[14] Permitting an effective voice for unpopular and minority views—views political parties may not embrace—is essential to deliberative democracy. The goal should be to bring the views of all citizens into the political arena for consideration, be they accepted or rejected at the end of the day. Free speech in the public square may not be curtailed merely because one might find the message unappetizing or the messenger distasteful (Figueroa, ... at para. 28):

Put simply, full political debate ensures that ours is an open society with the benefit of a broad range of ideas and opinions. ... This, in turn, ensures not only that policy makers are aware of a broad range of options, but also that the determination of social policy is sensitive to the needs and interests of a broad range of citizens.

Participation in political debate "is ... the primary means by which the average citizen participates in the open debate that animates the determination of social policy"; see Figueroa, at para. 29.

[15] The right to participate in political discourse is a right to effective participation—for each citizen to play a “meaningful” role in the democratic process[.] ...

[16] The ability to engage in effective speech in the public square means nothing if it does not include the ability to attempt to persuade one’s fellow citizens through debate and discussion. This is the kernel from which reasoned political discourse emerges. ...

[17] Freedom of expression protects not only the individual who speaks the message, but also the recipient. Members of the public—as viewers, listeners and readers—have a right to information on public governance, absent which they cannot cast an informed vote . . . Thus the Charter protects listeners as well as speakers; see Ford v. Quebec (Attorney General), ... [1988] 2 S.C.R. 712, at pp. 766-67.

[19] The Canada Elections Act undercuts the right to listen by withholding from voters an ingredient that is critical to their individual and collective deliberation: substantive analysis and commentary on political issues of the day. The spending limits impede the ability of citizens to communicate with one another through public fora and media during elections and curtail the diversity of perspectives heard and assessed by the electorate. Because citizens cannot mount effective national television, radio and print campaigns, the only sustained messages voters see and hear during the course of an election campaign are from political parties.

[20] It is clear that the right here at issue is of vital importance to Canadian democracy. In the democracy of ancient Athens, all citizens were able to meet and discuss the issues of the day in person. In our modern democracy, we cannot speak personally with each of our fellow citizens. We can convey our message only through methods of mass communication. ... The ability to speak in one’s own home or on a remote street corner does not fulfill the objective of the guarantee of freedom of expression, which is that each citizen be afforded the opportunity to present her views for public consumption and attempt to persuade her fellow citizens. Pell J.’s observation could not be more apt: “[s]peech without effective communication is not speech but an idle monologue in the wilderness”; see United States v. Dellinger, 472 F.2d 340 (7th Cir. 1972), at p. 415.

[21] This is the perspective from which we must approach the question whether the limitation on citizen spending is justified. It is no answer to say that the citizen can speak through a registered political party. The citizen may hold views not espoused by a registered party. The citizen[s] right to communicate those views ... lies at the core of the free expression guarantee. That does not mean that the right cannot be limited. But it does mean that limits on it must be supported by a clear and convincing demonstration that they are necessary, do not go too far, and enhance more than harm the democratic process.

(2) The Law’s Objective: Is It Pressing and Substantial?

[22] ... The Attorney General states that the objective of the legislation is to promote fair elections.

[23] In more concrete terms, the limits are purported to further three objectives: first, to favour equality, by preventing those with greater means from dominating electoral debate; second, to foster informed citizenship, by ensuring that some positions are not drowned out by others (this is related to the right to participate in the political process by casting an informed vote); third, to enhance public confidence by ensuring equality, a better informed citizenship and fostering the appearance and reality of fairness in the democratic process.

[26] Common sense dictates that promoting electoral fairness is a pressing and substantial objective in our liberal democracy, even in the absence of evidence that past elections have been unfair

C. Proportionality

[31] The real question in this case . . . is whether the limits go too far in their incursion on free political expression.

[33] It is impossible to say whether an infringement is carefully tailored to the asserted goals without having some idea of the actual seriousness of the problem being addressed. The yardstick by which excessive interference with rights is measured is the need for the remedial infringement. If a serious problem is demonstrated, more serious measures may be needed to tackle it. Conversely, if a problem is only hypothetical, severe curtailments on an important right may be excessive.

[34] . . . The Attorney General presented no evidence that wealthier Canadians—alone or in concert—will dominate political debate during the electoral period absent limits. It offered only the hypothetical possibility that, without limits on citizen spending, problems could arise. If, as urged by the Attorney General, wealthy Canadians are poised to hijack this country's election process, an expectation of some evidence to that effect is reasonable. Yet none was presented. This minimizes the Attorney General's assertions of necessity and lends credence to the argument that the legislation is an overreaction to a non-existent problem.

[35] On the other side of the equation, the infringement on the right is severe. We earlier reviewed the stringency of the limits. They prevent citizens from effectively communicating with their fellow citizens on election issues during a campaign. . . . Citizens are limited to 1.3 percent of the expenditures of registered political parties. This is significantly lower than other countries that have also imposed citizen spending limits. It is not an exaggeration to say that the limits imposed on citizens amount to a virtual ban on their participation in political debate during the election period. In actuality, the only space left in the marketplace of ideas is for political parties and their candidates. The right of each citizen to have her voice heard, so vaunted in Figueroa, supra, is effectively negated unless the citizen is able or willing to speak through a political party.

[38] There is no demonstration that limits this draconian are required to meet the perceived dangers of inequality, an uninformed electorate and the public perception that the system is unfair. On the contrary, the measures may themselves exacerbate these dangers. Citizens who cannot effectively communicate with others on electoral issues may feel they are being treated unequally compared to citizens who speak through political parties. The absence of their messages may result in the public being less well informed than it would otherwise be. And a process that bans citizens from effective participation in the electoral debate during an election campaign may well be perceived as unfair. These fears may be hypothetical, but no more so than the fears conjured by the Attorney General in support of the infringement.

[39] This is not to suggest that election spending limits are never permissible. On the contrary, this Court . . . has recognized that they are an acceptable, even desirable, tool to ensure fairness and faith in the electoral process. Limits that permit citizens to conduct effective and persuasive communication with their fellow citizens might well meet the minimum impairment test. The problem here is that the draconian nature of the infringement—to effectively deprive all those who do not or cannot speak through political parties of their voice during an election period—overshoots the perceived danger. Even recognizing that “[t]he tailoring process seldom admits of perfection” … , and according Parliament a healthy measure of deference, we are left with the fact that nothing in the evidence suggests that a virtual ban on citizen communication through effective advertising is required to avoid the hypothetical evils of inequality, a misinformed public and loss of public confidence in the system.

[Chief Justice McLachlin and Major J then moved to the proportionality branch of the Oakes test.]

[41] Given the unproven and speculative nature of the danger the limits are said to address, the possible benefits conferred by the law are illusory. The smaller the danger, the less the benefit conferred. Yet the infringement is serious. It denies the citizen the right of effective political communication except through a registered party. … The measures may actually cause more inequality, less civic engagement and greater disrepute than they avoid. In the absence of any evidence to the contrary, it cannot be said that the infringement does more good than harm.

[42] Having had the advantage of reviewing the reasons of Bastarache J., we believe it is important to make three observations. First, whether or not citizens dispose of sufficient funds to meet or exceed the existing spending limits is irrelevant. What is important is that citizens have the capacity, should they so choose, to exercise their right to free political speech. The spending limits as they currently stand do not allow this. Instead, they have a chilling effect on political speech, forcing citizens into a Hobson’s choice between not expressing themselves at all or having their voice reduced to a mere whisper. Faced with such options, citizens could not be faulted for choosing the former.

[43] Second, it is important to recognize that the spending limits do not constrain the right of only a few citizens to speak. They constrain the political speech of all Canadians, be they of superior or modest means. Whether it is a citizen incurring expenditures of $3001 for leafleting in her riding or a group of citizens pooling 1501 individual contributions of $100 to run a national advertising campaign, the Charter protects the right to free political speech.

[44] Finally, even if were true that spending limits constrained the political speech rights of only a few citizens, it would be no answer to say, as suggests Bastarache J., at para. 112, that few citizens can afford to spend more than the limits anyway. This amounts to saying that even if the breach of s. 2(b) is not justified, it does not matter because it affects only a few people. Charter breaches cannot be justified on this basis. Moreover, one may question the premise that only a few people are affected by the spending limits. Indeed, if so few can afford to spend more than the existing limits, why, one may ask, are they needed?

BASTARACHE J (Iacobucci, Arbour, LeBel, Deschamps, and Fish JJ concurring):

V. Analysis

A. Third Party Electoral Advertising Regime

[55] Numerous groups and organizations participate in the electoral process as third parties[,] … to achieve three purposes. First, third parties may seek to influence the outcome of an election[.] … Second, third parties may add a fresh perspective or new dimension to the discourse surrounding one or more issues associated with a candidate or political party. ... Third, they may add an issue to the political debate and in some cases force candidates and political parties to address it.

[57] Parliament enacted new third party spending limits as part of a larger third party electoral advertising regime in the 2000 Canada Elections Act. Part 17 of the Act, ss. 349 to 362, creates a scheme that limits the advertising expenses of individuals and groups who are not candidates or political parties. The scheme also requires such expenses to be reported to the Chief Electoral Officer. ...

[59] This case represents the first opportunity for this Court to determine the constitutionality of the third party election advertising regime established by Parliament. This Court has however previously considered the constitutionality of limits on independent spending in the regulation of referendums in Libman

B. Libman v. Quebec (Attorney General)

[60] In Libman, the Court was asked to determine the constitutionality of the independent spending limits set out in Quebec's referenda legislation, the Referendum Act, R.S.Q., c. C-64.1. ... [The details of the legislation are omitted.]

[61] The Court agreed that the limits on independent spending set out in the Referendum Act were not justified. The Court did, however, endorse spending limits as an essential means of promoting fairness in referenda and elections which the Court held were parallel processes: Libman, at para. 46. The Court ... endorsed [the following principles (at paras. 47-50)]:

- [1] ... Owing to the competitive nature of elections, ... spending limits are necessary to prevent the most affluent from monopolizing election discourse and consequently depriving their opponents of a reasonable opportunity to speak and be heard [equal dissemination of points of view].
- [2] Spending limits are also necessary to guarantee the right of electors to be adequately informed of all the political positions advanced by the candidates and by the various political parties [free and informed vote]. ...
- [3] For spending limits to be fully effective, they must apply to all possible election expenses ...
- [4] The actions of independent individuals and groups can [either] directly or indirectly support one of the parties or candidates, thereby resulting in an imbalance in the financial resources each candidate or political party is permitted. ...
- [5] It is also important to limit independent spending more strictly than spending by candidates or political parties [because of the former's much greater numbers]. ... [Emphasis added.]

[62] The Court's conception of electoral fairness as reflected in the foregoing principles is consistent with the egalitarian model of elections adopted by Parliament as an essential component of our democratic society. This model ... promotes an electoral process that requires the wealthy to be prevented from controlling the electoral process to the detriment of others with less economic power. The state can equalize participation in the electoral process in two ways ... [by providing] a voice to those who might otherwise not be heard. The Act does so by reimbursing candidates and political parties and by providing broadcast time to political parties. Second, the State can restrict the voices which dominate the political discourse so that others may be heard as well. In Canada, electoral regulation has focussed on the latter by regulating electoral spending through comprehensive election finance provisions. ... In contrast, the libertarian model of elections favours an electoral process subject to as few restrictions as possible.

[63] The current third party election advertising regime is Parliament's response to this Court's decision in Libman. The regime is clearly structured on the egalitarian model of elections. The overarching objective of the regime is to promote electoral fairness by creating equality in the political discourse. The regime promotes the equal dissemination of points of view by limiting the election advertising of third parties who, as this Court has recognized, are important and influential participants in the electoral process. The advancement of equality and fairness in elections ultimately encourages public confidence in the electoral system. Thus, broadly speaking, the third party election advertising regime is consistent with an egalitarian conception of elections and the principles endorsed by this Court in Libman.

C. Election Advertising Expense Limits

(1) Freedom of Expression

[66] The appellant rightly concedes that the limits on election advertising expenses infringe s. 2(b) of the Charter. ...

[Justice Bastarache found that the section did not breach s 3 of the Charter, the right to vote.]

(3) The Section 1 Justification Applicable to the Infringement of Freedom of Expression

[75] The central issue at this stage of the analysis is the nature and sufficiency of the evidence required for the Attorney General to demonstrate that the limits imposed on freedom of expression are reasonable and justifiable in a free and democratic society. ...

[76] This is not the first time the Court has addressed the standard of proof the Crown must satisfy in demonstrating possible harm. Nor is it the first time that the Court has been faced with conflicting social science evidence regarding the problem that Parliament seeks to address. ... The context of the impugned provision determines the type of proof that a court will require of the legislature to justify its measures under s. 1; see Thomson Newspapers, at para. 88. As this pivotal issue affects the entire s. 1 analysis, it is helpful to consider the contextual factors at the outset.

(a) Contextual Factors

(i) The Nature of the Harm and the Inability to Measure It

[77] The legislature is not required to provide scientific proof based on concrete evidence of the problem it seeks to address in every case. Where the court is faced with inconclusive or competing social science evidence relating the harm to the legislature's measures, the court may rely on a reasoned apprehension of that harm.

[Justice Bastarache then cited Keegstra, Butler, and Sharpe, among others.]

[79] ... [T]he nature of the harm and the efficaciousness of Parliament's remedy in this case is difficult, if not impossible, to measure scientifically. The harm which Parliament seeks to address can be broadly articulated as electoral unfairness. Several experts, as well as the Lortie Commission, concluded that unlimited third party advertising can undermine election fairness in several ways. First, it can lead to the dominance of the political discourse by the wealthy Second, it may allow candidates and political parties to circumvent their own spending limits through the creation of third parties Third, unlimited third party spending can have an unfair effect on the outcome of an election Fourth, the absence of limits ... can erode the confidence of the Canadian electorate who perceive the electoral process as being dominated by the wealthy. This harm is difficult, if not impossible, to measure because of the subtle ways in which advertising influences human behaviour; the influence of other factors such as the media and polls; and the multitude of issues, candidates and independent parties involved in the electoral process. In light of these difficulties, logic and reason assisted by some social science evidence is sufficient proof of the harm that Parliament seeks to remedy.

(ii) Vulnerability of the Group

[80] Third party spending limits seek to protect two groups. First, the limits seek to protect the Canadian electorate by ensuring that it is possible to hear from all groups and thus promote a more informed vote. Generally, the Canadian electorate "must be presumed to have a certain degree of maturity and intelligence"; see Thomson Newspapers, supra, at para. 101. Where, however, third party advertising seeks to systematically manipulate the voter, the Canadian electorate may be seen as more vulnerable; see Thomson Newspapers, at para. 114.

[Justice Bastarache noted that candidates and political parties are not "vulnerable" (at para 81).]

(iii) Subjective Fears and Apprehension of Harm

[82] Perception is of utmost importance in preserving and promoting the electoral regime in Canada. ... Where Canadians perceive elections to be unfair, voter apathy follows shortly thereafter.

[83] Several surveys indicate that Canadians view third party spending limits as an effective means of advancing electoral fairness. Indeed, in Libman, supra, at para. 52, the Court relied on the survey conducted by the Lortie Commission illustrating that 75 percent of Canadians supported limits on spending by interest groups to conclude that spending limits are important to maintain public confidence in the electoral system.

(iv) The Nature of the Infringed Activity: Political Expression

[84] Third party advertising is political expression. ... As such, the election advertising of third parties lies at the core of the expression guaranteed by the Charter and warrants a high degree of constitutional protection. ...

[85] In some circumstances, however, third party advertising will be less deserving of constitutional protection. Indeed, it is possible that third parties having access to significant financial resources can manipulate political discourse to their advantage through political advertising. ...

There is no evidence before the Court that indicates that third party advertising seeks to be manipulative. Nor is there any evidence that third parties wish to use their advertising dollars to smear candidates or engage in other forms of non-political discourse. Nevertheless, the danger that political advertising may manipulate or oppress the voter means that some deference to the means chosen by Parliament is warranted.

[86] ... Further, by limiting political expression, the spending limits bring greater balance to the political discourse and allow for more meaningful participation in the electoral process. Thus, the provisions also enhance a second Charter right, the right to vote.

[87] Under the egalitarian model of elections, Parliament must balance the rights and privileges of the participants in the electoral process: candidates, political parties, third parties and voters. ... The difficulties of striking this balance are evident. Given the right of Parliament to choose Canada's electoral model and the nuances inherent in implementing this model, the Court must approach the justification analysis with deference. The lower courts erred in failing to do so (Paperny J.A., at para. 135). In the end, the electoral system, which regulates many aspects of an election, including its duration and the control and reimbursement of expenses, reflects a political choice, the details of which are better left to Parliament.

[Justice Bastarache rejected the argument that the third-party advertising regime was too vague as to constitute a limit prescribed by law.]

(c) Is the Objective Pressing and Substantial?

[91] The overarching objective of the third party election advertising limits is electoral fairness. Equality in the political discourse promotes electoral fairness and is achieved, in part, by restricting the participation of those who have access to significant financial resources. The more voices that have access to the political discourse, the more voters will be empowered to exercise their right in a meaningful and informed manner. Canadians understandably have greater confidence in an electoral system which ultimately encourages increased participation.

[94] In this case, the Lortie Report is the central piece of the evidentiary record establishing the possible harm engendered by uncontrolled third party advertising and justifying the limits set by Parliament on the advertising expenses of third parties.

[100] In my view, the findings of the Lortie Report can be relied upon in this appeal to determine whether the third party advertising limits are justified. ... [Here Bastarache J cited the intention to promote equality in political discourse, to protect integrity of the electoral finance regime, and to maintain confidence in the electoral process.]

(d) Rational Connection

[104] ... The lower courts erred by demanding too stringent a level of proof, in essence, by requiring the Attorney General to establish an empirical connection between third party spending limits and the objectives of s. 350. There is sufficient evidence establishing a rational connection between third party advertising expense limits and promoting equality in the political discourse, protecting the integrity of the financing regime applicable to candidates and parties, and maintaining confidence in the electoral process. [Bastarache J's elaboration of these points is omitted.]

(e) Minimal Impairment

[111] ... In this case, the contextual factors indicate that the Court should afford deference to the balance Parliament has struck between political expression and meaningful participation in the electoral process. As Berger J.A. in dissent aptly noted, at para. 268, "[t]he Court should not substitute judicial opinion for legislative choice in the face of a genuine and reasonable attempt to balance the fundamental value of freedom of expression against the need for fairness in the electoral process."

[112] The Chief Justice and Major J. assert that short of spending well over $150,000 nationally and $3,000 in a given electoral district, citizens cannot effectively communicate their views on election issues to their fellow citizens (para. 9). Respectfully, this ignores the fact that third party advertising is not restricted prior to the commencement of the election period. Outside this time, the limits on third party intervention in political life do not exist. Any group or individual may freely spend money or advertise to make its views known or to persuade others. In fact, many of these groups are not formed for the purpose of an election but are already organized and have a continued presence, mandate and political view which they promote. Many groups and individuals will reinforce their message during an electoral campaign.

[113] The nature of Canada's political system must be considered when deciding whether individuals and groups who engage in election advertising will be affected unduly by the limits set out in s. 350. First, ... there are few obstacles for individuals to join existing political parties or to create their own Still, some will participate outside the party affiliations; this explains why the existence of multiple organizations and parties of varying sizes requires Parliament to balance their participation during the election period. Further, ... the vast majority of Canadian citizens simply cannot spend $150,000 nationally or $3,000 in a given electoral district. What prevents most citizens from effectively exercising their right of political free speech ... is a lack of means, not legislative restrictions. ... I do not suggest that since the breach of s. 2(b) only affects a few people, it is therefore justifiable. As discussed, the objective is to ensure the political discourse is not dominated by those who have greater resources. The proper focus is on protecting the right to meaningful participation of the entire electorate. Let me now examine in more detail how this is achieved.

[114] Section 350 minimally impairs the right to free expression. The definition of "election advertising" in s. 319 only applies to advertising that is associated with a candidate or party. Where an issue is not associated with a candidate or political party, third parties may partake in an unlimited advertising campaign.

[115] The $3,000 limit per electoral district and $150,000 national limit allow for meaningful participation in the electoral process while respecting the right to free expression. Why? First, because the limits established in s. 350 allow third parties to advertise in a limited way in some expensive forms of media such as television, newspaper and radio. But, more importantly, the limits are high enough to allow third parties to engage in a significant amount of low cost forms of advertising such as computer generated posters or leaflets or the creation of a 1-800 number. In addition, the definition of "election advertising" in s. 319 does not apply to many forms of communication such as editorials, debates, speeches, interviews, columns, letters, commentary, the news and the Internet which constitute highly effective means of conveying information. Thus, as the trial judge concluded, at para. 78, the limits allow for "modest, national, informational campaigns and reasonable electoral district informational campaigns."

[116] Second, the limits set out in s. 350 are justifiably lower than the candidate and political party advertising limits, as recommended by the Lortie Commission. As this Court explained in Libman, supra, at paras. 49-50, the third party limit must be low enough to ensure that a particular candidate who is targeted by a third party has sufficient resources to respond. ... The limits must also account for the fact that third parties generally have lower overall expenses than candidates and political parties. The limits must also appreciate that third parties tend to focus on one issue and may therefore achieve their objective less expensively. Thus, the limits seek to preserve a balance between the resources available to candidates and parties taking part in an election and those resources that might be available to third parties during this period. Professor Fletcher confirmed (in evidence) that the limits set out in s. 350 achieve this goal.

[118] Certainly, one can conceive of less impairing limits. Indeed, any limit greater than $150,000 would be less impairing. Nevertheless, s. 350 satisfies this stage of the Oakes analysis. The limits allow third parties to inform the electorate of their message in a manner that will not overwhelm candidates, political parties or other third parties. The limits preclude the voices of the wealthy from dominating the political discourse, thereby allowing more voices to be heard. The limits allow for meaningful participation in the electoral process and encourage informed voting. The limits promote a free and democratic society.

(f) Proportionality

[119] The final stage of the Oakes analysis requires the Court to weigh the deleterious effects against the salutary effects.

[120] ... By ensuring that affluent groups or individuals do not dominate the political discourse, s. 350 promotes the political expression of those who are less affluent or less capable of obtaining access to significant financial resources and ensures that candidates and political parties who are subject to spending limits are not overwhelmed by third party advertising. Section 350 also protects the integrity of the candidate and political party spending limits by ensuring that these limits are not circumvented through the creation of phony third parties. Finally, s. 350 promotes fairness and accessibility in the electoral system and consequently increases Canadians' confidence in it.

[121] The deleterious effect of s. 350 is that the spending limits do not allow third parties to engage in unlimited political expression. That is, third parties are permitted to engage in informational but not necessarily persuasive campaigns, especially when acting alone. When weighed against the salutary effects of the legislation, the limits must be upheld. As the Court explained in Libman, supra, at para. 84:

... Freedom of political expression, so dear to our democratic tradition, would lose much value if it could only be exercised in a context in which the economic power of the most affluent members of society constituted the ultimate guidepost of our political choices. Nor would it be much better served by a system that undermined the confidence of citizens in the referendum process. [... emphasis added.]

Accordingly, s. 350 should be upheld as a demonstrably justified limit in a free and democratic society.

[The majority decision upheld other provisions of the Canada Elections Act—most notably, the ban on transmitting election advertising on polling day.] [Emphasis in original.]

Appeal allowed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Claims that unlimited spending might enable wealthier candidates to “drown out” or “bury” their less wealthy opponents are a familiar part of the case for ceilings. Yet how do the voices of the wealthy “drown out” or “bury” the voices of others? Why does unequal spending matter? How does it translate into unequal campaign influence?

2. In Thomson Newspapers Co v Canada (AG), [1998] 1 SCR 877, 1998 CanLII 829, the Supreme Court of Canada struck down the federal ban on the publication of election campaign polls during the final days of the campaign (s 322.1 of the Canada Elections Act, RSC 1985, c E-2). The federal government argued that the ban was necessary “to prevent the potentially distorting effect of public opinion survey results that are released late in an election campaign leaving insufficient time to assess their validity” (at para 22).

Justice Bastarache, for the majority, dismissed this argument. He recognized that polls might contain information useful to voters. Late poll results, in particular, might be useful to those who want to vote strategically—that is, to vote for their second choice if their first choice seems to have no chance of winning. In any event, argued Bastarache J, it is up to voters to decide what information they want to take into account when deciding how to vote: “If they feel that their votes are better informed as a result of having this information, then the ban not only interferes with their freedom of expression, but with their perception of the freeness and validity of their vote” (at para 129).

We should not, said Bastarache J, underestimate the capacity of voters to assess polls. Voters are exposed to opinion polls throughout the campaign and are likely to spot a single inaccurate poll result. More generally, a commitment to democracy and to freedom of expression means that we must presume that the Canadian voter “is a rational actor who can learn from experience and make independent judgments about the value of particular sources of electoral information” (at para 112). Canadian voters must be “presumed to have a certain degree of maturity and intelligence” (at para 101). One cannot assume that “Canadians will become so mesmerized by the flurry of polls” (at para 101) in the media that they will forget about the real issues.

Justice Gonthier dissented. In his view, the ban permitted timely discussion and careful scrutiny of all published poll results and so contributed to “the promotion of an informed vote over a misinformed vote” (at para 25).

3. In R v Bryan, the Supreme Court of Canada dealt with a s 2(b) challenge to s 329 of the Canada Elections Act, SC 2000, c 9, which prohibits the broadcasting of election results on election day until polling stations are closed in all parts of Canada. The facts involved the federal general election of November 27, 2000, during which the appellant transmitted the election results from Atlantic Canada, while polling stations remained open in other parts of Canada, by posting the results on a website. The results were therefore available to the public in every electoral district in Canada. The appellant had made his intention to do so public before the election, and the commissioner of Canada Elections had warned him that such publication would be contrary to s 329 of the Canada Elections Act. A majority of the Court held that while s 329 infringed s 2(b), the infringement was justified under s 1. The pressing and substantial purpose of the provision was to ensure “informational equality” and to avoid the perception of unfairness that occurs when some voters have access to information that is not available to others and the possibility that access to that information will affect voter participation or choices. Because of the difficulty of policing social media, s 329 was repealed in 2014: see Fair Elections Act, SC 2014, c 12, s 73.

VII. ACCESS TO PUBLIC PROPERTY

Freedom of expression should be open to all, not only to those who can afford to rent halls or buy advertising space. In the United States, the “public forum” doctrine constitutionally permits the use of government-owned property for the exercise of freedom of speech if that property is ordinarily open to the public, such as streets and parks. The state may restrict the content of speech in a public forum only for substantial and compelling reasons and only if the restriction is narrowly drawn. Content-neutral restrictions (time, place, and manner restrictions) will be justified only if they serve an important state interest and leave open alternative channels of communication. In non-public forums, places not ordinarily open to the public, such as government workplaces, restrictions on speech are permissible so long as they are “rational” and are not content-based or directed at particular viewpoints. This grants to government wide discretion to limit expressive activity in non-public forums. Other spaces, which are not traditional public forums, may be “designated” as such by government, in which case government restrictions will be scrutinized more carefully, as if they were traditional public forums: see Cass R Sunstein, Democracy and the Problem of Free Speech (New York: The Free Press, 1993) at 101–3. In International Society for Krishna Consciousness, Inc v Lee, 505 US 672, 112 S Ct 2701 (1992), the US Supreme Court ruled that airports were not public forums for the purposes of the First Amendment because they were not traditional public forums.

Canadian courts have also accepted that freedom of expression must include the right to communicate on state-owned property—that in the absence of any right to communicate on state-owned property, many individuals would be significantly hindered in their ability to communicate with others. Yet the issue of communicative access to state property does not seem to fit neatly into the standard two-step model of freedom of expression adjudication. As you read the following cases, consider why this might be so.

NOTE: COMMITTEE FOR THE COMMONWEALTH OF CANADA V CANADA

In 1984, officials at Dorval Airport in Montreal prevented three members of the Committee for the Republic of Canada from communicating their political views to passersby in the public areas of the airport. The committee members were told that their activities—speaking with passersby and distributing leaflets—violated a federal airport regulation, which provided that “no person shall (1) conduct any business or undertaking, commercial or otherwise, at an airport; (2) advertise or solicit at an airport for the purpose of any business or undertaking” without the authorization of the Minister. The airport management indicated that the only exception made to the regulation was the sale of poppies by veterans every November. The case was appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada. In Committee for the Commonwealth of Canada v Canada, [1991] 1 SCR 139, 1991 CanLII 119 all members of the Court agreed that the airport authorities’ interference with the respondents’ communication of political views was a restriction on freedom of expression that could not be justified under s 1. However, three different approaches to the issue of communicative access were put forward by the Court:

1. Chief Justice Lamer took the position that the question of whether an individual has a right to communicate on state-owned property should be resolved under s 2(b) and depend simply on whether the particular communication is consistent or compatible with the state’s use of the property. A restriction that is based on the incompatibility of the particular form of expression with the state’s property use does not violate s 2(b) and so does not require special justification under s 1.
2. Justice McLachlin adopted what she regarded as the reasonable “middle ground” on the issue of communicative access to state property, “between the extremes of the right to expression on all government property and the right to expression on none.”

According to McLachlin J, a restriction on communicative access to state-owned property that is based not on content but on the incompatibility of access with the state's use of its property will violate s 2(b) only if the restricted communication can be shown to advance expression values. Constitutional protection of access should extend "to expression on some but not all government property." Communicative access to certain state-owned properties—"private" state properties such as prison cells, judge's private chambers, private government offices, and publicly owned broadcasting facilities—would not advance the values of democracy, truth, and autonomy. Such places were neither "places of public debate aimed at promoting either the truth or a better understanding of social and political issues," nor related to "the maximization of individual fulfillment and human flourishing." A restriction on communicative access to a private, state-owned property will not violate s 2(b) and so will not require justification under s 1. On the other hand, McLachlin J considered that the purposes of the guarantee of free expression are served by protecting expression in public forums, "which have by tradition of designation been dedicated to public expressions." A restriction on communicative access to a "public forum" will violate s 2(b) and so will require justification under s 1.

3. Justice L'Heureux-Dubé took the view that any time the state restricts expression on its property, it violates s 2(b) and must justify the restriction under s 1. Any restriction of expression on state property must satisfy the rationality, minimal impairment, and proportionality standards of s 1. She suggested, however, that these standards should not be applied strictly in access to public property cases. Instead, she called for a flexible balancing of competing state and individual interests under s 1.

In Committee for the Commonwealth of Canada, the Supreme Court of Canada seemed to adopt a version of the public forum doctrine. Why do you think it did so? For an argument that issues related to the location of speech should be dealt with under s 1 of the Charter, see Brian Slattery, "Freedom of Expression and Location: Are There Constitutional Dead Zones?" (2010) 51 SCLR (2d) 245.

NOTE: RAMSDEN V PETERBOROUGH (CITY)

In Ramsden v Peterborough (City), a local musician affixed posters announcing an upcoming performance to hydro poles. He was charged with contravening a municipal by-law that imposed an absolute prohibition on the affixing of posters on any public property. Without resolving the issue of the appropriate test for communicative access to public property, all members of the Court agreed that the by-law was an unjustifiable infringement of freedom of expression. In establishing a violation of freedom of expression, Iacobucci J, writing for the Court, noted that "posters have communicated political, cultural and social information for centuries. Posterizing on public property, including utility poles, increases the availability of those messages, and thereby fosters social and historical decision-making." Reference was made to the evidence of an art historian who testified that [p]osters have always been a medium of communication of revolutionary and unpopular ideas. They have been called "the circulating libraries of the poor." They have been not only a political weapon but also a means of communicating artistic, cultural, and commercial messages.

In the s 1 analysis, the Court found that the municipality's concerns with litter and aesthetic blight, while legitimate, could be met in a manner far less restrictive than an absolute ban. It referred to such alternatives as regulating the use of [utility] poles for such purposes by specifying or regulating the location, size of posters, the length of time that a poster might remain on any location, the type of substance used to affix posters, and requiring that the posters be removed after a certain specified time. If necessary, a reasonable fee could be imposed to defray costs of administering such a system.

In the following case, the Court reviewed its prior decisions and attempted to articulate a single test for communicative access to public property. Do you think the Court succeeded?

Montréal (City) v 2952-1366 Québec Inc

McLACHLIN CJ and DESCHAMPS J (Bastarache, LeBel, Abella, and Charron JJ concurring):

1. Introduction

[2] In light of its scope, art. 9(1) of the By-law concerning noise, RBCM 1994, c. B-3 ("By-law"), was validly adopted by the City pursuant to its regulatory powers. Although this provision limits the freedom of expression guaranteed by s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter, the limit is reasonable and can be justified within the meaning of s. 1 of the Canadian Charter.

2. Origins of the Case

[3] The respondent operates a club featuring female dancers in a commercial zone of downtown Montréal, in a building fronting Ste-Catherine Street. To attract customers and compete with a similar establishment located nearby, the respondent set up, in the main entrance to its club, a loudspeaker that amplified the music and commentary accompanying the show under way inside so that passers-by would hear them. Around midnight on May 14, 1996, a police officer on patrol on Ste-Catherine Street heard the music from a nearby intersection. The respondent was charged with producing noise that could be heard outside using sound equipment, in violation of arts. 9(1) and 11 of the By-law. These provisions read as follows:

9. In addition to the noise referred to in article 8, the following noises, where they can be heard from the outside, are specifically prohibited:

(1) noise produced by sound equipment, whether it is inside a building or installed or used outside;

11. No noise specifically prohibited under articles 9 or 10 may be produced, whether or not it affects an inhabited place.

3. Analysis

3.1 Does the City Have the Power to Adopt Article 9(1) of the By-law?

[The majority held that, despite its general language, the by-law applied only to sounds that stood out over environmental noise.]

[36] It is not in dispute that the City has the power to define and prohibit nuisances. In adopting art. 9(1) of the By-law, the City was targeting noises that constitute a nuisance. We accordingly conclude that the City had the power to adopt art. 9(1) of the By-law.

3.2 Does Article 9(1) of the By-law Infringe Section 2(b) of the Canadian Charter?

3.2.1 Expressive Content

[58] The first question is whether the noise emitted by a loudspeaker from inside the club had expressive content. The answer must be yes. ... Expressive activity is not excluded from the scope of the guarantee because of its particular message. ...

3.2.2 Excluded Expression

[60] Expressive activity may fall outside the scope of s. 2(b) protection because of how or where it is delivered. ... For instance, this Court has found that violent expression is not protected by the Canadian Charter[.] ...

[61] This case raises the question of whether the location of the expression at issue causes the expression to be excluded from the scope of s. 2(b): see Committee for the Commonwealth of Canada v. Canada, ... [1991] 1 S.C.R. 139, per Lamer C.J. Property may be private or public. Public property is government-owned. In this case, although the loudspeaker was located on the respondent's private property, the sound issued onto the street, a public space owned by the government. One aspect of free expression is the right to express oneself in certain public spaces. Thus, the public square and the speakers' corner have by tradition become places of protected expression. The question here is whether s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter protects not only what the appellants were doing, but their right to do it in the place where they were doing it, namely a public street.

[62] Section 2(b) protection does not extend to all places. Private property, for example, will fall outside the protected sphere of s. 2(b) absent state-imposed limits on expression, since state action is necessary to implicate the Canadian Charter. Public property, however, may be more problematic since, by definition, it implicates the state. Two countervailing arguments, both powerful, are pitted against each other where the issue is expression on public property.

[63] The argument for s. 2(b) protection on all public property focuses on ownership. ... The government as the owner of property controls it. It follows that restrictions on the use of public property for expressive purposes are "government acts." Therefore, it is argued, the government is limiting the right to free expression guaranteed by s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter and must justify this under s. 1.

[64] The argument against s. 2(b) protection on at least some government-owned property, by contrast, focuses on the distinction between public use of property and private use of property. Regardless of the fact that the government owns and hence controls its property, it is asserted, many government places are essentially private in use. Some areas of government-owned property have become recognized as public spaces in which the public has a right to express itself. But other areas, like private offices and diverse places of public business, have never been viewed as available spaces for public expression. It cannot have been the intention of the drafters of the Canadian Charter, the argument continues, to confer a prima facie right of free expression in these essentially private spaces and to cast the onus on the government to justify the exclusion of public expression from places that have always and unquestionably been off-limits to public expression and could not effectively function if they were open to the public.

[65] In Committee for the Commonwealth of Canada, six of seven judges endorsed the second general approach, although they adopted different tests for determining whether the government-owned property at issue was public or private in nature. [Those approaches were discussed in the note above.] ...

[66] In this case, as in Ramsden v. Peterborough (City), ... [1993] 2 S.C.R. 1084, we are satisfied that on any of the tests proposed in Committee for the Commonwealth of Canada, the emission of noise onto a public street is protected by s. 2(b). The activity is expressive. The evidence does not establish that ... a building-mounted amplifier emitting noise onto a public street ... impede[s] the function of city streets or fail[s] to promote the values that underlie the free expression guarantee.

[67] This method of expression is not repugnant to the primary function of a public street, on the test of Lamer C.J. Streets provide means of passing and accessing adjoining buildings. They also serve as venues of public communication. However one defines their function, emitting noise produced by sound equipment onto public streets seems not in itself to interfere with it. If sound equipment were being used in a way that prevented people from using the street for passage or communication, the answer might be different However, the evidence here does not establish this.

[68] The method and location of the expression also arguably serve the values that underlie the guarantee of free expression, on the approach advocated by McLachlin J. Amplified emissions of noise from buildings onto a public street could further democratic discourse, truth finding and self-fulfillment. Again, if the evidence showed that the amplification inhibited passage and communication on the street, the situation might be different. Th[at argument rests on content] ... , and cannot be considered in addressing the issue of whether the method or location of the expression itself is inimical to s. 2(b).

[69] Finally, on the analysis of L'Heureux-Dubé J. in Committee for the Commonwealth of Canada, the expressive content of the noise mandates the conclusion that it is protected by s. 2(b) and propels the analysis directly into s. 1, where justification is the issue.

[70] It follows that ... it is unnecessary to revisit the question of which of the divergent approaches to the issue of expression on public property should be adopted. However, since we are requested to clarify the test, we offer the following views.

[71] We agree with the view of the majority in Committee for the Commonwealth of Canada that the application of s. 2(b) is not attracted by the mere fact of government ownership of the place in question. There must be a further enquiry

[72] Expressive activity should be excluded from the protective scope of s. 2(b) only if its method or location clearly undermines the values that underlie the guarantee. Violent expression ... provides a useful analogy. Violent expression ... may serve to enhance the self-fulfillment of the perpetrator. However, it is not protected by s. 2(b) because violent means and methods undermine the values that s. 2(b) seeks to protect. ... Similarly, in determining what public spaces fall outside s. 2(b) protection, we must ask whether free expression in a given place undermines the values underlying s. 2(b).

[73] We therefore propose the following test for the application of s. 2(b) to public property The onus of satisfying this test rests on the claimant.

[74] The basic question ... is whether the place is a public place where one would expect constitutional protection for free expression on the basis that expression in that place does not conflict with the purposes which s. 2(b) is intended to serve, namely (1) democratic discourse, (2) truth finding and (3) self-fulfillment. To answer this question, the following factors should be considered:

- (a) the historical or actual function of the place; and
- (b) whether other aspects of the place suggest that expression within it would undermine the values underlying free expression.

[75] The historical function of a place for public discourse is an indicator that expression in that place is consistent with the purposes of s. 2(b). In places where free expression has traditionally occurred, it is unlikely that protecting expression undermines the values underlying the freedom. As a result, where historical use for free expression is made out, the location of the expression as it relates to public property will be protected.

[76] Actual function is also important. Is the space in fact essentially private, despite being government-owned, or is it public? Is the function of the space—the activity going on there—compatible with open public expression? Or is the activity one that requires privacy and limited access? Would an open right to intrude and present one's message by word or action be consistent with what is done in the space? Or would it hamper the activity? Many government functions, from cabinet meetings to minor clerical functions, require privacy. To extend a right of free expression to such venues might well undermine democracy and efficient governance.

[77] Historical and actual functions serve as markers for places where free expression would have the effect of undermining the values underlying the freedom of expression. The ultimate question, however, will always be whether free expression in the place at issue would undermine the values the guarantee is designed to promote. Most cases will be resolved on the basis of historical or actual function. However, we cannot discount the possibility that other factors may be relevant. Changes in society and technology may affect the spaces where expression should be protected having regard to the values that underlie the guarantee. The proposed test reflects this, by permitting factors other than historical or actual function to be considered where relevant.

[78] The markers of historical and actual functions will provide ready answers in most cases. However, we must accept that, ... some imprecision is inevitable. ... This said, the historical and actual functions of a place is something that can be established by evidence. As courts rule on what types of spaces are inherently public, a central core of certainty may be expected to evolve with respect to when expression in a public place will undermine the values underlying the freedom of expression.

[79] Another concern is whether the proposed test screens out expression which merits protection, on the one hand, or admits too much clearly unprotected expression on the other. Our jurisprudence requires broad protection at the s. 2(b) stage The proposed test reflects this. However, it also reflects the reality that some places must remain outside the protected sphere of s. 2(b). People must know where they can and cannot express themselves and governments should not be required to justify every exclusion or regulation of expression under s. 1. ... [T]he test must provide a preliminary screening process. Otherwise, uncertainty will prevail Restricted access to many government-owned venues is part of our history and our constitutional tradition. The Canadian Charter was not intended to turn this state of affairs on its head.

[80] A final concern is whether the proposed test is flexible enough to accommodate future developments. ... Some say, for example, that the increasing privatization of government space will shift the debate to the private sector. Others say that the new spaces for communication created by electronic communication through the Internet will raise new questions on the issue of where the right to free speech applies. We do not suggest how the problems of the future will be answered. But it seems to us that a test that focuses on historical and actual functions as markers for public and private domains, adapted as necessary to accord with new situations and the values underlying the s. 2(b) guarantees, will be sufficiently flexible to meet the problems of the future.

[81] Applying the approach we propose to the case at bar confirms the conclusion ... that the expression at issue in this case falls within the protected sphere of s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter. The content, as already noted, is expressive. Viewed from the perspective of locus, the expression falls within the public domain. Streets are clearly areas of public, as opposed to private, concourse, where expression of many varieties has long been accepted. There is nothing to suggest that to permit this medium of expression would subvert the values of s. 2(b).

3.2.3 The Infringement

[82] This brings us to the third step of the Irwin Toy test. Having concluded that the expression falls within the protected scope of s. 2(b), we must ask whether the By-law impinges on protected expression, in purpose or effect.

[83] Here, the purpose of the By-law is benign. However, its effect is to restrict expression. Where the effect of a provision is to limit expression, a breach of s. 2(b) will be made out, provided the claimant shows that the expression at issue promotes one of the values underlying the freedom of expression: Irwin Toy, at p. 976.

[84] The electronically amplified noise at issue here encouraged passers-by to engage in the leisure activity of attending one of the performances held at the club. Generally speaking, engaging in lawful leisure activities promotes such values as individual self-fulfillment and human flourishing. The disputed value of particular expressions of self-fulfillment, like exotic dancing, does not negate this general proposition: R v. Butler, ... [1992] 1 S.C.R. 452, at p. 489. It follows that the By-law has the effect of restricting expression which promotes one of the values underlying s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter.

[85] We conclude that the City's ban on emitting amplified noise constitutes a limit on free expression under s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter.

3.3 Is the Limit Justified Under Section 1 of the Canadian Charter?

[89] [Applying the test from R v Oakes, [1986] 1 SCR 103, 1986 CanLII 46,] [w]e conclude that the objective of the limitation is pressing and substantial. The Superior Court judge, Boillard J., defined that objective as combatting noise pollution Noise pollution is a serious problem in urban centers, and cities like Montréal are entitled to act reasonably and responsibly in seeking to curb it.

[90] This brings us to proportionality. Proportionality is concerned with the means chosen to meet the objective. Here the City chose a two-pronged attack on noise pollution. First, it prohibited noises exceeding a stipulated degree of loudness: art. 8. Second, it prohibited particular noises—namely noise that can be heard from the outside and is produced by sound equipment, whether it is inside a building or installed or used outside: art. 9. Noise targeted by art. 9 is prohibited regardless of whether it affects an inhabited place: art. 11. It is important, however, to note that art. 9 does not represent an absolute ban. Unlike Ramsden, ... the scheme of the By-law in this case anticipates routine granting of licences as exceptions to the prohibition. ... The City has exercised this authority and granted permits to use sound equipment on hundreds of occasions There is no evidence that it has exercised this authority arbitrarily or to curb democratic discourse. Moreover, as discussed above, in para. 34, a contextual reading of the impugned provision leads to the conclusion that art. 9(1) only captures noise that interferes with the peaceful use and enjoyment of the urban environment. This is the essence of the regulatory scheme the City put in place to deal with noise pollution on its streets.

[91] The first question is whether the limit on noise produced by sound equipment is rationally connected to the City's objective of limiting noise in the streets. Clearly it is[.] ...

[92] The second question, and the most difficult, is whether the measure impairs the right in a reasonably minimal way.

[94] First, in dealing with social issues like this one, where interests and rights conflict, elected officials must be accorded a measure of latitude. The Court will not interfere simply because it can think of a better, less intrusive way to manage the problem. What is required is that the City establish that it has tailored the limit to the exigencies of the problem in a reasonable way. This is particularly so on environmental issues, where views and interests conflict and precision is elusive

[95] Second, it is far from clear that regulation by degree of loudness would effectively deal with the problem of noise pollution[.] ... Detecting and prosecuting violations could be difficult. Moreover, the regulation of sound levels alone would not prevent the possibility that multiple, simultaneous noises, each within the legal limit, could cumulatively exceed an acceptable sound level.

[96] Regulation by degree of loudness would not achieve the City's goal of eliminating, subject to exceptions, a certain type of sound—that produced by sound equipment. Moreover, regulation by sound level meters has definite limits. While some noises may be capable of being monitored in this way, some, like intermittent noises or random noises, cannot. Moreover, the suggestion was unrealistic. As Chamberland J.A. put it: [TRANSLATION] "[I]t would take a forest of sound level meters and an army of qualified technicians lying in waiting to monitor the noise produced by sound equipment at different times of day and night, everywhere in greater Montréal" (para. 119).

[97] Rights should never be sacrificed to mere administrative convenience. Here, however, the City contends that for a variety of reasons there was really no other practical way to deal with the complex problem it was facing. Accordingly, the City's measures do not go beyond what was reasonably necessary in the circumstances and, as a result, its regulatory plan is entitled to deference.

[98] It remains to consider whether the prejudicial effects on free expression ... are proportionate to the beneficial effects of the regulation. In our view, the test supports the conclusion that the By-law is valid.

[99] The expression limited by the By-law consists of noise produced by sound equipment that interferes with the peaceful use and enjoyment of the urban environment. This limitation therefore goes to the permitted forms of expression on city streets, regardless of content. Against this stand the benefits of reducing noise pollution on the street and in the neighbourhood. We acknowledge that in balancing the deleterious and positive effects of the By-law, account must be taken of the fact that the activity was taking place on a street with an active commercial nightlife in a large and sophisticated city. This does not, however, mean that its residents must necessarily be subjected to abuses of the enjoyment of their environment. As

Chamberland J.A. put it, [TRANSLATION] "the citizens of a city, even a city the size of Montréal, are entitled to a healthy environment. Noise control is unquestionably part of what must be done to improve the quality of this environment" (para. 129). We conclude that the beneficial effects of the By-law outweigh its prejudicial effects. [We therefore conclude that the By-law is constitutional.]

[In a dissenting judgment, Binnie J found that the by-law could not be interpreted as anything other than a ban on noise produced by sound equipment, regardless of its volume. In his view, the by-law breached s 2(b) and could not be justified under s 1 because it went beyond what could be considered minimal impairment.] [Emphasis in original.]

Appeal allowed.

NOTE: GREATER VANCOUVER TRANSPORTATION AUTHORITY V CANADIAN FEDERATION OF STUDENTS

In Greater Vancouver Transportation Authority v Canadian Federation of Students—British Columbia Component, 2009 SCC 31, the Court applied the two-factor City of Montréal test in a case where two public transit authorities, TransLink and BC Transit, refused to allow the Canadian Federation of Students—British Columbia Component (CFS) and the British Columbia Teachers' Federation (BCTF) to purchase advertising space on their buses. In anticipation of an upcoming provincial election, the CFS sought to post an advertisement depicting a silhouette of a crowd at a concert with the following text:

Register now. Learn the issues. Vote May 17, 2005.
ROCKTHEVOTEBC.com

The second advertisement was a "banner ad" placed along the top of the bus, which would have read in one long line as follows:

Tuition fees ROCKTHEVOTEBC.com Minimum wage ROCKTHEVOTEBC.com Environment
ROCKTHEVOTEBC.com

The BCTF, which was the exclusive bargaining agent for more than 40,000 public school teachers in British Columbia, sought to voice its concern about changes in the public education system by posting the following message:

2,500 fewer teachers, 114 schools closed.
Your kids. Our students. Worth speaking out for.

The transit authorities refused to accept the paid advertisements. They had identical policies:

2. Advertisements, to be accepted, shall be limited to those which communicate information concerning goods, services, public service announcements and public events.

7. No advertisement will be accepted which is likely, in the light of prevailing community standards, to cause offence to any person or group of persons or create controversy.

9. No advertisement will be accepted which advocates or opposes any ideology or political philosophy, point of view, policy or action, or which conveys information about a political meeting, gathering or event, a political party or the candidacy of any person for a political position or public office.

The teachers and students brought an action seeking a declaration that the advertising policies infringed s 2(b) of the Charter. Justice Deschamps, for the majority (McLachlin CJ and LeBel, Abella, Charron, and Rothstein JJ concurring), applied the City of Montréal factors as follows:

[42] The question is whether the historical or actual function or other aspects of the space are incompatible with expression or suggest that expression within it would undermine the values underlying free expression. One way to answer this question is to look at past or present practice. ... While it is true that buses have not been used as spaces for this type of expressive activity for as long as city streets, utility poles and town squares, there is some history of their being so used, and they are in fact being used for it at present. As a result, not only is there some history of use of this property as a space for public expression, but there is actual use—both of which indicate that the expressive activity in question neither impedes the primary function of the bus as a vehicle for public transportation nor, more importantly, undermines the values underlying freedom of expression.

[43] The second factor from City of Montréal is whether other aspects of the place suggest that expression within it would undermine the values underlying the constitutional protection. TransLink submits that its buses should be characterized as private publicly owned property, to which one cannot reasonably expect access. This position is untenable. The very fact that the general public has access to the advertising space on buses is an indication that members of the public would expect constitutional protection of their expression in that government-owned space. Moreover, an important aspect of a bus is that it is by nature a public, not a private, space. Unlike the activities which occur in certain government buildings or offices, those which occur on a public bus do not require privacy and limited access. The bus is operated on city streets and forms an integral part of the public transportation system. The general public ... are therefore exposed to a message placed on the side of a bus in the same way as to a message on a utility pole or in any public space in the city. ... Thus, rather than undermining the purposes of s. 2(b), expression on the sides of buses could enhance them by furthering democratic discourse, and perhaps even truth finding and self-fulfillment.

[46] I do not see any aspect of the location that suggests that expression within it would undermine the values underlying free expression. On the contrary, the space allows for expression by a broad range of speakers to a large public audience and expression there could actually further the values underlying s. 2 (b) of the Charter.

Justice Deschamps then turned to s 1:

[76] I accept that the policies were adopted for the purpose of providing "a safe, welcoming public transit system" and that this is a sufficiently important objective to warrant placing a limit on freedom of expression. However, like the trial judge, I am not convinced that the limits on political content imposed by articles 2, 7 and 9 are rationally connected to the objective. I have some difficulty seeing how an advertisement on the side of a bus that constitutes political speech might create a safety risk or an unwelcoming environment for transit users. It is not the political nature of an advertisement that creates a dangerous or hostile environment. Rather, it is only if the advertisement is offensive in that, for example, its content is discriminatory or it advocates violence or terrorism—regardless of whether it is commercial or political in nature—that the objective of providing a safe and welcoming transit system will be undermined.

[77] Had I found a rational connection between the objective and the limits imposed by articles 2, 7 and 9, I would nevertheless have concluded that the means chosen to implement the objective was neither reasonable nor proportionate to the respondents' interest in disseminating their messages pursuant to their right under s. 2(b) of the Charter to freedom of expression. The policies allow for commercial speech but prohibit all political advertising.

In particular, article 2 of the policies limits the types of advertisements that will be accepted to "those which communicate information concerning goods, services, public service announcements and public events," thereby excluding advertisements which communicate political messages. Article 7, on the other hand, refers to prevailing community standards as a measuring stick for whether an advertisement is likely "to cause offence to any person or group of persons or create controversy." While a community standard of tolerance may constitute a reasonable limit on offensive advertisements, excluding advertisements which "create controversy" is unnecessarily broad. Citizens, including bus riders, are expected to put up with some controversy in a free and democratic society. Finally, article 9 ... bans all forms of political content regardless of whether the message actually contributes to an unsafe or unwelcoming transit environment. In sum, the policies amount to a blanket exclusion of a highly valued form of expression in a public location that serves as an important place for public discourse. They therefore do not constitute a minimal impairment of freedom of expression.

Greater Vancouver Transportation Authority also involved a preliminary issue of whether the Charter applied to TransLink and BC Transit. This aspect of the case is discussed in Chapter 18.

NOTE: THE OCCUPY MOVEMENT

Streets and parks seem to be paradigmatic of the sorts of public places available for the conduct of expressive activity. The Occupy movement tested the outer boundaries of this tradition in autumn 2011. Replicating a strategy inaugurated by the Occupy Wall Street Movement, Canadian protestors took to occupying parks and public spaces, setting up tent cities with various amenities including community food kitchens and libraries. Public authorities tolerated most occupations for about thirty days after which municipalities sought to evict the occupiers. This precipitated a series of lower court rulings in Canadian courts in various provinces. For instance, trespass notices were distributed to the Occupy Toronto movement ordering removal of tents, persons, and other structures from St. James Park in downtown Toronto. They were entitled to use the park, the City claimed, but not for the purpose of erecting structures and not between the hours of 12:01 a.m. and 5:30 a.m. Characterizing the occupiers as lawbreakers and engaging in civil disobedience, Justice Brown of the Superior Court of Justice for Ontario [in Batty v City of Toronto, 2011 ONSC 6862] admitted that s. 2(b) freedoms were at stake. Likening the case to the noise by-law at issue in City of Montreal, Justice Brown granted a measure of latitude to the city under section 1. As a consequence, the interests of other city goers who wished to use the park for dog walking, frisbee throwing, or reading a book, were entitled to as much solicitude as those engaging in constitutionally protected activity. As the municipal by-law did not result in a complete ban, the measures were considered proportionate to the objective of sharing public parks with everyone. The protestor's attempt to monopolize park space for constitutional purposes would have to yield to the multiple pleasures that parks bring to all citizens. "Peace, order, and good government" would prevail, declared Justice Brown. Similar results obtained in applications to enjoin the occupiers in Victoria and Vancouver without any consideration of Charter questions. In an application for injunctive relief against Occupy Calgary, Justice Wittman of the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench weighed freedom of expression rights into the equation but in a less than adequate manner. Beginning with the measure of deference we find in cases involving public protest, Justice Wittman found the City's permit application process was reasonable and proportionate. Moreover, Occupy Calgary "had not proposed any alternative to these limits that would meet the City's objectives," losing sight of the burden of proof at this stage of the justification analysis. It should be noted that courts in other countries (such as those in the U.S. and U.K.) did not perform much better.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In order to avoid harassment of both workers at abortion clinics and women seeking abortion services, a provincial legislature enacts access to abortion legislation, creating no-protest zones ("bubble zones") around the clinics. All anti-abortion protest activity is prohibited within the bubble zones, including active protesting and sidewalk counselling, as well as silent protests taking the form of displaying a sign. The bubble zones involve a maximum distance of 50 metres from the clinic. Violation of the legislation will result in a fine or imprisonment. Would protesters be able to raise a successful Charter challenge to the legislation on the ground that the public streets and sidewalks outside abortion clinics should be available for their expressive activity, particularly given the symbolic significance of the venue? See R v Spratt, 2008 BCCA 340, leave to appeal to SCC refused, 33037 (18 June 2009).

2. The materials in this section have largely dealt with situations where a speaker is claiming access to public property as a forum for speech. Another form of access right that may be grounded in freedom of expression is access to information related to the operation of government and issues of public policy. In the clearest application of this principle, s 2(b) has been interpreted as including a prima facie right of public access, including the media, to judicial and quasi-judicial proceedings, with the result that legislative provisions for in camera proceedings are required to be justified under s 1: see Re Southam Inc and The Queen (No 1) 1983 CanLII 1707, 41 OR \(2d\) 113 \(CA\); Pacific Press Ltd v Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), [1991] 2 FC 327 (CA); Canadian Broadcasting Corp v New Brunswick (AG), [\[1996\] 3 SCR 480, 1996 CanLII 184](#). In Canadian Broadcasting Corp v Canada (AG), 2011 SCC 2, Deschamps J, writing for the Court, laid out the governing principles in this area:

[1] The open court principle is of crucial importance in a democratic society. It ensures that citizens have access to the courts and can, as a result, comment on how courts operate and on proceedings that take place in them. Public access to the courts also guarantees the integrity of judicial processes inasmuch as the transparency that flows from access ensures that justice is rendered in a manner that is not arbitrary, but is in accordance with the rule of law.

[2] The right to freedom of expression is just as fundamental in our society as the open court principle. It fosters democratic discourse, truth finding and self-fulfilment. Freedom of the press has always been an embodiment of freedom of expression. It is also the main vehicle for informing the public about court proceedings. In this sense, freedom of the press is essential to the open court principle. Nevertheless, it is sometimes necessary to harmonize the exercise of freedom of the press with the open court principle to ensure that the administration of justice is fair.

On the facts of the case, Deschamps J went on to uphold restrictions on media filming and interviewing in the public areas of court houses in Quebec and a rule prohibiting the broadcasting of audio recordings of court proceedings.

The Supreme Court of Canada dealt with the issue of whether s 2(b) might give a right of access to government information in Ontario (Public Safety and Security) v Criminal Lawyers' Association, 2010 SCC 23, discussed below.

3. The leading case on the related issue of publication bans (restrictions on the reporting of court proceedings) is Dagenais v Canadian Broadcasting Corp, [\[1994\] 3 SCR 835, 1994 CanLII 39](#). In that case, the Supreme Court of Canada reformulated the common law rule governing publication bans, taking into account freedom of expression interests. The Court stated that a publication ban should only be ordered when (1) such a ban is necessary in order to prevent a real and substantial risk to the fairness of a trial, because reasonably available alternative measures will not prevent the risk; and (2) the salutary effects of the publication ban outweigh the deleterious effects to the free expression of those affected by the ban.

NOTE: ONTARIO (PUBLIC SAFETY AND SECURITY) V CRIMINAL LAWYERS' ASSOCIATION AND THE ISSUE OF ACCESS TO INFORMATION

Does s 2(b) guarantee access to government information? In Ontario (Public Safety and Security) v Criminal Lawyers' Association, in a joint opinion by McLachlin CJ and Abella J, the Court declared (at para 5) that s 2(b) does not guarantee access to all documents in government hands. Access to documents in government hands is constitutionally protected only where it is shown to be a necessary precondition of meaningful expression, does not encroach on protected privileges, and is compatible with the function of the institution concerned.

In this case, the Criminal Lawyers' Association (CLA) had sought documents, pursuant to the Ontario Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act, RSO 1990, c F.31 concerning an investigation of alleged police misconduct that exonerated the officers involved for having botched a murder prosecution. Two of the documents sought contained legal advice and a third was a 318-page investigative report. The Minister refused to disclose any of these documents. He was of the opinion that the material fell within exemptions provided for in the Act concerning solicitor-client privilege (s 19) and law enforcement (s 14). A "public interest" exception ("where a compelling public interest in the disclosure of the record clearly outweighs the purpose of the exemption," s 23) did not apply to this class of material. The CLA maintained that the Charter required that a general public interest exception be available. The Court rejected the CLA's argument, concluding:

[59] ... [T]he CLA has not established that [access] is necessary for meaningful public discussion of the problems in the administration of justice relating to the Racco murder.

[60] If necessity were established, the CLA ... would face the further challenge of demonstrating that access to ss. 14 and 19 documents, obtained through the s. 23 override, would not impinge on privileges or impair the proper functioning of relevant government institutions. As discussed, ss. 14 and 19 are intended to protect documents from disclosure on these very grounds. On the record before us, it is not established that the CLA could satisfy the requirements of the above framework.

[61] ... [T]he impact of the absence of a s. 23 public interest override in relation to documents under ss. 14 and 19 is so minimal that even if s. 2 (b) were engaged, it would not be breached. The ultimate answer to the CLA's claim is that the absence of the second-stage review, provided by the s. 23 override for documents within ss. 14 and 19, does not significantly impair any hypothetical right to access government documents, given that those sections, properly interpreted, already incorporate consideration of the public interest. The CLA would not meet the test because it could not show that the state has infringed its rights to freedom of expression.

Note that the Court declared that the sections prohibiting disclosure, if "properly interpreted, already incorporate consideration of the public interest." The Court appears to have adopted an interpretation of the statute advanced in Lisa Austin & Lorne Sossin, "Is Discretion the Last Refuge of Scoundrels? A Comment on Criminal Lawyers' Assn v Ontario" (2009) 55 Crim LQ 323 at 325.

NOTE: INDIGENOUS BLOCKADES AND EXPRESSIVE FREEDOM

Questions about the limits of the right to protest and the strength of Canada's constitutional commitment to free expression have arisen with respect to a series of injunctions issued against blockades by Indigenous protesters and their supporters. The Supreme Court of Canada in MacMillan Bloedel Ltd v Simpson, [1996] 2 SCR 1048, 1996 CanLII 165 ruled that it is within the inherent jurisdiction of courts to "maintain the rule of law" by enforcing injunctions against unnamed protesters—including Indigenous peoples seeking to protect their lands—who blocked logging of old-growth forests at Clayoquot Sound, BC. Over 800 protestors were arrested in the summer and fall of 1993. Justice McLachlin for the Court declared that the case rested on a fundamental conflict between the right to express public dissent on the one hand, and the exercise of property and contractual rights on the other. Thus the appellants are wrong in asserting that the orders in question are nothing more than "government by injunction" aimed at suppressing public dissent. The respondent is equally wrong in asserting that this case has nothing to do with the public expression of dissenting views and pertains only to private property. This case is about both. In a society that prizes both the right to express dissent and the maintenance of private rights, a way to reconcile both interests must be found. One of the ways this can be done is through court orders like the one at issue in this case.

This ruling should be contrasted with the injunction BC courts declined to issue against Indigenous protestors who interfered with logging operations on Meares Island, BC. In MacMillan Bloedel Ltd v Mullin, 1985 CanLII 145, 61 BCLR 145 (BCCA), the BC Court of Appeal was concerned that old-growth forests would be wholly cleared and Indigenous interests in the land permanently destroyed. Consider how this decision anticipates the duty to consult cases discussed in Chapter 14, Indigenous Peoples and the Constitution.

Courts have not been as solicitous of Indigenous interests in a series of more recent cases associated with the grassroots Idle No More movement. Justice Brown of the Ontario Superior Court was the presiding judge in two cases where injunctions put an end to protests involving railroad blockades in Sarnia and Kingston. Blockades were meant to signal opposition to the federal government's omnibus Bill C-45 which, it was alleged, impaired treaty rights to land and to waterways without any consultation having taken place. In the Sarnia case, CNR v Chief Chris Plain, 2012 ONSC 7348 [CNR No 1], an emergency and temporary injunction was granted at the request of Canadian National Railways (CN) without hearing representations from Indigenous protestors who were being enjoined from engaging in expressive activity. Justice Brown acknowledged that the "protestors obviously are engaged in a form of expressive activity" and that "persons are free to engage in political protest of that public nature" (at para 23). Nevertheless, he went on to hold:

[23] ... the law does not permit them to do so by engaging in civil disobedience through trespassing on the private property of others, such as CN. Given the alternative locations for expressive conduct open to the protestors, and the economic disruption their expressive activity most probably will have on other industries, the political nature of the message expressed by the protestors carries little weight in the balance of convenience analysis in the particular circumstances of this case.

Similar to his decision with respect to the Occupy movement, Brown J recognized that expressive issues were at stake in the protest but held that other interests, namely protecting private property through trespass law, should prevail.

Six days after the initial order was issued, Brown J issued another ruling continuing the temporary injunction in CNR v Chief Chris Plain, 2012 ONSC 7356 [CNR No 2]. He attempted to distinguish two Ontario Court of Appeal decisions (Henco Industries Limited v Haudenosaunee Six Nations Confederacy Council, 2006 CanLII 41649, 82 OR (3d) 721 (CA) and Frontenac Ventures Corporation v Ardoch Algonquin First Nation, 2008 ONCA 534) that stressed the need to consider the Crown's duties to consult and other obligations towards Indigenous peoples when granting and enforcing injunctions. Justice Brown distinguished these two Appeal Court rulings on the basis that the Idle No More blockade at Sarnia was part of a general protest toward the policies of the federal government and did not apparently involve an assertion of Indigenous title as had the situations at issue before the Ontario Court of Appeal.

Kent Roach and David Schneiderman doubt that the distinction between public protests and Indigenous claims are as clear cut as Brown J suggests:

It is questionable whether the Ontario Court of Appeal judgments can be so easily distinguished, especially because the protesters were not represented in the proceedings and the nature of their protest appeared to have been gleaned by Justice Brown from the media. The protests were multi-faceted and involved concerns about treaty, land, and constitutional rights that also were the focus of the Ontario Court of Appeal's earlier decisions.

Justice Brown displayed considerable frustration that the Sarnia police had not enforced the injunction and ended the blockade in the six days since the injunction was issued. He stated in CNR II that "it is not the purpose of a court order simply to initiate talks or consultations between the police and those whom the court has found to have breached the law." He warned about the dangers of the police deciding "that the writ of the courts do not run against particular groups or particular political messages." In our view, Justice Brown's approach runs a serious risk of undermining the legitimate role of police and prosecutorial discretion in enforcing injunctions and attempting to reconcile the competing constitutional values at issue, including those of freedom of expression. Moreover, it avoids clear warnings by the Ontario Court of Appeal in Henco about the importance of police and prosecutorial discretion in enforcing injunctions against Aboriginal protests. These warnings should not be limited to cases where claims of Aboriginal title were made but are relevant to a wider range of contexts including those involving all forms of non-violent protest protected by section 2(b) of the Charter.

Another emergency injunction was issued by Brown J in early 2013 that was requested by CN against a blockade of its main rail line at Kingston in Canadian National Railway Company v John Doe, 2013 ONSC 115. Justice Brown was of the view that the Charter's freedom of expression was not relevant:

[11] ... While expressive conduct by lawful means enjoys strong protection in our system of governance and law, expressive conduct by unlawful means does not. No one can seriously suggest that a person can block freight and passenger traffic on one of the main arteries of our economy and then cloak himself with protection by asserting freedom of expression. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms does not offer such protection, as I examined at length in Batty v. Toronto (City).

Roach and Schneiderman write that Brown J's idea that "expressive conduct by unlawful means" is not protected under section 2(b) is clearly erroneous, given the Supreme Court's broad interpretation of freedom of expression as only excluding violence and threats of violence. The suggestion that unlawful conduct can never be protected as freedom of expression ignores the fundamental distinction in a democracy between peaceful civil disobedience and violent protest. It is also inconsistent with Justice Brown's own recognition in the Batty case involving the Occupy movement ... that freedom of expression was in play in the construction of shelters to convey a political message.

As in the Sarnia case, Justice Brown's Kingston injunction decision demonstrated considerable impatience with the lack of an immediate and forceful police response to the protest. ... Justice Brown's approach seems to view injunctions against Aboriginal protests simply as a matter of law enforcement and not one involving competing rights, including freedom of expression.

See Kent Roach & David Schneiderman, "Freedom of Expression in Canada," cited above, at 509-10 (footnotes omitted).

VIII. DEFAMATION

The common law jealously guards individual reputation. Under the common law of defamation, defamatory statements are presumed to be false and malicious. No further proof of harm is required to be shown; general damages are presumed to have been suffered. The common law rule then shifts the onus onto the publisher of the defamatory utterance to prove its truthfulness or otherwise show that the statement falls within a limited range of privileged statements. Chief Justice McLachlin described the state of the law in the case of Grant v Torstar Corp, discussed further below:

[28] A plaintiff in a defamation action is required to prove three things to obtain judgment and an award of damages: (1) that the impugned words were defamatory, in the sense that they would tend to lower the plaintiff's reputation in the eyes of a reasonable person; (2) that the words in fact referred to the plaintiff; and (3) that the words were published, meaning that they were communicated to at least one person other than the plaintiff. If these elements are established on a balance of probabilities, falsity and damage are presumed, though this rule has been subject to strong criticism The plaintiff is not required to show that the defendant intended to do harm, or even that the defendant was careless. The tort is thus one of strict liability.

[29] If the plaintiff proves the required elements, the onus then shifts to the defendant to advance a defence in order to escape liability.

[30] Both statements of opinion and statements of fact may attract the defence of privilege, depending on the occasion on which they were made. Some "occasions," like Parliamentary and legal proceedings, are absolutely privileged. Others, like reference letters or credit reports, enjoy "qualified" privilege, meaning that the privilege can be defeated by proof that the defendant acted with malice The[se] defences ... reflect the fact that "common convenience and welfare of society" sometimes requires untrammeled communications[.] ...

[31] In addition to privilege, statements of opinion, a category which includes any "deduction, inference, conclusion, criticism, judgment, remark or observation which is generally incapable of proof" , may attract the defence of fair comment.

[32] Where statements of fact are at issue, usually only two defences are available: ... the statement was substantially true (justification); and ... the statement was made in a protected context (privilege). The issue in this case is whether the defences to actions for defamatory statements of fact should be expanded, as has been done for statements of opinion, in recognition of the importance of freedom of expression in a free society.

[33] To succeed on the defence of justification, a defendant must adduce evidence showing that the statement was substantially true. This may be difficult to do. A journalist who has checked sources and is satisfied that a statement is substantially true may nevertheless have difficulty proving this in court, perhaps years after the event. The practical result of the gap between responsible verification and the ability to prove truth in a court of law on some date far in the future, is that the defence of justification is often of little utility to journalists and those who publish their stories.

[34] If the defence of justification fails, generally the only way a publisher can escape liability for an untrue defamatory statement of fact is by establishing that the statement was made on a privileged occasion. However, the defence of qualified privilege has seldom assisted media organizations. One reason is that qualified privilege has traditionally been grounded in special relationships characterized by a "duty" to communicate the information and a reciprocal "interest" in receiving it. The press communicates information not to identified individuals with whom it has a personal relationship, but to the public at large. Another reason is the conservative stance of early decisions, which struck a balance that preferred reputation over freedom of expression. ...

[37] Despite these tentative forays, the threshold for privilege remains high and the criteria for reciprocal duty and interest required to establish it unclear. It remains uncertain when, if ever, a media outlet can avail itself of the defence of qualified privilege.

Public personalities have repeatedly had recourse to the law of defamation as a means of punishing or thwarting speech tending to impair their reputations. Minister of Human Resources Bill Vander Zalm, in British Columbia, successfully sued the editorial cartoonist of the Vancouver Sun for depicting Vander Zalm tearing the wings off of flies: see Vander Zalm v Times Publishers, 1979 CanLII 2780, 96 DLR \(3d\) 172 \(BCSC\), rev'd 1980 CanLII 389, 109 DLR \(3d\) 531 \(BCCA\). Former premier of Quebec Jacques Parizeau and Bloc Québécois leader Lucien Bouchard successfully sued a financial analyst who, in his financial bulletin, likened Parizeau and Bouchard to Adolf Hitler: see Lafferty, Harwood & Partners v Parizeau, [2003 CanLII 32941, \[2003\] RJQ 2758 \(QCCA\)](#). In the United States, the common law of defamation was modified in New York Times v Sullivan. "Erroneous statement is inevitable in free debate," wrote Brennan J, and even these demand protection if freedom of expression is to have its requisite 'breathing space'" (at 271-72). The US Supreme Court modified the common law rule, prohibiting public officials from suing for defamatory falsehoods relating to their official conduct, unless a statement is proven by the plaintiff to have been made with "actual malice"—that is, with knowledge of its falsity or with "reckless disregard as to whether it was false or not" (at 280). With the advent of the Charter's guarantee of freedom of expression, it might have been thought that the common law rule would be modified in Canada as well in accordance with the Charter's "values." In its first opportunity to consider reform of the highly protective rule, in Hill, immediately below, the Supreme Court of Canada declined to do so.

NOTE: HILL V CHURCH OF SCIENTOLOGY OF TORONTO

In Hill, a jury awarded $1.6 million in damages to Crown Prosecutor Casey Hill for defamatory statements made by the Church of Scientology. The Church, acting through its representatives, falsely alleged that Hill had misled a Supreme Court of Ontario Judge and breached orders regarding the sealing of Scientology documents obtained under a search warrant. Justice Cory, writing for six of the seven justices, noted:

[21] Long before he gave advice to the OPP in connection with the search and seizure of documents which took place on March 3 and 4, 1983, Casey Hill had become a target of Scientology's enmity. Over the years, he had been involved in a number of matters concerning Scientology's affairs. As a result, it kept a file on him. This was only discovered when the production of the file was ordered during the course of this action. The file disclosed that from approximately 1977 until at least 1981, Scientology closely monitored and tracked Casey Hill and had labelled him an "Enemy Canada." Casey Hill testified that from his experience, persons viewed by Scientology as its enemies were "subject to being neutralized."

Justice Cory held that the common law of defamation was not inconsistent with the constitutional right to freedom of expression:

[137] The New York Times v. Sullivan decision has been criticized by judges and academic writers in the United States and elsewhere. It has not been followed in the United Kingdom or Australia. I can see no reason for adopting it in Canada in an action between private litigants. The law of defamation is essentially aimed at the prohibition of the publication of injurious false statements. It is the means by which the individual may protect his or her reputation which may well be the most distinguishing feature of his or her character, personality and, perhaps, identity. I simply cannot see that the law of defamation is unduly restrictive or inhibiting. Surely it is not requiring too much of individuals that they ascertain the truth of the allegations they publish. The law of defamation provides for the defences of fair comment and of qualified privilege in appropriate cases. Those who publish statements should assume a reasonable level of responsibility.

The Court also rejected the intermediate position of a defence of reasonable publication. The High Court of Australia in Theophanous v Herald & Weekly Times, [1994] HCA 46, 182 CLR 104 held that defendants could escape liability for defamatory statements concerning political matters if "circumstances were such as to make it reasonable to publish the impugned material without ascertaining whether it was true or false" (at 19). This modification of the common law rule would enable publication of urgent political matters in circumstances where there was no opportunity for further investigation or fact checking. In Hill, Cory J wrote:

[139] ... First, this appeal does not involve the media or political commentary about government policies. Thus the issues considered by the High Court of Australia in Theophanous ... are also not raised in this case and need not be considered.

[140] Second, a review of jury verdicts in Canada reveals that there is no danger of numerous large awards threatening the viability of media organizations. Finally, in Canada there is no broad privilege accorded to the public statements of government officials which needs to be counterbalanced by a similar right for private individuals.

[141] In conclusion, in its application to the parties in this action, the common law of defamation complies with the underlying values of the Charter and there is no need to amend or alter it.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Prosecutor Casey Hill was promoted to the Ontario Superior Court in the midst of the proceedings. Recall that the law of defamation presumes damages are suffered in a case of falsity. Did it matter that Hill likely did not suffer any decline in reputation? Justice Cory thought not:

[177] ... [A]t the time the libellous statement was made, Casey Hill was a young lawyer in the Crown Law office working in the litigation field. For all lawyers their reputation is of paramount importance. Clients depend on the integrity of lawyers, as do colleagues. Judges rely upon commitments and undertakings given to them by counsel. Our whole system of administration of justice depends upon counsel's reputation for integrity. Anything that leads to the tarnishing of a professional reputation can be disastrous for a lawyer. It matters not that subsequent to the publication of the libel, Casey Hill received promotions, was elected a bencher and eventually appointed a trial judge in the General Division of the Court of Ontario. As a lawyer, Hill would have no way of knowing what members of the public, colleagues, other lawyers and judges may have been affected by the dramatic presentation of the allegation that he had been instrumental in breaching an order of the court and that he was guilty of criminal contempt.

[178] This nagging doubt and sense of hurt must have affected him in every telephone call he made and received in the course of his daily work, in every letter that he sent and received and in every appearance that he made before the courts of the province of Ontario. He would never know who, as a result of the libellous statement, had some lingering suspicion that he was guilty of misconduct which was criminal in nature. He would never know who might have believed that he was a person without integrity who would act criminally in the performance of his duties as a Crown counsel. He could never be certain who would accept the allegation that he was guilty of a criminal breach of trust which was the essential thrust of the libel.

2. There is no mention in Hill of the chilling effect (or “libel chill”), a concern that animated the US Supreme Court decision in New York Times v Sullivan. Justice Brennan wrote (at 300):

We should be particularly careful, therefore, adequately to protect the liberties which are embodied in the First and Fourteenth Amendments. It may be urged that deliberately and maliciously false statements have no conceivable value as free speech. That argument, however, is not responsive to the real issue presented by this case, which is whether that freedom of speech which all agree is constitutionally protected can be effectively safeguarded by a rule allowing the imposition of liability upon a jury’s evaluation of the speaker’s state of mind. If individual citizens may be held liable in damages for strong words, which a jury finds false and maliciously motivated, there can be little doubt that public debate and advocacy will be constrained. And if newspapers, publishing advertisements dealing with public issues, thereby risk liability, there can also be little doubt that the ability of minority groups to secure publication of their views on public affairs and to seek support for their causes will be greatly diminished.

The Supreme Court of Canada may now be more interested in chilling effects, in the light of its reasons in Grant v Torstar Corp, immediately below.

[Unlike Hill, this case involved the media and political commentary. Grant brought an action for defamation against a newspaper and a reporter for having published a story about a “proposed private golf course development on [his] lakefront estate” (at para 4). The story aired the views of local residents who were critical of the development’s environmental impact and suspicious that Grant was exercising political influence behind the scenes to secure government approval for the new golf course. The reporter, an experienced journalist named Bill Schiller, attempted to verify the allegations in the article, including asking Grant for comment, which Grant chose not to provide. The subsequent article, entitled “Cottagers teed off over golf course—Long-time Harris backer awaits Tory nod on plan,” discussed Grant’s ties to Premier Harris and the Progressive Conservative Party, explained the background to the controversy, and gave voice to the cottagers’ concerns over the development itself and the possibility of political interference. It noted that Grant had refused to comment and mentioned that one of Grant’s employees had “tried to drive the photographer’s vehicle off a public road” (at para 16). The article included the following paragraph, which became the centrepiece of this litigation (at para 16):

“Everyone thinks it’s a done deal because of Grant’s influence—but most of all his Mike Harris ties,” says Lorrie Clark, who owns a cottage on Twin Lakes.

At trial, the plaintiffs were awarded damages totalling $1.475 million.]

McLACHLIN CJ (Binnie, LeBel, Deschamps, Fish, Charron, Rothstein, and Cromwell JJ concurring):

[2] ... [F]reedom of expression is not absolute. One limitation on free expression is the law of defamation, which protects a person's reputation from unjustified assault. The law of defamation does not forbid people from expressing themselves. It merely provides that if a person defames another, that person may be required to pay damages to the other for the harm caused to the other's reputation. However, if the defences available to a publisher are too narrowly defined, the result may be "libel chill," undermining freedom of expression and of the press.

[7] For the reasons that follow, I conclude that the common law should be modified to recognize a defence of responsible communication on matters of public interest. In view of this new defence, as well as errors in the jury instruction on fair comment, a new trial should be ordered.

[Chief Justice McLachlin's review of the current law has been reproduced above, at the beginning of the materials on defamation.]

[38] Two related arguments are presented in support of broadening the defences available to public communicators, such as the press, in reporting matters of fact.

[39] The first argument is grounded in principle. It asserts that the existing law is inconsistent with the principle of freedom of expression as guaranteed by s. 2(b) of the Charter. In the modern context, it is argued, the traditional rule has a chilling effect that unjustifiably limits reporting facts, and strikes a balance too heavily weighted in favour of protection of reputation. ...

[40] The second argument is grounded in jurisprudence. This argument points out that many foreign common law jurisdictions have modified the law of defamation to give more protection to the press While different countries have taken different approaches, the trend is clear. Recent Canadian cases, most notably the decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal in [Cusson v Quan, 2007 ONCA 771], have affirmed this trend.

[44] ... The common law, though not directly subject to Charter scrutiny where disputes between private parties are concerned, may be modified to bring it into harmony with the Charter. As Cory J. put it in Hill v. Church of Scientology of Toronto, ... [1995] 2 S.C.R. 1130, at para. 97, "Charter values, framed in general terms, should be weighed against the principles which underlie the common law. The Charter values will then provide the guidelines for any modification to the common law which the court feels is necessary."

[45] The argument that the Charter requires modification of Canadian defamation law was considered in Hill. Writing for a unanimous Court on this point, Cory J. declined to adopt the American "actual malice" rule from New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964) Cory J. did, however, undertake a modest expansion of the recognized qualified privilege for reports on judicial proceedings.

[46] While Hill stands for a rejection of the Sullivan approach and an affirmation of the common law of defamation's general conformity with the Charter, it does not close the door to further changes in specific rules and doctrines. As Iacobucci J. observed in R. v. Salituro, ... [1991] 3 S.C.R. 654, at p. 670, "[j]udges can and should adapt the common law to reflect the changing social, moral and economic fabric of the country." It is implicit in this duty that the courts will, from time to time, take a fresh look at the common law and re-evaluate its consistency with evolving societal expectations through the lens of Charter values.

[62] The protection offered by a new defence based on conduct is meaningful for both the publisher and those whose reputations are at stake. If the publisher fails to take appropriate steps having regard to all the circumstances, it will be liable. The press and others engaged in public communication on matters of public interest, like bloggers, must act carefully, having regard to the injury to reputation that a false statement can cause. A defence based on responsible conduct reflects the social concern that the media should be held accountable through the law of defamation. As Kirby P. stated in Ballina Shire Council v. Ringland (1994), 33 N.S.W.L.R. 680 (C.A.), at p. 700: "The law of defamation is one of the comparatively few checks upon [the media's] great power." The requirement that the publisher of defamatory material act responsibly provides accountability and comports with the reasonable expectations of those whose conduct brings them within the sphere of public interest. People in public life are entitled to expect that the media and other reporters will act responsibly in protecting them from false accusations and innuendo. They are not, however, entitled to demand perfection and the inevitable silencing of critical comment that a standard of perfection would impose.

[Chief Justice McLachlin then looked to recent comparative developments, beginning with the United Kingdom and the test of responsible journalism inaugurated by the House of Lords in Reynolds v Times Newspapers Ltd, [1999] 3 WLR 1010, [1999] 4 All ER 609. That case gave rise to what are known as "the Reynolds factors"—a list of considerations to determine whether a publication should be covered by responsible journalism. She then turned to Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa, all of which had developed and refined the reasonableness test from Reynolds.]

[98] This brings us to the substance of the test for responsible communication. In Quan, Sharpe J.A. held that the defence has two essential elements: public interest and responsibility. I agree, and would formulate the test as follows. First, the publication must be on a matter of public interest. Second, the defendant must show that publication was responsible, in that he or she was diligent in trying to verify the allegation(s), having regard to all the relevant circumstances.

[102] How is "public interest" in the subject matter established? First, and most fundamentally, the public interest is not synonymous with what interests the public. ... Conversely, the fact that much of the public would be less than riveted by a given subject matter does not remove the subject from the public interest. It is enough that some segment of the community would have a genuine interest in receiving information on the subject.

[105] To be of public interest, the subject matter "must be shown to be one inviting public attention, or about which the public has some substantial concern because it affects the welfare of citizens, or one to which considerable public notoriety or controversy has attached[.]" ... Public interest may be a function of the prominence of the person referred to in the communication, but mere curiosity or prurient interest is not enough. Some segment of the public must have a genuine stake in knowing about the matter published.

[106] Public interest is not confined to publications on government and political matters, as it is in Australia and New Zealand. Nor is it necessary that the plaintiff be a "public figure," as in the American jurisprudence since Sullivan. Both qualifications cast the public interest too narrowly. The public has a genuine stake in knowing about many matters, ranging from science and the arts to the environment, religion, and morality. The democratic interest in such wide-ranging public debate must be reflected in the jurisprudence.

[Chief Justice McLachlin ruled that the question whether the publication is a matter of public interest is for the judge to decide because this is primarily a question of law; the question whether the publication was responsible is, by contrast, a matter for the jury. A jury must consider numerous factors, including the seriousness of the allegation, the public importance of the matter, the status and reliability of the source, and whether the plaintiff's side of the story was sought and accurately reported. On the facts of the case, McLachlin CJ found that the many errors made by the trial judge in instructing the jury, including a failure to instruct them on the defence of responsible communication, required a new trial.

Justice Abella would have made the second issue—responsible reporting—a question for the judge as well:

[145] By adopting the responsible communication defence, we are recognizing the sophistication and constitutional complexity of defamation cases involving communications on matters of public interest. What is most important is protecting the integrity of the interests and values at stake in such cases. This defence is a highly complex legal determination with constitutional dimensions. That takes it beyond the jury's jurisdiction and squarely into judicial territory.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The companion case of Quan v Cusson, 2009 SCC 62 concerned the curious instance of an Ontario provincial police constable, Cusson, who, with his pet dog, Ranger, rushed to Manhattan's "Ground Zero" to help out in 9/11 rescue operations, even though the OPP's official offer of assistance had been declined by New York authorities. Although Cusson was first lauded as a hero in the press, the Ottawa Citizen later reported that it had learned of allegations that Cusson had "misled New York State police into thinking he was a fully trained K 9 handler with the RCMP." At trial, the jury awarded $100,000 in damages. Chief Justice McLachlin ordered a new trial so that the defendants (principally, the Ottawa Citizen) could avail themselves of the new defence. She found as follows:

[31] In this case, the public interest test is clearly met. The Canadian public has a vital interest in knowing about the professional misdeeds of those [entrusted to protect] public safety. ... When Cst. Cusson represented himself ... as an OPP or RCMP officer, he sacrificed any claim to be engaged in a purely private matter. News of his heroism was already a matter of public record; there is no reason that legitimate questions about the validity of this impression should not have been publicized too.

[32] That being the case, the defendants' liability hinges on whether they were diligent in trying to verify the allegations prior to publication. ... [I]t will be for the jury at a new trial to decide whether the articles met the standard of responsibility articulated in Grant.

2. Consider that the defence of responsible communication on matters of public interest was devised originally to protect traditional journalism. Will it also protect those engaging in non-traditional forms of journalism, such as "citizen journalism," blogging, Facebook posts, or tweets? Contrariwise, does the defence grant too much leeway to journalists and others to act on a single weak source, even innuendo? On the impact the new defence may have had on Toronto municipal politics, see Ivor Tossell, "The Story Behind the Rob Ford Story," The Walrus (17 February 2014).

3. Why does the majority in Grant insist that the defence of responsible communication should be a matter for a jury and not a judge? Do you agree with Abella J's dissent on this point?

4. In Bou Malhab v Diffusion Métromédia CMR inc, 2011 SCC 9, Malhab sought damages on behalf of all Arabic and Creole speaking Montreal taxi drivers for on-air defamatory comments made by Quebec City "shock jock" radio host André Arthur. Although Deshamps J, for the majority, admitted that Arthur's comments were "racist" (at para 82), the group was too heterogeneous and Arthur's comments too "general and vague" to give rise to liability under Quebec's Civil Code, SQ 1991, c 64 (at para 88). Justice Abella, in dissent, concluded (at para 119) that the group was defined with sufficient precision and the statements specific enough to be harmful to the reputations of each of its members. If Mr. Arthur had named an individual taxi driver and accused him or her of similar corruption and incompetence, there seems to me to be little doubt that an ordinary person would find those comments to be defamatory and therefore injurious.

Do you think that group defamation claims are likely to succeed in Canada? Consider the case of Beauharnais v Illinois, 343 US 250, 72 S Ct 725 (1952), where the US Supreme Court upheld under the First Amendment an Illinois group defamation statute. Chief Justice Dickson suggested in Keegstra that the Beauharnais decision has probably been overtaken by later cases.

5. In Doré v Barreau du Québec, 2012 SCC 12, the Supreme Court exhibited little interest in protecting the freedom of expression of lawyers. Relying on the "need to ensure civility in the profession" (at para 66), the Court held that lawyers could be disciplined for insults directed at a judge in private correspondence (in this instance, in response to derogatory remarks made by the judge in the course of criminal proceedings). Justice Abella, for the Court, wrote:

[68] Lawyers potentially face criticisms and pressures on a daily basis. They are expected by the public, on whose behalf they serve, to endure them with civility and dignity. This is not always easy where the lawyer feels he or she has been unfairly provoked, as in this case. But it is precisely when a lawyer's equilibrium is unduly tested that he or she is particularly called upon to behave with transcendent civility. On the other hand, lawyers should not be expected to behave like verbal eunuchs. They not only have a right to speak their minds freely, they arguably have a duty to do so. But they are constrained by their profession to do so with dignified restraint.

Applying a more deferential administrative law standard of review, rather than the Oakes test, the Court was satisfied that the "discipline committee's decision to reprimand the lawyer reflected a proportionate balancing of its public mandate to ensure that lawyers behave with 'objectivity, moderation and dignity' with the lawyer's expressive rights" (at para 8). Note that Abella J adopted a stricter test for review of administrative tribunal determinations where Charter rights are at stake in her reasons in Loyola High School v Quebec (AG), 2015 SCC 12, excerpted in Chapter 19.

IX. ACCESS TO SOCIAL MEDIA

Following a riot at the US Capitol on January 6, 2021, the social media giant Facebook, on January 7, 2021, restricted then President Donald Trump's access to posting content on both his Facebook page and Instagram account for an indefinite period. Facebook concluded that Trump, by sending encouraging messages to his supporters who had breached the Capitol buildings, had offended Facebook's Community Standards, which, in part, prohibit praise or support of people engaged in violence. Facebook's decision was reviewed by its Oversight

Board, an independent body comprised of 40 diverse experts who are empowered to review content decisions made by Facebook. The purpose of the Board, Facebook declares, is to "promote free expression by making principled, independent decisions regarding content on Facebook and Instagram and by issuing recommendations on the relevant Facebook company content policy." The Board can select specific cases for "review" and can "uphold or reverse Facebook's content decisions." Once a decision is selected for review, it is assigned to a panel who will "receive information to help with their in-depth review."

8. Oversight Board analysis

8.1 Compliance with content policies

The Board agrees with Facebook's decision that the two posts by Mr. Trump on January 6 violated Facebook's Community Standards and Instagram's Community Guidelines. Facebook's Community Standard on Dangerous Individuals and Organizations says that users should not post content "expressing support or praise for groups, leaders, or individuals involved in" violating events. Facebook designated the storming of the Capitol as a "violating event" and noted that it interprets violating events to include designated "violent" events.

At the time the posts were made, the violence at the Capitol was underway. Both posts praised or supported people who were engaged in violence. The words "We love you. You're very special" in the first post and "great patriots" and "remember this day forever" in the second post amounted to praise or support of the individuals involved in the violence and the events at the Capitol that day.

The Board notes that other Community Standards may have been violated in this case, including the Standard on Violence and Incitement. Because Facebook's decision was not based on this Standard and an additional finding of violation would not affect the outcome of this proceeding, a majority of the Board refrains from reaching any judgment on this alternative ground. ...

8.3 Compliance with Facebook's human rights responsibilities

The Board's decisions do not concern the human rights obligations of states or application of national laws, but focus on Facebook's content policies, its values and its human rights responsibilities as a business. The UN Guiding Principles on Business and Human Rights, which Facebook has endorsed ... establish what businesses should do on a voluntary basis to meet these responsibilities. This includes avoiding causing or contributing to human rights harms, in part through identifying possible and actual harms and working to prevent or address them (UNGPrinciples 11, 13, 15, 18). These responsibilities extend to harms caused by third parties (UNGPrinciple 19).

Facebook has become a virtually indispensable medium for political discourse, and especially so in election periods. It has a responsibility both to allow political expression and to avoid serious risks to other human rights. Facebook, like other digital platforms and media companies, has been heavily criticized for distributing misinformation and amplifying controversial and inflammatory material. Facebook's human rights responsibilities must be understood in the light of those sometimes competing considerations.

The Board analyzes Facebook's human rights responsibilities through international standards on freedom of expression and the rights to life, security, and political participation. Article 19 of the ICCPR [International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights] sets out the right to freedom of expression. Article 19 states that "everyone shall have the right to freedom of expression; this right shall include freedom to seek, receive and impart information and ideas of all kinds, regardless of frontiers, either orally, in writing or in print, in the form of art, or through any other media of his choice." The Board does not apply the First Amendment of the U.S. Constitution, which does not govern the conduct of private companies. However, the Board notes that in many relevant respects the principles of freedom of expression reflected in the First Amendment are similar or analogous to the principles of freedom of expression in ICCPR Article 19.

Political speech receives high protection under human rights law because of its importance to democratic debate. The UN Human Rights Committee provided authoritative guidance on Article 19 ICCPR in General Comment No. 34, in which it states that "free communication of information and ideas about public and political issues between citizens, candidates and elected representatives is essential" (para. 20).

Facebook's decision to suspend Mr. Trump's Facebook page and Instagram account has freedom of expression implications not only for Mr. Trump but also for the rights of people to hear from political leaders, whether they support them or not. Although political figures do not have a greater right to freedom of expression than other people, restricting their speech can harm the rights of other people to be informed and participate in political affairs. However, international human rights standards expect state actors to condemn violence (Rabat Plan of Action), and to provide accurate information to the public on matters of public interest, while also correcting misinformation (2020 Joint Statement of international freedom of expression monitors on COVID-19).

International law allows for expression to be limited when certain conditions are met. Any restrictions must meet three requirements—rules must be clear and accessible, they must be designed for a legitimate aim, and they must be necessary and proportionate to the risk of harm. The Board uses this three-part test to analyze Facebook's actions when it restricts content or accounts. First Amendment principles under U.S. law also insist that restrictions on freedom of speech imposed through state action may not be vague, must be for important governmental reasons and must be narrowly tailored to the risk of harm.

I. Legality (clarity and accessibility of the rules)

In international law on freedom of expression, the principle of legality requires that any rule used to limit expression is clear and accessible. People must be able to understand what is allowed and what is not allowed. Equally important, rules must be sufficiently clear to provide guidance to those who make decisions on limiting expression, so that these rules do not confer unfettered discretion [or] ... result in selective application ... In this case, these rules are Facebook's Community Standards and Instagram's Community Guidelines. ...

The clarity of the Standard against praise and support of Dangerous Individuals and Organizations leaves much to be desired, as the Board noted in a prior decision (case 2020-005-FB-UA). ... As the Board has noted previously in case 2020-003-FB-UA, there may be times in which certain wording may raise legality concerns, but as applied to a particular case those concerns are not warranted. ... The January 6 riot at the Capitol fell squarely within the types of harmful events set out in Facebook's policy, and Mr. Trump's posts praised and supported those involved at the very time the violence was going on, and while Members of Congress were calling on him for help. In relation to these facts, Facebook's policies gave adequate notice to the user and guidance to those enforcing the rule.

With regard to penalties for violations, the Community Standards and related information about account restrictions are published in various sources, including the Terms of Service, the introduction to the Community Standards, the Community Standard on Account Integrity and Authentic Identity, the Facebook Newsroom, and the Facebook Help Center. As noted in case 2020-006-FB-FBR the Board reiterates that the patchwork of applicable rules makes it difficult for users to understand why and when Facebook restricts accounts, and raises legality concerns.

While the Board is satisfied that the Dangerous Individuals and Organizations Standard is sufficiently clear [in this case] ... , Facebook's imposition of an "indefinite" restriction is vague and uncertain. "Indefinite" restrictions are not described in the Community Standards and it is unclear what standards would trigger this penalty or what standards will be employed to maintain or remove it. Facebook provided no information of any prior imposition of indefinite suspensions in any other cases. The Board recognizes the necessity of some discretion on Facebook's part to suspend accounts in urgent situations like that of January, but users cannot be left in a state of uncertainty for an indefinite time.

The Board rejects Facebook's request for it to endorse indefinite restrictions, imposed and lifted without clear criteria. Appropriate limits on discretionary powers are crucial to distinguish the legitimate use of discretion from possible scenarios around the world in which Facebook may unduly silence speech not linked to harm or delay action critical to protecting people.

II. Legitimate aim

The requirement of legitimate aim means that any measure restricting expression must be for a purpose listed in Article 19, para. 3 of the ICCPR, and this list of aims is exhaustive. Legitimate aims include the protection of public order, as well as respect for the rights of others, including the rights to life, security, and to participate in elections and to have the outcome respected and implemented. An aim would not be legitimate where used as a pretext for suppressing expression, for example, to cite the aims of protecting security or the rights of others to censor speech simply because it is disagreeable or offensive (General Comment No. 34, paras. 11, 30, 46, 48). Facebook's policy on praising and supporting individuals involved in "violating events," violence or criminal activity was in accordance with the aims above.

III. Necessity and proportionality

The requirement of necessity and proportionality means that any restriction on expression must, among other things, be the least intrusive way to achieve a legitimate aim (General Comment No. 34, para. 34).

The Board believes that, where possible, Facebook should use less restrictive measures to address potentially harmful speech and protect the rights of others before resorting to content removal and account restriction. At a minimum, this would mean developing effective mechanisms to avoid amplifying speech that poses risks of imminent violence, discrimination, or other lawless action, where possible and proportionate, rather than banning the speech outright.

Facebook stated to the Board that it considered Mr. Trump's "repeated use of Facebook and other platforms to undermine confidence in the integrity of the election (necessitating repeated application by Facebook of authoritative labels correcting the misinformation) represented an extraordinary abuse of the platform." The Board sought clarification from Facebook about the extent to which the platform's design decisions, including algorithms, policies, procedures and technical features, amplified Mr. Trump's posts after the election and whether Facebook had conducted any internal analysis of whether such design decisions may have contributed to the events of January 6. Facebook declined to answer these questions. This makes it difficult for the Board to assess whether less severe measures, taken earlier, may have been sufficient to protect the rights of others.

The crucial question is whether Facebook's decision to restrict access to Mr. Trump's accounts on January 6 and 7 was necessary and proportionate to protect the rights of others. To understand the risk posed by the January 6 posts, the Board assessed Mr. Trump's Facebook and Instagram posts and off-platform comments since the November election. In maintaining an unfounded narrative of electoral fraud and persistent calls to action, Mr. Trump created an environment where a serious risk of violence was possible. On January 6, Mr. Trump's words of support to those involved in the riot legitimized their violent actions. Although the messages included a seemingly perfunctory call for people to act peacefully, this was insufficient to defuse the tensions and remove the risk of harm that his supporting statements contributed to. It was appropriate for Facebook to interpret Mr. Trump's posts on January 6 in the context of escalating tensions in the United States and Mr. Trump's statements in other media and at public events.

As part of its analysis, the Board drew upon the six factors from the Rabat Plan of Action to assess the capacity of speech to create a serious risk of inciting discrimination, violence, or other lawless action:

- Context: The posts were made during a time of high political tension centered on the unfounded claim that the November 2020 presidential election had been stolen. [Courts consistently rejected these claims.] ... Mr. Trump nonetheless continued to assert these claims on social media, including Facebook and Instagram, using his authoritative status as head of state to lend them credibility. He encouraged supporters to come to the nation's capital on January 6 to "StoptheSteal," suggesting that the events would be "wild." On January 6, ... [a]t the time of the posts, severe violence was continuing. When the restrictions were extended on January 7, the situation remained volatile. Among other indicators of the context, the District of Columbia took steps to warn of a heightened risk of violence surrounding the events at the Capitol.
- Status of the speaker: Mr. Trump's identity as president of the United States and a political leader gave his Facebook and Instagram posts a high degree of influence. ... Mr. Trump's status as head of state with a high position of trust not only imbued his words with greater force and credibility but also created risks that his followers would understand they could act with impunity.
- Intent: The Board is not in a position to conclusively assess Mr. Trump's intentions. ... [T]he Board considered that he likely knew or should have known that these communications would pose a risk of legitimizing or encouraging violence.
- Content and form: The two posts on January 6 praised and supported rioters, even though they called on them to go home peacefully. The posts also reiterated the unfounded claim that the election was stolen. Reports suggest that this claim was understood by some of the rioters as legitimizing their actions.

The evidence here shows that Mr. Trump used the communicative authority of the presidency [to support the attackers and stop the lawful counting of electoral votes].

- Extent and reach: Mr. Trump had a large audience, with a following of at least 35 million accounts on Facebook and at least 24 million accounts on Instagram. Importantly, these social media posts are frequently picked up and shared more broadly through mass media channels as well as by high profile supporters of Mr. Trump with large audiences, greatly increasing their reach.
- Imminence of harm: The posts were made during a dynamic and fluid period of ongoing violence. There was a clear immediate risk of harm to life, electoral integrity, and political participation. The violence at the Capitol started within an hour of the rally organized through the use of Facebook and other social media. Indeed, even as Mr. Trump was posting, the rioters were rampaging through the halls of Congress and Members of Congress were expressing fear by calling on the White House and pleading for the president to calm the situation. The riot directly interfered with Congress's ability to discharge its constitutional responsibility of counting electoral votes, delaying this process by several hours.

Analyzing these factors, the Board concludes that the violation in this case was severe in terms of its human rights harms. Facebook's imposition of account-level restrictions on January 6 and the extension of those restrictions on January 7 was necessary and proportionate.

[The Oversight Board, while concluding that the ban was necessary and proportionate, concluded that the penalty imposed was arbitrary (at 33):

However, it was not appropriate for Facebook to impose an indefinite suspension.

Facebook did not follow a clear published procedure in this case. Facebook's normal account-level penalties for violations of its rules are to impose either a time-limited suspension or to permanently disable the user's account. The Board finds that it is not permissible for Facebook to keep a user off the platform for an undefined period, with no criteria for when or whether the account will be restored.

Facebook must, within six months of this decision, reexamine the arbitrary penalty it imposed on January 7 and decide the appropriate penalty. This penalty must be based on the gravity of the violation and the prospect of future harm. It must also be consistent with Facebook's rules for severe violations which must in turn be clear, necessary, and proportionate.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Because the First Amendment to the US Constitution declares that "Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech" (binding on both federal and state action), the US constitution did not apply to Facebook's actions. Did the Oversight Board, nonetheless, undertake a constitutional analysis?
2. Consider that the US Supreme Court typically applies categorical rules, rather than a proportionality analysis, in determining whether a government decision offends the First Amendment. Does the Oversight Board's decision resemble more the performance of Canadian courts under s 2(b) of the Charter?
3. The Oversight Board declared that it is not a "legitimate aim" to circumscribe speech that is "disagreeable" or "offensive." Is this consistent with the Canadian jurisprudence under s 2(b)?

4. Facebook declined to respond to the Oversight Board request that it provide information about how its platform design decisions may have amplified Trump's posts both before and after January 6. Should the Oversight Board have drawn a negative inference from this failure to respond, as did the Supreme Court of Canada in RJR-MacDonald, where the Government of Canada refused to produce evidence of less restrictive alternatives by preferring to rely upon the cloak of Cabinet confidentiality?

5. The Oversight Board found the Facebook standard was unclear, but vagueness concerns did not arise "as applied" to Trump's posts. It has been said, in US constitutional law circles, that a challenge to a law "as applied" to a litigant, rather than a challenge to the law on its face, should not typically be available in free speech cases: see Richard Fallon, "As-Applied and Facial Challenges and Third-Party Standing" (2000) 113:6 Harvard L Rev 1321-1370. Why do you think courts should be reluctant to use an as applied rule to these cases?

6. Facebook responded in June 2021 by adopting many of the Oversight Board's recommendations, including a determination that Trump's suspension will be limited to two years, after which Facebook will assess whether the "risk to public safety has receded."

Trump has since launched a class action lawsuit against Facebook, Twitter, and Google for violating the right to freedom of speech under the US Constitution. The odds of success do not appear to favour Trump.

In Canada, documentary film maker and law professor Joel Bakan, together with the marketing firm "Cool World," have launched legal challenges regarding Twitter's decision not to accept promotional tweets for the film The New Corporation. These paid tweets were comprised mainly of a link to a trailer for the film, which offers a stinging critique of how corporations, including large social media conglomerates, brand their activities as socially conscious while posing dangers to democracy. Twitter, on six separate occasions, rejected a request to advertise the film via a paid tweet and, each time, offered a different justification, including reliance on a Twitter policy that bars "political" ads. Two separate legal proceedings were launched: the first against Twitter and the second against the Government of Canada. This is how both sets of pleadings describe the freedom of expression issue at stake (at 4-6):

(a) This case arises at a moment of revolutionary change in communications in Canada and worldwide. Over the last two decades, the social media platform operated by the Respondents, Twitter, which hosts hundreds of millions of users across the globe, has become a central public arena for democratic dialogue and debate among citizens, organizations, and governments. Twitter is widely regarded, and promotes itself, as a forum for expressive activity, open to all. It is where heads of state, politicians, and public institutions make significant statements, communicate with citizens and media, and relay critical information. Moreover, Twitter is a platform for citizens to engage with political decision-makers and each other. Because of its role as a public arena for political and social speech, Twitter is unique among companies, including traditional media outlets and other social media platforms.

(b) Within Canada, Twitter is the principal social media platform for government communications. Prime Minister Trudeau has 5.6M Twitter followers (@JustinTrudeau), and makes all of his important announcements there. Official accounts now exist for federal, provincial and territorial ministers and departments. The Supreme Court of Canada (@SCC_eng and @CSC_fra), the Ontario Court of Appeal (@ONCA_en), the Superior Court of Justice (Ontario) (@SCJOntario_en) and the Ontario Court of Justice (@OntarioOn) all have accounts on Twitter. The COVID-19 pandemic has cemented Twitter's role as the social media platform of choice for Canadian public institutions: for example, the Superior Court relied on Twitter to issue a historically unprecedented number of Notices to the Profession to adapt court operations and procedures.

(c) Twitter's substantial power over democratic dialogue and debate is widely regarded as a matter of urgent public concern that is intrinsically tied to the fate of democracy itself. The reason is the absolute power of Twitter to censor at will the political and social expression which takes place on its platform, through exercise of its ownership rights. Twitter wields its power as owner to ban ("de-platform") users, suspend tweets, hide tweets, and refuse to promote tweets at its discretion. There is little to no transparency to the processes that lead to these decisions, many of which are automated through the use of artificial intelligence. In addition, Twitter's decisions to censor speech in Canada are mainly made from its corporate headquarters in California.

(d) As the Supreme Court has observed, "access to ... social media platforms, including the online communities they make possible, has become increasingly important for the exercise of free speech, freedom of association and for full participation in democracy." (Douez v. Facebook, 2017 SCC 33 at para. 56). The United States Supreme Court has likewise stated that social media platforms are a "quintessential forum for the exercise of First Amendment rights," and that "[w]hile in the past there may have been difficulty in identifying the most important places (in a spatial sense) for the exchange of views, today the answer is clear. It is cyberspace—the 'vast democratic forums of the Internet' in general, and social media in particular" (Packingham v. North Carolina, 582 US _ (2017) at 5).

(e) Nevertheless, Canada has not regulated Twitter to protect freedom of expression. By default, in the absence of government regulation, Twitter is governed by the online standard form agreement (the "User Agreement"), a contract of adhesion in relation to which there is no negotiation, it has entered with its hundreds of millions of users worldwide, including millions of users in Canada.

(f) The fundamental question raised by this Application is: how must the common law of contracts evolve to respond to Twitter, a platform that, while privately owned, has become a public arena for democratic dialogue and debate that has powerful sway over core constitutional values of freedom of expression and democracy? [Emphasis in original.]

The first legal proceeding relies upon contract law, arguing that its doctrine should be developed in conformity with Charter values. "[T]wo contextual factors should shape the development of the common law of contract to comport with the Charter," they argue: "first, Twitter's role as a public arena, and second the fact that Twitter's policies and/or actions have banned high value social and political expression" (at 10, emphasis in original).

In the second proceeding, the plaintiffs seek a declaration under s 2(b) of the Charter requiring the Government of Canada "to introduce legislation and promulgate regulations that protects constitutional freedom of expression values and interests on Twitter and other social media platforms similarly functioning as public arenas for political, social, governmental and democratic expressive activity" (at 3, emphasis in original). It is claimed that Canada has a "constitutional duty under s. 2(b) of the Charter to protect high value speech on Twitter and other platforms" (at 10). Three reasons are offered in support of this remedy:

(a) "First, by using Twitter as their principal social media platform for official communication, governments have given Twitter a public character that triggers Charter obligations to protect, on that platform, citizens' rights to communicate with government, to receive communications from government, and to engage in dialogue and debate relevant to governmental decisions and public policy in general. The United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit held that President Trump's Twitter account created a public forum, and therefore subjected him to First Amendment duties—in that case, the obligation not to block users who disagreed with him: Knight First Amdt. Inst. at Columbia Univ. v. Trump, 928 F. 3d 226 (2019). By extension, Canadian public institutions have collectively created on Twitter a digital public arena for debating and deliberating over politics, which triggers a Charter duty on Canada to keep that public arena open to all Canadians to engage in expressive activity that would, if in a public arena on public property, be protected by section 2(b). Because governments in Canada have effectively created a public arena on a privately owned social media platform, Canada is constitutionally obligated under the Charter to ensure that arena is open to all, and to all expression that courts would protect from intrusions by government.

(b) Second, Twitter's Ad Policies restrict social and political speech, such as The New Corporation tweet. This expression lies at the core of s. 2(b) and has been afforded the highest level of constitutional protection by courts. Twitter's blanket restrictions on social and political speech, if rooted in state action, would be struck down on the basis of overbreadth at the minimal impairment stage of the R v. Oakes, [1986] 1 SCR 103 s. 1 analysis. By extension, the state has a duty to protect such expression on private social media platforms that serve as public arenas, like Twitter.

(c) Third, Twitter's operations, which profoundly impact Canadian expressive activity and democracy, are directed by its parent company in the United States. The effect of Canada's failure to regulate Twitter to protect users' rights of freedom of expression is to cede authority over Canadians' high value expression to a foreign corporation, which operates in the American constitutional system, where governments have limited power to regulate speech on social media platforms (either to restrict or protect), and do not have constitutional duties to do so.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Can you reconcile this argument with Charter application doctrine? In Haig v Canada; Haig v Canada (Chief Electoral Officer), [1993] 2 SCR 995, 1993 CanLII 58 at 1039, L'Heureux-Dubé J stated that "in order to make a fundamental freedom meaningful, a posture of restraint would not be enough, and positive governmental action might be required. ... [F]or example ... legislative intervention aimed at preventing certain conditions which muzzle expression." Justice Rothstein favorably cited this passage (at para 26) in Baier v Alberta, 2007 SCC 31 in addition to Dunmore v Ontario (AG), 2001 SCC 94, a s 2(d) freedom of association case concerning under-inclusive legislation. Justice Rothstein held that there could be a "positive obligation on the government to provide legislative protection" (at para 80) under s 2(b) in cases of exclusion from a statutory regime. The government has enacted the Broadcasting Act, SC 1991, c 11; the Digital Privacy Act, SC 2015, c 32; the Telecommunications Act, SC 1993, c 38; and the Competition Act, RSC 1985, c C-34; statutes that authorize agencies, such as the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission (CRTC) and the Competition Bureau to regulate aspects of electronic media. The Canadian government, however, has not yet exercised its legislative authority to protect users' freedom of expression on social media platforms.

2. In light of Reference re Secession of Quebec, [1998] 2 SCR 217, 1998 CanLII 793, can it be said that a constitutional duty arises in the case of a legislative vacuum? In what circumstances might the government have a duty to act under the Charter? The applicants argue that the "effect of Canada's failure to regulate Twitter to protect users' rights of freedom of expression is to cede authority over Canadians' high value expression to a foreign corporation" operating under foreign law. Should these circumstances give rise to a constitutional duty?

3. If the Charter does not apply to Twitter, is it appropriate, under the common law, for Twitter to ban "high value" political speech that does not cause harm? Should private parties be free to make these choices, or is Twitter required to behave as if it were, practically speaking, operating a public forum? Consider the RWDSU, Local 558 v Pepsi-Cola Canada Beverages (West) Ltd, 2002 SCC 8, where the Supreme Court interpreted the common law as rendering secondary picketing lawful unless it involves "tortious or criminal conduct" (at para 3). Or consider Grant v Torstar, where the Supreme Court modified the common law of defamation to recognize a defence of responsible communication on matters of public interest. Should the common law of contracts also be modified to accommodate high value political expression? Should such a modification extend to expression that is of lower value and that is said not to cause harm, such as commercial expression?

4. Is it fair to say that Bakan and Cool World stand on an equal footing to former President Trump? If Trump does not pay for promotional tweets on Twitter, why should Bakan and Cool World be entitled, via government regulation, to do so? Or is it more accurate to say that promoted tweets enable less powerful interests to have their voices heard in ways that compete with more powerful ones, such as former presidents?

5. There is currently a great deal of discussion about whether and how to regulate social media. Should governments do this directly? What are some of the potential benefits, and what are some of the concerns? For discussion, see Carissima Mathen, "Regulating Expression on Social Media" in Emmett MacFarlane, ed, Dilemmas of Free Expression (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2021).

CHAPTER TWENTY-ONE

FREEDOM OF ASSOCIATION

I. Introduction	1047
II. The Right to Associate with Others	1048
III. The Freedom Not to Associate with Others	1081

I. INTRODUCTION

The readings in this chapter are a testimony to the fact freedom of association is intimately connected to the history of labour relations in Canada. The common law of employment, generally speaking, is hostile to efforts by employees to improve their terms and conditions of work by collective means. With the rise of collective bargaining legislation, employees became entitled to join together for the purposes of collective bargaining with their employer and, if necessary and under strict conditions, to strike for the purposes of improving their working conditions. Thus, in many ways, the history of labour relations in Canada is a history of efforts by employees to expand their freedom of association. With the enactment of s 2(d) of the Charter, the judiciary became vested with the authority to rule on the constitutionality of laws that regulate relations between employers and employees. The constitutional guarantee of freedom of association raises critical questions concerning the extent to which governments can restrict, or must actually facilitate, the ability of employees to form unions, bargain collectively, and strike. It also raises questions about whether employees can be required to belong or contribute to trade unions and participate in their lawful activities.

Importantly, though freedom of association jurisprudence is mainly concerned with labour relations, associational activity is, in fact, central to individual, communal, and national identities that reach well beyond that context. As you read through the following materials, try to extrapolate from the labour relations setting to other settings, such as the family, religious institutions, political activity, and ethnic and cultural ties. What are the implications of the Court's approach for other spheres of social and political life that manifest associational activity? How should freedom of association relate to other constitutional guarantees, such as equality or freedom of religion?

The following section details a remarkable jurisprudential voyage. In 1987, the Court rendered judgment in a trilogy of cases, known collectively as the Labour Trilogy, that cast cold water on the Canadian labour movement's hopes that s 2(d) would extend robust constitutional protection for the rights of workers—Reference re Public Service Employee Relations Act (Alta), [1987] 1 SCR 313, 1987 CanLII 88 [Alberta Reference]; PSAC v Canada, [1987] 1 SCR 424, 1987 CanLII 89 [Public Service Alliance]; RWDSU v Saskatchewan, [1987] 1 SCR 460, 1987 CanLII 90 [Saskatchewan Dairy Workers]. In the Alberta Reference, the majority of the Court, per McIntyre and Le Dain JJ, defined the scope of freedom of association narrowly, holding that the guarantee enshrines neither a right to strike nor a right to bargain collectively with one's employer. At most, freedom of association protects the right of workers to establish, join, and belong to a trade union. Chief Justice Dickson issued a powerful dissent, holding that freedom of association not only protects a right of workers to establish, join, and belong to a trade union but also a right to bargain collectively.

Obliquely acknowledging the Labour Trilogy's logical flaws and doctrinal inconsistencies, subsequent cases began to chip away at its holdings. In 2001, in Dunmore v Ontario (AG), 2001 SCC 94, the majority adopted some of Dickson CJ's dissenting views in the Alberta Reference. In 2007, the dam finally broke in Health Services and Support—Facilities Subsector Bargaining Assn v British Columbia, 2007 SCC 27 [BC Health Services], in which the Court explicitly overruled the Labour Trilogy's reasoning and much of its result, ushering in an expansive conception of freedom of association in the context of work by holding that freedom of association protects the right of workers to bargain collectively with their employers. More recently, in 2011, the Court explored some of the implications of this dramatic reversal, holding in Ontario (AG) v Fraser, 2011 SCC 20 that freedom of association guarantees a meaningful process that enables employee associations to make representations to employers, which employers must consider and discuss in good faith. In 2015, a majority of the Court strongly affirmed Fraser in Mounted Police Association of Ontario v Canada (AG), 2015 SCC 1 and also held that freedom of association guarantees a right to strike in Saskatchewan Federation of Labour v Saskatchewan, 2015 SCC 4.

II. THE RIGHT TO ASSOCIATE WITH OTHERS

NOTE: THE LABOUR TRILOGY

In Alberta Reference, the Government of Alberta had referred three statutes to the Alberta Court of Appeal, the opinion of which the government subsequently appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada. The statutes were the Public Service Employee Relations Act, RSA 1980, c P-33; the Labour Relations Act, RSA 1980, c L-1.1; and the Police Officers Collective Bargaining Act, SA 1983(2), c P-12.05, all of which removed the right to strike of selected government employees—police, firefighters, hospital employees, and public servants—and replaced that right with a scheme of compulsory arbitration. The provisions governing interest arbitration also limited the matters that could be arbitrated and included criteria to guide arbitral decision-making. The issue before the courts was whether the right to strike and the right to bargain collectively are constitutionally protected under s 2(d) of the Charter, which guarantees freedom of association. A majority of the Court of Appeal decided that s 2(d) of the Charter did not include the right to strike and thus declared the three statutes valid.

Justice McIntyre of the Supreme Court of Canada identified freedom of association as "one of the most fundamental rights in a free society," as indicated by the fact that historically the conqueror, seeking to control foreign peoples, invariably strikes first at freedom of association in order to eliminate effective opposition. Meetings are forbidden, curfews are enforced, trade and commerce is suppressed, and rigid controls are imposed to isolate and thus debilitate the individual (at para 148).

In defining the scope of freedom of association under s 2(d) of the Charter, McIntyre J stated:

[154] ... Freedom of association then serves the interest of the individual, strengthens the general social order, and supports the healthy functioning of democratic government.

[155] In considering the constitutional position of freedom of association, it must be recognized that while it advances many group interests and, of course, cannot be exercised alone, it is nonetheless a freedom belonging to the individual and not to the group formed through its exercise. ... People, by merely combining together, cannot create an entity which has greater constitutional rights and freedoms than they, as individuals, possess. Freedom of association cannot therefore vest independent rights in the group.

[157] The recognition of this principle in the case at bar is of great significance. The only basis on which it is contended that the Charter enshrines a right to strike is that of freedom of association. Collective bargaining is a group concern, a group activity, but the group can exercise only the constitutional rights of its individual members on behalf of those members. If the right asserted is not found in the Charter for the individual, it cannot be implied for the group merely by the fact of association. It follows as well that the rights of the individual members of the group cannot be enlarged merely by the fact of association.

Justice McIntyre examined six theories about the meaning of freedom of association. The first is that freedom of association is limited to the right to associate with others, but that neither the objects nor the actions of the group are protected. Under the second approach, freedom of association protects the right to engage collectively in activities that are constitutionally protected for the individual. The third approach protects the organization in doing whatever the individual could lawfully do alone—that is, individuals can do together that which they can lawfully do alone. The fourth approach protects collective activities considered to be fundamental to our culture—for example, marriage or gaining a livelihood. The fifth extends protection to all activities necessary for the association to achieve its lawful goals—this was the approach taken by the Ontario Divisional Court in Re Service Employees' International Union, Local 204 and Broadway Manor Nursing Home, 1983 CanLII 1928, 44 OR \(2d\) 392, which held that freedom of association included the right to bargain collectively and to strike. The sixth approach is the broadest, encompassing all acts done in association, subject to limitation under s 1 of the Charter.

Justice McIntyre rejected the fourth, fifth, and sixth approaches because he claimed, they did not cohere with conceiving freedom of association as an individual right. He then held that the third approach is the only one potentially relevant to the right to strike and that, for the following reasons, it does not encompass the right to strike:

[177] When this [third] definition of freedom of association is applied, it is clear that it does not guarantee the right to strike. Since the right to strike is not independently protected under the Charter, it can receive protection under freedom of association only if it is an activity which is permitted by law to an individual. Accepting this conclusion, the appellants argue that freedom of association must guarantee the right to strike because individuals may lawfully refuse to work. This position, however, is untenable for two reasons. First, it is not correct to say that it is lawful for an individual employee to cease work during the currency of his contract of employment. ... The second reason is simply that there is no analogy whatever between the cessation of work by a single employee and a strike conducted in accordance with modern labour legislation. The individual has, by reason of the cessation of work, either breached or terminated his contract of employment. It is true that the law will not compel the specific performance of the contract by ordering him back to work as this would reduce "the employee to a state tantamount to slavery" (I. Christie, Employment Law in Canada [(Toronto: Butterworths, 1980)], p. 268). But, this is markedly different from a lawful strike. An employee who ceases work does not contemplate a return to work, while employees on strike always contemplate a return to work. In recognition of this fact, the law does not regard a strike as either a breach of contract or a termination of employment. Every province and the federal Parliament has enacted legislation which preserves the employer–employee relationship during a strike.

It was not clear from McIntyre J's opinion in the Alberta Reference whether he also had concluded that collective bargaining was not protected by freedom of association. Justice Le Dain (Beetz and La Forest JJ concurring) agreed with McIntyre J's conclusion and viewed it as stating that the right to bargain collectively, as well as the right to strike, was not protected under freedom of association. Justice Le Dain emphasized that freedom of association will be applied to "a wide range of associations or organizations of a political, religious, social or economic nature, with a wide variety of objects, as well as activity by which the objects may be pursued" (at para 142), and therefore it is important to be restrained in granting constitutional protection to activities in which associations engage.

Chief Justice Dickson (Wilson J concurring)—whose dissenting opinion would eventually be embraced by the Court (see below)—took a different view of the scope of freedom of association, which he described as "the cornerstone of modern labour relations" (at para 23). He considered two approaches to the scope of the freedom, the constitutive and the derivative, both of which he rejected in favour of an interpretation that recognized that individuals are sometimes able to engage in activities through associations that they are unable to engage in solely as individuals:

[78] A wide variety of alternative interpretations of freedom of association has been advanced in the jurisprudence summarized above and in argument before this Court.

[79] At one extreme is a purely constitutive definition whereby freedom of association entails only a freedom to belong to or form an association. On this view, the constitutional guarantee does not extend beyond protecting the individual's status as a member of an association. It would not protect his or her associational actions.

[80] In the trade union context, then, a constitutive definition would find a prima facie violation of s. 2(d) of the Charter in legislation such as s. 2(1) of the Police Officers Act, which prohibits membership in any organization affiliated with a trade union. But it could find no violation of s. 2(d) in respect of legislation which prohibited a concerted refusal to work. Indeed, a wide variety of trade union activities, ranging from the organization of social activities for its members, to the establishment of union pension plans, to the discussion of collective bargaining strategy, could be prohibited by the State without infringing s. 2(d).

[81] The essentially formal nature of a constitutive approach to freedom of association is equally apparent when one considers other types of associational activity in our society. While the constitutive approach might find a possible violation of s. 2(d) in a legislative enactment which prohibited marriage for certain classes of people, it would hold inoffensive an enactment which precluded the same people from engaging in the activities integral to a marriage, such as cohabiting and raising children together. If freedom of association only protects the joining together of persons for common purposes, but not the pursuit of the very activities for which the association was formed, then the freedom is indeed legalistic, ungenerous, indeed vapid.

[82] In my view, while it is unquestionable that s. 2(d), at a minimum, guarantees the liberty of persons to be in association or belong to an organization, it must extend beyond a concern for associational status to give effective protection to the interests to which the constitutional guarantee is directed. In this respect, it is important to consider the purposive approach to constitutional interpretation mandated by this Court in R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd. [[1985] 1 SCR 295, 1985 CanLII 69]

[83] A second approach, the derivative approach, prevalent in the United States, embodies a somewhat more generous definition of freedom of association than the formal, constitutive approach. In the Canadian context, it is suggested by some that associational action which relates specifically to one of the other freedoms enumerated in s. 2 is constitutionally protected, but other associational activity is not.

[84] I am unable, however, to accept that freedom of association should be interpreted so restrictively. Section 2(d) of the Charter provides an explicit and independent guarantee of freedom of association. In this respect it stands in marked contrast to the First Amendment to the American Constitution. The derivative approach would, in my view, largely make surplausage of s. 2(d). . . . What is to be learnt from the United States jurisprudence is not that freedom of association must be restricted to associational activities involving independent constitutional rights but, rather, that the express conferral of a freedom of association is unnecessary if all that is intended is to give effect to the collective enjoyment of other individual freedoms.

[87] Freedom of association is most essential in those circumstances where the individual is liable to be prejudiced by the actions of some larger and more powerful entity, like the government or an employer. Association has always been the means through which political, cultural and racial minorities, religious groups and workers have sought to attain their purposes and fulfil their aspirations; it has enabled those who would otherwise be vulnerable and ineffective to meet on more equal terms the power and strength of those with whom their interests interact and, perhaps, conflict. ...

Chief Justice Dickson accepted that the guarantee protects the collective exercise of lawful individual activities but pointed out that there will be situations when no analogy involving individuals can be found for associational activity, or when a comparison between groups and individuals fails to capture the essence of a possible violation of associational rights (at para 89).

This is the case with the right to strike since, in his view, there is no individual parallel to the collective action of striking.

Finally, Dickson CJ distinguished between associational activity with economic objectives, such as earning a livelihood or dignity in the workplace, and "concerns of an exclusively pecuniary nature" (at para 90), the former of which he believed should receive constitutional protection, while protection of the latter is more debatable. He, therefore, concluded that collective bargaining and the right to strike are encompassed by freedom of association:

[92] The role of association has always been vital as a means of protecting the essential needs and interests of working people. Throughout history, workers have associated to overcome their vulnerability as individuals to the strength of their employers. The capacity to bargain collectively has long been recognized as one of the integral and primary functions of associations of working people. While trade unions also fulfil other important social, political and charitable functions, collective bargaining remains vital to the capacity of individual employees to participate in ensuring fair wages, health and safety protections and equitable and humane working conditions. ...

[94] Closely related to collective bargaining, at least in our existing industrial relations context, is the freedom to strike. ...

[95] The Woods Task Force Report [Harry D Woods, Canadian Industrial Relations: The Report of Task Force on Labour Relations (Ottawa: Privy Council Office, 1968)] at p. 129 identifies the work stoppage as the essential ingredient in collective bargaining:

408. Strikes and lockouts are an indispensable part of the Canadian industrial relations system and are likely to remain so in our present socio-economic-political society.

[97] I am satisfied, in sum, that whether or not freedom of association generally extends to protecting associational activity for the pursuit of exclusively pecuniary ends—a question on which I express no opinion—collective bargaining protects important employee interests which cannot be characterized as merely pecuniary in nature. Under our existing system of industrial relations, effective constitutional protection of the associational interests of employees in the collective bargaining process requires concomitant protection of their freedom to withdraw collectively their services, subject to s. 1 of the Charter.

Chief Justice Dickson found that the restrictions under the impugned legislation were not justified under s 1 of the Charter because they inadequately defined the essential services that could be exempted from the right to strike, they were overbroad in their application to certain workers, and the arbitration system was not an adequate replacement for the right to strike. In two companion cases, Public Service Alliance and Saskatchewan Dairy Workers, Dickson CJ held that restrictions on strikes and collective bargaining imposed limits on s 2(d) but, for the most part, could be upheld under s 1.

NOTES

1. Although it was clear from the decisions rendered in the Labour Trilogy that freedom of association did not include a right to strike, the judgments were less clear on the constitutional status of collective bargaining. Yet in Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada v Northwest Territories (Commissioner), [1990] 2 SCR 367, 1990 CanLII 72 [PIPSC], decided three years after the Labour Trilogy, a majority of the Court followed the Labour Trilogy cases to reach the conclusion that s 2(d) does not protect the right to bargain collectively.

2. In Delisle v Canada (Deputy AG), [1999] 2 SCR 989, 1999 CanLII 649, the Court addressed the constitutionality of a provision in the Public Service Staff Relations Act, RSC 1985, c 33 (2nd Supp) that expressly excluded members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police from the application of the Act, which established a collective bargaining regime for most civil servants and protected the right to form and join a union by prohibiting specific forms of managerial interference. Justice Bastarache, for a majority of the Court (Cory and Iacobucci JJ dissenting), relying on PIPSC, held there to be no violation of freedom of association in the denial of collective bargaining to RCMP members. The decision was heavily criticized, as in the following excerpt:

Patrick Macklem, "Developments in Employment Law: The 1990-91 Term"

(1992) 3 SCLR (2d) 227 at 239-41 (footnotes omitted)

Justice Sopinka's majority judgment in PIPSC perhaps represents the final curtain on the constitutional guarantee of freedom of association in the context of work. Unless there is a major doctrinal reversal, the combined effect of the Labour Trilogy and PIPS is to strip the constitutional guarantee of freedom of association of any substantive meaning in the context of union power. As a result of the Labour Trilogy, the Charter does not constitutionally recognize the freedom of workers to collectively withdraw their labour even when they are under no contractual obligation to continue to work for an employer. As a result of [PIPSC], the Charter does not recognize the freedom of employees to band together for the purpose of bargaining collectively with their employers. In the words of Justice Cory: "The fact that the people who form the association (the union) may still meet together without interference from the state has no meaning if this association cannot be recognized under the relevant labour legislation."

As stated, the invocation of Justice McIntyre's test in the Labour Trilogy was defended by reference to an individualistic vision of constitutional guarantees. By the time [PIPSC] was decided, the test was a matter of precedent and was presented as an incontrovertible feature of the constitutional landscape. The indeterminacy of the guarantee was made to disappear. Alternative visions of freedom of association were not even introduced for discussion. Even Chief Justice Dickson accepted the now-dominant understanding of the guarantee. The interpretive function took on an apolitical, objective veneer. Moreover, in applying the test that now has fixed the meaning of freedom of association, arguments were ignored that would have led to the protection of the very activity that the court excluded from section 2(d). As a result of the Labour Trilogy and [PIPSC], freedom of association is rendered barren, protecting nothing of positive importance to the union movement.

Whatever one thinks of the institutional competence of the judiciary in second-guessing substantive policy choices of legislatures, or of the progressive potential of Charter litigation, the combined effect of the Labour Trilogy and [PIPSC] is a national embarrassment. As stated previously, scholars disagree on the reasons why freedom of association is valuable in a democratic state. Some stress the fact that associational activity is critical to the self-realization of the individual, in that it is necessary in many cases to combine together to secure sufficient power to offset countervailing institutional forces that threaten individual autonomy and freedom. Others view associational activity as part of what it means to be human, in that an important component of human personality only obtains expression by association with others, and that such activity ought to be cherished and protected against the individuating tendencies of the modern state. Whatever the reason ultimately underpinning commitments to freedom of association, the important fact is that this freedom ought to be valued highly as a critical component of a democratic state.

Blinded by individualism, the Court treats freedom of association as though it potentially amounts to a threat to democracy. In contrast to the "large and liberal" approach to defining the scope and content of constitutional guarantees that the Court has been proud to articulate in relation to other constitutional rights, the Court appears determined to provide as minimal a content to freedom of association as possible. Alberta Reference's premise and conclusion is that the Constitution does not protect the essential purposes of some associations from state interference, yet no argument that does more than reiterate this view is given by the Court. In [PIPSC], no argument is necessary: precedent rules the day. The real reason for the Court's position appears to be a combination of conservatism and fear. It cannot be denied that groups can be powerful, nor can it be denied that the judiciary is not the most competent or legitimate institution to assess the relative merits of different types of associational activity. But these facts should go to the level of deference that the judiciary ought to accord to certain state initiatives, not to the definition of freedom of association itself. Workers deserve more from the judiciary than a jurisprudence of fear.

[In 1994, the Ontario legislature enacted the Agricultural Labour Relations Act, 1994 [ALRA], which extended trade union and collective bargaining rights to agricultural workers. Prior to the adoption of this legislation, agricultural workers had always been excluded from Ontario's labour relations regime. A year later, following a change in government, the legislature, by virtue of s 80 of the Labour Relations and Employment Statute Law Amendment Act, 1995 [LRESLA], repealed the ALRA in its entirety. The effect was thus to subject agricultural workers to s 3(b) of the Labour Relations Act, 1995 [LRA], which excluded them from the labour relations regime set out in the LRA. Section 80 also terminated any certification rights of trade unions under the ALRA, as well as any collective agreements certified thereunder. The appellants brought an application challenging the repeal of the ALRA and their exclusion from the LRA on the basis that it infringed their rights under ss 2(d) and 15(1) of the Charter. Both the Ontario Court (General Division) and the Ontario Court of Appeal dismissed the constitutional challenge.]

BASTARACHE J (McLachlin CJ and Gonthier, Iacobucci, Binnie, Arbour, and LeBel JJ concurring):

[16] ... [T]he purpose of s. 2(d) commands a single inquiry: has the state precluded activity because of its associational nature, thereby discouraging the collective pursuit of common goals? In my view, while the four-part test [outlined in PIPSC] for freedom of association sheds light on this concept, it does not capture the full range of activities protected by s. 2(d). In particular, there will be occasions where a given activity does not fall within the third and fourth rules ... , but where the state has nevertheless prohibited that activity solely because of its associational nature. These occasions will involve activities which (1) are not protected under any other constitutional freedom, and (2) cannot, for one reason or another, be understood as the lawful activities of individuals. As discussed by Dickson C.J. in the [Alberta Reference re Public Service Employee Relations Act (Alta), [1987] 1 SCR 313, 1987 CanLII 55], such activities may be collective in nature, in that they cannot be performed by individuals acting alone. [This aspect of Dickson CJ's reasons,] which was not explicitly rejected by the majority in the Alberta Reference or in PIPSC, recognizes that the collective is "qualitatively" distinct from the individual: individuals associate not simply because there is strength in numbers, but because communities can embody objectives that individuals cannot. For example, a "majority view" cannot be expressed by a lone individual, but a group of individuals can form a constituency and distill their views into a single platform. ... Indeed, this is the essential purpose of joining a political party, participating in a class action or certifying a trade union. To limit s. 2(d) to activities that are performable by individuals would, in my view, render futile these fundamental initiatives. At best, it would encourage s. 2(d) claimants to contrive individual analogs for inherently associational activities, a process which this Court clearly resisted in the labour trilogy, in [Canadian Egg Marketing Agency v Richardson, [1998] 3 SCR 157, 1997 CanLII 17020] and in its jurisprudence on union security clauses and the right not associate. ...

[17] As I see it, the very notion of "association" recognizes the qualitative differences between individuals and collectivities. It recognizes that the press differs qualitatively from the journalist, the language community from the language speaker, the union from the worker. In all cases, the community assumes a life of its own and develops needs and priorities that differ from those of its individual members. Thus, for example, a language community cannot be nurtured if the law protects only the individual's right to speak (see R. v. Beaulac, [1999] 1 S.C.R. 768, at para. 20). Similar reasoning applies, albeit in a limited fashion, to the freedom to organize: because trade unions develop needs and priorities that are distinct from those of their members individually, they cannot function if the law protects exclusively what might be "the lawful activities of individuals." Rather, the law must recognize that certain union activities—making collective representations to an employer, adopting a majority political platform, federating with other unions—may be central to freedom of association even though they are inconceivable on the individual level. This is not to say that all such activities are protected by s. 2(d), nor that all collectivities are worthy of constitutional protection; indeed, this Court has repeatedly excluded the right to strike and collectively bargain from the protected ambit of s. 2(d). ... It is to say, simply, that certain collective activities must be recognized if the freedom to form and maintain an association is to have any meaning.

As one author puts it, the per se exclusion of collective action reduces employee collectives to mere "aggregate[s] of economically self-interested individuals" rather than "co-operative undertakings where individual flourishing can be encouraged through membership in and co-operation with the community of fellow workers" (see L. Harmer, "The Right to Strike: Charter Implications and Interpretations" (1989), 47 U.T. Fac. L. Rev. 420, at pp. 434-35). This would surely undermine the purpose of s. 2(d), which is to allow the achievement of individual potential through interpersonal relationships and collective action (see, e.g., [Lavigne v Ontario Public Service Employees Union, [1991] 2 SCR 211, 1991 CanLII 68] per McLachlin J., at pp. 343-44, per La Forest J., at pp. 327-28).

[19] The content of the freedom to organize having been discussed, the next question that arises is the scope of state responsibility in respect of this freedom. This responsibility is generally characterized as "negative" in nature, meaning that Parliament and the provincial legislatures need only refrain from interfering (either in purpose or effect) with protected associational activity. Conversely, the Charter does not oblige the state to take affirmative action to safeguard or facilitate the exercise of fundamental freedoms.

[20] However, history has shown, and Canada's legislatures have uniformly recognized, that a posture of government restraint in the area of labour relations will expose most workers not only to a range of unfair labour practices, but potentially to legal liability under common law inhibitions on combinations and restraints of trade. Knowing this would foreclose the effective exercise of the freedom to organize, Ontario has provided a statutory freedom to organize in its LRA (s. 5), as well as protections against denial of access to property (s. 13), employer interference with trade union activity (s. 70), discrimination against trade unionists (s. 72), intimidation and coercion (s. 76), alteration of working conditions during the certification process (s. 86), coercion of witnesses (s. 87), and removal of Board notices (s. 88). In this context, it must be asked whether, in order to make the freedom to organize meaningful, s. 2(d) of the Charter imposes a positive obligation on the state to extend protective legislation to unprotected groups. More broadly, it may be asked whether the distinction between positive and negative state obligations ought to be nuanced in the context of labour relations, in the sense that excluding agricultural workers from a protective regime substantially contributes to the violation of protected freedoms.

[22] ... Where a group is denied a statutory benefit accorded to others, as is the case in this appeal, the normal course is to review this denial under s. 15(1) of the Charter, not s. 2(d) (see Haig v. Canada, [1993] 2 S.C.R. 995; Native Women's Assn. of Canada v. Canada, [1994] 3 S.C.R. 627 ("NWAC"); [Delisle v Canada (Deputy Attorney General), [1999] 2 SCR 989, 1999 CanLII 649]). ... However, it seems to me that ... exclusion from a protective regime may in some contexts amount to an affirmative interference with the effective exercise of a protected freedom. In such a case, it is not so much the differential treatment that is at issue, but the fact that the government is creating conditions which in effect substantially interfere with the exercise of a constitutional right; it has been held in the s. 2(a) context, for example, that "protection of one religion and the concomitant non-protection of others imports disparate impact destructive of the religious freedom of the collectivity" (see [R v Big M Drug Mart Ltd, [1985] 1 SCR 295, 1985 CanLII 69] at p. 337). This does not mean that there is a constitutional right to protective legislation per se; it means legislation that is underinclusive may, in unique contexts, substantially impact the exercise of a constitutional freedom.

[23] This brings me to the central question of this appeal: can excluding agricultural workers from a statutory labour relations regime, without expressly or intentionally prohibiting association, constitute a substantial interference with freedom of association? ...

[28] ... [W]hile it is generally desirable to confine claims of underinclusion to s. 15(1), it will not be appropriate to do so where the underinclusion results in the effective denial of a fundamental freedom such as the right of association itself. This is not to say that such claims will be common: they are constrained by both s. 32 of the Charter, which demands a minimum of state action before the Charter can be invoked, as well as by the factors discussed above. However, a claim for inclusion should not, in my view, automatically fail a s. 2(d) analysis: depending on the circumstances, freedom of association may, for example, prohibit the selective exclusion of a group from whatever protections are necessary to form and maintain an association, even though there is no constitutional right to such statutory protection per se. In this sense, the burden imposed by s. 2(d) of the Charter differs from that imposed by s. 15(1): while the latter focuses on the effects of underinclusion on human dignity (Law v. Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), [1999] 1 S.C.R. 497), the former focuses on the effects of underinclusion on the ability to exercise a fundamental freedom. This distinction is contemplated by the wording of the Charter itself and is supported by subsequent jurisprudence of this Court (see, e.g., Delisle, supra, at para. 25).

[Justice Bastarache's discussion of Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union, Local 580 v Dolphin Delivery Ltd., [1986] 2 SCR 573, 1986 CanLII 5, and the application of the Charter to private action can be found in Chapter 18, Application.]

[29] ... [T]he above doctrine does not, on its own, oblige the state to act where it has not already legislated in respect of a certain area. One must always guard against reviewing legislative silence, particularly where no legislation has been enacted in the first place. By the same token, it must be remembered why the Charter applies to legislation that is underinclusive. Once the state has chosen to regulate a private relationship such as that between employer and employee, I believe it is unduly formalistic to consign that relationship to a "private sphere" that is impervious to Charter review. As Dean P. W. Hogg has stated, "[t]he effect of the governmental action restriction is that there is a private realm in which people are not obliged to subscribe to 'state' values, and into which constitutional norms do not intrude. The boundaries of that realm are marked, not by an a priori definition of what is 'private,' but by the absence of statutory or other governmental intervention" (see Constitutional Law of Canada (loose-leaf ed.), at p. 34-27). I am not prepared to say that the relationship between farmers and their employees falls within that boundary. If, by investigating the effects of a statute that regulates this sphere, this Court is imposing "positive" obligations on the state, that is only because such imposition is justified in the circumstances.

[Justice Bastarache held that while conflicting claims concerning the meaning of troubling comments in the legislature made it impossible to conclude that the exclusion of agricultural workers from the LRA was intended to infringe their freedom to organize, the exclusion had the effect of infringing those workers' freedom of association. When discussing those effects, he made the following observations.]

[39] The fact that a regime aims to safeguard a fundamental freedom does not, of course, mean that exclusion from that regime automatically gives rise to a Charter

violation. ... [A] group that proves capable of associating despite its exclusion ... will be unable to meet the evidentiary burden required of a Charter claim. ... In this case, by contrast, the appellants' contend that total exclusion from the LRA creates a situation whereby they are substantially incapable of exercising their constitutional right to associate.

[41] ... Not only have agricultural workers proved unable to form employee associations in provinces which deny them protection but, unlike the RCMP officers in Delisle, they argue that their relative status and lack of statutory protection all but guarantee this result. Distinguishing features of agricultural workers are their political impotence, their lack of resources to associate without state protection and their vulnerability to reprisal by their employers; as noted [below] by Sharpe J, agricultural workers are "poorly paid, face difficult working conditions, have low levels of skill and education, low status and limited employment mobility" (p. 216). Moreover, unlike RCMP officers, agricultural workers are not employed by the government and therefore cannot access the Charter directly It is no wonder, therefore, according to the appellants, that agricultural workers have failed to associate in any meaningful way in Ontario

[42] ... As stated earlier in these reasons, it is only the right to associate that is at issue here, not the right to collective bargaining. Nevertheless, to suggest that s. 2(d) of the Charter is respected where an association is reduced to claiming a right to unionize would, in my view, make a mockery of freedom of association. The record shows that, but for the brief period covered by the ALRA, there has never been an agricultural workers' union in Ontario. Agricultural workers have suffered repeated attacks on their efforts to unionize. Conversely, in those provinces where labour relations rights have been extended to agricultural workers, union density is higher than in Ontario (see Statistics Canada, Annual Report of the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology under the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act, Part II, Labour Unions (1992), at pp. 38-41). The respondents do not contest this evidence, nor do they deny that legislative protection is absolutely crucial if agricultural workers wish to unionize. Indeed, to suggest otherwise would contradict a widespread consensus among Parliament and the provincial legislatures For these reasons, I readily conclude that the evidentiary burden has been met in this case: the appellants have brought this litigation because there is no possibility for association as such without minimum statutory protection. ...

[43] Their freedom to organize having been substantially impeded by exclusion from protective legislation, it is still incumbent on the appellants to link this impediment to state, not just private action (see Dolphin Delivery, supra). On this point, the respondent argues that since agricultural workers are isolated, seasonal and relatively under-educated, this, along with the unfair labour practices of their employers, is what explains the difficulty in creating associations rather than the underinclusiveness of the legislation. On the other hand, the appellants argue that the above conditions are reinforced by [the] legislation

[44] In my view, the appellants' argument must prevail. What the legislature has done by reviving the LRA is not simply allow private circumstances to subsist; it has reinforced those circumstances by excluding agricultural workers from the only available channel for associational activity (see [Vriend v Alberta, [1998] 1 SCR 493, 1998 CanLII 816], at paras. 99-103). ...

[45] The most palpable effect of the LRESLAA and the LRA is, in my view, to place a chilling effect on non-statutory union activity. By extending statutory protection to just about every class of worker in Ontario, the legislature has essentially discredited the organizing efforts of agricultural workers. This is especially true given the relative status of agricultural workers in Canadian society. In Delisle, supra, I linked

RCMP officers' ability to associate to their relative status, comparing them with the armed forces, senior executives in the public service and judges. The thrust of this argument was that if the PSSRA sought to discourage RCMP officers from associating, it could not do so in light of their relative status, their financial resources and their access to constitutional protection. By contrast, it is hard to imagine a more discouraging legislative provision than s. 3(b) of the LRA. The evidence is that the ability of agricultural workers to associate is only as great as their access to legal protection, and such protection exists neither in statutory nor constitutional form. Moreover, agricultural workers already possess a limited sense of entitlement as a result of their exclusion from other protective legislation related to employment standards and occupational health and safety. ... In this context, the effect of s. 3(b) of the LRA is not simply to perpetuate an existing inability to organize, but to exert the precise chilling effect I declined to recognize in Delisle, supra. ...

[46] ... It is widely accepted that labour relations laws function not only to provide a forum for airing specific grievances, but for fostering dialogue in an otherwise adversarial workplace. As P. Weiler has written, unionization introduces a form of political democracy into the workplace, subjecting employer and employee alike to the "rule of law" (Reconcilable Differences: New Directions in Canadian Labour Law (1980), at pp. 31-32). In this context, the wholesale exclusion of agricultural workers from a labour relations regime can only be viewed as a stimulus to interfere with organizing activity. The exclusion suggests that workplace democracy has no place in the agricultural sector and, moreover, that agricultural workers' efforts to associate are illegitimate. ...

[48] In sum, I believe it is reasonable to conclude that the exclusion of agricultural workers from the LRA substantially interferes with their fundamental freedom to organize. The inherent difficulties of organizing farm workers, combined with the threats of economic reprisal from employers, form only part of the reason why association is all but impossible in the agricultural sector in Ontario. Equally important is the message sent by s. 3(b) of the LRA, which delegitimizes associational activity and thereby ensures its ultimate failure. Given these known and foreseeable effects of s. 3(b), I conclude that the provision infringes the freedom to organize and thus violates s. 2(d) of the Charter.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. With respect to the s 1 analysis, Bastarache J held that the evidence established that many farms in Ontario are family-owned and -operated, and that the protection of the family farm is a pressing enough objective to warrant the infringement of s 2(d) of the Charter. The economic objective of ensuring farm productivity is also important, he stated, as agriculture occupies a volatile and highly competitive part of the private sector economy, experiences disproportionately thin profit margins, and, because of its seasonal character, is particularly vulnerable to strikes and lockouts. However, Bastarache J held, the wholesale exclusion of agricultural workers from Ontario's labour relations regime does not minimally impair their right to freedom of association. The categorical exclusion of agricultural workers is unjustified where no satisfactory effort has been made to protect their basic right to form associations, he stated, and the exclusion is overly broad because it denies the right of association to every sector of agriculture without distinction. The reliance on the family farm justification, he continued, ignores an increasing trend in Canada toward corporate farming and complex agribusiness and does not justify the unqualified and total exclusion of all agricultural workers from Ontario's labour relations regime.

2. Justice L'Heureux-Dubé concurred in separate reasons, adding that the occupational status of agricultural workers constitutes an "analogous ground" (at para 170) for the purposes of proving a s 15(1) breach. Justice Major dissented, arguing that s 2(d) does not impose a positive obligation of protection or inclusion on the state.

3. Dunmore is noteworthy for the remedy declared by Bastarache J. He declared that the LRESLAA is unconstitutional to the extent that it gives effect to the exclusion clause found in s 3(b) of the LRA, and that the appropriate remedy in this case would be to declare s 3(b) unconstitutional. The declarations were suspended for 18 months, allowing amending legislation to be passed if the legislature saw fit to do so. In Bastarache J's view, s 2(d) of the Charter only requires the legislature to provide a statutory framework that is consistent with the principles established in this case. At a minimum, these principles require that the statutory freedom to organize in s 5 of the LRA be extended to agricultural workers, along with protections judged essential to its meaningful exercise, such as freedom to assemble; freedom from interference, coercion and discrimination; and freedom to make representations and to participate in the lawful activities of the association. According to Bastarache J, the appropriate remedy does not require or forbid the inclusion of agricultural workers in a full collective bargaining regime, whether it be the LRA or a special regime applicable only to agricultural workers.

4. The Ontario legislature responded by enacting the Agricultural Employees Protection Act, 2002, SO 2002, c 16 [AEPA], the details of which are summarized in Fraser, excerpted below, in which the Supreme Court of Canada addressed its constitutionality, after it rendered judgment in BC Health Services, excerpted immediately below.

5. In Gosselin v Quebec (AG), 2002 SCC 84, excerpted in Chapter 22, The Right to Life, Liberty, and Security of the Person, Arbour J, dissenting, described Bastarache J's judgment in Dunmore as providing a three-part test for determining whether a Charter right or freedom gives rise to a positive obligation on the state to legislate for its protection. In Arbour J's view, this test is as follows (at para 365):

1. The claim must be grounded in a fundamental Charter right or freedom rather than in access to a particular statutory regime
2. A proper evidentiary foundation must be provided, before creating a positive obligation under the Charter, by demonstrating that exclusion from the regime constitutes a substantial interference with the exercise and fulfillment of a protected right
3. It must be determined whether the state can truly be held accountable for any inability to exercise the right or freedom in question

These criteria were affirmed by a majority of the Court in BC Health Services, immediately below. Are these appropriate criteria for determining whether Charter rights and freedoms impose positive obligations on the state to legislate for its protection? What does it mean in terms of s 32 of the Charter, which stipulates that the Charter applies to governmental action, to say that a failure to legislate under certain circumstances violates a Charter right or freedom?

6. Dunmore is also noteworthy for its engagement with international labour law. In support of his holdings, Bastarache J referred not only to International Labour Organization (ILO) Convention (No 87) concerning Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise, 67 UNTS 17 (entered into force 4 July 1950), which Canada has ratified, but also Convention (No 11) concerning the Rights of Association of Agricultural Workers, 38 UNTS 153 (entered into force 12 November 1921), and Convention (No 141) concerning Organisations of Rural Workers and Their Role in Economic and Social Development, 58:1 (1975) ILO Official Bulletin, neither of which Canada has ratified. The fact that the latter two instruments did not impose binding international legal obligations on Canada possessed no significance to Bastarache J's reasoning. They lent persuasive force to his conclusion that freedom of association, in some circumstances, requires legislatures to legislate for its protection.

Health Services and Support—Facilities Subsector Bargaining Assn v British Columbia

[The Health and Social Services Delivery Improvement Act, SBC 2002, c 2 was designed to restructure labour relations in BC's health care system. Part 2 of the Act introduced changes to transfers and multi-worksit assignment rights (ss 4, 5), contracting out (s 6), the status of contracted-out employees (s 6), job security programs (ss 7, 8), and layoffs and bumping rights (s 9). It gave health care employers greater flexibility to organize their relations with their employees as they see fit and, in some cases, in ways that would not have been permissible under existing collective agreements and without adhering to requirements of consultation and notice that would otherwise obtain. It invalidated important provisions of collective agreements then in force and effectively precluded meaningful collective bargaining on a number of specific issues. Furthermore, s 10 voided any part of a collective agreement, past or future, that was inconsistent with part 2 and any collective agreement purporting to modify these restrictions. The appellants—unions and members of the unions representing the nurses, facilities, or community subsectors—challenged the constitutional validity of part 2 of the Act as a violation of ss 2(d) and 15 of the Charter. Adhering to the precedent of the Labour Trilogy, both the trial judge and the Court of Appeal upheld the constitutionality of part 2 of the Act.]

McLACHLIN CJ and LeBEL J (Bastarache, Binnie, Fish, and Abella JJ concurring):

I. Introduction

[4] The [Health and Social Services Delivery Improvement Act] was adopted as a response to challenges facing British Columbia's health care system. Demand for health care and the cost of providing needed health care services had been increasing significantly for years. ... The government characterized the state of affairs in 2001 as a "crisis of sustainability" in the health care system

[6] The Act was quickly passed. It came into force three days after receiving a first reading as Bill 29 before the British Columbia legislature.

[7] There was no meaningful consultation with unions before it became law. ... The Minister of Health Services telephoned a union representative 20 minutes before Bill 29 was introduced in the legislative assembly to inform the union that the government would be introducing legislation dealing with employment security and other provisions of existing collective agreements. This was the only consultation with unions before the Act was passed. ...

[10] Only Part 2 of the Act is at issue in the current appeal. It introduced changes to transfers and multi-worksit assignment rights (ss. 4 and 5), contracting out (s. 6), the status of employees under contracting-out arrangements (s. 6), job security programs (ss. 7 and 8), and layoffs and bumping rights (s. 9).

[11] Part 2 gave health care employers greater flexibility to organize their relations with their employees as they see fit, and in some cases, to do so in ways that would not have been permissible under existing collective agreements and without adhering to requirements of consultation and notice that would otherwise obtain. It invalidated important provisions of collective agreements then in force, and effectively precluded meaningful collective bargaining on a number of specific issues.

Section 10 invalidated any part of a collective agreement, past or future, which was inconsistent with Part 2, and any collective agreement purporting to modify these restrictions. In the words of the Act, s. 10: "Part [2] prevails over collective agreements." It is not open to the employees (or the employer) to contract out of Part 2 or to rely on a collective agreement inconsistent with Part 2.

III. Analysis

[19] At issue in the present appeal is whether the guarantee of freedom of association in s. 2(d) of the Charter protects collective bargaining rights. We conclude that s. 2(d) of the Charter protects the capacity of members of labour unions to engage, in association, in collective bargaining on fundamental workplace issues. This protection does not cover all aspects of "collective bargaining," as that term is understood in the statutory labour relations regimes that are in place across the country. Nor does it ensure a particular outcome in a labour dispute, or guarantee access to any particular statutory regime. What is protected is simply the right of employees to associate in a process of collective action to achieve workplace goals. If the government substantially interferes with that right, it violates s. 2(d) of the Charter: [Dunmore v Ontario (AG), 2001 SCC 94]. We note that the present case does not concern the right to strike, which was considered in earlier litigation on the scope of the guarantee of freedom of association.

[20] Our conclusion that s. 2(d) of the Charter protects a process of collective bargaining rests on four propositions. ...

[22] ... We conclude that the grounds advanced in ... earlier decisions for the exclusion of collective bargaining from the Charter's protection of freedom of association do not withstand principled scrutiny and should be rejected.

[24] In [the Labour Trilogy and Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada v Northwest Territories (Commissioner), [1990] 2 SCR 367, 1990 CanLII 72 [PIPSC]], different members of the majorities put forth five main reasons in support of the contention that collective bargaining does not fall within s. 2(d)'s protection.

[25] The first suggested reason was that the rights to strike and to bargain collectively are "modern rights" created by legislation, not "fundamental freedoms" ([Reference re Public Service Employees Relations Act (Alta.), [1987] 1 SCR 313, 1987 CanLII 88], per Le Dain J., writing on behalf of himself, Beetz and La Forest JJ., at p. 391). The difficulty with this argument is that it fails to recognize the history of labour relations in [Canada] developed more thoroughly in the next section of these reasons

[26] The second suggested reason was that recognition of a right to collective bargaining would go against the principle of judicial restraint in interfering with government regulation of labour relations (Alberta Reference, at p. 391). ... This argument again fails to recognize the fact that worker organizations historically had the right to bargain collectively outside statutory regimes and takes an overbroad view of judicial deference. ...

[27] The third suggested reason for excluding collective bargaining from s. 2(d) of the Charter rested on the view that freedom of association protects only those activities performable by an individual (see PIPSC, per L'Heureux-Dubé and Sopinka JJ.). ...

[28] This narrow focus on individual activities has been overtaken by Dunmore, where this Court rejected the notion that freedom of association applies only to activities capable of performance by individuals. Bastarache J. held that “[t]o limit s. 2(d) to activities that are performable by individuals would ... render futile these fundamental initiatives” (para. 16), since, as Dickson C.J. noted in his dissent in the Alberta Reference, some collective activities may, by their very nature, be incapable of being performed by an individual. Bastarache J. provided the example of expressing a majority viewpoint as being an inherently collective activity without an individual analogue (para. 16). He concluded that:

As I see it, the very notion of “association” recognizes the qualitative differences between individuals and collectivities. It recognizes that the press differs qualitatively from the journalist, the language community from the language speaker, the union from the worker. In all cases, the community assumes a life of its own and develops needs and priorities that differ from those of its individual members. ... [B]ecause trade unions develop needs and priorities that are distinct from those of their members individually, they cannot function if the law protects exclusively what might be “the lawful activities of individuals.” Rather, the law must recognize that certain union activities—making collective representations to an employer, adopting a majority political platform, federating with other unions—may be central to freedom of association even though they are inconceivable on the individual level. This is not to say that all such activities are protected by s. 2(d), nor that all collectivities are worthy of constitutional protection ... It is to say, simply, that certain collective activities must be recognized if the freedom to form and maintain an association is to have any meaning. [Emphasis added; para. 17.]

[29] The fourth reason advanced for excluding collective bargaining rights from s. 2(d) was the suggestion of L’Heureux-Dubé J. that s. 2(d) was not intended to protect the “objects” or goals of an association (see PIPSC, at pp. 391-93). This argument overlooks the fact that it will always be possible to characterize the pursuit of a particular activity in concert with others as the “object” of that association. Recasting collective bargaining as an “object” begs the question of whether or not the activity is worthy of constitutional protection. ... In our view, it is entirely possible to protect the “procedure” known as collective bargaining without mandating constitutional protection for the fruits of that bargaining process. Thus, the characterization of collective bargaining as an association’s “object” does not provide a principled reason to deny it constitutional protection.

[30] An overarching concern is that the majority judgments in the Alberta Reference and PIPSC adopted a decontextualized approach to defining the scope of freedom of association, in contrast to the purposive approach taken to other Charter guarantees. The result was to forestall inquiry into the purpose of that Charter guarantee. The generic approach of the earlier decisions to s. 2(d) ignored differences between organizations. Whatever the organization—be it trade union or book club—its freedoms were treated as identical. The unfortunate effect was to overlook the importance of collective bargaining—both historically and currently—to the exercise of freedom of association in labour relations.

[31] We conclude that the reasons provided by the majorities in the Alberta Reference and PIPSC should not bar reconsideration of the question of whether s. 2(d) applies to collective bargaining. This is manifestly the case since this Court’s decision in Dunmore

[33] Second, Dunmore correctly advocated a more contextual analysis than had hitherto prevailed. Showing that a legislature has targeted associational conduct because of its “concerted or associational nature” requires a more contextual assessment than found in the early s. 2(d) cases. ...

[34] ... Dunmore [also] recognized that, in certain circumstances, s. 2(d) may place positive obligations on governments to extend legislation to particular groups. ...

[36] In summary, a review of the jurisprudence leads to the conclusion that the holdings in the Alberta Reference and PIPSC excluding collective bargaining from the scope of s. 2(d) can no longer stand. None of the reasons provided by the majorities in those cases survive scrutiny, and the rationale for excluding inherently collective activities from s. 2(d)'s protection has been overtaken by Dunmore.

[39] The general purpose of the Charter guarantees and the language of s. 2(d) are consistent with at least a measure of protection for collective bargaining. The language of s. 2(d) is cast in broad terms and devoid of limitations. However, this is not conclusive. To answer the question before us, we must consider the history of collective bargaining in Canada, collective bargaining in relation to freedom of association in the larger international context, and whether Charter values favour an interpretation of s. 2(d) that protects a process of collective bargaining: R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295, at p. 344, per Dickson J. Evaluating the scope of s. 2(d) of the Charter through these tools leads to the conclusion that s. 2(d) does indeed protect workers' rights to a process of collective bargaining.

[40] Association for purposes of collective bargaining has long been recognized as a fundamental Canadian right which predated the Charter. ...

[41] ... [T]he origin of a right to collective bargaining in the sense given to it in the present case (i.e., a procedural right to bargain collectively on conditions of employment), precedes the adoption of the present system of labour relations in the 1940s. ...

[63] ... [W]orkers in Canada began forming collectives to bargain over working conditions with their employers as early as the 18th century. However, the common law cast a shadow over the rights of workers to act collectively. When Parliament first began recognizing workers' rights, trade unions had no express statutory right to negotiate collectively with employers. Employers could simply ignore them. However, workers used the powerful economic weapon of strikes to gradually force employers to recognize unions and to bargain collectively with them. By adopting the Wagner Act model [in the 1940s, which authorizes employees to form unions, bargain collectively, and strike], governments across Canada recognized the fundamental need for workers to participate in the regulation of their work environment. This legislation confirmed what the labour movement had been fighting for over centuries and what it had access to in the laissez-faire era through the use of strikes—the right to collective bargaining with employers.

[66] Collective bargaining, despite early discouragement from the common law, has long been recognized in Canada. Indeed, historically, it emerges as the most significant collective activity through which freedom of association is expressed in the labour context. In our opinion, the concept of freedom of association under s. 2(d) of the Charter includes this notion of a procedural right to collective bargaining.

[70] Canada's adherence to international documents recognizing a right to collective bargaining supports recognition of the right in s. 2(d) of the Charter. As Dickson C.J. observed in the Alberta Reference, at p. 349, the Charter should be presumed to provide at least as great a level of protection as is found in the international human rights documents that Canada has ratified.

[71] The sources most important to the understanding of s. 2(d) of the Charter are the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, 993 U.N.T.S. 3 ("ICESCR"), the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 999 U.N.T.S. 171 ("ICCPR"), and the International Labour Organization's (ILO's) Convention (No. 87) Concerning Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize, 68 U.N.T.S. 17 ("Convention No. 87"). Canada has endorsed all three of these documents, acceding to both the ICESCR and the ICCPR, and ratifying Convention No. 87 in 1972. This means that these documents reflect not only international consensus, but also principles that Canada has committed itself to uphold.

[72] The ICESCR, the ICCPR and Convention No. 87 extend protection to the functioning of trade unions in a manner suggesting that a right to collective bargaining is part of freedom of association. The interpretation of these conventions, in Canada and internationally, not only supports the proposition that there is a right to collective bargaining in international law, but also suggests that such a right should be recognized in the Canadian context under s. 2(d).

[81] Human dignity, equality, liberty, respect for the autonomy of the person and the enhancement of democracy are among the values that underlie the Charter: R. v. Zundel, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 731; Corbiere v. Canada (Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs), [1999] 2 S.C.R. 203, at para. 100; R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103. All of these values are complemented and indeed, promoted, by the protection of collective bargaining in s. 2(d) of the Charter.

[82] The right to bargain collectively with an employer enhances the human dignity, liberty and autonomy of workers by giving them the opportunity to influence the establishment of workplace rules and thereby gain some control over a major aspect of their lives, namely their work

[84] Collective bargaining also enhances the Charter value of equality. One of the fundamental achievements of collective bargaining is to palliate the historical inequality between employers and employees: see Wallace v. United Grain Growers Ltd. [(1997) 3 SCR 701, 1997 CanLII 332], per Iacobucci J. ...

Freedom of association is the cornerstone of modern labour relations. Historically, workers have combined to overcome the inherent inequalities of bargaining power in the employment relationship and to protect themselves from unfair, unsafe, or exploitative working conditions. As the United States Supreme Court stated in N.L.R.B. v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1 (1937), at p. 33:

Long ago we stated the reason for labour organizations. We said that they were organized out of the necessities of the situation; that a single employee was helpless in dealing with an employer; that he was dependent ordinarily on his daily wage for the maintenance of himself and family; that if the employer refused to pay him the wages that he thought fair, he was nevertheless unable to leave the employ and resist arbitrary and unfair treatment; ...

The "necessities of the situation" go beyond, of course, the fairness of wages and remunerative concerns, and extend to matters such as health and safety in the work place, hours of work, sexual equality, and other aspects of work fundamental to the dignity and personal liberty of employees. [pp. 334-35]

[85] Finally, a constitutional right to collective bargaining is supported by the Charter value of enhancing democracy. Collective bargaining permits workers to achieve a form of workplace democracy and to ensure the rule of law in the workplace. Workers gain a voice to influence the establishment of rules that control a major aspect of their lives

[86] We conclude that the protection of collective bargaining under s. 2(d) of the Charter is consistent with and supportive of the values underlying the Charter and the purposes of the Charter as a whole. Recognizing that workers have the right to bargain collectively as part of their freedom to associate reaffirms the values of dignity, personal autonomy, equality and democracy that are inherent in the Charter.

[89] ... Based on the principles developed in Dunmore and in this historical and international perspective, the constitutional right to collective bargaining concerns the protection of the ability of workers to engage in associational activities, and their capacity to act in common to reach shared goals related to workplace issues and terms of employment. In brief, the protected activity might be described as employees banding together to achieve particular work-related objectives. Section 2(d) does not guarantee the particular objectives sought through this associational activity. However, it guarantees the process through which those goals are pursued. It means that employees have the right to unite, to present demands to health sector employers collectively and to engage in discussions in an attempt to achieve workplace-related goals. Section 2(d) imposes corresponding duties on government employers to agree to meet and discuss with them. It also puts constraints on the exercise of legislative powers in respect of the right to collective bargaining, which we shall discuss below.

[90] Section 2(d) of the Charter does not protect all aspects of the associational activity of collective bargaining. ...

[91] The right to collective bargaining ... is a limited right. First, as the right is to a process, it does not guarantee a certain substantive or economic outcome. Moreover, the right is to a general process of collective bargaining, not to a particular model of labour relations, nor to a specific bargaining method. ... Finally, and most importantly, the interference, as Dunmore instructs, must be substantial—so substantial that it interferes not only with the attainment of the union members' objectives (which is not protected), but with the very process that enables them to pursue these objectives by engaging in meaningful negotiations with the employer.

[92] To constitute substantial interference with freedom of association, the intent or effect must seriously undercut or undermine the activity of workers joining together to pursue the common goals of negotiating workplace conditions and terms of employment with their employer that we call collective bargaining. Laws or actions that can be characterized as "union breaking" clearly meet this requirement. But less dramatic interference with the collective process may also suffice. In Dunmore, denying the union access to the labour laws of Ontario designed to support and give a voice to unions was enough. Acts of bad faith, or unilateral nullification of negotiated terms, without any process of meaningful discussion and consultation may also significantly undermine the process of collective bargaining. The inquiry in every case is contextual and fact-specific. The question in every case is whether the process of voluntary, good faith collective bargaining between employees and the employer has been, or is likely to be, significantly and adversely impacted.

[93] Generally speaking, determining whether a government measure affecting the protected process of collective bargaining amounts to substantial interference involves two inquiries. The first inquiry is into the importance of the matter affected to the process of collective bargaining, and more specifically, to the capacity of the union members to come together and pursue collective goals in concert. The second inquiry is into the manner in which the measure impacts on the collective right to good faith negotiation and consultation.

[94] Both inquiries are necessary. If the matters affected do not substantially impact on the process of collective bargaining, the measure does not violate s. 2(d) and, indeed, the employer may be under no duty to discuss and consult. There will be no need to consider process issues. If, on the other hand, the changes substantially touch on collective bargaining, they will still not violate s. 2(d) if they preserve a process of consultation and good faith negotiation.

[95] Turning to the first inquiry, the essential question is whether the subject matter of a particular instance of collective bargaining is such that interfering with bargaining over that issue will affect the ability of unions to pursue common goals collectively ...

[96] While it is impossible to determine in advance exactly what sorts of matters are important to the ability of union members to pursue shared goals in concert, some general guidance may be apposite. Laws or state actions that prevent or deny meaningful discussion and consultation about working conditions between employees and their employer may substantially interfere with the activity of collective bargaining, as may laws that unilaterally nullify significant negotiated terms in existing collective agreements. By contrast, measures affecting less important matters such as the design of uniform, the lay out and organization of cafeterias, or the location or availability of parking lots, may be far less likely to constitute significant interference with the s. 2(d) right of freedom of association. This is because it is difficult to see how interfering with collective bargaining over these matters undermines the capacity of union members to pursue shared goals in concert. Thus, an interference with collective bargaining over these issues is less likely to meet the requirements set out in Dunmore for a breach of s. 2(d).

[97] Where it is established that the measure impacts on subject matter important to collective bargaining and the capacity of the union members to come together and pursue common goals, the need for the second inquiry arises: does the legislative measure or government conduct in issue respect the fundamental precept of collective bargaining—the duty to consult and negotiate in good faith? If it does, there will be no violation of s. 2(d), even if the content of the measures might be seen as being of substantial importance to collective bargaining concerns, since the process confirms the associational right of collective bargaining.

[Chief Justice McLachlin and LeBel J addressed the nature and scope of the duty to bargain in good faith and concluded that one of its basic elements is an obligation to actually meet and commit time to the process. The parties have a duty to engage in meaningful dialogue, exchange and explain their positions, and make a reasonable effort to arrive at an acceptable contract. However, the duty to bargain in good faith does not impose on the parties an obligation to conclude a collective agreement, nor does it include a duty to accept any particular contractual provisions. In considering whether the legislative provisions impinge on the collective right to good faith negotiations and consultation, regard must be had for the circumstances surrounding their adoption. Situations of exigency and urgency may affect the content and the modalities of the duty to bargain in good faith. Different situations may demand different processes and timelines. Moreover, failure to comply with the duty to consult and bargain in good faith should not be lightly found and should be clearly supported on the record.

They went on to conclude that ss 4 and 5 of the Act could not be said to amount to a substantial interference with the union's ability to engage in collective bargaining so as to attract the protection under s 2(d) of the Charter. However, they concluded that the provisions dealing with contracting out, layoffs, and bumping infringe the right to bargain collectively that is protected by s 2(d). These provisions deal with matters central to the freedom of association and amount to substantial interference with associational activities. Furthermore, these provisions did not preserve the processes of collective bargaining. Although the government was facing a situation of exigency, the measures it adopted constituted a virtual denial of the s 2(d) right to a process of good faith bargaining and consultation.

They also held that these infringements are not justified under s 1 of the Charter. While the Act's main objective of improving the delivery of health care services and subordinate objectives was pressing and substantial, and while there was a rational connection between the means adopted by the Act and the objectives, the government had not shown that the Act minimally impaired the employees' s 2(d) right of collective bargaining. There was no evidence that the government considered whether it could reach its goal by less intrusive measures. Ultimately:

160 This was an important and significant piece of labour legislation. It had the potential to affect the rights of employees dramatically and unusually. Yet it was adopted with full knowledge that the unions were strongly opposed to many of the provisions, and without consideration of alternative ways to achieve the government objective, and without explanation of the government's choices.

Justice Deschamps, dissenting in part, disagreed with the "substantial interference" standard (at para 177) proposed by the majority for determining whether a government measure amounts to an infringement of s 2(d). In her view, a more appropriate test would be:

180 ... Laws or state actions that prevent or deny meaningful discussion and consultation about significant workplace issues between employees and their employer may interfere with the activity of collective bargaining, as may laws that unilaterally nullify negotiated terms on significant workplace issues in existing collective agreements.

Justice Deschamps's test would involve two inquiries: first, whether the process of negotiation between employers and employees or their representatives is interfered with in any way; and second, whether the issues involved are significant. Only interference with significant workplace issues would be relevant to s 2(d). She found that ss 4, 5, 6(2), 6(4), and 9 of the Act infringed freedom of association but that, with the exception of s 6(4), they were justified under s 1 of the Charter.]

Appeal allowed in part.

NOTE: ONTARIO (AG) V FRASER

In 2002, the Ontario legislature enacted the AEPA, which excluded farm workers from the LRA, but crafted a separate labour relations regime for farm workers. The AEPA was a response to Dunmore, which found that the previous legislative scheme violated s 2(d) of the Charter and declared it constitutionally invalid. It granted farm workers, inter alia, the rights to form and join an employees' association, to assemble, to make representations, and to be protected against interference, coercion, and discrimination in the exercise of their rights. The employer was required to receive and consider representations respecting the terms and conditions of employment. The AEPA tasked a tribunal with hearing and deciding disputes about the application of the Act.

After limited efforts to use the new protections under the AEPA, a constitutional challenge was mounted on the basis that the Act infringed farm workers' rights under ss 2(d) and 15 of the Charter by failing to provide effective protection for the right to organize and bargain collectively and by excluding farm workers from the protections accorded to workers in other sectors. In 2006, the Ontario Superior Court dismissed the application. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal and declared the AEPA to be constitutionally invalid. It rendered its decision after the release of Health Services and Support—Facilities Subsector Bargaining Assn v British Columbia, excerpted above. In Ontario (AG) v Fraser, 2011 SCC 20, the Superior Court of Canada allowed the appeal and dismissed the constitutional challenge.

Chief Justice McLachlin and LeBel J wrote the reasons on behalf of the five-member majority. Their reasons reaffirmed the holding of Health Services that "freedom of association" encompasses a right to collectively bargain; however, they did so in words that seemed narrower than the language of the Health Services decision itself:

[40] The majority of the Court in Health Services affirmed that bargaining activities protected by s. 2(d) in the labour relations context include good faith bargaining on important workplace issues (para. 94; see also paras. 93, 130, 135). This is not limited to a mere right to make representations to one's employer, but requires the employer to engage in a process of consideration and discussion to have them considered by the employer. ...

[51] In our view, the majority decision in Health Services should be interpreted as holding what it repeatedly states: that workers have a constitutional right to make collective representations and to have their collective representations considered in good faith. (Emphasis added.)

Chief Justice McLachlin and LeBel J reaffirmed the earlier finding that "freedom of association" did not give a right to a particular model of collective bargaining, including the "Wagner" model that is enshrined in the LRA and almost all labour relations statutes in Canada and the United States:

[54] Our colleague [Rothstein J] appears to interpret Health Services as establishing directly or indirectly a Wagner model of labour relations. The actual holding of Health Services, as discussed above, was more modest. Health Services affirms a derivative right to collective bargaining, understood in the sense of a process that allows employees to make representations and have them considered in good faith by employers, who in turn must engage in a process of meaningful discussion. ... No particular bargaining model is required. (Emphasis added.)

Chief Justice McLachlin and LeBel J found that the provisions of the AEPA satisfied the collective bargaining requirements first identified in Health Services. In so doing, the majority implied into the AEPA a requirement on employers not only to "listen to" (which is all that the statute explicitly provided) or "read" the representations but also to "consider [the] representations in good faith" (at para 101).

There were two sets of concurring reasons, agreeing in the result, but for different reasons. Justice Rothstein, writing for himself and Charron J, strongly advocated for the Supreme Court to overturn the earlier Health Services decision. Justice Rothstein argued that Health Services had incorrectly expanded the scope of freedom of association:

[125] In my view, s. 2(d) protects the liberty of individuals to associate and engage in associational activities. Therefore, s. 2(d) protects the freedom of workers to form self-directed employee associations in an attempt to improve wages and working conditions. What s. 2(d) does not do, however, is impose duties on others, such as the duty to bargain in good faith on employers.

In the view of Rothstein J, the question of which labour relations regime should apply and what mutual rights and obligations it should contain are matters best left to the legislature.

Justice Deschamps would have expressly narrowed the finding of Health Services to its facts. In her view, freedom of association in the employment context should be limited to what was set out in Dunmore.

Justice Abella dissented and would have upheld the decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal. In her view, Health Services created "a completely different jurisprudential universe" (at para 155). Moreover, she would have found that the AEPA did not include any obligation on the employer to respond; as such, it could not satisfy the good-faith bargaining obligations required by BC Health Services.

Of interest is Deschamps J's discussion of s 15 of the Charter. Traditionally, employment status has not been found to be an analogous ground for s 15 purposes. In Fraser, the s 15 claim was dismissed. However, rather than dismissing it on the basis that employment status is not an analogous ground, the majority found that the claim was premature. Deschamps J went further, suggesting that s 15 should be interpreted to cover claims such as the one being made in Fraser.

Mounted Police Association of Ontario v Canada (AG)

McLACHLIN CJ and LeBel J (Abella, Cromwell, Karakatsanis, and Wagner JJ concurring):

[2] RCMP members are not permitted to unionize or engage in collective bargaining. They have been excluded from the [Public Service Modernization Act, SC 2003, c 22, s 2] PSLRA and its predecessor statute since collective bargaining was first introduced in the federal public service in the late 1960s. Instead, there exists a non-unionized labour relations regime with three core components. First, members can advance their workplace concerns through the Staff Relations Representative Program ("SRRP"). Second, members' concerns regarding pay and benefits are communicated to management through the RCMP Pay Council process. Third, RCMP members have created the Mounted Police Members' Legal Fund ("Legal Fund"), a not-for-profit corporation funded through membership dues, which provides legal assistance to RCMP members for employment-related issues.

[3] A little over 15 years ago, this Court held that exclusion of RCMP members from collective bargaining under the PSLRA's predecessor legislation did not infringe s. 2(d): Delisle v. Canada (Deputy Attorney General), [1999] 2 S.C.R. 989. On this appeal we are asked to reconsider that decision as it relates to the PSLRA. ...

[30] The jurisprudence on freedom of association under s. 2(d) of the Charter—which developed mainly with respect to labour relations ... falls into two broad periods. ...

[46] ... [A]fter an initial period of reluctance to embrace the full import of the freedom of association guarantee in the field of labour relations, the jurisprudence has evolved to affirm a generous approach to that guarantee. This approach is centred on the purpose of encouraging the individual's self-fulfillment and the collective realization of human goals, consistent with democratic values, as informed by "the historical origins of the concepts enshrined" in s. 2(d): R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295, at p. 344.

[54] The purposive approach, adopted by Dickson C.J. in [his dissenting opinion in] the Alberta Reference, defines the content of s. 2(d) by reference to the purpose of the guarantee of freedom of association: "... to recognize the profoundly social nature of human endeavours and to protect the individual from state-enforced isolation in the pursuit of his or her ends" (Alberta Reference, at p. 365). ... Elaborating on this interpretive approach, Dickson C.J. states that the purpose of the freedom of association encompasses the protection of (1) individuals joining with others to form associations (the constitutive approach); (2) collective activity in support of other constitutional rights (the derivative approach); and (3) collective activity that enables "those who would otherwise be vulnerable and ineffective to meet on more equal terms the power and strength of those with whom their interests interact and, perhaps, conflict": Alberta Reference, at p. 366.

[55] The purposive approach thus recognizes that freedom of association is empowering, and that we value the guarantee enshrined in s. 2(d) because it empowers groups whose members' individual voices may be all too easily drowned out. ...

[58] ... [A] fundamental purpose of s. 2(d) [is] to protect the individual from "state-enforced isolation in the pursuit of his or her ends": Alberta Reference, at p. 365. The guarantee functions to protect individuals against more powerful entities. By banding together in the pursuit of common goals, individuals are able to prevent more powerful entities from thwarting their legitimate goals and desires. In this way, the guarantee of freedom of association empowers vulnerable groups and helps them work to right imbalances in society. It protects marginalized groups and makes possible a more equal society.

[62] ... It follows that the associational rights protected by s. 2(d) are not merely a bundle of individual rights, but collective rights that inhere in associations. ...

[67] Applying the purposive approach just discussed to the domain of labour relations, we conclude that s. 2(d) guarantees the right of employees to meaningfully associate in the pursuit of collective workplace goals, affirming the central holdings of Health Services and Fraser. ...

[70] ... As we have seen, s. 2(d) functions to prevent individuals, who alone may be powerless, from being overwhelmed by more powerful entities, while also enhancing their strength through the exercise of collective power. Nowhere are these dual functions of s. 2(d) more pertinent than in labour relations. Individual employees typically lack the power to bargain and pursue workplace goals with their more powerful employers. Only by banding together in collective bargaining associations, thus strengthening their bargaining power with their employer, can they meaningfully pursue their workplace goals.

[71] The right to a meaningful process of collective bargaining is therefore a necessary element of the right to collectively pursue workplace goals in a meaningful way (Health Services; Fraser). ...

[81] ... This raises the question—what are the features essential to a meaningful process of collective bargaining under s. 2(d)? ... [W]e conclude that a meaningful process of collective bargaining is a process that provides employees with a degree of choice and independence sufficient to enable them to determine their collective interests and meaningfully pursue them.

[83] ... [T]he degree of choice required by the Charter for collective bargaining purposes is one that enables employees to have effective input into the selection of the collective goals to be advanced by their association. In the same vein, the degree of independence required by the Charter for collective bargaining purposes is one that ensures that the activities of the association are aligned with the interests of its members.

[97] ... Choice and independence do not require adversarial labour relations; nothing in the Charter prevents an employee association from engaging willingly with an employer in different, less adversarial and more cooperative ways. This said, genuine collective bargaining cannot be based on the suppression of employees' interests, where these diverge from those of their employer, in the name of a "non-adversarial" process. Whatever the model, the Charter does not permit choice and independence to be eroded such that there is substantial interference with a meaningful process of collective bargaining. Designation of collective bargaining agents and determination of collective bargaining frameworks would therefore not breach s. 2(d) where the structures that are put in place are free from employer interference, remain under the control of employees and provide employees with sufficient choice over the workplace goals they wish to advance.

[105] This ... case [does not involve] a complete denial of the constitutional right to associate and of its related constitutional guarantees. It is rather a case of substantial interference with the right to associate for the purpose of addressing workplace goals through a meaningful process of collective bargaining, free from employer control, as understood by Dickson C.J. in the Alberta Reference. We conclude that the flaws in the SRRP process do not permit meaningful collective bargaining, and are inconsistent with s. 2(d). The SRRP process fails to respect RCMP members' freedom of association in both its purpose and its effects.

[106] Section 96 of the RCMP Regulations imposed the SRRP on RCMP members as the sole means of presenting their concerns to management. Section 56 of the current-day RCMP Regulations, 2014 continues to impose the SRRP under nearly identical terms. RCMP members are represented by an organization they did not choose and do not control. They must work within a structure that lacks independence from management. Indeed, this structure and process are part of the management organization of the RCMP. The process fails to achieve the balance between employees and employer that is essential to meaningful collective bargaining, and leaves members in a disadvantaged, vulnerable position.

[118] Simply put, in our view, the SRRP is not an association in any meaningful sense, nor a form of exercise of the right to freedom of association. It is simply an internal human relations scheme imposed on RCMP members by management. Accordingly, the element of employee choice is almost entirely missing under the present scheme.

[122] The appellants [also] challenge the exclusion of RCMP members from the application of the PSLRA and ask that para. (d) of the definition of "employee" in s. 2(1) of that Act be struck down.

[123] For employees in the federal public service, the PSLRA provides the general framework through which they can join and participate in employee associations; these associations can be certified as bargaining agents, and good faith collective bargaining can occur. The PSLRA provides for mediation, conciliation and arbitration when problems arise during collective bargaining and provides remedies for unfair labour practices. While being significantly different from private-sector labour relations models in many ways, the PSLRA and its predecessor, the PSSRA, are generally referred to as a Wagner Act model of labour relations (C. Rootham, Labour and Employment Law in the Federal Public Service (2007), at pp. 19-20).

[124] Paragraph (d) of the definition of "employee" in s. 2(1) of the PSLRA excludes RCMP members from the application of the PSLRA. This Court in Delisle held that the exclusion of the RCMP from the PSSRA, the PSLRA's predecessor legislation, did not violate s. 2(d) of the Charter. This raises a threshold question: Should the Court's decision in Delisle be reconsidered? In our view, it should [125] ... [because] Delisle was decided before this Court's decisions in Health Services and Fraser, which marked a shift to a purposive and generous approach to labour relations.

[136] We conclude that the purpose of the exclusion in s. 2(1) of the PSLRA substantially interferes with freedom of association. At this point, we need not consider the effects of the PSLRA exclusion independently from those of the imposition of the SRRP as a labour relations regime.

[137] This conclusion does not mean that Parliament must include the RCMP in the PSLRA scheme. As discussed above, s. 2(d) of the Charter does not mandate a particular model of labour relations. Our conclusion with respect to the constitutionality of the PSLRA exclusion means only that Parliament must not substantially interfere with the right of RCMP members to a meaningful process of collective bargaining, unless this interference can be justified under s. 1 of the Charter. For example, it remains open to the federal government to explore other collective bargaining processes that could better address the specific context in which members of the RCMP discharge their duties.

[The majority went on to hold that the limits imposed by the SRRP and the PSLRA could not be justified under s 1 of the Charter.]

Saskatchewan Federation of Labour v Saskatchewan

[This case concerns the Saskatchewan Public Service Essential Services Act, SS 2008, c P-42.2 [PSESA], which became law on May 14, 2008 (at para 8):

Under the PSESA, designated "essential services employees" [were] prohibited from participating in any work stoppage against their public employer. In the event of a strike, those employees were required to continue "the duties of [their] employment with the public employer in accordance with the terms and conditions of the last collective bargaining agreement," and [were] prohibited from refusing to continue those duties "without lawful excuse." Contravention of any provision under the PSESA was a summary conviction offence.

The trial judge concluded that the prohibition on the right to strike in the PSESA substantially interfered with the s 2(d) rights of the affected public sector employees, and that the absolute ban on the right to strike in the PSESA was neither minimally impairing nor proportionate under s 1 of the Charter. The Saskatchewan Court of Appeal unanimously allowed the government of Saskatchewan's appeal with respect to the constitutionality of the PSEA, concluding (at para 23) that [w]hile the Court's freedom of association jurisprudence has evolved in recent years, it has not shifted far enough, or clearly enough, to warrant a ruling by this Court that the right to strike is protected by s. 2(d) of the Charter.

Speaking for a majority of the Supreme Court of Canada, Abella J agreed with the trial judge and allowed the appeal of the Saskatchewan Federation of Labour and other unions. Justices Rothstein and Wagner, in a joint decision, dissented.]

ABELLA J (McLachlin CJ and LeBel, Cromwell, and Karakatsanis JJ concurring):

[2] The question in this appeal is whether a prohibition on designated employees participating in strike action for the purpose of negotiating the terms and conditions of their employment amounts to a substantial interference with their right to a meaningful process of collective bargaining and, as a result, violates s. 2(d) of the Charter. The question of whether other forms of collective work stoppage are protected by s. 2(d) of the Charter is not at issue here.

[3] The conclusion that the right to strike is an essential part of a meaningful collective bargaining process in our system of labour relations is supported by history, by jurisprudence, and by Canada's international obligations. As Otto Kahn-Freund and Bob Hepple recognized:

The power to withdraw their labour is for the workers what for management is its power to shut down production, to switch it to different purposes, to transfer it to different places. A legal system which suppresses that freedom to strike puts the workers at the mercy of their employers. This—in all its simplicity—is the essence of the matter.

(Laws Against Strikes (1972), at p. 8)

The right to strike is not merely derivative of collective bargaining, it is an indispensable component of that right. It seems to me to be the time to give this conclusion constitutional benediction.

[4] This applies too to public sector employees. Those public sector employees who provide essential services undoubtedly have unique functions which may argue for a less disruptive mechanism when collective bargaining reaches an impasse, but they do not argue for no mechanism at all. Because Saskatchewan's legislation abrogates the right to strike for a number of employees and provides no such alternative mechanism, it is unconstitutional.

[32] Given the fundamental shift in the scope of s. 2(d) since the Alberta Reference was decided, the trial judge was entitled to depart from precedent and consider the issue in accordance with this Court's revitalized interpretation of s. 2(d): Canada (Attorney General) v. Bedford, [2013] 3 S.C.R. 1101, at para. 42.

[33] Dickson C.J.'s dissenting reasons in the Alberta Reference were influential in the development of the more "generous approach" in the recent jurisprudence. Recognizing that association "has always been vital as a means of protecting the essential needs and interests of working people" (at p. 368), and that Canada's international human rights obligations required protection for both the formation and essential activities of labour unions, including collective bargaining and the freedom to strike, Dickson C.J. concluded that "effective constitutional protection of the associational interests of employees in the collective bargaining process requires concomitant protection of their freedom to withdraw ... their services [collectively], subject to s. 1 of the Charter" (at p. 371). ...

[34] His views are supported by the history of strike activity in Canada and globally.

[35] This Court referenced this history in Health Services:

In England, as early as the end of the Middle Ages, workers were getting together to improve their conditions of employment. They were addressing petitions to Parliament, asking for laws to secure better wages or other more favourable working conditions. Soon thereafter, strike activity began (M.-L. Beaulieu, Les Conflits de Droit dans les Rapports Collectifs du Travail (1955), at pp. 29-30). [para. 45]

[36] In England in the 19th century, strike action was the subject of criminal sanction This state of affairs continued in England "until the 'legislative settlement' of the 1870s ... lifted the threat of criminal sanctions from all but violent forms of behaviour associated with industrial action": Simon Deakin and Gillian S. Morris, Labour Law (6th ed. 2012), at p. 8.

[38] ... [W]orkers participated in strike activity long before the modern system of labour relations was introduced in Canada. Strikes and collective bargaining were seen to go hand in hand since both "are creatures of working class action: working people turned to these methods to improve their lot in industry from the earliest days of nineteenth century Canadian capitalism": Geoffrey England, "Some Thoughts on Constitutionalizing the Right to Strike" (1988), 13:2 Queens L.J. 168, at p. 175. ...

[39] The acceptance of the crucial role of strike activity led to its eventual decriminalization. ...

[42] In 1935, the Wagner Act was adopted in the United States, introducing a model of labour relations that came to inspire legislative schemes across Canada. This model was adopted in Canada because the federal and provincial governments "recognized the fundamental need for workers to participate in the regulation of their work environment," and, in doing so, "confirmed what the labour movement had been fighting for over centuries and what it had access to in the laissez-faire era through the use of strikes—the right to collective bargaining with employers" (Health Services, at para. 63). One of the goals of the Wagner model, therefore, was to reduce the frequency of strikes by ensuring a commitment to meaningful collective bargaining.

[43] ... [M]odern labour relations legislation was "designed to secure a greater measure of industrial peace to the public by encouraging collective bargaining and conciliation procedures rather than strikes as a method of resolving industrial disputes" (Gagnon v. Foundation Maritime Ltd., [1961] S.C.R. 435, at pp. 443-44, per Ritchie J.).

[44] Modern labour relations legislation in Canada accordingly limited certain forms of strike activities and replaced the freedom to collectively engage in the withdrawal of services with statutorily protected rights to organize and engage in collective bargaining. As Judy Fudge and Eric Tucker noted, this model gave workers collective bargaining protection as a trade-off for limitations imposed on the freedom to strike

[45] ... The trade-off in the Wagner labour relations model, limiting the ability to strike in favour of an emphasis on negotiated solutions for workplace issues, remains at the heart of labour relations in Canada. That is not to say it is the only model available, but it is the prevailing model in this country and the one under the s. 2(d) microscope in this case.

[46] It is important to point out, however, that the right to strike is not a creature just of the Wagner model. Most labour relations models include it. ... That is because it has long been recognized that the ability to collectively withdraw services for the purpose of negotiating the terms and conditions of employment—in other words, to strike—is an essential component of the process through which workers pursue collective workplace goals. ...

[53] In Health Services, this Court recognized that the Charter values of “[h]uman dignity, equality, liberty, respect for the autonomy of the person and the enhancement of democracy” supported protecting the right to a meaningful process of collective bargaining within the scope of s. 2(d) (para. 81). And, most recently, drawing on these same values, in Mounted Police it confirmed that protection for a meaningful process of collective bargaining requires that employees have the ability to pursue their goals and that, at its core, s. 2(d) aims to protect the individual from “state-enforced isolation in the pursuit of his or her ends” The guarantee functions to protect individuals against more powerful entities. By banding together in the pursuit of common goals, individuals are able to prevent more powerful entities from thwarting their legitimate goals and desires. In this way, the guarantee of freedom of association empowers vulnerable groups and helps them work to right imbalances in society. It protects marginalized groups and makes possible a more equal society. [para. 58]

[54] ... Through a strike, workers come together to participate directly in the process of determining their wages, working conditions and the rules that will govern their working lives (Fudge and Tucker, at p. 334). The ability to strike thereby allows workers, through collective action, to refuse to work under imposed terms and conditions. This collective action at the moment of impasse is an affirmation of the dignity and autonomy of employees in their working lives.

[55] Striking—the “powerhouse” of collective bargaining—also promotes equality in the bargaining process: England, at p. 188. This Court has long recognized the deep inequalities that structure the relationship between employers and employees, and the vulnerability of employees in this context. ...

[56] In their dissent, my colleagues suggest that s. 2(d) should not protect strike activity ... because “true workplace justice looks at the interests of all implicated parties” (para. 125), including employers. In essentially attributing equivalence between the power of employees and employers, this reasoning, with respect, turns labour relations on its head It drives us inevitably to Anatole France’s aphoristic fallacy: “The law, in its majestic equality, forbids the rich as well as the poor to sleep under bridges, to beg in the streets, and to steal bread.”

[57] Strike activity itself does not guarantee that a labour dispute will be resolved in any particular manner, or that it will be resolved at all. ... But what it does permit is the employees’ ability to engage in negotiations with an employer on a more equal footing (see Williams v. Aristocratic Restaurants (1947) Ltd., [1951] S.C.R. 762, at p. 780; Mounted Police, at paras. 70–71).

[58] Moreover, while the right to strike is best analyzed through the lens of freedom of association, expressive activity in the labour context is directly related to the Charter-protected right of workers to associate to further common workplace goals under s. 2(d) of the Charter: Fraser, at para. 38; Alberta (Information and Privacy Commissioner), at para. 30. Strike action “bring[s] the debate on the labour conditions with an employer into the public realm”: Alberta (Information and Privacy Commissioner), at para. 28. Cory J. recognized this dynamic in United Nurses of Alberta v. Alberta (Attorney General), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 901:

Often it is only by means of a strike that union members can publicize and emphasize the merits of their position as they see them with regard to the issues in dispute. It is essential that both the labour and management side be able to put forward their position so the public fully understands the issues and can determine which side is worthy of public support. ...

[59] As Dickson C.J. observed, "[t]he very nature of a strike, and its raison d'être, is to influence an employer by joint action which would be ineffective if it were carried out by an individual" (Alberta Reference, at p. 371).

[62] Canada's international human rights obligations also mandate protecting the right to strike as part of a meaningful process of collective bargaining. ...

[64] LeBel J. confirmed in R. v. Hape, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 292, that in interpreting the Charter, the Court "has sought to ensure consistency between its interpretation of the Charter, on the one hand, and Canada's international obligations and the relevant principles of international law, on the other": para. 55. And this Court reaffirmed in Divito v. Canada (Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness), [2013] 3 S.C.R. 157, at para. 23, "the Charter should be presumed to provide at least as great a level of protection as is found in the international human rights documents that Canada has ratified."

[65] Given this presumption, Canada's international obligations clearly argue for the recognition of a right to strike within s. 2(d). Canada is a party to two instruments which explicitly protect the right to strike. Article 8(1) of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, 993 U.N.T.S. 3, to which Canada acceded in May 1976, provides that the "States Parties to the present Covenant undertake to ensure ... (d) the right to strike, provided that it is exercised in conformity with the laws of the particular country." (See also affidavit of Prof. Patrick Macklem (Expert Report), sworn December 21, 2010). ...

[Justice Abella also cited the Charter of the Organization of American States, Can TS 1990 No 23, article 45(c).]

[75] This historical, international, and jurisprudential landscape suggests compellingly to me that s. 2(d) has arrived at the destination sought by Dickson C.J. in the Alberta Reference, namely, the conclusion that a meaningful process of collective bargaining requires the ability of employees to participate in the collective withdrawal of services for the purpose of pursuing the terms and conditions of their employment through a collective agreement. Where good faith negotiations break down, the ability to engage in the collective withdrawal of services is a necessary component of the process through which workers can continue to participate meaningfully in the pursuit of their collective workplace goals. In this case, the suppression of the right to strike amounts to a substantial interference with the right to a meaningful process of collective bargaining.

[76] In their dissenting reasons, however, my colleagues urge deference to the legislature in interpreting the scope of s. 2(d). ... In the context of constitutional adjudication, deference is a conclusion, not an analysis. It certainly plays a role in s. 1, where, if a law is justified as proportionate, the legislative choice is maintained. But the whole purpose of Charter review is to assess a law for constitutional compliance. If the touchstone of Charter compliance is deference, what is the point of judicial scrutiny?

[78] The test, then, [for an infringement of s 2(d)] is whether the legislative interference with the right to strike in a particular case amounts to a substantial interference with collective bargaining. The PSESA demonstrably meets this threshold because it prevents designated employees from engaging in any work stoppage as part of the bargaining process. It must therefore be justified under s. 1 of the Charter.

[79] The maintenance of essential public services is self-evidently a pressing and substantial objective, as the Unions acknowledge. The Unions also accept the trial judge's further conclusion that the government's objective—ensuring the continued delivery of essential services—is rationally connected to the "basic structure of the legislation, including the sanctions imposed on employees and their unions to ensure compliance with its provisions."

[80] The determinative issue here, in my view, is whether the means chosen by the government are minimally impairing, that is, "carefully tailored so that rights are impaired no more than necessary" (RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 199, at para. 160).

[81] The trial judge concluded that the provisions of the PSESA "go beyond what is reasonably required to ensure the uninterrupted delivery of essential services during a strike." I agree. The unilateral authority of public employers to determine whether and how essential services are to be maintained during a work stoppage with no adequate review mechanism, and the absence of a meaningful dispute resolution mechanism to resolve bargaining impasses, justify the trial judge's conclusion that the PSESA impairs the s. 2(d) rights more than is necessary.

[96] Given the breadth of essential services that the employer is entitled to designate unilaterally without an independent review process, and the absence of an adequate, impartial and effective alternative mechanism for resolving collective bargaining impasses, there can be little doubt that the trial judge was right to conclude that the scheme was not minimally impairing. Quite simply, it impairs the s. 2(d) rights of designated employees much more widely and deeply than is necessary to achieve its objective of ensuring the continued delivery of essential services.

[97] The Public Service Essential Services Act is therefore unconstitutional.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The Court's substantial broadening of freedom of association since Dunmore is dramatic, as is its sharp rebuttal of its earlier reasoning in the Labour Trilogy. Still, it is important to ask, have these dramatic changes in Charter law actually benefitted workers? Do workers now have more bargaining power with employers? To what extent can they actually exercise their new constitutional rights to strike and bargain collectively?

In Just Words: Constitutional Rights and Social Wrongs (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1997) at 88-96, Joel Bakan argues that even if the Court had followed Dickson CJ's lead and interpreted s 2(d) more generously, it would have had little impact on workers' ability to act collectively because the factors that restrict their freedom of association lay beyond the Charter's reach:

Canadian workers' freedom of association is severely restricted. Workers' capacities to form and join trade unions, bargain collectively and strike have been undermined by political-economic shifts—increased mobility of capital, new workplace technologies, and new modes of workplace organization—that lie far beyond the reach of the Charter’s right of freedom of association. ... Until quite recently, capitalist production typically took place in large workplaces with relatively consistent shift systems. Substantial numbers of workers would regularly inhabit the same spaces at the same times, an important condition for their developing a sense of common interest and struggle. ... Over the last two decades, new production methods and deindustrialization have had the opposite effect, fragmenting the worksite in time and space and thus creating real obstacles to workers’ development of solidaristic ties. The steady rise of part-time and temporary work arrangements means that the worksite is no longer a temporally cohesive unit. Workers come and go and are unlikely to have contact with the same co-workers for any substantial period of time. Moreover, as they rush from one part-time job to another—all the while, especially if they are women, juggling other obligations, such as care of children and elderly relatives, tasks themselves becoming more time consuming because of cuts in social services)—workers have less contact among themselves. Sharing among workers of concerns, complaints, and aspirations—a necessary basis for creating a sense of common interest (and thus successful union organizing)—is difficult in the absence of regular and consistent contact. Spatial (in addition to temporal) fragmentation of work worsens this situation. Increasingly, firms are “downsizing” and relying on subcontractors to meet production needs previously met within the firm. Large plants may become medium-sized ones and then subcontract with small, specialized firms and even single homeworkers. Workers are thus spread out in space and isolated from each other, geographically dissociated, and thus less able to develop solidaristic ties. Moreover, small firms are prohibitively costly for unions to organize and thus allow for greater resistance by employers to certification. ... [Finally, with economic globalization in full swing] a firm’s threat to relocate is a significant trump for overriding union concerns in the bargaining process, for extracting concessions, for dampening the will of employees to strike, and for getting the union to agree to introduction of “human resource management” policies. High unemployment is the background condition that gives these threats their power. ... [M]uch more than a generous interpretation of the Charter right of freedom of association is necessary to ensure that workers have genuine freedom of association. Ways must be found to resist and overcome the increasing isolation of workers from each other and the weakening of unions’ bargaining power in the new political economy. The solution lies not in the Charter, but in curbing business’s power and capacity to dissociate workers from each other and ignore their collective voice.

Consider Bakan’s arguments in relation to the post-pandemic trend of employers permitting, and often encouraging, employees to work from home (see, for example, Clare O’Hara, “Sun Life Plans to Allow Canadian Employees to Choose Whether to Return to the Office,” Globe and Mail (8 July 2021) B2. Might that have the effect of further eroding workers’ freedom of association? And what about the “gig” economy and the way it recasts workers as not workers? This is a trend Bakan explores in this excerpt from The New Corporation: How “Good” Corporations are Bad for Democracy (Toronto: Penguin Canada, 2020) at 102-3:

The overarching effect of Uber has been to transform a job protected by regulations and employment law—professional driving—into one that is precarious and unprotected. Through its app and algorithms, the company connects drivers to customers, claiming to be nothing more than a matchmaker, not an employer. Its “driver partners” are independent contractors, it claims, in business-to-business relationships with the company and therefore beyond the scope of employment protection. ... Uber is not the only company developing apps that evade the employment relationship. Similar platforms are emerging across sectors (a few examples: Upwork, TaskRabbit, UpCounsel, Postmates, and CrowdMed) and within corporations too. Amazon Flex is an example of the latter. It promises “Great Earnings. Flexible Hours. Be Your Own Boss” for its nonemployee delivery drivers, who use an app to claim delivery shifts, drive their own vehicles to an Amazon warehouse, pick up packages, and then deliver them. The system is rife with abuse, overwork, and underpayment, all untouched by law because the workers are not technically employees. ... We're quickly moving toward a future where work is no longer organized as employment but instead is broken down into segmented steps that workers are hired to do on a piecemeal basis, brokered by fee-collecting Internet platforms. "The digital economy will sharply erode the traditional employer-employee relationship," states a recent International Monetary Fund report, as we move toward "crowd-based capitalism in which most of the workforce shifts from a full-time job as a talent or labour provider to running a business of one, in effect a microentrepreneur." The proliferation of digital labour platforms across increasing numbers of sectors, both low skilled and professional, means that "nonemployment work arrangements will expand ... possibly taking full-time jobs out of companies and converting them into sets of projects and tasks."

What kinds of legal and policy changes are needed to protect workers' freedom of association in light of the trends discussed in the above two excerpts? Is it possible to interpret the Court's recent cases establishing constitutional rights to bargain collectively and strike as requiring such changes? Assume Uber drivers challenge their exclusion from collective bargaining legislation (which applies only to "employees") on the ground it violates s 2(d). Could an argument be made that Dunmore and Ontario Mounted Police require they be included? Think about that as you read the following excerpt from Uber v Aslam, [2021] UKSC 5, [2021] IRLR 407, a United Kingdom Supreme Court decision:

[1] New ways of working organised through digital platforms pose pressing questions about the employment status of the people who do the work involved. The central question on this appeal is whether an employment tribunal was entitled to find that drivers whose work is arranged through Uber's smartphone application ("the Uber app") work for Uber under workers' contracts and so qualify for the national minimum wage, paid annual leave and other workers' rights; or whether, as Uber contends, the drivers do not have these rights because they work for themselves as independent contractors, performing services under contracts made with passengers through Uber as their booking agent. ...

[87] ... [T]he vulnerabilities of workers which create the need for statutory protection are subordination to and dependence upon another person in relation to the work done. As also discussed, a touchstone of such subordination and dependence is (as has long been recognised in employment law) the degree of control exercised by the putative employer over the work or services performed by the individual concerned. The greater the extent of such control, the stronger the case for classifying the individual as a "worker" who is employed under a "worker's contract."

[101] ... the transportation service performed by drivers and offered to passengers through the Uber app is very tightly defined and controlled by Uber. Furthermore, it is designed and organised in such a way as to provide a standardised service to passengers in which drivers are perceived as substantially interchangeable and from which Uber, rather than individual drivers, obtains the benefit of customer loyalty and goodwill. From the drivers' point of view, the same factors—in particular, the inability to offer a distinctive service or to set their own prices and Uber's control over all aspects of their interaction with passengers—mean that they have little or no ability to improve their economic position through professional or entrepreneurial skill. In practice the only way in which they can increase their earnings is by working longer hours while constantly meeting Uber's measures of performance.

The UK Supreme Court held that Uber drivers are workers and therefore enjoy workers' rights. Not long after this decision, and as a direct result of it, Uber officially recognized the GMB union as representing Uber drivers in the United Kingdom.

2. As stated in the introduction to this chapter, the readings thus far illustrate that the nature and scope of freedom of association have been debated largely in the context of labour disputes. Yet a number of cases before both the Supreme Court of Canada and lower courts have addressed the guarantee in non-labour settings, adding greater depth and texture to the developing jurisprudence on freedom of association.

3. In Black v Law Society of Alberta, [1989] 1 SCR 591, 1989 CanLII 132 (excerpted in Chapter 10, Federalism and the Economy), for example, the Supreme Court of Canada assessed the constitutionality of two regulations adopted by the Law Society of Alberta that, in effect, prevented the formation of partnerships between resident and non-resident members of the law society. While the majority of the Court held the provisions to be an unjustifiable interference with the respondents' mobility rights as guaranteed under s 6 of the Charter, McIntyre J, dissenting in part, with whom Wilson J concurred, found the restrictions offensive, not with respect to mobility rights but with the respondents' freedom to associate, thereby implicating s 2(d) of the Charter. In McIntyre J's view, the provision preventing the forming of a partnership or association between active member residents and active member non-residents (r 154) amounted to an infringement of s 2(d), which could not be saved under s 1. With respect to r 75B, which prevented members of the society from being partners in more than one firm, McIntyre J found this provision to offend s 2(d) of the Charter but upheld the restriction under s 1 as necessary to ensure and maintain the ethical practice of law in Alberta.

4. In Canadian Egg Marketing Agency v Richardson, [1998] 3 SCR 157, 1997 CanLII 17020 (also excerpted in Chapter 10, and referred to in BC Health Services), the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency sought an injunction to prevent egg producers in the Northwest Territories from selling their eggs in interprovincial trade in the absence of federal quota authorizing such trade. The producers challenged the constitutionality of the federal regulatory scheme, arguing inter alia that it violated their freedom of association. Consider the following reasons by Iacobucci and Bastarache JJ for a majority of the Court:

[104] ... Since it is impossible to "market eggs by oneself" (p. 224), considering the legality of the activity if performed alone is an inappropriate litmus test for determining whether this associational activity is comprehended by s. 2(d). If it is necessary to associate with others to do something, then the right in s. 2(d) reaches beyond protecting the act of associating to protect the very activity for which the association is formed, an activity which is described as "foundational" to the association. The problem with this argument is that in this case it is not so much the activity that is foundational to the association as it is the association that is foundational to the activity. It is the activity that the respondents seek to cloak with the protection of s. 2(d); any association with others is merely a means to an end.

[105] The fact that the association is but a means to an end is not immediately fatal to the respondents' case, because associations normally are a means to an end. As McIntyre J. noted in Reference re Public Service Employee Relations Act (Alta.), ... the right protected by s. 2(d) derives from the fact that "the attainment of individual goals, through the exercise of individual rights, is generally impossible without the aid and cooperation of others" (p. 395). However, underlying the cases on s. 2(d) is the proposition that freedom of association protects only the associational aspect of activities, not the activity itself. If the activity is to be protected by the Constitution, that protection must be found elsewhere than in s. 2(d).

[109] ... It cannot be said that freedom of contract and trade is a modern notion. Nevertheless, the regulation of trade, and in particular, trade in agricultural commodities, is an exercise that involves a balance of competing interests that requires specialized expertise. Yet the effect of the respondents' submissions would be to constitutionalize all commercial relationships under the rubric of freedom of association. There is no trade or profession that can be exercised entirely by oneself.

III. THE FREEDOM NOT TO ASSOCIATE WITH OTHERS

While most of the freedom of association cases involve the right to associate, the Supreme Court of Canada has also interpreted s 2(d) as including a right not to associate. As you read the following decisions, ask yourself whether the Court's account of the right not to associate is consistent with the reasons it offered in BC Health Services in support of its holding that freedom of association includes a right to bargain collectively.

The first case in which the Court squarely addressed the issue of whether freedom of association includes a right not to associate, or what is also described as a negative right of association, was Lavigne v Ontario Public Service Employees Union, [1991] 2 SCR 211, 1991 CanLII 68, which involved a challenge to a mandatory dues check-off. The appellant Lavigne taught at a community college in Ontario. The Ontario Public Service Employees Union (OPSEU) was the bargaining agent for community college faculty members, including the appellant. Sections 51, 52, and 53 of the Ontario Colleges Collective Bargaining Act, RSO 1980, c 74 authorized the inclusion of what is known as a "Rand formula"—requiring all employees to pay dues to a trade union regardless of whether they are members of the union—in collective agreements governing terms and conditions of employment at community colleges. The appellant objected to certain expenditures by OPSEU, including contributions to the following: a campaign against cruise missile testing, a campaign opposing the expenditure of municipal funds for the SkyDome stadium in Toronto, the National Union of Mine Workers in the United Kingdom, and the New Democratic Party. He also opposed contributions required by OPSEU's constitution to the National Union of Provincial Government Employees (NUPGE), which in turn pays dues to the Canadian Labour Congress. Both of these organizations also make a number of contributions of an economic, social, and political nature.

The appellant brought an application seeking a declaration that ss 51, 52, and 53 of the Act infringe ss 2(b) and 2(d) of the Charter. Justice White of the Supreme Court of Ontario found in favour of the appellant. The Court of Appeal allowed an appeal. A further appeal was dismissed by a unanimous Supreme Court of Canada.

The issue of the Charter's application is discussed in Chapter 18. Briefly, La Forest J (Sopinka, Gonthier, Cory, and McLachlin JJ concurring) held that the Council of Regents, which is the entity responsible for negotiating a collective agreement with the union, is a part of the government because it is a Crown agent, and the provincial Ministry of Colleges and Universities exercises full control of the council's activities. In his view, the council's agreement to the Rand formula constituted government action sufficient to trigger Charter scrutiny. Justice Wilson (L'Heureux-Dubé J concurring) gave separate concurring reasons substantially similar to the views expressed by La Forest J on this issue.

With respect to the claim that compelled payment of dues interferes with the appellant's freedom of expression, La Forest J (Sopinka and Gonthier JJ concurring) held that the payment of dues to the union does not amount to an attempt to convey meaning, and the union's uses of his dues cannot be regarded as an expression of the appellant's views. Justice Wilson (L'Heureux-Dubé and Cory JJ concurring) essentially agreed with La Forest J on this point, but added that even if compelled payment of dues amounts to an infringement of freedom of expression, it can be justified in the light of its purpose—that is, to foster collective bargaining.

Justices La Forest (Sopinka and Gonthier JJ concurring), Wilson (L'Heureux-Dubé and Cory JJ concurring), and McLachlin also dismissed the argument that compelled payment of dues unjustifiably interferes with freedom of association. Justice McLachlin held that s 2(d) protects against compelled association of an individual with ideas and values to which they do not voluntarily subscribe. In her view, the compelled payment does not violate freedom of association because there is no link between the mandatory payment and conformity with the ideas and values to which the appellant objected.

Justice La Forest (Sopinka and Gonthier JJ concurring) explained that the Rand formula could be challenged only if it interferes with the freedom not to associate with others—that is, the negative aspect of freedom of association. He, therefore, identified the issue as to whether s 2(d) encompasses the freedom not to be forced to associate with others and concluded that it does (at 318-19):

In my view, the answer is clearly yes. Forced association will stifle the individual's potential for self-fulfillment and realization as surely as voluntary association will develop it. Moreover, society cannot expect meaningful contribution from groups or organizations that are not truly representative of their memberships' convictions and free choice. Instead, it can expect that such groups and organizations will, overall, have a negative effect on the development of the larger community. One need only think of the history of social stagnation in Eastern Europe and of the role played in its development and preservation by officially established "free" trade unions, peace movements and cultural organizations to appreciate the destructive effect forced association can have upon the body politic. Recognition of the freedom of the individual to refrain from association is a necessary counterpart of meaningful association in keeping with democratic ideals.

Furthermore, this is in keeping with our conception of freedom as guaranteed by the Charter. In R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295, Dickson J. had this to say, at pp. 336-37:

Freedom can primarily be characterized by the absence of coercion or constraint. If a person is compelled by the State or the will of another to a course of action or inaction which he would not otherwise have chosen, he is not acting of his own volition and he cannot be said to be truly free. One of the major purposes of the Charter is to protect, within reason, from compulsion or restraint. Coercion includes not only such blatant forms of compulsion as direct commands to act or refrain from acting on pain or sanction, coercion includes indirect forms of control which determine or limit alternative courses of conduct available to others. [Emphasis added.]

Freedom in a broad sense embraces both the absence of coercion and constraint, and the right to manifest beliefs and practices. Freedom means that, subject to such limitations as are necessary to protect public safety, order, health, or morals or the fundamental rights and freedoms of others, no one is to be forced to act in a way contrary to his beliefs or his conscience. [Emphasis added.]

It is clear that a conception of freedom of association that did not include freedom from forced association would not truly be "freedom" within the meaning of the Charter.

This brings into focus the critical point that freedom from forced association and freedom to associate should not be viewed in opposition, one "negative" and the other "positive." These are not distinct rights, but two sides of a bilateral freedom which has as its unifying purpose the advancement of individual aspirations. The bilateral nature of the associational right is explicitly recognized in art. 20 of the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 1948, which provides as follows:

1. Everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and association.
2. No one may be compelled to belong to an association.

In La Forest J's view, the fact that some aspects of freedom of association may also be protected by other guarantees does not mean that s 2(d) should not be given its full meaning, nor that all forms of association are protected under s 2(d): s 2(d) is not "a right to isolation" (at 320) because "certain associations ... are accepted because they are integral to the very structure of society" (at 321). In considering the test for determining whether there has been an infringement of the right not to associate, La Forest J focused on the role of freedom of association in enhancing the autonomy of the individual. In Lavigne's case, therefore, it is not sufficient that other people may not assume that he agrees with the union's position on various causes just because he is required to pay dues that are given to those causes. He is entitled to object to his dues being allocated to causes with which he disagrees. Justice La Forest found that the payment of dues (which are used to further the objects of the union) constitutes association. Lavigne had conceded that the requirement he pay dues for collective bargaining purposes is constitutional, and thus the only issue was whether it was constitutional to require him to pay dues to causes not directly related to collective bargaining or the workplace more generally.

After having found that the forced payment of dues constitutes a prima facie violation of an individual's rights under s 2(d) of the Charter, La Forest J proceeded to uphold the infringement under s 1. In his view, the fundamental importance of trade unions in democratizing the workplace, as well as their broader societal role in promoting democratic principles, would be undermined if the courts were to find agency shop provisions unconstitutional. Thus, at the minimal impairment stage of the Oakes test, he rejected the possibility of an "opting out" formula in the payment of dues as a feasible alternative. Such a formula, he argued, would not only strike at a union's financial base, rendering it less fit to fulfill its role, but would also undermine the solidarity that "is so important to the emotional and symbolic underpinnings of unionism" (at 214). For La Forest J, the agency shop provisions represent a justifiable limit on freedom of association.

Justice Wilson (L'Heureux-Dubé and Cory JJ concurring) disagreed that freedom to associate encompasses a freedom from compelled association. Recognizing a freedom not to associate, in her view, "would be 'to overshoot the actual purpose of the right or freedom in question'" and "would set the scene for contests between the positive associational rights of union members and the negative associational rights of non-members." Thus, "[t]o construe the section in this way would place the court in the impossible position of having to choose whose s. 2(d) rights should prevail" (at 259). Furthermore, an individual who does not wish to associate with a particular group would be able to bring the claim under s 2(b) or s 7 of the Charter. Justice Wilson concluded that Lavigne's positive right to associate had not been contravened and that, even if there were a negative right, it had not been contravened because it would encompass the same narrow scope as the positive right pursuant to the Alberta Reference. Accordingly, she held that Lavigne's challenge did not fall within s 2(d).

The application of the negative freedom of association arises not only in the context of dues payment but also, perhaps more directly, in the context of mandatory union membership. The Supreme Court of Canada addressed this issue in its decision in Advance Cutting & Coring, in which the Court was divided on the application of the negative right.

R v Advance Cutting & Coring Ltd

[Section 119.1 of the Quebec Act Respecting Labour Relations, Vocational Training and Manpower Management in the Construction Industry, RSQ, c R-20 required construction workers to obtain a competency certificate before they could work on a project. Before they could obtain a certificate, they had to join one of five union groups. The appellants were contractors and real estate promoters who had hired employees who did not have competency certificates and construction workers who worked without competency certificates. They challenged the legislative provisions on the ground that requiring the workers to become members of the union groups in order to obtain competency certificates breached the freedom not to associate. At the Supreme Court of Canada, in an opinion written by Bastarache J, four justices held that the provisions contravened the Charter and were not justified under s 1 of the Charter; four justices held that the provisions did not contravene the Charter (of whom three, per LeBel J, found that the negative freedom of association was not infringed, and one, L'Heureux-Dubé J, held that s 2(d) did not encompass a negative freedom of association). Because the ninth justice, Iacobucci J, found a contravention, but considered that it was justifiable under s 1, the provisions were upheld by a narrow margin.]

LeBEL J (Gonthier and Arbour JJ concurring):

[163] The case at bar offers the possibility for an evolution in the relationship between the Charter and labour law. ... [T]he present case involves an attack on some forms of union security clauses. Under many shapes and forms, such arrangements often provide for an obligation to obtain or maintain union membership in order to retain or obtain employment. They may also address the financing of union activities. They may combine provisions relating to the checking off of union dues with others concerning the maintenance of union membership. A well-known and common form of union security, the Rand formula, which was discussed in [Lavigne v Ontario Public Service Employees Union, [1991] 2 SCR 211, 1991 CanLII 68], has even become a standard part of the labour laws of some provinces, for example, under the Quebec Labour Code, R.S.Q., c. C-27, s. 47. Under this formula, union dues are withheld from the pay of an employee, whether or not he or she belongs to the union.

[205] The present case presents a more difficult problem than the application of the Rand formula canvassed in Lavigne. The Construction Act imposes an obligation to join one of five unions. The question becomes whether this fact per se triggers the negative component and becomes a breach of s. 2(d) of the Charter that must be justified under s. 1. If we adopt this route, it might well mean that all forms of compulsory membership provided for or even authorized under statute would be open to challenge under the Charter.

[206] A proper analysis of Lavigne and of the nature of the constitutional guarantee does not allow for such a result. Although differing in some respects, McLachlin J's and La Forest J's reasons both refused to view the negative right as a simple mirror-image of the positive right of association. Both Justices accepted that the nature of a workplace and the status of the persons participating in its life and experience created associations that became unavoidable or "compelled." The use of the notion of ideological conformity by McLachlin J or La Forest J's concerns for the safeguarding of broad liberty interests acknowledged the need for association, as well as the need to join, which may be required in some aspects of life in the workplace. At the same time, they intended to meet the need to safeguard democratic values and to foster them in the area of labour relations. Their reasons reflect the view that some forms of compelled association might breach s. 2(d) of the Charter if the fact of association imposes on an individual values and views of the world antithetical to his or her own.

[207] The Court found a balance in Lavigne. This balance is now at stake in the present case. The majority of the Court in Lavigne found that there was a negative right not to associate. Although it acknowledged the need for such a right, it accepted a democratic rationale for putting internal limits on the right not to associate. La Forest J regarded the Constitution's presumption of democracy as a reason for concluding that forced associations which flow from the functioning of democracy cannot be severed with the aid of the Charter (at pp. 317 and 320-21). Democracy is not primarily about withdrawal, but fundamentally about participation in the life and management of democratic institutions like unions.

[208] An approach that fails to read in some inner limits and restrictions to a right not to associate would deny the individual the benefits arising from an association. This Court has maintained, since the labour law trilogy of 1987, that the right of association intends to foster individual autonomy and attaches to individuals. At the same time, the exercise of the right of association also reinforces the ability of an individual to convey ideas and opinions, through a group voice, as the Court acknowledged in [Libman v Quebec (AG), [1997] 3 SCR 569, 1997 CanLII 326], discussed in Chapter 20, Freedom of Expression, while discussing political and ideological associations. It should not be viewed as an inferior right, barely tolerated and narrowly circumscribed.

[218] The Construction Act imposes an obligation to join a union group. The obligation remains, nevertheless, a very limited one. It boils down to the obligation to designate a collective bargaining representative, to belong to it for a given period of time, and to pay union dues. The Act does not require more. At the same time, the Act provides protection against past, present and potential abuses of union power. ... The law allows any construction worker to change his or her union affiliation, at the appropriate time. As it stands, the law does not impose on construction workers much more than the bare obligation to belong to a union. It does not create any mechanism to enforce ideological conformity.

[220] ... No witness came forward to assert that he felt or believed that joining a union associated him with activities he disapproved of, or with opinions he did not share. In order to trigger the negative guarantee in this case, ideological conformity or breach of another liberty interest would have to be found in the fact that unions, as other groups belonging to or participating in a democratic society, sometimes engage in public debate, take positions on issues concerning their members, or comment on broad social or political questions.

[221] Our Court would have to presume that, because they take part in social debate, unions in Quebec or elsewhere act in breach of the democratic values of our society, and of the liberty interests and the freedom of opinion and expression of their members. Still, if union members assert such a concern, it may have to be addressed. Accommodation may become necessary to safeguard the democratic character of unions and of the society within which they operate. ...

[223] No evidence was introduced about union practices that would impose values or opinions on their members. No evidence was offered about the internal life of construction unions or about the constraints they might seek to impose upon members. There was no indication that free expression is limited by union activities of such a nature that forced association would trigger the guarantee of s. 2(d). The nature of a particular legislative or regulatory system, in an important part of the economy like the construction industry, may certainly be subject to criticisms or political discussions. Nevertheless, personal disagreements with the extent of a strict regulatory system do not suffice to mount a successful Charter challenge. It should now be clear that the mere fact of compelled association will not, by itself, involve a breach of the Charter. More is needed in order to trigger the negative component of s. 2(d).

[Justice LeBel then addressed the issue of whether the Court could infer or presume that workers were subject to ideological coercion.]

[224] May the Court presume ideological coercion from the fact that, at times, Quebec unions, like other groups, have advocated particular causes? ...

[225] In order to reach such a result, the Court would have to take judicial notice of the presumed ideological bent of Quebec unions. The Court would have to judicially notice that ideological orientations or the adoption of social and political causes within the union movement mean that a form of intellectual conformity is being imposed by unions on their members, and that the liberty interests of those members are being jeopardized. Judicial notice certainly has its place in constitutional adjudication. ...

[226] The fact that unions intervene in political social debate is well known and well documented and might be the object of judicial notice. Indeed, our Court acknowledged the importance of this role in the Lavigne case. Several ideological currents have criss-crossed the history of the Quebec labour movement. ...

[227] Taking judicial notice of the fact that Quebec unions have a constant ideology, act in constant support of a particular cause or policy, and seek to impose that ideology on their members seems far more controversial. It would require a leap of faith and logic, absent a proper factual record on the question. The assertion seems to rest on the tenuous line that, although we do not have any evidence to this effect, coercion on the individuals should be inferred from "ideological" trends present in the labour movement. This "fact" is unlike issues of notorious discrimination against certain groups in Canadian society, and unlike the disadvantage experienced by women and children after a divorce, both facts of which this Court has taken judicial notice (see R. v. Williams, [1998] 1 S.C.R. 1128, and Willick v. Willick, [1994] 3 S.C.R. 670). In this case, it cannot be said that some form of politicization and ideological conformity which allegedly flows from the political and social orientation of the labour movement is self-evident. Instead, such views evidence stereotypes about the union movement as authoritarian and undemocratic, and conjure images of workers marching in lock step without any free choice or free will, under the watchful eyes of union bosses and their goon squads.

[228] In fact, democracy undergirds the particular form of union security provided for by the Construction Act. Throughout the conflicts and difficulties that marred the history of the construction industry, a critical flaw of the regime appeared to be the lack of participation in the life of unions and the need to reestablish and maintain member control over their affairs. ... Affiliation means that he or she has, at least, gained the ability to influence the life of the association whether or not he or she decides to exercise this right.

[229] In the case of the construction unions, a heightened degree of participation in the life of the associations appeared necessary in order to foster union democracy. At the same time, the legislative formula left workers a choice among the various groups active in the construction industry. These groups had held widely different views on the role of labour unions in society. Their orientations represented a broad spectrum of opinions, both about the orientation of society and about the functions of unions. The legislative solution represented an answer to some of the pressing problems that the Quebec construction industry had been confronted with during several years. The degree of relative peace and equilibrium reached by the time the present case started bears witness to the basic soundness of this legislative choice, which expresses a deep concern for democratic values. One might think that an absolute right to withdraw at will, even with payment of service fees for unions, would not preserve and develop the internal democracy of union groups in the same manner. It would deprive the dues-paying worker of any influence on the life of the union and on the determination of working conditions meant to be extended to the entire industry or a sector thereof, as rules of public order.

[230] Union members seem to act very independently from their union when it comes to the expression of their political choices and, even more so, to their voting preferences, come election time. Existence of attempted ideological conformity, let alone its realization, seems highly doubtful. ...

[231] In this context, there is simply no evidence to support judicial notice of Quebec unions ideologically coercing their members. Such an inference presumes that unions hold a single ideology and impose it on their rank and file, including the complainants in this case. Such an inference would amount to little more than an unsubstantiated stereotype. ...

BASTARACHE J (McLachlin CJ and Major and Binnie JJ concurring) (dissenting):

[3] The test relied upon by LeBel J is based primarily upon the decision of McLachlin J (as she then was) in Lavigne [above]. According to LeBel J, for ideological conformity to exist, there must be evidence of an imposition of union values or opinions on the member, evidence of a limitation of the member's free expression, or evidence that the union participates in causes and activities of which the member disapproves. ... In other words, LeBel J's interpretation of ideological conformity is a narrow one where, in order to exist, there must be some impact on the member's moral convictions. This test, as formulated by LeBel J, is, in my opinion, too narrow and results in a negative right that is too constrained. I do not agree that McLachlin J's opinion in Lavigne need be interpreted so restrictively. In my view, the interpretation of ideological conformity must be broader and take place in context. In this case, this context would take into account the true nature of unions as participatory bodies holding political and economic roles in society which, in turn, translates into the existence of ideological positions. To mandate that an individual adhere to such a union is ideological conformity.

[Justice Bastarache referred to the concerns about association prior to the Charter as reflected in the Rand formula, whereby a worker will be required to pay union dues but can choose not to join the union that represents the employees in a workplace. The infringement in the current case is more significant, he said, and therefore requires greater justification.]

[17] ... To suggest that the unions in the present case are not associated with any ideological cause is to ignore the history of the union movement itself. Although it has been accepted that freedom of association protects an activity by an association that is permitted by an individual, this does not mean that there is no distinctive function for an association, or that associational analogues to individual rights need be ignored. The collective character of the right to associate is undeniable because collective activity is not equivalent to the addition of individual activities. It is important, however, that belonging to important social institutions be free; this is how democracy will be enhanced.

[Justice Bastarache then considered whether the negative right is infringed. He discussed the political role played by unions, including their support of the New Democratic Party, their participation in the sovereignty issue in Quebec, and the general political representation of their members.]

[27] ... Furthermore, membership has meaning. Membership is about sharing values, joining to pursue goals in common, expressing views reflecting the position of a particular group in society. ... It is because of the collective force produced by membership that unions can be a potent force in public debate, that they can influence Parliament and the legislatures in their functions, that they can bargain effectively. This force must be constituted democratically to conform to s. 2(d). ...

[29] In the present case, workers objected to being forced to join a union and objected generally to the compulsory unionization scheme, which is, in my view, ideological in nature.

[31] This is a case where the freedom not to associate is markedly infringed. ... This is a clear situation of government coercion, the result of which mandates that workers in the construction industry in Quebec group together in a few unions which are specified and approved by government. The fact that there are five unions from which workers can choose in no way negates this infringement for it remains government-mandated group affiliation. Self-realization of the worker is violated in many ways. He or she must unionize. Within the prescribed regime, democracy is further restricted by limited choice. There is no guarantee that a majority of voters will exercise their right. A default provision can determine the outcome of elections. Those voting for minority associations may be left out of future negotiations.

[34] As I have said, ideological conformity is engaged in particular because the members of the associations necessarily participate in and indirectly support a system of forced association and state control over work opportunity. This is a situation whereby the democratic rights of workers are taken away. Being forced to accept and participate in a system that severely limits the democratic principle in the area of labour relations is a form of coercion that cannot be segregated totally from ideological conformity. If Parliament provided that a person must belong to a specific political party to work in the public service of Canada, the situation would be analogous. Some would argue that one does not have to believe, simply that one has to belong; ... I believe there would still be clear ideological conformity.

[36] ... There is also a distinction to be made with the requirements of professional associations such as medical associations and law societies, where the need for protection of the public may require a forced association which is justified under s. 1 of the Charter. In this case, the provisions are not based on the protection of the public by way of assuring the competency of workers. To receive certification, a worker must be a member of one of the five chosen unions; to become a member, he or she must have been a resident of Quebec in the previous year, have worked a set number of hours in that year and must be under 50 years of age. Without having met these requirements, a worker is unable to work in Quebec regardless of his or her actual competence or experience in his or her chosen trade. The conditions related to forced association have nothing to do with the protection of the public. As stated by Bonin J of the Court of Québec, "[TRANSLATION] [t]he certificate's main purpose was to maintain hiring priority." As such, a s. 1 justification is required. Before considering s. 1, however, I turn next to the examination of the positive right which is also part of s. 2(d).

[Justice Bastarache found that s 30 of the Act, which establishes the conditions under which a competency card can be obtained (workers have to be resident in Quebec in the previous year during which they had to have worked 300 hours and be under 50 years old), and the regional quota requirements limiting the right to be placed on the union lists breach the positive right to associate. The conditions affect workers inside and outside Quebec and "severely" restrict their ability to join one of the unions. He concluded that, under s 1 of the Charter, these requirements were disproportionate to their stated objectives.

Justice Iacobucci agreed that s 2(d) includes a negative right to be free from compelled association. He held that the legislation infringed that right, but that it was justified under s 1 of the Charter. He disagreed with both LeBel and Bastarache JJ, however, that the test for whether the negative right has been infringed relies on a finding of ideological conformity, preferring the test of whether the association poses a threat to a specific liberty interest enunciated by La Forest J in Lavigne. Indicating that forced association with respect to professional or skilled organizations will usually be valid because it reflects competence, he found that the forced membership in the construction unions is not contingent on competency. It also impaired the liberty interest of those who are opposed to joining a union and those who would choose a different union than one of the five recognized unions. He adopted LeBel J's s 1 analysis to find the contravention justified.

Justice L'Heureux-Dubé held that Lavigne does not support a clear statement of a constitutional right not to associate and that because freedom from ideological conformity can be addressed through s 2(b) or 7 of the Charter, it is not appropriate to develop new constitutional tools. She did not recognize a negative right of association and therefore held that there was no contravention of s 2(d). She further expressed concern (at para 76) that the impetus for efforts to establish the negative right to association has historically originated with those opposed to the establishment or maintenance of labour associations. Such a tainted pedigree raises the question of whether we should constitutionalize an initiative whose purpose was to defeat the right to associate.]

Appeal dismissed.

NOTE AND QUESTIONS

Compulsion is also an issue with respect to s 2(b) of the Charter, which guarantees freedom of expression. Having regard to Chapter 20, is the Court's approach to compelled expression versus compelled association consistent? In your view, are there relevant differences between the two?

I. INTRODUCTION

Section 7 of the Charter provides:

7. Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

When the Charter was enacted in 1982, the scope of the interests in “life, liberty and security of the person” and the meaning of the phrase “principles of fundamental justice” were debatable. At that time, commentators anticipated that the s 7 rights would be interpreted in relation to two other legal ideas.

The first was the American conception of “due process.” The 5th and 14th amendments to the US Constitution provide, among other rights, that no person may be deprived of “life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.” In the landmark case of Lochner v New York, 198 US 45, 25 S Ct 539 (1905), the US Supreme Court struck down a New York statute that set maximum hours of work for bakers on the ground that it took away a person’s “liberty” without “due process.” The liberty in question was the liberty of employees to make contracts about hours of work. This case and others like it created a doctrine called “substantive due process,” which protects substantive values such as freedom of contract, in contrast to “procedural due process,” which protects values associated with procedural fairness.

Lochner, like most landmarks, has been interpreted in different ways by different generations. The dominant understanding of Lochner has been that the US Supreme Court imposed its own laissez-faire ideology on the law, frustrating the efforts of progressive legislatures to reform working conditions and defying the terms and history of the Bill of Rights and the preferences of the majority of Americans. On this reading, the case is a paradigmatic example of the need for judicial restraint and the danger that arises when judges read their own personal economic and social values into the terms of constitutional guarantees. In the 1930s, the US Supreme Court committed itself to a much more restrained standard of review for economic and social legislation, requiring only a "rational basis" for constitutional validity.

The second relevant legal idea was the administrative law doctrine of "natural justice" or "fairness." According to this doctrine, an individual who will be affected in some distinctive or particular way by a proposed administrative action or decision by the government is entitled to "natural justice"—that is, to have a hearing before officials who are impartial and independent. The phrase "some distinctive or particular way" refers to the effect of a wide range of decisions, all of them contrasted with the making of general policy. For example, if the governing body of a profession proposes to discipline a member for misconduct or negligence, it must do so in a hearing because the decision will affect the member alone. The hearing required for a decision that meets this threshold requirement is a reasonable opportunity to know what is being contemplated and to participate in the decision through the presentation of evidence and arguments. Depending on the context, natural justice may range from an informal interview or written submissions to a formal proceeding that is much like a trial. The requirement of impartiality and independence requires the decision-maker both to be and to appear to be uninfluenced by factors such as a financial interest in the outcome of the decision, personal animosity, or friendship toward a party, and participation in both the prosecution and the adjudication of an issue. This body of doctrine, "natural justice," together with the procedural protections in the criminal law, stands as one of the large elements of the common law protections of constitutional liberty in the British tradition.

How do the American conception of substantive due process and the common law conception of natural justice bear on the nature and scope of s 7? Both were part of the stock of common knowledge of the lawyers who participated in drafting s 7 and of the lawyers and judges who sought to interpret it. It is reasonably apparent that the drafters felt an acute need to avoid the dangers represented by Lochner. The word "property," for example, was not included in the phrase "life, liberty and security of the person," and several proposals to include it afterward have perished. The drafters of s 7 also tended to assume, and sometimes expressly stated, that in their view "the principles of fundamental justice" referred only to rules designed to secure procedural fairness or natural justice, as opposed to rules vindicating substantive values that may or may not find expression elsewhere in the Constitution.

Although the courts have been careful to disclaim any attraction to Lochner's temptations, we will see that the Supreme Court has interpreted fundamental justice to include substantive as well as procedural protections for life, liberty, and security of the person.

A. THE STRUCTURE OF SECTION 7

The following case, often referred to as the Motor Vehicle Reference, was the Supreme Court of Canada's first major decision to address the nature and scope of s 7. At issue was the constitutional validity of s 94(2) of the Motor Vehicle Act, RSBC 1979, c 288. Section 94(1) of that Act imposed a fine and a mandatory period of seven days' imprisonment on a driver for driving while their licence was suspended. Section 94(2) explicitly stated that the offence was one of "absolute liability," meaning that an accused would be found guilty once the prohibited act was proved, even if they were in no way at fault in committing the act. An accused who had driven with a suspended licence was guilty of this offence regardless of whether they knew of or had received notice of the suspension and regardless of any due diligence they might have exercised to ensure that the licence was not suspended. Because imprisonment was clearly a deprivation of liberty, much of the decision addressed the meaning of fundamental justice. The decision nonetheless also provides valuable insight on how life, liberty, and security of the person relate to each other, to the principles of fundamental justice, and to other rights and freedoms guaranteed in the Charter.

Re BC Motor Vehicle Act[1985] 2 SCR 486, 1985 CanLII 81

LAMER J (Dickson CJ and Beetz, Chouinard, and Le Dain JJ concurring):

The Nature and Legitimacy of Constitutional Adjudication Under the Charter

[15] ... [I]n the context of s. 7, and in particular of the interpretation of "principles of fundamental justice" there has prevailed in certain quarters an assumption that all but a narrow construction of s. 7 will inexorably lead the courts to question the wisdom of enactments, to adjudicate upon the merits of public policy.

[16] From this have sprung warnings of the dangers of a judicial "super-legislature" beyond the reach of Parliament, the provincial legislatures and the electorate. ... This is an argument which was heard countless times prior to the entrenchment of the Charter but which has in truth, for better or for worse, been settled by the very coming into force of the Constitution Act, 1982. It ought not to be forgotten that the historic decision to entrench the Charter in our Constitution was taken not by the courts but by the elected representatives of the people of Canada. It was those representatives who extended the scope of constitutional adjudication and entrusted the courts with this new and onerous responsibility. Adjudication under the Charter must be approached free of any lingering doubts as to its legitimacy.

[17] The concerns with the bounds of constitutional adjudication explain the characterization of the issue in a narrow and restrictive fashion, i.e., whether the term "principles of fundamental justice" has a substantive or merely procedural content. In my view, the characterization of the issue in such fashion preempts an open-minded approach to determining the meaning of "principles of fundamental justice."

[18] The substantive/procedural dichotomy narrows the issue almost to an all-or-nothing proposition. Moreover, it is largely bound up in the American experience with substantive and procedural due process. It imports into the Canadian context American concepts, terminology and jurisprudence, all of which are inextricably linked to problems concerning the nature and legitimacy of adjudication under the U.S. Constitution. That Constitution, it must be remembered, has no s. 52 nor has it the internal checks and balances of ss. 1 and 33. We would, in my view, do our own Constitution a disservice to simply allow the American debate to define the issue for us, all the while ignoring the truly fundamental structural differences between the two constitutions. Finally, the dichotomy creates its own set of difficulties by the attempt to distinguish between two concepts whose outer boundaries are not always clear and often tend to overlap. Such difficulties can and should, when possible, be avoided.

The Principles of Fundamental Justice

[24] In the framework of a purposive analysis, designed to ascertain the purpose of the s. 7 guarantee and "the interests it was meant to protect" (R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [[1985] 1 SCR 295, 1985 CanLII 69]), it is clear to me that the interests which are meant to be protected by the words "and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice" of s. 7 are the life, liberty and security of the person. The principles of fundamental justice, on the other hand, are not a protected interest, but rather a qualifier of the right not to be deprived of life, liberty and security of the person.

[25] ... As a qualifier, the phrase serves to establish the parameters of the interests but it cannot be interpreted so narrowly as to frustrate or stultify them. For the narrower the meaning given to "principles of fundamental justice" the greater will be the possibility that individuals may be deprived of these most basic rights. This latter result is to be avoided given that the rights involved are as fundamental as those which pertain to the life, liberty and security of the person

[26] For these reasons, I am of the view that it would be wrong to interpret the term "fundamental justice" as being synonymous with natural justice as the Attorney General of British Columbia and others have suggested. To do so would strip the protected interests of much, if not most, of their content and leave the "right" to life, liberty and security of the person in a sorely emaciated state. Such a result would be inconsistent with the broad, affirmative language in which those rights are expressed and equally inconsistent with the approach adopted by this Court toward the interpretation of Charter rights

[27] It would mean that the right to liberty would be narrower than the right not to be arbitrarily detained or imprisoned (s. 9), that the right to security of the person would have less content than the right to be secure against unreasonable search or seizure (s. 8). Such an interpretation would give the specific expressions of the "right to life, liberty and security of the person" which are set forth in ss. 8 to 14 greater content than the general concept from which they originate.

[28] Sections 8 to 14, in other words, address specific deprivations of the "right" to life, liberty and security of the person in breach of the principles of fundamental justice, and as such, violations of s. 7. They are designed to protect, in a specific manner and setting, the right to life, liberty and security of the person set forth in s. 7. It would be incongruous to interpret s. 7 more narrowly than the rights in ss. 8 to 14. ...

[29] Sections 8 to 14 are illustrative of deprivations of those rights to life, liberty and security of the person in breach of the principles of fundamental justice. For they, in effect, illustrate some of the parameters of the "right" to life, liberty and security of the person; they are examples of instances in which the "right" to life, liberty and security of the person would be violated in a manner which is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. To put matters in a different way, ss. 7 to 14 could have been fused into one section, with inserted between the words of s. 7 and the rest of those sections the oft utilised provision in our statutes, "and, without limiting the generality of the foregoing (s. 7) the following shall be deemed to be in violation of a person's rights under this section." Clearly, some of those sections embody principles that are beyond what could be characterized as "procedural."

[30] Thus, ss. 8 to 14 provide an invaluable key to the meaning of "principles of fundamental justice." Many have been developed over time as presumptions of the common law, others have found expression in the international conventions on human rights. All have been recognized as essential elements of a system for the administration of justice which is founded upon a belief in "the dignity and worth of the human person" (preamble to the Canadian Bill of Rights, R.S.C. 1970, App. III) and on "the rule of law" (preamble to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms).

[31] It is this common thread which, in my view, must guide us in determining the scope and content of "principles of fundamental justice." In other words, the principles of fundamental justice are to be found in the basic tenets of our legal system. They do not lie in the realm of general public policy but in the inherent domain of the judiciary as guardian of the justice system. Such an approach to the interpretation of "principles of fundamental justice" is consistent with the wording and structure of s. 7, the context of the section, i.e., ss. 8 to 14, and the character and larger objects of the Charter itself. It provides meaningful content for the s. 7 guarantee all the while avoiding adjudication of policy matters.

[32] Thus, it seems to me that to replace "fundamental justice" with the term "natural justice" misses the mark entirely. It was, after all, clearly open to the legislator to use the term natural justice, a known term of art, but such was not done. We must, as a general rule, be loath to exchange the terms actually used with terms so obviously avoided.

[33] Whatever may have been the degree of synonymy between the two expressions in the past (which in any event has not been clearly demonstrated by the parties and interveners), as of the last few decades this country has given a precise meaning to the words natural justice for the purpose of delineating the responsibility of adjudicators (in the wide sense of the word) in the field of administrative law.

[34] It is, in my view, that precise and somewhat narrow meaning that the legislator avoided, clearly indicating thereby a will to give greater content to the words "principles of fundamental justice," the limits of which were left for the courts to develop but within, of course, the acceptable sphere of judicial activity.

[Justice Lamer then explained why he placed little emphasis on the testimony of federal civil servants from the Department of Justice before the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Constitution to the effect that the term "fundamental justice" in s 7 would cover procedural due process and that its meaning would be similar to the concept of natural justice, a concept familiar to the courts. This portion of the judgment is excerpted in Chapter 17, The Framework of the Charter.]

[65] We should not be surprised to find that many of the principles of fundamental justice are procedural in nature. Our common law has largely been a law of remedies and procedures and, as Frankfurter J. wrote in McNabb v. United States, 318 U.S. 332 (1942), at p. 347, "the history of liberty has largely been the history of observance of procedural safeguards." This is not to say, however, that the principles of fundamental justice are limited solely to procedural guarantees. Rather, the proper approach to the determination of the principles of fundamental justice is quite simply one in which, as Professor L. Tremblay has written, "future growth will be based on historical roots" ("Section 7 of the Charter: Substantive Due Process?" (1984), 18 U.B.C.L. Rev. 201, at p. 254).

[Justice Lamer concluded that absolute liability offended fundamental justice, deriving this conclusion from the basic principle that the innocent should not be punished. He also concluded that the absolute liability imposed by s 94(2) of the Motor Vehicle Act could not be justified under s 1. Even though it was highly desirable that bad drivers be kept off the road and that drivers who scorned licence requirements be severely punished, the government had not demonstrated that the risk of imprisoning innocent persons was a reasonable limit when weighed against the alternative of a statute that allowed for a defence of due diligence. Section 94(2) was declared of no force or effect. Justices Wilson and McIntyre wrote separate reasons agreeing in the result with Lamer J.]

Appeal dismissed.

The Motor Vehicle Reference established the basic structure of a s 7 claim. First, the applicant must show that the law or other state action in question affected their life, liberty, or security of the person: see below, Section I.B. Second, the applicant must show that the effect on their life, liberty, or security of the person violated one or more of the principles of fundamental justice: see below, Section I.C. If the applicant establishes both of these elements, then their s 7 right has been violated. The government may then attempt to show that the violation of s 7 is justified under s 1 of the Charter: see Section IV, below, and Chapter 17.

Although there have been many developments in the interpretation of s 7 since 1985, the basic structure of a s 7 claim remains the same as in the Motor Vehicle Reference: the Charter applicant must demonstrate that the state action in question both (1) affects life, liberty, or security of the person; and (2) is inconsistent with an identified principle of fundamental justice. Put another way, state action that affects life, liberty, or security of the person but complies with the principles of fundamental justice does not violate s 7; similarly, state action that is inconsistent with fundamental justice but does not affect life, liberty, or security of the person does not violate s 7 (see, for example, R v Transport Robert (1973) Lteeé; R v 1260448 Ontario Inc., 2003 CanLII 7741, 180 CCC \(3d\) 254 \(Ont CA\), where a penal statute of absolute liability was upheld because it did not affect liberty or security of the person).

Some have questioned whether this is the correct way to read s 7. In Gosselin v Québec (AG), 2002 SCC 84, Arbour J, dissenting, proposed a different reading:

[338] It is in fact arguable, as Professor Hogg [Peter W Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (Toronto: Carswell, 2001) (loose-leaf)] points out (at p. 44-3), "that s. 7 confers two rights": a right, set out in the section's first clause, to "life, liberty and security of the person" full stop (more or less); and a right, set out in the section's second clause, not to be deprived of life, liberty or security of the person except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. Wilson J. explicitly considered this interpretation of s. 7 in Operation Dismantle Inc. v. The Queen, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 441, at p. 488. Although in that case she expressed misgivings regarding the feasibility of the interpretation, she ultimately left its status undecided. In fact, in Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act ..., at p. 523, which was heard later in the same year, [Justice Wilson] may have overcome her earlier misgivings and impliedly accepted the two-rights interpretation by stating that a deprivation of life, liberty or security of the person would require s. 1 justification even if the principles of fundamental justice were satisfied. Her statement in this regard is consistent with the notion that the first clause in s. 7 affords additional protection, over and above that afforded in the second clause, with the result that mere compliance with the principles of fundamental justice does not in itself guarantee that the rights to life, liberty and security of the person will not be violated.

How would this "two-right" view affect the way that s 7 is applied to government action?

Some scholars have proposed that s 7 should be interpreted so as to require the government to show that any effect on life, liberty, or security of the person is "in accordance with" a specific principle of fundamental justice, rather than requiring the applicant to show a violation of a principle of fundamental justice. How would that approach differ from the majority's holding in the Motor Vehicle Reference?

B. THE INTERESTS PROTECTED BY SECTION 7

As noted above, the first step in a s 7 claim is to show that the applicant's life, liberty, or security of the person has been negatively affected by state action. In what follows, we provide an overview of the approach that the courts have taken to defining the content of each of those interests and also include a discussion of the requirement of a causal connection between the negative effect on those interests and state action.

In the early years of the Charter, uncertainty existed about the extent to which s 7 applied outside the criminal law context. For example, in several early s 7 decisions, Lamer CJ expressed the view that s 7 applied only where the interests protected by s 7 were engaged in criminal proceedings and other proceedings involving coercive enforcement of the law by state officials. In the first cases excerpted below in Section II—that is, Morgentaler and Rodriguez—you will see that Supreme Court was careful to emphasize that its findings of a violation of the security of the person were made in the criminal law context and to caution that it was expressing no opinion on whether deprivations of security of the person would be found outside that context. These concerns about limiting the scope of s 7 have disappeared over time, and the Court has clearly extended the application of s 7 beyond the criminal law context and even beyond contexts connected to the administration of justice: see, for example, Chaoulli v Quebec (AG), 2005 SCC 35 and other cases found below in Section III.

1. Life

The interest in life has been found to be engaged by government action that creates a serious threat to an applicant's life by preventing him or her from obtaining access to medical care: see, for example, Chaoulli, above, excerpted in Section III.

Imposing the death penalty as a punishment for an offence would also engage the s 7 right to life; however, capital punishment was abolished under the Criminal Code in 1976 and under the National Defence Act in 1998. Thus, the issue of whether capital punishment would be consistent with fundamental justice has not arisen directly under the Charter. Moreover, if this issue were to arise, it is likely that a court would treat it as a question of cruel and unusual punishment under s 12 of the Charter, rather than as a question of fundamental justice under s 7; see R v Nur, 2015 SCC 15, which considered the constitutionality of a minimum sentence under s 12 rather than under s 7.

The extradition of persons from Canada to face offences punishable by death in other jurisdictions does engage s 7, although the courts have tended to treat extradition under these circumstances as engaging the interests in liberty and security of the person, rather than the interest in life. Regardless of the interest in question, the Supreme Court of Canada has held that only in exceptional circumstances should Canada extradite someone to face the death penalty. In the case of extradition to US jurisdictions for offences that are punishable by death, the Court has held that, in all but exceptional circumstances, the minister of justice must seek assurances, pursuant to the extradition treaty between Canada and the United States, that the death penalty will not be imposed: United States v Burns, 2001 SCC 7. Why does fundamental justice require such an approach? What should the minister do if the requesting state cannot or will not provide assurances that the death penalty will not be imposed?

2. Liberty

The Motor Vehicle Reference established that the possibility of imprisonment as a consequence of criminal or other penal proceedings always engages the applicant's liberty interest. Therefore, the principles of fundamental justice apply at every stage of the criminal process, including the conduct of criminal investigations, pre-trial proceedings such as bail hearings, the criminal trial itself (including the rules of procedure and evidence), sentencing, and the parole system. Moreover, because the Motor Vehicle Reference held that the principles of fundamental justice could include substantive principles of criminal law, the definition of criminal offences is subject to scrutiny under s 7, especially in relation to their fault elements. It is arguable that s 7 has had a greater impact on the criminal justice system than on any other area of Canadian law. Nevertheless, we don't consider this impact in detail here because it is normally dealt with in courses on criminal law, criminal procedure, and evidence.

Detention in non-criminal contexts also engages s 7. For example, detention pursuant to immigration law, involuntary committal under provincial mental health law, and the extradition process all affect the s 7 liberty interest and must therefore comply with the principles of fundamental justice: Charkaoui v Canada (Citizenship and Immigration), 2007 SCC 9 (immigration proceedings); PS v Ontario, 2014 ONCA 900 (involuntary committal); United States v Burns, above (extradition).

To what extent does the s 7 interest in liberty extend to the more general interest that everyone has in making their own choices about where to go and what to do? The Supreme Court of Canada has been cautious in extending the liberty interest in this way. In the early days of the Charter, the Court rejected the idea that "liberty" included "freedom of contract." In Reference re ss 193 and 195.1(1)(c) of the Criminal Code (Man), [\[1990\] 1 SCR 1123, 1990 CanLII 105](#) [Prostitution Reference], for example, Lamer CJ stated (at 1171):

I ... reject the application of the American line of cases that suggest that liberty under the Fourteenth Amendment includes liberty of contract. ... [T]hese cases have a specific historical context, a context that incorporated into the American jurisprudence certain laissez-faire principles that may not have a corresponding application to the interpretation of the Charter in the present day. There is also a significant difference in the wording of s. 7 and the Fourteenth Amendment. The American provision speaks specifically of a protection of property interests while our framers did not choose to similarly protect property rights.

In R v Malmo-Levine; R v Caine, 2003 SCC 74, the accused challenged the provisions of the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act that criminalized the possession of marijuana. He argued that "smoking marihuana is integral to his preferred lifestyle, and that the criminalization of marihuana in both its possession and trafficking aspects is an unacceptable infringement of his personal liberty" (at para 81). The majority held that this argument did not engage the accused's s 7 liberty interest:

[86] While we accept Malmo-Levine's statement that smoking marihuana is central to his lifestyle, the Constitution cannot be stretched to afford protection to whatever activity an individual chooses to define as central to his or her lifestyle. One individual chooses to smoke marihuana; another has an obsessive interest in golf; a third is addicted to gambling. The appellant Caine invokes a taste for fatty foods. A society that extended constitutional protection to any and all such lifestyles would be ungovernable. Lifestyle choices of this order are not, we think, "basic choices going to the core of what it means to enjoy individual dignity and independence" [Godbout v Longueuil (City), [\[1997\] 3 SCR 844, 1997 CanLII 335](#) at para 66].

On the other hand, in R v Heywood, [\[1994\] 3 SCR 761, 1994 CanLII 34](#), Cory J, speaking for the majority, held that the criminal prohibition in question affected the liberty interest because it prevented the accused from visiting places "where the rest of the public is free to roam" (at 789), suggesting that s 7 protects everyone's interest in being able to move freely around Canada. And in the following case, the Court recognized a liberty interest in decisions of "fundamental personal importance."

[A children's aid society obtained an order pursuant to the Ontario Child Welfare Act, RSO 1980, c 66, granting it wardship of a child, which gave the society authority to consent to a blood transfusion on the child's behalf. The child's parents were both devout Jehovah's Witnesses. They challenged the wardship order, arguing that it violated their right to choose medical treatment for their child in accordance with the tenets of their religion, which prohibit blood transfusions. They based their claim on both ss 2(a) and 7 of the Charter. The Supreme Court dismissed the parents' claim for a wide range of reasons. The s 2(a) aspect of the case is discussed in a note in Chapter 19, Section V, "Religious Families, Communities, and Organizations." With respect to the s 7 claim, La Forest J, writing for three members of the Court, found that the parents' right to liberty had been violated, but that fundamental justice had been observed.]

La FOREST J (Gonthier and McLachlin JJ concurring):

... On the one hand, liberty does not mean unconstrained freedom. ... Freedom of the individual to do what he or she wishes must, in any organized society, be subjected to numerous constraints for the common good. The state undoubtedly has the right to impose many types of restraints on individual behaviour, and not all limitations will attract Charter scrutiny. On the other hand, liberty does not mean mere freedom from physical restraint. In a free and democratic society, the individual must be left room for personal autonomy to live his or her own life and to make decisions that are of fundamental personal importance. ...

Where to draw the line between interests and regulatory powers falling within the accepted ambit of state authority will often raise difficulty. But much on either side of the line is clear enough. On that basis, I would have thought it plain that the right to nurture a child, to care for its development, and to make decisions for it in fundamental matters such as medical care, are part of the liberty interest of a parent. ... The common law has long recognized that parents are in the best position to take care of their children and make all the decisions necessary to ensure their well-being. ... Although the philosophy underlying state intervention has changed over time, most contemporary statutes dealing with child protection matters, and in particular the Ontario Act, while focusing on the best interest of the child, favour minimal intervention. In recent years, courts have expressed some reluctance to interfere with parental rights, and state intervention has been tolerated only when necessity was demonstrated. This only serves to confirm that the parental interest in bringing up, nurturing and caring for a child, including medical care and moral upbringing, is an individual interest of fundamental importance to our society.

... This liberty interest is not a parental right tantamount to a right of property in children. (Fortunately, we have distanced ourselves from the ancient juridical conception of children as chattels of their parents.) The state is now actively involved in a number of areas traditionally conceived of as properly belonging to the private sphere. Nonetheless, our society is far from having repudiated the privileged role parents exercise in the upbringing of their children. This role translates into a protected sphere of parental decision-making which is rooted in the presumption that parents should make important decisions affecting their children both because parents are more likely to appreciate the best interests of their children and because the state is ill-equipped to make such decisions itself. Moreover, individuals have a deep personal interest as parents in fostering the growth of their own children. This is not to say that the state cannot intervene when it considers it necessary to safeguard the child's autonomy or health. But such intervention must be justified. In other words, parental decision-making must receive the protection of the Charter in order for state interference to be properly monitored by the courts, and be permitted only when it conforms to the values underlying the Charter.

The respondents also argued that the infant's rights were paramount to those of the appellants and, on that basis alone, state intervention was justified. ... Children undeniably benefit from the Charter, most notably in its protection of their rights to life and to the security of their person. As children are unable to assert these, our society presumes that parents will exercise their freedom of choice in a manner that does not offend the rights of their children. If one considers the multitude of decisions parents make daily, it is clear that in practice, state interference in order to balance the rights of parents and children will arise only in exceptional cases. In fact, we must accept that parents can, at times, make decisions contrary to their children's wishes—and rights—as long as they do not exceed the threshold dictated by public policy, in its broad conception. For instance, it would be difficult to deny that a parent can dictate to his or her child the place where he or she will live, or which school he or she will attend. However, the state can properly intervene in situations where parental conduct falls below the socially acceptable threshold. But in doing so, the state is limiting the constitutional rights of parents rather than vindicating the constitutional rights of children. ...

Once it is decided that the parents have a liberty interest, further balancing of parents' and children's rights should be done in the course of determining whether state interference conforms to the principles of fundamental justice, rather than when defining the scope of the liberty interest. Even assuming that the rights of children can qualify the liberty interest of their parents, that interest exists nonetheless. In the case at bar, the application of the Act deprived the appellants of their right to decide which medical treatment should be administered to their infant. In so doing, the Act has infringed upon the parental "liberty" protected in s. 7 of the Charter. I now propose to determine whether this deprivation was made in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

[Justice La Forest concluded that the general procedure under the Child Welfare Act for granting orders of wardship met the standards of fundamental justice. In coming to this conclusion, he stressed the provisions about notice; the hearing before a judge, at which the parents had ample opportunity to present their concerns and preferences; and the onus on the applicant. Justice L'Heureux-Dubé, dissenting on another issue, agreed with this part of La Forest J's reasons. Justice Sopinka finessed the question of whether there was a violation of life, liberty, and security of the person by reasoning that, whether or not there had been a violation, fundamental justice had been observed. Justices Iacobucci and Major (Cory J concurring) found no violation of the parents' right to liberty under s 7. Taking the position that the child's s 7 rights to life and security of the person had to be considered, they found that an exercise of parental liberty that seriously endangers the survival of the child falls outside s 7. Chief Justice Lamer also found that there was no violation of life, liberty, and security of the person but for different reasons, connected to his view that it was inappropriate to expand the scope of the s 7 liberty interest beyond physical liberty.]

Two years later, in Godbout v Longueuil (City), [1997] 3 SCR 844, 1997 CanLII 335, La Forest J, writing for three members of the Court, held that the decision about where to establish one's home was a decision of fundamental personal importance and that a law interfering with that decision engaged the s 7 liberty interest. He characterized the choice of where to live as "a quintessentially private decision going to the very heart of personal or individual autonomy" (at para 66). But a majority of the Court (Lamer CJ and Cory, Iacobucci, Sopinka, Major, and Gonthier JJ) held that the law in issue unjustifiably violated the Quebec Charter, and thus that there was no need to consider the application of s 7 of the Canadian Charter.

In Blencoe v British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), 2000 SCC 44, the applicant sought a stay on both common law and Charter grounds of a human rights inquiry into sexual harassment allegations against him. Bastarache J, writing for a majority of the Court, held that the inquiry in itself did not affect Blencoe's liberty interest in the sense of interfering with a decision of fundamental personal importance:

[86] Few interests are as compelling as, and basic to individual autonomy than, a woman's choice to terminate her pregnancy, an individual's decision to terminate his or her life, the right to raise one's children, and [as in R v O'Connor, [1995] 4 SCR 411, 1995 CanLII 51] the ability of sexual assault victims to seek therapy without fear of their private records being disclosed. Such interests are indeed basic to individual dignity. But the alleged right to be free from stigma associated with a human rights complaint does not fall within this narrow sphere. The state has not interfered with the respondent's right to make decisions that affect his fundamental being. The prejudice to the respondent in this case, as recognized by Lowry J, at para. 10, is essentially confined to his personal hardship. He is not "employable" as a politician, he and his family have moved residences twice, his financial resources are depleted, and he has suffered physically and psychologically. However, the state has not interfered with the respondent and his family's ability to make essential life choices. To accept that the prejudice suffered by the respondent in this case amounts to state interference with his security of the person would be to stretch the meaning of this right.

Why is the Court so reluctant to give an expansive meaning to the word "liberty" in s 7? Is it true that society would be "ungovernable" under a broader interpretation of "liberty"?

3. Security of the Person

Generally speaking, the s 7 interest in security of the person is engaged by state interferences with bodily integrity and severe state-imposed psychological stress. State interference with bodily integrity can occur in many ways. Generally speaking, whenever the state uses force against a person's body, s 7 will be engaged: see, for example, R v SA (B), 2003 SCC 60 (taking bodily samples for forensic DNA analysis); R v Nasogaluak, 2010 SCC 6 (use of force to carry out an arrest); AC Manitoba (Director of Child and Family Services), 2009 SCC 30 (state-imposed medical treatment). Further examples of statutes that affect bodily integrity are illustrated by the cases excerpted in Section II, below.

To what extent is the s 7 right of a child engaged by the right of parents and teachers to use force by way of correction against the child (see s 43 of the Criminal Code, RSC 1985, c C-46), given that adults are not in general subject to corrective force? Should this distinction between adults and children be treated as a question of equality rights under s 15 of the Charter instead of, or as well as, an issue of security of the person? See Canadian Foundation for Children, Youth and the Law v Canada (AG), 2004 SCC 4.

The Supreme Court of Canada has considered state-imposed psychological stress in a number of cases. In New Brunswick (Minister of Health and Community Services) v G (J), [\[1999\] 3 SCR 46, 1999 CanLII 653](#), the issue was whether indigent parents have a constitutional right to be provided with state-funded counsel when the state seeks a judicial order suspending such parents' custody of their children pursuant to child welfare legislation. The decision not to provide the appellant with legal aid was made pursuant to a policy in force at the time of her application that stipulated that no legal aid certificates would be issued to respondents in custody applications made by the Minister of Health and Community Services. The Court held that the failure to provide the appellant with legal aid violated her right to security of the person and was not justifiable under s 1 of the Charter. Chief Justice Lamer, for the majority, said:

[59] Delineating the boundaries protecting the individual's psychological integrity from state interference is an inexact science. Dickson C.J. in [R v Morgentaler, [1988] 1 SCR 30, 1990 CanLII 90], at p. 56, suggested that security of the person would be restricted through serious state-imposed psychological stress (emphasis added). Dickson C.J. was trying to convey something qualitative about the type of state interference that would rise to the level of an infringement of this right. It is clear that the right to security of the person does not protect the individual from the ordinary stresses and anxieties that a person of reasonable sensibility would suffer as a result of government action. If the right were interpreted with such broad sweep, countless government initiatives could be challenged on the ground that they infringe the right to security of the person, massively expanding the scope of judicial review, and, in the process, trivializing what it means for a right to be constitutionally protected. Nor will every violation of a fundamental freedom guaranteed in s. 2 of the Charter amount to a restriction of security of the person. I do not believe it can be seriously argued that a law prohibiting certain kinds of commercial expression in violation of s. 2(b), for example, will necessarily result in a violation of the psychological integrity of the person. This is not to say, though, that there will never be cases where a violation of s. 2 will also deprive an individual of security of the person.

[60] For a restriction of security of the person to be made out, then, the impugned state action must have a serious and profound effect on a person's psychological integrity. The effects of the state interference must be assessed objectively, with a view to their impact on the psychological integrity of a person of reasonable sensibility. This need not rise to the level of nervous shock or psychiatric illness, but must be greater than ordinary stress or anxiety.

[61] I have little doubt that state removal of a child from parental custody pursuant to the state's parens patriae jurisdiction constitutes a serious interference with the psychological integrity of the parent. The parental interest in raising and caring for a child is, as La Forest J. held in [B (R) v Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto, [1995] 1 SCR 315, 1995 CanLII 115], at para. 83, "an individual interest of fundamental importance in our society." Besides the obvious distress arising from the loss of companionship of the child, direct state interference with the parent-child relationship, through a procedure in which the relationship is subject to state inspection and review, is a gross intrusion into a private and intimate sphere. Further, the parent is often stigmatized as "unfit" when relieved of custody. As an individual's status as a parent is often fundamental to personal identity, the stigma and distress resulting from a loss of parental status is a particularly serious consequence of the state's conduct.

[63] Not every state action which interferes with the parent-child relationship will restrict a parent's right to security of the person. For example, a parent's security of the person is not restricted when, without more, his or her child is sentenced to jail or conscripted into the army. Nor is it restricted when the child is negligently shot and killed by a police officer: see Augustus v. Gosset, [1996] 3 S.C.R. 268.

[64] While the parent may suffer significant stress and anxiety as a result of the interference with the relationship occasioned by these actions, the quality of the injury to the parent is distinguishable from that in the present case. In the aforementioned examples, the state is making no pronouncement as to the parent's fitness or parental status, nor is it usurping the parental role or prying into the intimacies of the relationship. In short, the state is not directly interfering with the psychological integrity of the parent qua parent. The different effect on the psychological integrity of the parent in the above examples leads me to the conclusion that no constitutional rights of the parent are engaged.

In Blencoe v British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), 2000 SCC 44, which has been discussed above with respect to the "liberty" interest under s 7, a minister in the government of British Columbia was the subject of allegations of sexual harassment, which led to complaints of sex discrimination before the BC Human Rights Commission. Following the allegations, Blencoe suffered from severe depression. He did not stand for re-election and considered himself "unemployable" because of the outstanding complaints. He commenced judicial review proceedings to stay the complaints on several grounds, including unreasonable delay. A majority of the BC Court of Appeal held that his rights under s 7 of the Charter were violated by the delay and ordered a stay of proceedings. The commission appealed. The Supreme Court of Canada, per Bastarache J, allowed the appeal on the basis that the harm to Blencoe was neither "state-imposed," because it occurred before the commencement of proceedings before the commission, nor, in Bastarache J's words, "seriously exacerbated by the delays" (at para 71). The following except from Bastarache J's reasons address the seriousness of the threat posed to the respondent's psychological integrity:

[96] I do not doubt that parties in human rights sex discrimination proceedings experience some level of stress and disruption of their lives as a consequence of allegations of complainants. Even accepting that the stress and anxiety experienced by the respondent in this case was linked to delays in the proceedings, I cannot conclude that the scope of his security of the person protected by s. 7 of the Charter covers such emotional effects nor that they can be equated with the kind of stigma contemplated in [Mills v The Queen, [1986] 1 SCR 863, 1986 CanLII 17], of an overlong and vexatious pending criminal trial or in [New Brunswick (Minister of Health and Community Services) v G (J), [1999] 3 SCR 46, 1999 CanLII 653], where the state sought to remove a child from his or her parents. If the purpose of the impugned proceedings is to provide a vehicle or act as an arbiter for redressing private rights, some amount of stress and stigma attached to the proceedings must be accepted. This will also be the case when dealing with the regulation of a business, profession, or other activity. A civil suit involving fraud, defamation or the tort of sexual battery will also be "stigmatizing." The Commission's investigations are not public, the respondent is asked to provide his version of events, and communication goes back and forth. While the respondent may be vilified by the press, there is no "stigmatizing" state pronouncement as to his "fitness" that would carry with it serious consequences such as those in G. (J.). There is thus no constitutional right or freedom against such stigma protected by the s. 7 rights to "liberty" or "security of the person."

NOTE: CAUSAL CONNECTION

As noted at the outset of this section, the Charter applicant must show that state action has negatively affected the interests protected by s 7; in other words, there must be a causal connection between the state action and the effect on the applicant's life, liberty, or security of the person. In Canada (AG) v Bedford, 2013 SCC 72 (excerpted in detail in Section II), McLachlin CJ expressed the required standard of causation as follows:

[74] Three possible standards for causation are raised for our consideration: (1) "sufficient causal connection," adopted by the application judge ... ; (2) a general "impact" approach, adopted by the Court of Appeal ... ; and (3) "active and foreseeable" and "direct" causal connection, urged by the appellant Attorneys General

[75] I conclude that the "sufficient causal connection" standard should prevail. This is a flexible standard, which allows the circumstances of each particular case to be taken into account.

Although a "sufficient causal connection" is often easy to show (as in a criminal prosecution), the government has sometimes argued that the effects on the applicant's s 7 interests were caused by some other factor, such as the actions of a third party, a natural force, or the applicant's own personal choice. An argument of this kind was accepted in Blencoe, above, but failed in Canada (AG) v PHS Community Services Society, 2011 SCC 44 [PHS]; Bedford; and Rodriguez v British Columbia (AG), [\[1993\] 3 SCR 519, 1993 CanLII 75](#) all excerpted below.

C. THE PRINCIPLES OF FUNDAMENTAL JUSTICE

If a law or other state action affects a person's life, liberty, or security of the person, the person's s 7 right will be infringed only if the state action is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. The Charter does not define or list these principles, so it has been left to the courts to develop them. Although the principles of fundamental justice certainly include principles of procedural fairness, as we've seen, in the Motor Vehicle Reference, the Supreme Court of Canada held that they also include principles of substantive justice. Since then, the Court has developed a three-part test for determining whether a proposed principle is a principle of fundamental justice for s 7 purposes, originally outlined in Rodriguez, excerpted below. In R v Malmo-Levine; R v Caine, 2003 SCC 74, the majority summarized this test as follows:

[112] In Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act ... , Lamer J. (as he then was) explained that the principles of fundamental justice lie in "the basic tenets of our legal system. They do not lie in the realm of general public policy but in the inherent domain of the judiciary as guardian of the justice system" (p. 503). This Court provided further guidance as to what constitutes a principle of fundamental justice for the purposes of s. 7, in [Rodriguez v British Columbia (AG), [1993] 3 SCR 519, 1993 CanLII 75] per Sopinka J. (at pp. 590-91 and 607):

A mere common law rule does not suffice to constitute a principle of fundamental justice, rather, as the term implies, principles upon which there is some consensus that they are vital or fundamental to our societal notion of justice are required. Principles of fundamental justice must not, however, be so broad as to be no more than vague generalizations about what our society considers to be ethical or moral. They must be capable of being identified with some precision and applied to situations in a manner which yields an understandable result. They must also, in my view, be legal principles.

While the principles of fundamental justice are concerned with more than process, reference must be made to principles which are "fundamental" in the sense that they would have general acceptance among reasonable people. [Emphasis added.]

[113] The requirement of "general acceptance among reasonable people" enhances the legitimacy of judicial review of state action, and ensures that the values against which state action is measured are not just fundamental "in the eye of the beholder only": Rodriguez, at pp. 607 and 590 (emphasis in original). In short, for a rule or principle to constitute a principle of fundamental justice for the purposes of s. 7, it must be a legal principle about which there is significant societal consensus that it is fundamental to the way in which the legal system ought fairly to operate, and it must be identified with sufficient precision to yield a manageable standard against which to measure deprivations of life, liberty or security of the person.

On this standard, the Court held that the "harm principle"—the principle that conduct should not be criminalized unless it is harmful to others—satisfied none of the three criteria and was therefore not a principle of fundamental justice.

The Court has, however, recognized many other principles of fundamental justice, both procedural and substantive. For a description of these principles, see Hamish Stewart, Fundamental Justice, 2nd ed (Toronto: Irwin Law, 2019) chs 3, 4. Three related ideas have been of particular importance in recent constitutional litigation. Considered in relation to its own objectives, a law:

1. should not be arbitrary,
2. should not be overbroad, and
3. should not have a grossly disproportionate effect on the s 7 interests.

These three principles of fundamental justice—the norms against arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality—are described in more detail in the cases excerpted in Sections II and III. The relationship between these norms and s 1 of the Charter is briefly discussed in Section IV.

II. SECTION 7 AND BODILY INTEGRITY

The cases in this section are central to the s 7 jurisprudence of the Supreme Court of Canada. All involve criminal prohibitions that affect the bodily integrity of individuals. The cases are presented in chronological order so that you can follow the ongoing development of s 7. When reading these cases, consider how the claimant's bodily integrity engaged s 7 of the Charter, which principles of fundamental justice were invoked, and why these principles were or were not violated.

R v Morgentaler

[Section 251(1) of the Criminal Code provided that anyone who took steps to cause an abortion was guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life. Section 251(2) provided that a pregnant woman who sought to cause her own abortion was guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for two years. Section 251(4) created an exception to s 251(1) for abortions performed in an accredited or approved hospital ... if ... the therapeutic abortion committee for that ... hospital ... has by certificate in writing stated that in its opinion the continuation of the pregnancy ... would or would be likely to endanger her life or health, and if the abortion was performed by "a qualified medical practitioner who was not a member of the committee." (The reference to "an accredited or approved hospital" was to hospitals that had been approved by a provincial minister of health for the purpose of performing abortions and accredited by the Canadian Council on Hospital Accreditation.) The prohibition in s 251(1) had been in the Code since the late 19th century. The exception in s 251(4) was enacted in 1969.

Dr Morgentaler and two colleagues established and operated an abortion clinic in Toronto. Every abortion performed at their clinic violated s 251(1) because the clinic was not an approved or accredited hospital and therefore had no therapeutic abortion committee to issue certificates. Morgentaler and his colleagues were charged with conspiring to commit an offence under s 251(1). Before trial, they moved to quash the indictment on the basis that s 251(1) was unconstitutional, and in particular that it violated s 7 of the Charter. The trial judge dismissed the motion, and the case proceeded to trial. The jury acquitted Morgentaler and his colleagues. The Ontario Court of Appeal allowed the Crown's appeal from the acquittal and ordered a new trial. Morgentaler and his colleagues appealed to the Supreme Court.]

DICKSON CJ (Lamer J concurring):

B. Security of the Person

The law has long recognized that the human body ought to be protected from interference by others. At common law, for example, any medical procedure carried out on a person without that person's consent is an assault. Only in emergency circumstances does the law allow others to make decisions of this nature. Similarly, art. 19 of the Civil Code of Lower Canada provides that "The human person is inviolable" and that "No person may cause harm to the person of another without his consent or without being authorized by law to do so." "Security of the person," in other words, is not a value alien to our legal landscape. With the advent of the Charter, security of the person has been elevated to the status of a constitutional norm. This is not to say that the various forms of protection accorded to the human body by the common and civil law occupy a similar status. "Security of the person" must be given content in a manner sensitive to its constitutional position. The above examples are simply illustrative of our respect for individual physical integrity. (See R. Macdonald, "Procedural Due Process in Canadian Constitutional Law" (1987), 39 U. Fla. L. Rev. 217 (1987), at p. 248.) Nor is it to say that the state can never impair personal security interests. There may well be valid reasons for interfering with security of the person. It is to say, however, that if the state does interfere with security of the person, the Charter requires such interference to conform with the principles of fundamental justice.

The appellants submitted that the "security of the person" protected by the Charter is an explicit right to control one's body and to make fundamental decisions about one's life. The Crown contended that "security of the person" is a more circumscribed interest and that, like all of the elements of s. 7, it at most relates to the concept of physical control, simply protecting the individual's interest in his or her bodily integrity.

[Chief Justice Dickson then reviewed case law interpreting ss 10 and 11 of the Charter to include protection against serious state-imposed psychological stress and psychological compulsion.]

It may well be that constitutional protection of the above interests is specific to, and is only triggered by, the invocation of our system of criminal justice. It must not be forgotten, however, that s. 251 of the Code, subject to subs. (4), makes it an indictable offence for a person to procure the miscarriage and provides a maximum sentence of two years in the case of the woman herself, and a maximum sentence of life imprisonment in the cases of another person. Like Justice Beetz, I do not find it necessary to decide how s. 7 would apply in other cases.

The case law leads me to the conclusion that state interference with bodily integrity and serious state-imposed psychological stress, at least in the criminal law context, constitute a breach of security of the person. It is not necessary in this case to determine whether the right extends further, to protect either interests central to personal autonomy, such as a right to privacy, or interests unrelated to criminal justice.

I wish to reiterate that finding a violation of security of the person does not end the s. 7 inquiry. Parliament could choose to infringe security of the person if it did so in a manner consistent with the principles of fundamental justice. The present discussion should therefore be seen as a threshold inquiry and the conclusions do not dispose definitively of all the issues relevant to s. 7. With that caution, I have no difficulty in concluding that the encyclopedic factual submissions addressed to us by counsel in the present appeal establish beyond any doubt that s. 251 of the Criminal Code is prima facie a violation of the security of the person of thousands of Canadian women who have made the difficult decision that they do not wish to continue with a pregnancy.

At the most basic, physical and emotional level, every pregnant woman is told by the section that she cannot submit to a generally safe medical procedure that might be of clear benefit to her unless she meets criteria entirely unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations. Not only does the removal of decision-making power threaten women in a physical sense; the indecision of knowing whether an abortion will be granted inflicts emotional stress. Section 251 clearly interferes with a woman's bodily integrity in both a physical and emotional sense. Forcing a woman, by threat of criminal sanction, to carry a foetus to term unless she meets certain criteria unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations, is a profound interference with a woman's body and thus a violation of security of the person. Section 251, therefore, is required by the Charter to comport with the principles of fundamental justice.

Although this interference with physical and emotional integrity is sufficient in itself to trigger a review of s. 251 against the principles of fundamental justice, the operation of the decision-making mechanism set out in s. 251 creates additional glaring breaches of security of the person. The evidence indicates that s. 251 causes a certain amount of delay for women who are successful in meeting its criteria. In the context of abortion, any unnecessary delay can have profound consequences on the woman's physical and emotional well-being.

[Chief Justice Dickson then reviewed evidence about the relationship between delay in access to abortion and health risks.]

It is no doubt true that the overall complication and mortality rates for women who undergo abortions are very low, but the increasing risks caused by delay are so clearly established that I have no difficulty in concluding that the delay in obtaining therapeutic abortions caused by the mandatory procedures of s. 251 is an infringement of the purely physical aspect of the individual's right to security of the person. I should stress that the marked contrast between the relative speed with which abortions can be obtained at the government-sponsored community clinics in Quebec and in hospitals under the s. 251 procedure was established at trial. The evidence indicated that at the government-sponsored clinics in Quebec, the maximum delay was less than a week. One must conclude, and perhaps underline, that the delay experienced by many women seeking a therapeutic abortion, be it of one, two, four, or six weeks' duration, is caused in large measure by the requirements of s. 251 itself.

The above physical interference caused by the delays created by s. 251, involving a clear risk of damage to the physical well-being of a woman, is sufficient, in my view, to warrant inquiring whether s. 251 comports with the principles of fundamental justice. However, there is yet another infringement of security of the person. It is clear from the evidence that s. 251 harms the psychological integrity of women seeking abortions. A 1985 report of the Canadian Medical Association, discussed in the Powell Report [Report on Therapeutic Abortion Services in Ontario (Toronto: Ontario Ministry of Health, 1987)], at p. 15, emphasized that the procedure involved in s. 251, with the concomitant delays, greatly increases the stress levels of patients and that this can lead to more physical complications associated with abortion.

In summary, s. 251 is a law which forces women to carry a foetus to term contrary to their own priorities and aspirations and which imposes serious delay causing increased physical and psychological trauma to those women who meet its criteria. It must, therefore, be determined whether that infringement is accomplished in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice, thereby saving s. 251 under the second part of s. 7.

C. The Principles of Fundamental Justice

[After describing s 251, Dickson CJ considered its practical operation. He relied heavily on Canada, The Report of the Committee on the Operation of the Abortion Law (Ottawa: Ministry of Supply and Services, 1977) (Chair: Robin Badgley) (the Badgley report), made by a committee established by the federal government to determine whether the abortion provisions were operating "equitably." The report demonstrated that the "procedural and administrative requirements" had created substantial inconsistencies and obstacles that greatly limited the number of hospitals performing abortions. Section 251(4) implicitly required at least three doctors for a committee, and because none of them could perform the abortion, a fourth was needed. Only about 75 percent of the hospitals in Canada met this minimum requirement. As well, the accreditation requirement excluded about 60 percent, and only about 50 percent of the remainder had chosen to establish a committee. The combined effect of these constraints was that in 1976 only about 20 percent of the hospitals in Canada performed abortions, and the provinces could, by regulation, impose even more restrictive requirements for approval, and even eliminate the exception provided in s 251(4).]

A further flaw with the administrative system established in s. 251(4) is the failure to provide an adequate standard for therapeutic abortion committees which must determine when a therapeutic abortion should, as a matter of law, be granted. Sub-section (4) states simply that a therapeutic abortion committee may grant a certificate when it determines that a continuation of a pregnancy would be likely to endanger the "life or health" of the pregnant woman. It was noted above that "health" is not defined for the purposes of the section. The Crown admitted in its supplementary factum that the medical witnesses at trial testified uniformly that the health standard was ambiguous, but the Crown derives comfort from the fact that "the medical witnesses were unanimous in their approval of the broad World Health Organization definition of health." The World Health Organization defines "health" not merely as the absence of disease or infirmity, but as a state of physical, mental and social well-being.

Various expert doctors testified at trial that therapeutic abortion committees apply widely differing definitions of health. For some committees, psychological health is a justification for therapeutic abortion; for others it is not. Some committees routinely refuse abortions to married women unless they are in physical danger, while for other committees it is possible for a married woman to show that she would suffer psychological harm if she continued with a pregnancy, thereby justifying an abortion. It is not typically possible for women to know in advance what standards of health will be applied by any given committee. ...

It is no answer to say that "health" is a medical term and that doctors who sit on therapeutic abortion committees must simply exercise their professional judgment. A therapeutic abortion committee is a strange hybrid, part medical committee and part legal committee. ...

When the decision of the therapeutic abortion committee is so directly laden with consequences, the absence of any clear legal standard to be applied by the committee in reaching its decision is a serious procedural flaw.

The combined effect of all of these problems with the procedure stipulated in s. 251 for access to therapeutic abortions is a failure to comply with the principles of fundamental justice. In Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, [[1985] 2 SCR 486, 1985 CanLII 81] Lamer J. held, at p. 503, that "the principles of fundamental justice are to be found in the basic tenets of our legal system." One of the basic tenets of our system of criminal justice is that when Parliament creates a defence to a criminal charge, the defence should not be illusory or so difficult to attain as to be practically illusory. The criminal law is a very special form of governmental regulation, for it seeks to express our society's collective disapprobation of certain acts and omissions. When a defence is provided, especially a specifically-tailored defence to a particular charge, it is because the legislator has determined that the disapprobation of society is not warranted when the conditions of the defence are met.

Consider then the case of a pregnant married woman who wishes to apply for a therapeutic abortion certificate because she fears that her psychological health would be impaired seriously if she carried the foetus to term. The uncontested evidence reveals that there are many areas in Canada where such a woman would simply not have access to a therapeutic abortion. She may live in an area where no hospital has four doctors; no therapeutic abortion committee can be created. Equally, she may live in a place where the treatment functions of the nearby hospitals do not satisfy the definition of "accredited hospital" in s. 251(6). Or she may live in a province where the provincial government has imposed such stringent requirements on hospitals seeking to create therapeutic abortion committees that no hospital can qualify. Alternatively, our hypothetical woman may confront a therapeutic abortion committee in her local hospital which defines "health" in purely physical terms or which refuses to countenance abortions for married women. In each of these cases, it is the administrative structures and procedures established by s. 251 itself that would in practice prevent the woman from gaining the benefit of the defence held out to her in s. 251(4).

[The Crown argued that women could travel to hospitals that performed abortions, but Dickson CJ held that the enormous emotional and financial burden of travelling was itself an obstacle, and one created by the Code. As well, some hospitals imposed geographic limitations.]

... Parliament must be given room to design an appropriate administrative and procedural structure for bringing into operation a particular defence to criminal liability. But if that structure is "so manifestly unfair, having regard to the decisions it is called upon to make, as to violate the principles of fundamental justice," that structure must be struck down. In the present case, the structure [of] the system regulating access to therapeutic abortions is manifestly unfair. It contains so many potential barriers to its own operation that the defence it creates will in many circumstances be practically unavailable to women who would prima facie qualify for the defence, or at least would force such women to travel great distances at substantial expense and inconvenience in order to benefit from a defence that is held out to be generally available.

I conclude that the procedures created in s. 251 of the Criminal Code for obtaining a therapeutic abortion do not comport with the principles of fundamental justice. It is not necessary to determine whether s. 7 also contains a substantive content leading to the conclusion that, in some circumstances at least, the deprivation of a pregnant woman's right to security of the person can never comport with fundamental justice. Simply put, assuming Parliament can act, it must do so properly. For the reasons given earlier, the deprivation of security of the person caused by s. 251 as a whole is not in accordance with the second clause of s. 7. ...

[Chief Justice Dickson held further that s 251 could not be justified under s 1 of the Charter.]

... The procedures established to implement the policy of s. 251 impair s. 7 rights far more than is necessary because they hold out an illusory defence to many women who would prima facie qualify under the exculpatory provisions of s. 251(4). In other words, many women whom Parliament professes not to wish to subject to criminal liability will nevertheless be forced by the practical unavailability of the supposed defence to risk liability or to suffer other harm such as a traumatic late abortion caused by the delay inherent in the s. 251 system. Finally, the effects of the limitation upon the s. 7 rights of many pregnant women are out of proportion to the objective sought to be achieved. Indeed, to the extent that s. 251(4) is designed to protect the life and health of women, the procedures it establishes may actually defeat that objective. The administrative structures of s. 251(4) are so cumbersome that women whose health is endangered by pregnancy may not be able to gain a therapeutic abortion, at least without great trauma, expense and inconvenience.

BEETZ J (Estey J concurring):

[Justice Beetz held that the primary purpose of s 251 was "the protection of the foetus."]

If a rule of criminal law precludes a person from obtaining appropriate medical treatment when his or her life or health is in danger, then the state has intervened and this intervention constitutes a violation of that man's or that woman's security of the person. "Security of the person" must include a right of access to medical treatment for a condition representing a danger to life or health without fear of criminal sanction. If an act of Parliament forces a person whose life or health is in danger to choose between, on the one hand, the commission of a crime to obtain effective and timely medical treatment and, on the other hand, inadequate treatment or no treatment at all, the right to security of the person has been violated.

This interpretation of s. 7 of the Charter is sufficient to measure the content of s. 251 of the Criminal Code against that of the Charter in order to dispose of this appeal. While I agree with McIntyre J. that a breach of a right to security must be "based upon an infringement of some interest which would be of such nature and such importance as to warrant constitutional protection," I am of the view that the protection of life or health is an interest of sufficient importance in this regard. Under the Criminal Code, the only way in which a pregnant woman can legally secure an abortion when the continuation of the pregnancy would or would be likely to endanger her life or health is to comply with the procedure set forth in s. 251(4). Where the continued pregnancy does constitute a danger to life or health, the pregnant woman faces a choice: (1) she can endeavour to follow the s. 251(4) procedure, which, as we shall see, creates an additional medical risk given its inherent delays and the possibility that the danger will not be recognized by the state-imposed therapeutic abortion committee; or (2) she can secure medical treatment without respecting s. 251(4) and subject herself to criminal sanction under s. 251(2).

The evidence reveals that the actual workings of s. 251(4) are the source of certain delays which create an additional medical risk for many pregnant women whose medical condition already meets the standard of s. 251(4)(c). Stated simply, when pregnant women suffer from a condition which represents a danger to their life or health, their efforts to conform to the procedure set forth for obtaining lawful abortions in the Criminal Code often create an additional risk to their health. They may have to choose between bearing the burden of these risks by accepting delayed medical treatment, and committing a crime by seeking timely medical treatment outside s. 251(4). Given that the procedure in s. 251(4) is the source of this additional risk, it constitutes a violation of the pregnant woman's security of the person. ...

While only administrative inefficiencies that are caused by the rules in s. 251 are relevant to the evaluation of the constitutionality of the legislation under s. 7 of the Charter, the evidence which relates to the availability of therapeutic abortions under the Criminal Code reveals three sorts of delay, all of which can be traced to the requirements of s. 251 itself: (1) the absence of hospitals with therapeutic abortion committees in many parts of Canada; (2) the quotas which some hospitals with committees impose on the number of therapeutic abortions which they perform; and (3) the committee requirement itself each create delays for pregnant women who seek timely and effective medical treatment.

The delays which a pregnant woman may have to suffer as a result of the requirements of s. 251(4) must undermine the security of her person in order that there be a violation of this element of s. 7 of the Charter. As I said earlier, s. 7 cannot be invoked simply because a woman's pregnancy amounts to a medically dangerous condition. If, however, the delays occasioned by s. 251(4) of the Criminal Code result in an additional danger to the pregnant woman's health, then the state has intervened and this intervention constitutes a violation of that woman's security of the person. By creating this additional risk, s. 251 prevents access to effective and timely medical treatment for the continued pregnancy which would or would be likely to endanger her life or health. If an effective and timely therapeutic abortion may only be obtained by committing a crime, then s. 251 violates the pregnant woman's right to security of the person.

The evidence reveals that the delays caused by s. 251(4) result in at least three broad types of additional medical risks. The risk of post-operative complications increases with delay. Secondly, there is a risk that the pregnant woman requires a more dangerous means of procuring a miscarriage because of the delay. Finally, since a pregnant woman knows her life or health is in danger, the delay created by the s. 251(4) procedure may result in an additional psychological trauma. ...

I turn now to a consideration of the manner in which pregnant women are deprived of their right to security of the person by s. 251. Section 7 of the Charter states that everyone has the right not to be deprived of security of the person except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. As I will endeavour to demonstrate, s. 251(4) does not accord with the principles of fundamental justice.

[Justice Beetz found that the standard expressed in s 251 was not so imprecise as to violate the principles of fundamental justice. He then went on to examine the administrative structure under s 251.]

In R. v. Jones, [1986] 2 S.C.R. 284, at p. 304, La Forest J. explained that the legislator must be accorded a certain latitude to make choices regarding the type of administrative structure that will suit its needs unless the use of such structure is in itself "so manifestly unfair, having regard to the decisions it is called upon to make [emphasis added], as to violate the principles of fundamental justice." An administrative structure made up of unnecessary rules, which result in an additional risk to the health of pregnant women, is manifestly unfair and does not conform to the principles of fundamental justice. Section 251(4), taken as a whole, does not accord with the principles of fundamental justice in that certain of the procedural requirements of s. 251 create unnecessary delays. As will be seen, some of these requirements are manifestly unfair because they have no connection whatsoever with Parliament's objectives in establishing the administrative structure in s. 251(4). Although connected to Parliament's objectives, other rules in s. 251(4) are manifestly unfair because they are not necessary to assure that the objectives are met.

Parliament is justified in requiring a reliable, independent and medically sound opinion in order to protect the state interest in the foetus. This is undoubtedly the objective of a rule which requires an independent verification of the practising physician's opinion that the life or health of the pregnant woman is in danger. It cannot be said to be simply a mechanism designed to protect the health of the pregnant woman. While this latter objective clearly explains the requirement that the practising physician be a "qualified medical practitioner" and that the abortion take place in a safe place, it cannot explain the necessary intercession of an in-hospital committee of three physicians from which is excluded the practising physician.

While a second medical opinion is very often seen as necessary in medical circles when difficult questions as to a patient's life or health are at issue, the independent opinion called for by the Criminal Code has a different purpose. Parliament requires this independent opinion because it is not only the woman's interest that is at stake in a decision to authorize an abortion. The Ontario Court of Appeal alluded to this at p. 378 when it stated that "[o]ne cannot overlook the fact that the situation respecting a woman's right to control her own person becomes more complex when she becomes pregnant, and that some statutory control may be appropriate." The presence of the foetus accounts for this complexity. By requiring an independent medical opinion that the pregnant woman's life or health is in fact endangered, Parliament seeks to ensure that, in any given case, only therapeutic reasons will justify the decision to abort. The amendments to the Criminal Code in 1969 amounted to a recognition by Parliament, as I have said, that the interest in the life or health of the pregnant woman takes precedence over the interest of the state in the protection of the foetus when the continuation of the pregnancy would or would be likely to endanger the pregnant woman's life or health. Parliament decided that it was necessary to ascertain this from a medical point of view before the law would allow the interest of the pregnant woman to indeed take precedence over that of the foetus and permit an abortion to be performed without criminal sanction.

I do not believe it to be unreasonable to seek independent medical confirmation of the threat to the woman's life or health when such an important and distinct interest hangs in the balance. ...

The assertion that an independent medical opinion, distinct from that of the pregnant woman and her practising physician, does not offend the principles of fundamental justice would need to be reevaluated if a right of access to abortion is founded upon the right to "liberty" in s. 7 of the Charter. I am of the view that there would still be circumstances in which the state interest in the protection of the foetus would require an independent medical opinion as to the danger to the life or health of the pregnant woman. Assuming without deciding that a right of access to abortion can be founded upon the right to "liberty," there would be a point in time at which the state interest in the foetus would become compelling. From this point in time, Parliament would be entitled to limit abortions to those required by therapeutic reasons and therefore require an independent opinion as to the health exception. ...

Some delay is inevitable in connection with any system which purports to limit to therapeutic reasons the grounds upon which an abortion can be performed lawfully. Any statutory mechanism for ensuring an independent confirmation as to the state of the woman's life or health, adopted pursuant to the objective of assuring the protection of the foetus, will inevitably result in a delay which would exceed whatever delay would be encountered if an independent opinion was not required. Furthermore, rules promoting the safety of abortions designed to protect the interest of the pregnant woman will also cause some unavoidable delay. It is only insofar as the administrative structure creates delays which are unnecessary that the structure can be considered to violate the principles of fundamental justice. ...

[Justice Beetz went on to find that the requirement that abortions be performed in hospitals, the power to appoint a committee of more than three members, and the exclusion of doctors who performed therapeutic abortions from those committees were all unnecessary and consequently manifestly unfair, thus violating the principles of fundamental justice. He conducted a detailed s 1 analysis and concluded that s 251 could not be saved because, being unnecessary to achieve Parliament's objective of protecting the foetus, it was not rationally connected to that objective.]

WILSON J:

At the heart of this appeal is the question whether a pregnant woman can, as a constitutional matter, be compelled by law to carry the foetus to term. The legislature has proceeded on the basis that she can be so compelled and, indeed, has made it a criminal offence punishable by imprisonment under s. 251 of the Criminal Code for her or her physician to terminate the pregnancy unless the procedural requirements of the section are complied with.

My colleagues, the Chief Justice and Justice Beetz, have attacked those requirements in reasons which I have had the privilege of reading. They have found that the requirements do not comport with the principles of fundamental justice in the procedural sense and have concluded that, since they cannot be severed from the provisions creating the substantive offence, the whole of s. 251 must fall.

With all due respect, I think that the Court must tackle the primary issue first. A consideration as to whether or not the procedural requirements for obtaining or performing an abortion comport with fundamental justice is purely academic if such requirements cannot as a constitutional matter be imposed at all. If a pregnant woman cannot, as a constitutional matter, be compelled by law to carry the foetus to term against her will, a review of the procedural requirements by which she may be compelled to do so seems pointless. Moreover, it would, in my opinion, be an exercise in futility for the legislature to expend its time and energy in attempting to remedy the defects in the procedural requirements unless it has some assurance that this process will, at the end of the day, result in the creation of a valid criminal offence. I turn, therefore, to what I believe is the central issue that must be addressed.

1. The Right of Access to Abortion

It seems to me ... that to commence the analysis with the premise that the s. 7 right encompasses only a right to physical and psychological security and to fail to deal with the right to liberty in the context of "life, liberty and security of the person" begs the central issue in the case. If either the right to liberty or the right to security of the person or a combination of both confers on the pregnant woman the right to decide for herself (with the guidance of her physician) whether or not to have an abortion, then we have to examine the legislative scheme not only from the point of view of fundamental justice in the procedural sense but in the substantive sense as well. I think, therefore, that we must answer the question: what is meant by the right to liberty in the context of the abortion issue? Does it ... give the pregnant woman control over decisions affecting her own body? If not, does her right to security of the person give her such control? I turn first to the right to liberty.

The Charter is predicated on a particular conception of the place of the individual in society. An individual is not a totally independent entity disconnected from the society in which he or she lives. Neither, however, is the individual a mere cog in an impersonal machine in which his or her values, goals and aspirations are subordinated to those of the collectivity. The individual is a bit of both. The Charter reflects this reality by leaving a wide range of activities and decisions open to legitimate government control while at the same time placing limits on the proper scope of that control. Thus, the rights guaranteed in the Charter erect around each individual, metaphorically speaking, an invisible fence over which the state will not be allowed to trespass. The role of the courts is to map out, piece by piece, the parameters of the fence.

The Charter and the right to individual liberty guaranteed under it are inextricably tied to the concept of human dignity. ...

The idea of human dignity finds expression in almost every right and freedom guaranteed in the Charter. Individuals are afforded the right to choose their own religion and their own philosophy of life, the right to choose with whom they will associate and how they will express themselves, the right to choose where they will live and what occupation they will pursue. These are all examples of the basic theory underlying the Charter, namely that the state will respect choices made by individuals and, to the greatest extent possible, will avoid subordinating these choices to any one conception of the good life.

Thus, an aspect of the respect for human dignity on which the Charter is founded is the right to make fundamental personal decisions without interference from the state. This right is a critical component of the right to liberty. Liberty ... is a phrase capable of a broad range of meaning. In my view, this right, properly construed, grants the individual a degree of autonomy in making decisions of fundamental personal importance.

... Liberty in a free and democratic society does not require the state to approve the personal decisions made by its citizens; it does, however, require the state to respect them.

In my opinion, the respect for individual decision-making in matters of fundamental personal importance reflected in the American jurisprudence also informs the Canadian Charter. Indeed, as the Chief Justice pointed out in R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., beliefs about human worth and dignity "are the sine qua non of the political tradition underlying the Charter." I would conclude, therefore, that the right to liberty contained in s. 7 guarantees to every individual a degree of personal autonomy over important decisions intimately affecting their private lives.

The question then becomes whether the decision of a woman to terminate her pregnancy falls within this class of protected decisions. I have no doubt that it does.

This decision is one that will have profound psychological, economic and social consequences for the pregnant woman. The circumstances giving rise to it can be complex and varied and there may be, and usually are, powerful considerations militating in opposite directions. It is a decision that deeply reflects the way the woman thinks about herself and her relationship to others and to society at large. It is not just a medical decision; it is a profound social and ethical one as well. Her response to it will be the response of the whole person.

It is probably impossible for a man to respond, even imaginatively, to such a dilemma not just because it is outside the realm of his personal experience (although this is, of course, the case) but because he can relate to it only by objectifying it, thereby eliminating the subjective elements of the female psyche which are at the heart of the dilemma. As Noreen Burrows, Lecturer in European Law at the University of Glasgow, has pointed out in her essay on "International Law and Human Rights: The Case of Women's Rights," in Human Rights: From Rhetoric to Reality (1986), the history of the struggle for human rights from the eighteenth century on has been the history of men struggling to assert their dignity and common humanity against an overbearing state apparatus. The more recent struggle for women's rights has been a struggle to eliminate discrimination, to achieve a place for women in a man's world, to develop a set of legislative reforms in order to place women in the same position as men (at 81-82). It has not been a struggle to define the rights of women in relation to their special place in the societal structure and in relation to the biological distinction between the two sexes. Thus, women's needs and aspirations are only now being translated into protected rights. The right to reproduce or not to reproduce which is in issue in this case is one such right and is properly perceived as an integral part of modern woman's struggle to assert her dignity and worth as a human being.

Given then that the right to liberty guaranteed by s. 7 of the Charter gives a woman the right to decide for herself whether or not to terminate her pregnancy, does s. 251 of the Criminal Code violate this right? Clearly it does. The purpose of the section is to take the decision away from the woman and give it to a committee. Furthermore, as the Chief Justice correctly points out, at 56, the committee bases its decision on "criteria entirely unrelated to [the pregnant woman's] priorities and aspirations." The fact that the decision whether a woman will be allowed to terminate her pregnancy is in the hands of a committee is just as great a violation of the woman's right to personal autonomy in decisions of an intimate and private nature as it would be if a committee were established to decide whether a woman should be allowed to continue her pregnancy. Both these arrangements violate the woman's right to liberty by deciding for her something that she has the right to decide for herself.

(b) The Right to Security of the Person

Section 7 of the Charter also guarantees everyone the right to security of the person. Does this ... extend to the right of control over one's own body?

I agree with the Chief Justice and with Beetz J. that the right to "security of the person" under s. 7 of the Charter protects both the physical and psychological integrity of the individual. State enforced medical or surgical treatment comes readily to mind as an obvious invasion of physical integrity. ... I believe, however, that the flaw in the present legislative scheme goes much deeper than that. In essence, what it does is assert that the woman's capacity to reproduce is not to be subject to her own control. It is to be subject to the control of the state. She may not choose whether to exercise her existing capacity or not to exercise it. This is not, in my view, just a matter of interfering with her right to liberty in the sense (already discussed) of her right to personal autonomy in decision-making, it is a direct interference with her physical person as well. She is truly being treated as ... a means to an end which she does not desire but over which she has no control. She is the passive recipient of a decision made by others as to whether her body is to be used to nurture a new life. Can there be anything that comports less with human dignity and self-respect? How can a woman in this position have any sense of security with respect to her person? I believe that s. 251 of the Criminal Code deprives the pregnant woman of her right to security of the person as well as her right to liberty.

[Justice Wilson also held that s 251 deprived women of their right to freedom of conscience under s 2(a) of the Charter. She held that the decision to terminate a pregnancy was a moral decision and commented (at 179):

[F]or the state to take sides on the issue of abortion, as it does in the impugned legislation by making it a criminal offence for the pregnant woman to exercise one of her options, is not only to endorse but also to enforce, on pain of a further loss of liberty through actual imprisonment, one conscientiously-held view at the expense of another.

Further, she held that the deprivation of a s 7 right, which has the effect of infringing a right guaranteed elsewhere in the Charter, could not be in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. Accordingly, s 251 violated s 7 of the Charter. Finally, Wilson J concluded that s 251 was not a reasonable limit under s 1 because it took the decision away from the woman at all stages of her pregnancy and was not sufficiently tailored to its objective.]

McINTYRE J (La Forest J concurring) (dissenting):

The Right to Abortion and Section 7 of the Charter

The judgment of my colleague, Wilson J., is based upon the proposition that a pregnant woman has a right, under s. 7 of the Charter, to have an abortion. The same concept underlies the judgment of the Chief Justice. ... He has not said in specific terms that the pregnant woman has the right to an abortion, whether therapeutic or otherwise. In my view, however, his whole position depends for its validity upon that proposition and that interference with the right constitutes an infringement of her right to security of the person. It is said that a law which forces a woman to carry a foetus to term unless she meets certain criteria unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations interferes with security of her person. If compelling a woman to complete her pregnancy interferes with security of her person, it can only be because the concept of security of her person includes a right not to be compelled to carry the child to completion of her pregnancy. This, then, is simply to say that she has a right to have an abortion. It follows, then, that if no such right can be shown, it cannot be said that security of her person has been infringed by state action or otherwise.

All laws, it must be noted, have the potential for interference with individual priorities and aspirations. In fact, the very purpose of most legislation is to cause such interference. It is only when such legislation goes beyond interfering with priorities and aspirations, and abridges rights, that courts may intervene. ...

The proposition that women enjoy a constitutional right to have an abortion is devoid of support in the language of s. 7 of the Charter or any other section. While some human rights documents, such as the American Convention on Human Rights, 1969 (Article 4(1)), expressly address the question of abortion, the Charter is entirely silent on the point. It may be of some significance that the Charter uses specific language in dealing with other topics, such as voting rights, religion, expression and such controversial matters as mobility rights, language rights and minority rights, but remains silent on the question of abortion which, at the time the Charter was under consideration, was as much a subject of public controversy as it is today. Furthermore, it would appear that the history of the constitutional text of the Charter affords no support for the appellants' proposition. . . .

It cannot be said that the history, traditions and underlying philosophies of our society would support the proposition that a right to abortion could be implied in the Charter. . . .

There has always been clear recognition of a public interest in the protection of the unborn and there has been no evidence or indication of any general acceptance of the concept of abortion at will in our society. It is to be observed as well that at the time of adoption of the Charter the sole provision for an abortion in Canadian law was that to be found in s. 251 of the Criminal Code. It follows then, in my view, that the interpretive approach to the Charter, which has been accepted in this Court, affords no support for the entrenchment of a constitutional right of abortion.

As to an asserted right to be free from any state interference with bodily integrity and serious state-imposed psychological stress, I would say that to be accepted, as a constitutional right, it would have to be based on something more than the mere imposition, by the State, of such stress and anxiety. It must, surely, be evident that many forms of government action deemed to be reasonable, and even necessary in our society, will cause stress and anxiety to many, while at the same time being acceptable exercises of government power in pursuit of socially desirable goals. . . .

To invade the s. 7 right of security of the person, there would have to be more than state-imposed stress or strain. A breach of the right would have to be based upon an infringement of some interest which would be of such nature and such importance as to warrant constitutional protection. This, it would seem to me, would be limited to cases where the state-action complained of, in addition to imposing stress and strain, also infringed another right, freedom or interest which was deserving of protection under the concept of security of the person. For the reasons outlined above, the right to have an abortion—given the language, structure and history of the Charter and given the history, traditions and underlying philosophies of our society—is not such an interest.

[Justice McIntyre would have rejected the constitutional challenge to s 251 and would have dismissed the appeal.]

Appeal allowed; acquittals restored.

NOTE: ABORTION—SOME OTHER ISSUES

In 1987, a different challenge was made to s 251 by Joseph Borowski. He claimed that the foetus was protected by both ss 7 and 15, and accordingly commenced an action for a declaration that the exception in s 251(4) to the prohibition in s 251(1) was unconstitutional. (In an earlier decision, the Supreme Court of Canada had allowed Borowski to proceed simply as a concerned citizen, both because the issue was an important one and because there was no other reasonably effective way it was likely to be brought to court: for a discussion of standing, see Chapter 2, Judicial Review and Constitutional Interpretation). Both the Saskatchewan Court of Queen's Bench and the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal dismissed his claim, holding that the foetus did not come within the meaning of "everyone" in s 7 or within the meaning of "every individual" in s 15. Borowski appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada, but before the appeal was heard, the Court decided Morgentaler. The Court then dismissed Borowski's appeal on the ground of mootness—the basis of his action had disappeared when s 251 was struck down: see Borowski v Canada (AG), [1989] 1 SCR 342, 1989 CanLII 123.

In Tremblay v Daigle, [1989] 2 SCR 530, 1989 CanLII 33, a prospective father asked the Quebec courts to prevent the mother, his former partner, from obtaining an abortion. An injunction that was granted by the trial judge and affirmed by the Court of Appeal was set aside on appeal by the Supreme Court, on the ground that neither the foetus nor the father had a right to be protected. The Court held that the foetus was not a "human being" under the Quebec Charter. It did not, though, undertake to answer the question whether the foetus was included in the term "everyone" in s 7 of the Canadian Charter because s 7 did not apply—the action was one between two private individuals. The prospective father, in contrast to the foetus, had no right to participate in the mother's decisions.

The Morgentaler judgment left a legislative void with respect to federal regulation of the practice of abortion. In 1990, the government introduced Bill C-43 to replace s 251 (renumbered s 287 in 1988). Proposed s 287(1) read as follows:

Every person who induces an abortion on a female person is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, unless the abortion is induced by or under the direction of a medical practitioner who is of the opinion that, if the abortion were not induced, the health or life of the female person would be likely to be threatened.

"Health" was defined in proposed s 287(2) as including "physical, mental and psychological health." The bill passed the House of Commons but was defeated in the Senate on a tie vote. If the bill had been enacted, would it have survived a challenge under s 7? What about a requirement of a waiting period or, for prospective mothers under the age of 16, parental consent?

Despite being of no force or effect, s 287 was not repealed until 2019.

Provincial legislative power to regulate abortion as a matter of health is circumscribed by federal jurisdiction over the criminal law. Thus, a province cannot enact legislation to reduce or eliminate abortion on the ground that it is morally repugnant. In R v Morgentaler, [1993] 3 SCR 463, 1993 CanLII 74, excerpted in Chapter 8, Interpreting the Division of Powers, the Supreme Court of Canada declared ultra vires a Nova Scotia statute prohibiting the performance of certain medical procedures, including abortion, outside accredited hospitals, and denying medical insurance coverage to abortions that were performed in contravention of the statute. The province contended that the purpose of the statute was to ensure a single, uniform, high-quality health care system. The Court held that the true object was to prevent the establishment of abortion clinics and that the statute was, in pith and substance, an exercise of criminal law jurisdiction and thus ultra vires.

Rodriguez v British Columbia (AG)

[Rodriguez, the appellant, was terminally ill, suffering from amyotrophic lateral sclerosis, or Lou Gehrig's disease, a progressive degeneration of the motor neurons. Although this disease would likely not affect her mind, its ineluctable course would destroy her ability to control her body. Within months or, at most, a few years, she would become bedridden and unable to speak or care for herself. She sought a declaration that she was entitled to have assistance in committing suicide when, in her judgment, her condition became unbearable and if she was then unable to commit suicide without assistance. The obstacle was s 241(b) of the Criminal Code, which provided that "[e]very one who ... aids or abets a person to commit suicide, whether suicide ensues or not, is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding fourteen years." Her application was dismissed by both the Supreme Court of British Columbia and the BC Court of Appeal. Her further appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada was also dismissed. Justice Sopinka, for the majority, held that Rodriguez's security of the person was restricted by the prohibition on assisted suicide, but that there was no violation of the principles of fundamental justice.]

SOPINKA J (La Forest, Gonthier, Iacobucci, and Major JJ concurring):

The most substantial issue in this appeal is whether s. 241(b) infringes s. 7 in that it inhibits the appellant in controlling the timing and manner of her death. I conclude that while the section impinges on the security interest of the appellant, any resulting deprivation is not contrary to the principles of fundamental justice. I would come to the same conclusion with respect to any liberty interest which may be involved.

The appellant argues that, by prohibiting anyone from assisting her to end her life when her illness has rendered her incapable of terminating her life without such assistance, by threat of criminal sanction, s. 241(b) deprives her of both her liberty and her security of the person. The appellant asserts that her application is based upon (a) the right to live her remaining life with the inherent dignity of a human person; (b) the right to control what happens to her body while she is living; and (c) the right to be free from governmental interference in making fundamental personal decisions concerning the terminal stages of her life. The first two of these asserted rights can be seen to invoke both liberty and security of the person; the latter is more closely associated with only the liberty interest.

The appellant seeks a remedy which would assure her some control over the time and manner of her death. While she supports her claim on the ground that her liberty and security of the person interests are engaged, a consideration of these interests cannot be divorced from the sanctity of life, which is one of the three Charter values protected by s. 7.

As a threshold issue, I do not accept the submission that the appellant's problems are due to her physical disabilities caused by her terminal illness, and not by governmental action. There is no doubt that the prohibition in s. 241(b) will contribute to the appellant's distress if she is prevented from managing her death in the circumstances which she fears will occur. ...

I find more merit in the argument that security of the person, by its nature, cannot encompass a right to take action that will end one's life as security of the person is intrinsically concerned with the well-being of the living person. This argument focuses on the generally held and deeply rooted belief in our society that human life is sacred or inviolable (which terms I use in the non-religious sense described by ... [Ronald Dworkin, Life's Dominion: An Argument About Abortion, Euthanasia, and Individual Freedom (New York: Knopf, 1993)]) to mean that human life is seen to have a deep intrinsic value of its own.) As members of a society based upon respect for the intrinsic value of human life and on the inherent dignity of every human being, can we incorporate within the Constitution, which embodies our most fundamental values, a right to terminate one's own life in any circumstances? This question in turn evokes other queries of fundamental importance such as the degree to which our conception of the sanctity of life includes notions of quality of life as well.

Sanctity of life, as we will see, has been understood historically as excluding freedom of choice in the self-infliction of death and certainly in the involvement of others in carrying out that choice. At the very least, no new consensus has emerged in society opposing the right of the state to regulate the involvement of others in exercising power over individuals ending their lives.

The appellant suggests that for the terminally ill, the choice is one of time and manner of death rather than death itself since the latter is inevitable. I disagree. Rather it is one of choosing death instead of allowing natural forces to run their course. The time and precise manner of death remain unknown until death actually occurs. There can be no certainty in forecasting the precise circumstances of a death. Death is, for all mortals, inevitable. Even when death appears imminent, seeking to control the manner and timing of one's death constitutes a conscious choice of death over life. It follows that life as a value is engaged even in the case of the terminally ill who seek to choose death over life.

Indeed, it has been abundantly pointed out that such persons are particularly vulnerable as to their life and will to live and great concern has been expressed as to their adequate protection, as will be further set forth.

I do not draw from this that in such circumstances life as a value must prevail over security of person or liberty as these have been understood under the Charter, but that it is one of the values engaged in the present case.

... [T]he judgments of this Court in Morgentaler [R v Morgentaler, [1988] 1 SCR 30, 1988 CanLII 123] can be seen to encompass a notion of personal autonomy involving, at the very least, control over one's bodily integrity free from state interference and freedom from state-imposed psychological and emotional stress. In Reference re: ss. 193 and 195.1(1)(c) of Criminal Code (Man.), [[1985] 2 SCR 486, 1985 CanLII 105] Lamer J. [as he then was] also expressed this view, stating at p. 1177 that "[s]ection 7 is also implicated when the state restricts individuals' security of the person by interfering with, or removing from them, control over their physical or mental integrity." There is no question, then, that personal autonomy, at least with respect to the right to make choices concerning one's own body, control over one's physical and psychological integrity, and basic human dignity are encompassed within security of the person, at least to the extent of freedom from criminal prohibitions which interfere with these.

The effect of the prohibition in s. 241(b) is to prevent the appellant from having assistance to commit suicide when she is no longer able to do so on her own. She fears that she will be required to live until the deterioration from her disease is such that she will die as a result of choking, suffocation or pneumonia caused by aspiration of food or secretions. She will be totally dependent upon machines to perform her bodily functions and completely dependent upon others. Throughout this time, she will remain mentally competent and able to appreciate all that is happening to her. Although palliative care may be available to ease the pain and other physical discomfort which she will experience, the appellant fears the sedating effects of such drugs and argues, in any event, that they will not prevent the psychological and emotional distress which will result from being in a situation of utter dependence and loss of dignity. That there is a right to choose how one's body will be dealt with, even in the context of beneficial medical treatment, has long been recognized by the common law. To impose medical treatment on one who refuses it constitutes battery, and our common law has recognized the right to demand that medical treatment which would extend life be withheld or withdrawn. In my view, these considerations lead to the conclusion that the prohibition in s. 241(b) deprives the appellant of autonomy over her person and causes her physical pain and psychological stress in a manner which impinges on the security of her person. The appellant's security interest (considered in the context of the life and liberty interest) is, therefore, engaged, and it is necessary to determine whether there has been any deprivation thereof that is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

In this case, it is not disputed that in general s. 241(b) is valid and desirable legislation which fulfils the government's objectives of preserving life and protecting the vulnerable. The complaint is that the legislation is over-inclusive because it does not exclude from the reach of the prohibition those in the situation of the appellant who are terminally ill, mentally competent, but cannot commit suicide on their own. It is also argued that the extension of the prohibition to the appellant is arbitrary and unfair as suicide itself is not unlawful, and the common law allows a physician to withhold or withdraw life-saving or life-maintaining treatment on the patient's instructions and to administer palliative care which has the effect of hastening death. The issue is whether, given this legal context, the existence of a criminal prohibition on assisting suicide for one in the appellant's situation is contrary to principles of fundamental justice.

Discerning the principles of fundamental justice with which deprivation of life, liberty or security of the person must accord, in order to withstand constitutional scrutiny, is not an easy task. A mere common law rule does not suffice to constitute a principle of fundamental justice, rather, as the term implies, principles upon which there is some consensus that they are vital or fundamental to our societal notion of justice are required. Principles of fundamental justice must not, however, be so broad as to be no more than vague generalizations about what our society considers to be ethical or moral. They must be capable of being identified with some precision and applied to situations in a manner which yields an understandable result. They must also, in my view, be legal principles. ...

The appellant asserts that it is a principle of fundamental justice that the human dignity and autonomy of individuals be respected, and that to subject her to needless suffering in this manner is to rob her of her dignity. ...

That respect for human dignity is one of the underlying principles upon which our society is based is unquestioned. I have difficulty, however, in characterizing this in itself as a principle of fundamental justice within the meaning of s. 7. While respect for human dignity is the genesis for many principles of fundamental justice, not every law that fails to accord such respect runs afoul of these principles. To state that "respect for human dignity and autonomy" is a principle of fundamental justice, then, is essentially to state that the deprivation of the appellant's security of the person is contrary to principles of fundamental justice because it deprives her of security of the person. This interpretation would equate security of the person with a principle of fundamental justice and render the latter redundant.

I cannot subscribe to the opinion expressed by my colleague, McLachlin J., that the state interest is an inappropriate consideration in recognizing the principles of fundamental justice in this case. This Court has affirmed that in arriving at these principles, a balancing of the interest of the state and the individual is required. ...

Where the deprivation of the right in question does little or nothing to enhance the state's interest (whatever it may be), it seems to me that a breach of fundamental justice will be made out, as the individual's rights will have been deprived for no valid purpose. This is, to my mind, essentially the type of analysis which E. Colvin advocates in his article "Section Seven of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms" (1989), 68 Can. Bar Rev. 560, and which was carried out in Morgentaler. That is, both Dickson C.J. and Beetz J. were of the view that at least some of the restrictions placed upon access to abortion had no relevance to the state objective of protecting the foetus while protecting the life and health of the mother. In that regard the restrictions were arbitrary or unfair. It follows that before one can determine that a statutory provision is contrary to fundamental justice, the relationship between the provision and the state interest must be considered. ... One cannot conclude that a particular limit is arbitrary because (in the words of my colleague, McLachlin J. at pp. 619-20) "it bears no relation to, or is inconsistent with, the objective that lies behind" the legislation without considering the state interest and the societal concerns which it reflects.

The issue here, then, can be characterized as being whether the blanket prohibition on assisted suicide is arbitrary or unfair in that it is unrelated to the state's interest in protecting the vulnerable, and that it lacks a foundation in the legal tradition and societal beliefs which are said to be represented by the prohibition.

Section 241(b) has as its purpose the protection of the vulnerable who might be induced in moments of weakness to commit suicide. This purpose is grounded in the state interest in protecting life and reflects the policy of the state that human life should not be depreciated by allowing life to be taken. This policy finds expression not only in the provisions of our Criminal Code which prohibit murder and other violent acts against others notwithstanding the consent of the victim, but also in the policy against capital punishment and, until its repeal, attempted suicide. This is not only a policy of the state, however, but is part of our fundamental conception of the sanctity of human life. ...

What the preceding review demonstrates is that Canada and other western democracies recognize and apply the principle of the sanctity of life as a general principle which is subject to limited and narrow exceptions in situations in which notions of personal autonomy and dignity must prevail. However, these same societies continue to draw distinctions between passive and active forms of intervention in the dying process, and with very few exceptions, prohibit assisted suicide in situations akin to that of the appellant. The task then becomes to identify the rationales upon which these distinctions are based and to determine whether they are constitutionally supportable.

[Justice Sopinka then dealt with the argument that it was arbitrary for the law to prohibit assisted suicide but to allow both withdrawal of life supportive treatment upon the patient's request and the administration of drugs to control pain as part of palliative care treatment with the knowledge that they will hasten death. He held that these distinctions could be supported and were not fundamentally unjust.]

The principles of fundamental justice cannot be created for the occasion to reflect the court's dislike or distaste of a particular statute. While the principles of fundamental justice are concerned with more than process, reference must be made to principles which are "fundamental" in the sense that they would have general acceptance among reasonable people. From the review that I have conducted above, I am unable to discern anything approaching unanimity with respect to the issue before us. Regardless of one's personal views as to whether the distinctions drawn between withdrawal of treatment and palliative care, on the one hand, and assisted suicide on the other, are practically compelling, the fact remains that these distinctions are maintained and can be persuasively defended. To the extent that there is a consensus, it is that human life must be respected and we must be careful not to undermine the institutions that protect it.

... Given the concerns about abuse that have been expressed and the great difficulty in creating appropriate safeguards to prevent these, it cannot be said that the blanket prohibition on assisted suicide is arbitrary or unfair, or that it is not reflective of fundamental values at play in our society. I am thus unable to find that any principle of fundamental justice is violated by s. 241(b).

[Justice McLachlin (L'Heureux-Dubé J concurring) dissented. She held that s 241(b) deprived Rodriguez of her security of the person (by denying her the right to make decisions about her body) in a way that offended the principles of fundamental justice by drawing an arbitrary distinction between suicide and assisted suicide. She went on to hold that this violation of s 7 could not be justified under s 1. While recognizing that the objective of the complete prohibition on assisted suicide was to prevent the killing of those who did not truly consent to death, she found that this objective could be met by ensuring fully informed and free consent and could not justify denying persons in the position of Rodriguez the ability to obtain assistance in ending their lives:

The concern for deaths produced by outside influence or depression centre on the concept of consent. If a person of sound mind, fully aware of all relevant circumstances, comes to the decision to end her life at a certain point, as Sue Rodriguez has, it is difficult to argue that the criminal law should operate to prevent her, given that it does not so operate in the case of others throughout society. The fear is that a person who does not consent may be murdered, or that the consent of a vulnerable person may be improperly procured.

Chief Justice Lamer also dissented, holding that s 241(b) infringed s 15 of the Charter by discriminating on the basis of physical disability and could not be justified under s 1 because it was an absolute prohibition indifferent to individual circumstances. Justice Cory also dissented, agreeing in substance with both Lamer CJ and McLachlin J to find unjustified violations of both ss 7 and 15.]

Appeal dismissed.

Twenty-two years after Rodriguez, the Supreme Court of Canada revisited the constitutionality of s 241(b) in Carter v Canada (AG), 2015 SCC 5, excerpted below, with a different result. The intervening years brought many developments in the interpretation of s 7, specifically in the Supreme Court of Canada's understanding of the principles of fundamental justice as shown in the next two cases: PHS (often referred to as the "Insite" case) and Bedford.

Canada (AG) v PHS Community Services Society

McLACHLIN CJ (Binnie, LeBel, Deschamps, Fish, Abella, Charron, Rothstein, and Cromwell JJ concurring):

[1] Since 2003, the Insite safe injection facility has provided medical services to intravenous drug users in the Downtown Eastside of Vancouver ("DTES"). Local, provincial and federal authorities came together to create a legal framework for a safe injection facility in which clients could inject drugs under medical supervision without fear of arrest and prosecution. Insite was widely hailed as an effective response to the catastrophic spread of infectious diseases such as HIV/AIDS and hepatitis C, and the high rate of deaths from drug overdoses in the DTES.

[2] In 2008, the federal government failed to extend Insite's exemption from the operation of criminal laws in the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act, S.C. 1996, c. 19 ("CDSA"). Faced with the threat that Insite would have to stop offering services, the claimants brought an action for declarations that the CDSA is inapplicable to Insite and that its application to Insite resulted in a violation of the claimants' s. 7 rights under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, or, in the alternative, that the federal Minister of Health, in refusing to grant an extension of Insite's exemption, had violated the claimants' s. 7 rights.

[3] The question in this appeal is whether Insite is exempt from the federal criminal laws that prohibit the possession and trafficking of controlled substances, either because Insite is a health facility within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Province, or because the application of the criminal law would violate the Charter. ...

[The trial judge granted Insite a constitutional exemption. The government's appeal to the BC Court of Appeal was dismissed.]

V. Division of Powers Arguments

[Chief Justice McLachlin held that the CDSA was intra vires the federal Parliament and was not inapplicable to Insite by reason of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity. This aspect of the decision is discussed in more detail in Chapter 8, Section V, "Applicability: The Interjurisdictional Immunity Doctrine."]

VI. Charter Claims

[74] Three Charter claims fall for consideration.

[75] Ms. Tomic, Mr. Wilson and PHS argue that ss. 4(1) and 5(1) of the CDSA, which prohibit possession and trafficking respectively, are invalid because they limit the claimants' s. 7 rights to life, liberty and security of the person and are not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

[76] In the alternative, they assert that their s. 7 rights have been infringed by the Minister's refusal to extend the exemption for Insite from the application of the federal drug laws.

B. Challenge to Sections 4(1) and 5(1) of the CDSA

[Chief Justice McLachlin held that, without a s 56 exemption, both the staff and the clients of Insite would be guilty of possession of controlled substances; they would not, however, be guilty of trafficking. Therefore, the possession, but not the trafficking, provisions of the CDSA engaged their s 7 liberty interests. However, McLachlin CJ rejected the argument that the possession provisions were inconsistent with the principles of fundamental justice: "The availability of exemptions [under s 56] acts as a safety valve that prevents the CDSA from applying where such application would be arbitrary, overbroad or grossly disproportionate in its effects" (at para 113). In the process of analyzing the parties' arguments about the constitutionality of the possession provisions, McLachlin CJ made the following comments about the issue of causation.]

(2) Canada's Argument on Choice

[97] Canada argues that any negative health risks drug users may suffer if Insite is unable to provide them with health services, are not caused by the CDSA's prohibition on possession of illegal drugs, but rather are the consequence of the drug users' decision to use illegal drugs.

[98] Canada's position, deconstructed, reveals three distinct strands.

[99] The first strand is that from a factual perspective, personal choice, not the law, is the cause of the death and disease Insite prevents. Canada's difficulty is that this assertion contradicts the uncontested factual findings of the trial judge. The trial judge found that addiction is an illness, characterized by a loss of control over the need to consume the substance to which the addiction relates (para. 87).

[100] This does not negate the fact that some addicts may retain some power of choice. Insite is premised on the assumption that at least some addicts will be capable of making the choice to consume drugs in the safety of the facility and under the supervision of its staff. The range of services offered at the facility, from peer counselling to detox, assume at least a limited capacity on the part of some people to choose not to consume drugs.

[101] The ability to make some choices, whether with the aid of Insite or otherwise, does not negate the trial judge's findings on the record before him that addiction is a disease in which the central feature is impaired control over the use of the addictive substance (para. 142). At trial, Pitfield J. adopted the definition of addiction developed by the Canadian Society of Addiction Medicine:

A primary, chronic disease, characterized by impaired control over the use of a psychoactive substance and/or behaviour. Clinically, the manifestations occur along biological, psychological, sociological and spiritual dimensions. Common features are change in mood, relief from negative emotions, provision of pleasure, pre-occupation with the use of substance(s) or ritualistic behaviour(s); and continued use of the substance(s) and/or engagement in behaviour(s) despite adverse physical, psychological and/or social consequences. Like other chronic diseases, it can be progressive, relapsing and fatal. [para. 48]

That finding was not challenged here. ...

[102] The second strand of Canada's choice argument is a moral argument that those who commit crimes should be made to suffer the consequences. On this point it suffices to say that whether a law limits a Charter right is simply a matter of the purpose and effect of the law that is challenged, not whether the law is right or wrong. The morality of the activity the law regulates is irrelevant at the initial stage of determining whether the law engages a s. 7 right.

[103] The third way to view Canada's choice argument is as a matter of government policy. Canada argues that the decision to allow supervised injection is a policy question, and thus immune from Charter review.

[104] The answer, once again, is that policy is not relevant at the stage of determining whether a law or state action limits a Charter right. The place for such arguments is when considering the principles of fundamental justice or at the s. 1 stage of justification if a Charter breach has been established.

[105] The issue of illegal drug use and addiction is a complex one which attracts a variety of social, political, scientific and moral reactions. There is room for disagreement between reasonable people concerning how addiction should be treated. It is for the relevant governments, not the Court, to make criminal and health policy. However, when a policy is translated into law or state action, those laws and actions are subject to scrutiny under the Charter . . . The issue before the Court at this point is not whether harm reduction or abstinence-based programmes are the best approach to resolving illegal drug use. It is simply whether Canada has limited the rights of the claimants in a manner that does not comply with Charter.

[106] I conclude that, whatever form it takes, Canada's assertion that choice rather than state conduct is the cause of the health hazards Insite seeks to address and the claimants' resultant deprivation must be rejected.

C. Has the Minister's Decision Violated the Claimants' Section 7 Rights?

[116] The main issue, as the appeal was argued, was the constitutionality of the CDSA itself. I have concluded that, properly interpreted, the statute is valid. This leaves the question of the Minister's decision to refuse an exemption. A preliminary issue arises whether the Court should consider this issue. In the special circumstances of this case, I conclude that it should. The claimants pleaded in the alternative that, if the CDSA were valid, the Minister's decision violated their Charter rights. The issue was raised at the hearing and the parties afforded an opportunity to address it. It is therefore properly before us and the Attorney General of Canada cannot complain that it would be unfair to deal with it. Most importantly, justice requires us to consider this issue. The claimants have established that their s. 7 rights are at stake. They should not be denied a remedy and sent back for another trial on this point simply because it is the Minister's decision and not the statute that causes the breach when the matter has been pleaded and no unfairness arises.

[117] The discretion vested in the Minister of Health is not absolute: as with all exercises of discretion, the Minister's decisions must conform to the Charter: Suresh v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2002 SCC 1, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 3. If the Minister's decision results in an application of the CDSA that limits the s. 7 rights of individuals in a manner that is not in accordance with the Charter, then the Minister's discretion has been exercised unconstitutionally.

[Chief Justice McLachlin rejected the government's claim that the minister had made no decision that could be reviewed. She found that the minister had in fact decided to reject the application for an exemption and that this decision engaged the claimants' s 7 rights.]

(3) Does the Minister's Refusal to Grant an Exemption to Insite Accord with the Principles of Fundamental Justice?

[127] The next question is whether the Minister's decision that the CDSA applies to Insite is in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. On the basis of the facts established at trial, which are consistent with the evidence available to the Minister at the relevant time, I conclude that the Minister's refusal to grant Insite a s. 56 exemption was arbitrary and grossly disproportionate in its effects, and hence not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

[128] As noted above, the Minister, when exercising his discretion under s. 56, must respect the rights guaranteed by the Charter. This means that, where s. 7 rights are at stake, any limitations imposed by ministerial decision must be in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. The Minister cannot simply deny an application for a s. 56 exemption on the basis of policy simpliciter; insofar as it affects Charter rights, his decision must accord with the principles of fundamental justice.

[129] When considering whether a law's application is arbitrary, the first step is to identify the law's objectives. Decisions of the Minister under s. 56 of the CDSA must target the purpose of the Act. The legitimate state objectives of the CDSA (then the Narcotic Control Act, R.S.C. 1986, c. N-1) were identified by this Court in Malmo-Levine as the protection of health and public safety.

[130] The second step is to identify the relationship between the state interest and the impugned law, or, in this case, the impugned decision of the Minister. The relationship between the general prohibition on possession in the CDSA and the state objective was recognized in Malmo-Levine [2003 SCC 74] with respect to marihuana:

The criminalization of possession is a statement of society's collective disapproval of the use of a psychoactive drug such as marihuana ... , and, through Parliament, the continuing view that its use should be deterred. The prohibition is not arbitrary but is rationally connected to a reasonable apprehension of harm. In particular, criminalization seeks to take marihuana out of the hands of users and potential users, so as to prevent the associated harm and to eliminate the market for traffickers. [para. 136]

The question is whether the decision that the CDSA apply to the activities at Insite bears the same relationship to the state objective. As noted above, the burden is on the claimants to establish that the limit imposed by the law is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

[131] The trial judge's key findings in this regard are consistent with the information available to the Minister, and are those on which successive federal Ministers have relied in granting exemption orders over almost five years, including the facts that: (1) traditional criminal law prohibitions have done little to reduce drug use in the DTES; (2) the risk to injection drug users of death and disease is reduced when they inject under the supervision of a health professional; and (3) the presence of Insite did not contribute to increased crime rates, increased incidents of public injection, or relapse rates in injection drug users. On the contrary, Insite was perceived favourably or neutrally by the public; a local business association reported a reduction in crime during the period Insite was operating; the facility encouraged clients to seek counselling, detoxification and treatment. Most importantly, the staff of Insite had intervened in 336 overdoses since 2006, and no overdose deaths had occurred at the facility. ... These findings suggest not only that exempting Insite from the application of the possession prohibition does not undermine the objectives of public health and safety, but furthers them.

[132] The jurisprudence on arbitrariness is not entirely settled. In Chaoulli [v Quebec (AG), 2005 SCC 35], three justices (per McLachlin C.J. and Major J.) preferred an approach that asked whether a limit was "necessary" to further the state objective: paras. 131-32. Conversely, three other justices (per Binnie and LeBel JJ.), preferred to avoid the language of necessity and instead approved of the prior articulation of arbitrariness as where “[a] deprivation of a right ... bears no relation to, or is inconsistent with, the state interest that lies behind the legislation” (para. 232). It is unnecessary to determine which approach should prevail, because the government action at issue in this case qualifies as arbitrary under both definitions.

(b) Gross Disproportionality

[133] The application of the possession prohibition to Insite is also grossly disproportionate in its effects. Gross disproportionality describes state actions or legislative responses to a problem that are so extreme as to be disproportionate to any legitimate government interest: Malmo-Levine, at para. 143. Insite saves lives. Its benefits have been proven. There has been no discernable negative impact on the public safety and health objectives of Canada during its eight years of operation. The effect of denying the services of Insite to the population it serves is grossly disproportionate to any benefit that Canada might derive from presenting a uniform stance on the possession of narcotics.

(c) Overbreadth

[134] Having found the Minister’s decision arbitrary and its effects grossly disproportionate, I need not consider this aspect of the argument.

[135] I conclude that, on the basis of the factual findings of the trial judge, the claimants have met the evidentiary burden of showing that the failure of the Minister to grant a s. 56 exemption to Insite is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

(4) Conclusion on the Challenge to Minister’s Decision

[136] The Minister made a decision not to extend the exemption from the application of the federal drug laws to Insite. The effect of that decision, but for the trial judge’s interim order, would have been to prevent injection drug users from accessing the health services offered by Insite, threatening the health and indeed the lives of the potential clients. The Minister’s decision thus engages the claimants’ s. 7 interests and constitutes a limit on their s. 7 rights. Based on the information available to the Minister, this limit is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. It is arbitrary, undermining the very purposes of the CDSA, which include public health and safety. It is also grossly disproportionate: the potential denial of health services and the correlative increase in the risk of death and disease to injection drug users outweigh any benefit that might be derived from maintaining an absolute prohibition on possession of illegal drugs on Insite’s premises.

D. Section 1

[137] If a s. 1 analysis were required, a point not argued, no s. 1 justification could succeed. The goals of the CDSA, as I have stated, are the maintenance and promotion of public health and safety. The Minister’s decision to refuse the exemption bears no relation to these objectives; therefore they cannot justify the infringement of the complainants’ s. 7 rights. However one views the matter, the Minister’s decision was arbitrary and unsustainable. See Chaoulli, at para. 155, per McLachlin C.J. and Major J.

[138] Before leaving s. 1, I turn to the Minister’s argument that granting a s. 56 exemption to Insite would undermine the rule of law and that denying an exemption is therefore justified.

[139] Canada submits that exempting Insite from the prohibitions in the CDSA "would effectively turn the rule of law on its head by dictating that where a particular individual breaks the law with such frequency and persistence that he or she becomes unable to comply with it, it is unconstitutional to apply the law to that person" (A.F., at para. 101). Canada raises the spectre of a host of exempt sites, where the country's drug laws would be flouted with impunity.

[140] The conclusion that the Minister has not exercised his discretion in accordance with the Charter in this case is not a licence for injection drug users to possess drugs wherever and whenever they wish. Nor is it an invitation for anyone who so chooses to open a facility for drug use under the banner of a "safe injection facility." The result in this case rests on the trial judge's conclusions that Insite is effective in reducing the risk of death and disease and has had no negative impact on the legitimate criminal law objectives of the federal government. Neither s. 56 of the CDSA nor s. 7 of the Charter require condonation of crime. They demand only that, in administering the criminal law, the state not deprive individuals of their s. 7 rights to life, liberty and security of the person in a manner that violates the principles of fundamental justice.

VII. Remedy

[The Court ordered the Minister to grant Insite an exemption pursuant to s 56.]

Appeal and cross-appeal dismissed.

Does PHS establish any kind of "positive right" against the state? Would the possession provisions of the CDSA be constitutionally valid if the statute contained no procedures for exempting individuals from its prohibitions on medical grounds?

Canada (AG) v Bedford

McLACHLIN CJ (LeBel, Fish, Abella, Rothstein, Cromwell, Moldaver, Karakatsanis, and Wagner JJ concurring):

[1] It is not a crime in Canada to sell sex for money. However, it is a crime to keep a bawdy-house, to live on the avails of prostitution or to communicate in public with respect to a proposed act of prostitution. It is argued that these restrictions on prostitution put the safety and lives of prostitutes at risk, and are therefore unconstitutional.

I. The Case

[3] Three applicants, all current or former prostitutes, brought an application seeking declarations that three provisions of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, are unconstitutional.

[4] The three impugned provisions criminalize various activities related to prostitution. They are primarily concerned with preventing public nuisance, as well as the exploitation of prostitutes. Section 210 makes it an offence to be an inmate of a bawdy-house, to be found in a bawdy-house without lawful excuse, or to be an owner, landlord, lessor, tenant, or occupier of a place who knowingly permits it to be used as a bawdy-house. [Section 197 defines "common bawdy-house" as a place used for purposes of prostitution or the practice of acts of indecency.] Section 212(1)(j) makes it an offence to live on the avails of another's prostitution. Section 213(1)(c) makes it an offence to either stop or attempt to stop, or communicate or attempt to communicate with, someone in a public place for the purpose of engaging in prostitution or hiring a prostitute.

[5] ... Under the existing regime, Parliament has confined lawful prostitution to two categories: street prostitution and "out-calls"—where the prostitute goes out and meets the client at a designated location, such as the client's home. This reflects a policy choice on Parliament's part. Parliament is not precluded from imposing limits on where and how prostitution may be conducted, as long as it does so in a way that does not infringe the constitutional rights of prostitutes.

[6] The applicants allege that all three provisions infringe s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms by preventing prostitutes from implementing certain safety measures—such as hiring security guards or "screening" potential clients—that could protect them from violent clients. The applicants also allege that s. 213(1)(c) infringes s. 2(b) of the Charter, and that none of the provisions are saved under s. 1.

III. Prior Decisions

[The Ontario Superior Court had granted the application, declaring that each of the impugned Criminal Code provisions violated the Charter and could not be saved by s 1. The Ontario Court of Appeal agreed that s 210 (the bawdy-house provision) was an unconstitutional violation of s 7 and ordered that the word "prostitution" be struck from the definition of bawdy house. The Court of Appeal also agreed that s 212(1)(j) (living off the avails of prostitution) was an unconstitutional violation of s 7 and ordered the reading in of words to clarify that the prohibition only applies to those who do so "in circumstances of exploitation." However, the Court of Appeal held that s 213(1)(c) (the communicating provision) did not violate either s 2(b) or s 7.]

IV. Discussion

[36] The appellant Attorneys General [of Canada and Ontario] appeal from the Court of Appeal's declaration that ss. 210 and 212(1)(j) of the Code are unconstitutional. The respondents cross-appeal on the issue of the constitutionality of s. 213(1)(c), and in respect of the Court of Appeal's remedy to resolve the unconstitutionality of s. 210.

[37] Before turning to the Charter arguments before us, I will first discuss two preliminary issues: (1) whether the 1990 decision in the Prostitution Reference [Reference re ss 193 and 195.1(1)(c) of the Criminal Code (Man), [1990] 1 SCR 1123, 1990 CanLII 105], upholding the bawdy-house and communication prohibitions, is binding on trial judges and this Court; and (2) the degree of deference to be accorded to the application judge's findings on social and legislative facts.

A. Preliminary Issues

(1) Revisiting the Prostitution Reference

[39] The issue of when, if ever, such precedents may be departed from takes two forms. The first "vertical" question is when, if ever, a lower court may depart from a precedent established by a higher court. The second "horizontal" question is when a court such as the Supreme Court of Canada may depart from its own precedents.

[40] In this case, the precedent in question is the Supreme Court of Canada's 1990 advisory opinion in the Prostitution Reference, which upheld the constitutionality of the prohibitions on bawdy-houses and communicating—two of the three provisions challenged in this case. The questions in that case were whether the laws infringed s. 7 or s. 2(b) of the Charter, and, if so, whether the limit was justified under s. 1. The Court concluded that neither of the impugned laws were inconsistent with s. 7, and that although the communicating law infringed s. 2(b), it was a justifiable limit under s. 1 of the Charter. ...

[42] In my view, a trial judge can consider and decide arguments based on Charter provisions that were not raised in the earlier case; this constitutes a new legal issue. Similarly, the matter may be revisited if new legal issues are raised as a consequence of significant developments in the law, or if there is a change in the circumstances or evidence that fundamentally shifts the parameters of the debate.

[43] The intervener, the David Asper Centre for Constitutional Rights, argues that the common law principle of stare decisis is subordinate to the Constitution and cannot require a court to uphold a law which is unconstitutional. It submits that lower courts should not be limited to acting as "mere scribe[s]," creating a record and findings without conducting a legal analysis (I.F., at para. 25).

[44] I agree. ... [H]owever, a lower court is not entitled to ignore binding precedent, and the threshold for revisiting a matter is not an easy one to reach. In my view, as discussed above, this threshold is met when a new legal issue is raised, or if there is a significant change in the circumstances or evidence. This balances the need for finality and stability with the recognition that when an appropriate case arises for revisiting precedent, a lower court must be able to perform its full role.

[45] It follows that the application judge in this case was entitled to rule on whether the laws in question violated the security of the person interests under s. 7 of the Charter. In the Prostitution Reference, the majority decision was based on the s. 7 physical liberty interest alone. ... Furthermore, the principles of fundamental justice considered in the Prostitution Reference dealt with vagueness and the permissibility of indirect criminalization. The principles raised in this case—arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality—have, to a large extent, developed only in the last 20 years.

[46] These considerations do not apply to the question of whether the communication provision is a justified limit on freedom of expression. That issue was decided in the Prostitution Reference. Re-characterizing the type of expression alleged to be infringed did not convert this argument into a new legal issue, nor did the more current evidentiary record or the shift in attitudes and perspectives amount to a change in the circumstances or evidence that fundamentally shifted the parameters of the debate.

[47] This brings me to the question of whether this Court should depart from its previous decision on the s. 2(b) aspect of this case. At heart, this is a balancing exercise, in which the Court must weigh correctness against certainty. ... In this case, however, it is not necessary to determine whether this Court can depart from its s. 2(b) conclusion in the Prostitution Reference, since it is possible to resolve the case entirely on s. 7 grounds.

(2) Deference to the Application Judge's Findings on Social and Legislative Facts

[48] The Court of Appeal held that the application judge's findings on social and legislative facts—that is, facts about society at large, established by complex social science evidence—were not entitled to deference. [In earlier cases, there had been some indication that appellate courts need not defer to this component of the factual record.] With respect I cannot agree. ... [A]ppellate courts should not interfere with a trial judge's findings of fact [whether adjudicative, social, or legislative] absent a palpable and overriding error.

[49] When social and legislative evidence is put before a judge of first instance, the judge's duty is to evaluate and weigh that evidence in order to arrive at the conclusions of fact necessary to decide the case. The trial judge is charged with the responsibility of establishing the record on which subsequent appeals are founded. Absent reviewable error in the trial judge's appreciation of the evidence, a court of appeal should not interfere with the trial judge's conclusions on social and legislative facts. This division of labour is basic to our court system. The first instance judge determines the facts; appeal courts review the decision for correctness in law or palpable and overriding error in fact. This applies to social and legislative facts as much as to findings of fact as to what happened in a particular case [that is, adjudicative facts].

[51] First, to do so would require the appeal court to duplicate the sometimes time-consuming and tedious work of the first instance judge in reviewing all the material and reconciling differences between the experts, studies and research results. A new set of judges would need to take the hours if not weeks required to intimately appreciate and analyze the evidence. And counsel for the parties would be required to take the appellate judges through all the evidence once again so they could draw their own conclusions. All this would increase the costs and delay in the litigation process. In a review for error—which is what an appeal is—it makes more sense to have counsel point out alleged errors in the trial judge's conclusions on the evidence and confine the court of appeal to determining whether those errors vitiate the trial judge's conclusions.

[52] Second, social and legislative facts may be intertwined with adjudicative facts—that is, the facts of the case at hand—and with issues of credibility of experts. To posit a different standard of review for adjudicative facts and the credibility of affiants and expert witnesses on the one hand, and social and legislative facts on the other (as proposed by the Court of Appeal), is to ask the impossible of courts of appeal. Untangling the different sources of those conclusions and applying different standards of review to them would immensely complicate the appellate task.

[53] ... [T]his Court's decision in RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 199, suggested that legislative fact findings are owed less deference. However, the use of social science evidence in Charter litigation has evolved significantly since RJR-MacDonald was decided. In the intervening years, this Court has expressed a preference for social science evidence to be presented through an expert witness The distinction between adjudicative and legislative facts can no longer justify gradations of deference.

B. Section 7 Analysis

(1) Is Security of the Person Engaged?

[58] Section 7 provides that the state cannot deny a person's right to life, liberty or security of the person, except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. At this stage, the [initial] question is whether the impugned laws negatively impact or limit the applicants' security of the person, thus bringing them within the ambit of, or engaging, s. 7 of the Charter. [The focus is on security of the person, not liberty, for three reasons. First, the Prostitution Reference decided that the communicating and bawdy-house provisions engage liberty, and it is binding on this point. The security of the person argument is a novel issue and an important reason why the application judge was able to revisit the Prostitution Reference. Second, it is not clear that any of the applicants' personal liberty interests are engaged by the living on the avails provision; rather, they have pleaded that they fear that it could apply to their employees or their loved ones. Lastly, it seems to me that the real gravamen of the complaint is not that breaking the law engages the applicants' liberty, but rather that compliance with the laws infringes the applicants' security of the person.]

[59] Here, the applicants argue that the prohibitions on bawdy-houses, living on the avails of prostitution, and communicating in public for the purposes of prostitution, heighten the risks they face in prostitution—itself a legal activity. The application judge found that the evidence supported this proposition and the Court of Appeal agreed.

[60] For reasons set out below, I am of the same view. The prohibitions at issue do not merely impose conditions on how prostitutes operate. They go a critical step further, by imposing dangerous conditions on prostitution; they prevent people engaged in a risky—but legal—activity from taking steps to protect themselves from the risks.

(a) Sections 197 and 210: Keeping a Common Bawdy-House

[61] It is not an offence to sell sex for money. The bawdy-house provisions, however, make it an offence to do so in any "place" that is "kept or occupied" or "resorted to" for the purpose of prostitution (ss. 197 and 210(1) of the Code). The reach of these provisions is broad. "Place" includes any defined space, even if unenclosed and used only temporarily And by definition, it applies even if resorted to by only one person

[62] The practical effect of s. 210 is to confine lawful prostitution to two categories: street prostitution and out-calls In-calls, where the john comes to the prostitute's residence, are prohibited. Out-calls, where the prostitute goes out and meets the client at a designated location, such as the client's home, are allowed. Working on the street is also permitted, though the practice of street prostitution is significantly limited by the prohibition on communicating in public (s. 213(1)(c)).

[63] The application judge found, on a balance of probabilities, that the safest form of prostitution is working independently from a fixed location (para. 300). She concluded that indoor work is far less dangerous than street prostitution—a finding that the evidence amply supports ... [and] concluded that out-call work is not as safe as in-call work

[64] First, the prohibition prevents prostitutes from working in a fixed indoor location, which would be safer than working on the streets or meeting clients at different locations, especially given the current prohibition on hiring drivers or security guards. This, in turn, prevents prostitutes from having a regular clientele and from setting up indoor safeguards like receptionists, assistants, bodyguards and audio room monitoring, which would reduce risks Second, it interferes with provision of health checks and preventive health measures. Finally ... the bawdy-house prohibition prevents resort to safe houses, to which prostitutes working on the street can take clients. In Vancouver, for example, "Grandma's House" was established to support street workers in the Downtown Eastside, at about the same time as fears were growing that a serial killer was prowling the streets—fears which materialized in the notorious Robert Pickton. Street prostitutes ... were able to bring clients to Grandma's House. However, charges were laid under s. 210

[65] I conclude, therefore, that the bawdy-house provision negatively impacts the security of the person of prostitutes and engages s. 7 of the Charter.

(b) Section 212(1)(j): Living on the Avails of Prostitution

[66] Section 212(1)(j) criminalizes living on the avails of prostitution of another person, wholly or in part. While targeting parasitic relationships ... , it has a broad reach. As interpreted by the courts, it makes it a crime for anyone to supply a service to a prostitute, because she is a prostitute In effect, it prevents a prostitute from hiring bodyguards, drivers and receptionists. The application judge found that by denying prostitutes access to these security-enhancing safeguards, the law prevented them from taking steps to reduce the risks they face and negatively impacted their security of the person

[67] ... I conclude that s. 212(1)(j) negatively impacts security of the person and engages s. 7.

(c) Section 213(1)(c): Communicating in a Public Place

[68] Section 213(1)(c) prohibits communicating or attempting to communicate for the purpose of engaging in prostitution or obtaining the sexual services of a prostitute, in a public place or a place open to public view. The provision extends to conduct short of verbal communication by prohibiting stopping or attempting to stop any person for those purposes

[Chief Justice McLachlin accepted the application judge's findings that face-to-face communication was an "essential tool" in enhancing street prostitutes' safety and that, by depriving them of this tool, s 213(1)(c) "significantly increases the risks they face." Therefore, s 213(1)(c) engaged the applicants' interest in security of the person.]

(2) A Closer Look at Causation

[73] For the reasons discussed above, the application judge concluded—and I agree—that the impugned laws negatively impact and thus engage security of the person rights of prostitutes. However, the appellant Attorneys General contend that s. 7 is not engaged because there is an insufficient causal connection between the laws and the risks faced by prostitutes. First, they argue that the courts below erroneously measured causation by an attenuated standard. Second, they argue that it is the choice of the applicants to engage in prostitution, rather than the law, that is the causal source of the harms they face. These arguments cannot succeed.

(a) The Nature of the Required Causal Connection

[In a passage reproduced above, in Section I.B, McLachlin CJ held that the applicants had to establish a "sufficient causal connection" between the law and the effect on their s 7 interests.]

(b) Is the Causal Connection Negated by Choice or the Role of Third Parties?

[79] The Attorneys General ... argue that prostitutes choose to engage in an inherently risky activity. They can avoid both the risk inherent in prostitution and any increased risk that the laws impose simply by choosing not to engage in this activity. They say that choice—and not the law—is the real cause of their injury.

[85] ... I cannot accept the argument that it is not the law, but rather prostitutes' choice and third parties, that cause the risks complained of in this case.

[86] First, while some prostitutes may fit the description of persons who freely choose (or at one time chose) to engage in the risky economic activity of prostitution, many prostitutes have no meaningful choice but to do so. ... Whether because of financial desperation, drug addictions, mental illness, or compulsion from pimps, they often have little choice but to sell their bodies for money. Realistically, while they may retain some minimal power of choice ... these are not people who can be said to be truly "choosing" a risky line of business (see PHS, at paras. 97-101).

[87] Second, even accepting that there are those who freely choose to engage in prostitution, it must be remembered that prostitution—the exchange of sex for money—is not illegal. The causal question is whether the impugned laws make this lawful activity more dangerous. An analogy could be drawn to a law preventing a cyclist from wearing a helmet. That the cyclist chooses to ride her bike does not diminish the causal role of the law in making that activity riskier. ...

[89] It makes no difference that the conduct of pimps and johns is the immediate source of the harms suffered by prostitutes. The impugned laws deprive people engaged in a risky, but legal, activity of the means to protect themselves against those risks. The violence of a john does not diminish the role of the state in making a prostitute more vulnerable to that violence.

(3) Principles of Fundamental Justice

(a) The Applicable Norms

[96] The Motor Vehicle Reference recognized that the principles of fundamental justice are about the basic values underpinning our constitutional order. The s. 7 analysis is concerned with capturing inherently bad laws: that is, laws that take away life, liberty, or security of the person in a way that runs afoul of our basic values. The principles of fundamental justice are an attempt to capture those values. Over the years, the jurisprudence has given shape to the content of these basic values. In this case, we are concerned with the basic values against arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality.

[97] The concepts of arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality evolved organically as courts were faced with novel Charter claims.

[107] Although there is significant overlap between these three principles, and one law may properly be characterized by more than one of them, arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality remain three distinct principles that stem from what Hamish Stewart calls "failures of instrumental rationality"—the situation where the law is "inadequately connected to its objective or in some sense goes too far in seeking to attain it" (Fundamental Justice: Section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (2012), at p. 151). ...

[108] ... The first evil is addressed by the norms against arbitrariness and overbreadth, which target the absence of connection between the law's purpose and the s. 7 deprivation.

[109] The second evil lies in depriving a person of life, liberty or security of the person in a manner that is grossly disproportionate to the law's objective. The law's impact on the s. 7 interest is connected to the purpose, but the impact is so severe that it violates our fundamental norms.

[111] Arbitrariness asks whether there is a direct connection between the purpose of the law and the impugned effect on the individual, in the sense that the effect on the individual bears some relation to the law's purpose. There must be a rational connection between the object of the measure that causes the s. 7 deprivation, and the limits it imposes on life, liberty, or security of the person (Stewart, at p. 136). A law that imposes limits on these interests in a way that bears no connection to its objective arbitrarily impinges on those interests. Thus, in [Chaoulli v Quebec, 2005 SCC 35], the law was arbitrary because the prohibition of private health insurance was held to be unrelated to the objective of protecting the public health system.

[112] Overbreadth deals with a law that is so broad in scope that it includes some conduct that bears no relation to its purpose. In this sense, the law is arbitrary in part. At its core, overbreadth addresses the situation where there is no rational connection between the purposes of the law and some, but not all, of its impacts. ...

[113] Overbreadth allows courts to recognize that the law is rational in some cases, but that it overreaches in its effect in others. Despite this recognition of the scope of the law as a whole, the focus remains on the individual and whether the effect on the individual is rationally connected to the law's purpose. For example, where a law is drawn broadly and targets some conduct that bears no relation to its purpose in order to make enforcement more practical, there is still no connection between the purpose of the law and its effect on the specific individual. Enforcement practicality may be a justification for an overbroad law, to be analyzed under s. 1 of the Charter.

[117] ... [I]t may be helpful to think of overbreadth as a distinct principle of fundamental justice related to arbitrariness, in that the question for both is whether there is no connection between the effects of a law and its objective. Overbreadth simply allows the court to recognize that the lack of connection arises in a law that goes too far by sweeping conduct into its ambit that bears no relation to its objective.

[120] Gross disproportionality asks a different question from arbitrariness and overbreadth. It targets the second fundamental evil: the law's effects on life, liberty or security of the person are so grossly disproportionate to its purposes that they cannot rationally be supported. The rule against gross disproportionality only applies in extreme cases where the seriousness of the deprivation is totally out of sync with the objective of the measure. This idea is captured by the hypothetical of a law with the purpose of keeping the streets clean that imposes a sentence of life imprisonment for spitting on the sidewalk. The connection between the draconian impact of the law and its object must be entirely outside the norms accepted in our free and democratic society.

[121] Gross disproportionality under s. 7 of the Charter does not consider the beneficial effects of the law for society. It balances the negative effect on the individual against the purpose of the law, not against societal benefit that might flow from the law. ...

[122] Thus, gross disproportionality is not concerned with the number of people who experience grossly disproportionate effects; a grossly disproportionate effect on one person is sufficient to violate the norm.

[123] All three principles—arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality—compare the rights infringement caused by the law with the objective of the law, not with the law's effectiveness. That is, they do not look to how well the law achieves its object, or to how much of the population the law benefits. They do not consider ancillary benefits to the general population. Furthermore, none of the principles measure the percentage of the population that is negatively impacted. The analysis is qualitative, not quantitative. The question under s. 7 is whether anyone's life, liberty or security of the person has been denied by a law that is inherently bad; a grossly disproportionate, overbroad, or arbitrary effect on one person is sufficient to establish a breach of s. 7.

(4) Do the Impugned Laws Respect the Principles of Fundamental Justice?

(a) Section 210: The Bawdy-House Prohibition

(i) The Object of the Provision

[Chief Justice McLachlin reviewed the legislative history and the case law concerning the bawdy-house offence and concluded that its purpose was not to deter prostitution as such but "to combat neighbourhood disruption or disorder and to safeguard public health and safety" (at para 132).]

(ii) Compliance with the Principles of Fundamental Justice

[134] I agree with [the courts below] that the negative impact of the bawdy-house prohibition on the applicants' security of the person is grossly disproportionate to its objective. ... The application judge found on the evidence that moving to a bawdy-house would improve prostitutes' safety by providing "the safety benefits of proximity to others, familiarity with surroundings, security staff, closed-circuit television and other such monitoring that a permanent indoor location can facilitate" (para. 427). Balancing this against the evidence demonstrating that "complaints about nuisance arising from indoor prostitution establishments are rare" (ibid.), she found that the harmful impact of the provision was grossly disproportionate to its purpose.

[135] The Court of Appeal ... concluded that the evidence supported the application judge's findings on gross disproportionality—in particular, the evidence of the high homicide rate among prostitutes, with the overwhelming number of victims being street prostitutes. ...

[136] ... The harms identified by the courts below are grossly disproportionate to the deterrence of community disruption that is the object of the law. Parliament has the power to regulate against nuisances, but not at the cost of the health, safety and lives of prostitutes. A law that prevents street prostitutes from resorting to a safe haven such as Grandma's House while a suspected serial killer prowls the streets, is a law that has lost sight of its purpose.

(b) Section 212(1)(j): Living on the Avails of Prostitution

(i) The Object of the Provision

[Chief Justice McLachlin rejected the government's argument that "the true objective of s. 212(1)(j) was to target the commercialization of prostitution, and to promote the values of dignity and equality" (at para 138) and held that "the purpose of this provision is to target pimps and the parasitic, exploitative conduct in which they engage" (at para 137).]

(ii) Compliance with the Principles of Fundamental Justice

[139] The courts below concluded that the living on the avails provision is overbroad insofar as it captures a number of non-exploitative relationships which are not connected to the law's purpose. The courts below also concluded that the provision's negative effect on the security and safety of prostitutes is grossly disproportionate to its objective of protecting prostitutes from harm.

[140] I agree with the courts below that the living on the avails provision is overbroad.

[141] The provision has been judicially restricted to those who provide a service or good to a prostitute because she is a prostitute, thus excluding grocers and doctors It also has been held to require that exploitation be proven in the case of a person who lives with the prostitute, in order to exclude people in legitimate domestic relationships with a prostitute These refinements render the prohibition narrower than its words might suggest.

[142] ... The law punishes everyone who lives on the avails of prostitution without distinguishing between those who exploit prostitutes (for example, controlling and abusive pimps) and those who could increase the safety and security of prostitutes (for example, legitimate drivers, managers, or bodyguards). It also includes anyone involved in business with a prostitute, such as accountants or receptionists. In these ways, the law includes some conduct that bears no relation to its purpose of preventing the exploitation of prostitutes. The living on the avails provision is therefore overbroad.

[143] The appellant Attorneys General argue that the line between an exploitative pimp and a prostitute's legitimate driver, manager or bodyguard, blurs in the real world. A relationship that begins on a non-exploitative footing may become exploitative over time. If the provision were tailored more narrowly—for example, by reading in "in circumstances of exploitation" as the Court of Appeal did—evidentiary difficulties may lead to exploiters escaping liability. Relationships of exploitation often involve intimidation and manipulation of the kind that make it very difficult for a prostitute to testify. For these reasons, the Attorneys General argue, the provision must be drawn broadly in order to effectively capture those it targets.

[144] This argument is more appropriately addressed under the s. 1 analysis. As stated above, if a law captures conduct that bears no relation to its purpose, the law is overbroad under s. 7; enforcement practicality is one way the government may justify an overbroad law under s. 1 of the Charter.

[145] Having found that the prohibition on living on the avails of prostitution is overbroad, I find it unnecessary to consider whether it is also grossly disproportionate to its object of protecting prostitutes from exploitative relationships.

(c) Section 213 Provision (1)(c): Communicating in Public for the Purposes of Prostitution

(i) The Object of the Provision

[147] It is clear that the purpose of the communicating provision is not to eliminate street prostitution for its own sake, but to take prostitution "off the streets and out of public view" in order to prevent the nuisances that street prostitution can cause. ...

(ii) Compliance with the Principles of Fundamental Justice

[148] The application judge concluded that the harm imposed by the prohibition on communicating in public was grossly disproportionate to the provision's object of removing the nuisance of prostitution from the streets. This was based on evidence that she found established that the ability to screen clients was an "essential tool" to avoiding violent or drunken clients (application decision, at para. 432).

D. Are the Infringements Justified Under Section 1 of the Charter?

[161] The appellant Attorneys General have not seriously argued that the laws, if found to infringe s. 7, can be justified under s. 1 of the Charter. ... I therefore find it unnecessary to engage in a full s. 1 analysis for each of the impugned provisions. However, some of their arguments under s. 7 of the Charter are properly addressed at this stage of the analysis.

[162] In particular, the Attorneys General attempt to justify the living on the avails provision on the basis that it must be drafted broadly in order to capture all exploitative relationships, which can be difficult to identify. However, the law not only catches drivers and bodyguards, who may actually be pimps, but it also catches clearly non-exploitative relationships, such as receptionists or accountants who work with prostitutes. The law is therefore not minimally impairing. Nor, at the final stage of the s. 1 inquiry, is the law's effect of preventing prostitutes from taking measures that would increase their safety, and possibly save their lives, outweighed by the law's positive effect of protecting prostitutes from exploitative relationships.

[163] The Attorneys General have not raised any other arguments distinct from those considered under s. 7. I therefore find that the impugned laws are not saved by s. 1 of the Charter.

V. Result and Remedy

[164] I would dismiss the appeals and allow the cross-appeal. Sections 210, 212(1)(j) and 213(1)(c) are declared to be inconsistent with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and hence are void.

[The Court suspended the declaration of invalidity for one year.]

Appeals dismissed and cross appeal allowed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The principles of fundamental justice invoked in Bedford (and subsequently in Carter, immediately below)—the norms against arbitrary, overbroad, and grossly disproportionate laws—are all concerned with the relationship between the legislature's purpose and the impact of the law on the interests protected by s 7. Thus, to apply these norms, it seems that a court should compare the effectiveness of the law in achieving its purpose with the overall impact of the law on everyone's life, liberty, and security of the person. But in Bedford and Carter, the Court held that these norms were to be applied individualistically; as the Court said in Bedford (at para 123), these principles compare the rights infringement caused by the law with the objective of the law, not with the law's effectiveness. ... The question ... is whether anyone's life, liberty or security of the person has been denied by a law that is inherently bad.

How can a court decide whether a law is "arbitrary" in the sense articulated in these cases without considering its "effectiveness"? How can a court determine the proportionality between a law's purpose and its impact on the s 7 interests by looking at its effect on one person in isolation from its effectiveness? Should these comparisons be made under s 1 of the Charter instead? For further discussion of these questions, see Hamish Stewart, "Bedford and the Structure of Section 7" (2015) 60 McGill LJ 575.

2. Parliament responded to Bedford by enacting the Protection of Communities and Exploited Persons Act, SC 2014, c 25. This statute begins with a lengthy preamble expressing Parliament's concern about matters such as "the exploitation that is inherent in prostitution," "the objectification of the human body and the commodification of sexual activity," and the "disproportionate impact" of prostitution on women and children. In substance, the statute amends the Criminal Code by modifying s 213, repealing s 212 in its entirety, and enacting several new offences relating to "obtaining sexual services for consideration": see ss 286.1 through 286.5 of the Criminal Code. Under these provisions, it is an offence to obtain sexual services for consideration, to communicate for that purpose, to advertise such services, or to obtain a material benefit from such services. However, s 286.5(2) states that "[n]o person shall be prosecuted" for these new offences on any theory of accessory liability—for example, aiding and abetting—or conspiracy where "the offence relates to the offering or provision of their own sexual services." The new material benefit offence in s 286.2(1) is subject to a number of exemptions in s 286.2(4), such as obtaining benefits from a "legitimate living arrangement" or a "moral and legal obligation." But these exemptions are themselves restricted by s 286.2(5), which states (among other limits) that the material benefit offence continues to apply where the benefit is received "in the context of a commercial enterprise that offers sexual services for consideration." In effect, these new provisions of the Criminal Code attempt to criminalize the purchase, but not the sale, of sexual services; they also attempt to remedy the overbreadth of the old law, but at the same time attempt to discourage the commercialization of sex work. In light of Bedford, how would you go about constructing arguments for and against the constitutional validity of this new criminal law regime for sex work? See R v NS, 2021 ONSC 1628.

Carter v Canada (AG)

THE COURT (McLachlin CJ and LeBel, Abella, Rothstein, Cromwell, Moldaver, Karakatsanis, Wagner, and Gascon JJ):

[1] It is a crime in Canada to assist another person in ending her own life. As a result, people who are grievously and irremediably ill cannot seek a physician's assistance in dying and may be condemned to a life of severe and intolerable suffering. A person facing this prospect has two options: she can take her own life prematurely, often by violent or dangerous means, or she can suffer until she dies from natural causes. The choice is cruel.

[2] The question on this appeal is whether the criminal prohibition that puts a person to this choice violates her Charter rights to life, liberty and security of the person (s. 7) and to equal treatment by and under the law (s. 15). This is a question that asks us to balance competing values of great importance. On the one hand stands the autonomy and dignity of a competent adult who seeks death as a response to a grievous and irremediable medical condition. On the other stands the sanctity of life and the need to protect the vulnerable.

[3] The trial judge found that the prohibition violates the s. 7 rights of competent adults who are suffering intolerably as a result of a grievous and irremediable medical condition. She concluded that this infringement is not justified under s. 1 of the Charter. We agree. The trial judge's findings were based on an exhaustive review of the extensive record before her. The evidence supports her conclusion that the violation of the right to life, liberty and security of the person guaranteed by s. 7 of the Charter is severe. It also supports her finding that a properly administered regulatory regime is capable of protecting the vulnerable from abuse or error.

[4] We conclude that the prohibition on physician-assisted dying is void insofar as it deprives a competent adult of such assistance where (1) the person affected clearly consents to the termination of life; and (2) the person has a grievous and irremediable medical condition (including an illness, disease or disability) that causes enduring suffering that is intolerable to the individual in the circumstances of his or her condition. We therefore allow the appeal.

II. Background

[5] In Canada, aiding or abetting a person to commit suicide is a criminal offence: see s. 241(b) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46. This means that a person cannot seek a physician-assisted death. Twenty-one years ago, this Court upheld this blanket prohibition on assisted suicide by a slim majority: Rodriguez v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 519. ...

[6] Despite the Court's decision in Rodriguez, the debate over physician-assisted dying continued. Between 1991 and 2010, the House of Commons and its committees debated no less than six private member's bills seeking to decriminalize assisted suicide. None was passed. ...

[7] More recent reports have come down in favour of reform. In 2011, the Royal Society of Canada published a report on end-of-life decision-making and recommended that the Criminal Code be modified to permit assistance in dying in some circumstances. The Quebec National Assembly's Select Committee on Dying with Dignity issued a report in 2012, recommending amendments to legislation to recognize medical aid in dying as appropriate end-of-life care (now codified in An Act respecting end-of-life care, CQLR, c. S-32.0001).

[8] The legislative landscape on the issue of physician-assisted death has changed in the two decades since Rodriguez. In 1993 Sopinka J. noted that no other Western democracy expressly permitted assistance in dying. By 2010, however, eight jurisdictions permitted some form of assisted dying: the Netherlands, Belgium, Luxembourg, Switzerland, Oregon, Washington, Montana and Colombia. ... Together, these regimes have produced a body of evidence about the practical and legal workings of physician-assisted death and the efficacy of safeguards for the vulnerable.

[9] Nevertheless, physician-assisted dying remains a criminal offence in most Western countries, and a number of courts have upheld the prohibition on such assistance in the face of constitutional and human rights challenges . . . [Here the Court cited the majority decision of the Supreme Court of the United Kingdom in R (on the application of Nicklinson) v Ministry of Justice, [2014] UKSC 38, [2014] 3 All ER 843.]

dignity, and that the legalization of physician-assisted suicide will protect them by establishing stronger safeguards and oversight for end-of-life medical care.

[11] The impetus for this case arose in 2009, when Gloria Taylor was diagnosed with a fatal neurodegenerative disease, amyotrophic lateral sclerosis (or ALS), which causes progressive muscle weakness. ALS patients first lose the ability to use their hands and feet, then the ability to walk, chew, swallow, speak and, eventually, breathe. Like Sue Rodriguez before her, Gloria Taylor did "not want to die slowly, piece by piece" or "wracked with pain," and brought a claim before the British Columbia Supreme Court challenging the constitutionality of the Criminal Code provisions that prohibit assistance in dying, specifically ss. 14, 21, 22, 222 and 241. She was joined in her claim by Lee Carter and Hollis Johnson, who had assisted Ms. Carter's mother, Kathleen ("Kay") Carter, in achieving her goal of dying with dignity ... ; Dr. William Shoichet, a physician from British Columbia ... ; and the British Columbia Civil Liberties Association

V. Issues on Appeal

[40] ... The appellants advance two claims: (1) that the prohibition on physician-assisted dying deprives competent adults, who suffer a grievous and irremediable medical condition that causes the person to endure physical or psychological suffering that is intolerable to that person, of their right to life, liberty and security of the person under s. 7 of the Charter, and (2) that the prohibition deprives adults who are physically disabled of their right to equal treatment under s. 15 of the Charter.

[The Court reviewed the proceedings in the courts below. The trial judge found that the prohibition against physician-assisted dying violated the s 7 rights of competent adults who are suffering intolerably as a result of a grievous and irremediable medical condition and concluded that this infringement is not justified under s 1 of the Charter. She also found that the prohibition unjustifiably infringed s 15 of the Charter. She declared the prohibition unconstitutional, granted a one-year suspension of invalidity, and provided Taylor with a constitutional exemption. The majority of the British Columbia Court of Appeal allowed the government's appeal on the ground that the trial judge was bound to follow the Supreme Court of Canada's decision in Rodriguez.]

VI. Was the Trial Judge Bound by Rodriguez?

[The Court, applying its approach to precedent from Bedford, held that the trial judge was not bound by Rodriguez.]

[44] The doctrine that lower courts must follow the decisions of higher courts is fundamental to our legal system. It provides certainty while permitting the orderly development of the law in incremental steps. However, stare decisis is not a strait-jacket that condemns the law to stasis. Trial courts may reconsider settled rulings of higher courts in two situations: (1) where a new legal issue is raised; and (2) where there is a change in the circumstances or evidence that "fundamentally shifts the parameters of the debate" (Canada (Attorney General) v. Bedford, 2013 SCC 72, [2013] 3 S.C.R. 1101, at para. 42).

[45] Both conditions were met in this case. The trial judge explained her decision to revisit Rodriguez by noting the changes in both the legal framework for s. 7 and the evidence on controlling the risk of abuse associated with assisted suicide.

[46] The argument before the trial judge involved a different legal conception of s. 7 than that prevailing when Rodriguez was decided. In particular, the law relating to the principles of overbreadth and gross disproportionality had materially advanced since Rodriguez. The majority of this Court in Rodriguez acknowledged the argument that the impugned laws were “over-inclusive” when discussing the principles of fundamental justice (see p. 590). However, it did not apply the principle of overbreadth as it is currently understood, but instead asked whether the prohibition was “arbitrary or unfair in that it is unrelated to the state’s interest in protecting the vulnerable, and that it lacks a foundation in the legal tradition and societal beliefs which are said to be represented by the prohibition” (p. 595). By contrast, the law on overbreadth, now explicitly recognized as a principle of fundamental justice, asks whether the law interferes with some conduct that has no connection to the law’s objectives (Bedford, at para. 101). This different question may lead to a different answer. The majority’s consideration of overbreadth under s. 1 suffers from the same defect: see Rodriguez, at p. 614. Finally, the majority in Rodriguez did not consider whether the prohibition was grossly disproportionate.

[47] The matrix of legislative and social facts in this case also differed from the evidence before the Court in Rodriguez. The majority in Rodriguez relied on evidence of (1) the widespread acceptance of a moral or ethical distinction between passive and active euthanasia (pp. 605-7); (2) the lack of any “halfway measure” that could protect the vulnerable (pp. 613-14); and (3) the “substantial consensus” in Western countries that a blanket prohibition is necessary to protect against the slippery slope (pp. 601-6 and 613). The record before the trial judge in this case contained evidence that, if accepted, was capable of undermining each of these conclusions

VIII. Section 7

A. Does the Law Infringe the Right to Life, Liberty and Security of the Person?

(1) Life

[57] The trial judge found that the prohibition on physician-assisted dying had the effect of forcing some individuals to take their own lives prematurely, for fear that they would be incapable of doing so when they reached the point where suffering was intolerable. On that basis, she found that the right to life was engaged.

[58] We see no basis for interfering with the trial judge’s conclusion on this point. ...

[59] The appellants and a number of the interveners urge us to adopt a broader, qualitative approach to the right to life. Some argue that the right to life is not restricted to the preservation of life, but protects quality of life and therefore a right to die with dignity. Others argue that the right to life protects personal autonomy and fundamental notions of self-determination and dignity, and therefore includes the right to determine whether to take one’s own life.

[61] The trial judge, on the other hand, rejected the “qualitative” approach to the right to life. She concluded that the right to life is only engaged when there is a threat of death as a result of government action or laws. In her words, the right to life is limited to a “right not to die” (para. 1322 (emphasis in original)).

[62] This Court has most recently invoked the right to life in Chaoulli v. Quebec (Attorney General), 2005 SCC 35, [2005] 1 S.C.R. 791, where evidence showed that the lack of timely health care could result in death ... and in PHS, where the clients of Insite were deprived of potentially lifesaving medical care ... In each case, the right was only engaged by the threat of death. In short, the case law suggests that the right to life is engaged where the law or state action imposes death or an increased risk of death on a person, either directly or indirectly. Conversely, concerns about autonomy and quality of life have traditionally been treated as liberty and security rights. We see no reason to alter that approach in this case.

[63] This said, we do not agree that the existential formulation of the right to life requires an absolute prohibition on assistance in dying, or that individuals cannot "waive" their right to life. This would create a "duty to live," rather than a "right to life," and would call into question the legality of any consent to the withdrawal or refusal of lifesaving or life-sustaining treatment. The sanctity of life is one of our most fundamental societal values. Section 7 is rooted in a profound respect for the value of human life. But s. 7 also encompasses life, liberty and security of the person during the passage to death. It is for this reason that the sanctity of life "is no longer seen to require that all human life be preserved at all costs" (Rodriguez, at p. 595, per Sopinka J.). And it is for this reason that the law has come to recognize that, in certain circumstances, an individual's choice about the end of her life is entitled to respect. It is to this fundamental choice that we now turn.

(2) Liberty and Security of the Person

[64] Underlying both of these rights is a concern for the protection of individual autonomy and dignity. Liberty protects "the right to make fundamental personal choices free from state interference": Blencoe v. British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), 2000 SCC 44, [2000] 2 S.C.R. 307, at para. 54. Security of the person encompasses "a notion of personal autonomy involving ... control over one's bodily integrity free from state interference" (Rodriguez, at pp. 587-88 per Sopinka J., referring to R. v. Morgentaler, [1988] 1 S.C.R. 30) and it is engaged by state interference with an individual's physical or psychological integrity, including any state action that causes physical or serious psychological suffering [reference was made to New Brunswick (Minister of Health and Community Services) v G (J), [1999] 3 SCR 46; Blencoe; and Chaoulli]. While liberty and security of the person are distinct interests, for the purpose of this appeal they may be considered together.

[65] The trial judge concluded that the prohibition on assisted dying limited Ms. Taylor's s. 7 right to liberty and security of the person, by interfering with "fundamentally important and personal medical decision-making" (para. 1302), imposing pain and psychological stress and depriving her of control over her bodily integrity (paras. 1293-94). She found that the prohibition left people like Ms. Taylor to suffer physical or psychological pain and imposed stress due to the unavailability of physician-assisted dying, impinging on her security of the person. She further noted that seriously and irremediably ill persons were "denied the opportunity to make a choice that may be very important to their sense of dignity and personal integrity" and that is "consistent with their lifelong values and that reflects their life's experience" (para. 1326).

[66] We agree with the trial judge. An individual's response to a grievous and irremediable medical condition is a matter critical to their dignity and autonomy. The law allows people in this situation to request palliative sedation, refuse artificial nutrition and hydration, or request the removal of life-sustaining medical equipment, but denies them the right to request a physician's assistance in dying. This interferes with their ability to make decisions concerning their bodily integrity and medical care and thus trenches on liberty. And, by leaving people like Ms. Taylor to endure intolerable suffering, it impinges on their security of the person.

B. The Principles of Fundamental Justice

[71] Section 7 does not promise that the state will never interfere with a person's life, liberty or security of the person—laws do this all the time—but rather that the state will not do so in a way that violates the principles of fundamental justice.

[72] Section 7 does not catalogue the principles of fundamental justice to which it refers. Over the course of 32 years of Charter adjudication, this Court has worked to define the minimum constitutional requirements that a law that trenches on life, liberty, or security of the person must meet (Bedford, at para. 94). While the Court has recognized a number of principles of fundamental justice, three have emerged as central in the recent s. 7 jurisprudence: laws that impinge on life, liberty or security of the person must not be arbitrary, overbroad, or have consequences that are grossly disproportionate to their object.

[73] Each of these potential vices involves comparison with the object of the law that is challenged (Bedford, at para. 123). The first step is therefore to identify the object of the prohibition on assisted dying.

[74] The trial judge, relying on Rodriguez, concluded that the object of the prohibition was to protect vulnerable persons from being induced to commit suicide at a time of weakness (para. 1190). All the parties except Canada accept this formulation of the object.

[75] Canada agrees that the prohibition is intended to protect the vulnerable, but argues that the object of the prohibition should also be defined more broadly as simply "the preservation of life" . . . We cannot accept this submission.

[76] First, it is incorrect to say that the majority in Rodriguez adopted "the preservation of life" as the object of the prohibition on assisted dying. Justice Sopinka refers to the preservation of life when discussing the objectives of s. 241(b) (pp. 590, 614). However, he later clarifies this comment, stating that "[s]ection 241(b) has as its purpose the protection of the vulnerable who might be induced in moments of weakness to commit suicide" (p. 595). Sopinka J. then goes on to note that this purpose is "grounded in the state interest in protecting life and reflects the policy of the state that human life should not be depreciated by allowing life to be taken" (ibid.). His remarks about the "preservation of life" in Rodriguez are best understood as a reference to an animating social value rather than as a description of the specific object of the prohibition.

[77] Second, defining the object of the prohibition on physician-assisted dying as the preservation of life has the potential to short-circuit the analysis. In RJR-MacDonald, this Court warned against stating the object of a law "too broadly" in the s. 1 analysis, lest the resulting objective immunize the law from challenge under the Charter (para. 144). The same applies to assessing whether the principles of fundamental justice are breached under s. 7. If the object of the prohibition is stated broadly as "the preservation of life," it becomes difficult to say that the means used to further it are overbroad or grossly disproportionate. The outcome is to this extent foreordained.

[78] Finally, the jurisprudence requires the object of the impugned law to be defined precisely for the purposes of s. 7. In Bedford, Canada argued that bawdy-house prohibition in s. 210 of the Code should be defined broadly as to "deter prostitution" for the purposes of s. 7 (para. 131). This Court rejected this argument, holding that the object of the prohibition should be confined to measures directly targeted by the law (para. 132). That reasoning applies with equal force in this case. Section 241(b) is not directed at preserving life, or even at preventing suicide—attempted suicide is no longer a crime. Yet Canada asks us to posit that the object of the prohibition is to preserve life, whatever the circumstances. This formulation goes beyond the ambit of the provision itself. The direct target of the measure is the narrow goal of preventing vulnerable persons from being induced to commit suicide at a time of weakness.

(1) Arbitrariness

[83] The principle of fundamental justice that forbids arbitrariness targets the situation where there is no rational connection between the object of the law and the limit it imposes on life, liberty or security of the person: Bedford, at para. 111. An arbitrary law is one that is not capable of fulfilling its objectives. It exacts a constitutional price in terms of rights, without furthering the public good that is said to be the object of the law.

[84] The object of the prohibition on physician-assisted dying is to protect the vulnerable from ending their life in times of weakness. A total ban on assisted suicide clearly helps achieve this object. Therefore, individuals' rights are not limited arbitrarily.

(2) Overbreadth

[85] The overbreadth inquiry asks whether a law that takes away rights in a way that generally supports the object of the law goes too far by denying the rights of some individuals in a way that bears no relation to the object: Bedford, at paras. 101 and 112-13. Like the other principles of fundamental justice under s. 7, overbreadth is not concerned with competing social interests or ancillary benefits to the general population. A law that is drawn broadly to target conduct that bears no relation to its purpose "in order to make enforcement more practical" may therefore be overbroad (see Bedford, at para. 113). The question is not whether Parliament has chosen the least restrictive means, but whether the chosen means infringe life, liberty or security of the person in a way that has no connection with the mischief contemplated by the legislature. The focus is not on broad social impacts, but on the impact of the measure on the individuals whose life, liberty or security of the person is trammelled.

[86] Applying this approach, we conclude that the prohibition on assisted dying is overbroad. The object of the law, as discussed, is to protect vulnerable persons from being induced to commit suicide at a moment of weakness. Canada conceded at trial that the law catches people outside this class: "It is recognized that not every person who wishes to commit suicide is vulnerable, and that there may be people with disabilities who have a considered, rational and persistent wish to end their own lives" (trial reasons, at para. 1136). The trial judge accepted that Ms. Taylor was such a person—competent, fully-informed, and free from coercion or duress (para. 16). It follows that the limitation on their rights is in at least some cases not connected to the objective of protecting vulnerable persons. The blanket prohibition sweeps conduct into its ambit that is unrelated to the law's objective.

[87] Canada argues that it is difficult to conclusively identify the "vulnerable," and that therefore it cannot be said that the prohibition is overbroad. Indeed, Canada asserts, "every person is potentially vulnerable" from a legislative perspective

[88] We do not agree. The situation is analogous to that in Bedford, where this Court concluded that the prohibition on living on the avails of prostitution in

s. 212(1)(j) of the Criminal Code was overbroad. The law in that case punished everyone who earned a living through a relationship with a prostitute, without distinguishing between those who would assist and protect them and those who would be at least potentially exploitative of them. Canada there as here argued that the line between exploitative and non-exploitative relationships was blurry, and that, as a result, the provision had to be drawn broadly to capture its targets. The Court concluded that that argument is more appropriately addressed under s. 1

(3) Gross Disproportionality

[The Court found it "unnecessary to decide whether the prohibition also violates the principle against gross disproportionality, in light of our conclusion that it is overbroad" (at para 90).]

[94] In order to justify the infringement of the appellants' s. 7 rights under s. 1 of the Charter, Canada must show that the law has a pressing and substantial object and that the means chosen are proportional to that object. ...

[95] It is difficult to justify a s. 7 violation The rights protected by s. 7 are fundamental, and "not easily overridden by competing social interests" (Charkaoui, at para. 66). And it is hard to justify a law that runs afoul of the principles of fundamental justice and is thus inherently flawed (Bedford, at para. 96). However, in some situations the state may be able to show that the public good—a matter not considered under s. 7, which looks only at the impact on the rights claimants—justifies depriving an individual of life, liberty or security of the person under s. 1 of the Charter. More particularly, in cases such as this where the competing societal interests are themselves protected under the Charter, a restriction on s. 7 rights may in the end be found to be proportionate to its objective.

[96] Here, the limit is prescribed by law, and the appellant concedes that the law has a pressing and substantial objective. The question is whether the government has demonstrated that the prohibition is proportionate.

[97] At this stage of the analysis, the courts must accord the legislature a measure of deference. Proportionality does not require perfection Section 1 only requires that the limits be "reasonable." This Court has emphasized that there may be a number of possible solutions to a particular social problem, and suggested that a "complex regulatory response" to a social ill will garner a high degree of deference [Alberta v Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony, 2009 SCC 37], at para. 37).

[98] On the one hand, as the trial judge noted, physician-assisted death involves complex issues of social policy and a number of competing societal values. Parliament faces a difficult task in addressing this issue; it must weigh and balance the perspective of those who might be at risk in a permissive regime against that of those who seek assistance in dying. It follows that a high degree of deference is owed to Parliament's decision to impose an absolute prohibition on assisted death. On the other hand, the trial judge also found—and we agree—that the absolute prohibition could not be described as a "complex regulatory response" (para. 1180). The degree of deference owed to Parliament, while high, is accordingly reduced.

(1) Rational Connection

[100] We agree with Finch C.J.B.C. in the Court of Appeal that, where an activity poses certain risks, prohibition of the activity in question is a rational method of curtailing the risks . . . We therefore conclude that there is a rational connection between the prohibition and its objective.

[101] The appellants argue that the absolute nature of the prohibition is not logically connected to the object of the provision. This is another way of saying that the prohibition goes too far. In our view, this argument is better dealt with in the inquiry into minimal impairment. It is clearly rational to conclude that a law that bars all persons from accessing assistance in suicide will protect the vulnerable from being induced to commit suicide at a time of weakness. The means here are logically connected with the objective.

(2) Minimal Impairment

[102] At this stage of the analysis, the question is whether the limit on the right is reasonably tailored to the objective. The inquiry into minimal impairment asks "whether there are less harmful means of achieving the legislative goal" (Hutterian Brethren, at para. 53). The burden is on the government to show the absence of less drastic means of achieving the objective "in a real and substantial manner" (ibid., at para. 55). The analysis at this stage is meant to ensure that the deprivation of Charter rights is confined to what is reasonably necessary to achieve the state's object.

[103] The question in this case comes down to whether the absolute prohibition on physician-assisted dying, with its heavy impact on the claimants' 7 rights to life, liberty and security of the person, is the least drastic means of achieving the legislative objective. It was the task of the trial judge to determine whether a regime less restrictive of life, liberty and security of the person could address the risks associated with physician-assisted dying, or whether Canada was right to say that the risks could not adequately be addressed through the use of safeguards.

[104] This question lies at the heart of this case and was the focus of much of the evidence at trial. In assessing minimal impairment, the trial judge heard evidence from scientists, medical practitioners, and others who were familiar with end-of-life decision-making in Canada and abroad. She also heard extensive evidence from each of the jurisdictions where physician-assisted dying is legal or regulated. In the trial judge's view, an absolute prohibition would have been necessary if the evidence showed that physicians were unable to reliably assess competence, voluntariness, and non-ambivalence in patients; that physicians fail to understand or apply the informed consent requirement for medical treatment; or if the evidence from permissive jurisdictions showed abuse of patients, carelessness, callousness, or a slippery slope, leading to the casual termination of life

[105] The trial judge, however, expressly rejected these possibilities. After reviewing the evidence, she concluded that a permissive regime with properly designed and administered safeguards was capable of protecting vulnerable people from abuse and error. While there are risks, to be sure, a carefully designed and managed system is capable of adequately addressing them:

My review of the evidence in this section, and in the preceding section on the experience in permissive jurisdictions, leads me to conclude that the risks inherent in permitting physician-assisted death can be identified and very substantially minimized through a carefully-designed system imposing stringent limits that are scrupulously monitored and enforced. [para. 883]

[106] The trial judge found that it was feasible for properly qualified and experienced physicians to reliably assess patient competence and voluntariness, and that coercion, undue influence, and ambivalence could all be reliably assessed as part of that process In reaching this conclusion, she particularly relied on the evidence on the application of the informed consent standard in other medical decision-making in Canada, including end-of-life decision-making . . . She concluded that it would be possible for physicians to apply the informed consent standard to patients who seek assistance in dying, adding the caution that physicians should ensure that patients are properly informed of their diagnosis and prognosis and the range of available options for medical care, including palliative care interventions aimed at reducing pain and avoiding the loss of personal dignity . . .

[107] As to the risk to vulnerable populations (such as the elderly and disabled), the trial judge found that there was no evidence from permissive jurisdictions that people with disabilities are at heightened risk of accessing physician-assisted dying . . . She thus rejected the contention that unconscious bias by physicians would undermine the assessment process . . . The trial judge found there was no evidence of inordinate impact on socially vulnerable populations in the permissive jurisdictions, and that in some cases palliative care actually improved post-legalization . . . She also found that while the evidence suggested that the law had both negative and positive impacts on physicians, it did support the conclusion that physicians were better able to provide overall end-of-life treatment once assisted death was legalized . . . Finally, she found no compelling evidence that a permissive regime in Canada would result in a “practical slippery slope” (para. 1241).

[108] Canada says that the trial judge made a palpable and overriding error in concluding that safeguards would minimize the risk associated with assisted dying. Canada argues that the trial judge’s conclusion that the level of risk was acceptable flies in the face of her acknowledgment that some of the evidence on safeguards was weak, and that there was evidence of a lack of compliance with safeguards in permissive jurisdictions. Canada also says the trial judge erred by relying on cultural differences between Canada and other countries in finding that problems experienced elsewhere were not likely to occur in Canada.

[109] We cannot accede to Canada’s submission. In Bedford, this Court affirmed that a trial judge’s findings on social and legislative facts are entitled to the same degree of deference as any other factual findings (para. 48). In our view, Canada has not established that the trial judge’s conclusion on this point is unsupported, arbitrary, insufficiently precise or otherwise in error. At most, Canada’s criticisms amount to “pointing out conflicting evidence,” which is not sufficient to establish a palpable and overriding error . . . We see no reason to reject the conclusions drawn by the trial judge. They were reasonable and open to her on the record.

[118] Canada also argues that the permissive regulatory regime accepted by the trial judge “accepts too much risk,” and that its effectiveness is “speculative” . . . In effect, Canada argues that a blanket prohibition should be upheld unless the appellants can demonstrate that an alternative approach eliminates all risk. This effectively reverses the onus under s. 1, requiring the claimant whose rights are infringed to prove less invasive ways of achieving the prohibition’s object. The burden of establishing minimal impairment is on the government.

[119] The trial judge found that Canada had not discharged this burden. The evidence, she concluded, did not support the contention that a blanket prohibition was necessary in order to substantially meet the government’s objectives. We agree. A theoretical or speculative fear cannot justify an absolute prohibition. As Deschamps J. stated in Chaoulli, at para. 68, the claimant “[does] not have the burden of disproving every fear or every threat,” nor can the government meet its burden simply by asserting an adverse impact on the public. Justification under s. 1 is a process of demonstration, not intuition or automatic deference to the government's assertion of risk ([RJR-MacDonald Inc v Canada (AG), [1995] 3 SCR 199, 1995 CanLII 64], at para. 128).

[120] Finally, it is argued that without an absolute prohibition on assisted dying, Canada will descend the slippery slope into euthanasia and condoned murder. Anecdotal examples of controversial cases abroad were cited in support of this argument, only to be countered by anecdotal examples of systems that work well. The resolution of the issue before us fails to be resolved not by competing anecdotes, but by the evidence. The trial judge, after an exhaustive review of the evidence, rejected the argument that adoption of a regulatory regime would initiate a descent down a slippery slope into homicide. We should not lightly assume that the regulatory regime will function defectively, nor should we assume that other criminal sanctions against the taking of lives will prove impotent against abuse.

[121] We find no error in the trial judge's analysis of minimal impairment. We therefore conclude that the absolute prohibition is not minimally impairing.

(3) Deleterious Effects and Salutary Benefits

[122] This stage of the Oakes analysis weighs the impact of the law on protected rights against the beneficial effect of the law in terms of the greater public good. Given our conclusion that the law is not minimally impairing, it is not necessary to go on to this step.

[123] We conclude that s. 241(b) and s. 14 of the Criminal Code are not saved by s. 1 of the Charter.

XI. Remedy

[The Court first dealt with the issue whether, as suggested by the BC Court of Appeal, free-standing constitutional exemptions for those whose rights were violated would be a more appropriate remedy than a declaration of invalidity.]

[125] In our view, this is not a proper case for a constitutional exemption. We have found that the prohibition infringes the claimants' s. 7 rights. Parliament must be given the opportunity to craft an appropriate remedy. The concerns raised in [R v Ferguson, 2008 SCC 6] about stand-alone constitutional exemptions are equally applicable here: issuing such an exemption would create uncertainty, undermine the rule of law, and usurp Parliament's role. Complex regulatory regimes are better created by Parliament than by the courts.

[The Court went on to hold that the appropriate remedy was a declaration of invalidity and that it should be suspended for 12 months. The appellants' request to create a mechanism for exemptions during the period of invalidity was refused.]

[130] A number of the interveners asked the Court to account for physicians' freedom of conscience and religion when crafting the remedy in this case. ...

[132] In our view, nothing in the declaration of invalidity which we propose to issue would compel physicians to provide assistance in dying. ... However, we note—as did Beetz J. in addressing the topic of physician participation in abortion in Morgentaler—that a physician's decision to participate in assisted dying is a matter of conscience and, in some cases, of religious belief (pp. 95-96). In making this observation, we do not wish to pre-empt the legislative and regulatory response to this judgment. Rather, we underline that the Charter rights of patients and physicians will need to be reconciled.

[147] The appeal is allowed. We would issue the following declaration, which is suspended for 12 months:

Section 241(b) and s. 14 of the Criminal Code unjustifiably infringe s. 7 of the Charter and are of no force or effect to the extent that they prohibit physician-assisted death for a competent adult person who (1) clearly consents to the termination of life and (2) has a grievous and irremediable medical condition (including an illness, disease or disability) that causes enduring suffering that is intolerable to the individual in the circumstances of his or her condition.

Appeal allowed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Parliament's response to Carter (An Act to amend the Criminal Code and to make related amendments to other Acts (medical assistance in dying), SC 2016, c 3) received royal assent on June 17, 2016. This Act amends the Criminal Code to create a procedure for exempting medical professionals from criminal liability for providing medical assistance in dying to a person who has a "grievous and irremediable medical condition": see ss 241.1 through 241.4. These provisions include both a substantive definition of the requisite medical condition and procedural requirements. The Criminal Code definition of a "grievous and irremediable medical condition" is found in s 241.2(2) and in its initial formulation was arguably more restrictive than what the Supreme Court of Canada had in mind in Carter. In Truchon c Procureur général du Canada, 2019 QCCS 3792, Baudouin J of the Quebec Superior Court held that the requirement in s 241.2(2)(d) that the person's "natural death has become reasonably foreseeable" violated ss 7 and 15 of the Charter and was not justified under s 1. The government chose not to appeal the ruling, and in 2021, Parliament repealed s 241.2(2)(d). When you read the new provisions of the Code, as amended in 2021, consider whether they are constitutionally valid, in light of the reasoning and the result in Carter.

2. For further discussion of the remedial issues raised by Carter, see Chapter 25, Enforcement of Rights, specifically the discussion of the temporary suspension of declarations of invalidity.

3. At paras 130–32 of Carter, the Court raises the issue of physicians who have conscientious objections to participation in assisted dying, noting that it is in the hands of the physicians' colleges, Parliament, and the provincial legislatures to respond to these objections: for further discussion of this issue, see Chapter 19.

4. In Bedford and Carter, the Court held that a law would be overbroad in s 7 terms if "it is rational in some cases, but ... overreaches in its effect in others" (Bedford at para 113; compare Carter at para 85). Thus, an "overbroad ... effect on one person is sufficient to establish a breach of s 7" (Bedford at para 123). This strict approach to the norm against overbreadth has been confirmed in subsequent cases (see, for example, R v Safarzadeh-Markhali, 2016 SCC 14). However, on occasion, courts seem to have interpreted the norm against overbreadth in a more relaxed manner, as requiring only a rational connection between the law and its purpose (see, for example, R v Moriarity, 2015 SCC 55; R v AB, 2015 ONCA 803). On the strict approach, are all laws overbroad? On the more relaxed approach, is there any difference between the norm against overbreadth and the norm against arbitrariness?

III. SECTION 7 AND SOCIAL CITIZENSHIP

Should interests associated with social citizenship—for example, public pensions, welfare benefits, adequate nutrition, housing, education, and health care—receive constitutional protection in the form of a right to life, liberty, and security of the person? The following cases discuss this question. As you read them, ask yourself to what extent they are consistent with one another.

Gosselin v Québec (AG)

[Under Quebec's social assistance scheme, found in the Social Aid Act, RSQ, c A-16 and accompanying regulations, between 1984 and 1989 the base amount of money payable to claimants under the age of 30 was one-third of that payable to those 30 and over. Those under 30 could increase their welfare payments to either the same as or slightly less than the amount received by those 30 and over by participating in an educational or work experience program. There was evidence that many young persons fell between the cracks and were unable to participate in these programs. The age-based distinction was removed in 1989. Gosselin brought a class action on behalf of all those who had been under 30 and affected by the old scheme before 1989. (Between 1982 and 1987 the scheme was protected from Charter scrutiny by Quebec's decision to apply the s 33 "notwithstanding" clause to all of its legislation.) Arguments were based on both ss 15 and 7 of the Charter. Reproduced below are the Court's opinions on whether the legislation violated s 7 of the Charter. A discussion of the Court's reasoning on the s 15 issue is found in Chapter 23, Equality Rights.]

McLACHLIN CJ (Gonthier, Iacobucci, Major, and Binnie JJ concurring):

[75] ... The appellant argues that the s. 7 right to security of the person includes the right to receive a particular level of social assistance from the state adequate to meet basic needs. ... There are three elements to [her] claim: (1) that the legislation affects an interest protected by the right to life, liberty and security of the person within the meaning of s. 7; (2) that providing inadequate benefits constitutes a "deprivation" by the state; and (3) that, if deprivation of a right protected by s. 7 is established, this was not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. The factual record is insufficient to support this claim. Nevertheless, I will examine these three elements.

[80] Can s. 7 apply to protect rights or interests wholly unconnected to the administration of justice? The question remains unanswered. In R. v. Morgentaler, [1988] 1 S.C.R. 30, at p. 56, Dickson C.J., for himself and Lamer J. entertained (without deciding on) the possibility that the right to security of the person extends "to protect either interests central to personal autonomy, such as a right to privacy." Similarly, in Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 927, at p. 1003, Dickson C.J., for the majority, left open the question of whether s. 7 could operate to protect "economic rights fundamental to human ... survival." Some cases, while on their facts involving the administration of justice, have described the rights protected by s. 7 without explicitly linking them to the administration of justice. ...

[81] Even if s. 7 could be read to encompass economic rights, a further hurdle emerges. Section 7 speaks of the right not to be deprived of life, liberty and security of the person, except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

Nothing in the jurisprudence thus far suggests that s. 7 places a positive obligation on the state to ensure that each person enjoys life, liberty or security of the person. Rather, s. 7 has been interpreted as restricting the state's ability to deprive people of these. Such a deprivation does not exist in the case at bar.

[82] One day s. 7 may be interpreted to include positive obligations. To evoke Lord Sankey's celebrated phrase in Edwards v. Attorney-General for Canada, [1930] A.C. 124 (P.C.), at p. 136, the Canadian Charter must be viewed as "a living tree capable of growth and expansion within its natural limits." ... It would be a mistake to regard s. 7 as frozen, or its content as having been exhaustively defined in previous cases. ... The question therefore is not whether s. 7 has ever been—or will ever be—recognized as creating positive rights. Rather, the question is whether the present circumstances warrant a novel application of s. 7 as the basis for a positive state obligation to guarantee adequate living standards.

[83] I conclude that they do not. With due respect for the views of my colleague Arbour J., I do not believe that there is sufficient evidence in this case to support the proposed interpretation of s. 7. I leave open the possibility that a positive obligation to sustain life, liberty, or security of person may be made out in special circumstances. However, this is not such a case. The impugned program contained compensatory "workfare" provisions and the evidence of actual hardship is wanting. The frail platform provided by the facts of this case cannot support the weight of a positive state obligation of citizen support.

[Justice Bastarache reached the same result as the majority on s 7, but for different reasons, which focused on the restriction of s 7 to situations involving interaction with the justice system and its administration. Justice LeBel, who dissented on the s 15 issue, found it unnecessary to consider the effect of s 7 beyond stating that, while no violation of s 7 was established, he agreed with that part of McLachlin CJ's reasons stating that it is inappropriate to rule out the possibility that s 7 might be applied in the future to circumstances unrelated to the justice system.]

ARBOUR J (dissenting):

[308] I would allow this appeal on the basis of the appellant's s. 7 Charter claim. In doing so, I conclude that the s. 7 rights to "life, liberty and security of the person" include a positive dimension. Few would dispute that an advanced modern welfare state like Canada has a positive moral obligation to protect the life, liberty and security of its citizens. There is considerably less agreement, however, as to whether this positive moral obligation translates into a legal one. Some will argue that there are interpretive barriers to the conclusion that s. 7 imposes a positive obligation on the state to offer such basic protection.

[309] In my view these barriers are all less real and substantial than one might assume. This Court has never ruled, nor does the language of the Charter itself require, that we must reject any positive claim against the state—as in this case—for the most basic positive protection of life and security. This Court has consistently chosen instead to leave open the possibility of finding certain positive rights to the basic means of subsistence within s. 7. In my view, far from resisting this conclusion, the language and structure of the Charter—and of s. 7 in particular—actually compel it. Before demonstrating all of this it will be necessary to deconstruct the various firewalls that are said to exist around s. 7, precluding this Court from reaching in this case what I believe to be an inevitable and just outcome.

II. Analysis of Section 7 of the Charter

[336] ... I set out s. 7 in its entirety:

7. Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. [Emphasis added.]

I have drawn attention to the conjunction in s. 7

[337] ... My reasons for emphasizing this ... are straightforward. Past judicial treatments of the section have habitually read out of the English version of s. 7 the conjunction and, with it, the entire first clause. The result is that we typically speak about s. 7 guaranteeing only the right not to be deprived of life, liberty and security of the person except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. ...

[340] ... [But] only by ignoring the structure of s. 7—by effectively reading out the conjunction and, with it, the first clause—is it possible to conclude that it protects exclusively “the right not to be deprived of life, liberty or security of the person except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.” There may be some question as to how far, precisely, the protection of s. 7 extends beyond this, but that the section’s first clause affords some additional protection seems, as a purely textual matter, beyond reasonable objection.

[355] ... Charter rights and freedoms find protection in s. 1, not only because they are guaranteed in that section, but because limitations on some rights are required by the positive protection of others. This approach to s. 1 justification, which invokes the values that underpin the Charter as the only suitable basis for limiting those rights, confirms that Charter rights contain a positive dimension. Constitutional rights are not simply a shield against state interference with liberty; they place a positive obligation on the state to arbitrate competing demands arising from the liberty and rights of others.

[356] In other words, the justificatory mechanism in place in s. 1 of the Charter reflects the existence of a positive right to Charter protection asserted in support of alleged interference by the state with the rights of others. If such positive rights exist in that form in s. 1, they must, a fortiori, exist in the various Charter provisions articulating the existence of the rights. For instance, if one’s right to life, liberty and security of the person can be limited under s. 1 by the need to protect the life, liberty or security of others, it can only be because the right is not merely a negative right but a positive one, calling for the state not only to abstain from interfering with life, liberty and security of the person but also to actively secure that right in the face of competing demands.

[357] This concludes my interpretive analysis of s. 7. In my view, the results are unequivocal: every suitable approach to Charter interpretation, including textual analysis, purposive analysis, and contextual analysis, mandates the conclusion that the s. 7 rights of life, liberty and security of the person include a positive dimension.

[358] It remains to show that the interest claimed in this case falls within the range of entitlements that the state is under a positive obligation to provide under s. 7. In one sense it seems obvious that it does. ... [A] minimum level of welfare is so closely connected to issues relating to one’s basic health (or security of the person), and potentially even to one’s survival (or life interest), that it appears inevitable that a positive right to life, liberty and security of the person must provide for it. Indeed in this case the legislature has in fact chosen to legislate in respect of welfare rights.

Thus determining the applicability of the foregoing general principles to the case at bar requires only that we analyse this case through the lens of the underinclusiveness line of cases

III. Application to the Case at Bar

[365] [Dunmore v Ontario (AG), 2001 SCC 94] articulated the criteria necessary for making a Charter claim based on underinclusion outside the context of s. 15. In my view, these criteria are satisfied in this case. They are as follows:

1. The claim must be grounded in a fundamental Charter right or freedom rather than in access to a particular statutory regime
2. A proper evidentiary foundation must be provided, before creating a positive obligation under the Charter, by demonstrating that exclusion from the regime constitutes a substantial interference with the exercise and fulfillment of a protected right
3. It must be determined whether the state can truly be held accountable for any inability to exercise the right or freedom in question

A. Is the Claim Grounded in an Appropriate Charter Right?

[367] ... Under s. 7, [the claimants argue] not that exclusion from the statutory regime is illicit per se, but that it violates their self-standing right to security of the person (and potentially their right to life as well). As in Dunmore, this right exists independently of any statutory enactment.

[368] The distinction between the s. 7 claim and the s. 15 claim can be illustrated as follows: if it were the case that the claimants could meet their basic needs through means outside of the Social Aid Act—for instance through an independent government program providing for subsidized housing, food vouchers, etc., in exchange for the performance of works of public service—their s. 7 claim would entirely disappear, but their s. 15 claim would potentially remain intact inasmuch as it would still be open to them to argue that being forced to resort to these alternative means somehow violated their human dignity. The problem in this case, by way of contrast, is that exclusion from this statutory regime effectively excludes the claimants from any real possibility of having their basic needs met through any means whatsoever. Thus, it is not exclusion from the particular statutory regime that is at stake but, more basically, the claimants' fundamental rights to security of the person and life itself.

B. Is There a Sufficient Evidentiary Basis to Establish That Exclusion from the Social Aid Act Substantially Interfered with the Fulfilment and Exercise of the Claimants' Fundamental Right to Security of the Person?

[370] ... [O]ne must avoid placing undue emphasis on whatever (often remote) possibility there might have been that the claimants could have satisfied their basic needs through private means. ... There is simply no requirement that they prove they exhausted all other avenues of relief before turning to public assistance. On the contrary, all that is required is that the claimants show that the lack of government intervention "substantially impede[d]" the enjoyment of their s. 7 rights. ...

[371] There is ample evidence in this case that the legislated exclusion of young adults from the full benefits of the social assistance regime substantially interfered with their s. 7 rights, in particular their right to security of the person. Welfare recipients under the age of 30 were allowed $170/month. The various remedial programs put in place in 1984 simply did not work: a startling 88.8 percent of the young adults who were eligible to participate in the programs were unable to increase their benefits to the level payable to adults 30 and over. In these conditions, the physical and psychological security of young adults was severely compromised during the period at issue. This was compellingly illustrated by the appellant's own testimony and by that of her four witnesses: a social worker, a psychologist, a dietician and a community physician. The sizeable volume of the appellant's record prohibits an exhaustive exposé of the dismal conditions in which many young welfare recipients lived. ...

[372] On $170/month, paying rent is impossible. Indeed, in 1987, the rent for a bachelor apartment in the Montreal Metropolitan Area was approximately $237 to $412/month, depending on the location. Two-bedroom apartments went for about $368 to $463/month. As a result, while some welfare recipients were able to live with parents, many became homeless. During the period at issue, it is estimated that over 5 000 young adults lived on the streets

(1) Interference with Physical Security of the Person

[373] The exclusion of welfare recipients under the age of 30 from the full benefits of the social assistance regime severely interfered with their physical integrity and security. First, there are the health risks that flow directly from the dismal living conditions that $170/month afford. ... According to Dr. Christine Colin, persons living in poverty are six times more likely to develop diseases like bronchial infections, asthma and emphysema than persons who live in decent conditions. Dr. Colin also testified that the poor not only develop more health problems, but are also more severely affected by [those] ailments

[374] Second, ... [malnourishment and undernourishment] result in a plethora of health problems. In 1987, the cost of proper nourishment for a single person was estimated at $152/month, that is 89 percent of the $170/month allowance. Jocelyne Leduc-Gauvin, a dietician, gave detailed evidence of the effects of poor and insufficient nourishment. [Justice Arbour cited evidence pointing to severe health outcomes for malnourished young adults including "obesity, anxiety, hypertension, infections, ulcers, fatigue and an increased sensitivity to pain" (at para 374).] ...

[375] In order to eat, many young welfare recipients benefited from food banks, soup kitchens and like charitable organizations. But since these could not be relied upon consistently other avenues had to be pursued. While some resorted to theft, others turned to prostitution. Dumpsters and garbage cans were scavenged in search of edible morsels of food, exposing the hungry youths to the risks of food poisoning and contamination. In one particular case reported by Mr. Sandborn, two young adults paid a restauranteur $10/month for the right to sit in his kitchen and eat whatever patrons left in their plates.

(2) Interference with Psychological Security of the Person

[376] The psychological and social consequences of being excluded from the full benefits of the social assistance regime were equally devastating. The hardships and marginalization of poverty propel the individual into a spiral of isolation, depression, humiliation, low self-esteem, anxiety, stress and drug addiction. According to a 1987 enquiry by Santé Québec, one out of five indigent young adults attempted suicide or had suicidal thoughts. The situation was even more alarming among homeless youths in Montreal, 50 percent of whom reportedly attempted to take their own lives.

[377] In my view, this evidence overwhelmingly demonstrates that the exclusion of young adults from the full benefits of the social assistance regime substantially interfered with their fundamental right to security of the person and, at the margins, perhaps with their right to life as well. Freedom from state interference with bodily or psychological integrity is of little consolation to those who, like the claimants in this case, are faced with a daily struggle to meet their most basic bodily and psychological needs. To them, such a purely negative right to security of the person is essentially meaningless: theirs is a world in which the primary threats to security of the person come not from others, but from their own dire circumstances. In such cases, one can reasonably conclude that positive state action is what is required in order to breathe purpose and meaning into their s. 7 guaranteed rights.

C. Can the State Be Held Accountable for the Claimants' Inability to Exercise Their Section 7 Rights?

[378] In one sense, there appears to be considerable overlap between this third criterion for making out a successful underinclusion claim and the second criterion just discussed. In fact, once one establishes in accordance with the second criterion that a claimant's fundamental rights cannot be effectively exercised without government intervention, it is difficult to see what more would be required in order to demonstrate state accountability.

[379] The absence of a direct, positive action by the state may appear to create particular problems of causation. Of course, state accountability in this context cannot be conceived of along the same lines of causal responsibility as where there is affirmative state action This may mean that one should not search for the same kind of causal nexus tying the state to the claimants' inability to exercise their fundamental freedoms. Such a nexus could only ever be established by pointing to some positive state action giving rise to the claimants' aggrieved condition. While this focus on state action is appropriate where one is considering the violation of a negative right, it imports a requirement that is inimical to the very idea of positive rights.

[380] Among the immediate implications of this is that the claimants in this case need not establish ... that the state can be held causally responsible for the socio-economic environment in which their s. 7 rights were threatened, ... [or] that the government's inaction worsened their plight. Here, as in all claims asserting the infringement of a positive right, the focus is on whether the state is under an obligation of performance to alleviate the claimants' condition, and not on whether it can be held causally responsible for that condition in the first place.

[381] All of which indicates that government accountability in the context of claims of underinclusion is to be understood simply in terms of the existence of a positive state obligation to redress conditions for which the state may or may not be causally responsible. On this view, the third criterion serves the purpose of ensuring not only that government intervention is needed to secure the effective exercise of a claimant's fundamental rights or freedoms, but also that it is obligatory. ...

[382] A focus on state obligation was also the driving force behind this Court's finding in Dunmore that the government could be held accountable for the violation of the claimants' s. 2(d) rights in that case. It led to the search for a "minimum of state action" ... [that] was satisfied in Dunmore by the mere fact that the government had chosen to legislate over matters of association (at para. 29):

Once the state has chosen to regulate a private relationship such as that between employer and employee ... it is unduly formalistic to consign that relationship to a "private sphere" that is impervious to Charter review

There can be no doubt that these dicta apply with equal force to the instant appeal.

[383] ... It is almost a cliché that the modern welfare state has developed in response to an obvious failure on the part of the free market economy to provide these basic needs for everyone. Were it necessary, this Court could take judicial notice of this fact in assessing the relevance of the Social Aid Act to the claimants' s. 7 rights. As it happens, any such necessity is mitigated by the fact that s. 6 of the Act explicitly sets out its objective: to provide supplemental aid to those who fall below a subsistence level.

[Justice Arbour cited various statements of the Quebec government where it recognized an obligation to provide for those who are unable to work; and acknowledged that the flaws in social assistance programs presented continuing barriers to the autonomy and emancipation of welfare recipients. She found those statements to indicate a willingness on the part of the state to regulate "the field of interests that generally fall within the rubric of s. 7 of the Charter" (at para 385) such that an effective lack of government intervention could violate section 7 rights.

Justice Arbour concluded that the government had not demonstrated that the violation could be saved by it. Justice L'Heureux-Dubé concurred with Arbour J's reasoning on the s 7 issue.]

Appeal dismissed.

In G (J), discussed in Section I.B, above, the Court held that the failure to provide legal aid to an indigent parent in child welfare proceedings where the state sought custody of the parent's child violated s 7 of the Charter (the removal of a child implicated security of the person, and a parent's lack of legal representation in the proceedings was inconsistent with the principles of fundamental justice), and it ordered the New Brunswick government to provide the parent with state-funded legal counsel. How does the Court's holding in G (J), where a positive economic obligation was placed on the state, square with its decision in Gosselin?

Chaoulli v Quebec (AG)

[Suffering from various health problems, Zeliotis found the waiting times in Quebec's public health care system untenable. Dr Chaoulli, a physician, was unsuccessful in having his home-delivered medical activities recognized and in obtaining a licence to operate an independent private hospital. Their situations had come about as a result of a statutory prohibition on private health insurance for health care services available in the public system (the prohibition was found in the Health Insurance Act [HEIA] and the Hospital Insurance Act [HOIA]). Having joined forces, Zeliotis and Chaoulli challenged the validity of this prohibition, contending that it deprived them of access to services that do not come with the waiting times inherent in the public system and thus violated their rights under s 7 of the Charter and under s 1 of the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms, CQLR, c C-12 [Quebec Charter]. The trial court dismissed the motion for a declaratory judgment on the basis that even though Zeliotis and Chaoulli had demonstrated a deprivation of the rights to life, liberty, and security of the person guaranteed by s 7 of the Canadian Charter, this deprivation was in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. The Court of Appeal affirmed that decision. A majority of the Supreme Court of Canada allowed the appeal.

Note that Deschamps J's judgment, one of the two judgments that together form the majority ruling, was based strictly on the Quebec Charter. Section 1 provides that "[e]very human being has a right to life, and to personal security, inviolability and freedom." The limitation clause in s 9.1 of the Quebec Charter states: "In exercising his fundamental freedoms and rights, a person shall maintain a proper regard for democratic values, public order and the general well-being of the citizens of Québec. In this respect, the scope of the freedoms and rights, and limits to their exercise, may be fixed by law." Justice Deschamps found that the prohibitions at issue violated s 1 of the Quebec Charter and were not justified under s 9.1; she, therefore, found it unnecessary to consider arguments based on the Canadian Charter. Her judgment is nevertheless relevant to s 7 of the Canadian Charter for its general characterization of the issue at stake and for its interpretation of the right to life and security of the person. Moreover, Deschamps J applied the Canadian Charter's Oakes test to s 9.1. Her comments on the circumstances where deference should, or should not, be shown to legislative choices are therefore relevant to the Canadian Charter's limitation clause.]

DESCHAMPS J:

[1] Quebecers are prohibited from taking out insurance to obtain in the private sector services that are available under Quebec's public health care plan. Is this prohibition justified by the need to preserve the integrity of the plan?

[4] In essence, the question is whether Quebecers who are prepared to spend money to get access to health care that is, in practice, not accessible in the public sector because of waiting lists may be validly prevented from doing so by the state. For the reasons that follow, I find that the prohibition infringes the right to personal inviolability and that it is not justified by a proper regard for democratic values, public order and the general well-being of the citizens of Quebec.

[14] ... [N]o one questions the need to preserve a sound public health care system. The central question raised by the appeal is whether the prohibition is justified by the need to preserve the integrity of the public system. In this regard, when my colleagues ask whether Quebec has the power under the Constitution to discourage the establishment of a parallel health care system, I can only agree with them that it does. But that is not the issue in the appeal. The appellants do not contend that they have a constitutional right to private insurance. Rather, they contend that the waiting times violate their rights to life and security. It is the measure chosen by the government that is in issue, not Quebecers' need for a public health care system.

I. Legislative Context

[16] ... The debate about the effectiveness of public health care has become an emotional one. The Romanow Report [Canada, Commission on the Future of Health Care in Canada, Building on Values: The Future of Health Care in Canada (Ottawa, 2002)] stated that the Canada Health Act [RSC 1985, c C-6] has achieved an iconic status that makes it untouchable by politicians The tone adopted by my colleagues Binnie and LeBel JJ is indicative of this type of emotional reaction. It leads them to characterize the debate as pitting rich against poor when the case is really about determining whether a specific measure is justified under either the Quebec Charter or the Canadian Charter. I believe that it is essential to take a step back and consider these various reactions objectively. The Canada Health Act does not prohibit private health care services, nor does it provide benchmarks for the length of waiting times that might be regarded as consistent with the principles it lays down, and in particular with the principle of real accessibility.

V. Infringement of the Rights Protected by Section 1 of the Quebec Charter

[37] The appellant Zeliotis argues that the prohibition infringes Quebecers' right to life. Some patients die as a result of long waits for treatment in the public system when they could have gained prompt access to care in the private sector. Were it not for [the impugned provisions], they could buy private insurance and receive care in the private sector.

[38] ... After meticulously analysing the evidence, [the trial judge] found that the right to life and liberty protected by s. 7 of the Canadian Charter had been infringed. ... [T]he trial judge's findings of fact concerning the infringement of the right to life and liberty protected by s. 7 of the Canadian Charter apply to the right protected by s. 1 of the Quebec Charter.

[39] Not only is it common knowledge that health care in Quebec is subject to waiting times, but a number of witnesses acknowledged that the demand for health care is potentially unlimited and that waiting lists are a more or less implicit form of rationing Waiting lists are therefore real and intentional. ...

[40] ... [Because of a monthly rise in the risk of mortality due, according to a physician witness, to waiting times], [t]he right to life is therefore affected by the delays that are the necessary result of waiting lists.

[44] In the opinion of my colleagues Binnie and LeBel JJ, there is an internal mechanism that safeguards the public health system. According to them, Quebecers may go outside the province for treatment where services are not available in Quebec. This possibility is clearly not a solution for the system's deficiencies. The evidence did not bring to light any administrative mechanism that would permit Quebecers suffering as a result of waiting times to obtain care outside the province. The possibility of obtaining care outside Quebec is case-specific and is limited to crisis situations.

[45] I find that the trial judge did not err in finding that the prohibition on insurance for health care already insured by the state constitutes an infringement of the right to life and security. ... Quebecers are denied a solution that would permit them to avoid waiting lists, which are used as a tool to manage the public plan. ...

VI. Justification for the Prohibition

A. Purpose of the Statute

[49] ... The general objective of [the impugned] statutes is to promote health care of the highest possible quality for all Quebecers regardless of their ability to pay. Quality of care and equality of access are two inseparable objectives under the statutes.

[52] The HOIA and the HEIA provide that, within the framework they establish, the state is responsible for the provision and funding of health services. ... [A detailed review of the legislation and its administration is omitted.]

[53] It can be seen from this brief review of the legislation governing health services that such services are controlled almost entirely by the state.

[55] Section 11 HOIA and s. 15 HEIA ... render any proposal to develop private professional services almost illusory. The prohibition on private insurance creates an obstacle that is practically insurmountable for people with average incomes. ... These effects must not be confused with the objective of the legislation. According to the Attorney General of Quebec, the purpose of the prohibition is to preserve the integrity of the public health care system. From this perspective, the objective appears at first glance to be pressing and substantial. Its pressing and substantial nature can be confirmed by considering the historical context.

[56] ... The enactment of the first legislation providing for universal health care was a response to a need for social justice. ... Since the government passed legislation based on its view that it had to be the principal actor in the health care sphere, it is easy to understand its distrust of the private sector. At the stage of analysis of the objective of the legislation, I believe that preserving the public plan is a pressing and substantial purpose.

B. Proportionality

(1) Rational Connection

[58] ... Although the effect of a measure is not always indicative of a rational connection between the measure and its objective, in the instant case the consequences show an undeniable connection between the objective and the measure. The public plan is preserved because it has a quasi-monopoly.

(2) Minimal Impairment

[Justice Deschamps held that the prohibition on private insurance was not minimally impairing. She held that the evidence led at trial did not support the trial judge's factual findings concerning minimal impairment.]

[84] It cannot therefore be concluded from the evidence relating to the Quebec plan or the plans of the other provinces of Canada, or from the evolution of the systems in place in various OECD countries, that the Attorney General of Quebec has discharged his burden of proof under s. 9.1 of the Quebec Charter. A number of measures are available to him to protect the integrity of Quebec's health care plan. The choice of prohibiting private insurance contracts is not justified by the evidence. However, is this a case in which the Court should show deference?

(d) Level of Deference Required

[89] The courts have a duty to rise above political debate. They leave it to the legislatures to develop social policy. But when such social policies infringe rights that are protected by the charters, the courts cannot shy away from considering them. The judicial branch plays a role that is not played by the legislative branch. [As K Roach has stated in "Dialogic Judicial Review and Its Critics" (2004) 23 SCLR (2d) 49 at 71:]

... Judges can add value to societal debates about justice by listening to claims of injustice and by promoting values and perspectives that may not otherwise be taken seriously in the legislative process.

[91] To refuse to exercise the power set out in s. 52 of the Quebec Charter [that Charter's primacy clause] would be to deny that provision its real meaning and to deprive Quebecers of the protection to which they are entitled.

[92] In a given case, a court may find that evidence could not be presented for reasons that it considers valid, be it due to the complexity of the evidence or to some other factor. However, the government cannot argue that the evidence is too complex without explaining why it cannot be presented. If such an explanation is given, the court may show greater deference to the government. Based on the extent of the impairment and the complexity of the evidence considered to be necessary, the court can determine whether the government has discharged its burden of proof.

[95] ... Certain factors favour greater deference, such as the prospective nature of the decision, the impact on public finances, the multiplicity of competing interests, the difficulty of presenting scientific evidence and the limited time available to the state. This list is certainly not exhaustive. It serves primarily to highlight the facts that it is up to the government to choose the measure, that the decision is often complex and difficult, and that the government must have the necessary time and resources to respond. ...

[96] The instant case is a good example of a case in which the courts have all the necessary tools to evaluate the government's measure. Ample evidence was presented. The government had plenty of time to act. Numerous commissions have been established ... , and special or independent committees have published reports Governments have promised on numerous occasions to find a solution to the problem of waiting lists. Given the tendency to focus the debate on a sociopolitical philosophy, it seems that governments have lost sight of the urgency of taking concrete action. The courts are therefore the last line of defence for citizens.

[97] For many years, the government has failed to act; the situation continues to deteriorate. ... While the government has the power to decide what measures to adopt, it cannot choose to do nothing in the face of the violation of Quebecers' right to security. The government has not given reasons for its failure to act. Inertia cannot be used as an argument to justify deference.

[98] In the instant case, the effectiveness of the prohibition has by no means been established. The government has not proved, by the evidence in the record, that the measure minimally impairs the protected rights. Moreover, the evidence shows that a wide variety of measures are available to governments, as can be seen from the plans of other provinces and other countries.

McLACHLIN CJ and MAJOR J (Bastarache J concurring):

[Agreeing with Deschamps J's conclusion as to the invalidity of the impugned provisions in respect of the Quebec Charter, McLachlin CJ and Major J focused their analysis on the Canadian Charter.]

[103] The appellants do not seek an order that the government spend more money on health care, nor do they seek an order that waiting times for treatment under the public health care scheme be reduced. They only seek a ruling that because delays in the public system place their health and security at risk, they should be allowed to take out insurance to permit them to access private services.

[104] The Charter does not confer a freestanding constitutional right to health care. However, where the government puts in place a scheme to provide health care, that scheme must comply with the Charter. ...

[106] The Canada Health Act, the Health Insurance Act, and the Hospital Insurance Act ... limit access to private health services by removing the ability to contract for private health care insurance to cover the same services covered by public insurance. The result is a virtual monopoly for the public health scheme. ... This virtual monopoly, on the evidence, results in delays in treatment that adversely affect the citizen's security of the person. Where a law adversely affects life, liberty or security of the person, it must conform to the principles of fundamental justice. This law, in our view, fails to do so.

[107] ... The fact that [a] matter is complex, contentious or laden with social values does not mean that the courts can abdicate the responsibility vested in them by our Constitution to review legislation for Charter compliance when citizens challenge it. ...

I. Section 7 of the Charter

A. Deprivation of Life, Liberty or Security of the Person

[110] The issue at this stage is whether the prohibition on insurance for private medical care deprives individuals of their life, liberty or security of the person protected by s. 7 of the Charter.

[111] The appellants have established that many Quebec residents face delays in treatment that adversely affect their security of the person and that they would not sustain but for the prohibition on medical insurance. It is common ground that the effect of the prohibition on insurance is to allow only the very rich, who do not need insurance, to secure private health care in order to avoid the delays in the public system. Given the ban on insurance, most Quebecers have no choice but to accept delays in the medical system and their adverse physical and psychological consequences.

[After reviewing the evidence adduced at trial, McLachlin CJ and Major J reached the same conclusion as Deschamps J, emphasizing both the physical and psychological consequences of waiting times on patients.]

[119] In this appeal, delays in treatment giving rise to psychological and physical suffering engage the s. 7 protection of security of the person just as they did in [R v Morgentaler, [1988] 1 SCR 30, 1988 CanLII 90]. ... In Morgentaler the result of the monopolistic scheme was delay in treatment with attendant physical risk and psychological suffering. In Morgentaler, as here, people in urgent need of care face the same prospect: unless they fall within the wealthy few who can pay for private care, typically outside the country, they have no choice but to accept the delays imposed by the legislative scheme and the adverse physical and psychological consequences this entails. ...

[121] ... The sanction by which the mandatory public system was maintained [was] criminal in Morgentaler, [as opposed to] "administrative" in the case at bar. Yet the consequences for the individual in both cases are serious. In Morgentaler, as here, the system left the individual facing a lack of critical care with no choice but to travel outside the country to obtain the required medical care at her own expense. It was this constraint on s. 7 security, ... and not the criminal sanction, that drove the majority analysis in Morgentaler. We therefore conclude that the decision provides guidance in the case at bar.

[123] Not every difficulty rises to the level of adverse impact on security of the person under s. 7. ... However, because patients may be denied timely health care for a condition that is clinically significant to their current and future health, [in this case] s. 7 protection of security of the person is engaged. Access to a waiting list is not access to health care. ... Where lack of timely health care can result in death, s. 7 protection of life itself is engaged. The evidence here demonstrates that the prohibition on health insurance results in physical and psychological suffering that meets this threshold requirement of seriousness.

B. Deprivation in Accordance with the Principles of Fundamental Justice

(1) Laws Shall Not Be Arbitrary: A Principle of Fundamental Justice

[129] It is a well-recognized principle of fundamental justice that laws should not be arbitrary ...

[130] A law is arbitrary where "it bears no relation to, or is inconsistent with, the objective that lies behind [it]." To determine whether this is the case, it is necessary to consider the state interest and societal concerns that the provision is meant to reflect: [Rodriguez v British Columbia (AG), [1993] 3 SCR 519, 1993 CanLII 75], at pp. 594-95.

[131] In order not to be arbitrary, the limit on life, liberty and security requires not only a theoretical connection between the limit and the legislative goal, but a real connection on the facts. The onus of showing lack of connection in this sense rests with the claimant. The question in every case is whether the measure is arbitrary in the sense of bearing no real relation to the goal and hence being manifestly unfair. The more serious the impingement on the person's liberty and security, the more clear must be the connection. Where the individual's very life may be at stake, the reasonable person would expect a clear connection, in theory and in fact, between the measure that puts life at risk and the legislative goals.

(2) Whether the Prohibition on Private Medical Insurance Is Arbitrary

[135] The government argues that ... if people can purchase private health insurance, they will seek treatment from private doctors and hospitals, which are not banned under the Act. According to the government's argument, this will divert resources from the public health system into private health facilities, ultimately reducing the quality of public care.

[137] The appellants ... disagreed and offered their own conflicting "common sense" argument for the proposition that prohibiting private health insurance is neither necessary nor related to maintaining high quality in the public health care system. Quality public care, they argue, depends not on a monopoly, but on money and management. They testified that permitting people to buy private insurance would make alternative medical care more accessible and reduce the burden on the public system. The result, they assert, would be better care for all. ...

[138] To this point, we are confronted with competing but unproven "common sense" arguments, amounting to little more than assertions of belief. ... But as discussed above, a theoretically defensible limitation may be arbitrary if in fact the limit lacks a connection to the goal.

[139] This brings us to the evidence called by the appellants at trial on the experience of other developed countries with public health care systems which permit access to private health care. The experience of these countries suggests that there is no real connection in fact between prohibition of health insurance and the goal of a quality public health system.

[140] The evidence adduced at trial establishes that many western democracies that do not impose a monopoly on the delivery of health care have successfully delivered to their citizens medical services that are superior to and more affordable than the services that are presently available in Canada. This demonstrates that a monopoly is not necessary or even related to the provision of quality public health care.

[149] In summary, the evidence on the experience of other western democracies refutes the government's theoretical contention that a prohibition on private insurance is linked to maintaining quality public health care.

[150] Binnie and LeBel JJ suggest that the experience of other countries is of little assistance. With respect, we cannot agree. This evidence was properly placed before the trial judge and, unless discredited, stands as the best guide with respect to the question of whether a ban on private insurance is necessary and relevant to the goal of providing quality public health care. The task of the courts, on s. 7 issues as on others, is to evaluate the issue in the light, not just of common sense or theory, but of the evidence. This is supported by our jurisprudence, according to which the experience of other western democracies may be relevant in assessing alleged arbitrariness. ...

[151] Binnie and LeBel JJ also suggest that the government's continued commitment to a monopoly on the provision of health insurance cannot be arbitrary because it is rooted in reliance on "a series of authoritative reports [that analysed] health care in this country and in other countries" (para. 258); We observe in passing that the import of these reports, which differ in many of their conclusions, is a matter of some debate But the conclusions of other bodies on other material ... cannot relieve the courts of their obligation to review government action for consistency with the Charter on the evidence before them.

[152] When we look to the evidence rather than to assumptions, the connection between prohibiting private insurance and maintaining quality public health care vanishes. ...

[153] We conclude that on the evidence adduced in this case, the appellants have established that in the face of delays in treatment that cause psychological and physical suffering, the prohibition on private insurance jeopardizes the right to life, liberty and security of the person of Canadians in an arbitrary manner, and is therefore not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

II. Section 1 of the Charter

[155] The government undeniably has an interest in protecting the public health regime. However, given the absence of evidence that the prohibition on the purchase and sale of private health insurance protects the health care system, the rational connection between the prohibition and the objective is not made out. Indeed, we question whether an arbitrary provision, which by reason of its arbitrariness cannot further its stated objective, will ever meet the rational connection test under R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103. [The three judges found that the denial of access to medical care was not minimally impairing, nor did its benefits outweigh its deleterious effects.]

BINNIE and LeBEL JJ (Fish J concurring) (dissenting):

I. Introduction

[161] The question in this appeal is whether the province of Quebec not only has the constitutional authority to establish a comprehensive single-tier health plan, but to discourage a second (private) tier health sector by prohibiting the purchase and sale of private health insurance. ... We are unable to agree with our four colleagues who would allow the appeal that such a debate can or should be resolved as a matter of law by judges. ...

[163] The Court recently held in Auton (Guardian ad litem of) v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [2004] 3 S.C.R. 657, 2004 SCC 78, that the government was not required to fund the treatment of autistic children. It did not on that occasion address in constitutional terms the scope and nature of "reasonable" health services. Courts will now have to make that determination. What, then, are constitutionally required "reasonable health services"? What is treatment "within a reasonable time"? What are the benchmarks? How short a waiting list is short enough? How many MRIs does the Constitution require? The majority does not tell us. The majority lays down no manageable constitutional standard. The public cannot know, nor can judges or governments know, how much health care is "reasonable" enough to satisfy s. 7 of the [Canadian Charter] and s. 1 of the [Quebec Charter]. It is to be hoped that we will know it when we see it.

[164] The policy of the Canada Health Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-6, and its provincial counterparts is to provide health care based on need rather than on wealth or status. The evidence certainly established that the public health care system ... has serious and persistent problems. This does not mean that the courts are well placed to perform the required surgery. ... Our colleagues McLachlin C.J. and Major J. argue that Quebec's enforcement of a single-tier health plan ... is "arbitrary." In our view, with respect, the prohibition against private health insurance is a rational consequence of Quebec's commitment to the goals and objectives of the Canada Health Act.

[165] ... [I]t must be recognized that the liberty and security of Quebecers who do not have the money to afford private health insurance, who cannot qualify for it, or who are not employed by establishments that provide it, are not put at risk by the absence of "upper tier" health care. It is Quebecers who have the money to afford private medical insurance and can qualify for it who will be the beneficiaries of the appellants' constitutional challenge.

[166] The Quebec government views the prohibition against private insurance as essential to preventing the current single-tier health system from disintegrating into a de facto two-tier system. The trial judge found, and the evidence demonstrated, that there is good reason for this fear. ... She thus found no legal basis to intervene, and declined to do so. ... [T]he debate is about social values. It is not about constitutional law. ...

[167] We believe our colleagues the Chief Justice and Major J have extended too far the strands of interpretation under the Canadian Charter laid down in some of the earlier cases, in particular the ruling on abortion in R. v. Morgentaler, [1988] 1 S.C.R. 30 (which involved criminal liability, not public health policy). We cannot find in the constitutional law of Canada a "principle of fundamental justice" dispositive of the problems of waiting lists in the Quebec health system. ... The proper forum to determine the social policy of Quebec in this matter is the National Assembly.

[168] ... There is nothing in the evidence to justify our colleagues' disagreement with [the trial judge's] conclusion that the general availability of health insurance will lead to a significant expansion of the private health sector to the detriment of the public health sector. While no one doubts that the Quebec health plan is under sustained and heavy criticism, ... [a]s a matter of law, we see no reason to interfere with [lower courts'] collective and unanimous judgment on this point. Whatever else it might be, the prohibition is not arbitrary.

[169] ... A legislative policy is not "arbitrary" just because we may disagree with it. As our colleagues the Chief Justice and Major J. fully recognize, the legal test of "arbitrariness" is quite well established in the earlier case law. ... Suffice it to say at this point that in our view, the appellants' argument about "arbitrariness" is based largely on generalizations about the public system drawn from fragmentary experience, an overly optimistic view of the benefits offered by private health insurance, an oversimplified view of the adverse effects on the public health system of permitting private sector health services to flourish and an overly interventionist view of the role the courts should play in trying to supply a "fix" to the failings, real or perceived, of major social programs.

A. The Argument About Adding an "Upper Tier" to the Quebec Health Plan

[170] ... It is evident, of course, that neither Quebec nor any of the other provinces has a "pure" single-tier system. ... The issue here, as it is so often in social policy debates, is where to draw the line. ... Drawing the line around social programs properly falls within the legitimate exercise of the democratic mandates of people elected for such purposes, preferably after a public debate.

B. Background to the Health Policy Debate

[174] Not all Canadian provinces prohibit private health insurance, but all of them (with the arguable exception of Newfoundland) take steps to protect the public health system by discouraging the private sector, whether by prohibiting private insurance. ... or by prohibiting doctors who opt out of the public sector, from billing their private patients more than the public sector tariff ... , or eliminating any form of cross-subsidy from the public to the private sector. [A catalogue of the various provincial plans is omitted.] The ... underlying policies flow from the Canada Health Act and are the same: i.e. as a matter of principle, health care should be based on need, not wealth, and as a matter of practicality the provinces judge that growth of the private sector will undermine the strength of the public sector and its ability to achieve the objectives of the Canada Health Act.

[175] The argument for a "two-tier system" is that it will enable "ordinary" Canadians to access private health care. Indeed, this is the view taken by our colleagues the Chief Justice and Major J. This way of putting the argument suggests that the Court has a mandate to save middle-income and low-income Quebecers from themselves [The dissent rejected comparisons to the American experience which, in their view, created much worse outcomes for minority groups.]

[176] It would be open to Quebec to adopt a U.S.-style health care system. No one suggests that there is anything in our Constitution to prevent it. But to do so would be contrary to the policy of the Quebec National Assembly, and its policy in that respect is shared by the other provinces and the federal Parliament. ... While the existence of waiting times is undoubtedly, and their management a matter of serious public concern, the proposed constitutional right to a two-tier health system for those who can afford private medical insurance would precipitate a seismic shift in health policy for Quebec. We do not believe that such a seismic shift is compelled by either the Quebec Charter or the Canadian Charter.

II. Analysis

[180] Our colleagues the Chief Justice and Major J[’s conclusion] ... that there is a violation of s. 7 of the Canadian Charter. ... rests in substantial part on observations made by various members of this Court in Morgentaler. ... The factual and legal issues raised in that criminal law problem are, we think, far removed from the debate over a two-tiered health system. Morgentaler applied a “manifest unfairness” test which has never been adopted by the Court outside the criminal law, and certainly not in the context of the design of social programs. The Morgentaler judgment fastened on internal inconsistencies in s. 251 of the [Criminal] Code, which find no counterpart here. In our view, with respect, Morgentaler provides no support for the appellants in this case, as we discuss commencing at para. 259.

[181] As stated, we accept the finding of the courts below that a two-tier health care system would likely have a negative impact on the integrity, functioning and viability of the public system Although this finding is disputed by our colleagues the Chief Justice and Major J. (a point to which we will return), it cannot be contested that as a matter of principle, access to private health care based on wealth rather than need contradicts one of the key social policy objectives expressed in the Canada Health Act. The state has established its interest in promoting the equal treatment of its citizens in terms of health care. The issue of arbitrariness relates only to the validity of the means adopted to achieve that policy objective. ... While Quebec does not outlaw private health care, which is therefore accessible to those with cash on hand, it wishes to discourage its growth. Failure to stop the few people with ready cash does not pose a structural threat to the Quebec health plan. Failure to stop private health insurance will, as the trial judge found, do so. Private insurance is a condition precedent to, and aims at promoting, a flourishing parallel private health care sector. For Dr. Chaoulli in particular, that is the whole point of this proceeding.

B. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms

[Justices Binnie and LeBel began by expressing the view that s 7 was likely not applicable in this case because there was an insufficient nexus to adjudicative or administrative proceedings. In their opinion, in the absence of this nexus it would be difficult for the claimants to establish a breach of the principles of fundamental justice.]

(2) Which Section 7 Interests Are Engaged?

[200] Section 7 interests are enumerated as life, liberty and security of the person. As stated, we accept the trial judge’s finding that the current state of the Quebec health system, linked to the prohibition against health insurance for insured services, is capable, at least in the cases of some individuals on some occasions, of putting at risk their life or security of the person.

[201] We do not agree with the appellants, however, that the Quebec Health Plan puts the "liberty" of Quebecers at risk. The argument that "liberty" includes freedom of contract (in this case to contract for private medical insurance) is novel in Canada, where economic rights are not included in the Charter and discredited in the United States. In that country, the liberty of individuals (mainly employers) to contract out of social and economic programs was endorsed by the Supreme Court in the early decades of the 20th century on the theory that laws that prohibited employers from entering into oppressive contracts with employees violated their "liberty" of contract; see, e.g., Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905)

[202] Nor do we accept that s. 7 of the Canadian Charter guarantees Dr. Chaoulli the "liberty" to deliver health care in a private context. ... The fact that state action constrains an individual's freedom by eliminating career choices that would otherwise be available does not in itself attract the protection of the liberty interest under s. 7. The liberty interest does not, for example, include the right to transact business whenever one wishes: R. v. Edwards Books and Art Ltd., [1986] 2 S.C.R. 713, at p. 786. Nor does it protect the right to exercise one's chosen profession: Prostitution Reference [[1990] 1 SCR 1123, 1990 CanLII 105], at p. 1179, per Larmer J. We would therefore reject Dr. Chaoulli's claim on behalf of care providers that their liberty interest under either the Canadian Charter or the Quebec Charter has been infringed by Quebec's single-tier public health system.

[207] As stated, the principal legal hurdle to the appellants' Canadian Charter challenge is not the preliminary step of identifying a s. 7 interest potentially affected The hurdle lies in their failure to find a fundamental principle of justice that is violated by the Quebec health plan so as to justify the Court in striking down the prohibition

C. Principles of Fundamental Justice

[208] For a principle to be one of fundamental justice, it must count among the basic tenets of our legal system: [Reference re Section 94(2) of the Motor Vehicle Act (BC), [1985] 2 SCR 486, 1985 CanLII 81], at p. 503. It must generally be accepted as such among reasonable people. ...

[209] Thus, the formal requirements for a principle of fundamental justice are threefold. First, it must be a legal principle. Second, the reasonable person must regard it as vital to our societal notion of justice, which implies a significant societal consensus. Third, it must be capable of being identified with precision and applied in a manner that yields predictable results. These requirements present insurmountable hurdles to the appellants. The aim of "health care to a reasonable standard within reasonable time" is not a legal principle. There is no "societal consensus" about what it means or how to achieve it. It cannot be "identified with precision." As the testimony in this case showed, a level of care that is considered perfectly reasonable by some doctors is denounced by others. Finally, we think it will be very difficult for those designing and implementing a health plan to predict when its provisions cross the line from what is "reasonable" into the forbidden territory of what is "unreasonable," and how the one is to be distinguished from the other.

[212] A review of the expert evidence and the medical literature suggests that there is no consensus regarding guidelines for timely medical treatment. ... There are currently no national standards for timely treatment

[Justices Binnie and LeBel noted that the bulk of expert evidence adduced and accepted by the trial judge was reliable and credible.]

[217] How serious is the waiting-list problem? No doubt it is serious; but how serious? The first major evidentiary difficulty for the appellants is the lack of accurate data. The major studies concluded that the real picture concerning waiting lists in Canada is subject to contradictory evidence and conflicting claims

[220] It is even more difficult to generalize about the potential impact of a waiting list on a particular patient. ... [After examining the literature, Binnie and LeBel JJ comment:] In other words, waiting lists may be serious in some cases, but in how many cases and how serious?

[221] Waiting times are not only found in public systems. They are found in all health care systems The consequence of a quasi-unlimited demand for health care coupled with limited resources, be they public or private, is to ration services. ...

[223] In a public system founded on the values of equity, solidarity and collective responsibility, rationing occurs on the basis of clinical need rather than wealth and social status As a result, there exists in Canada a phenomenon of "static queues" whereby a group of persons may remain on a waiting list for a considerable time if their situation is not pressing. ... In general, the evidence suggests that patients who need immediate medical care receive it. There are of course exceptions, and these exceptions are properly the focus of controversy, but in our view they can and should be addressed on a case-by-case basis.

[224] Section 10 of the Health Insurance Act provides that in certain circumstances Quebecers will be reimbursed for the cost of "insured services" rendered outside Quebec but in Canada (Regulation respecting the application of the Health Insurance Act, R.R.Q. 1981, c. A-29, s. 23.1), or outside Canada altogether (s. 23.2). There is no doubt that the power of reimbursement is exercised sparingly, and on occasion unlawfully The existence of the individual remedy, however, introduces an important element of flexibility, if administered properly.

[225] ... [O]ur colleagues write, "patients die while on waiting lists" (para. 112). This, too, is true. But our colleagues are not advocating an overbuilt system with enough idle capacity to eliminate waiting lists, and such generalized comments provided no guidance for what in practical terms would constitute an appropriate level of resources to meet their suggested standard of "public health care of a reasonable standard within reasonable time" (para. 105).

[226] We have similar concerns about the use made by the appellants of various reports in connection with other OECD countries. ... We think the Court is sufficiently burdened with conflicting evidence about our own health system without attempting a detailed investigation of the merits of trade-offs made in other countries, for their own purposes. ...

[Justices Binnie and LeBel went on to criticize what they perceived as McLachlin CJ and Major J's selective use of evidence about the situation in foreign states.]

[229] We are not to be taken as disputing the undoubted fact that there are serious problems with the single-tier health plan in Canada. Our point is simply that bits of evidence must be put in context. With respect, it is particularly dangerous to venture selectively into aspects of foreign health care systems with which we, as Canadians, have little familiarity. At the very least such information should be filtered and analysed at trial through an expert witness.

(2) Arbitrariness

[233] We agree with our colleagues the Chief Justice and Major J. that a law is arbitrary if "it bears no relation to, or is inconsistent with, the objective that lies behind [the legislation]" (para. 130). We do not agree with the Chief Justice and Major J. that the prohibition against private health insurance "bears no relation to, or is inconsistent with" the preservation of access to a health system based on need rather than wealth in accordance with the Canada Health Act. We also do not agree with our colleagues' expansion of the Morgentaler principle to invalidate a prohibition simply because a court believes it to be "unnecessary" for the government's purpose. There must be more than that to sustain a valid objection.

[234] The accepted definition in Rodriguez states that a law is arbitrary only where "it bears no relation to, or is inconsistent with, the objective that lies behind the legislation." To substitute the term "unnecessary" for "inconsistent" is to substantively alter the meaning of the term "arbitrary." "Inconsistent" means that the law logically contradicts its objectives, whereas "unnecessary" simply means that the objective could be met by other means. It is quite apparent that the latter is a much broader term that involves a policy choice. If a court were to declare unconstitutional every law impacting "security of the person" that the court considers unnecessary, there would be much greater scope for intervention under s. 7 than has previously been considered by this Court to be acceptable. ... The courts might find themselves constantly second-guessing the validity of governments' public policy objectives based on subjective views of the necessity of particular means used to advance legitimate government action as opposed to other means which critics might prefer.

[235] ... We approach the issue of arbitrariness in three steps

(a) What Is the "State Interest" Sought to Be Protected?

[236] Quebec's legislative objective is to provide high quality health care, at a reasonable cost, for as many people as possible in a manner that is consistent with principles of efficiency, equity and fiscal responsibility. Quebec (along with the other provinces and territories) subscribes to the policy objectives of the Canada Health Act An overbuilt health system is seen as no more in the larger public interest than a system that on occasion falls short. The legislative task is to strike a balance among competing interests.

(b) What Is the Relationship Between the "State Interest" Thus Identified and the Prohibition Against Private Health Insurance?

[238] The relationship lies both in principle and in practicality.

[239] In principle, Quebec wants a health system where access is governed by need rather than wealth or status. Quebec does not want people who are uninsurable to be left behind. To accomplish this objective endorsed by the Canada Health Act, Quebec seeks to discourage the growth of private-sector delivery of "insured" services based on wealth and insurability. We believe the prohibition is rationally connected to Quebec's objective and is not inconsistent with it.

[240] In practical terms, Quebec bases the prohibition on the view that private insurance, and a consequent major expansion of private health services, would have a harmful effect on the public system.

(c) Have the Appellants Established That the Prohibition Bears No Relation to, or Is Inconsistent with, the State Interest?

[242] The trial judge considered all the evidence and concluded that the expansion of private health care would undoubtedly have a negative impact on the public health system The trial judge relied on the reports available to her in rejecting the appellants' constitutional challenge, and none of the material that has since been added (such as the Romanow Report) changes or modifies the correctness of her conclusion, in our view. We therefore agree with the trial judge and the Quebec Court of Appeal that the appellants failed to make out a case of "arbitrariness" on the evidence. Indeed the evidence proves the contrary. . . .

[256] For all these reasons, we agree . . . that in light of the legislative objectives of the Canada Health Act it is not "arbitrary" for Quebec to discourage the growth of private sector health care. Prohibition of private health insurance is directly related to Quebec's interest in promoting a need-based system and in ensuring its viability and efficiency. Prohibition of private insurance is not "inconsistent" with the state interest; still less is it "unrelated" to it.

[258] As to our colleagues' dismissal of the factual basis for Quebec's legislative choice, the public has invested very large sums of money in a series of authoritative reports to analyse health care in this country and in other countries. The reports uniformly recommend the retention of single-tier medicine. People are free to challenge (as do the appellants) the government's reliance on those reports but such reliance cannot be dismissed as "arbitrary." People are also free to dispute Quebec's strategy, but in our view it cannot be said that . . . [a legislative choice] has been adopted "arbitrarily" by the Quebec National Assembly

(4) Conclusion Under Section 7 of the Canadian Charter

[265] For the foregoing reasons, even accepting (as we do) the trial judge's conclusion that the claimants have established a deprivation of the life and security of some Quebec residents occasioned in some circumstances by waiting list delays, the deprivation would not violate any legal principle of fundamental justice within the meaning of s. 7 of the Canadian Charter.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

For further discussion of the implications of Chaoulli on the issue of privatization of our health care system, see Colleen Flood, Kent Roach & Lorne Sossin, eds, Access to Care, Access to Justice: The Legal Debate Over Private Health Insurance in Canada (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2005).

2. For another challenge to key elements of a provincial health care plan, with a very different outcome, see Cambie Surgeries Corporation v British Columbia (AG), 2020 BCSC 1310.

3. In Flora v Ontario Health Insurance Plan, 2008 ONCA 538, the applicant was diagnosed with liver cancer in 1999. After consulting several Ontario doctors, he was told that he was not a suitable candidate for a liver transplant and was given approximately six to eight months to live. Eventually, at a cost of about $450,000, he received life-saving treatment at a hospital in London, England. He applied to the Ontario Health Insurance Plan (OHIP) for reimbursement of his medical expenses. When the respondent rejected his reimbursement request, the applicant sought a review of OHIP's decision before the Health Services Appeal and Review Board. The majority of the Board upheld OHIP's denial of reimbursement on the basis that the treatment received by the appellant in England was not an "insured service" within the meaning of the Health Insurance Act, RSO 1990, c H.6 (the Act) and s 28.4(2) of RRO 1990, Reg 552 (the Regulation). His subsequent appeals to the Divisional Court and the Court of Appeal were dismissed. The Court of Appeal said that OHIP's decision did not violate the applicant's s 7 rights:

[101] ... In contrast to the legislative provisions at issue in Chaoulli, Morgentaler and Rodriguez, s. 28.4(2) of the Regulation does not prohibit or impede anyone from seeking medical treatment. ... Section 28.4(2) provides a defined benefit for out-of-country medical treatment that is not otherwise available to Ontarians—the right to obtain public funding for certain specific out-of-country medical treatments. By not providing funding for all out-of-country medical treatments, it does not deprive an individual of the rights protected by s. 7 of the Charter.

4. Recall the PHS (Insite) case, excerpted above in Section II. Could it be read as establishing any kind of "positive right" to health care against the state?

5. In Allen v Alberta, 2015 ABCA 277, a s 7 challenge to Alberta's ban on private health insurance was unsuccessful. Chaoulli was distinguished on an evidentiary basis, with a finding at the Court of Queen's Bench level, affirmed by the Court of Appeal, that the challenger, Allen, had not established on the facts a violation of his security of the person. (Allen, a dentist, had required back surgery as a result of hockey injuries. He was in increasing pain and was unable to work. The wait time for such surgery in Alberta was 18 months, and Allen eventually had surgery in the United States at a cost of over $77,000.)

6. At issue in Victoria (City) v Adams, 2008 BCSC 1363 was a civil injunction, sought by the city of Victoria, British Columbia, against a group of homeless people who had erected a tent city in a park. The injunction required them to vacate pursuant to a city by-law that made it an offence for anyone to "take up a temporary abode overnight" (at para 9) or "erect or construct, or cause to be erected or constructed, a tent, building or structure, including a temporary structure such as a tent, in a park" (at para 32). Madam Justice Ross of the BC Supreme Court struck down the by-law, holding it in violation of s 7 of the Charter. In her words, "the uncontradicted expert evidence establishes that exposure to the elements without adequate shelter, and in particular without overhead protection, can result in a number of serious and life-threatening conditions, most notably hypothermia" (at para 145). Because Victoria's emergency shelters were insufficient to house the city's homeless population, she concluded that some homeless people were invariably forced to seek public shelter in a way that exposed them to significant health and safety risks. Justice Ross held further that the s 7 deprivation was both arbitrary and overbroad. The purposes of the prohibition were to ensure that use of public spaces was open to all members of society, to protect the natural environment from damage, and to address public health and safety concerns. But the specific ban on setting up a tent in a park was not tailored to any of these purposes. Noting the Supreme Court of Canada's decision in Gosselin, Ross J did not declare that s 7 imposes a positive obligation on the government to provide adequate housing. Instead, relying on the Court's decision in Chaoulli, she concluded that the government violated a negative obligation to not deprive individuals of their s 7 rights. The city's appeal was dismissed: Victoria (City) v Adams, 2009 BCCA 563.

7. An attempt to expand the ambit of s 7 to include social and economic rights was unsuccessful in Tanudjaja v Canada (AG), 2014 ONCA 852, leave to appeal to SCC dismissed, [2015 CanLII 36780, \[2015\] SCCA No 39 \(QL\)](#). The appellants suffered from homelessness and inadequate housing and applied for Charter relief on the basis that legislative policies, programs, and services had worsened their plight. A majority of the Ontario Court of Appeal upheld the finding of the motions judge that the application was not justiciable and that it was "demonstrably unsuitable for adjudication" (at para 36). Justice Feldman dissented; leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada was denied.

8. Could s 7 be used to safeguard environmental rights? Could a successful s 7 challenge be brought to laws or other government actions that allow pollution at levels that interfere with human health and well-being? What difficulties would arise in bringing such a challenge?: see Nathalie J Chalifour, "Environmental Justice and the Charter: Do Environmental Injustices Infringe Sections 7 and 15 of the Charter?" IV. SECTIONS 7 AND 1

The Supreme Court of Canada has never upheld a violation of s 7 under s 1 and has often commented that it would be difficult to do so, particularly where the s 7 violation involves a law that is arbitrary, overbroad, or grossly disproportionate. It might be thought that an arbitrary law could not pass the rational connection stage, while an overbroad law would not be minimally impairing, and a grossly disproportionate law would necessarily fail the final step of the Oakes test. More generally, one might wonder whether a law that deprives someone of life, liberty, and security of the person in a way that violates the principles of fundamental justice could be "demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society" (Charter, s 1). Nevertheless, in Bedford, excerpted above in Section II, McLachlin CJ accepted the possibility of justifying a s 7 infringement:

[124] This Court has previously identified parallels between the rules against arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality under s. 7 and elements of the s. 1 analysis for justification of laws that violate Charter rights. These parallels should not be allowed to obscure the crucial differences between the two sections.

[125] Section 7 and s. 1 ask different questions. The question under s. 7 is whether the law's negative effect on life, liberty or security of the person is in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. With respect to the principles of arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality, the specific questions are whether the law's purpose, taken at face value, is connected to its effects and whether the negative effect is grossly disproportionate to the law's purpose. Under s. 1, the question is different—whether the negative impact of a law on the rights of individuals is proportionate to the pressing and substantial goal of the law in furthering the public interest. The question of justification on the basis of an overarching public goal is at the heart of s. 1, but it plays no part in the s. 7 analysis, which is concerned with the narrower question of whether the impugned law infringes individual rights.

[126] ... Under s. 1, the government bears the burden of showing that a law that breaches an individual's rights can be justified having regard to the government's goal. Because the question is whether the broader public interest justifies the infringement of individual rights, the law's goal must be pressing and substantial. The "rational connection" branch of the s. 1 analysis asks whether the law was a rational means for the legislature to pursue its objective. "Minimal impairment" asks whether the legislature could have designed a law that infringes rights to a lesser extent; it considers the legislature's reasonable alternatives. At the final stage of the s. 1 analysis, the court is required to weigh the negative impact of the law on people's rights against the beneficial impact of the law in terms of achieving its goal for the greater public good. The impacts are judged both qualitatively and quantitatively. Unlike individual claimants, the Crown is well placed to call the social science and expert evidence required to justify the law's impact in terms of society as a whole.

[127] By contrast, under s. 7, the claimant bears the burden of establishing that the law deprives her of life, liberty or security of the person in a manner that is not connected to the law's object or in a manner that is grossly disproportionate to the law's object. The inquiry into the purpose of the law focuses on the nature of the object, not on its efficacy. The inquiry into the impact on life, liberty or security of the person is not quantitative—for example, how many people are negatively impacted—but qualitative. An arbitrary, overbroad, or grossly disproportionate impact on one person suffices to establish a breach of s. 7. To require s. 7 claimants to establish the efficacy of the law versus its deleterious consequences on members of society as a whole, would impose the government's s. 1 burden on claimants under s. 7. That cannot be right.

[129] It has been said that a law that violates s. 7 is unlikely to be justified under s. 1 of the Charter (Motor Vehicle Reference, at p. 518). The significance of the fundamental rights protected by s. 7 supports this observation. Nevertheless, the jurisprudence has also recognized that there may be some cases where s. 1 has a role to play (see, e.g., R. v. Malmo-Levine [2003 SCC 74], at paras. 96–98). Depending on the importance of the legislative goal and the nature of the s. 7 infringement in a particular case, the possibility that the government could establish that a s. 7 violation is justified under s. 1 of the Charter cannot be discounted.

In R v Michaud, 2015 ONCA 585, the Ontario Court of Appeal considered a Charter challenge to an Ontario regulation that required commercial truckers to equip their vehicles with devices that limited their speed to 105 km/h. The Court of Appeal accepted the trial judge's conclusion that in a small number of cases, a truck driver would have to travel faster than 105 km/h for a short period of time in order to avoid collisions. The regulation therefore affected truck drivers' security of the person; moreover, it was arbitrary in part—that is, overbroad—in light of its overall objective of improving highway safety. Nevertheless, after noting McLachlin CJ's comments in Bedford, the Court conducted a complete Oakes analysis and held that this infringement of s 7 was justified. On the minimal impairment step, Lauwers JA commented that the choice of a 105 km/h limit was, in the context of "a complex regulatory response to the social problem of motor vehicle and highway safety" (at para 127), "within the reasonable range of policy choices open to the government ... and is well within the margin of appreciation or room to maneuver due to the regulator" (at para 136). How far might this kind of reasoning extend? Why does it matter that the law at issue in Michaud was part of a complex regulatory scheme as opposed to an outright prohibition on behaviour?

For an extensive discussion of the relationship between s 7 and s 1 of the Charter and of the reasoning in Michaud, see Cambie Surgeries Corporation v British Columbia (AG), 2020 BCSC 1310. In a very lengthy decision, Steeves J considered and rejected a constitutional challenge to central elements of British Columbia's Medicare Protection Act, RSBC 1996, c 286. He rejected the plaintiffs' claim that the impugned restrictions on private clinics and private health insurance violated s 7 of the Charter, but he also commented that if there had been any violations, he would have upheld them under s 1.

I. INTRODUCTION AND HISTORY OF EQUALITY RIGHTS

Section 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (Charter) came into effect on April 15, 1985, three years after the rest of the Charter. This delay was provided so that governments had time to review their laws for compliance with the new equality guarantee. However, as we will see in this chapter, s 15 demanded more than simply reviewing laws that were discriminatory on their face, which created challenges for both courts and governments. Indeed, former Chief Justice Beverley McLachlin once called equality “the most difficult” Charter right (in “Equality: The Most Difficult Right” (2001) 14 SCLR (2d) 17), and the Supreme Court of Canada has continuously re-evaluated its approach to equality rights since it decided its first s 15 case, Andrews v Law Society of British Columbia, [1989] 1 SCR 143, 1989 CanLII 2. The difficulty could be seen to stem from several sources: the history of equality rights and their interpretation prior to s 15, contested meanings of equality in other jurisdictions and in different disciplines, and the demands that the eradication of systemic inequality places upon courts and governments. At the root of the difficulty is the contrast between formal equality, which only requires that similarly situated people be treated the same, and substantive equality, which recognizes that differential treatment and positive government action are often needed in order to redress the inequalities experienced by members of disadvantaged and oppressed groups. As we will see, although the Supreme Court has claimed that s 15, interpreted properly, guarantees the right to substantive equality, the meaning of that term remains contested, and it has been inconsistently applied in the case law.

Prior to the Charter, the Canadian Bill of Rights, SC 1960, c 44 guaranteed individuals “equality before the law and the protection of the law” (s 1(b)). The Canadian Bill of Rights jurisprudence on equality was influenced by British constitutional theorist Albert Venn Dicey, who conceptualized equality in relation to “the rule of law” (see Chapter 15, Antecedents of the Charter). For Dicey, equality only demanded equal treatment in the administration and enforcement of the law. While this definition was consistent with the idea that society be governed by law, it did not require a review of the constitutionality of governments’ exercise of legislative powers. Equality-based challenges to legislation under the Canadian Bill of Rights were uniformly unsuccessful (see, for example, Bliss v Attorney General of Canada, [1979] 1 SCR 183, 1978 CanLII 25, discussed in the excerpt from Andrews in Section II.A), and equality-seeking groups sought to ensure that the Charter's equality guarantee would provide courts with a more fulsome basis for addressing systemic inequalities.

Also pre-dating the Charter is a series of international human rights instruments providing for civil and political rights, economic, social and cultural rights, and a range of rights related to race, sex, disability, and other grounds (see the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 19 December 1966, 999 UNTS 171 (entered into force 23 March 1976, accession by Canada 19 May 1976); the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, 16 December 1966, 993 UNTS 3 (entered into force 3 January 1976, accession by Canada 19 May 1976); the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, 21 December 1965, Can TS 1970 No 28 (entered into force 4 January 1969, ratified by Canada 14 October 1970); the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women, 18 December 1979, Can TS 1982 No 31 (entered into force 3 September 1981, ratified by Canada 10 December 1981). The Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, 13 December 2006, A/RES/61/106 (entered into force 3 May 2008, ratified by Canada 11 March 2010) and the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, 13 September 2007, A/RES/61/295 (assented to by Canada 21 June 2021), post-date the Charter). These international human rights instruments grounded the lobbying efforts of equality-seeking groups more so than the equality guarantee in the 14th Amendment of the United States Constitution, which is discussed in Section II.A, Note 4 following Andrews. The former provided a clearer pathway to the realization of positive state duties to ensure economic, social, and cultural rights, whereas the 14th Amendment, like the Canadian Bill of Rights, guaranteed only "equal protection of the laws" and had a history of narrow and formalistic interpretations of equality.

The first draft of the Charter's equality guarantee, tabled in 1980, provided that:

- 15.(1) Everyone has the right to equality before the law and to the equal protection of the law without discrimination because of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age or sex.
- (2) The section does not preclude any program or activity that has as its object the amelioration of conditions of disadvantaged persons or groups.

See Proposed Resolution for Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen Respecting the Constitution of Canada, tabled in the House of Commons and Senate, 6 October 1980.

Advocacy from a range of equality-seeking groups resulted in several changes to this text. First, protections were added for equality under the law and equal benefit of the law. As explained in Andrews by McIntyre J, writing for the majority (at 170) on s 15, the inclusion of four equality rights was an attempt to remedy some of the shortcomings of the right to equality in the Canadian Bill of Rights. It also reflected the expanded concept of discrimination being developed under the various human rights codes since the enactment of the Canadian Bill of Rights.

As we will see throughout this chapter, however, subsequent to Andrews the Court has not had much to say about the four equality rights in its s 15 decisions. For further discussion, see Mary Ebets & Kim Stanton, "The Disappearance of the Four Equality Rights and Systemic Discrimination from Canadian Equality Jurisprudence" (2018) 38:1 NJCL 89.

The second major change was that the list of grounds that are protected under s 15 was made open ended, and mental and physical disability were added as enumerated grounds. Advocates also sought to include marital status, sexual orientation, and political belief as enumerated grounds, but these were left out and made subject to the interpretation of the courts as to appropriate "analogous grounds." In the case of sexual orientation, in particular, commentators noted the lack of consensus on inclusion of this ground and the desire on the part of some framers to leave this issue to judicial review. Third, the ameliorative programs provision in s 15(2) was revised to include the same open-ended list of grounds as s 15(1). Fourth, the heading for s 15 was changed from "Non-discrimination Rights" to "Equality Rights," largely at the behest of women's groups concerned about a negative rights approach to s 15.

The final text of s 15 reads as follows:

15(1) Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

15(2) Subsection (1) does not preclude any law, program or activity that has as its object the amelioration of conditions of disadvantaged individuals or groups including those that are disadvantaged because of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

Another significant feature of the language of s 15 is its guarantee of equality rights to "every individual," which means that—unlike some other Charter rights and freedoms—natural persons, including non-citizens, can mount challenges under s 15, while corporations and estates cannot (see Canada (AG) v Hislop, 2007 SCC 10 at paras 71-73).

Women's groups also lobbied for the inclusion of s 28 of the Charter, which was seen as crucial when the notwithstanding clause, s 33, was added to the Charter and allowed equality rights to be subject to the legislative override at the behest of governments. Drafted so as to apply notwithstanding s 33, s 28 provides that:

28. Notwithstanding anything in this Charter, the rights and freedoms referred to in it are guaranteed equally to male and female persons.

Similar to s 28 is s 35(4) of the Constitution Act, 1982, which guarantees Aboriginal and treaty rights equally to male and female persons. Although neither section has been subject to extensive judicial consideration, we consider some potential applications of s 28 in Section II.C of this chapter.

For further discussions of the history of ss 15 and 28, see Kerri Froc, "A Prayer for Original Meaning: A History of Section 15 and What It Should Mean for Equality" (2018) 38:1 NJCL 35; Gwen Brodsky & Shelagh Day, Canadian Charter Equality Rights for Women: One Step Forward or Two Steps Back? (Ottawa: Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, 1989) ch 1; FL Morton & Rainer Knopff, The Charter Revolution and the Court Party (Peterborough, Ont: Broadview Press, 2000); Bruce Porter, "Expectations of Equality" (2006) 33 SCLR (2d) 23.

While much of the focus on the development of s 15 was on the four equality rights, the concept of discrimination also lies at the heart of s 15(1). Section II of this chapter will review the key cases establishing the test for discrimination, its evolution over time, and how the courts have undertaken the interpretation of the key elements of s 15.

Section III of this chapter will discuss the interplay between s 15(1) and s 15(2). Section 15(2) protects laws, programs, and activities that are aimed at improving the condition of disadvantaged groups. It provides interpretive assistance with the scope and purpose of Charter equality rights by suggesting that ameliorative programs do not violate s 15(1), and it also provides an alternative basis for governments to defend their actions, rather than relying on s 1. As we shall see, however, the Court has looked at the ameliorative nature of laws and policies under both s 15(1) and s 15(2), depending on the nature of the claim at issue and whether it is one of so-called "reverse discrimination" or an underinclusive benefit program.

Another important issue that arises is the interplay between s 15(1) and s 1 of the Charter, which we will review in Section IV of this chapter. Since Andrews, the Court has emphasized the importance of keeping s 15 and s 1 analytically distinct. This means that the reasons behind government laws and policies that are alleged to violate s 15 should not be relied on to foreclose the finding of a violation of s 15. To do otherwise would be to import s 1 considerations into s 15, when s 15—unlike s 7 and the principles of fundamental justice—does not have an internal limit apart from “discrimination” and the protected grounds. This is an important issue in terms of who bears the burden of proof as to the reasonableness and rationality of government actions. Section IV will also review some of the nuances in s 1 analysis where there has been a breach of s 15, as well as what sorts of remedies a s 15 violation may demand.

This chapter focuses on two key s 15 decisions as “bookends” in the Court’s development of equality rights doctrine: Andrews and Fraser v Canada (AG), 2020 SCC 28. These two cases allow us to explore the evolution of many of the core issues in the interpretation and application of s 15, including the test for discrimination; the differences between direct and adverse effects discrimination; the role of grounds under s 15; and the interplay between s 15(1), s 15(2), and s 1. In Fraser, Abella J attempted to provide clarity on several issues that have plagued the Court for decades, but the strong dissenting reasons in Fraser leave open many questions about the future of s 15 claims. We also include discussion of several s 15 cases between Andrews and Fraser and post-Fraser, exploring issues such as the relative success of claims involving LGBTQ2+ rights and the challenges of applying s 15 in the context of individual and group claims connected to the rights of Indigenous peoples, which involve the intersection of equality and Aboriginal rights.

We review some of the ongoing debates about s 15 throughout this chapter, including divisions in the courts about the test for discrimination and how it should be applied; the interplay between s 15 and s 25 of the Charter, which protects Aboriginal, treaty, and other rights that may conflict with Charter rights; other potential conflicts and overlaps between rights and freedoms, including freedom of religion and the right to be free from discrimination based on sexual orientation, gender identity, and gender expression; and gaps in s 15 jurisprudence, including a lack of cases involving racial discrimination and reproductive rights.

Our aim in this chapter is to ensure that students and other readers come away with an understanding of why s 15 has been “the most difficult right” (McLachlin, “Equality: The Most Difficult Right,” above) for courts and governments. We pose questions throughout about the leading Supreme Court cases we excerpt and their implications for equality rights litigation and government decision making. As you read the cases and notes in this chapter, here are some overarching questions to consider: What are the challenges inherent in s 15 litigation from the claimants’ perspectives? How does this compare with challenges in litigating other Charter rights, or Aboriginal rights claims under s 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982? How should governments respond to their s 15 obligations in the context of their legislative, executive, and administrative functions, as well as in the litigation context? Most importantly, can s 15 litigation lead to the sort of legal and social change that “substantive equality” promises and that equality-seeking groups hoped for with the entrenchment of s 15? Are some claims easier than others for courts to accept under s 15—for example, those that require recognition of members of equality-seeking groups rather than redistribution of public resources or other positive action on the part of government? What are the proper roles of courts and governments in responding to systemic inequality in all its manifestations?

II. SECTION 15 FRAMEWORK AND ANALYTICAL APPROACH

In this part, we focus on the earliest s 15(1) case decided by the Supreme Court of Canada—Andrews—and the latest major s 15 decision—Fraser. The cases in the 30-plus intervening years are briefly noted and excerpted in the notes between these two bookends, as are some of the recurring issues. Cases decided subsequent to Fraser, and other recurring issues, are discussed in the notes following Fraser.

Because the implementation of s 15 was delayed until three years after the rest of the Charter came into force, it was not until 1989 that the Supreme Court of Canada decided its first case interpreting and applying the equality guarantee. In Andrews, the Court set out a three-part approach to s 15, requiring (1) differential treatment (2) on the basis of an expressly prohibited or analogous ground (3) that is discriminatory because it imposes a burden or denies a benefit.

A. THE TEST FOR DISCRIMINATION/PURPOSE OF SECTION 15

Andrews v Law Society of British Columbia

[\[1989\] 1 SCR 143, 1989 CanLII 2](#) (cited to SCR)

[Andrews, a British subject permanently resident in Canada, brought an action for a declaration that the Canadian citizenship requirement for admission to the Law Society of British Columbia violated s 15 of the Charter. In accepting his claim, the Supreme Court evaluated three possible approaches to s 15 and selected the one that seemed to make the most sense of its language and history, as well as the relationship between s 15 and s 1.

The Supreme Court unanimously held that the citizenship requirement violated s 15. Justice McIntyre wrote the principal opinion on the interpretation of s 15. Justice Wilson (Dickson CJ and L'Heureux-Dubé J concurring) and La Forest J wrote separate opinions in which they agreed with McIntyre J's approach to s 15. They disagreed with McIntyre J on the issue of whether the violation was justified under s 1; in their view, the citizenship requirement was not closely linked to candidates' ability to effectively practise law. Justice McIntyre would have upheld the citizenship requirement, using a deferential approach to the state's burden of justifying s 15 violations. While McIntyre J's judgment was ultimately the dissent in a 4–2 ruling, it is the Court's unanimous position on the interpretation of s 15.]

McINTYRE J (Lamer J concurring) (dissenting in part):

[158] This appeal raises only one question. Does the citizenship requirement for entry into the legal profession contained in s. 42 of the Barristers and Solicitors Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 26, (the "Act") contravene s. 15(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

[163] The Concept of Equality

Section 15(1) of the Charter provides for every individual a guarantee of equality before and under the law, as well as the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination. This is not a general guarantee of equality; it does not provide for equality between individuals or groups within society in a general or abstract sense, nor does it impose on individuals or groups [164] an obligation to accord equal treatment to others. It is concerned with the application of the law. No problem regarding the scope of the word "law," as employed in s. 15(1), can arise in this case because it is an Act of the Legislature which is under attack. Whether other governmental or quasi-governmental regulations, rules, or requirements may be termed laws under s. 15(1) should be left for cases in which the issue arises.

The concept of equality has long been a feature of Western thought. As embodied in s. 15(1) of the Charter, it is an elusive concept and, more than any of the other rights and freedoms guaranteed in the Charter, it lacks precise definition. ...

It is a comparative concept, the condition of which may only be attained or discerned by comparison with the condition of others in the social and political setting in which the question arises. It must be recognized at once, however, that every difference in treatment between individuals under the law will not necessarily result in inequality and, as well, that identical treatment may frequently produce serious inequality. ...

[165] [The thought that inequality may result from equal treatment] has been expressed in this Court in the context of s. 2(a) of the Charter in R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295, where Dickson C.J. said at p. 347:

The equality necessary to support religious freedom does not require identical treatment of all religions. In fact, the interests of true equality may well require differentiation in treatment.

In simple terms, then, it may be said that a law which treats all identically and which provides equality of treatment between "A" and "B" might well cause inequality for "C," depending on differences in personal characteristics and situations. To approach the ideal of full equality before and under the law—and in human affairs an approach is all that can be expected—the main consideration must be the impact of the law on the individual or the group concerned. Recognizing that there will always be an infinite variety of personal characteristics, capacities, entitlements and merits among those subject to a law, there must be accorded, as nearly as may be possible, an equality of benefit and protection and no more of the restrictions, penalties or burdens imposed upon one than another. In other words, the admittedly unattainable ideal should be that a law expressed to bind all should not because of irrelevant personal differences have a more burdensome or less beneficial impact on one than another.

[166] ... The similarly situated test is a restatement of the Aristotelian principle of formal equality—that "things that are alike should be treated alike, while things that are unlike should be treated unlike in proportion to their unlikeness" (Ethica Nicomachea, trans. W. Ross, Book V3, at p. 1131a-6 (1925)).

The test as stated, however, is seriously deficient in that it excludes any consideration of the nature of the law. ...

[167] ... A similarly situated test focussing on the equal application of the law to those to whom it has application could lead to results akin to those in Bliss v. Attorney General of Canada, [1979] 1 S.C.R. 183. In Bliss, a pregnant woman was denied unemployment benefits to which she would have been entitled had she not been pregnant. She claimed that the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, violated the equality guarantees of the Canadian Bill of Rights because it discriminated against her on the basis of her sex. Her claim was dismissed by this Court on the grounds that there was no discrimination on the basis of sex, since the class into which she fell under the Act was that of pregnant persons, and within that class, all persons were treated equally. This case, of course, was decided before the advent of the Charter.

... [T]he [similarly situated] test cannot be accepted as a fixed rule or formula for the resolution of equality questions arising under the Charter. Consideration must be given to the content of the law, to its purpose, and its impact upon those to whom it applies, and also upon those whom it excludes from its application. The issues which will arise from case to case are such that it would be wrong to attempt to confine these considerations within such a fixed and limited formula.

It is not every distinction or differentiation in treatment at law which will transgress the equality guarantees of s. 15 of the Charter. It is, of course, obvious that legislatures may—and to govern effectively—must treat different individuals and groups in different ways. Indeed, such distinctions are one of the main preoccupations of legislatures. The classifying of individuals and groups, the making of different provisions respecting such groups, the application of different rules, regulations, requirements and qualifications to different persons is necessary for the governance of modern [169] society. As noted above, for the accommodation of differences, which is the essence of true equality, it will frequently be necessary to make distinctions. What kinds of distinctions will be acceptable under s. 15(1) and what kinds will violate its provisions?

[In answering these questions, McIntyre J quoted the articulation of the purposive approach in Hunter v Southam Inc, [1984] 2 SCR 145, 1984 CanLII 33 (as discussed in Chapter 17) before setting out the purpose of s 15:]

[171] ... It is clear that the purpose of s. 15 is to ensure equality in the formulation and application of the law. The promotion of equality entails the promotion of a society in which all are secure in the knowledge that they are recognized at law as human beings equally deserving of concern, respect and consideration. It has a large remedial component. ...

It must be recognized, however, as well that the promotion of equality under s. 15 has a much more specific goal than the mere elimination of distinctions. If the Charter was intended to eliminate all distinctions, then there would be no place for sections such as 27 (multicultural heritage); 2(a) (freedom of conscience and religion); 25 (aboriginal rights and freedoms); and other such provisions designed to safeguard certain distinctions. Moreover, the fact that identical treatment may frequently produce serious inequality is recognized in s. 15(2), which states that the equality rights in s. 15(1) do "not preclude any law, program or activity that has as its object the amelioration of conditions of disadvantaged individuals or groups ...".

[172] Discrimination

The right to equality before and under the law, and the rights to the equal protection and benefit of the law contained in s. 15, are granted with the direction contained in s. 15 itself that they be without discrimination. Discrimination is unacceptable in a democratic society because it epitomizes the worst effects of the denial of equality, and discrimination reinforced by law is particularly repugnant. The worst oppression will result from discriminatory measures having the force of law. It is against this evil that s. 15 provides a guarantee.

Discrimination as referred to in s. 15 of the Charter must be understood in the context of pre-Charter history. Prior to the enactment of s. 15(1), the Legislatures of the various provinces and the federal Parliament had passed during the previous fifty years what may be generally referred to as Human Rights Acts. ...

[173] ... What does discrimination mean? The question has arisen most commonly in a consideration of the Human Rights Acts and the general concept of discrimination under those enactments has been fairly well settled. There is little difficulty, drawing upon the cases in this Court, in isolating an acceptable definition. In Ontario Human Rights Commission and O'Malley v. Simpsons-Sears Ltd., [1985] 2 S.C.R. 536, at p. 551, discrimination (in that case adverse effect discrimination) was described in these terms: "It arises where an employer ... adopts a rule or standard ... which has a discriminatory effect upon a prohibited ground on one employee or group of employees in that it imposes, because of some special characteristic of the employee or group, obligations, penalties, or restrictive conditions not imposed on other members of the work force." It was held in that case, as well, that no intent was required as an element of discrimination, for it is in essence the impact of the discriminatory act or provision upon the person affected which is decisive in considering any complaint. ...

[Turning next to Dickson CJ's discussion of systemic discrimination in Canadian National Railway Co v Canada (Canadian Human Rights Commission), [1987] 1 SCR 1114, 1987 CanLII 109, McIntyre J relied upon the following passage from Rosalie S Abella, Report of the Commission on Equality in Employment (Ottawa: Minister of Supply and Services Canada, 1984) at 2:]

Discrimination ... means practices or attitudes that have, whether by design or impact, the effect of limiting an individual's or a group's right to the opportunities generally available because of attributed rather than actual characteristics ...

It is not a question of whether this discrimination is motivated by an intentional desire to obstruct someone's potential, or whether it is the accidental by-product of innocently motivated practices or systems. If the barrier is affecting certain groups in a disproportionately negative way, it is a signal that the practices that lead to this adverse impact may be discriminatory.

... I would say then that discrimination may be described as a distinction, whether intentional or not but based on grounds relating to personal characteristics of the individual or group, which has the effect of imposing burdens, obligations, or disadvantages on such individual or group not imposed upon others, or which withholds or limits access to opportunities, benefits, and advantages available to other members of society. Distinctions based on personal characteristics attributed to an individual solely on the basis of association with a group will rarely escape the charge of discrimination, while those [175] based on an individual's merits and capacities will rarely be so classed.

... The enumerated grounds do, however, reflect the most common and probably the most socially destructive and historically practised bases of discrimination and must, in the words of s. 15(1), receive particular attention. Both the enumerated grounds themselves and other possible grounds of discrimination recognized under s. 15(1) must be interpreted in a broad and generous manner, reflecting the fact that they are constitutional provisions not easily repealed or amended but intended to provide a "continuing framework for the legitimate exercise of governmental power" and, at the same time, for "the unremitting protection" of equality rights. ...

[177] Relationship Between s. 15(1) and s. 1 of the Charter

[178] ... This Court has described the analytical approach to the Charter in R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103; R. v. Edwards Books and Art Ltd., [1986] 2 S.C.R. 713, and other cases, the essential feature of which is that the right guaranteeing sections be kept analytically separate from s. 1. In other words, when confronted with a problem under the Charter, the first question which must be answered will be whether or not an infringement of a guaranteed right has occurred. Any justification of an infringement which is found to have occurred must be made, if at all, under the broad provisions of s. 1. It must be admitted at once that the relationship between these two sections may well be difficult to determine on a wholly satisfactory basis. It is, however, important to keep them analytically distinct if for no other reason than the different attribution of the burden of proof. It is for the citizen to establish that his or her Charter right has been infringed and for the state to justify the infringement.

Approaches to s. 15(1)

[Justice McIntyre discussed three approaches that had been adopted with respect to the interpretation of s 15 and its relationship to s 1. The first, advanced by Peter Hogg in Constitutional Law of Canada, 2nd ed (Toronto: Carswell, 1985), proposed that every distinction drawn would be a breach of s 15 and require justification under s 1. Justice McIntyre rejected this approach, saying that it trivialized a fundamental Charter right and deprived the concept of "discrimination" of any content by equating it with "distinction." The second approach, which had been adopted by (then) McLachlin J in the lower court decision—Andrews v Law Society of British Columbia, 1986 CanLII 1287, 27 DLR (4th) 600 at 610 (BCCA)—required that the reasonableness and fairness of any distinction drawn by the law be considered under s 15(1). Justice McIntyre rejected this approach because it left only a very minor role for s 1 and departed from the Court's analytical approach to the Charter. Justice McIntyre adopted a third approach that is based on the limitations in the text of s 15(1)—that is discrimination on the basis of prohibited grounds.]

[179] A third approach, sometimes described as an "enumerated or analogous grounds" approach, adopts the concept that discrimination is generally [180] expressed by the enumerated grounds. ...

The analysis of discrimination in this approach must take place within the context of the enumerated grounds and those analogous to them. The words "without discrimination" require more than [181] a mere finding of distinction between the treatment of groups or individuals. Those words are a form of qualifier built into s. 15 itself and limit those distinctions which are forbidden by the section to those which involve prejudice or disadvantage.

[182] ... The third or "enumerated and analogous grounds" approach most closely accords with the purposes of s. 15 and the definition of discrimination outlined above and leaves questions of justification to s. 1. However, in assessing whether a complainant's rights have been infringed under s. 15(1), it is not enough to focus only on the alleged ground of discrimination and decide whether or not it is an enumerated or analogous ground. The effect of the impugned distinction or classification on the complainant must be considered. Once it is accepted that not all distinctions and differentiations created by law are discriminatory, then a role must be assigned to s. 15(1) which goes beyond the mere recognition of a legal distinction. A complainant under s. 15(1) must show not only that he or she is not receiving equal treatment before and under the law or that the law has a differential impact on him or her in the protection or benefit accorded by law but, in addition, must show that the legislative impact of the law is discriminatory.

Where discrimination is found a breach of s. 15(1) has occurred and—where s. 15(2) is not applicable—any justification, any consideration of the reasonableness of the enactment; indeed, any consideration of factors which could justify the discrimination and support the constitutionality of the impugned enactment would take place under s. 1. This approach would conform with the directions of this Court in earlier decisions concerning the application of s. 1 and at the same time would allow for the screening out of the obviously trivial and vexatious claim. In this, it would provide a workable approach to the problem.

[Justice McIntyre went on to find that the distinction drawn between citizens and non-citizens imposed a burden by delaying admission to the bar and was therefore discriminatory. See Section II.C for a discussion of the reasons for finding non-citizenship to be an analogous ground.

In addition to concurring with McIntyre J's approach to the interpretation of s 15, Wilson J agreed that non-citizens should have access to s 15. Like McIntyre J, she borrowed a famous phrase from American equal protection law, stating that non-citizens are a "discrete and insular minority" vulnerable to having their interests overlooked in the legislative process (United States v Carolene Products Co, 304 US 144 at 152-53, n 4 (1938) as cited in Andrews at 151 (Wilson J) and at 183 (McIntyre J)); see Note 4 below.

A majority of the Court found that the Oakes test should apply without modification to a s 15(1) violation. For a discussion of the different approaches taken by the judges in Andrews to the s 1 question of justification, see Section IV, Note 1.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The Supreme Court of Canada adopted a purposive approach to the interpretation of Charter provisions in Hunter v Southam Inc, [1984] 2 SCR 145 at 157, 1984 CanLII 33, holding that a judgment about the scope of a particular right can only be made after the Court has "specif[ied] the purpose underlying" the right or "delineate[d] the nature of the interests it is meant to protect" (see Chapter 17, Section II). R v Big M Drug Mart Ltd, [1985] 1 SCR 295, 1985 CanLII 69 at para 117, added that the purpose is to be found in the character and the larger objects of the Charter itself, ... the language chosen to articulate the specific right or freedom, ... the historical origins of the concepts enshrined, and where applicable, [in] the meaning and purpose of the other specific rights and freedoms with which it is associated within the text of the Charter.

In Andrews, McIntyre J articulated the purpose of s 15 and the nature of the interests it is meant to protect in accordance with the purposive approach to Charter interpretation, saying that the purpose of the equality guarantee is to promote "a society in which all are secure in the knowledge that they are recognized at law as human beings equally deserving of concern, respect and consideration" (at 171). As we will see in the following note, for a time the Supreme Court highlighted the underlying values of equal concern and respect, but in later cases it dropped almost all references to the interests being protected.

Justice McIntyre's interpretation of s 15 included a look at its historical origins (as discussed in Section I) and a focus on the language used to articulate the right. Initially, the Court's approach was very text-based. Consider the bifurcated nature of s 15(1), with its first branch specifying four equality rights that are to be enjoyed by every individual without discrimination, and the second branch specifying an open-ended list of the grounds on which discrimination is prohibited. After noting the four basic rights and their reason for inclusion in the text, McIntyre J pointed to the fact they were granted with the direction contained in s 15 itself that they be "without discrimination" (at 172). Justice Wilson, in R v Turpin, [1989] 1 SCR 1296 at 1331, 1989 CanLII 98, articulated the interpretation that equality rights were limited by the prohibition on discrimination even more plainly, holding:

The internal qualification in s. 15 that the differential treatment be “without discrimination” is determinative of whether or not there has been a violation of the section. It is only when one of the four equality rights has been denied with discrimination that the values protected by s. 15 are threatened.

It did not take long, however, for the language chosen to articulate the four basic equality rights to be ignored by the courts, leaving the s 15 analysis focused almost entirely on discrimination. A focus on discrimination rather than equality arguably contributes to the under-theorizing of the purpose of the equality guarantee and a less-than-robust understanding of substantive equality. See Mary Eberts & Kim Stanton, “The Disappearance of the Four Equality Rights and Systemic Discrimination from Canadian Equality Jurisprudence” (2018) 38:1 NJCL 89; James Hendry, “The Current Nature and Measure of the Charter Equality Right” (2012) 31:1 NJCL 25. See also Melina Buckley’s rewrite of Andrews for the “Women’s Court of Canada,” a fictional court that has reimagined several s 15 decisions in alternative judgment form: “Reference re: Andrews v Law Society of British Columbia” (2018) 30:2 CJWL 197. What difference might it make if each claim were articulated as a claim to one or more of the four equality rights specified in s 15(1)? Would a greater focus on the specific rights that claimants have—rather than on a right to be free from discrimination—facilitate a broader understanding of equality?

An originalist interpretation for the Charter had been rejected early in Hunter v Southam Inc on the basis that a constitution is designed to provide a continuing framework for the legitimate exercise of government power and cannot easily be repealed or amended, with the Court concluding “it must, therefore be capable of growth and development over time to meet new social, political and historical realities often unimagined by its framers” (at 155). Originalism is a group of approaches that maintain that the meaning of constitutional provisions is fixed at the time a provision such as the Charter’s s 15 comes into effect. The original intent or meaning—the original intentions of the framers or the “public meaning” of the words at the time—prevails. The purposive approach does include the historical origins of the concepts enshrined in constitutional provisions, but references to the framers’ intent are rare in current s 15 jurisprudence. See Adam M Dodek, “The Dutiful Conscript: An Originalist View of Justice Wilson’s Conception of Charter Rights and Their Limits” (2008) 41 SCLR (2d) 331; Kerri A Froc, “Is Originalism Bad for Women? The Curious Case of Canada’s Equal Rights Amendment” (2015) 19:2 Rev Const Stud 237; Kerri A Froc, “A Prayer for Original Meaning: A History of Section 15 and What It Should Mean for Equality,” above. Recall Section I of this chapter and the language advocated by equality-seeking groups in order to support positive rights, and social and economic rights. What are the potential benefits and dangers of an original meaning approach to the interpretation of s 15?

2. Various attempts to elaborate on s 15’s purpose have appeared in the case law, with most elaborations occurring in the decade immediately following Andrews. Differences in articulating the purpose of s 15 and the underlying interests to be protected matter because disagreement at this foundational level manifests in different articulations of the test for discrimination and the factors to be taken into account. As we will see, there have been at least four different articulations of the test since Andrews (depending on what is counted as a major enough change to be considered a different test) and numerous contentious interpretive factors.

The narrowing effect of a purposive interpretation is illustrated by the judgment of Wilson J, writing for a unanimous Court in R v Turpin. That case involved persons charged with murder in Ontario who argued that the Criminal Code discriminated against them by denying them the choice of a trial by judge alone, a choice open to accused persons in Alberta. In rejecting the s 15(1) claim, Wilson J said that it was not enough for the claimant to show that they were disadvantaged by the challenged law. They had to show the distinction in the legislation defined a group that was disadvantaged in other ways, and “province of residence” did not identify a disadvantaged group in the context of this case. Justice Wilson tied the reasons for denying the claim to the purpose of s 15(1) by stating that accepting the claim would not "advance the purposes of s. 15 in remedying or preventing discrimination against groups suffering social, political and legal disadvantage in our society" (at 1333). In Turpin, the purpose of s 15 was said to be to remedy or prevent "discrimination against groups suffering social, political, and legal disadvantage in our society" (at 1333).

In the mid-1990s, the fundamental purpose of s 15 was articulated as the protection of "human dignity," putting the focus on the underlying interest to be protected. Justice Cory, in Egan v Canada, [1995] 2 SCR 513 at 584, 1995 CanLII 98, stated that the equality guarantee "recognizes and cherishes the innate human dignity of every individual." In Egan, L'Heureux-Dubé J elaborated on that purpose in the following words (at 545):

[A]t the heart of s. 15 is the promotion of a society in which all are secure in the knowledge that they are recognized at law as equal human beings, equally capable, and equally deserving. A person or group of persons has been discriminated against within the meaning of s.15 of the Charter when members of that group have been made to feel, by virtue of the impugned legislative distinction, that they are less capable, or less worthy of recognition or value as human beings or as members of Canadian society, equally deserving of concern, respect, and consideration.

Perhaps the lengthiest discussion of the purpose of s 15 can be found in the unanimous decision in Law v Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), [1999] 1 SCR 497, 1999 CanLII 675. After reviewing what previous cases had said about the purpose, Iacobucci J continued (at para 51):

It may be said that the purpose of s. 15(1) is to prevent the violation of essential human dignity and freedom through the imposition of disadvantage, stereotyping, or political or social prejudice, and to promote a society in which all persons enjoy equal recognition at law as human beings or as members of Canadian society, equally capable and equally deserving of concern, respect and consideration. Legislation which effects differential treatment between individuals or groups will violate this fundamental purpose where those who are subject to differential treatment fall within one or more enumerated or analogous grounds, and where the differential treatment reflects the stereotypical application of presumed group or personal characteristics, or otherwise has the effect of perpetuating or promoting the view that the individual is less capable, or less worthy of recognition or value as a human being or as a member of Canadian society. Alternatively, differential treatment will not likely constitute discrimination within the purpose of s. 15(1) where it does not violate the human dignity or freedom of a person or group in this way, and in particular where the differential treatment also assists in ameliorating the position of the disadvantaged within Canadian society.

Justice Iacobucci elaborated on the underlying interests associated with human dignity, stating that "[i]t is concerned with the realization of personal autonomy and self-determination ... [and] physical and psychological integrity and empowerment" (at para 53). But he went on to emphasize more subjective aspects as well, saying that human dignity "means that an individual or group feels self-respect and self-worth" and "concerns the manner in which a person legitimately feels when confronted with a particular law" (at para 53). See Rahool Parkash Argarwal, "An Autonomy-Based Approach to Section 15(1) of the Charter" (2006) 12:1 Rev Const Stud 83 for an argument that basic human dignity can be understood as the more precise concept of personal autonomy.

To what extent does human dignity explain why certain types of differential treatment are unfair or harmful and therefore constitute discrimination? Are there types of systemic inequality that a focus on human dignity might leave out? Is a focus on underlying interests such as human dignity and autonomy more helpful to articulating a test for s 15 than a focus on the goal of substantive equality? Why or why not? For commentary on the role of human dignity in s 15, see Denise G Réaume, "Discrimination and Dignity" (2002-2003) La L Rev 645; Sophia R Moreau, "The Wrongs of Unequal Treatment" (2004) 54:3 UTLJ 291; James R Fyfe, "Dignity as Theory: Competing Conceptions of Human Dignity at the Supreme Court of Canada" (2007) 70 Sask L Rev 1; Denise G Réaume, "Dignity, Equality, and Comparison" in Deborah Hellman & Sophia Moreau, eds, Philosophical Foundations of Discrimination Law (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2013).

The purpose of s 15 has also been articulated to include equal citizenship and full participation in society, but less often than one might expect of a constitutional document in a democratic society. For one example, see Corbiere v Canada (Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs), [1999] 2 SCR 203, 1999 CanLII 687 at paras 73-74 (also excerpted in Section II.C). A reluctance to articulate full participation in society as the goal of s 15 may be tied to the courts' hesitation to embrace social and economic rights. See Fay Faraday, "Access to Social Programs: Substantive Equality Under the Charter of Rights" (2006-2007) 21 NJCL 111; see also the discussion of positive rights in Section II.B, Note 6 following Eldridge.

In these articulations of the purpose of s 15, equality has been seen as instrumental to other rights or values, rather than as an intrinsic good in and of itself. However, the Supreme Court has on occasion attributed intrinsic value to the equality guarantee. See Jonnette Watson Hamilton & Dan Shea, "The Value of Equality: End, Means or Something Else?" (2010) 29 Windsor Rev Legal Soc Issues 125.

3. When the Court signalled a new approach to s 15(1) in R v Kapp, 2008 SCC 41, the purpose of s 15 began to focus less on its underlying interests than on its goal, the promotion of substantive equality. According to McLachlin CJ and Abella J (at para 16):

Sections 15(1) and 15(2) work together to promote the vision of substantive equality that underlies s. 15 as a whole. Section 15(1) is aimed at preventing discriminatory distinctions that impact adversely on members of groups identified by the grounds enumerated in s. 15 and analogous grounds. This is one way of combatting discrimination. However, governments may also wish to combat discrimination by developing programs aimed at helping disadvantaged groups improve their situation. Through s. 15(2), the Charter preserves the right of governments to implement such programs, without fear of challenge under s. 15(1). This is made apparent by the existence of s. 15(2). Thus s. 15(1) and s. 15(2) work together to confirm s. 15's purpose of furthering substantive equality.

In Fraser, the Court considered a claim of sex discrimination by female RCMP officers in the context of their pension rights. Justice Abella, writing for the majority, identified substantive equality as "the philosophical premise of s. 15" (at para 40), the "animating norm" of s 15 (at paras 42, 48), and "the foundational premise of this Court's s. 15 jurisprudence" (at para 134).

In rejecting the "similarly situated test," Andrews rejected formal equality and embraced substantive equality, albeit without using the latter term. For differences among the concepts of formal equality, substantive equality, equity, and diversity, see Patricia Hughes, "Supreme Court of Canada Equality Jurisprudence and 'Everyday Life'" (2012) 58 SCLR (2d) 245; Colleen Sheppard, Inclusive Equality: The Relational Dimensions of Systemic Discrimination in Canada (Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press, 2010).

The term "substantive equality" was first used by the Court in L'Heureux-Dubé J's dissent in Symes v Canada, [1993] 4 SCR 695 at 786, 1993 CanLII 55 and then affirmed more broadly by a majority of the Court in Eldridge v British Columbia (AG), [1997] 3 SCR 624, 1997 CanLII 327 and Vriend v Alberta, [1998] 1 SCR 493, 1998 CanLII 816 (both excerpted in Section II.B). These two cases were the first to challenge the government's failure to take action to remedy disadvantage. They were the first Supreme Court decisions in which the obligation to promote equality, and not simply prevent discrimination, were given some real effect.

In two pay equity cases decided in 2018—Quebec (AG) v Alliance du personnel professionnel et technique de la santé et des services sociaux, 2018 SCC 17 and Centrale des syndicats du Québec v Quebec (AG), 2018 SCC 18—and in Fraser, we see the majority and dissent divide sharply on the usefulness of recognizing substantive equality as “the foundational premise of this Court’s s. 15 jurisprudence” (Fraser, Abella J at para 134).

Is the articulation of the purpose of s 15 a precondition to articulating a test to identify violations of the equality guarantee? Could the Court’s continual reformulation of the test be avoided if the Court focused more of its attention on the purpose? Would a consensus on the underlying interests being protected be a better way forward?

4. In Andrews, both McIntyre J (at 183) and Wilson J (at 151) used the phrase “discrete and insular minority,” a phrase coined by Stone J of the United States Supreme Court (USSC) in United States v Carolene Products Co, 304 US 144 at 152–53, n 4, 58 S Ct 778 (1938), as part of that country’s equal protection jurisprudence. The phrase was Stone J’s way of describing groups, such as African Americans, who were vulnerable to the prejudices of those in power. However, the term can be misleading because vulnerable groups are not necessarily discrete and insular. As Dale Gibson argues, the phrase is best understood as a way of describing those groups, like non-citizens, that suffer a relative lack of political power: The Law of the Charter: Equality Rights (Toronto: Carswell, 1990) at 151.

Andrews discussed other concepts found in American constitutional law, including that of adverse effects discrimination (discussed in this section, Note 6 after Fraser) and the “similarly situated” approach.

The major source of American constitutional protection for equality is the equal protection clause of the 14th amendment of the United States Constitution, which simply states: “No State shall ... deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws” (s 1). That clause—and the social, political, economic, cultural, ideological, and historical context of the law—is very different from the Charter’s s 15. As Colleen Sheppard has explained, the starting premise of US constitutional law is the idea that equality means “sameness of treatment”: see “Equality in Context: Judicial Approaches in Canada and the United States” (1990) 39 UNBLJ 111 at 113–15, 122. The context for this interpretation is that country’s history of slavery, segregation, and the denial of civil and political rights based on race. Equality as sameness of treatment was the response to injustice in the form of differential treatment. What emerged in the doctrine based on this history was the “strict scrutiny test,” based on the idea that race was a “suspect class” and almost never a legitimate basis of legislative line-drawing (Sheppard at 114).

The strict scrutiny test was later relaxed. Instead of providing an absolute right to sameness of treatment, it provided protection only against arbitrary or unreasonable differences in treatment, most commonly measured by the “similarly situated” test. That test—discussed and rejected by McIntyre J in Andrews—interpreted the equal protection clause to require that everyone who was similarly situated, with respect to the purpose of the law, be treated similarly. In addition, the government must show that the challenged classification serves a compelling interest and that the classification is necessary to serve that interest.

Although distinctions involving suspect classifications such as race, national origin, and religion, as well as distinctions that burden certain fundamental rights (such as the right to vote) are still subject to strict scrutiny, the USSC developed two other levels of scrutiny of claims made under the equal protection clause: intermediate scrutiny and rational basis review. The intermediate level of scrutiny of “quasi-suspect” classifications applies to distinctions made on the basis of sex or illegitimacy. For those grounds, the challenged classification must serve an important government interest but only has to be substantially related to serving that interest. Most classifications are only subject to rational basis review by courts. This minimum level of scrutiny applies to distinctions made, for example, on the basis of sexual orientation and disability. In such cases, the government only needs to show that the challenged classification is rationally related to serving a legitimate government interest. See, for example, Barry Sullivan, “Three Tiers, Exceedingly Persuasive Justifications and Undue Burdens” (2018) 20 Eur JL Reform 181; Katie R Eyer, “The Canon of Rational Basis Review” (2018) 93:3 Notre Dame L Rev 1317.

Although the USSC developed a jurisprudence in which the level of scrutiny depended on the ground of discrimination, as we will see in Section II.C of this chapter, Canadian courts have not applied different levels of scrutiny to different grounds under s 15.

Another major difference between the United States and Canada is that the equal protection clause of the former has been held to prohibit only intentional discrimination (Washington v Davis, 426 US 229, 96 S Ct 2040 (1976)). At a very general level, when the law does not employ a racial classification on its face, an equality claimant must prove intentional malice or animus on the part of the state actor. However, challenges to affirmative action programs designed to ameliorate racial inequality are governed by what the American jurisprudence and commentary usually calls the norm of “colourblindness,” which renders the government’s good motives irrelevant. See Ian Haney-Lopez, “Intentional Blindness” (2012) 87:6 NYU L Rev 1779; Michael Selmi, “Proving Intentional Discrimination: The Reality of Supreme Court Rhetoric” (1997) 86:2 Geo LJ 279. For discussion of Canada’s approach to affirmative action, that is, to ameliorative programs under s 15(2) of the Charter, see Section III.

5. As previously noted, in Andrews, McIntyre J organized his analysis of s 15(1) around three questions: (1) Has there been a denial of one of the four equality rights set out in s 15(1)? (2) Is there discrimination? (3) Is the discrimination based on enumerated or analogous grounds? Unlike the focus on the four types of equality rights, the focus on grounds has been maintained. For the answer to the second question, McIntyre J relied on the understanding of discrimination (quoted above) that focused on impact or effect (thereby recognizing both direct and adverse effects discrimination), on comparison with others, and on benefits or burdens. To a greater or lesser extent, this focus has dominated the various articulations of the tests used to analyze equality claims ever since.

A majority of the Court in Andrews also decided that the Oakes test should apply without modification to s 15(1) violations. For further discussion of the equality guarantee and s 1, see Section IV.

For commentary on Andrews, see, for example, Richard Moon, “A Discrete and Insular Right to Equality: Comment on Andrews v Law Society of British Columbia” (1989) 21 Ottawa L Rev 563; Anne F Bayefsky, “A Case Comment on the First Three Equality Rights Cases Under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms: Andrews, Worker’s Compensation Reference, Turpin” (1990) 1 SCLR (2d) 503; Marc Gold, “Comment: Andrews v Law Society of British Columbia” (1988-1989) 34 McGill LJ 1063; Mary Eaton, “Andrews v Law Society of British Columbia” (1990) 4 CJWL 276.

6. The apparent consensus in the Court’s approach to s 15 in Andrews and subsequent cases came undone in 1995 in a trilogy of cases. Three different perspectives on the proper interpretation of s 15 were on display in each case.

In Miron v Trudel, [1995] 2 SCR 418, 1995 CanLII 97, the Court held, by a 5–4 majority, that the denial of automobile accident insurance benefits to an unmarried opposite-sex couple constituted discrimination on the basis of marital status and could not be justified. In Egan v Canada, [1995] 2 SCR 513, 1995 CanLII 98, the Court held, again by a 5–4 majority, that the denial of an old age spousal allowance to same-sex couples was discriminatory but justified under s 1. Nevertheless, Egan was a milestone because the Court was unanimous in recognizing for the first time that sexual orientation is an analogous ground of discrimination. In Thibaudeau v Canada, [1995] 2 SCR 627, 1995 CanLII 99, the Court dismissed a challenge to the rules in the Income Tax Act, RSC 1985, c 1 (5th Supp) which permitted the parent who paid spousal and child support—98 percent of whom were men—to deduct it from income, while requiring the parent receiving support—98 percent of whom were women—to add the amount to income.

In the trilogy, one approach—that of McLachlin, Cory, Iacobucci, and Sopinka JJ—retained the analysis most resembling that developed in Andrews. A second approach, espoused only by L’Heureux-Dubé J, recommended that the focus on grounds be abandoned in favour of a focus on the nature of the claimant group and their interests. A final approach—that of Lamer

CJ and Gonthier, La Forest, and Major JJ—added a “relevance” element to the Andrews test. They held that to prove a violation of s 15, the personal characteristic at issue must be irrelevant to the functional values underlying the challenged law. On this view, because the functional value underlying the laws at issue in Miron and Egan was the support of marriage, it followed that marital status and sexual orientation were relevant, and the laws, therefore, were not discriminatory. This approach was criticized almost immediately on the basis that it was a formal equality approach, and it brought s 1 considerations about the rationality of the law’s means in relation to its purpose into s 15. Notwithstanding the rejection of the addition of relevance by a majority of the Court, relevance continues to resurface as a factor in equality cases.

7. Despite the fractures revealed by the equality trilogy, in two cases decided in the late 1990s the Court illustrated an expansive understanding of discrimination, rigorous and contextualized effects-based analysis, and a willingness to use s 15(1) to promote equality and not simply prevent discrimination. These two cases—Eldridge and Vriend—both involved adverse effects discrimination, where the distinction on protected grounds is created not by line-drawing on the face of the law but by the law’s impact. These two cases—the only successful examples of adverse effects discrimination claims decided by the Supreme Court until 2020—are excerpted and discussed in Section II.B.

8. Between 1999 and 2008, the Law case, with its focus on human dignity and contextual factors, replaced Andrews as the leading case on s 15. Justice Iacobucci presented the Law guidelines as a summary of the Andrews test as refined in subsequent jurisprudence, but most commentators and courts were of the view that Law introduced a new test.

The claimant in the case, Nancy Law, was 30 years old when her husband died. Because she was under the age of 35 years at the time of his death, was not disabled, and did not have any dependent children, she was precluded from receiving survivor’s benefits under the Canada Pension Plan until she reached the age of 65.

The unanimous decision written by Iacobucci J established a three-step inquiry for claims of discrimination (at para 88):

- (A) whether a law imposes differential treatment between the claimant and others, in purpose or effect;
- (B) whether one or more enumerated or analogous grounds of discrimination are the basis for the differential treatment; and
- (C) whether the law in question has a purpose or effect that is discriminatory within the meaning of the equality guarantee.

Justice Iacobucci emphasized that the appropriate perspective to use in establishing discrimination is that of the claimant in the selection of comparators in step one and in evaluating the impact of the differential treatment in step three (at paras 59–61). However, the analysis is not entirely subjective. According to Law (at para 59), “the larger context of the legislation in question,” as well as society’s treatment of the claimant and others with similar characteristics or circumstances in the past and the present must support the claim. The question of whose perspective and how much context belongs in the s 15(1) analysis has become controversial recently; see Note 2 following Fraser in this Section.

The question of discrimination—step three and normally the key issue—focused on whether the claimant could show a violation of their human dignity. The relevant point of view was that of the reasonable person in circumstances similar to those of the claimant. Contextual factors were made relevant to this question and, although not intended to be an exhaustive list, the four factors listed by Iacobucci J became the four contextual factors that helped to determine if s 15(1) had been infringed during the Law era (at para 88, emphasis added):

- (A) Pre-existing disadvantage, stereotyping, prejudice, or vulnerability experienced by the individual or group at issue. The effects of a law [on] individuals or groups who are vulnerable, disadvantaged, or members of “discrete and insular minorities” should

- always be a central consideration. Although ... association with a historically more advantaged or disadvantaged group or groups is not per se determinative ... , the existence of these pre-existing factors will favour a finding that s. 15(1) has been infringed.
- (B) The correspondence, or lack thereof, between the ground or grounds on which the claim is based and the actual need, capacity, or circumstances of the claimant or others. ... [I]t will generally be more difficult to establish discrimination to the extent that the law takes into account the claimant's actual situation in a manner that respects his or her value as a human being or member of Canadian society, and less difficult to do so where the law fails to take into account the claimant's actual situation.
- (C) The ameliorative purpose or effects of the impugned law upon a more disadvantaged person or group in society. An ameliorative purpose or effect which accords with the purpose of s. 15(1) of the Charter will likely not violate the human dignity of more advantaged individuals where [their] exclusion ... corresponds to the greater need or the different circumstances experienced by the [targeted] disadvantaged group This factor is more relevant [for claims by] more advantaged member[s] of society.
- (D) The nature and scope of the interest affected by the impugned law. The more severe and localized the consequences of the legislation for the affected group, the more likely that the differential treatment responsible for these consequences is discriminatory within the meaning of s. 15(1).

Despite Iacobucci J's warning that it was "inappropriate to attempt to confine analysis under s. 15(1) of the Charter to a fixed and limited formula" (at para 88), subsequent decisions applied the three-plus-four-step test in mechanical, formalistic fashion. This was problematic, in part, because Law imported some s 1 considerations into s 15, particularly through the second contextual factor of correspondence, which proved over the years to be the most important of the four contextual factors. Paying attention to the correspondence between the ground and the claimant's actual circumstances inevitably involved paying attention to the purpose of the challenged law or policy and a consideration of whether the differential treatment on a prohibited ground was relevant to the achievement of that purpose.

The abstract, subjective, and malleable nature of human dignity was another problem with the Law test. The effect of Law was to shift the focus of equality analysis, which Andrews had placed on disadvantage—a matter of structural and social relations—to a focus on dignity, defined by Law as feelings of "self-respect and self-worth" (at para 53). The criticisms of Law were acknowledged by the Supreme Court in Kapp in 2008, but for the nine years that followed the Law decision, human dignity and the contextual factors played major roles in s 15 analyses.

For commentary on Law, see, for example, June Ross, "A Flawed Synthesis of the Law" (2000) 11 Const Forum Const 74; Deborah M McAllister, "Section 15(1)—The Unpredictability of the Law Test" (2003-2004) 15 NJCL 35; Christopher Bredt & Adam Dodek, "Breaking the Law's Grip on Equality: A New Paradigm for Section 15" (2003) 20 SCLR (2d) 33; Donna Greschner, "Does 'Law' Advance the Cause of Equality?" (2001) 27 Queens LJ 299.

9. Kapp involved a challenge to the federal government's Aboriginal Fishing Strategy, which included a 24-hour priority license to fishers from three First Nations along the Fraser River. A group of mostly non-Aboriginal commercial fishers argued that this priority violated their equality rights because it discriminated on the basis of race. Kapp is usually considered most significant for its approach to s 15(2), which is discussed in Section III of this chapter, but the case made some important changes to the framework for analyzing s 15(1) claims.

Chief Justice McLachlin and Abella J, writing for a unanimous Court on the s 15 issue, abandoned the human dignity test that Law had made the focus of equality analysis and purported to restore the approach in Andrews while retaining Law's four contextual factors:

[17] The template in Andrews, as further developed in a series of cases culminating in Law ... established in essence a two-part test for showing discrimination under s. 15(1): (1) Does the law create a distinction based on an enumerated or analogous ground? (2) Does the distinction create a disadvantage by perpetuating prejudice or stereotyping? These were divided, in Law, into three steps, but in our view the test is, in substance, the same.

[18] In Andrews, McIntyre J. viewed discriminatory impact through the lens of two concepts: (1) the perpetuation of prejudice or disadvantage to members of a group on the basis of personal characteristics identified in the enumerated and analogous grounds; and (2) stereotyping on the basis of these grounds that results in a decision that does not correspond to a claimant's or group's actual circumstances and characteristics. ...

[19] A decade later, in Law, this Court suggested that discrimination should be defined in terms of the impact of the law or program on the "human dignity" of members of the claimant group, having regard to four contextual factors

[21] ... [S]everal difficulties have arisen from the attempt in Law to employ human dignity as a legal test. There can be no doubt that human dignity is an essential value underlying the s. 15 equality guarantee. In fact, the protection of all of the rights guaranteed by the Charter has as its lodestar the promotion of human dignity. ...

[22] But as critics have pointed out, human dignity is an abstract and subjective notion that, even with the guidance of the four contextual factors, cannot only become confusing and difficult to apply; it has also proven to be an additional burden on equality claimants, rather than the philosophical enhancement it was intended to be. Criticism has also accrued for the way Law has allowed the formalism of some of the Court's post-Andrews jurisprudence to resurface in the form of an artificial comparator analysis focussed on treating likes alike.

[23] The analysis in a particular case, as Law itself recognizes, more usefully focusses on the factors that identify impact amounting to discrimination. The four factors cited in Law are based on and relate to the identification in Andrews of perpetuation of disadvantage and stereotyping as the primary indicators of discrimination. Pre-existing disadvantage and the nature of the interest affected (factors one and four in Law) go to perpetuation of disadvantage and prejudice, while the second factor deals with stereotyping. The ameliorative purpose or effect of a law or program (the third factor in Law) goes to whether the purpose is remedial within the meaning of s. 15(2). (We would suggest, without deciding here, that the third Law factor might also be relevant to the question under s. 15(1) as to whether the effect of the law or program is to perpetuate disadvantage.)

[24] Viewed in this way, Law does not impose a new and distinctive test for discrimination, but rather affirms the approach to substantive equality under s. 15 set out in Andrews and developed in numerous subsequent decisions. The factors cited in Law should not be read literally as if they were legislative dispositions, but as a way of focussing on the central concern of s. 15 identified in Andrews—combatting discrimination, defined in terms of perpetuating disadvantage and stereotyping.

Kapp's understanding of the meaning of discrimination was narrower than Andrews' focus on disadvantage or Law's concern with human dignity. Kapp was interpreted as limiting the inquiry in the second step to a search for the perpetuation of prejudice or stereotyping. Disadvantage was mentioned (see para 24), but its role alongside prejudice and stereotyping was minimized in Kapp and in cases heard subsequent to Kapp and before Quebec (AG) v A, 2013 SCC 5.

In Kapp, the majority of the Supreme Court did not discuss the appropriateness of the ground of race, or whether Indigeneity is a subset of race, despite the fact that Kapp was the first case in which the Court found a violation of s 15 based on the ground of race. The majority simply accepted the race-based argument without any discussion of s 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 or s 25 of the Charter and how those provisions acknowledge the unique place of Indigenous peoples within the Canadian state. For an argument that Kapp should not have been treated as a case about racial differentiation in the service of an ameliorative program, see Sonia Lawrence's judgment for the Women's Court of Canada, "R v Kapp" (2018) 30:2 CJWL 268. 10. The Court's next major s 15(1) case—a unanimous decision co-authored by McLachlin CJ and Abella J—was Withler v Canada (AG), 2011 SCC 12, which is often seen as a companion case to Kapp. The surviving spouses of federal civil servants and Canadian Forces members challenged the reduction in the supplementary death benefits they received after their spouses died on the basis of age, a reduction that applied only to the surviving spouses of older plan members.

Withler confirmed the continued relevance of Law's four contextual factors and added a fifth factor that has proven to be divisive in some of the Court's most recent cases. Chief Justice McLachlin and Abella J held (at para 3) that where the impugned distinction is the denial of a benefit that is part of a statutory benefit scheme that applies to a large number of people, the discrimination assessment must focus on the object of the measure alleged to be discriminatory in the context of the broader legislative scheme, taking into account the universe of potential beneficiaries.

A large degree of deference to the government was shown, with the Court indicating that "allocation of resources and particular policy goals that the legislature may be seeking to achieve" are relevant in the context of large benefit schemes (at para 67).

This new factor appeared to import s 1 considerations about balancing interests and social policy goals into s 15, departing from the principle in Andrews that s 15 and s 1 considerations must be kept distinct. In Withler itself, the Court found that the age distinction was not discriminatory because the central consideration was the overall purpose of the benefit scheme, the allocation of government resources, and legislative policy goals. The Court also held that the reduced benefits did not fail to account for the claimant's actual needs and circumstances when their situation was compared to that of the beneficiaries of the broader benefit scheme.

Withler's approach to comparative analysis under s 15(1) was also significant and has prevailed. The s 15(1) equality right had been recognized as a comparative concept from the beginning (Andrews at 164). As Dianne Pothier noted in "Equality as a Comparative Concept: Mirror, Mirror, on the Wall, What's the Fairest of Them All?" (2006) 33 SCLR (2d) 135, how comparisons are made and whether they can take account of difference has a great deal to do with whether an equality analysis contributes to the goal of substantive equality. In the 2004 case of Hodge v Canada (Minister of Human Resources Development), 2004 SCC 65 at para 23 (involving a claim for a Canada Pension Plan survivor's pension by the woman who had been in a common law relationship with the deceased but had separated from him before his death), the Court had asserted what came to be known as the "mirror comparator" approach:

The appropriate comparator group is the one which mirrors the characteristics of the claimant ... relevant to the benefit or advantage sought except that the statutory definition includes a personal characteristic that is offensive to the Charter or omits a personal characteristic in a way that is offensive to the Charter.

Hodge lost her claim on the ground of marital status because the Court compared her situation as a former common law spouse to that of a divorced spouse (who was ineligible for a survivor's pension) rather than to that of a separated spouse (who was eligible).

Shortly after that decision, the Court repeated the need for a "mirror comparator" in Auton (Guardian ad litem of) v British Columbia (AG), 2004 SCC 78. In that case, parents of autistic children sued for provincial government funding of a specific applied behavioural therapy that was not provided by doctors or hospitals and was therefore only funded on a discretionary basis. A funding difference based on who provided the therapy arguably disproportionately failed to meet the needs of persons with disabilities. Chief Justice McLachlin, writing for a unanimous Court, held that there was no violation of s 15(1) because the benefit claimed was not one provided by law and went on to specify the appropriate comparator in the following words (at para 55):

[A] non-disabled person or a person suffering a disability other than a mental disability (here autism) seeking or receiving funding for a non-core therapy important for his or her present and future health, which is emergent and only recently becoming recognized as medically required.

This level of detail in a comparator “all but guarantees there will be no one else in the mirror to serve as the basis for an equality argument” (Pothier at 147)—in other words, there will be no one “similarly situated.” Both Hodge and Auton illustrate that substantive equality may require more generality in comparators in order that analogies can be drawn. For further commentary, see Daphne Gilbert & Diana Majury, “Critical Comparisons: The Supreme Court of Canada Dooms Section 15” (2006) 24 Windsor YB Access Just 111; Sophia Reibetanz Moreau, “Equality Rights and the Relevance of Comparator Groups” (2006) 5 JL & Equality 81.

In Withler, McLachlin CJ and Abella J took note of the criticism of the mirror comparator approach, admitting that it might have resulted in formal equality due to the focus on comparing the treatment of those who were similarly situated, and acknowledging that it could make claims based on intersecting grounds of discrimination more difficult. As a result, they adopted a more flexible approach to comparison. At the first stage of the Kapp test, there was no need to identify a comparator group if the claimant established a distinction based on one or more protected grounds. However, this would be difficult if the claim was one of adverse effects discrimination, where the law on its face treated everyone the same but had an adverse impact on a particular group. In such cases, McLachlin CJ and Abella J said (at para 64) that claimants “will have more work to do” as they may need to present evidence of historical or sociological disadvantage to show how the law imposed a burden or denied a benefit to them relative to others. For commentary on Withler, see Jennifer Kosan & Jonnette Watson Hamilton, “Meaningless Mantra: Substantive Equality After Withler” (2011) 16:1 Rev Const Stud 31; Patrick J Monahan & Chanakya Sethi, “Constitutional Cases 2011: An Overview” (2012) 58 SCLR (2d) 1 at 31-36.

11. The 2013 decision of the Supreme Court in Quebec (AG v A, 2013 SCC 5), signalled the beginning of a fourth reconfiguration of the analytical approach to s 15(1). This case involved the exclusion of de facto spouses from Quebec’s Civil Code provisions dealing with spousal support and property division on the breakdown of relationships. These provisions were available to spouses who were married or in a civil union. A 5–4 majority found that the exclusion of de facto spouses violated s 15(1). Justice Abella wrote only for herself, but four other judges indicated they agreed with her on the s 15(1) issue. The dissent of LeBel J, concurred in by three other judges, found no violation of the equality guarantee. However, McLachlin CJ held that the violation was justified under s 1, making no (unjustified) discrimination the 5–4 majority decision on the outcome. The influence of this decision was arguably diminished by the divisions within the Court and the difficulty of identifying a majority.

Nevertheless, Abella J made several points in Quebec v A that were developed in subsequent cases to become the latest approach to s 15(1). In reviewing the Kapp/Withler approach, she indicated that the Court’s references to prejudice and stereotyping were not intended to create a new s 15(1) test, nor to impose additional requirements on equality claimants. Instead, stereotyping and prejudice were to be seen as only two of the indicia relevant to whether there was a violation of substantive equality. The s 15(1) majority seemed to accept that discrimination may involve other harms and focused its analysis on broader questions of disadvantage. Justice Abella also introduced the idea of “arbitrary disadvantage” when she wrote (at para 331) that

Kapp and Withler guide us … to a flexible and contextual inquiry into whether a distinction has the effect of perpetuating arbitrary disadvantage on the claimant because of his or her membership in an enumerated or analogous group.

12. Kahkewistahaw First Nation v Taypotat, 2015 SCC 30, a unanimous decision authored by Abella J, clarified the changes made in Quebec v A. The community election code adopted by the First Nation to govern elections for the positions of Chief and Band Councilors restricted eligibility for these positions to persons who had at least a Grade 12 education or its equivalent. Louis Taypotat, who had previously served as Chief for a total of 27 years, was disqualified from standing for election because he did not meet the new education minimum, which he challenged in an application for judicial review. The Supreme Court held that the adverse effects discrimination claim failed at the grounds stage due to evidentiary deficiencies. See the discussion of adverse effects and the ground of race in Sections II.B, Note 7 following Eldridge and II.C, Note 4 of this chapter.

Justice Abella built upon her own judgment in Quebec v A, reformulating the test under s 15(1) as an inquiry into “whether a distinction has the effect of perpetuating arbitrary disadvantage on the claimant because of his or her membership in an enumerated or analogous group” (at para 16; emphasis omitted). Taypotat therefore continued the shift away from prejudice and stereotyping—neither of which were mentioned in this judgment—and toward historical disadvantage. However, the case emphasized “arbitrary disadvantage” as the focus of the second step of the analysis. While Abella J used “arbitrary” as a synonym for “discriminatory,” the most common understanding of arbitrary is “not based on reason or evidence.” Commentators expressed concern that identifying “arbitrary disadvantage” as the harm risks importing s 1 justifications about purposes and the means for achieving those purposes into s 15.

Justice Abella also returned to two of the four contextual factors developed in Law. First, she noted that a law that perpetuates arbitrary disadvantage fails to respond to group members’ “actual capacities and needs” (at para 20)—the correspondence factor from Law which was critiqued because it requires a focus on the government’s objectives and their link to the group’s characteristics. Second, Justice Abella focused on “pre-existing disadvantage,” Law’s first contextual factor, raising a question about the necessity for claimants to prove historical disadvantage.

For more on Taypotat, see Sections II.B, Note 3 following Eldridge and II.C, as well as Section III, Note 5 in connection with s 15(2). For commentary on Quebec (AG) v A and Taypotat, see, for example, Jonnette Watson Hamilton & Jennifer Koshan, “Kahkewistahaw First Nation v Taypotat: An Arbitrary Approach to Discrimination” (2016) 76 SCLR 243; Alicja Puchta, “Quebec v A and Taypotat: Unpacking the Supreme Court’s Latest Decisions on Section 15 of the Charter” (2018) 55:3 Osgoode Hall LJ 665; Colleen Sheppard & Mary Louise Chabot, “Obstacles to Crossing the Discrimination Threshold: Connecting Individual Exclusion to Group-Based Inequalities” (2018) 96:1 Can B Rev 1.

In Taypotat, like other unanimous and significant Supreme Court equality decisions—including Law, Kapp, and Withler—the s 15 claim was denied. Is it perhaps easier for a nine-judge bench to agree on unsuccessful claims?

13. In Quebec (AG) v Alliance du personnel professionnel et technique de la santé et des services sociaux, 2018 SCC 17 and Centrale des syndicats du Québec v Quebec (AG), 2018 SCC 18—the Court’s companion pay equity decisions—the unanimity evident in Taypotat was gone. The Court was badly split in its analysis, and the substance of these disagreements continued into the Court’s 2020 decision in Fraser and beyond.

Despite the lack of consensus, Alliance is a significant case because it was the first time that women won a sex-based equality claim in the Supreme Court, and their claim involved a challenge to Quebec’s attempts to deal with systemic gender-based wage inequalities. The 1996 version of the Pay Equity Act created a continuous obligation on public and private employers with ten or more employees to monitor pay equity and make wage adjustments to achieve it. Employees and their unions could enforce these obligations through complaints to the Pay Equity Commission, which had the power to order retroactive employee compensation. Quebec amended its Pay Equity Act in 2009 because of "widespread non-compliance" (Alliance at para 16). The 2009 amendments replaced employers' continuous obligations to implement pay equity with a system of pay equity audits to be conducted every five years. The amendments also removed the possibility of retroactive employee compensation unless an employer acted in bad faith, arbitrarily, or with discrimination. The claimants' challenge to the 2009 amendments led to a 6–3 majority decision in Alliance, authored by Abella J, which found the amendments violated s 15(1) and could not be justified under s 1. Those in dissent—Côté, Brown, and Rowe JJ—found no violation of s 15(1) and, alternatively, that the legislation was protected under s 15(2).

The majority in both Alliance and Centrale clarified and simplified the test for proving a breach of s 15(1), and affirmed that Quebec v A and Taypotat had signalled a move away from the Kapp approach. In both cases, the majority decisions avoided Taypotat's problematic language of "arbitrary disadvantage," as well as the importation of Law's correspondence factor into the articulation of step two. Instead, Abella J formulated the test for a violation of s 15 (1) in the following terms in Alliance (at para 25):

The test for a prima facie violation of s. 15 proceeds in two stages: Does the impugned law, on its face or in its impact, create a distinction based on enumerated or analogous grounds; if so, does the law impose "burdens or [deny] a benefit in a manner that has the effect of reinforcing, perpetuating, or exacerbating ... disadvantage."

The majority in Alliance had no problem finding a distinction based on sex in the legislation that targeted systemic pay discrimination against women. They also found the challenged amendments perpetuated women's pre-existing disadvantage by making employers' obligations episodic and partial rather than continuous, by removing the possibility of retroactive employee compensation in most cases, and by denying access to the information needed to challenge employers' decisions.

The dissent in Alliance retained the correspondence factor from Taypotat's articulation of the s 15(1) test. They also created another hurdle in the first step of the test by requiring consideration of whether the distinction was disadvantageous or prejudicial. In the second step of the test, the dissent brought back all four of Law's contextual factors. Relying heavily on the amelioration factor, they argued that the legislation as a whole did not perpetuate existing disadvantage but instead ameliorated it. They also considered the ameliorative nature of the program under s 15(2), as discussed in Section III below.

In Centrale, the claimants challenged a provision in the Pay Equity Act that created a six-year delay in implementing pay equity for women in workplaces without male comparators. In a 5–4 decision on s 15, again written by Abella J, the majority found that the delay in implementing pay equity was a violation of s 15(1), but all members of the majority except McLachlin CJ found that the violation was justified under s 1. Justice Wagner joined the three judges who had dissented in Alliance in finding no breach of s 15(1). In the result, the Court ruled against the claimants 8–1.

In Centrale, the majority applied the test from Alliance and found that the impugned provision created a distinction based on sex. They also found the distinction was discriminatory because it denied women access to remedies to combat pay inequality. However, the delay was seen as justified under s 1 by all but McLachlin CJ (for further discussion, see Section IV).

The s 15 dissent in Centrale reiterated the Kapp test but, unlike their previous dissent in Alliance, did not require proof of disadvantage or prejudice at step one. They again used Law's four contextual factors in the second step. In applying their modified Kapp/Law test, the dissent rejected the claim of sex-based discrimination. In their view, the fact that the Act did not cover the claimants (because they occupied positions that had no ready male comparators) was a distinction related to their occupation, which is not a protected ground under s 15. As a result, Wagner, Côté, Brown, and Rowe JJ found no discrimination.

The pay equity cases revealed a serious split among the members of the Court on at least four issues: (1) the need to prove disadvantage in the first step of the test, at least in some cases; (2) the contrasting approaches to comparators; (3) the role of Law's four contextual factors; and (4) more generally, the question of positive and negative Charter rights. The latter issue was raised in a discussion by both the majority and the dissent about the significance of the fact that the Quebec government did not cause pay discrimination against women. The existence of positive obligations on government to redress social inequalities, a long-standing debate in equality jurisprudence, is discussed in Section II.B, Note 6 following Eldridge.

Fraser v Canada (AG)

[Fraser involved an adverse effects discrimination claim, the first successful adverse effects discrimination claim since Vriend and Eldridge in the 1990s. The claimants—retired RCMP officers—enrolled in the RCMP's job-sharing program in the 1990s after returning from maternity leave because they were unable to find childcare that could enable them to continue to work full-time. RCMP members on temporary leave without pay could elect to contribute to the pension fund on their return to full-time service and, by doing so, "buy back" pension benefits by paying both employee and employer contributions for the leave period into the pension fund. Those that the relevant regulations classified as part-time workers—including job sharers—were not entitled to buy back pension benefits when they returned to full-time service, leaving job-sharing participants with permanently reduced pensions. The vast majority of members who enrolled in the program were women with children. The claimants sued on the basis that the plan, which was neutral on its face, had a disproportionate impact on women with caregiving responsibilities.

The Federal Court denied the claim on the basis there was not enough evidence that job-sharing was disadvantageous as compared to unpaid leave, and, even assuming it was disadvantageous, the adverse effects were the result of the claimants' choice to job-share. The Federal Court of Appeal denied the appeal, holding that the claimants "were not denied buy-back rights based on their personal characteristics of being female RCMP members with young children, but rather because they elected to job-share as opposed to taking care and nurturing leave": Fraser v Canada (AG), 2018 FCA 223 at para 53. They were successful in the Supreme Court, with Abella J writing for the 6–3 majority.

Justices Brown and Rowe dissented on the basis that the distinction between full-time RCMP officers and those in job-sharing arrangements—a distinction they agreed was a distinction based on sex—was not "arbitrary" because it was related to their employment status. In addition, Brown and Rowe JJ found that any disadvantage the claimants faced was not caused by the impugned provisions, but by the unequal division of household and family responsibilities, and other social circumstances. Looking at the larger benefit scheme surrounding the program, they also relied on Withler to take into account the ameliorative impact of that scheme in determining whether the impugned provisions were discriminatory. Their reliance on the government's ameliorative purpose was tied to their deference to government action that intended to accommodate the claimant's "actual capacities and needs"—the correspondence factor. In addition, because Brown and Rowe JJ found that governments have no positive obligation to address systemic discrimination; incremental action by government with an ameliorative purpose in mind was enough for compliance with s 15. Finally, as noted above, this dissent attacked the goal of substantive equality, saying that it had become "an open-ended and undisciplined rhetorical device by which courts may privilege, without making explicit, their own policy preferences" (at para 146).

In a separate and much narrower dissent, Côté J found that the claim failed on the first step of the test for s 15(1) because the distinction was not based on the ground of sex and there was insufficient evidence for the ground of family or parental status to be recognized as analogous.]

ABELLA J (Wagner CJ and Moldaver, Karakatsanis, Martin, and Kasirer JJ concurring):

[27] Section 15(1) reflects a profound commitment to promote equality and prevent discrimination against disadvantaged groups (Quebec (Attorney General) v A, 2013 SCC 5, [2013] 1 S.C.R. 61, at para. 332; Kahkewistahaw First Nation v Taypotat, 2015 SCC 30, [2015] 2 S.C.R. 548, at paras. 19-20). To prove a prima facie violation of s. 15(1), a claimant must demonstrate that the impugned law or state action:

- on its face or in its impact, creates a distinction based on enumerated or analogous grounds; and
- imposes burdens or denies a benefit in a manner that has the effect of reinforcing, perpetuating, or exacerbating disadvantage. ...

[28] Ms. Fraser does not suggest that the negative pension consequences of job-sharing are explicitly based on sex. Rather, she claims that they have an adverse impact on women with children.

[29] ... As Prof. Colleen Sheppard notes:

Why is it so critical to expand on our understanding of adverse effect discrimination? If we do not, there is a significant risk that discrimination embedded in apparently neutral institutional policies, rules, or procedures will not be recognized as discriminatory. This risk is accentuated by the necessity in anti-discrimination law to connect the experience of exclusion, harm, prejudice, or disadvantage to a recognized ground of discrimination. ... We need a sophisticated and coherent theory of adverse effect discrimination to assist claimants, lawyers, and adjudicators with the complexities of the manifestations of systemic discrimination. ("Of Forest Fires and Systemic Discrimination: A Review of British Columbia (Public Service Employee Relations Commission) v. B.C.G.S.E.U." (2001), 46 McGill L.J. 533, at p. 542)

[30] It is helpful to start by defining the concept. Adverse impact discrimination occurs when a seemingly neutral law has a disproportionate impact on members of groups protected on the basis of an enumerated or analogous ground Instead of explicitly singling out those who are in the protected groups for differential treatment, the law indirectly places them at a disadvantage

[31] Increased awareness of adverse impact discrimination has been a "central trend in the development of discrimination law," marking a shift away from a fault-based conception of discrimination towards an effects-based model which critically examines systems, structures, and their impact on disadvantaged groups (Denise G.

Réaume, "Harm and Fault in Discrimination Law: The Transition from Intentional to Adverse Effect Discrimination" (2001), 2 Theor. Inq. L. 349, at pp. 350-51 ...). Accompanying this shift was the recognition that discrimination is "frequently a product of continuing to do things 'the way they have always been done,'" and that governments must be "particularly vigilant about the effects of their own policies" on members of disadvantaged groups (Fay Faraday, "One Step Forward, Two Steps Back? Substantive Equality, Systemic Discrimination and Pay Equity at the Supreme Court of Canada" (2020), 94 S.C.L.R. (2d) 301, at p. 310; Sophia Moreau, "The Moral Seriousness of Indirect Discrimination," in Hugh Collins and Tarunabh Khaitan, eds., Foundations of Indirect Discrimination Law (2018), 123, at p. 145).

[35] Addressing adverse impact discrimination can be among the "most powerful legal measures available to disadvantaged groups in society to assert their claims to justice" (Hugh Collins and Tarunabh Khaitan, "Indirect Discrimination Law: Controversies and Critical Questions," in Hugh Collins and Tarunabh Khaitan, eds., Foundations of Indirect Discrimination Law (2018), 1, at p. 30). Not only is such discrimination "much more prevalent than the cruder brand of openly direct discrimination," it often poses a greater threat to the equality aspirations of disadvantaged groups:

... even more common are situations where the discrimination occurs in a context like an employment relationship, government program or statute, or educational setting, and there is no single identifiable "villain," no single action identifiable as "discriminatory," and the outward appearance of a neutral set of rules or practices being applied across the board. This invisible structure, with its accompanying set of practices, is a powerful limit on the equality aspirations of many who must deal within that structure but have characteristics that do not match those of persons intended to benefit from the structure. (Mary Ebets and Kim Stanton, "The Disappearance of the Four Equality Rights and Systemic Discrimination from Canadian Equality Jurisprudence" (2018), 38 N.J.C.L. 89, at p. 92)

[36] By recognizing the exclusionary impact of such discrimination, courts can better address "discrimination in its diverse forms," including at "the systemic or institutional level." Remediating adverse effects discrimination allows courts

[to] go to the heart of the equality question, to the goal of transformation, to an examination of the way institutions and relations must be changed in order to make them available, accessible, meaningful and rewarding for the many diverse groups of which our society is composed. (... Shelagh Day and Gwen Brodsky, "The Duty to Accommodate: Who Will Benefit?" (1996), 75 Can. Bar Rev. 433, at p. 462).

[42] [Our decisions subsequent to Andrews] left no doubt that substantive equality is the "animating norm" of the s. 15 framework ... ; and that substantive equality requires attention to the "full context of the claimant group's situation," to the "actual impact of the law on that situation," and to the "persistent systemic disadvantages [that] have operated to limit the opportunities available" to that group's members

[43] The Court, applying these principles, has acknowledged the existence of adverse impact discrimination under s. 15(1). [The Court discussed Eldridge and Vriend, excerpted in Section II.B.] ...

[52] ... [I]n order for a law to create a distinction based on prohibited grounds through its effects, it must have a disproportionate impact on members of a protected group. If so, the first stage of the s. 15 test will be met.

[53] How does this work in practice? Instead of asking whether a law explicitly targets a protected group for differential treatment, a court must explore whether it does so indirectly through its impact on members of that group . . . A law, for example, may include seemingly neutral rules, restrictions or criteria that operate in practice as "built-in headwinds" for members of protected groups. . . .

[54] In other cases, the problem is not "headwinds" built into a law, but the absence of accommodation for members of protected groups. . . .

[56] Two types of evidence will be especially helpful in proving that a law has a disproportionate impact on members of a protected group. The first is evidence about the situation of the claimant group. The second is evidence about the results of the law.

[57] Courts will benefit from evidence about the physical, social, cultural or other barriers which provide the "full context of the claimant group's situation" This evidence may come from the claimant, from expert witnesses, or through judicial notice The goal of such evidence is to show that membership in the claimant group is associated with certain characteristics that have disadvantaged members of the group When evaluating evidence about the group, courts should be mindful of the fact that issues which predominantly affect certain populations may be under-documented. These claimants may have to rely more heavily on their own evidence or evidence from other members of their group, rather than on government reports, academic studies or expert testimony.

[58] Courts will also benefit from evidence about the outcomes that the impugned law or policy (or a substantially similar one) has produced in practice. . . . This evidence may include statistics, especially if the pool of people adversely affected by a criterion or standard includes both members of a protected group and members of more advantaged groups

[59] There is no universal measure for what level of statistical disparity is necessary to demonstrate that there is a disproportionate impact, and the Court should not, in my view, craft rigid rules on this issue. The goal of statistical evidence, ultimately, is to establish "a disparate pattern of exclusion or harm that is statistically significant and not simply the result of chance" (Sheppard (2001), at p. 546 . . .). The weight given to statistics will depend on, among other things, their quality and methodology

[60] Ideally, claims of adverse effects discrimination should be supported by evidence about the circumstances of the claimant group and about the results produced by the challenged law. Evidence about the claimant group's situation, on its own, may amount to merely a "web of instinct" if too far removed from the situation in the actual workplace, community or institution subject to the discrimination claim (Taypotat, at para. 34). Evidence of statistical disparity, on its own, may have significant shortcomings that leave open the possibility of unreliable results. The weaknesses with each type of evidence can be overcome if they are both present

[61] This is not to say, of course, that both kinds of evidence are always required. In some cases, evidence about a group will show such a strong association with certain traits—such as pregnancy with gender—that the disproportionate impact on members of that group "will be apparent and immediate" (Taypotat, at para. 33 . . .)

[63] . . . Similarly, . . . [i]f there are clear and consistent statistical disparities in how a law affects a claimant's group, I see no reason for requiring the claimant to bear the additional burden of explaining why the law has such an effect. In such cases, the statistical evidence is itself a compelling sign that the law has not been structured in a way that takes into account the protected group's circumstances

[68] Some further observations.

[69] First, whether the legislature intended to create a disparate impact is irrelevant Proof of discriminatory intent has never been required to establish a claim under s. 15(1) Nor is an ameliorative purpose sufficient to shield legislation from s. 15(1) scrutiny

[70] Second, if claimants successfully demonstrate that a law has a disproportionate impact on members of a protected group, they need not independently prove that the protected characteristic "caused" the disproportionate impact

[71] It is also unnecessary to inquire into whether the law itself was responsible for creating the background social or physical barriers which made a particular rule, requirement or criterion disadvantageous for the claimant group Section 15(1) has always required attention to the systemic disadvantages affecting members of protected groups, even if the state did not create them

[72] Third, claimants need not show that the criteria, characteristics or other factors used in the impugned law affect all members of a protected group in the same way. This Court has long held that "[t]he fact that discrimination is only partial does not convert it into non-discrimination" (Brooks v. Canada Safeway Ltd., [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1219, at p. 1248 . . .). . . .

[75] The Court subsequently confirmed that "heterogeneity within a claimant group does not defeat a claim of discrimination" (Quebec v. A., at para. 354)

[76] This brings us to the second step of the s. 15 test: whether the law has the effect of reinforcing, perpetuating, or exacerbating disadvantage This inquiry will usually proceed similarly in cases of disparate impact and explicit discrimination. There is no "rigid template" of factors relevant to this inquiry The goal is to examine the impact of the harm caused to the affected group. The harm may include "[e]conomic exclusion or disadvantage, [s]ocial exclusion . . . [p]sychological harms . . . [p]hysical harms . . . [or] [p]olitical exclusion," and must be viewed in light of any systemic or historical disadvantages faced by the claimant group ([Colleen Sheppard, Inclusive Equality: The Relational Dimensions of Systemic Discrimination in Canada] (2010), at pp. 62-63 (emphasis deleted)).

[77] The purpose of the inquiry is to keep s. 15(1) focussed on the protection of groups that have experienced exclusionary disadvantage based on group characteristics, as well as the protection of those "who are members of more than one socially disadvantaged group in society" (Colleen Sheppard, "Grounds of Discrimination: Towards an Inclusive and Contextual Approach" (2001), 80 Can. Bar Rev. 893, at p. 896 . . .).

[78] Notably, the presence of social prejudices or stereotyping are not necessary factors in the s. 15(1) inquiry. . . . They may assist in showing that a law has negative effects on a particular group, but they "are neither separate elements of the Andrews test, nor categories into which a claim of discrimination must fit" (Quebec v. A., at para. 329)

[79] The perpetuation of disadvantage, moreover, does not become less serious under s. 15(1) simply because it was relevant to a legitimate state objective. I agree with Dean Mayo Moran that adding relevance to the s. 15(1) test—even as one contextual factor among others—risks reducing the inquiry to a search for a "rational basis" for the impugned law ("Protesting Too Much: Rational Basis Review Under Canada's Equality Guarantee," in Sheila McIntyre and Sandra Rodgers, eds., Diminishing Returns: Inequality and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (2006), 71, at pp. 81-84 . . .).

[80] Similarly, there is no burden on a claimant to prove that the distinction is arbitrary to prove a prima facie breach of s. 15(1). It is for the government to demonstrate that the law is not arbitrary in its justificatory submissions under s. 1

[81] In sum, then, the first stage of the s. 15 test is about establishing that the law imposes differential treatment based on protected grounds, either explicitly or through adverse impact. At the second stage, the Court asks whether it has the effect of reinforcing, perpetuating, or exacerbating disadvantage (Alliance, at para. 25).

[82] Where possible, the two inquiries should be kept distinct, but there is clearly potential for overlap in adverse effects cases based on “the impossibility of rigid categorizations” (Sheppard (2010), at p. 21). What matters in the end is that a court asks and answers the necessary questions relevant to the s. 15(1) inquiry, not whether it keeps the two steps of the inquiry in two impermeable silos.

Application

[86] In relying on Ms. Fraser’s “choice” to job share as grounds for dismissing her claim, the Federal Court and Court of Appeal, with respect, misapprehended our s. 15(1) jurisprudence. This Court has consistently held that differential treatment can be discriminatory even if it is based on choices made by the affected individual or group.

[90] Prof. Sonia Lawrence makes the critical point that choices are themselves shaped by systemic inequality:

Any number of structural conditions push people towards their choices, with the result that certain choices may be made more often by people with particular “personal characteristics.” This is a key feature of systemic inequality—it develops not out of direct statutory discrimination, but rather out of the operation of institutions which may seem neutral at first glance. [Emphasis added.]

(“Choice, Equality and Tales of Racial Discrimination: Reading the Supreme Court on Section 15”, in Sheila McIntyre and Sandra Rodgers, eds., Diminishing Returns: Inequality and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (2006), 115, at pp. 115-16 and 124-25)

[91] The case before us highlights the flaws of over emphasizing choice in the s. 15 inquiry. For many women, the decision to work on a part-time basis, far from being an unencumbered choice, “often lies beyond the individual’s effective control” (Miron at para. 153 ...).

[97] In my respectful view, the use of an RCMP member’s temporary reduction in working hours as a basis to impose less favourable pension consequences plainly has a disproportionate impact on women. The relevant evidence—the results of the system—showed that:

- RCMP members who worked reduced hours in the job-sharing program were predominantly women with young children.
- From 2010-2014, 100 percent of members working reduced hours through job-sharing were women, and most of them cited childcare as their reason for doing so.

[98] These statistics were bolstered by compelling evidence about the disadvantages women face as a group in balancing professional and domestic work. Evidence submitted by Ms. Fraser indicated that women have historically borne the overwhelming share of childcare responsibilities, that part-time workers in Canada are disproportionately women, and that they are far more likely than men to work part-time due to child care responsibilities. As a result, they experience less stable employment and periods of "scaling back at work," including within police services.

[Justice Abella referred to several reports, case law, international law, and literature.]

[106] All of these sources—and more—show the clear association between gender and fewer or less stable working hours. They provide powerful support for Ms. Fraser's core argument: that the RCMP's use of a temporary reduction in working hours as a basis for imposing less favourable pension consequences has an adverse impact on women. The first part of the s. 15(1) test has therefore been met.

[107] This leads me to the second part of the s. 15(1) inquiry: whether this adverse impact reinforces, exacerbates or perpetuates disadvantage.

[108] There is no doubt that it does. I agree with Ms. Fraser that the negative pension consequences of job-sharing perpetuate a long-standing source of disadvantage to women: gender biases within pension plans, which have historically been designed "for middle and upper-income full-time employees with long service, typically male" (Report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Pensions in Ontario (1980), at p. 116).

[Justice Abella then considered s 1 of the Charter.]

[126] The Attorney General, in my respectful view, has identified no pressing and substantial policy concern, purpose or principle that explains why job-sharers should not be granted full-time pension credit for their service. On the contrary, this limitation is entirely detached from the purposes of both the job-sharing scheme and the buy-back provisions, which were intended to ameliorate the position of female RCMP members who take leave to care for their children. ...

[138] In my view, the appropriate remedy is a declaration that there has been a breach of the s. 15(1) rights of full-time RCMP members who temporarily reduced their working hours under a job-sharing agreement, based on the inability of those members to buy back full pension credit for that service. The methodology for facilitating the buy-back of pension credit is for the government to develop, but any remedial measures it takes should be in accordance with this Court's reasons. They should also have retroactive effect in order to give the claimants in this case and others in their position a meaningful remedy.... .

[The dissent of Brown and Rowe JJ used a different test for identifying violations of s 15(1) than did the majority in Fraser and the two earlier pay equity decisions. They reverted to the version set out by the unanimous Court in Taypotat (at paras 19-20) that included one additional factor in the second step of the test:

[169] As our colleague explains, this claim alleges adverse impact discrimination. We agree that the s. 15 test, as it is framed, can address such claims (paras. 48-50). That test consists of the following two steps:

1. Does the law, on its face or in its impact, create a distinction on the basis of an enumerated or analogous ground?

2. Does the law fail to respond to the actual capacities and needs of the group and instead impose burdens or deny a benefit in a manner that has the effect of reinforcing, perpetuating, or exacerbating their disadvantage? [emphasis added]

On the first step and the issue of linking the adverse distinction to protected grounds, Brown and Rowe JJ agreed with the majority that the comparison between full-time RCMP officers and those in job-sharing arrangements showed a distinction based on sex (at para 185). However, at step 2, they found that this distinction was not discriminatory because it was not arbitrary or wrongful—it simply related to the hours worked by these different groups of workers (at paras 195, 198, 200). Justices Brown and Rowe seemed to be saying that the only relevant distinction between these workers, or the real basis for the lack of full pension benefits, related to their employment status rather than sex, and employment status is not an analogous ground. See Reference Re Workers' Compensation Act, 1983 (Nfld), [1989] 1 SCR 922, 1989 CanLII 86; Delisle v Canada (Deputy Attorney General), [1999] 2 SCR 989, 1999 CanLII 649; Baier v Alberta, 2007 SCC 31; and Health Services and Support—Facilities Subsector Bargaining Assn v British Columbia, 2007 SCC 27, and see Section II.C, Note 8.

In step two, the added factor in Brown and Rowe JJ's version of the test is the correspondence factor from Law. Bringing the correspondence factor back into the test, and using Withler's additional factor that directs attention to the larger benefit scheme that the impugned provisions are a part of, allowed this dissent to focus on the ameliorative purpose of the job-sharing provisions:]

[162] ... It is incumbent upon this Court in judging the constitutionality of the Plan to understand and account for how the scheme operates as a whole, rather than compare options that are available to different groups line-by-line. And, considering the Plan as a whole, it is clear that it accommodates various stages of a member's life and career. It is meant to be flexible and meet different needs at different times.

[168] In the present case, the Plan represents neither a public nor private source of ongoing systemic disadvantage. It does not contribute to women's systemic disadvantage; nor does it reinforce, perpetuate, or exacerbate the pre-existing disadvantage of women in the workplace which arises in part from unequal distribution of parental responsibilities. Rather, it seeks to ameliorate (although without eliminating) the effects of that pre-existing disadvantage on women's careers in the RCMP by providing employment options which allow them the flexibility to continue to pursue their careers while raising children. This case therefore raises the question: can a court strike down part of a statutory scheme for simply being insufficiently remedial? In our respectful view, and as we explain below, it cannot.

[As is evident in this passage, Brown and Rowe JJ's focus on the ameliorative purpose of the pension scheme as a whole is tied to their view that the claimants' disadvantage was entirely outside the impugned provision or the larger benefit scheme. Instead, the dissent identified the cause of the financial disadvantage experienced by job-sharing female RCMP members as the unequal distribution of parental responsibilities and the unavailability of quality child care, both of which existed "outside the purview of the courts" (at paras 168, 215). For the dissent, the impugned law had to at least be a "contribution" to the disadvantage and that was not the case on the facts (at paras 175, 180-181).]

Their approach also insisted that any government attempt at amelioration is enough to decide that there is no breach of s 15 (at paras 168, 177). This approach aligns with their re-insertion of responding "to the actual capacities and needs of the group" into the test for a breach (at para 169), a phrase that they relied on heavily in their analysis of step 2 (at paras 189, 198). As long as the government intended to be accommodating (for example, by adding job-sharing as an option for its members with caregiving responsibilities), that was enough (at para 228). In addition, as long as the government acted with benevolent intentions, it could do so incrementally (at para 177). That is because, for Brown and Rowe JJ, the government did not need to act at all; there is no positive obligation on the government to address systemic discrimination (at paras 177, 210, 212). Since they saw no causal relationship between the claimants' disadvantage and the impugned provisions, Brown and Rowe JJ criticized the majority for making the state responsible for discrimination it had not caused (at para 181). And that was seen as injecting positive duties into s 15(1), which appeared to be the primary problem that Brown and Rowe JJ had with the majority decision in Fraser and also in the two pay equity cases. Positive and negative rights had been thoroughly canvassed in the dissenting opinion in Alliance (Côté, Brown, and Rowe JJ), where they asserted, "Charter rights are fundamentally negative in that they preclude the state from acting in ways that would impair them" (at para 65). In Fraser, Brown, and Rowe JJ made the same point:]

[212] The practical effect of this decision is to abandon the foundational principles so recently affirmed in Alliance and to discourage governments from offering ameliorative programs (or, as in this case, employment options to its employees) in the future. This is because our colleague has, in effect, imposed a positive obligation on legislatures, where they attempt merely to ameliorate the effects of inequality, to eradicate those effects altogether. Such an obligation exceeds the ambit this Court has given s. 15(1), which, unlike certain other provisions of the Charter that appear to compel government action (e.g. ss. 3, 14, 20 and 23), "does not impose upon governments the obligation to take positive actions to remedy the symptoms of systemic inequality" (Thibaudeau v Canada, [1995] 2 SCR 637 at para 38 ...).

[Despite these indications of the depth of the dissent's disagreement with the majority's approach to s 15(1), it is the attack of Brown and Rowe JJ on substantive equality that is perhaps the most unusual feature of their dissent:]

[146] [The imposition of positive duties under s 15] leads to a more fundamental concern presented by this appeal—a concern which, we observe, has been repeatedly made by legal commentators, but which has yet to be taken up by this Court. The gauge of "substantive equality" by which this Court has measured s. 15(1) claims ... not having been defined (except by reference to what it is not—e.g. "formal equality"), has become an open-ended and undisciplined rhetorical device by which courts may privilege, without making explicit, their own policy preferences. As we explain below, and with respect, this case is an instance of that inherent malleability being deployed so as to strike down a scheme which was, after all, designed to be ameliorative.

[216] ... For 30 years, this Court has struggled to define the term "substantive equality." An intelligible and principled definition continues to be elusive. Indeed, this case illustrates the difficulties posed by the slippery quality of "substantive equality"—the core value of our colleague's decision (at paras. 47-48)—and its constant shifting in this Court's jurisprudence.

[218] To be clear, we do not seek to overturn the jurisprudence that our colleague recounts in her reasons. Rather, we aim to give effect to it. Our disagreement is about the meaning and requirements of substantive equality: we view her approach as lacking in the clarity and guidance necessary to give effect properly to the Charter's purposes, notably with regard to legislation that is fundamentally ameliorative. ... The concept has not been defined in a manner that renders s. 15 rights, or even the criteria by which they are adjudicated, knowable in advance by claimants and the state, or applicable with any consistency by courts.

[219] This lack of definition ex ante is antithetical to any notion of judicial restraint. Where a legal test lacks defined bounds, courts applying it exercise truly arbitrary powers of review. And that is the point at which we have arrived with "substantive equality." It has become an unbounded, rhetorical vehicle by which the judiciary's policy preferences and personal ideologies are imposed piecemeal upon individual cases. Consider our colleague's approach here: legislation that is ameliorative in both intent and effect is judicially reconfigured because it is not ameliorative enough, or more precisely, not ameliorative in ways our colleague would prefer. It is also a prime example of how the goalposts of "substantive equality" are constantly on the move, evidenced most clearly by our colleague's abandonment of the prudent guidance in Alliance, at para. 42, regarding incremental measures to alleviate systemic inequality.

[228] As we see it, the sole reason the Plan is being judicially reviewed is because Parliament and the government tried to be accommodating in their employment options. If they had not offered pension buy back rights for members who take LWOP, there would be no basis for judicial intervention at all. The upshot of our colleague's reasoning is that the public is now burdened with new financial obligations, simply because Parliament and the executive dared to address pre-existing inequality incrementally, instead of taking more radical measures to eliminate it. In the future, they may well reason that inaction is the safer route.

[229] Similar issues will undoubtedly arise with any other social welfare legislation or government attempts to remedy systemic disadvantage. By reserving the right to arbitrarily second guess and undo any legislation that attempts to incrementally address systemic disadvantage, the Court makes it more practically difficult for legislatures and governments to implement policies that promote equality. Put simply, we see restricting the government's ability to incrementally address disadvantage as a peculiar way to promote equality.

[Justice Côté's dissent is much shorter and narrower than that of Brown and Rowe JJ. She did not agree that the ground of sex was the relevant one in Fraser. Justice Côté reasoned that although it was predominantly women with children who job-shared, not only women have child-care responsibilities, so the key focus was caregiving, parental, or family status rather than sex (at paras 234-235, 242). She relied heavily on the language of "based on" in the test for discrimination and on the need for evidence demonstrating a causal or necessary link between the adverse distinction and the ground in question (at paras 235, 242-243). Finding that the disproportionate impact was "based on" the claimants' caregiver status, Côté J agreed with the majority that there was an insufficient record of evidence and submissions for this ground to be recognized as an analogous ground under s 15, and she would have dismissed the claim on that basis (at para 238). For further discussion of parental or family status as analogous grounds, see Section II.C, Note 5.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The Supreme Court has released two decisions dealing with s 15 of the Charter since Fraser, both in the criminal law context.

In Ontario (AG) v G, 2020 SCC 38, the Court considered a constitutional challenge to a provincial sex offender registry. The claimant, G, who had been found not criminally responsible on account of mental disorder (NCRMD) of two counts of sexual assault, argued that the application of the sex offender registry legislation to persons found NCRMD violated their rights under ss 7 and 15 of the Charter. His s 15 argument was based on mental disability, and the fact that persons found guilty of sexual offences had some opportunities for exemption and removal from the registry, or to be relieved from their obligation to report regularly to police. In contrast, persons found NCRMD of sexual offences could never be removed from the registry or exempted from reporting. The Supreme Court unanimously held that the lack of "exit ramps" from the registry for persons found NCRMD violated s 15 on the basis of mental disability and could not be justified under s 1 (at paras 16, 49, 55, 59, 60, 68, Karakatsani J; at para 222, Côté and Brown JJ). Unlike Fraser, the Court's main disagreements in this case focused on the issue of remedy rather than the approach to s 15, but there are hints of the split in Fraser in the decision. (For a discussion of the Court's divided approach to remedy see Chapter 25, Enforcement of Rights).

Applying the first step of the test from Fraser, Karakatsanis J found that persons found NCRMD "are plainly subjected to different treatment based on the enumerated ground of mental disability" (at para 52). At the second step of the Fraser test, Karakatsanis J noted how persons with mental illness are subject to stereotyping, stigmatization, and prejudice, which "has led to profound disadvantage" (at para 62). Furthermore, she found (at para 67) that the impugned law imposes a burden on people found NCRMD in a manner that violates the norm of substantive equality in two respects: the law itself invokes prejudicial and stereotypical views about persons with mental illnesses, feeding harmful stigma; and the law puts those found NCRMD in a worse position than those found guilty. Both effects perpetuate the historical and enduring disadvantage experienced by persons with mental illnesses.

The government argued that the distinction—lack of exit ramps from the registry—could be resolved by removing those mechanisms for persons found criminally responsible for sexual offences. Rejecting this argument, Karakatsanis J responded that subjecting everyone to similar treatment might still "impose a heavier burden on persons found NCRMD" (at para 55). Further, she found, such an approach might also raise concerns under s 7 of the Charter (at para 56).

In their reasons dissenting in part on the issue of remedy, Côté and Brown JJ agreed with the majority that the sex offender registry legislation violated s 15 on the basis of mental disability. However, they took issue with Karakatsanis J's "extensive obiter dicta discuss[ing] adverse-effects discrimination and 'substantive equality,'" stating that "[h]er doctrinal statements are not remotely relevant to the issues raised by this appeal, especially considering this is not an adverse-effects case" (at para 223). Justice Rowe concurred with the s 15 reasons of Côté and Brown JJ.

Why do you think the government continues to make s 15 arguments that have been rejected by the Court on previous occasions, for example, arguments that take a formal equality approach or rely on a lack of discriminatory intent?

2. In R v CP, 2021 SCC 19, the Court dismissed a challenge to s 37(10) of the Youth Criminal Justice Act, SC 2002, c 1 [YCJA] under ss 7 and 15 of the Charter. The YCJA states that young persons have no automatic right of appeal to the Supreme Court, whereas the Criminal Code grants adults automatic leave in some circumstances. Chief Justice Wagner (Moldaver, Brown, and Rowe JJ concurring) found no violation of ss 7 or 15. Justice Abella (Karakatsanis and Martin JJ concurring) found a violation of s 15 that could not be justified under s 1. Justice

Kasirer agreed with Abella J's 15 reasons but found that the violation could be justified under s 1. Justice Côté viewed the Charter issues as moot since the Court had granted leave to appeal to CP. On the appeal of the criminal matter itself, all but Côté J upheld the conviction as reasonable, and their reasons on the Charter issues can be seen as obiter dicta.

On the s 15 issue, Wagner CJ cited the test from Fraser, and had no difficulty concluding that the impugned provision created a distinction based on age. The issue was whether this distinction was discriminatory. Chief Justice Wagner believed that a contextual analysis mandated a review of the impact of the YCJA as an entire legislative scheme, rather than "cherry-picking individual features" (at para 144). The YCJA was construed as balancing multiple interests—specifically, providing procedural protections that only young persons receive and enhanced timeliness and promptness in the resolution of matters, which was in turn connected to several interests pertaining to the young person, alleged victim, and society (including procedural fairness, reduced psychological impact, and rehabilitation/reintegration into society). Chief Justice Wagner cited Withler (at para 38) for the point that "the ameliorative effect of the law on others and the multiplicity of interests it attempts to balance will ... colour the discrimination analysis" (at para 152). He indicated that this approach did not inappropriately bring s 1 issues into s 15 but simply gave "full effect to the contextual analysis mandated by this Court's approach to substantive equality" (at para 153, citing Fraser at para 42). He also found that the "slight" delay entailed in applying for leave to appeal did not perpetuate a "tangible disadvantage" to young persons (at para 157) and that, moreover, the Court could be expected to exercise its discretion to grant leave appropriately.

Justice Abella distilled her s 15 and s 1 reasons as follows (at para 4):

- The fact that the overall purpose of the legislation is ameliorative is of no relevance in determining whether a particular limitation represents a prima facie breach of s. 15. It may factor contextually into the justificatory analysis in s. 1, but what is at issue at the breach stage is the impact of the limitation on the claimant group, not the purpose of the legislation as a whole. The crucial fact remains that the YCJA does not provide any analogous procedural substitute for a guaranteed right to appeal to this Court.
- The objective of timeliness is not a justification for denying access to a procedural protection that has historically served to guard against miscarriages of justice. There is no justification for a speedy resolution if the resolution is based on an unfair trial.

Justice Abella found that s 37(10) of the YCJA deprived young persons of a benefit on the basis of their age, namely an automatic right of appeal that could guard against wrongful convictions and miscarriages of justice. This differential treatment was discriminatory given that it perpetuated the disadvantage of young persons charged with criminal offences, including their heightened risk of wrongful conviction. She also noted that this vulnerability "is amplified for those young people who are indigenous or members of racial minorities," who "disproportionately interact with the criminal justice system for a complex variety of reasons, which include both direct and systemic racial discrimination within the system" (at para 88).

Justice Kasirer found that the considerations relied on by Wagner CJ under s 15—namely, the importance of timely dispositions of young persons' appeals and the Court's ability to grant leave to appeal in appropriate cases—justified the denial of an automatic right of appeal under s 1.

Do you think Wagner CJ's approach is in line with, or a departure from, the majority's approach in Fraser? Keeping in mind that Wagner CJ and Moldaver J were part of the majority in Fraser, are there key differences between the laws at issue in these two cases that explain any differences in their approach in R v CP and Fraser? Whose decision in R v CP do you find most persuasive, and why?

3. Three of the concepts that have most beleaguered the Court in its articulation of the tests for violations of s 15 have been "relevance," the "correspondence" factor, and "arbitrariness." In the 1995 equality trilogy (see Note 6 after Andrews, above), four judges held that adverse differential treatment is discriminatory only if the alleged enumerated or analogous ground is irrelevant to the goals and values of the impugned law—in other words, they applied the rational connection test of s 1 that asks whether the distinction created by the legislation is rationally connected to its purpose. In Law, the Court did not refer to the irrelevant personal characteristics test from the 1995 trilogy. However, Law's correspondence factor seems to invite a relevance/rational connection analysis.

With the eclipse of the Law test, first by Kapp/Withler and then Taypotat, the question became whether the correspondence or relevance analysis lived on in the search for “arbitrary disadvantage.” Justice Abella’s definition of arbitrariness as the failure of a law to “respond to the actual capacities and needs of the members of a group” (Taypotat at para 20) echoes the “correspondence” factor from Law, which asked whether there is a correspondence between the impugned legislation and “the actual need, capacity, or circumstances of the claimant or others” (at para 88).

Even now, following the omission of the language of “arbitrary disadvantage” and “fail[ing] to respond to the actual capacities and needs of the members of the group” (Taypotat at para 20) from the test used by the majorities in the pay equity cases, Fraser, Ontario v G, and CP, the question of the role and influence of relevance, correspondence, and arbitrariness remains.

In their dissent in Fraser, Brown and Rowe JJ argued that “substantive discrimination” has “always required an element of arbitrariness or unfairness” (at para 191). Like Abella J in Taypotat, Brown and Rowe JJ saw arbitrariness as being most often expressed as a failure to respond to individuals’ actual capacities, needs, and circumstances.

Does discussion of the government’s purpose in the s 15(1) analysis risk introducing a requirement that the government must act intentionally for a claim to be successful? Do “relevance,” the “correspondence” factor, and “arbitrary” disadvantage all import considerations from the s 1 analysis into s 15, and do they do so in the same way? Aside from the shifting of the evidentiary burden, what are the reasons for keeping the analysis of any violation under s 15 separate from the analysis of the justification of the violation under s 1?

4. “Choice” played a determining role in both the Federal Court and the Federal Court of Appeal decisions in Fraser. In Fraser v Canada (AG), 2017 FC 557, the Federal Court found that the claimants did not have the option to buy-back their pensions because of “the decisions the member makes, as difficult as those may be, as a family to balance work and child care, by having one parent, usually the woman, work part-time for a few years” (at para 137, emphasis added). In Fraser v Canada (AG), 2018 FCA 223, the Court of Appeal concluded “the appellants were not denied buy-back rights based on their personal characteristics ... but rather because they elected to job-share as opposed to taking care and nurturing leave” (at para 53, emphasis added). Although both levels of court acknowledged the constraints on the claimants’ choices to job-share, their choices—and not the law being challenged—were nevertheless seen as the cause of their disadvantage.

In contrast, on the appeal to the Supreme Court, Abella J for the majority asserted: “This Court has consistently held that differential treatment can be discriminatory even if it is based on choices made by the affected individual or group” (at para 86, emphasis added). However, despite the claim of past consistency, the Supreme Court had previously relied on choice to determine that differential treatment was not discriminatory. It did so in Nova Scotia (AG) v Walsh, 2002 SCC 83, a decision now overturned by Quebec (AG) v A, 2013 SCC 5.

In Walsh, the claimant unsuccessfully challenged the exclusion of unmarried cohabitants from a statutory marital property regime that presumed an equal division of marital property, alleging discrimination on the basis of marital status. The majority held that the regime was not discriminatory because “it respects the fundamental personal autonomy and dignity of the individual” who has chosen to not marry (at para 62).

In Quebec v A, Abella J critiqued the choice-based approach as fundamentally flawed:

[342] ... In contrast to formal equality, which assumes an “autonomous, self-interested and self-determined” individual, substantive equality looks not only at the choices that are available to individuals, but at "the social and economic environments in which [they] play out" (Margot Young, "Unequal to the Task: 'Kapp'ing the Substantive Potential of Section 15", in Sandra Rodgers and Sheila McIntyre, eds., The Supreme Court of Canada and Social Justice: Commitment, Retrenchment or Retreat (2010), 183, at pp. 190-91 and 196).

In Fraser, Abella J acknowledged the traditional role that governments' perceptions of choice have played in gendered systemic discrimination (at para 89, excerpted above) and the structural conditions that constrict choice (at para 29, excerpted above).

In addition to dismantling the relevance of choice to a finding of discrimination as a matter of law, Abella J in Fraser recognized that choice may also be factually absent (at para 91). On this point, she relied on McLachlin J's decision in Miron v Trudel, which considered choice in the context of whether marital status was an analogous ground. Justice McLachlin noted some of the factors that constrain an individual's choice to marry (at para 73):

The law; the reluctance of one's partner to marry; financial, religious or social constraints—these factors and others commonly function to prevent partners who otherwise operate as a family unit from formally marrying. In short, marital status often lies beyond the individual's effective control. In this respect, marital status is not unlike citizenship, recognized as an analogous ground in Andrews: the individual exercises limited but not exclusive control over the designation.

At the same time, however, Abella J stated that Fraser "highlights the flaws of overemphasizing choice in the s. 15 inquiry" (at para 91, emphasis added), suggesting there is still a role for choice but leaving that role unspecified. In contrast, in her earlier decision in Quebec v A, she had been more prescriptive, listing only two very specific and narrow instances when choice may still be relevant to s 15(1) claims: in determining whether a personal characteristic qualifies as an analogous ground (as discussed in Section II.C) and as a factor in the s 1 analysis (at para 343).

If autonomy is one of the values underlying the purpose of s 15 (Note 2 after Andrews), does limiting the role of choice to determining which grounds are analogous and to s 1 sufficiently support those values? Or does the link between liberty interests and choice require more attention to relations of power before choice has any role to play in the achievement of substantive equality?

For further commentary on the role of choice under s 15(1), see Diana Majury, "Women Are Themselves to Blame: Choice as a Justification for Unequal Treatment" in Fay Faraday, Margaret Denike & M Kate Stephenson, eds, Making Equality Rights Real: Securing Substantive Equality Under the Charter (Toronto: LexisNexis Canada, 2006) 209; Sheila McIntyre, "The Equality Jurisprudence of the McLachlin Court" in Sandra Rodgers & Sheila McIntyre, eds, The Supreme Court of Canada and Social Justice: Commitment, Retrenchment or Retreat (Toronto: LexisNexis Canada, 2010) 129.

5. Whether the group of which the claimant is a member must be historically disadvantaged in order to succeed under s 15(1) has been controversial. The question first arose in the Court's 1989 decision in R v Turpin and is still being addressed by the Supreme Court in its most recent decisions. In Turpin, Wilson J noted that a finding of discrimination would in most, if not all, cases "necessarily entail a search for disadvantage that exists apart from and independent of the particular legal distinction being challenged" (at 1332).

Historical disadvantage was characterized as "probably the most compelling factor" in Iacobucci J's unanimous decision in Law in 1999:

[63] As has been consistently recognized throughout this Court's jurisprudence, probably the most compelling factor favouring a conclusion that differential treatment imposed by legislation is truly discriminatory will be, where it exists, pre-existing disadvantage, vulnerability, stereotyping, or prejudice experienced by the individual or group . . . These factors are relevant because, to the extent that the claimant is already subject to unfair circumstances or treatment in society by virtue of personal characteristics or circumstances, persons like him or her have often not been given equal concern, respect, and consideration. It is logical to conclude that, in most cases, further differential treatment will contribute to the perpetuation or promotion of their unfair social characterization, and will have a more severe impact upon them, since they are already vulnerable.

Despite this characterization, in the 15 Supreme Court decisions that applied Law's reformulation of the test for discrimination, historical disadvantage played a secondary role to the correspondence factor. See Bruce Ryder, Cidalia C Faria & Emily Lawrence, "What's Law Good For?: An Empirical Overview of Charter Equality Rights Decisions" (2004) 24 SCLR (2d) 103 at 122.

The role of historical disadvantage in the analytical framework for s 15 was divisive in Fraser. In their dissent, Brown and Rowe JJ accused the majority of requiring only proof of historical disadvantage in step two of the analysis:

[190] This Court has said that historic disadvantage plays a significant role in identifying substantive discrimination . . . Substantive discrimination, however, cannot be reduced to historical disadvantage. . . Under our colleague's approach, the second step of the s. 15 test serves only to check if the unequal impact of a law impacts a historically disadvantaged group; there is no analysis of whether the unequal impact corresponds with a group's actual circumstances or needs or whether it is in any other sense substantively discriminatory.

[194] Our colleague now suggests, however, that the sole focus of the substantive discrimination analysis is historical disadvantage (at para. 77).

In the referenced paragraph, Abella J had stated:

[77] The purpose of the inquiry is to keep s. 15(1) focussed on the protection of groups that have experienced exclusionary disadvantage based on group characteristics, as well as the protection of those "who are members of more than one socially disadvantaged group in society" . . . As the Court noted in Quebec v. A when discussing the second stage of the s. 15 test:

The root of s. 15 is our awareness that certain groups have been historically discriminated against, and that the perpetuation of such discrimination should be curtailed. [para. 332]

A similar point had been made in Withler, where McLachlin CJ and Abella J defined the "perpetuation" of disadvantage as the treatment of a historically disadvantaged group in a way that exacerbates their situation. The fact that the current test for a violation of s 15 requires in step two that the claimant prove the impugned provision imposes burdens or denies a benefit in a manner that has the effect of reinforcing, perpetuating, or exacerbating disadvantage suggests that the disadvantage must be historical, at least in the sense of pre-existing the challenged law or policy.

The most recent statement on this issue is found in the majority judgment of Karakatsanis J in Ontario (AG) v G, where she undertook a lengthy discussion of substantive equality, noting amongst other points that "historical discrimination need not be demonstrated for a court to find that a law infringes s 15(1)" (at para 39) and "substantive equality concerns itself with historical or current conditions of disadvantage, products of the persistent systemic discrimination that continues to oppress groups ..." (at para 47, emphasis added). Despite the clarity of these statements, it is unlikely that the controversy over the need to prove historical disadvantage is over.

Do you think claimants should be required to show historical disadvantage in order to succeed on their s 15 claim? Consider the case of a claim challenging a new form of discrimination, such as discrimination based on genetics.

6. The concepts of "benefits" and "burdens" have played a key role in the s 15(1) analytical frameworks since Andrews. In that case, McIntyre J summarized his discussion of how inequality may be the result of the same treatment by stating (at 165):

[T]here must be accorded, as nearly as may be possible, an equality of benefit and protection and no more of the restrictions, penalties or burdens imposed upon one than another. In other words, the admittedly unattainable ideal should be that a law expressed to bind all should not because of irrelevant personal differences have a more burdensome or less beneficial impact on one than another. [Emphasis added.]

More than 30 years later, we see that the second step of the test in Fraser is once again framed in terms of benefits and burdens, requiring that the impugned law "imposes burdens or denies a benefit in a manner that has the effect of reinforcing, perpetuating, or exacerbating disadvantage" (at para 27). Justice Abella went on to adopt the metaphor of "headwinds" and the idea of "accommodations" to explain burdens and benefits in the context of adverse effects discrimination (at paras 53–54):

A law, for example, may include seemingly neutral rules, restrictions or criteria that operate in practice as "built-in headwinds" for members of protected groups. ... In other cases, the problem is not "headwinds" built into a law, but the absence of accommodation for members of protected groups.

The source of the "headwinds" metaphor is Griggs v Duke Power Co, 401 US 424, 91 S Ct 849 (1971), where the United States Supreme Court stated that "[g]ood intent or absence of discriminatory intent does not redeem employment procedures or testing mechanisms that operate as 'built-in headwinds' for minority groups and are unrelated to measuring job capability" (at 432). In Fraser, Abella J relied on Griggs as "a classic example of adverse impact discrimination" in distinguishing that type of discrimination from direct discrimination (at para 32). Griggs was an employment discrimination case decided under Title VII of the American 1964 Civil Rights Act. The case involved an employer that required its employees to have a high school diploma and pass standardized tests to work in certain departments at a power plant. Both requirements had the effect of disqualifying African Americans at a substantially higher rate than white applicants.

The two recent Supreme Court of Canada cases of Ontario v G and R v CP (discussed in Notes 1 and 2 above) illustrate the conventionally understood differences between benefits and burdens. In the first case, the claimant was denied the benefit of applying to be removed from the sex offender registry or to be exempted from reporting. In R v CP, young offenders had the burden of needing to seek leave to appeal to the Supreme Court imposed on them, when adult offenders were not so burdened. However, many claims can be categorized as either benefits or burdens, depending on the level of generalization. Can you reframe Ontario v G as a case involving a burden and R v CP as a case involving a benefit? Fraser can be framed as the denial of the benefit of buying back pension contributions or as one example of the burden of male pattern employment laws. Although the reframing of the claim as one involving a burden is much more abstract, it does reveal the systemic nature of the discrimination. See Fay Faraday, "Envisioning Equality: Analogous Grounds and Farm Workers' Experience of Discrimination" in Fay Faraday, Judy Fudge & Eric Tucker, Constitutional Labour Rights in Canada: Farm Workers and the Fraser Case (Toronto: Irwin Law, 2012) at 109; Martha McCluskey, "Law and Economics Against Capitalism" in Deborah L Brake, Martha Chamallas & Verna L Williams, eds, Oxford Handbook on Feminism and Law in the US (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2021) on the racialized, gendered, and contingent flaws of an existing legal structure being taken as neutral social and economic baselines.

The "widening the gap" metaphor that has become popular with all members of the Supreme Court is an attempt to combine benefits and burdens and express the concept of discriminatory disadvantage (or lack thereof) in one evocative metaphor; see, for example,

Quebec v A at para 332 (Abella J); Alliance at para 92 (Côté, Brown, and Rowe JJ); Ontario v G at para 69 (Karakatsanis J); CP at para 239 (Côté J).

If the “widening the gap” metaphor aptly describes the impact of the impugned law on the claimant, then step 2 of the test for a violation of s 15(1) has been met because “widening the gap between the historically disadvantaged group and the rest of society” is another way to say “reinforcing, perpetuating, or exacerbating historical disadvantage.” See Colleen Sheppard, Inclusive Equality: The Relational Dimensions of Systemic Discrimination in Canada (Montreal: McGill-Queen’s University Press, 2010) at 40–41; Jennifer Koshan & Jonnette Watson Hamilton, “Alberta v Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony” (2018) 30:2 CJWL 292 at 311–12.

How would you characterize the s 15 adverse effects claim in Alberta v Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony, 2009 SCC 37, in terms of benefit or burden, headwinds or lack of accommodation? In Hutterian Brethren, excerpted in Chapter 19, Freedom of Religion, the law was changed to require photographs on all drivers’ licences by removing a religious exemption that had been available and used by members of the religious sect for faith-based reasons.

7. In a number of cases, judges have relied on the ameliorative purpose of the impugned legislative scheme as the decisive factor in determining that the provision did not violate s 15(1).

The ameliorative purpose or effect of a challenged law or policy was the third contextual factor used to determine whether a distinction was discriminatory in the Law test.

Consideration of amelioration was moved to s 15(2) in Kapp, but with a note that “the third Law factor might also be relevant to the question under s. 15(1) as to whether the effect of the law or program is to perpetuate disadvantage” (at para 23; see also Section II). Part of what we see in the current divisions within the Court is different answers to whether amelioration “might also be relevant” at step two of the s 15(1) analysis.

But there is another issue: how a narrow consideration of the ameliorative purpose or effect of the challenged provision or policy in Law and Kapp expanded to become a reliance on the ameliorative purpose or effect of the entire legislative scheme that the challenged provision was a part of. Recall that Withler added a fifth contextual factor to the second step of the discrimination test when the challenged law is part of a statutory benefit scheme that applies to a large number of people. Chief Justice McLachlin and Abella J held that, in such cases, the purpose of the impugned provision in the context of the broader legislative scheme will influence the discrimination analysis. Although the Kapp s 15(1) test was disavowed in Taypotat, the pay equity cases, and Fraser, the addition of the fifth contextual factor from Withler was not, and its continued use can be seen in Wagner CJ’s reasons in CP.

Is the YCJA “a statutory benefit scheme that applies to a large number of people”? In what ways is it similar to and distinguishable from the federal civil servant and Canadian Forces work-related benefits legislation at issue in Withler?

What is gained and what is lost by considering the ameliorative purpose and effects of a large benefit scheme and its balancing of interests in the s 15(1) analysis, as Wagner CJ did in R v CP, rather than under s 15(2) or as part of the proportionality analysis under s 1?

8. Each time the Supreme Court has revised the s 15 test, it has done so in response to the struggle over the meaning and scope of s 15. The critiques of Brown and Rowe JJ in their dissent in Fraser suggest that the test for s 15(1) has been reformulated so many times because the Court has failed to provide a definition of “substantive equality.” See Carissima Mathen’s “The Upside of Dissent in Equality Jurisprudence” (2013) 63 SCLR (2d) 111 on Quebec v A and her “Equality Before the Charter: Reflections on Fraser v Canada” (2021) SCLR (2d) (forthcoming) on Fraser for discussions of the Court’s continuing profound disagreement on what it means for a society to be committed to substantive equality.

Richard Moon has noted that the same issues and tensions that were evident in Andrews are still unreconciled in Fraser. He attributes the reason for the Court’s continuing struggle to its adoption of a broad and egalitarian equality of result approach in a context where the harm done by the impugned law or policy is only one manifestation of the disadvantaged position of the group. He also argues that the Court's pursuit of substantive equality is constrained by its institutional competence, i.e., what the judiciary has the expertise and resources to deal with competently given its role and in contrast to the institutional competence of the legislative branch of government. See Richard Moon, "Comment on Fraser v Canada (AG): The More Things Change" (2021) 30:2 Const Forum Const 85 at 86, 94.

Taking this critique even further, Joshua Sealy-Harrington, in "The Alchemy of Equality Rights" (2021) 30:2 Const Forum Const 53, argues that a clear legal test for equality both is and should be impossible. This is because ideology is what divides the Court, with the scope of Canadian equality law dependent on the inequality the Court is willing to recognize; see also Jonnette Watson Hamilton, "Cautious Optimism: Fraser v Canada (Attorney General)" (2021) 30:2 Const Forum Const 1. Nevertheless, Sealy-Harrington applauds Abella J's explicit rejection in Fraser of the need for claimants to prove discriminatory intent, causation, stereotyping, arbitrariness, involuntariness (i.e., lack of choice), and exhaustion (i.e., that all members of the group must experience the same discrimination), seeing the Fraser test's relative simplicity as potentially giving it the necessary flexibility to deal with pervasive systemic inequalities (at 66–67, 82).

Other scholars are also hopeful about s 15. For example, Fay Faraday, in "The Elephant in the Room and Straw Men on Fire" (2021) 30:2 Const Forum Const 15, argues for "analytical guardrails" that keep those who do not understand substantive equality from resorting to the impoverished and thin embrace of formal equality (at 24–25). Like Mary Eberts & Kim Stanton in "The Disappearance of the Four Equality Rights and Systemic Discrimination from Canadian Equality Jurisprudence" (2018) 38:1 NJCL 89, Faraday advocates for a renewed focus on the four equality rights in s 15, as well as for in-depth analysis and precision to describe and understand the systemic forces which perpetuate disadvantage and institutionalize systemic discrimination. Given what you have read so far in this chapter, how hopeful do you think equality-seeking groups should be about the potential of s 15 to address systemic inequality?

B. DIRECT DISCRIMINATION/ADVERSE EFFECTS DISCRIMINATION

The leading cases on s 15(1)—including Andrews, Law, Kapp/Withler, Taypotat, and Fraser—have all emphasized that discrimination can be found in the effects of a law. The first step in the s 15(1) analysis currently asks whether the impugned law or state action, "on its face or in its impact, creates a distinction based on an enumerated or analogous ground" (Fraser at para 27, emphasis added). To date, successful s 15(1) claims have predominantly involved differentiation on the face of the challenged law or policy. For example, the statute at issue in Andrews made citizenship a requirement for being called to the bar and thus treated citizens and non-citizens differently on its face. This is an example of "direct discrimination." In other cases—comprising a very small minority of the successful claims at the Supreme Court of Canada—the challenged law or policy is "facially neutral." In those cases, the differential treatment is the result of the impact of the law. For example, the legislation at issue in Fraser made no distinctions based on enumerated or analogous grounds on its face, but simply referenced part-time employment status (see Section II.C, Note 5 for discussions of the family/parental status grounds issue in Fraser and Note 8 for the lack of success in claiming employment status as a ground). When facially neutral state action has a differential impact on the basis of a prohibited ground of discrimination—such as the impact based on sex in Fraser—it is an example of "adverse effects" discrimination.

To illustrate the difference between direct and adverse effects claims, this section includes excerpts from three cases. First is M v H, a successful direct discrimination claim that was decided using the test from Law. Second is Vriend, an example of both direct and adverse effects discrimination that succeeded under the Andrews test. The third is Eldridge, which also uses the Andrews test and which is an example of a successful adverse effects claim. In each case, the focus of the excerpts is on the “creation of the distinction” aspect of the first step in the test for a violation of s 15(1). Section II.C looks at the grounds aspect of the first step.

Eldridge and Vriend were, for many equality-seekers, the high point of s 15 litigation and the possibilities of achieving substantive equality. But they were also controversial, prompting accusations of judicial activism and claims that the courts were undemocratic institutions without legitimacy. In particular, the issue of whether the equality guarantee in s 15 is a positive right requiring governments to act or only a negative right limiting state discrimination came to the foreground in legal and political commentary following Eldridge and Vriend.

Despite the claimants’ victories in both Vriend and Eldridge, it was not until 2020 that a third successful adverse effects claim—Fraser—was decided by the Supreme Court. In the 22 years in between these cases, only 11 of the 72 s 15 cases heard by the Court included adverse effects claims, and all were unsuccessful. But the issue of positive versus negative rights is back at the forefront in the dissents in Fraser as well as in the 2018 pay equity cases.

M v H

[Two women, M and H, cohabited in a same-sex relationship from 1982 to 1992. H was in a financially stronger position than M during the relationship. The parties lived in a house owned by H and started their own advertising business, and H’s contributions to the business were greater than those of M, who devoted more of her time to domestic tasks than to the business. When the business failed, only H was able to find other employment. After their breakup, M commenced an action against H, including a claim for support pursuant to part III of the Family Law Act, RSO 1990, c F.3 [FLA]. Section 29 of the FLA extended the definition of “spouse” governing support applications beyond married persons to include unmarried opposite-sex couples who had cohabited for three years or more. M asserted that the law’s exclusion of same-sex couples was unconstitutional. A motions judge found in M’s favour, and extended the definition of “spouse” by reading out “a man and a woman” and reading in “two persons.” H and the Attorney General of Ontario, an intervenor before the motions judge, appealed. The Ontario Court of Appeal upheld the decision of the motions judge but suspended the order for one year to give the legislature time to amend the FLA. The Supreme Court granted the Attorney General leave to appeal that ruling.]

In the Supreme Court, the claim was analyzed using the Law test, which required three broad inquiries (see Section II.A, Note 8 following Andrews). It is the first question that the excerpts in this section focus on: does the impugned law (1) draw a formal distinction between the claimant and others on the basis of one or more personal characteristics, or (2) fail to take into account the claimant’s already disadvantaged position within Canadian society resulting in substantively differential treatment between the claimant and others on the basis of one or more personal characteristics?]

CORY and IACOBUCCI JJ (Lamer CJ and L’Heureux-Dubé, McLachlin, and Binnie JJ concurring): [In their joint reasons, Cory J addressed the s 15 issue.]

CORY J:

[53] ... [T]he FLA draws a distinction by specifically according rights to individual members of unmarried cohabiting opposite-sex couples, which by omission it fails to accord to individual members of same-sex couples who are living together. It is this distinction that lies at the heart of the s. 15 analysis. The rights and obligations that exist between married persons play no part in this analysis. The legislature did not extend full marital status, for the purposes of all the rights and obligations under the FLA, to those unmarried cohabitants included in s. 29 of the Act. Rather, the definition of "spouse" in s. 29 only applies for certain purposes. Specifically, it allows persons who became financially dependent in the course of a lengthy intimate relationship some relief from financial hardship resulting from the breakdown of that relationship. It follows that this provision was designed to reduce the demands on the public welfare system. This will be discussed more fully in the s. 1 analysis below.

[57] The definition [of "spouse" in s 29] clearly indicates that the legislature decided to extend the obligation to provide spousal support beyond married persons. ... The obligation was extended to include those relationships which:

- (i) exist between a man and a woman;
- (ii) have a specific degree of permanence;
- (iii) are conjugal.

Only individuals in relationships which meet these minimum criteria may apply for a support order under Part III of the FLA.

[61] Since gay and lesbian individuals are capable of being involved in conjugal relationships, and since their relationships are capable of meeting the FLA's temporal requirements, the distinction of relevance to this appeal is between persons in an opposite-sex, conjugal relationship of some permanence and persons in a same-sex, conjugal relationship of some permanence. In this regard, I must disagree with the dissenting opinion in the court below, which characterized the distinction arising in s. 29 as being between opposite-sex and same-sex couples. This conclusion would require that the section be scrutinized for any discriminatory impact it may have on same-sex couples, and not on the individual members of that couple. Section 29 defines "spouse" as "either of a man and woman" who meet the other requirements of the section. It follows that the definition could not have been meant to define a couple. Rather it explicitly refers to the individual members of the couple. Thus the distinction of relevance must be between individual persons in a same-sex, conjugal relationship of some permanence and individual persons in an opposite-sex, conjugal relationship of some permanence.

[62] Thus it is apparent that the legislation has drawn a formal distinction between the claimant and others, based on personal characteristics. As stated in Law, supra, the first broad inquiry in the s. 15(1) analysis determines whether there is differential treatment imposed by the impugned legislation between the claimant and others. It is clear that there is differential treatment here. Under s. 29 of the FLA, members of opposite-sex couples who can meet the requirements of the statute are able to gain access to the court-enforced system of support provided by the FLA. It is this system that ensures the provision of support to a dependent spouse. Members of same-sex couples are denied access to this system entirely on the basis of their sexual orientation.

[The rest of the Court agreed with Cory J that s 29 of the FLA had drawn a distinction based upon sexual orientation, an analogous ground recognized in Egan. The members of the Court differed on whether the differential treatment was discriminatory and whether, if it was, it was saved by s 1.]

The majority held that s 29 of the FLA withheld a benefit that conferred access to a court-enforced process that could confer economic benefits and protect the economic interests of individuals in intimate relationships. That denial of the benefit was held to violate the purpose of s 15 because it exacerbated the significant pre-existing disadvantage and vulnerability experienced by individuals in same-sex relationships, failed to take account of the claimant's actual situation, and promoted the view that M and others in same-sex relationships are less worthy of recognition and protection. See Section IV, Note 2 of this chapter for a discussion of the reasons why s 29 of the FLA was not saved by s 1. The majority ordered that s 29 of the FLA be severed and declared to be of no force or effect, although that remedy was suspended for six months.

Justice Bastarache also found a violation of s 15(1) that was not saved by s 1, although he differed from the majority on the objectives of the FLA. Justice Major also agreed with the majority's result but argued it was unnecessary to consider whether other types of long-term relationships gave rise to dependency. Justice Gonthier, dissenting, found there was no violation of s 15(1); while there was a distinction that differentiated between members of opposite-sex and same-sex cohabiting couples, the differentiation was not discriminatory because it did not perpetuate the view that individuals in same-sex relationships are less deserving of concern, respect, and consideration (at para 262).]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. M v H was seen as a major victory against discrimination for same-sex relationships and LGBTQ2+ persons. As a result of the decision, the Ontario government responded with An Act to amend certain statutes to ensure their constitutionality because of the Supreme Court of Canada decision in M v H. As the government had recognized in its initial extension of rights to members of some unmarried couples, this amendment had the effect of "reducing the strain on the public purse" by privatizing the support obligation, suggesting that the recognition of same-sex benefits might be limited to, or easier for, new rights that did not cost the state any money. See Brenda Cossman, "Canadian Same Sex Relationship Recognition Struggles and the Contradictory Nature of Legal Victories" (2000) 48:1 Clev St L Rev 49. And while the amendment extended the rights that members of unmarried couples had, it did so by introducing a new term, "same-sex partner," instead of changing the traditional definition of "spouse." See Brenda Cossman, "Developments in Family Law: The 1998-99 Term" (2000) 11 SCLR (2d) 433 at 463; Emily Graham, "Law v Canada: New Directions for Equality Under the Canadian Charter?" (2002) 22:4 Oxford J Leg Stud 641 at 657-58.

2. Beginning in 2000, cases in Quebec, Ontario, and British Columbia were launched that argued that the common law definition of marriage that restricted it to "one man and one woman" violated s 15(1). All three cases attracted national attention and succeeded in their respective provincial appellate courts. See Catholic Civil Rights League v Hendricks, [2004 CanLII 20538, \[2004\] RJQ 851 \(CA\)](#); Halpern v Canada (AG), 2003 CanLII 26403, 65 OR \(3d\) 161 \(CA\); Barbeau v British Columbia (AG), 2003 BCCA 251 [EGALE Canada v Canada (AG)]. The federal government announced it would not appeal any of the decisions but would instead introduce legislation that formalized the British Columbia and Ontario judgments and refer that draft legislation to the Supreme Court of Canada. In its decision in Reference re Same-Sex Marriage, 2004 SCC 79, the Court held that Parliament alone had the authority to define marriage with respect to capacity issues, rejecting an originalist interpretation that would have restricted the word "marriage" to its common law meaning at the time of Confederation. It also held that while the proposed legislation was consistent with the Charter, religious officials could not be compelled by the state to perform same-sex marriage ceremonies. It declined to answer the reference question of whether the opposite-sex definition of marriage violated s 15(1). For commentary on the case law subsequent to M v H and the legal fight for same-sex marriage, see for example, Sarah Loosemore, "EGALE v Canada: The Case for Same-Sex Marriage" (2002) 60 UT Fac L Rev 43; Nicholas Bala, "The Debates About Same-Sex Marriage in Canada and the United States: Controversy over the Evolution of a Fundamental Social Institution" (2005-6) 20 BYU J Pub L 195; Carissima Mathen, "Mutability and Method in the Marriage Reference" (2005) 54 UNBLJ 43.

3. For discussions of legislated reforms to same-sex partnerships and marriage and how feminist critiques of marriage and familial ideology were sidelined, including by gay and lesbian activists, see Claire Young & Susan Boyd, "Challenging Heteronormativity? Reaction and Resistance to the Legal Recognition of Same Sex Partnerships" in Dorothy E Chunn, Susan B Boyd & Hester Lessard, eds, Reaction and Resistance: Feminism, Law and Social Change (Vancouver: UBC Press, 2007) 262. To what degree has the success of LGBTQ2+ equality rights litigation in the family law sphere required same-sex couples and LGBTQ2+ individuals to present themselves as similarly situated to heterosexual couples and individuals? How would you frame these cases in substantive equality rather than formal equality terms?

[Vriend is an example of a successful claim of both direct and adverse effects discrimination. The appellant, a laboratory coordinator, was fired from a Bible college after he had revealed that he was gay in response to an inquiry from the college's president. Vriend attempted to file a complaint with the Alberta Human Rights Commission, alleging discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation, but the Commission would not accept the complaint because sexual orientation was not a prohibited ground of discrimination in Alberta's Individual's Rights Protection Act [IRPA]. Vriend then initiated a court action, arguing that the omission was a violation of his equality rights. The trial judge agreed. The majority in the Court of Appeal allowed the government's appeal, which argued that the exclusion of sexual orientation did not amount to differential treatment; it constituted a "neutral silence" (Vriend v Alberta, 1996 ABCA 87 at para 16, McClung JA).

The question of whether the impugned statute, on its face or in its impact, created a distinction based on an analogous ground was an issue in the Court's decision, as was the application of the Charter to an omission in the law. On the latter point, Cory J held that "[t]he fact that it is the underinclusiveness of the Act which is at issue does not alter the fact that it is the legislative act which is the subject of Charter scrutiny in this case" (at para 55).]

CORY and IACOBUCCI JJ (Lamer CJ and Gonthier, McLachlin, and Bastarache JJ concurring): [In their joint reasons, Cory J addressed the s 15 issue.]

CORY J:

[68] The concept and principle of equality is almost intuitively understood and cherished by all. It is easy to praise these concepts as providing the foundation for a just society which permits every individual to live in dignity and in harmony with all. The difficulty lies in giving real effect to equality. Difficult as the goal of equality may be it is worth the arduous struggle to attain. It is only when equality is a reality that fraternity and harmony will be achieved. It is then that all individuals will truly live in dignity.

(a) Does the IRPA Create a Distinction?

[75] The respondents have argued that because the IRPA merely omits any reference to sexual orientation, this "neutral silence" cannot be understood as creating a distinction. They contend that the IRPA extends full protection on the grounds contained within it to heterosexuals and homosexuals alike, and therefore there is no distinction and hence no discrimination. It is the respondents' position that if any distinction is made on the basis of sexual orientation that distinction exists because it is present in society and not because of the IRPA.

[76] These arguments cannot be accepted. They are based on that "thin and impoverished" notion of equality referred to in Eldridge (at para. 73). It has been repeatedly held that identical treatment will not always constitute equal treatment (see for example Andrews, supra, at p. 164). It is also clear that the way in which an exclusion is worded should not disguise the nature of the exclusion so as to allow differently drafted exclusions to be treated differently. [The Court quoted the following from Knodel v British Columbia (Medical Services Commission) (1991), 58 BCLR (2d) 356 (SC) at 384-85]:

Where the state makes a distinction between two classes of individuals, A and B, ... the manner in which the legislative provision or law is drafted is irrelevant for constitutional purposes; i.e., it is immaterial whether the subject law states: (1) A benefits; or (2) Everyone benefits except B. In both cases, the impact upon the individual within group B is the same.

[77] The respondents concede that if homosexuals were excluded altogether from the protection of the IRPA in the sense that they were not protected from discrimination on any grounds, this would be discriminatory. Clearly that would be discrimination of the most egregious kind. It is true that gay and lesbian individuals are not entirely excluded from the protection of the IRPA. They can claim protection on some grounds. Yet that certainly does not mean that there is no discrimination present. For example, the fact that a lesbian and a heterosexual woman are both entitled to bring a complaint of discrimination on the basis of gender does not mean that they have equal protection under the Act. Lesbian and gay individuals are still denied protection under the ground that may be the most significant for them, discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.

[80] If the mere silence of the legislation was enough to remove it from s. 15(1) scrutiny then any legislature could easily avoid the objects of s. 15(1) simply by drafting laws which omitted reference to excluded groups. Such an approach would ignore the recognition that this Court has given to the principle that discrimination can arise from underinclusive legislation. This principle was expressed with great clarity by Dickson C.J. in Brooks v. Canada Safeway Ltd., [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1219, at p. 1240. There he stated: "Underinclusion may be simply a backhanded way of permitting discrimination."

[81] It is clear that the [Act], by reason of its underinclusiveness, does create a distinction. The distinction is simultaneously drawn along two different lines. The first is the distinction between homosexuals, on one hand, and other disadvantaged groups which are protected under the Act, on the other. Gays and lesbians do not even have formal equality with reference to other protected groups, since those other groups are explicitly included and they are not.

[82] The second distinction, and, I think, the more fundamental one, is between homosexuals and heterosexuals. This distinction may be more difficult to see because there is, on the surface, a measure of formal equality: gay or lesbian individuals have the same access as heterosexual individuals to the protection of the IRPA in the sense that they could complain to the Commission about an incident of discrimination on the basis of any of the grounds currently included. However, the exclusion of the ground of sexual orientation, considered in the context of the social reality of discrimination against gays and lesbians, clearly has a disproportionate impact on them as opposed to heterosexuals. Therefore the IRPA in its underinclusive state denies substantive equality to the former group. ... It is possible that a heterosexual individual could be discriminated against on the ground of sexual orientation. Yet this is far less likely to occur than discrimination against a homosexual or lesbian on that same ground. It thus is apparent that there is a clear distinction created by the disproportionate impact which arises from the exclusion of the ground from the IRPA.

[84] Finally, the respondents' contention that the distinction is not created by law, but rather exists independently of the IRPA in society, cannot be accepted. It is, of course, true that discrimination against gays and lesbians exists in society. The reality of this cruel and unfortunate discrimination was recognized in Egan. Indeed it provides the context in which the legislative distinction challenged in this case must be analysed. The reality of society's discrimination against lesbians and gay men demonstrates that there is a distinction drawn in the IRPA which denies these groups equal protection of the law by excluding lesbians and gay men from its protection, the very protection they so urgently need because of the existence of discrimination against them in society. It is not necessary to find that the legislation creates the discrimination existing in society in order to determine that it creates a potentially discriminatory distinction.

[86] The omission of sexual orientation as a protected ground in the IRPA creates a distinction on the basis of sexual orientation. The "silence" of the IRPA with respect to discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation is not "neutral." Gay men and lesbians are treated differently from other disadvantaged groups and from heterosexuals. They, unlike gays and lesbians, receive protection from discrimination on the grounds that are likely to be relevant to them.

[Justice Cory held that the appropriate remedy was to read sexual orientation in to the IRPA.

Justice L'Heureux-Dubé concurred with that result but wrote separately, reiterating her position from the 1995 trilogy that a group-based approach was the proper approach to s 15(1). Justice Major, dissenting in part, agreed there was a breach of s 15(1) but argued that sexual orientation should not be read in to the Act because the legislature might prefer to have no human rights legislation to extending the IRPA's protection to the ground of sexual orientation. For a discussion of the Court's s 1 reasons, see Section IV, Note 2.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In identifying some of the problems with recognizing adverse effects discrimination, Cory J noted that, although both heterosexual and gay and lesbian individuals were affected by the omission of sexual orientation as a ground of discrimination, the first group is not adversely affected (at para 82). In doing so, he acknowledged a significant difference between grounds and the different groups that might be included within those grounds. All individuals have a sexual orientation, but not all have a sexual orientation that leaves them vulnerable to a seemingly neutral law. The main point made by this passage, however, is that it is only when the relative impact of the statute on heterosexual and gay and lesbian individuals is examined that the adverse effects are seen. This also illustrates the value of comparison and of using many comparators, rather than the one "mirror comparator" that was required before Withler.

2. In Vriend, the government had argued the IRPA could not be understood as creating a distinction through omission and that, if any distinction was made on the basis of sexual orientation, that distinction existed because it was present in society and not because of the law (at para 75). This point about the need to demonstrate causation between the law and the disadvantage is a recurring one. For example, it was made 22 years later by Brown and Rowe JJ in their dissent in Fraser (excerpted in Section II.A above). In that case, the dissent identified the cause of the financial disadvantage experienced by job-sharing female RCMP members as the unequal distribution of parental responsibilities and the unavailability of quality childcare, both of which existed "outside ... the purview of the courts" (at para 215; see also para 168). Justices Brown and Rowe concluded that the state should not be responsible for discrimination it had not caused (at para 181).

3. At the time the Charter's equality guarantee was drafted and first interpreted and applied to issues involving sexual identity in cases such as Egan (recognizing sexual orientation as an analogous ground), M v H, and Vriend, it was conceptualized as two binary sets of identity, heterosexuality or homosexuality. Binary identities—such as heterosexual/gay and male/female—constructed and were constructed by the grounds approach and the category of "sex" as an enumerated ground (and later, sexual orientation as an analogous ground). Today, a continuum of identification has become a more common way to conceptualize sexuality and gender identities. What problems arise due to the law's requirement of bounded categories within which to classify individual or group claims for rights protection? See Heather Shipley, "One of These Things Is Not like the Other: Sexual Diversity and Accommodation," in Lori G Beaman, ed, Reasonable Accommodation: Managing Religious Diversity (Vancouver: UBC Press, 2012) at 165.

Eldridge v British Columbia (AG)

[1997] 3 SCR 624, 1997 CanLII 327

[Three individuals who were born deaf and whose preferred means of communication was sign language sought a declaration that the failure to provide public funding for sign language interpreters for the deaf when they received medical services violated s 15 of the Charter. According to the Medical and Health Care Services Act, the power to decide whether a service was "medically required" and hence a "benefit" under the Act was delegated to the Medical Services Commission. In the case of the Hospital Insurance Act, 1996, c 204, hospitals were given discretion to determine which services should be provided free of charge. The Commission and the hospitals did not make sign language interpretation available as an insured service. The s 32 issue of whether the Charter applied to the funding decisions of hospitals or the Commission is discussed in Chapter 18, Application. The portions of La Forest J's judgment excerpted below focus on the question of whether the failure to provide funding for sign language interpretation violated s 15 and, in particular, on the nature of adverse effects discrimination.]

La FOREST J (Lamer CJ and L'Heureux-Dubé, Sopinka, Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin, Iacobucci, and Major JJ concurring):

[53] Having concluded that the Charter applies to the failure of hospitals and the Medical Services Commission to provide sign language interpreters, it remains to be determined whether that failure infringes the appellants' equality rights under s. 15(1) of the Charter. ... I emphasize at the outset that s. 15(1), like other Charter rights, is to be generously and purposively interpreted

[54] In the case of s. 15(1), this Court has stressed that it serves two distinct but related purposes. First, it expresses a commitment—deeply ingrained in our social, political and legal culture—to the equal worth and human dignity of all persons. ... Secondly, it instantiates a desire to rectify and prevent discrimination against particular groups "suffering social, political and legal disadvantage in our society" While this Court has confirmed that it is not necessary to show membership in a historically disadvantaged group in order to establish a s. 15(1) violation, the fact that a law draws a distinction on such a ground is an important indicium of discrimination

[55] As deaf persons, the appellants belong to an enumerated group under s. 15(1)—the physically disabled

[56] It is an unfortunate truth that the history of disabled persons in Canada is largely one of exclusion and marginalization. Persons with disabilities have too often been excluded from the labour force, denied access to opportunities for social interaction and advancement, subjected to invidious stereotyping and relegated to institutions This historical disadvantage has to a great extent been shaped and perpetuated by the notion that disability is an abnormality or flaw. As a result, disabled persons have not generally been afforded the "equal concern, respect and consideration" that s. 15(1) of the Charter demands. Instead, they have been subjected to paternalistic attitudes of pity and charity, and their entrance into the social mainstream has been conditional upon their emulation of able-bodied norms One consequence of these attitudes is the persistent social and economic disadvantage faced by the disabled. Statistics indicate that persons with disabilities, in comparison to non-disabled persons, have less education, are more likely to be outside the labour force, face much higher unemployment rates, and are concentrated at the lower end of the pay scale when employed

[57] Deaf persons have not escaped this general predicament. Although many of them resist the notion that deafness is an impairment and identify themselves as members of a distinct community with its own language and culture, this does not justify their compelled exclusion from the opportunities and services designed for and otherwise available to the hearing population. For many hearing persons, the dominant perception of deafness is one of silence. This perception has perpetuated ignorance of the needs of deaf persons and has resulted in a society that is for the most part organized as though everyone can hear Not surprisingly, therefore, the disadvantage experienced by deaf persons derives largely from barriers to communication with the hearing population.

[Justice La Forest then reviewed the general analytic framework to s 15 and the different approaches adopted by various members of the Court in a trilogy of rulings released in 1995.]

[59] In my view, in the present case the same result is reached regardless of which of these approaches is applied . . . There is no question that the distinction here is based on a personal characteristic that is irrelevant to the functional values underlying the health care system. Those values consist of the promotion of health and the prevention and treatment of illness and disease, and the realization of those values through the vehicle of a publicly funded health care system. There could be no personal characteristic less relevant to these values than an individual's physical disability.

[60] The only question in this case, then, is whether the appellants have been afforded "equal benefit of the law without discrimination" within the meaning of s. 15(1) of the Charter. On its face, the medicare system in British Columbia applies equally to the deaf and hearing populations. It does not make an explicit "distinction" based on disability by singling out deaf persons for different treatment. Both deaf and hearing persons are entitled to receive certain medical services free of charge. The appellants nevertheless contend that the lack of funding for sign language interpreters renders them unable to benefit from this legislation to the same extent as hearing persons. Their claim, in other words, is one of "adverse effects" discrimination.

[Justice La Forest then reviewed the discussion of adverse effects discrimination in Andrews.]

[65] ... [In Eaton v Brant County Board of Education, [1997] 1 SCR 241], Sopinka J. observed that in the case of disabled persons, it is often the failure to take into account the adverse effects of generally applicable laws that results in discrimination. He remarked, at paras. 66-67:

The principal object of certain of the prohibited grounds is the elimination of discrimination by the attribution of untrue characteristics based on stereotypical attitudes relating to immutable conditions such as race or sex. In the case of disability, this is one of the objectives. The other equally important objective seeks to take into account the true characteristics of this group which act as headwinds to the enjoyment of society's benefits and to accommodate them. Exclusion from the mainstream of society results from the construction of a society based solely on "mainstream" attributes to which disabled persons will never be able to gain access. ...

[66] ... [I]n the present case the adverse effects suffered by deaf persons stem not from the imposition of a burden not faced by the mainstream population, but rather from a failure to ensure that they benefit equally from a service offered to everyone. It is on this basis that the trial judge and the majority of the Court of Appeal found that the failure to provide medically related sign language interpretation was not discriminatory. Their analyses presuppose that there is a categorical distinction to be made between state-imposed burdens and benefits, and that the government is not obliged to ameliorate disadvantage that it has not helped to create or exacerbate . . .

[69] ... Effective communication is quite obviously an integral part of the provision of medical services. ...

[71] If there are circumstances in which deaf patients cannot communicate effectively with their doctors without an interpreter, how can it be said that they receive the same level of medical care as hearing persons? Those who hear do not receive communication as a distinct service. For them, an effective means of communication is routinely available, free of charge, as part of every health care service. In order to receive the same quality of care, deaf persons must bear the burden of paying for the means to communicate with their health care providers, despite the fact that the system is intended to make ability to pay irrelevant. Where it is necessary for effective communication, sign language interpretation should not therefore be viewed as an "ancillary" service. On the contrary, it is the means by which deaf persons may receive the same quality of medical care as the hearing population.

[72] Once it is accepted that effective communication is an indispensable component of the delivery of medical services, it becomes much more difficult to assert that the failure to ensure that deaf persons communicate effectively with their health care providers is not discriminatory. In their effort to persuade this Court otherwise, the respondents and their supporting interveners maintain that s. 15(1) does not oblige governments to implement programs to alleviate disadvantages that exist independently of state action. Adverse effects only arise from benefit programs, they aver, when those programs exacerbate the disparities between the group claiming a s. 15(1) violation and the general population. They assert, in other words, that governments should be entitled to provide benefits to the general population without ensuring that disadvantaged members of society have the resources to take full advantage of those benefits.

[73] In my view, this position bespeaks a thin and impoverished vision of s. 15(1). It is belied, more importantly, by the thrust of this Court's equality jurisprudence. It has been suggested that s. 15(1) of the Charter does not oblige the state to take positive actions, such as provide services to ameliorate the symptoms of systemic or general inequality . . . Whether or not this is true in all cases, and I do not purport to decide the matter here, the question raised in the present case is of a wholly different order. This Court has repeatedly held that once the state does provide a benefit, it is obliged to do so in a non-discriminatory manner . . . In many circumstances, this will require governments to take positive action, for example by extending the scope of a benefit to a previously excluded class of persons. . . .

[80] In my view, therefore, the failure of the Medical Services Commission and hospitals to provide sign language interpretation where it is necessary for effective communication constitutes a prima facie violation of the s. 15(1) rights of deaf persons. This failure denies them the equal benefit of the law and discriminates against them in comparison with hearing persons.

[Justice La Forest went on to find that the s 15 violation could not be justified pursuant to s 1. He held that "the government has manifestly failed to demonstrate that it had a reasonable basis for concluding that a total denial of medical interpretation services for the deaf constituted a minimum impairment of their rights" (at para 87). In the result, he issued a declaration that the failure to fund sign language interpretation violated s 15(1). The government was given six months to ensure that "sign language interpreters will be provided where necessary for effective communication in the delivery of medical services" (at para 96).]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Dianne Pothier wrote about two types of adverse effects discrimination in "Tackling Disability Discrimination at Work: Toward a Systemic Approach" (2010) 4:1 McGill JL & Health 17. She called the first type the "categorical exclusion" type and used Ontario Human Rights Commission v Simpsons-Sears, [1985] 2 SCR 536, 1985 CanLII 18 [O'Malley] as an example.

O'Malley's employer required its full-time sales clerks to work Friday evenings and Saturdays. O'Malley, a member of the Seventh-Day Adventist Church, observed the Sabbath from sundown Friday to sundown Saturday. The facially neutral condition of employment availability disproportionately impacted all members of that Church who, because of their religion, "were unable to work on Saturdays," even if it did not affect all people of faith (Pothier at 35).

Pothier called the second type of adverse effects discrimination the "disproportionate impact" type, as seen in a second human rights case: British Columbia (Public Service Employee Relations Commission) v BCGSEU, [1999] 3 SCR 3, 1999 CanLII 652 [Meiorin]. In Meiorin, the government had established minimum physical fitness standards for its firefighters, including an aerobic standard which the claimant, a female firefighter, failed to meet. Evidence demonstrated that, due to physiological differences, most women have a lower aerobic capacity than most men and, unlike most men, most women cannot increase their capacity with training to meet the standard. In other words, "all the women disproportionately fail the test compared to men, [but] some women pass the tests" (Pothier at 35).

Pothier noted the role that the two different types of adverse effects discrimination played in the choice of comparators. In categorical exclusion cases such as O'Malley, almost all of those who are not Seventh Day Adventists do not face the consequences the claimant was challenging. Comparators that reveal the adverse impact are simple to identify. In choosing who to compare the claimant to, choosing almost any other religious sub-group, or non-religious employees, would reveal the adverse impact. However, in disproportionate impact cases such as Meiorin, it would be possible to compare the claimant to male firefighters who fail to meet the aerobic standard, that is, to those who face the same consequences as the claimant but not for the same gender-based physiological reasons. But that cannot be an appropriate comparison because that would preclude all findings of discrimination in disproportionate impact type of cases. The comparison must be made "between those fired for failing the test (disproportionately women) and those who kept their jobs upon passing the test (disproportionately men)" (Pothier at 36).

Which type of adverse affects discrimination claim did the claimants in Fraser make? Consider that not every RCMP member who job-shared was a female with child-care responsibilities, although most were. Is the appropriate comparison to male RCMP members who job-shared and could not buy back their pensions? To RCMP members on leave without pay, who could buy back their pension (disproportionately women)? Or is it to all full-time RCMP members with full pension benefits (disproportionately men)? To put it in Abella J's terms, does a comparison to RCMP members on leave without pay who could buy back (disproportionately women) reveal an "absence of accommodation" (at para 54)? Does a comparison to all full-time RCMP members (disproportionately men) reveal "built-in headwinds" (at para 53)?

In connection with the evidence required to prove adverse effects discrimination, in Fraser Abella J identified two types: "evidence about the situation of the claimant group" and "evidence about the results of the law" (at para 56). The latter may include statistics "especially if the pool of people adversely affected by a criterion or standard includes both members of a protected group and members of more advantaged groups" (at para 58). She indicated both types of evidence would be preferable (at para 60) but that neither was always required (at para 61). What is not mentioned is that in the O'Malley categorical exclusion type of case—which Fraser was not—statistical or other evidence of the results of a law is always unnecessary. The very nature of the exclusion of the affected group is complete and total. One hundred percent of observant Seventh Day Adventists are adversely impacted by a requirement to work Saturdays due to a tenet of their faith. By definition, no one who does not hold such a belief can be adversely affected by it. It is only in disproportionate impact types of cases like Meiorin and Fraser that evidence of the results of the law—admitted as evidence in the case before the Court, accepted via judicial notice, or in precedents which the Court can follow—is needed, and in those cases, it is always needed.

2. Consider the relevance of these ideas about types of adverse effects discrimination and what it means for comparators and evidence requirements in the context of R v Sharma, 2020 ONCA 478, leave to appeal to SCC granted, 2021 CanLII 1101, [2020] SCCA No 311 (QL). Cheyenne Sharma, a 20-year-old First Nations woman who the sentencing judge described as "an intergenerational survivor of the government's residential school effort to eradicate the cultural heritage of her people" (at para 9) and who, along with her daughter, was facing homelessness, imported cocaine into Canada in exchange for $20,000 from her boyfriend. She confessed and pled guilty. Her application for a conditional sentence was rejected, and a custodial sentence of 17 months was imposed. Before 2012, a conditional sentence would have been available, but s 742.1(c) of the Criminal Code removed its availability for offences carrying a maximum sentence of 14 years or life imprisonment. At her sentencing hearing, Sharma applied to have s 742.1(c) struck, arguing that the provision discriminated against Indigenous offenders on the basis of race. The sentencing judge, using the test from Kapp, held that the s 15 argument failed on the first step because of the absence of a statistical record demonstrating that the impugned provision had a differential impact on Indigenous offenders.

The Ontario Court of Appeal, however, accepted a distinction based on the ground of "race" without analysis of the suitability of this ground for Indigenous people. Is it less problematic to accept the ground of race as the appropriate ground in a case like Sharma, where the impugned law applies on its face to all those charged with specific offences, than it is to accept it without analysis in a case like Kapp, which involved a constitutionally recognized fishery priority for three First Nations? See Section II.C, Note 4 for further discussion of grounds and Indigeneity.

In the Court of Appeal, Sharma expanded her argument, contending that s 742.1(c) and s 742.1(e)(ii) violated s 15 as well as s 7 for being arbitrary and overbroad. Section 742.1(e)(ii) removed the availability of conditional sentences for offences involving the import of drugs, and therefore also applied to Sharma. A majority of the Court of Appeal accepted both of her arguments and found the two impugned sections were not saved by s 1.

The majority in the Court of Appeal, applying the tests from Taypotat and Alliance, acknowledged they were dealing with adverse effects discrimination because the impugned provisions were facially neutral. While the Crown had argued that the removal of the conditional sentence option did not "create" any distinction between Indigenous and other offenders and that the distinction existed because of the social circumstances of Indigenous people, the majority, relying on R v Gladue, [1999] 1 SCR 688, 1999 CanLII 679, rejected those arguments. The majority noted that the purpose of the conditional sentencing provisions was to address the issue of overincarceration and particularly the overincarceration of Indigenous offenders (at para 77). It went on to find:

[79] The distinction that is created by the impact of the impugned provisions relates to the overincarceration of Aboriginal offenders, not their overrepresentation in the criminal justice system. By removing the ability to impose a conditional sentence instead of a prison sentence for an offence, the effect on an Aboriginal offender is to undermine the purpose and remedial effect of s. 718.2(e) in addressing the substantive inequality between Aboriginal and non-Aboriginal people manifested in overincarceration within the criminal justice system, which has been acknowledged by Parliament and the courts as requiring redress.

The majority also noted that giving the word "creates" in the first step of the Taypotat test the meaning the Crown argued for would require ignoring the second step of the test where the question was whether the distinction made on protected grounds reinforced, exacerbated, or perpetuated disadvantage for the affected group.

On the second step, the majority noted the "extensive evidentiary record detailing the relationship between the historic disadvantage endured by Aboriginal people in Canada and their overrepresentation in the criminal justice system" that had been put before the sentencing judge (at para 90). The evidence included statistics on the number and percentage of incarcerated Indigenous women and how many of the conditional sentences granted before 2012 could have been granted after that year. However, the sentencing judge had wanted statistics on how many Indigenous offenders would have received conditional sentences had the impugned provisions not been enacted. The Court of Appeal found that such evidence would not have been helpful, even if it had been available. The majority indicated the most useful statistical evidence would have been about the population of Indigenous offenders who were incarcerated when they otherwise would have been eligible for a conditional sentence, which required them to have received a sentence of less than two years. Because Sharma had been convicted of an offence with a mandatory minimum of two years' imprisonment before that mandatory minimum was struck down as unconstitutional in a different case, the majority found (at para 104):

Statistics would ... have been unable to capture the impact of the impugned provisions on Aboriginal offenders, as it would be difficult to identify the population that was specifically deprived of a conditional sentencing option.

Given the lack of comparators and the impossibility of presenting the most useful type of statistical evidence, Sharma illustrates just how difficult a disproportionate impact case of adverse effects discrimination can be. See also Sonia Lawrence, "That Admittedly Unattainable Ideal": Adverse Impact and Race Under Section 15" (2017) Law Society of Upper Canada, Special Lectures 2017: Canada at 150: The Charter and the Constitution 547 at 548.

Consider the Crown's argument that the removal of the conditional sentence option does not "create" any distinction between Indigenous and other offenders and that the distinction existed because of the social circumstances of Indigenous people and was not caused by the law. That type of argument was also made by the federal government in Fraser and adopted by Brown and Rowe JJ in their dissent. Could that same type of argument be made using the facts in O'Malley or Eldridge, which are both categorical exclusion type of cases?

Sharma provides an opportunity for the Supreme Court to centre power in its analysis. What evidence would be needed to ground a discussion of how power works to deny substantive equality as part of an analysis of systemic discrimination?

3. Eldridge and Vriend were the first Supreme Court decisions in which the obligation to promote substantive equality—and not just simply prevent discrimination—was given real effect. For commentary, see Bruce Porter, "Beyond Andrews: Substantive Equality and Positive Obligations After Eldridge and Vriend" (1997-98) 9:3 Const Forum Const 71; Isabel Grant & Judith Mosoff, "Hearing Claims of Inequality: Eldridge v British Columbia (A.G.)" (1998) 10 CJWL 229. However, Vriend and Eldridge would be the last cases in which the obligation to promote substantive equality was given material effect for the next 20 years. The following cases are illustrative of some losses during those two decades.

In Symes v Canada, [1993] 4 SCR 695, 1993 CanLII 55, the Court rejected a challenge brought by a female lawyer to provisions of the Income Tax Act that did not permit the full deduction of childcare expenses as a business expense. Writing for a majority of the Court, Iacobucci J concluded that the claimant had not established that the challenged provisions had a disproportionate impact on women. He acknowledged the evidence demonstrated that women bear a disproportionate share of the child care burden in Canada. But to establish that the limited deductibility of childcare expenses amounts to differential treatment on the basis of sex, he said Symes needed to show that women disproportionately paid child care expenses. Justice Iacobucci went on to suggest that a different sub-group of women, such as single mothers, might be more successful. For commentary, see Audrey Macklin, "Symes v MNR: Where Sex Meets Class" (1992) 5 CJWL 498; Rebecca Johnson, Taxing Choices: The Intersection of Class, Gender, Parenthood, and the Law (Vancouver: University of British Columbia Press, 2002).

A claim of adverse effects discrimination was also dismissed by the Court in Health Services and Support—Facilities Subsector Bargaining Assn v British Columbia, 2007 SCC 27, excerpted in Chapter 21, Freedom of Association. At issue was the constitutional validity of legislation that interfered with the collective bargaining rights of unions representing health care workers. Over 90 percent of the employees affected by the legislation were women. The unions argued that the act discriminated on the basis of sex (among other grounds) and also violated their freedom of association. The Court held that parts of the Act violated freedom of association protected by s 2(d) of the Charter, and could not be upheld pursuant to s 1. After reaching this conclusion, McLachlin CJ and LeBel J, in their joint majority opinion, disposed of the s 15 argument in a single paragraph:

[165] ... Like the courts below, we conclude that the distinctions made by the Act relate essentially to segregating different sectors of employment, in accordance with the long-standing practice in labour regulation of creating legislation specific to particular segments of the labour force, and do not amount to discrimination under s 15 of the Charter. The differential and adverse effects of the legislation on some groups of workers relate essentially to the type of work they do, and not to the persons they are. Nor does the evidence disclose that the Act reflects the stereotypical application of group or personal characteristics. Without minimizing the importance of the distinctions made by the Act to the lives and work of affected health care employees, the differential treatment based on personal characteristics required to get a discrimination analysis off the ground is absent here. [Emphasis added.]

In this paragraph, we see the Court refusing to deal with the question of why some workers who were predominantly women were excluded from the full benefits of collective bargaining. The Court dismissed the argument that gender was not merely coincidental to who was included and who was excluded. For analysis of the Court's rejection of the sex discrimination argument in BC Health Services, see Brian G Langille, "Can We Rely on the ILO?" (2007) 13 CLELJ 273; Melina Buckley & Fiona Sampson, "LEAF and the Supreme Court of Canada Appeal of Health Services and Support Facilities Subsector Bargaining Assn v British Columbia" (2005) 17:2 CJWL 473; Judy Fudge, "Conceptualizing Collective Bargaining Under the Charter: The Enduring Problem of Substantive Equality" (2008) 42 SCLR (2d) 213.

Another one-paragraph rejection of a s 15(1) claim based on adverse effects discrimination is seen in Alberta v Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony, 2009 SCC 37. The Alberta government repealed a regulation that allowed the Registrar of Motor Vehicles to grant exemptions to a requirement for a photograph on provincial operator's licences, making the requirement a universal one. The Hutterian Brethren claimed the mandatory photograph requirement was unconstitutional in light of their religious belief that having their photograph taken violates the Bible's second commandment. This facially neutral provision is a rare example of intentional adverse effect discrimination given the government's withdrawal of the benefit previously granted by the law. After analyzing the freedom of religion claim, a majority of the Court dismissed the s 15(1) claim in the following brief passage from McLachlin CJ's judgment:

[108] Assuming the respondents could show that the regulation creates a distinction on the enumerated ground of religion, it arises not from any demeaning stereotype but from a neutral and rationally defensible policy choice. There is no discrimination within the meaning of Andrews v. Law Society of British Columbia, ... as explained in Kapp. The Colony members' claim is to the unfettered practice of their religion, not to be free from religious discrimination. The substance of the respondents' s. 15(1) claim has already been dealt with under s. 2(a). There is no breach of s. 15(1). [Emphasis added.]

How could a law with a disproportionately burdensome impact on a vulnerable religious minority be defended as a "neutral" policy choice within s 15(1) and not raise the issue of adverse effects discrimination? For commentary, see Jennifer Kosman & Jonnette Watson

Hamilton, "‘Terrorism or Whatever’: The Implications of Alberta v Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony for Women’s Equality and Social Justice" (2010) 50 SCLR (2d) 221; Jennifer Kosan & Jonnette Watson Hamilton, "Alberta v Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony" (2018) 30:2 CJWL 292 (a Women’s Court of Canada judgment).

Other examples of Supreme Court of Canada rulings rejecting s 15(1) claims of adverse effects discrimination include Taypotat, discussed in Sections II.A, Note 12 following Andrews and II.C, Note 4, where a heavy evidentiary burden was placed on those attempting to bring claims of adverse impact discrimination, and Carter v Canada (AG), 2015 SCC 5, where the Court concluded there was a violation of s 7, and it was unnecessary to consider whether the prohibition on physician-assisted dying deprived adults who are physically disabled of their right to equal treatment under s 15.

For discussion of the jurisprudence on adverse effects discrimination, see Colleen Sheppard, "Of Forest Fires and Systemic Discrimination: A Review of British Columbia (Public Service Employee Relations Commission) v BCGSEU" (2001) 46 McGill LJ 533; Jonnette Watson Hamilton & Jennifer Kosan, "Adverse Impact: The Supreme Court’s Approach to Adverse Effects Discrimination Under Section 15 of the Charter" (2015) 19 Rev Const Stud 191.

4. The decisions in M v H, Vriend, and Eldridge were each attacked by the media, politicians, and some scholars as undemocratic and illegitimate instances of judicial activism or overreach. The essence of these attacks was that the unelected members of the Supreme Court had usurped the legitimate role of elected governments and violated democratic principles. For different views on the controversy generated by these decisions and government resistance to implementing new legislation in conformity with them, see, for example, Christopher P Manfredi, Judicial Power and the Charter: Canada and the Paradox of Liberal Constitutionalism, 2nd ed (Toronto: Oxford University Press, 2001); Brenda Cossman & Bruce Ryder, "M v H: Time to Clean Up Your Acts" (1998-99) 10 Const Forum Const 59.

5. Adverse effects claims do not rely on governments’ intent, and they do not rely on distinctions drawn by governments in their laws or policies. Adverse effects discrimination claims, therefore, open up the possibility of courts recognizing and remedying systemic discrimination. In CN v Canada (Canadian Human Rights Commission), [\[1987\] 1 SCR 1114, 1987 CanLII 109](#) [Action Travail]—a human rights appeal considering whether a tribunal had the power to impose an “employment equity program” on an employer in order to address a problem of systemic discrimination in the hiring and promotion of women to certain “blue collar” jobs—the Supreme Court defined systemic discrimination in the employment context as “discrimination that results from the simple operation of established procedures of recruitment, hiring and promotion, none of which is necessarily designed to promote discrimination” (at 1139). In Meiorin—the human rights case where a fitness test was structured in a way that had adverse employment consequences for some female firefighters—the Supreme Court recognized that adverse effects discrimination is a “more subtle type of discrimination, which rises in the aggregate to the level of systemic discrimination [and] is now much more prevalent than the cruder brand of openly direct discrimination” (at para 29).

Justice Abella began her discussion of adverse effects and systemic discrimination in Fraser by appearing to equate the two concepts, stating that “[h]ow adverse impact or systemic discrimination is applied has received extensive academic consideration” (at para 29). However, she went on to explain the relationship between the two concepts by quoting from Colleen Sheppard; see para 29 in Fraser (excerpted above).

Is the relationship between adverse effects discrimination and systemic discrimination that of a part to a whole, as suggested in Meiorin, or do the two concepts overlap partially or completely, as suggested in Fraser? Why might it matter in law whether or not the two concepts are separate or co-extensive? What is the relationship between direct discrimination and systemic discrimination?

6. As traditionally understood, negative rights focus on freedom from government interference with rights, while positive rights require government action and resource redistribution in order to be exercised. Positive rights include social and economic rights, such as women's right to equal pay for work of equal value (Alliance, Centrale), a right to housing (for example, Tanudjaja v Canada (AG), 2014 ONCA 852, leave to appeal to SCC dismissed, 2015 CanLII 36780, [2015] SCCA No 39 (QL), holding a claim to a "freestanding" right to housing to be non-justiciable), and a right to action on climate change (Note 8 below). But many of the positive rights claims heard at the Supreme Court have had relatively modest and narrow redistributive consequences, such as those required when the Court compelled the Alberta government to include sexual orientation in its human rights legislation (Vriend), the British Columbia government to fund sign language interpreters in hospitals (an estimated $150,000/year: Eldridge at para 4), and the federal government to allow RCMP job-sharers to use their own money to buy pension coverage (Fraser; but see the reasons of Brown and Rowe JJ at para 228 in the excerpt of Fraser in Section II.A for an argument to the contrary). For a discussion of the role of budgetary concerns in s 15 cases, see Hester A Lessard, "Dollars Versus [Equality] Rights: Money and the Limits on Distributive Justice" (2012) 58 SCLR (2d) 299.

The question of whether a government can be required to act, particularly in a context where claimants' disadvantages are seen by some to exist independent of state action, has resurfaced in the recent Supreme Court cases of Alliance, Centrale, and Fraser, and revealed mutually incompatible understandings of the Charter's equality guarantee. In general, the dissenting opinions in those cases took the position that equality rights are always negative rights and a government cannot be compelled to act, that governments are not required to act at all when the disadvantage suffered by a claimant group is not created by state action, and if the government does act when it need not, as long as its actions have an ameliorative purpose, then it may act incrementally without violating s 15(1). The dissenting justices would therefore have found against the claimants in all three of these cases, despite the fact that claims on public funds were involved only in some of these cases—specifically, the pay equity cases to the extent they involved public sector employment relationships.

This is not the vision of substantive equality that equality-seeking groups have. It is, to quote Cory J in Eldridge, "a thin and impoverished vision of s. 15(1)" (at para 73). Substantive equality cannot be achieved without the recognition of positive rights. But, even in Eldridge, the Supreme Court did not fully embrace positive equality rights, saying only that "once the state does provide a benefit, it is obliged to do so in a non-discriminatory manner," even if that requires the government to take positive action (at para 73; see also Schachter v Canada, [1992] 2 SCR 679, 1992 CanLII 74).

Twenty years after Eldridge, the judgments in the 2018 pay equity cases provide examples of the same point. Justice Abella's majority opinion in Alliance, which uses Vriend and Eldridge as precedents to address arguments made by the dissent of Côté, Brown, and Rowe JJ, is illustrative:

[41] ... [M]y colleagues imply that there is no breach of s. 15(1) of the Charter because the Quebec legislature did not create pay discrimination against women. No one has suggested that it did. But when the government passes legislation in a way that perpetuates historic disadvantage for protected groups, regardless of who caused their disadvantage, the legislation is subject to review for s. 15 compliance (Vriend, at para. 66).

[42] The result of finding that Quebec's amendments breach s. 15 in this case is not, as Quebec suggests, to impose a freestanding positive obligation on the state to enact benefit schemes to redress social inequalities. Nor does it undermine the state's ability to act incrementally in addressing systemic inequality. But s. 15 does require the state to ensure that whatever actions it does take do not have a discriminatory impact (Vriend; Eldridge ... at paras. 72-80).

The acceptance of positive rights is crucially important in the context of systemic discrimination. If the Charter does not place positive duties on the state to act to remedy social and economic inequalities—inequalities that manifest, for example, in disproportionate homelessness rates among those with mental and physical disabilities, the overincarceration of Indigenous and racialized offenders, and the disproportionate burden of climate change on the young—then action against systemic discrimination is entirely dependent on the good will of the governments in power.

7. Many examples of systemic discrimination based on race have been drawn to Canadians' attention recently as a result of political action and advocacy around racial inequalities within the criminal justice system. To date, however, s 15 cases involving race as a ground of discrimination have been almost entirely absent from the Supreme Court's equality jurisprudence. There was a claim on the ground of race in R v Kapp (discussed in Sections II.A, Note 9 following Andrews, and II.C, Note 4), but the Court did not address whether race was the appropriate ground. There have been a number of other cases involving Indigenous claimants and race as a ground of discrimination, but in none of those cases has the ground been analyzed more than minimally, nor has the question of whether Indigeneity is a subset of race been analyzed. See Section II.C, Note 4.

The gap in s 15(1) Supreme Court decisions based on the ground of race may soon be filled by a decision in R v Sharma (discussed in Note 2 above), where the claimant, a member of the Saugeen First Nation, alleged discrimination against Indigenous offenders on the basis of race. Sharma claims race as the ground of discrimination even though Indigeneity as a racial category is contested, and a constitutional analysis in this context should often include s 25 of the Constitution Act, 1982 as well as s 15 of the Charter (for a discussion of s 25 see Section III, Note 5). Nevertheless, most advocates and scholars agree that a similar analytical approach is appropriate in cases of racism and Indigenous subordination and oppression. See Sébastien Grammond, "Disentangling Race and Indigenous Status: The Role of Ethnicity" (2008) 33:2 Queen's LJ 487; Sonia Lawrence & Debra Parkes, "R v Turtle: Substantive Equality Touches Down in Treaty 5 Territory" (2020) 66 CR (7th) 430.

What might explain such a large gap in equality jurisprudence? Sonia Lawrence has posited a number of possible reasons for "the curious lack of racial discrimination claims under section 15," including the lack of community resources to build claims, difficulties in obtaining the necessary statistical data, and Kapp's ten-year focus on prejudice and stereotyping to the detriment of adverse effects claims: see "'That Admittedly Unattainable Ideal': Adverse Impact and Race Under Section 15" (2017) Law Society of Upper Canada, Special Lectures 2017: Canada at 150: The Charter and the Constitution 547 at 548–50. Joshua Sealy-Harrington, in commenting on the race evasiveness of the Supreme Court's equality jurisprudence, argues that the substantive equality framework first provided by Andrews and now enhanced by Fraser is capable of commanding required structural changes in Canadian society, and needs to be put to use at strategic sites of systemic disparity and persisting legacies of oppression and dispossession: "The Charter of Whites: Systemic Racism and Critical Race Equality in Canada" in Emmett Macfarlane & Kate Puddister, eds, The Constitution Act, 1982: 40 Years Later (forthcoming). Do you think that Indigenous individuals and communities have been more successful in bringing claims under s 35 than s 15, and, if so, why that might be?

The examples of the overincarceration of racialized individuals and of youth-led climate change litigation (in Note 8 below) raise the issue of positive rights and hint at the extent of positive state action that might be required to create substantive equality. The response of a significant minority of the Supreme Court to the possibility of such far-reaching consequences is evident in, for example, Brown and Rowe JJ's "floodgates" argument in Fraser:

[144] The circumstances here are extraordinary, in that it is acknowledged that Parliament was not obliged to enact the Plan ... nor is it barred from repealing it. ... But is not the next extension of our colleague's line of reasoning that governments (federal and provincial) have a positive duty under s. 15(1) to initiate measures that will remove all effects of historic disadvantage, and that they are constitutionally barred from repealing or even amending such measures? These are profoundly complex matters of public policy that no Canadian court is institutionally competent to deal with.

The views of Côté, Brown, and Rowe JJ on the nature of equality rights are perhaps most explicit in their dissent in Alliance, one of the two 2018 pay equity cases:

[65] At issue in this appeal is the nature of Charter rights. Charter rights are fundamentally negative in that they preclude the state from acting in ways that would impair them. They do not place the government under an obligation to act in order to obtain specific societal results such as the total and definitive eradication of gender-based pay inequities in private sector enterprises. An interpretation of the Charter that imposed a positive obligation such as that would change its nature and confer on the courts the unusual responsibility of overseeing compliance with it. Yet that is the consequence of our colleague's interpretation. Although government policies or legislation respecting human rights may be designed to eliminate pay inequities in private sector enterprises, there is no constitutional obligation to that effect: Auton (Guardian ad litem of) v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2004 SCC 78, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 657, at para. 41.

As Joshua Sealy-Harrington summarizes in "The Alchemy of Equality Rights" (2021) 30.2 Const Forum Const 53 at 67, Brown and Rowe JJ reason that government initiatives are immune from Charter scrutiny, seemingly, if they do any of the following: (1) intend to ameliorate; (2) involve policy; (3) take incremental steps; (4) target "private" rather than "public" discrimination; (5) lack demonstrated causation; or (6) lack the evils of "arbitrariness," "unfairness," or "wrongful[ness].

And, as he concludes, although Abella J critiques Brown and Rowe JJ's judgment for its formalism and they critique hers for indeterminacy, "their material disagreement is ideological" (at 73).

For further commentary on social and economic rights as equality rights, see, for example, David A Green & Jonathan R Kesselman, eds, Dimensions of Inequality in Canada (Vancouver: UBC Press, 2006); Margot Young, Susan B Boyd, Gwen Brodsky & Shelagh Day, eds, Poverty: Rights, Social Citizenship, and Legal Activism (Vancouver: UBC Press, 2007); Cara Wilkie & Meryl Zisman Gary, "Positive and Negative Rights Under the Charter: Closing the Divide to Advance Equality" (2011) 30 Windsor Rev Legal Soc Issues 37; Jennie Abell, "Poverty and Social Justice at the Supreme Court During the McLachlin Years: Slipsliding Away" in Sandra Rogers & Sheila McIntyre, eds, The Supreme Court of Canada and Social Justice: Commitment, Retrenchment or Retreat (Toronto: LexisNexis Canada, 2010) at 257.

The stakes in the positive versus negative equality rights debate—and in the related controversies over judicial activism, incrementalism, institutional competence, and causation—are high. With Wagner CJ and Moldaver J joining frequent dissenters Brown and Rowe JJ in R v CP (discussed in Note 2 following Fraser in Section II.A) and examining the impugned law from the perspective of those other than the claimant, bringing the balancing of multiple interests into s 15(1) when determining if there was a rights violation, it seems that debate about the fundamental meaning and nature of the Charter's equality guarantee might continue for some time. The claims in the pay equity cases and Fraser did not involve much, if any, call on the public purse. If future claims do make significant redistributive demands, we should expect them to evoke even more resistance. For commentary on the "unresolved fractures at the foundation of equality rights jurisprudence that threaten its stability going forward," see Fay Faraday, "One Step Forward, Two Steps Back? Substantive Equality, Systemic Discrimination and Pay Equity at the Supreme Court of Canada," cited above, at 302. What are the proper roles of courts and legislative bodies in responding to claims of positive rights and systemic inequality?

8. Five youth-led climate change lawsuits were before Canadian courts in early 2021 and included adverse effects discrimination claims that the impugned law or policies infringe the rights of youth and future generations guaranteed by s 15(1) of the Charter:

Government decisions allow and enable GHG emissions to continue at a rate that causes largely irreversible warming. This warming creates a cascade of serious social, economic, and health consequences of both a physical and mental nature. These consequences are (and will continue to be) disproportionately borne by younger and future generations, both because of the length of time they will live their lives on an impacted planet and, in the case of children, because of their unique vulnerabilities to some of the impacts.

See Nathalie J Chalifour, Jessica Earle & Laura Macintyre, "Coming of Age in a Warming World: The Charter's Section 15(1) Equality Guarantee and Youth-Led Climate Litigation" (2021) 17:1 JL & Equality 1 at 5.

To date, the major stumbling block for youth climate change claims has been the issue of justiciability, an issue which is explored in detail by Chalifour, Earle, and Macintyre. Only Environnement Jeunesse v Canada (AG), 2019 QCCS 2885 and Mathur v Ontario, 2020 ONSC 6918 initially survived government motions to strike the cases on the basis they were not justiciable. In Mathur, Brown J stated that a case for finding a positive obligation on the government could be made out in the context of climate change (at paras 228, 233, 234). However, although Environnement Jeunesse failed in the lower court on the basis that the proposed class defined by age 35 was arbitrary and not on the basis that the government refused to act, the appeal was dismissed on the basis the claim was not justiciable: Environnement Jeunesse c Procureur général du Canada, 2021 QCCA 1871. The work of Chalifour, Earle, and Macintyre indicates that the breadth or narrowness of the claims and the specificity of the impugned law and policies are two key factors in whether claims survive government charges of non-justiciability. In other words, did the claims challenge the federal government's overall approach to climate policy and fail to identify any specific government conduct, or did they target policy decisions that had been translated into law and were related to actions such as the setting of targets? These claims also illustrate the difficulty of challenging executive action on the part of government under s 15(1). For a discussion of justiciability, see the note following the Quebec Secession Reference, [\[1998\] 2 SCR 217, 1998 CanLII 793](#) in Chapter 2, Judicial Review and Constitutional Interpretation.

Justiciability issues can arise when s 15(1) claims challenge governments' failure to act—the omission or absence of laws or other state action—rather than specific statutes or regulations, and these youth climate change actions primarily focus on government inaction. Chalifour, Earle, and Macintyre classify the action/inaction spectrum as including claims challenging specific and direct state action at one end, claims alleging inadequate action in the middle, and claims based on the government's complete failure to act at the other end (at 41). As they point out, a successful claim based on a government failure to act would correspond to imposing a positive duty to act on the government and, as explored in Note 6 above, Canadian courts have been reluctant to impose positive duties in the context of s 15 claims.

Basing a s 15(1) claim on the failure of the government to act is supported by the Supreme Court's decision in Vriend; see above in this section. For example, Cory J rejected the argument that the Alberta legislature's "silence" was "neutral," holding (at para 57) that questions which raise the issue of neutrality can only be dealt with in the context of the s. 15 analysis itself [because] [u]nless that analysis is undertaken, it is impossible to say whether the omission is indeed neutral or not.

It is especially important that neutrality—i.e., no impact—not be assumed when the claim is a s 15(1) claim of adverse effects discrimination. That type of claim can only be seen in its impact.

Not only must the government's failure to act be shown to be a distinction that has adverse effects, but that distinction must be based on protected grounds. Youth-led climate change litigation raises unique issues with respect to the way the enumerated ground of age is used to demarcate a cohort that has been adversely affected by government inaction, and in raising "future generations" as a potential analogous ground. In addition, on the second step of the Fraser test, the claimants would have to show the disproportionate impact of the government's conduct, based on an argument that the burdens imposed by the government's inaction perpetuate or exacerbate young people's pre-existing disadvantage (for example, their inability to vote) (Chalifour, Earle, and Macintyre at 70). Does climate change law or policy have adverse impacts on other groups or grounds that could be challenged under s 15(1)?

C. GROUNDS OF DISCRIMINATION AND INTERSECTIONALITY

A crucial part of the s 15(1) analysis is to determine whether the differential treatment at issue is related to a personal characteristic that is either enumerated in s 15(1) or analogous to those grounds that are listed. This "grounds" stage of analysis has typically occurred as part of the first step of the test for discrimination, although during the era of the Law test, the grounds issue was a separate second step.

As set out in Section II.A, in Andrews, the Supreme Court found that the role of s 15 was to combat discrimination that was based on enumerated or analogous grounds, noting the connection between these grounds and prejudice or disadvantage (at 181). The Andrews Court rejected the view that s 15 should protect individuals from all laws that draw distinctions based on any personal characteristics, with the justification of all those distinctions to be assessed under s 1.

A focus on grounds has been criticized for failing to account for people's complex experiences of discrimination, and for ignoring the differences in discrimination experienced by, and within, the groups encompassed by the different grounds. This critique raises the issue of intersectionality, a term coined by Kimberlé Crenshaw to describe the idea that individuals and groups may experience inequality that is related to more than one aspect of their identity (or to more than one form of oppression), which may intersect in compounding and unique ways. Crenshaw's example was of Black women in the workplace who experienced systemic inequality based on the intersection of racism and sexism. One of her key points was that courts and other decision-makers have difficulty in seeing discrimination and inequality at the intersection of different grounds. As we will review in this section, the Supreme Court has not yet formally recognized intersecting grounds of discrimination under s 15, although Abella J did so informally in Fraser (at para 116). Intersectionality is also related to anti-essentialism and the importance of seeing the members of particular groups (such as women) in light of diverse identities and forms of oppression. For further discussion, see Kimberlé Crenshaw, "Demarginalizing the Intersection of Race and Sex: A Black Feminist Critique of Antidiscrimination Doctrine, Feminist Theory, and Antiracist Politics" [1989] U Chicago Legal F 139; Nitya Iyer, "Categorical Denials: Equality Rights and the Shaping of Social Identity" (1993) 19 Queen's LJ 179; Grace Ajele & Jena McGill, Intersectionality in Law and Legal Contexts (Toronto: Women's Legal Education and Action Fund, 2020); Colleen Sheppard, "Grounds of Discrimination: Towards an Inclusive and Contextual Approach" (2001) 80 Can Bar Rev 893.

In the 1995 trilogy—Miron, Egan, and Thibaudeau, discussed above in Section II.A, Note 6 following Andrews—L'Heureux-Dubé J took the position that the courts could better analyze people's experiences of discrimination if they focused on the comparative impact of laws on different groups rather than on the basis of grounds. Others, such as Dianne Pothier, defended the role of grounds in focusing attention on the historical and social reality of unequal power relations. While the Supreme Court has generally maintained its focus on the need to show differential treatment or impact based on an enumerated or analogous ground under s 15, it has sometimes used the language of "groups" rather than grounds. The Court has also differed in its approach to the issue of how analogous grounds should be identified, both over time and in particular cases. Pothier ties these points together in the following excerpt.

Dianne Pothier, "Connecting Grounds of Discrimination to Real People's Real Experiences"

(2001) 13 CJWL 37 at 40-41, 57-58

Justice L'Heureux-Dubé's concern, which was expressed in Egan, that a focus on grounds risks "being distanced and desensitised from real people's real experiences" assumes that grounds are disconnected from real people's real experiences. In contrast, I would contend ... that grounds are an important means of providing the necessary history and context of discrimination. This point is relevant with respect to both long-established and newly recognized grounds of discrimination. When, in Egan, Justice Sopinka described the recognition of same-sex relationships as "novel," thereby justifying non-intervention by the Court, he was indeed "distanced and desensitised from real people's real experiences." However, the distance and insensitivity of his judgment is not because sexual orientation is disconnected from the lives of lesbians and gay men. Rather, it reflects the fact that sexual orientation has for so long been either constrained by, or invisible to, the law.

Grounds of discrimination are not a purely legal construct. They reflect a political and social reality to which the law has, belatedly, given recognition. Discrimination was a fact of life long before the law decided that it should intervene to prohibit it. It is the grounds of discrimination that separate people who experience discrimination from those who do not. The focus on why something counts as a ground of discrimination should be a constant reminder of why discrimination is, legislatively and/or constitutionally, prohibited. Without a thorough understanding of the pertinent ground or grounds of discrimination, the discrimination analysis will be inadequate.

Grounds of discrimination are obviously only one element of the analysis. Although, in theory, it would be possible to be attentive to the dynamics of such phenomena as racism and sexism without making grounds a separate element of analysis, in practice, it is attention to grounds that can help ensure that the history and context of discrimination do not simply fade into the background. Grounds of discrimination, as a legal construct, are markers of the dynamics of power. The exercise of identifying new analogous grounds forces an inquiry into the complexities of the dynamics of power. Although there are certain commonalities across different kinds of discrimination, discrimination operates in different ways in the context of different grounds of discrimination. It is through an understanding of the different ways in which discrimination operates that a more complex and comprehensive appreciation of equality can emerge.

In Andrews, the question of whether a personal characteristic such as citizenship should be recognized as an analogous ground for the purposes of s 15 was framed differently by different members of the Court. Justice McIntyre focused on non-citizens as a "discrete and insular minority" coming within the protection of s 15 (at 183). Justice La Forest argued that what makes a ground analogous is that it relates to a personal characteristic that is "not within the control of the individual and, in this sense, is immutable," as well as a relative lack of power politically, noting the connection between citizenship, race, and national or ethnic origin (at 195). Justice Wilson also focused on non-citizens as "a group lacking in political power and as such vulnerable to having their interests overlooked and their rights to equal concern and respect violated" (at 152). She noted that "the range of discrete and insular minorities has changed and will continue to change with changing political and social circumstances," in keeping with the purpose of s 15 in ensuring "the 'unremitting protection' of equality rights in the years to come" (at 152-53, quoting Hunter v Southam Inc, [1984] 2 SCR 145 at 155, 1984 CanLII 33).

Since Andrews, the Court has recognized only three more analogous grounds of discrimination. As noted in Section II.A, Note 6 following Andrews, sexual orientation was unanimously accepted as an analogous ground in Egan, which involved the exclusion of same-sex spouses from benefits under the federal Old Age Security Act, RSC 1985, c O-9. Justice La Forest, writing for four members of the Court, stated (at 528) that sexual orientation is a deeply personal characteristic that is either unchangeable or changeable only at unacceptable personal costs, and so falls within the ambit of s 15 protection as being analogous to the enumerated grounds.

However, this group of four found that there was no discrimination at play in targeting a government benefit at heterosexual married and common law couples given the "biological and social realities that underlie the traditional marriage" (at 536). Justice Cory, writing for another four members of the Court, focused on the relationship between sexual orientation and stereotyping, historical disadvantage, and vulnerability to political and social prejudice. Noting that gays and lesbians had long been subject to harassment, violence, discrimination, and stigmatization, he concluded that they "form an identifiable minority who have suffered and continue to suffer serious social, political and economic disadvantage" (at 602). While a majority of the Court in Egan found that the law in question was discriminatory, Sopinka J provided a swing vote and upheld the law under s 1, based on the "novel" nature of the claim (as discussed by Pothier in the excerpt above).

Later rulings have been more favourable for claimants relying on discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation to ground violations of s 15(1). See, for example, two of the cases excerpted in Section II.B—Vriend (omission of sexual orientation from human rights legislation found to violate s 15(1)) and M v H (exclusion of members of same-sex couples from the definition of spouse in spousal support legislation found to violate s 15(1))—as well as Little Sisters Book and Art Emporium v Canada (Minister of Justice), 2000 SCC 69 (administration of customs rules regarding obscene publications as applied to gay and lesbian erotica found to violate s 15(1)); Canada (AG) v Hislop, 2007 SCC 10 (exclusion of some same-sex partners from retroactive survivors benefits under the Canada Pension Plan found to violate s 15(1)); and Reference re Same-Sex Marriage, 2004 SCC 79 (extending the right to civil marriage to same-sex couples found to be consistent with s 15 equality rights). Would you categorize these cases as claims of formal or substantive equality? Of recognition or of redistribution? Were there costs associated with implementing these rulings, and who would pay? To what extent might these characterizations have affected the Court's decisions?

In Miron v Trudel, discussed in Section II.A, Note 6 following Andrews, a 5–4 majority of the Court recognized marital status as an analogous argument under s 15. Justice McLachlin, writing for four members of the majority, examined a number of factors in assessing the analogous ground issue. First, she found that marital status touches matters that are related to "the essential dignity and worth of the individual"—namely, "the individual's freedom to live life with the mate of one's choice in the fashion of one's choice" (at para 151). Second, she noted that marital status is associated with patterns of historical disadvantage and prejudice. Third, while marital status may not be immutable in a strong sense, it is a status over which "the individual exercises limited but not exclusive control" (at para 153). Justice McLachlin concluded that the exclusion of unmarried partners from the definition of spouse in insurance legislation was discriminatory because it denied them equal benefits solely on the basis of their marital status. Writing for four dissenting members of the Court, Gonthier J focused on the importance of marriage as a social institution. In his analysis, analogous grounds are irrelevant personal characteristics' associated with historical disadvantage and stereotyping. He concluded that marital status may be an analogous ground in some circumstances, but not merely where particular benefits are attached to marriage without more. He also argued that marital status is a choice, which supported its relevance to the benefits provided by the impugned law (at paras 48-49).

Finally, in Corbiere, the Court recognized "Aboriginality-residence"—the status of being an off-reserve member of a First Nation regulated as an "Indian" band by the Indian Act—as an analogous ground of discrimination. While the Court agreed on this recognition, the following excerpt shows how the majority and concurring members of the Court differed in their approach to analogous grounds. Corbiere was decided shortly after Law and used the Law approach to s 15(1).

Corbiere v Canada (Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs)

[1999] 2 SCR 203, 1999 CanLII 687

[Section 77(1) of the Indian Act, RSC 1985, c I-5 required band members to be "ordinarily resident" on their reserve in order to be eligible to vote in band elections. Non-resident band members brought a challenge under s 15(1), alleging that residence was an inappropriate personal characteristic on which to deprive them of a voice in decisions that could deeply affect them—for instance, the sale of band-owned land or the expenditure of band-controlled monies. The entire Court agreed that the impugned provision violated s 15(1), and excerpted below are the portions of the two judgments that deal with the issue of analogous grounds.]

McLACHLIN and BASTARACHE JJ (Lamer CJ and Cory and Major JJ concurring):

[3] The narrow issue raised in this appeal is whether the exclusion of off-reserve members of an Indian band from the right to vote in band elections pursuant to s. 77(1) of the Indian Act, RSC 1985, c. I-5, is inconsistent with s. 15(1). ...

[6] We agree with L'Heureux-Dubé J that Aboriginality-residence (off-reserve band member status) constitutes a ground of discrimination analogous to the enumerated grounds. However, we wish to comment on two matters: (1) the suggestion by some that the same ground may or may not be analogous depending on the circumstances; and (2) the criteria that identify an analogous ground.

[7] The enumerated grounds function as legislative markers of suspect grounds associated with stereotypical, discriminatory decision making. They are a legal expression of a general characteristic, not a contextual, fact-based conclusion about whether discrimination exists in a particular case. As such, the enumerated grounds must be distinguished from a finding that discrimination exists in a particular case. Since the enumerated grounds are only indicators of suspect grounds of distinction, it follows that decisions on these grounds are not always discriminatory; if this were otherwise, it would be unnecessary to proceed to the separate examination of discrimination

[8] The same applies to the grounds recognized by the courts as "analogous" to the grounds enumerated in s. 15. To say that a ground of distinction is an analogous ground is merely to identify a type of decision making that is suspect because it often leads to discrimination and denial of substantive equality. Like distinctions made on enumerated grounds, distinctions made on analogous grounds may well not be discriminatory. But this does not mean that they are not analogous grounds or that they are analogous grounds only in some circumstances. Just as we do not speak of enumerated grounds existing in one circumstance and not another, we should not speak of analogous grounds existing in one circumstance and not another. The enumerated and analogous grounds stand as constant markers of suspect decision making or potential discrimination. What varies is whether they amount to discrimination in the particular circumstances of the case.

[9] We therefore disagree with the view that a marker of discrimination can change from case to case, depending on the government action challenged. ... Sex will always be a ground, although sex-based legislative distinctions may not always be discriminatory. To be sure, R. v. Turpin, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1296, suggested that residence might be an analogous ground in certain contexts. But in view of the synthesis of previous cases suggested in Law, supra, it is more likely that today the same result, dismissal of the claim, would be achieved either by finding no analogous ground or no discrimination in fact going to essential human dignity.

[10] If it is the intention of L'Heureux-Dubé J's reasons to affirm contextual dependency of the enumerated and analogous grounds, we must respectfully disagree. If "Aboriginality-residence" is to be an analogous ground (and we agree with L'Heureux-Dubé J that it should), then it must always stand as a constant marker of potential legislative discrimination, whether the challenge is to a governmental tax credit, a voting right, or a pension scheme. This established, the analysis moves to the third stage: whether the distinction amounts, in purpose or effect, to discrimination on the facts of the case.

[11] Maintaining the distinction ... between the enumerated or analogous ground analysis and the ... contextual discrimination analysis, offers several advantages. Both stages are concerned with discrimination and the violation of the presumption of the equal dignity and worth of every human being. But they approach it from different perspectives. The analogous grounds serve as jurisprudential markers for suspect distinctions. They function conceptually to identify the sorts of claims that properly fall under s. 15. By screening out other cases, they avoid trivializing the s. 15 equality guarantee and promote the efficient use of judicial resources. And they permit the development over time of a conceptual jurisprudence of the sorts of distinctions that fall under the s. 15 guarantee, without foreclosing new cases of discrimination. A distinction on an enumerated or analogous ground established, the contextual and fact-specific inquiry proceeds to whether the distinction amounts to discrimination in the context of the particular case.

[13] What then are the criteria by which we identify a ground of distinction as analogous? The obvious answer is that we look for grounds of distinction that are analogous or like the grounds enumerated in s. 15—race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age, or mental or physical disability. It seems to us that what these grounds have in common is the fact that they often serve as the basis for stereotypical decisions made not on the basis of merit but on the basis of a personal characteristic that is immutable or changeable only at unacceptable cost to personal identity. This suggests that the thrust of identification of analogous grounds at the second stage of the Law analysis is to reveal grounds based on characteristics that we cannot change or that the government has no legitimate interest in expecting us to change to receive equal treatment under the law. To put it another way, s. 15 targets the denial of equal treatment on grounds that are actually immutable, like race, or constructively immutable, like religion. Other factors identified in the cases as associated with the enumerated and analogous grounds, like the fact that the decision adversely impacts on a discrete and insular minority or a group that has been historically discriminated against, may be seen to flow from the central concept of immutable or constructively immutable personal characteristics, which too often have served as illegitimate and demeaning proxies for merit-based decision making.

[14] ... L'Heureux-Dubé J's discussion makes clear that the distinction goes to a personal characteristic essential to a band member's personal identity, which is no less constructively immutable than religion or citizenship. Off-reserve Aboriginal band members can change their status to on-reserve band members only at great cost, if at all.

[15] Two brief comments on this new analogous ground are warranted. First, reserve status should not be confused with residence. The ordinary "residence" decisions faced by the average Canadians should not be confused with the profound decisions Aboriginal band members make to live on or off their reserves, assuming choice is possible. The reality of their situation is unique and complex. Thus no new water is charted, in the sense of finding residence, in the generalized abstract, to be an analogous ground. Second, we note that the analogous ground of off-reserve status or Aboriginality-residence is limited to a subset of the Canadian population, while s. 15 is directed to everyone. In our view, this is no impediment to its inclusion as an analogous ground under s. 15. Its demographic limitation is no different, for example, from pregnancy, which is a distinct, but fundamentally inter-related form of discrimination from gender. "Embedded" analogous grounds may be necessary to permit meaningful consideration of intra-group discrimination.

L'HEUREUX-DUBÉ J (Gonthier, Iacobucci, and Binnie JJ concurring):

[After determining that the legislation imposed differential treatment, L'Heureux-Dubé J turned to the issue of analogous grounds.]

[59] ... The analogous grounds inquiry, like the other ... stages of analysis, must be undertaken in a purposive and contextual manner The "nature and situation of the individual or group at issue, and the social, political, and legal history of Canadian society's treatment of that group" must be considered

[60] Various contextual factors have been recognized in the case law that may demonstrate that the trait or combination of traits by which the claimants are defined has discriminatory potential. An analogous ground may be shown by the fundamental nature of the characteristic: whether from the perspective of a reasonable person in the position of the claimant, it is important to their identity, personhood, or belonging. The fact that a characteristic is immutable, difficult to change, or changeable only at unacceptable personal cost may also lead to its recognition as an analogous ground: Miron v. Trudel, [1995] 2 S.C.R. 418 at para. 148; Vriend v. Alberta, [1998] 1 S.C.R. 493, at para. 90. It is also central to the analysis if those defined by the characteristic are lacking in political power, disadvantaged, or vulnerable to becoming disadvantaged or having their interests overlooked: Andrews, supra, at p. 152; Law, supra, at para. 29. Another indicator is whether the ground is included in federal and provincial human rights codes: Miron, supra, at para. 148. Other criteria, of course, may also be considered in subsequent cases, and none of the above indicators are necessary for the recognition of an analogous ground or combination of grounds: Miron, supra, at para. 149.

[61] I should also note that if indicia of an analogous ground are not present in general, or among a certain group in Canadian society, they may nevertheless be present in another social or legislative context, within a different group in Canadian society, or in a given geographic area, to give only a few examples. Here, to illustrate, the nature of the decisions band members make about whether to live on or off a reserve are different from those made by many other Canadians in relation to their place of residence. So are other factors related to the analogous grounds analysis that still affect them. The [grounds] stage must therefore be flexible enough to adapt to stereotyping, prejudice, or denials of human dignity and worth that might occur in specific ways for specific groups of people, to recognize that personal characteristics may overlap or intersect (such as race, band membership, and place of residence in this case), and to reflect changing social phenomena or new or different forms of stereotyping or prejudice. ...

[62] Here, several factors lead to the conclusion that recognizing off-reserve band member status as an analogous ground would accord with the purposes of s. 15(1). From the perspective of off-reserve band members, the choice of whether to live on- or off-reserve, if it is available to them, is an important one to their identity and personhood, and is therefore fundamental. It involves choosing whether to live with other members of the band to which they belong, or apart from them. It relates to a community and land that have particular social and cultural significance to many or most band members. Also critical is the fact that as discussed below during the third stage of analysis, band members living off-reserve have generally experienced disadvantage, stereotyping, and prejudice, and form part of a "discrete and insular minority" defined by race and place of residence. In addition, because of the lack of opportunities and housing on many reserves, and the fact that the Indian Act's rules formerly removed band membership from various categories of band members, residence off the reserve has often been forced upon them, or constitutes a choice made reluctantly or at high personal cost. For these reasons, the second stage of analysis has been satisfied, and "off-reserve band member status" is an analogous ground. It will hereafter be recognized as an analogous ground in any future case involving this combination of traits. I note that in making this determination, I make no findings about "residence" as an analogous ground in contexts other than as it affects band members who do not live on the reserve of the band to which they belong.

[All members of the Court agreed that the distinction drawn by s 77(1) of the Indian Act discriminated against off-reserve band members, perpetuated their historical disadvantage, and treated them as less worthy and deserving than other band members.

The Court also agreed that the violation of s 15(1) could not be justified under s 1. While the restriction on voting was rationally connected to the objective of giving a voice in the affairs of the band only to the persons most directly affected by the band council's decisions, it was not minimally impairing in light of the complete denial of voting rights to off-reserve band members. As a remedy, the words "and is ordinarily resident on the reserve" were struck from the statute, but the order was delayed for 18 months to allow the government to conduct extensive consultations with the affected parties and "balance the affected interests in a manner that respects Aboriginal rights and all band members' equality interests" (at para 119).]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In Corbiere, McLachlin and Bastarache JJ took issue with L'Heureux-Dubé J on whether the recognition of a personal characteristic as an analogous ground should be context-specific. Justices McLachlin and Bastarache emphasized that once a personal characteristic is recognized as an analogous ground, it will be seen as a "constant marker" of discrimination across different kinds of government actions (at paras 8-9). Justice L'Heureux-Dubé suggested that whether a ground is analogous could depend on the social, legislative, or geographic context, also noting that personal characteristics could overlap and intersect (at para 61). Her illustration of this point was that residence could be seen as an analogous ground for First Nations band members even if residence was not more broadly recognized as an analogous ground, and she went on to say that "off-reserve band member status ... will hereafter be recognized as an analogous ground in any future case involving this combination of traits" (at para 62). How different do you think these two approaches are on the issue of whether the approach to analogous grounds should be contextual? What is the difference between an "embedded ground" as described by McLachlin and Bastarache JJ and the contextual approach of L'Heureux-Dubé J?

Since Corbiere, the Court has reiterated the view that new analogous grounds are permanent markers of discrimination, but it has not found any new analogous grounds: see, for example, Lavoie v Canada, 2002 SCC 23 at para 41 (Bastarache J on citizenship: "once a ground is found to be analogous, it is permanently enrolled as analogous for other cases"). The Court has not revisited its approach to analogous grounds since Corbiere.

2. In Corbiere, McLachlin and Bastarache JJ argued that the common feature of the enumerated grounds should also define the analogous grounds—and in their opinion, that was actual or constructive immutability. In their view, analogous grounds are personal characteristics "that we cannot change or that the government has no legitimate interest in expecting us to change to receive equal treatment under the law," and other factors identified in the case law "may be seen to flow from the central concept of immutable or constructively immutable personal characteristics" (at para 13). In contrast, L'Heureux-Dubé J stated that a range of factors, none of them necessary, should be considered when determining whether a personal characteristic should be recognized as an analogous ground. In this respect, L'Heureux-Dubé J was following the approach articulated by McLachlin J in Miron above. What are the implications of the apparent shift from Miron to Corbiere from a broader, more flexible inquiry to one that focuses on the single criterion of actual or constructive immutability?

For academic commentary on this issue, see Joshua Sealy-Harrington, "Assessing Analogous Grounds: The Doctrinal and Normative Superiority of a Multi-Variable Approach" (2013) 10 JL & Equality 37 (advocating a multi-factor approach to grounds); Jessica Eisen, "Grounding Equality in Social Relations: Suspect Classification, Analogous Grounds, and Relational Theory" (2017) 42:2 Queen's LJ 41 (advocating a relational approach to grounds).

3. Another key point in Corbiere was that the "grounds" and "discrimination" stages of analysis under s 15(1) must be kept separate and that finding a new analogous ground does not automatically lead to finding a violation of s 15(1) (McLachlin and Bastarache JJ at paras 11-12). This point has been reiterated in different ways in subsequent cases. For example, in Quebec (AG) v A, Abella J critiqued LeBel J's argument that marital status is a choice that should influence the finding of discrimination (at paras 335-36), yet she suggested that choice "may be an important factor in determining whether a ground of discrimination qualifies as an analogous ground" (at para 343). Do you agree that "choice" should be relevant in determining whether a particular status or other personal characteristic is an analogous ground? Would your answer differ if immutability was only one of several factors in assessing analogous grounds, as L'Heureux-Dubé J advocated in Corbiere? How does Abella J's handling of choice in Quebec v A align with her treatment of choice in Fraser, excerpted in Section II.A? For further discussion of the role of choice under s 15(1), see Section II.A, Note 4 following Fraser.

4. The Supreme Court has decided a number of s 15(1) claims involving Indigenous persons and groups, each raising different types of discrimination and different articulations of the grounds at play. Corbiere dealt with the voting rights of band members that differed depending on whether they lived on or off reserve. Justice L'Heureux Dubé also introduced an element of intersectionality into the analysis by noting (at para 72) that Aboriginal women, who can be said to be doubly disadvantaged on the basis of both sex and race, are among those particularly affected by legislation relating to off-reserve band members, because of their history and circumstances in Canadian and Aboriginal society.

This point references the fact that many First Nations women and their descendants lost their status and/or their right to reside on-reserve under the Indian Act when they married non-Indian men or men from different Nations. See the discussion of Attorney General of Canada v Lavell, [1974] SCR 1349, 1973 CanLII 175 in Chapter 15. In another case, Native Women's Association of Canada v Canada, [1994] 3 SCR 627, 1994 CanLII 27 (NWAC), the Court considered a Charter challenge to the federal government's failure to provide funding for an Indigenous women's group to allow their participation in constitutional talks alongside a number of other Indigenous organizations that were alleged to be male-dominated. Finding a lack of an evidentiary basis for NWAC's arguments, the Court dismissed their claim that the failure to provide funding violated s 15 and that it violated their equal right to freedom of expression, contrary to s 2(b) and s 28 of the Charter. How would you frame the grounds of discrimination at play in NWAC's claim, and how would you frame their arguments in intersectional terms? For a shadow judgment in this case on behalf of the Women's Court of Canada, see Mary Eberts, Sharon McIvor & Teressa Nahane, "Native Women's Association of Canada v Canada" (2006) 18:1 CJWL 67.

In Kapp, discussed in Section II.A, Note 9 following Andrews, and excerpted in Section III, the Court concluded without discussion that a 24-hour priority fishing license conferred on several First Nations amounted to differential treatment on the basis of race (at para 56). Would it have been preferable for the Court to recognize Aboriginality or Indigeneity as an analogous ground? For a critical analysis of the Court's finding of race-based discrimination in Kapp, see Sonia Lawrence's judgment for the Women's Court of Canada, "R v Kapp" (2018) 30:2 CJWL 268.

See also Ermineskin Indian Band and Nation v Canada, 2009 SCC 9 (finding a distinction between "Indians and non-Indians" without elaborating on the relevant ground because the distinction was found to be non-discriminatory); Lovelace v Ontario, 2000 SCC 37 (involving benefits that were differentially available to First Nations communities depending on whether they were bands registered under the Indian Act, where the Court found that it was unnecessary to decide if the differential treatment was based on an enumerated or analogous ground because there was no discrimination in the circumstances of the case); Alberta (Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development) v Cunningham, 2011 SCC 37 (assuming that registration as a "status Indian" constituted an analogous ground, but explicitly refraining from deciding the issue given the Court's finding that the impugned law was protected by s 15(2), as further discussed in Section III). What is the best way to frame the relevant grounds in these cases so that they would qualify as analogous grounds?

In Taypotat, discussed above in Section II.A, Note 12 following Andrews, the Court considered whether an educational requirement to run for the position of Chief or Band Councillor of a First Nation in Saskatchewan violated s 15(1). Taypotat initially argued that "educational attainment is analogous to race and age" (at para 10), and his claim was dismissed by the Federal Court for lack of evidence to support the argument that education level should be recognized as an analogous ground. The Federal Court of Appeal treated the educational requirement as a facially neutral rule that had an adverse impact on the basis of age and "Aboriginality-residence" based on statistical evidence of the lower education levels of older Indigenous persons and those living on First Nation reserves. On appeal to the Supreme Court, Abella J explicitly declined to apply the ground found to be analogous in Corbiere, "Aboriginality-residence," because Corbiere dealt with the unique disadvantages of persons residing "off-reserve" whereas Taypotat dealt with "on-reserve residence," about which there was a lack of evidence (at para 26). She also declined to look at the intersection between on-reserve residence, age, and status as a residential school survivor. For commentary, see Jonnette Watson Hamilton & Jennifer Koshan, "Kahkewistahaw First Nation v Taypotat: An Arbitrary Approach to Discrimination" (2016) 76 SCLR (2d) 243. See also R v Kokopenace, 2015 SCC 28, where the accused argued that the lack of jury representativeness for Indigenous persons living on reserve violated s 15(1), but the Court did not consider the relevant ground because it found the accused had not “clearly articulated a disadvantage” related to the makeup of his jury and he did not have standing to argue on behalf of on-reserve residents who were potential jurors (at para 128). Should the analogous ground of “Aboriginality-residence” be extended to include residence on reserve based on the Corbiere tests? Would status as a residential school survivor meet the current test for analogous grounds?

5. In Fraser (excerpted above in Section II.A), the Court declined to recognize family or parental status as an analogous ground. For the majority, Abella J found that “a robust intersectional analysis of gender and parenting … can be carried out under the enumerated ground of sex,” so it was not necessary to consider family or parental status (at para 116). The federal government had conceded that parental status, a narrower subset of family status, could qualify as an analogous ground for the purposes of the claim. However, Abella J stated that she was “uncomfortable with this Court accepting a new analogous ground as a one-off” (at para 115). Although she did not cite Corbiere, her reasoning on this point is consistent with the Court’s holding in that case that grounds are constant markers of discrimination once they are recognized as analogous. Justice Abella also found that Fraser was not an appropriate case to consider a new analogous ground due to a lack of submissions and evidentiary record on parental or family status.

While they did not agree with the majority that the RCMP pension plan violated s 15(1) on the basis of sex, Brown, Rowe, and Côté JJ agreed that there was insufficient evidence and submissions to evaluate the analogous grounds issue. What would a consideration of family or parental status have added to the Court’s analysis in Fraser? Do you agree with Abella J that the ground of sex can sufficiently incorporate an intersectional analysis of caregiving responsibilities? For commentary, see Jennifer Koshan, “Intersections and Roads Untravelled: Sex and Family Status in Fraser v Canada” (2021) 30:2 Const Forum Const 29. See also Elaine Craig, “Family as Status in Doe v Canada: Constituting Family Under Section 15 of the Charter” (2007) 20 NJCL 197 (arguing that family status can be a preferable [or additional] ground to sexual orientation in cases involving same sex partners because of its potential to queer notions of family and to avoid heterosexist assumptions about sexual identity).

For other cases considering aspects of family status as analogous grounds, see Thibaudeau v Canada, [1995] 2 SCR 627, 1995 CanLII 99, McLachlin J, dissenting (separated or divorced custodial parenthood an analogous ground); Schachter v Canada, [1992] 2 SCR 679, 1992 CanLII 74 (discrimination based on adoptive parent status conceded by government); Pratten v British Columbia (AG), 2011 BCSC 656 (manner of conception an analogous ground; differential treatment of adoptees and the offspring of donor insemination violates s 15), rev’d on other grounds, 2012 BCCA 480, leave to appeal to SCC dismissed, 2013 CanLII 30404, [2013] SCCA No 36 (QL). Do these aspects of family status meet the Corbiere tests for analogous grounds? Why might the Supreme Court be reluctant to consider family status as an analogous ground?

6. Sex is an enumerated ground, but as noted in Section II.A, a s 15 claim of sex discrimination by women was not successful at the Supreme Court until the 2018 pay equity cases. The Court found in favour of a man’s claim of sex discrimination long before it accepted a claim by women. In Trociuk v British Columbia (AG), 2003 SCC 34, the Court ruled that limits on unmarried fathers’ rights to name their children constituted sex discrimination against men, contrary to s 15(1). For a critique see Hester Lessard, “Mothers, Fathers, and Naming: Reflections on the Law Equality Framework and Trociuk v British Columbia (Attorney General)” (2004) 16:1 CJWL 165.

There are also some gaps in s 15 jurisprudence in the area of sex discrimination. For example, the Supreme Court has not ruled on any s 15 claims challenging restrictions or lack of access to reproductive health services, such as abortion. If some medical practitioners refused to provide reproductive health services or referrals for reasons of religion or conscience, how would you frame a s 15 claim? Consider that transgender individuals can also become pregnant and require reproductive health services. How would that influence your framing of such a claim? Could you also mount an argument based on s 7 and s 28 of the Charter? For a discussion, see Daphne Gilbert, "Let Thy Conscience Be Thy Guide (but Not My Guide): Physicians and the Duty to Refer" (2016) 10 McGill JL & Health 47.

7. Gender identity/expression has not yet been considered as an analogous ground by the Supreme Court, but it has been recognized by lower courts. In CF v Alberta (Vital Statistics), 2014 ABQB 237, the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench assessed the claim of a transgender woman that the requirement to undergo gender-affirming surgery before her birth certificate could be changed was discriminatory. The Court found that this requirement created a distinction based on sex, or alternatively, "if 'sex' in Charter s. 15(1) is interpreted so narrowly as to exclude the characteristics of transgendered persons that make them transgendered, then, at very least, the distinction is made on a ground analogous to sex" (at para 39). The Court went on to find that the distinction was discriminatory because it perpetuated the disadvantage, vulnerability, stereotyping, and prejudice suffered by transgender persons.

Gender identity/expression is included as a protected ground in human rights legislation across the country. For a decision finding a prima facie case of discrimination based on gender identity in this context, and discussing the differences between sex, gender, gender identity, and gender expression, see Boulachanis v Canada (AG), 2019 FC 456 (involving the claim of a transgender woman to be incarcerated in a female rather than male prison).

8. The Court has ruled that employment status and occupation do not qualify as analogous grounds: see Reference Re Workers' Compensation Act, 1983 (Nfld), [1989] 1 SCR 922, 1989 CanLII 86; Delisle v Canada (Deputy AG), [1999] 2 SCR 989, 1999 CanLII 649 (with respect to the RCMP); Baier v Alberta, 2007 SCC 31 (with respect to school employees); Health Services and Support—Facilities Subsector Bargaining Assn v British Columbia, 2007 SCC 27 (with respect to health care workers; discussed in Section II.B, Note 3 following Eldridge). See also Fraser (excerpted in Section II.A), where the dissent of Brown and Rowe JJ suggested that the differential treatment of job-sharing RCMP members as compared to those on leave without pay was based on their part-time employment status, without considering whether this was an analogous ground.

In Dunmore v Ontario (AG), 2001 SCC 94, a majority of the Court found that the exclusion of agricultural workers from collective bargaining legislation was an unjustifiable violation of s 2(d) of the Charter (see Chapter 21). The majority opinion of Bastarache J found it unnecessary to address the s 15(1) argument. In her concurring opinion, L'Heureux-Dubé J agreed with Bastarache J's conclusion on s 2(d), and also explained why she would have found the occupational status of agricultural workers to be an analogous ground:

[169] ... Not unlike the off-reserve aboriginal band members faced with the challenge of changing their status to on-reserve band members identified in Corbiere, I believe that agricultural workers, in light of their relative status, low levels of skill and education, and limited employment mobility, can change their occupational status "only at great cost, if at all" (Corbiere ... at para. 14). The fact that the agricultural workforce may be highly transient only reflects the unstable nature of the industry, and does not change the basic point that the workers lack other employment options; indeed, many of the seasonal workers are students and the unemployed. In my view, it is abundantly clear that agricultural workers do not enjoy the same "labour market flexibility" as RCMP officers (Delisle ... at para. 44) or other more advantaged professionals, and I see no reason to disturb the trial judge's considered findings of fact regarding the predicament of agricultural workers.

In Ontario (AG) v Fraser, 2011 SCC 20, the Court dismissed a Charter challenge to Ontario's Agricultural Employees Protection Act, 2002, SO 2002, c 16 [AEPA] that responded to Dunmore by creating a separate labour relations regime for agricultural workers that maintained their exclusion from the collective bargaining regime in the Labour Relations Act, 1995, SO 1995, c 1, Sch A. The majority opinion of McLachlin CJ and LeBel J dismissed the claimants'

s 15(1) arguments because they believed that the record was insufficient to establish that the new legislative regime disadvantaged farm workers. In his concurring opinion, Rothstein J agreed, adding that "the category of 'agricultural worker' does not rise to the level of an immutable (or constructively immutable) personal characteristic of the sort that would merit protection against discrimination under s. 15" (at para 295). In her concurring opinion, Deschamps J suggested that the Court's attempt to deal with issues of economic inequality under s 2(d) might be better addressed by recognizing new analogous grounds in s 15:

[319] To redress economic inequality, it would be more faithful to the design of the Charter to open the door to the recognition of more analogous grounds under s 15, as L'Heureux-Dubé J. proposed in Dunmore . . . This, of course, would entail a sea change in the interpretation of s. 15 of the Charter. The majority in the instant case resist such a change, referring to "Canadian values" and to the need to take a "generous and purposive" approach when interpreting Charter rights (at paras. 32, 90, 92 and 97), but to ensure consistency with the approach of the majority in Health Services (at paras. 81-96), they refer to equality in the s. 2(d) context without mentioning s. 15. . . [I]f the law needs to move away from Dunmore's distinction between positive and negative rights, this should not be accomplished by conflating freedom of association with the right to equality or any other Charter right that may be asserted by a litigant. An analysis based on principles grounding the protection of rights and freedoms offers a better prospect of judicial consistency than one based on the more amorphous notion of "Canadian values."

For a discussion of Dunmore and Ontario (AG) v Fraser, see Fay Faraday, "Envisioning Equality: Analogous Grounds and Farm Workers' Experience of Discrimination" in Fay Faraday, Judy Fudge & Eric Tucker, Constitutional Labour Rights in Canada: Farm Workers and the Fraser Case (Toronto: Irwin Law, 2012) 109. Do you agree with Deschamps J that it would be appropriate to redress economic inequality by expanding consideration of analogous grounds under s 15(1), rather than using "equality values" in the interpretation of freedom of association and the rights of workers under s 2(d)?

9. Other personal characteristics that the Court has not accepted as analogous grounds include: province or municipality of residence (Turpin; Haig v Canada; Haig v Canada (Chief Electoral Officer), [1993] 2 SCR 995, 1993 CanLII 58; Siemens v Manitoba (AG), 2003 SCC 3); persons charged with war crimes or crimes against humanity outside Canada (R v Finta, [1994] 1 SCR 701, 1994 CanLII 129); persons bringing a claim against the Crown (Rudolph Wolff & Co v Canada, [1990] 1 SCR 695, 1990 CanLII 139); cannabis users (R v Malmo-Levine; R v Caine, 2003 SCC 74).

10. Should poverty, social condition, or homelessness be recognized as analogous grounds? How would the "constructive or actual immutability" approach apply here? Would this recognition involve the courts in deciding issues with complex socio-economic and political dimensions that are best left to legislatures? See Jessica Eisen, "On Shaky Grounds: Poverty and Analogous Grounds under the Charter" (2013) 2 Can J Poverty L 1; Martha Jackman, "One Step Forward and Two Steps Back: Poverty, the Charter, and the Legacy of Gosselin" (2019) 39 NJCL 85; Joshua Sealy-Harrington, "Assessing Analogous Grounds: The Doctrinal and Normative Superiority of a Multi-Variable Approach" (2013) 10 JL & Equality 37.

In Tanudjaja v Canada (AG), 2014 ONCA 852, leave to appeal to SCC dismissed, 2015 CanLII 36780, [2015] SCCA No 39 (QL), also discussed in Section II.B, Note 6 following Eldridge, and Chapter 22, The Right to Life, Liberty, and Security of the Person, a majority of the Ontario Court of Appeal dismissed a Charter challenge to federal and provincial housing policies on the basis that the issues raised were not justiciable. As a result, the s 7 and s 15(1) arguments the claimants sought to advance were never fully argued. The majority left open the question of whether homelessness might be recognized as an analogous ground under s 15(1) in a future case. Justice Feldman, dissenting, found that whether homelessness or being without adequate housing is an analogous ground "is an important issue" (at para 74) that, along with the other Charter arguments, should be considered with a full evidentiary record. For analysis written by counsel for the claimants, see Tracy Heffernan, Fay Faraday & Peter Rosenthal, "Fighting for the Right to Housing in Canada" (2015) 24 JL & Soc Pol'y 10; Fay Faraday, Tracy Heffernan & Peter Rosenthal, "Winning the Right to Housing: Critical Reflections on a Holistic Approach to Public Interest Litigation" (2019) 90 SCLR (2d) 31.

Pending the recognition of poverty-related grounds as analogous, can other grounds be used to make s 15 arguments in the context of poverty? In Gosselin v Québec (AG), 2002 SCC 84, discussed in Chapter 22, the Supreme Court held 5–4 that Quebec legislation that reduced the benefits available to social assistance recipients under the age of 30 unless they participated in education and welfare programs did not constitute age discrimination. For commentary, see, for example, Gwen Brodsky, "Gosselin v Quebec (Attorney General): Autonomy with a Vengeance" (2003) 15 CJWL 194; Jamie Cameron, "Positive Obligations Under Sections 15 and 7 of the Charter: A Comment on Gosselin v Quebec" (2003) 20 SCLR (2d) 66. Does Fraser v Canada (AG) (excerpted in Section II.A) support the use of adverse effects discrimination arguments in this type of case, given what we know about how poverty disproportionately affects women, racialized and Indigenous persons, and persons with disabilities?

III. SECTION 15(2) AND AMELIORATIVE PROGRAMS

Section 15(2) of the Charter provides that s 15(1)

does not preclude any law, program or activity that has as its object the amelioration of conditions of disadvantaged individuals or groups including those that are disadvantaged because of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

Since Andrews, the Supreme Court has viewed s 15(2) as supporting the conception of substantive equality that underlies s 15 as a whole. However, the Court's view of the precise nature of the relationship between ss 15(1) and (2) has changed over time. In Law, the Court treated the ameliorative purpose of a law as one of the contextual factors relevant to determining discrimination. One year later, in Lovelace v Ontario, 2000 SCC 37, the Court described s 15(2) as "confirmatory and supplementary to s 15(1)" (at para 105). In both cases, s 15(2)'s affirmation of ameliorative programs was encompassed in the s 15(1) analysis. In Lovelace, the Court left open the possibility that s 15(2) might be interpreted in a future case in a way that gave it an independent role (at para 100). It took this interpretive step in Kapp, excerpted below (also discussed above in Sections II.A, Note 9 following Andrews, and II.C, Note 4. Following Kapp are excerpts from two other Supreme Court decisions considering the role of s 15(2): Alberta (Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development) v Cunningham, 2011 SCC 37 and Quebec (AG) v Alliance du personnel professionnel et technique de la santé et des services sociaux, 2018 SCC 17—one of the 2018 pay equity cases. In this section, the Notes and Questions for Discussion come after, rather than between, the three excerpted cases so that readers can think about the cases and contrast their approaches to s 15(2) collectively.

McLACHLIN CJ and ABELLA J (Binnie, LeBel, Deschamps, Fish, Charron, and Rothstein JJ concurring):

A. Introduction

[1] The appellants are commercial fishers, mainly non-aboriginal, who assert that their equality rights under s. 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms were violated by a communal fishing licence granting members of three aboriginal bands the exclusive right to fish for salmon in the mouth of the Fraser River for a period of 24 hours on August 19-20, 1998.

[2] The appellants base their claim on s. 15(1). The essence of the claim is that the communal fishing licence discriminated against them on the basis of race. The Crown argues that the general purpose of the program under which the licence was issued was to regulate the fishery, and that it ameliorated the conditions of a disadvantaged group. These contentions, taken together, ... require this Court to consider whether s. 15(2) is capable of operating independently of s. 15(1) to protect ameliorative programs from claims of discrimination—a possibility left open in this Court's equality jurisprudence.

[3] We have concluded that where a program makes a distinction on one of the grounds enumerated under s. 15 or an analogous ground but has as its object the amelioration of the conditions of a disadvantaged group, s. 15's guarantee of substantive equality is furthered, and the claim of discrimination must fail. ...

[Justice Abella and McLachlin CJ then summarized the facts and the lower court rulings and discussed s 15(1). Their s 15(1) reasons are omitted here but are excerpted above in Section II.A, Note 9 following Andrews.]

2. Section 15(2)

[28] Rather than requiring identical treatment for everyone, in Andrews, McIntyre J. distinguished between difference and discrimination and adopted an approach to equality that acknowledged and accommodated differences. ... In other words, not every distinction is discriminatory. By their very nature, programs designed to ameliorate the disadvantage of one group will inevitably exclude individuals from other groups. This does not necessarily make them either unconstitutional or "reverse discrimination." Andrews requires that discriminatory conduct entail more than different treatment. As McIntyre J. declared at p. 167, a law will not "necessarily be bad because it makes distinctions."

[29] In our view, the appellants have established that they were treated differently based on an enumerated ground, race. Because the government argues that the program ameliorated the conditions of a disadvantaged group, we must take a more detailed look at s. 15(2).

[30] The question that arises is whether the program that targeted the aboriginal bands falls under s. 15(2) in the sense that it is a "law, program or activity that has as its object the amelioration of conditions of disadvantaged individuals or groups." As noted, the communal fishing licence authorizing the three bands to fish for sale on August 19-20 was issued pursuant to an enabling statute and regulations This qualifies as a "law, program or activity" within the meaning of s. 15(2). The more complex issue is whether the program fulfills the remaining criteria of s. 15(2)—that is, whether the program "has as its object the amelioration of conditions of disadvantaged individuals or groups."

[32] The Royal Commission Report on Equality in Employment [the Abella Report], whose mandate was to determine whether there should be affirmative action in Canada and on which McIntyre J. relied to develop his theories of discrimination and equality, set out the principles underlying s. 15(2), at pp. 13-14:

In recognition of the journey many have yet to complete before they achieve equality, and in recognition of how the duration of the journey has been and is being unfairly protracted by arbitrary barriers, section 15(2) permits laws, programs, or activities designed to eliminate these restraints. While section 15(1) guarantees to individuals the right to be treated as equals free from discrimination, section 15(2), though itself creating no enforceable remedy, assures that it is neither discriminatory nor a violation of the equality guaranteed by section 15(1) to attempt to improve the condition of disadvantaged individuals or groups, even if this means treating them differently.

Section 15(2) ... encourages a comprehensive or systemic rather than a particularized approach to the elimination of discriminatory barriers.

... [I]t does not create the statutory obligation to establish laws, programs, or activities to hasten equality, ameliorate disadvantage, or eliminate discrimination. But it sanctions them, acting with statutory acquiescence.

[33] In essence, s. 15(2) of the Charter seeks to protect efforts by the state to develop and adopt remedial schemes designed to assist disadvantaged groups. This interpretation is confirmed by the language in s. 15(2), "does not preclude."

[34] This Court dealt explicitly with the relationship between s. 15(1) and s. 15(2) in Lovelace v. Ontario, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 950, 2000 SCC 37. The Court, per Iacobucci J., appeared unwilling at that time to give s. 15(2) independent force, but left the door open for that possibility, at para. 108:

[Alt this stage of the jurisprudence, I see s. 15(2) as confirmatory of s. 15(1) and, in that respect, claimants arguing equality claims in the future should first be directed to s. 15(1) since that subsection can embrace ameliorative programs of the kind that are contemplated by s. 15(2). By doing that one can ensure that the program is subject to the full scrutiny of the discrimination analysis, as well as the possibility of a s. 1 review. However ... we may well wish to reconsider this matter at a future time in the context of another case. [Emphasis added.]

[35] Iacobucci J. in Lovelace perceived two possible approaches to the interpretation of s. 15(2). He believed that the Supreme Court could either read s. 15(2) as an interpretive aid to s. 15(1) (the approach adopted in Lovelace) or read it as an exception or exemption from the operation of s. 15(1).

[36] He favoured the interpretive aid approach, while acknowledging that the exemption approach had some support. ...

[37] In our view, there is a third option: if the government can demonstrate that an impugned program meets the criteria of s. 15(2), it may be unnecessary to conduct a s. 15(1) analysis at all. As discussed at the outset of this analysis, s. 15(1) and s. 15(2) should be read as working together to promote substantive equality. The focus of s. 15(1) is on preventing governments from making distinctions based on enumerated or analogous grounds that have the effect of perpetuating disadvantage or prejudice or imposing disadvantage on the basis of stereotyping. The focus of s. 15(2) is on enabling governments to pro-actively combat discrimination. Read thus, the two sections are confirmatory of each other. Section 15(2) supports a full expression of equality, rather than derogating from it. ...

[38] But this confirmatory purpose does not preclude an independent role for s. 15(2). Section 15(2) is more than a hortatory admonition. It tells us, in simple clear language, that s. 15(1) cannot be read in a way that finds an ameliorative program aimed at combatting disadvantage to be discriminatory and in breach of s. 15.

[39] Here the appellants claim discrimination on the basis of s. 15(1). The source of that discrimination—the very essence of their complaint—is a program that may be ameliorative. This leaves but one conclusion: if the government establishes that the program falls under s. 15(2), the appellants' claim must fail.

[40] In other words, once the s. 15 claimant has shown a distinction made on an enumerated or analogous ground, it is open to the government to show that the impugned law, program or activity is ameliorative and, thus, constitutional. This approach has the advantage of avoiding the symbolic problem of finding a program discriminatory before "saving" it as ameliorative, while also giving independent force to a provision that has been written as distinct and separate from s. 15(1). Should the government fail to demonstrate that its program falls under s. 15(2), the program must then receive full scrutiny under s. 15(1) to determine whether its impact is discriminatory.

[41] We would therefore formulate the test under s. 15(2) as follows. A program does not violate the s. 15 equality guarantee if the government can demonstrate that: (1) the program has an ameliorative or remedial purpose; and (2) the program targets a disadvantaged group identified by the enumerated or analogous grounds. In proposing this test, we are mindful that future cases may demand some adjustment to the framework in order to meet the litigants' particular circumstances. ...

[42] We build our analysis of s. 15(2) and its operation around three key phrases in the provision. The subsection protects "any law, program or activity that has as its object the amelioration of conditions of disadvantaged individuals or groups." While there is some overlap in the considerations raised by each of these terms, it may be useful to consider each of them individually.

(a) "Has as Its Object"

[43] In interpreting this phrase, two issues arise. The first is whether courts should look to the purpose or to the effect of legislation. The second is whether, in order to qualify for s. 15(2) protection, a program must have an ameliorative purpose as its sole object, or whether having such a goal as one of several objectives is sufficient.

[44] The language of s. 15(2) suggests that legislative goal rather than actual effect is the paramount consideration in determining whether or not a program qualifies for s. 15(2) protection. ...

[45] Scholars and judges who have supported judicial examination of the actual effect of a program offer one primary argument to defend their view. They express concern that ... "if ameliorative legislative purpose were the sole test under section 15(2), a legislature could easily circumvent the egalitarian requirements under section 15(1) by including in any potentially discriminatory legislation a clause which provides that 'this Act has as its object the amelioration of the conditions of ... a disadvantaged group.'"

[46] In our opinion, this concern can be easily addressed. ... Courts could well examine legislation to ensure that the declared purpose is genuine. ...

[47] In that vein, proponents of the approach that focusses on the ameliorative goal of the program, rather than its effect, argue that doing so will prevent courts from unduly interfering in ameliorative programs created by the legislature. They note that Canadian Charter drafters wished to avoid the American experience, whereby judges overturned affirmative action programs under the banner of equality. The purpose-driven approach also reflects the language of the provision itself, which focuses on the "object" of the program, law or activity rather than its impact. Moreover, the effects of a program in its fledgling stages cannot always be easily ascertained. The law or program may be experimental. If the sincere purpose is to promote equality by ameliorating the conditions of a disadvantaged group, the government should be given some leeway to adopt innovative programs, even though some may ultimately prove to be unsuccessful. The government may learn from such failures and revise equality-enhancing programs to make them more effective.

[48] Given the language of the provision and its goal of enabling governments to pro-actively combat discrimination, we believe the “purpose”-based approach is more appropriate than the “effect”-based approach: where a law, program or activity creates a distinction based on an enumerated or analogous ground, was the government’s goal in creating that distinction to improve the conditions of a group that is disadvantaged? In examining purpose, courts may therefore find it necessary to consider not only statements made by the drafters of the program but also whether the legislature chose means rationally related to that ameliorative purpose, in the sense that it appears at least plausible that the program may indeed advance the stated goal of combatting disadvantage. ...

[49] Analysing the means employed by the government can easily turn into assessing the effect of the program. As a result, to preserve an intent-based analysis, courts could be encouraged to frame the analysis as follows: Was it rational for the state to conclude that the means chosen to reach its ameliorative goal would contribute to that purpose? For the distinction to be rational, there must be a correlation between the program and the disadvantage suffered by the target group. Such a standard permits significant deference to the legislature but allows judicial review where a program nominally seeks to serve the disadvantaged but in practice serves other non-remedial objectives.

[50] The next issue is whether the program’s ameliorative purpose needs to be its exclusive objective. ...

[51] We can find little justification for requiring the ameliorative purpose to be the sole object of a program. It seems unlikely that a single purpose will motivate any particular program; any number of goals are likely to be subsumed within a single scheme. To prevent such programs from earning s. 15(2) protection on the grounds that they contain other objectives seems to undermine the goal of s. 15(2).

[52] The importance of the ameliorative purpose within the scheme may help determine the scope of s. 15(2) protection, however. Consider that an ameliorative program may coexist with or interact with a larger legislative scheme. If only the program has an ameliorative purpose, does s. 15(2) extend to protect the wider legislative scheme? We offer as a tentative guide that s. 15(2) precludes from s. 15(1) review distinctions made on enumerated or analogous grounds that serve and are necessary to the ameliorative purpose.

(b) “Amelioration”

[53] Section 15(2) protects programs that aim to “ameliorate” the condition of disadvantaged groups identified by the enumerated or analogous grounds. Although the word does not at first seem liable to misunderstanding, courts have previously understood the term (and s. 15(2)) to apply in surprising circumstances. In R. v. Music Explosion Ltd. (1989), 62 Man. R (2d) 189, the Manitoba Court of Queen’s Bench upheld a Winnipeg bylaw that restricted young people under 16 from operating an amusement device without the consent of a guardian or a parent on the grounds that it was protected by s. 15(2). Smith J declared that the bylaw “is obviously for the benefit of the special needs of young persons” (para. 21). On appeal, the decision was reversed. The Court of Appeal explained: “[T]his legislation does not confer special benefits upon young people, but rather imposes a limitation. Nor is the purpose of the legislation the amelioration of their condition" ((1990), 68 Man. R (2d) 203, at para. 18). ...

[54] ... We would suggest that laws designed to restrict or punish behaviour would not qualify for s. 15(2) protection. Nor, as already discussed, should the focus be on the effect of the law. This said, the fact that a law has no plausible or predictable ameliorative effect may render suspect the state's ameliorative purpose. Governments, as discussed above, are not permitted to protect discriminatory programs on colourable pretexts.

(c) "Disadvantaged"

[55] The interpretation of "disadvantaged," explored in Andrews, Miron v. Trudel, [1995] 2 S.C.R. 418, and Law, and other cases in the context of s. 15(1), requires little further elaboration here. "Disadvantage" under s. 15 connotes vulnerability, prejudice and negative social characterization. Section 15(2)'s purpose is to protect government programs targeting the conditions of a specific and identifiable disadvantaged group, as contrasted with broad societal legislation, such as social assistance programs. Not all members of the group need to be disadvantaged, as long as the group as a whole has experienced discrimination.

3. Application of Section 15(2) to This Case

[Having found that the pilot sales program drew a distinction on the basis of race, satisfying the first step of the test for s 15(1), McLachlin CJ and Abella J turned to the application of s 15(2). They found that the program was part of the government's response to Aboriginal fishing rights claims, with the goal of promoting band self-sufficiency and redressing the social and economic disadvantage of the targeted bands. Furthermore, the means the government chose to achieve its purpose—beneficial fishing privileges for the bands—was seen to be rationally related to serving that purpose. The government had therefore established a genuine ameliorative purpose for the program. Finally, the program responded to the actual economic and social disadvantage suffered by members of the three targeted Aboriginal bands by addressing long-term goals of self-sufficiency and providing more immediate sources of income and employment. The majority also noted that although some individual band members may not have experienced personal disadvantage, this did not negate the group's disadvantage. It concluded that the impugned program was protected by s 15(2) and, therefore, that it did not violate s 15 of the Charter (at paras 57-61).

Justice Bastarache wrote separate reasons concurring in the result, but on the basis that s 25 of the Charter rather than s 15(2) barred the claim. For further discussion of his reasons and the majority's approach to s 25, see the Notes and Questions below.]

In Kapp, the Court indicated that its new approach to s 15(2) was a "basic starting point" that "leaves open the possibility for future refinement" (at para 41). That future arrived only three years later in Cunningham. In Kapp, the Court described the claim as one of "reverse discrimination" (at para 28), whereby a group of predominantly non-Indigenous fishers sought to altogether overturn the ameliorative program targeted at certain First Nations. Cunningham involved a different sort of claim—a claim of underinclusiveness—where the claimants alleged they were a sub-group that should have access to an ameliorative law they were excluded from. As you read Cunningham, think about the factual differences between these two cases and how those differences influenced the Court's approach to, and articulation of the test for, s 15(2).

Alberta (Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development) v Cunningham

2011 SCC 37

McLACHLIN CJ (Binnie, LeBel, Deschamps, Fish, Abella, Charron, Rothstein, and Cromwell JJ concurring):

I. Overview

[1] Section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 recognizes three groups of Aboriginal peoples—Indians, Métis and Inuit. The claimants are members of the Métis settlement of Peavine, Alberta; they are also status Indians. The Metis Settlements Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. M-14 ("MSA"), does not permit status Indians to become formal members of any Métis settlement, including Peavine. The claimants now apply for a declaration that this denial of membership violates the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees of equality, freedom of association and liberty, and is unconstitutional.

[3] The claimants assert that the MSA's exclusion of Métis who are also status Indians from membership in the Peavine Métis Settlement violates the guarantee of equality of s. 15 of the Charter. I conclude that s. 15(2) of the Charter, which permits inequalities associated with ameliorative programs aimed at helping a disadvantaged group, provides a complete answer to this claim. The purpose and effect of the MSA is to enhance Métis identity, culture, and self-governance by creating a land base for Métis. The exclusion of status Indians from membership in the new Métis land base serves and advances this object and hence is protected by s. 15(2). ...

[Chief Justice McLachlin summarized the legislative history of the Metis Settlements Act and the rulings of the lower courts. She then turned to s 15(2) of the Charter, beginning with its purpose.]

[41] ... Ameliorative programs function by targeting specific disadvantaged groups for benefits, while excluding others. At the time the Charter was being drafted, affirmative action programs were being challenged in the United States as discriminatory—a phenomenon sometimes called reverse discrimination. The underlying rationale of s. 15(2) is that governments should be permitted to target subsets of disadvantaged people on the basis of personal characteristics, while excluding others. ... Section 15(2) affirms that governments may not be able to help all members of a disadvantaged group at the same time, and should be permitted to set priorities. If governments are obliged to benefit all disadvantaged people (or all subsets of disadvantaged people) equally, they may be precluded from using targeted programs to achieve specific goals relating to specific groups. The cost of identical treatment for all would be loss of real opportunities to lessen disadvantage and prejudice.

B. The Steps Under Section 15(2)

[Chief Justice McLachlin described the Court's approach to s 15(2) in Kapp with some modifications.]

[45] ... [Section] 15(2) protects all distinctions drawn on enumerated or analogous grounds that "serve and are necessary to" the ameliorative purpose: Kapp, at para. 52. In this phrase, "necessary" should not be understood as requiring proof that the exclusion is essential to realizing the object of the ameliorative program. What is required is that the impugned distinction in a general sense serves or advances the object of the program, thus supporting the overall s. 15 goal of substantive equality. ... To be protected, the distinction must in a real sense serve or advance the ameliorative goal, consistent with s. 15's purpose of promoting substantive equality.

[46] The fundamental question is this: up to what point does s. 15(2) protect against a claim of discrimination? The tentative answer suggested by Kapp, as discussed above, is that the distinction must serve or advance the ameliorative goal. This will not be the case, for instance, if the state chooses irrational means to pursue its ameliorative goal. This criterion may be refined and developed as different cases emerge. But for our purposes, it suffices.

[53] This brings us to the following propositions. Ameliorative programs, by their nature, confer benefits on one group that are not conferred on others. These distinctions are generally protected if they serve or advance the object of the program, thus promoting substantive equality. This is so even where the included and excluded groups are aboriginals who share a similar history of disadvantage and marginalization: Lovelace.

[54] These propositions, as discussed more fully below, suffice to resolve the issue that arises in this case. What is at issue here is a special type of ameliorative program—one designed to enhance and preserve the identity, culture and self-governance of a constitutionally recognized group. The group targeted by the program precisely corresponds to a group that is identified as one of the groups that make up the "aboriginal peoples of Canada" in s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. The object of enhancing the identity, culture and self-governance of the Métis as a s. 35 group, of necessity, must permit the exclusion of other s. 35 groups since an essential part of their unique identity is that they are "not Indian" and "not Inuit."

[55] It is therefore unnecessary to embark on a lengthy consideration of precisely what considerations may enter into the issue of how distinctions are made for ameliorative programs in different types of cases. The law is best left to develop on an incremental basis.

C. Application

(1) Is the Distinction Based on an Enumerated or Analogous Ground of Discrimination?

[58] I refrain from making a determination as to whether registration as a status Indian constitutes an analogous ground of discrimination. Since the case has proceeded on the assumption that an analogous ground was made out, I will assume that it has been, and consider the remaining aspects of s. 15 as they apply in this case.

(2) Is the Program a Genuinely Ameliorative Program?

[60] I begin with the object of the MSA program. The discussion that follows establishes that the object of the program is to enhance Métis identity, culture and self-government through the establishment of a Métis land base. This is a special type of ameliorative program. Unlike many ameliorative programs, the object of the program is not the direct conferral of benefits onto individuals within a particular group, but the strengthening of the identity of Métis as a group—one of three aboriginal groups recognized in the Constitution.

[Chief Justice McLachlin reviewed the wording of the amending statute that created the MSA and the MSA itself. She noted the repeated reference to the aims of preserving and enhancing the “unique” Métis culture and identity and of enabling the Métis to attain self-governance through land set aside for Métis.]

[65] The wording of the MSA’s provisions supports the view that the object of the ameliorative program was to benefit Métis, as distinct from Indians, by setting up a land base that would strengthen an independent Métis identity, culture and desire for self-governance. ...

[66] The history of the struggle that culminated in the MSA supports this view of the object of the challenged legislation. The MSA, as discussed earlier, is the result of a negotiation process between the Métis of Alberta and the Province and the outcome of an ongoing struggle for self-preservation. The Métis considered themselves as one of three Aboriginal groups in Canada, but this was not recognized until the Constitution Act, 1982. Unlike Indians, however, they enjoyed no land base from which to strengthen their identity and culture or govern themselves. Nor did they enjoy the protection of an equivalent to the Indian Act. Their aboriginality, in a word, was not legally acknowledged or protected. Viewed in this perspective, the ameliorative program embodied in the MSA emerges as an attempt to provide to Alberta’s Métis settlements similar protections to those which various Indian bands have enjoyed since early times.

[Chief Justice McLachlin described a series of Commissions and enactments beginning in 1934 and culminating in the MSA in 1990, which granted a number of Métis communities fee simple title to the settlement lands as well as protecting Métis rights more broadly.]

[71] I conclude that the MSA, while unique, is a genuinely ameliorative program. Provided that the means of implementation chosen by the legislature serves or advances this end, s. 15(2) protects the MSA against the charge of discrimination.

(3) Does the Distinction Serve or Advance the Object of the Ameliorative Program?

[72] The object of the MSA is to benefit the members of a constitutionally identified and protected group by enhancing the identity, culture and self-governance of the group. In order to achieve this object, the legislature has excluded Métis who are also status Indians from membership in the settlement for purposes of establishing a Métis land base. The question is whether this distinction serves or advances its object.

[73] In my view, the line drawn by the MSA ... serves and advances the object of the program. It is supported by historic distinctions between Métis and Indian culture; by the fact that, without the distinction, achieving the object of the program would be more difficult; and by the role of the Métis settlement in defining its membership.

(a) The Program Recognizes the Historic Uniqueness of the Métis

[75] ... Since their emergence as a distinct people on the Canadian prairies in the 1700s, the Métis have claimed an identity based on non-Indianness. They have persistently distinguished themselves as a people from the other dominant Aboriginal group in their territory—Indians. The obverse side of the struggle of the Métis to preserve their distinct identity and culture is the fear that overlap and confusion with the larger Indian cultures would put their identity and culture at risk. ... Line drawing on this basis, far from being irrational, simply reflects the Constitution and serves the legitimate expectations of the Métis.

[76] The distinction in the MSA between Métis and status Indians ... serves to enhance Métis identity and to further the goal of the ameliorative program. The fact that some people may identify as both Métis and Indian does not negate the general correspondence underlying the distinction between the two groups.

(b) Realizing the Object of the Program

[77] To accord membership in the MSA communities to Métis who are also status Indians would undermine the object of the program of enhancing Métis identity, culture and governance, and would potentially hollow out the goal of the MSA of preserving and enhancing a distinct Métis culture, identity and governance.

[78] ... To the extent that status Indians are members of Métis settlements, the distinctive Métis identity, with its historic emphasis on being distinct from Indian identity, would be compromised. And to the extent that status Indians are members of Métis settlements, the goal of self-governance is hampered. For example, Indians who already enjoy the right to hunt off-reserve may have little interest in promoting the right of Métis to hunt outside settlement lands. The same may be ventured for other benefits and privileges. Because the Indian Act provides a scheme of benefits to status Indians, ranging from medical care to housing to tax-free status, status Indian members of Métis settlements may have less interest in fighting for similar benefits than Métis without Indian status.

(c) The Role of the Métis in Defining Their Community

[79] The exclusion of status Indians from membership in the new land-based Métis settlements was the product of a long period of consultation between the government and the Métis. According a measure of respect to this role serves and advances the object of the ameliorative program. It does not insulate the selection of beneficiaries from Charter review, to be sure, but it supports the connection between the object of the program and the means chosen to achieve it.

[Chief Justice McLachlin discussed the Court's decision in R v Powley, 2003 SCC 43, where it recognized that the term "Métis" in s 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 "refers to distinctive peoples who, in addition to their mixed ancestry, developed their own customs, way of life, and recognizable group identity separate from their Indian or Inuit and European forebears" (at para 10) and that "[t]he inclusion of the Métis in s. 35 is based on a commitment to recognizing the Métis and enhancing their survival as distinctive communities" (at para 13).]

[82] The self-organization and standardization of the Métis community in Alberta is precisely what the Alberta legislature and the Alberta Métis have together sought to achieve in developing, agreeing upon and enacting the membership requirements found in the MSA and challenged here. The significant role that the Métis must play in defining settlement membership requirements does not mean that this exercise is exempt from Charter scrutiny. Nevertheless, it does suggest that the courts must approach the task of reviewing membership requirements with prudence and due regard to the Métis's own conception of the distinct features of their community.

(d) Conclusion: The Distinction Serves and Advances the Object of the Ameliorative Program

[83] I conclude that the exclusion from membership in any Métis settlement, including the Peavine Settlement, of Métis who are also status Indians serves and advances the object of the ameliorative program. It corresponds to the historic and social distinction between the Métis and Indians, furthers realization of the object of enhancing Métis identity, culture and governance, and respects the role of the Métis in defining themselves as a people.

[84] It follows that the distinction between Métis and status Indians in the MSA does not fall outside the protective reach of s. 15(2). Rather, the distinction is the type of targeted ameliorative program s. 15 was intended to allow legislatures to adopt. Section 15(2) applies, and the exclusion of the claimants from membership in a Métis settlement does not constitute discrimination.

[86] That people, including many Métis, include mixed ethnic and cultural strands in their particular individual identity is clear. However, this does not mean that every program must recognize everyone who holds some claim to a group targeted by an ameliorative program. Mixed identity is a recurrent theme in Canada's ongoing exercise of achieving reconciliation between its Aboriginal peoples and the broader population. It figures, for example, in land claims negotiations between particular Indian groups and the government. Residents of one Indian group frequently also identify themselves with other Indian groups for historical and cultural reasons. Yet lines must be drawn if agreements are to be achieved. The situation of Métis settlements is similar. In order to preserve the unique Métis culture and identity and to assure effective self-governance through a dedicated Métis land base, some line drawing will be required. It follows of necessity that not every person who is a Métis in the broad sense of having Indian-European ancestry and self-identifying with the Métis community, as discussed in Powley, may be entitled to the benefit of membership under the MSA.

[88] ... It follows that the claimants' s. 15 claim must be dismissed.

[Chief Justice McLachlin went on to dismiss the claims under s 2(d) and s 7 of the Charter.]

Many scholars and equality-seeking groups expressed concern that Cunningham might lead to a significant number of cases in which governments would seek to protect under-inclusive ameliorative programs under s 15(2)—i.e., those that target some disadvantaged groups to the exclusion of others. However, it was not until the pay equity decisions of 2018 that the Supreme Court again considered the role of s 15(2). Excerpted below is Quebec (AG) v Alliance du personnel professionnel et technique de la santé et des services sociaux, where the majority and dissenting judges were divided on their approach to both s 15(1) and s 15(2). As you read this case, consider again how the factual context of a case can influence the Court's approach to s 15(2).

Quebec (AG) v Alliance du personnel professionnel et technique de la santé et des services sociaux

[Alliance involved Quebec's Pay Equity Act, CQLR, c E-12.001, which sought to "redress differences in compensation due to the systemic gender discrimination suffered by persons who occupy positions in predominantly female job classes" (at para 29). For a description of the 2009 amendments that were subject to challenge, see Section II.A, Note 13 following Andrews.

Justice Abella wrote for a 6–3 majority in Alliance and found that the 2009 amendments violated s 15(1) of the Charter. At the first step of the s 15(1) test, she found that the amendments created a distinction based on sex:]

[29] ... They set out how deficiencies in women's pay, in comparison to men, will be identified. They set out when women will—and will not—receive compensation for those inequities. And they set out the information that will—and will not—be made available about when those inequities emerge to the women who may need to challenge them. The impugned provisions therefore draw distinctions based on sex, both on their face and in their impact. [Emphasis in original].

[Justice Abella then considered s 15(2):]

[30] Before turning to discriminatory impact, a brief word on s. 15(2). It has no application in cases such as this one.

[31] Its purpose "is to save ameliorative programs from the charge of 'reverse discrimination'" (Alberta (Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development) v. Cunningham, 2011 SCC 37 (CanLII), [2011] 2 S.C.R. 670, at para. 41; Kapp). It protects ameliorative programs for disadvantaged groups from claims by those the program was not intended to benefit that the ameliorative program discriminates against them.

[32] In the case before us, on the other hand, the argument is that parts of an ameliorative scheme violate s. 15(1) because they have a discriminatory impact on women, the disadvantaged group the scheme was intended to benefit. Section 15(2) cannot bar s. 15(1) claims by the very group the legislation seeks to protect and there is no jurisprudential support for the view that it could do so.

[Justice Abella went on to address the second step of the s 15(1) analysis, finding that the 2009 amendments had a discriminatory impact because they perpetuated women's pre-existing disadvantage.

Justices Côté, Brown, and Rowe thought that s 15(2) was applicable. They also argued that in a case where the claimant group is the same group that is targeted by the ameliorative program in question, s 15(2) should not be addressed until after both steps of the s 15(1) test are completed. Their reasons for reordering Kapp's stages of analysis and on the application of s 15(2) in Alliance follow.]

[74] According to the principles that were laid down in R. v. Kapp, 2008 SCC 41, [2008] 2 S.C.R. 483, and reaffirmed in Alberta (Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development) v. Cunningham, 2011 SCC 37, [2011] 2 S.C.R. 670, at para. 44, whether s. 15(2) applies should generally be determined before turning to the second step of the s. 15(1) analysis. In Kapp, the Court found that the advantage of dividing the analysis in this way was to make it unnecessary to conclude that the equality guarantee had been violated before saving the measure under s. 15(2) ...

[75] ... It is true that in [some] circumstances, there is a certain advantage to not explicitly acknowledging that a measure has discriminatory effects on one or more groups to which it does not apply before concluding that those effects are justified by the objective of achieving substantive equality for another group that is disadvantaged. In that situation, the proposed approach is not really problematic.

[76] In the case at bar, it is the group to which an enumerated ground applies that raises the discriminatory nature of the effects of a law whose specific object is the amelioration of conditions of the group's members. If the approach proposed in Kapp were applied, it would have the effect of terminating the analysis prematurely. It is not impossible or unimaginable that even though a law genuinely has the amelioration of a group's conditions as its object, its effect might be to widen the prejudicial and discriminatory gap in relation to the rest of society . . . The group to which the measure or law applies would then find itself in a constitutional cul-de-sac: even though the effects of a government action would ultimately exacerbate the discrimination against the group, the courts would have to defer to the government because its intentions were benevolent. But such a situation would be contrary to the approach favoured by this Court in the equality context: Andrews, at p. 182; Quebec v. A., at para. 333.

[77] It is our opinion that such circumstances require us to defer the s. 15(2) analysis until after the entire s. 15(1) analysis has been completed. First of all, that will make it possible to determine whether the government action creates or perpetuates a discriminatory disadvantage. It is, obviously, not necessary to "save" a measure that does not violate s. 15. In addition, the second step of the s. 15(1) analysis will help in identifying the law's real object. Thus, if a law establishes mechanisms that create no benefit for the group, it probably does not genuinely have the amelioration of the group's conditions as its object. It will be more difficult to rule on this point if the law creates both benefits and disadvantages. Although the test remains objective, and deferential to the legislature's preferences, there is no question that the true effect of the measures the legislature adopts can be taken into account: Kapp, at para. 49.

[78] Finally, the approach we recommend in this case is consistent with the combined effect of s. 15(1) and s. 15(2), namely to promote substantive equality: Kapp, at para. 16. It should be borne in mind that the Court acknowledged in Kapp that the test it was proposing at that time was only at an early stage in the development of the case law on s. 15(2) and that "future cases may demand some adjustment to the framework" (para. 41).

[79] In Cunningham, the Court was right to decline to alter the analytical framework for a group that was arguing that its exclusion from a program conferring a benefit on another group with characteristics similar to its own to which an enumerated ground applied was unconstitutional (para. 53). . . We are of the view that in such cases in which a group or subset of a group is included under one of the enumerated or analogous groups but is otherwise excluded from the group to which the measure specifically applies, it will always be appropriate to follow the approach from Kapp, because the advantage of doing so will remain relevant.

[80] In sum, it is only where the claimant is a member of the group to which the law specifically applies that the s. 15(2) analysis should be deferred until after that of s. 15(1). In any situation in which the claimant is not a member of the group, the order set out in Kapp should be followed.

[After finding that the amendments did not violate s 15(1), Côté, Brown, and Rowe JJ turned to s 15(2):]

[107] Alternatively, even if it were to be held that the specific mechanism created by the statutory amendments can be considered discriminatory, the Act as a whole should be protected under s. 15(2).

[108] According to the principles laid down in Cunningham, what must be determined is whether the law has a genuine ameliorative object

[109] Furthermore, a distinction that serves or advances the ameliorative object has the effect of supporting the goal of s. 15 of the Charter, namely the promotion of substantive equality: Cunningham, at para. 45.

[110] In Kapp, the Court referred to the role of s. 15(2) in supporting the implementation of measures to combat systemic discrimination. Given that Quebec's National Assembly has answered the call in this regard, the entire Act should be protected

[111] There is no doubt that the Act genuinely has the promotion and achievement of substantive equality as its object. The correlation between that object and the chosen mechanism is clear, even if the mechanism is not perfect. The appeal should also fail at this stage of the analysis.

[Given their conclusion on ss 15(1) and 15(2), Côté, Brown, and Rowe JJ did not consider s 1. For the majority, Abella J found that the 2009 amendments could not be justified under s 1.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In the companion pay equity decision to Alliance, Centrale des syndicats du Québec v Quebec (AG), 2018 SCC 18, Abella J wrote for a majority of five and found that s 15(2) was inapplicable to the Pay Equity Act. She stated that the government could only invoke s 15(2) when there is a claim by a person or group who is excluded from the program that their exclusion is discriminatory (at paras 37, 39). The claimants, who were challenging the delay in the Act for women in workplaces with no male comparators, were not excluded from the scheme but were challenging its discriminatory impact. Justice Côté, writing for four justices, did not find it necessary to consider s 15(2) given her conclusion that the Act did not violate s 15(1), but she stated that this silence should not be taken as endorsing Abella J's reasons on s 15(2) (at para 152).

2. Kapp, Cunningham, and Alliance/Centrale could be seen as cases involving three different types of challenges to ameliorative programs—a program alleged to involve “reverse discrimination” (Kapp), an underinclusive ameliorative program (Cunningham), and an ameliorative program that is aimed at the group who is challenging some aspect of the program (Alliance/Centrale). Do you think this categorization is helpful in understanding the Court’s evolving approach to s 15(2)? Does it help explain why in Kapp, the Court deliberately avoided the language of “saving” because of the “symbolic problem of finding a program discriminatory before ‘saving’ it as ameliorative” (at para 40), but then used the language of “saving” in Cunningham and the pay equity cases? Does it help explain why in Kapp, the Court took the position that s 15(2) precludes the review of distinctions under s 15(1) that “serve and are necessary to” the ameliorative purpose (at para 52), but in Cunningham, this standard was revised to “serves or advances” (at para 45)? Does it help explain why in the pay equity cases, a majority of the Court found that s 15(2) should not apply in the third category of cases, where the ameliorative program is aimed at the same group who is challenging it? Do you agree that it is appropriate to approach ameliorative programs differently under s 15(2) depending on who is challenging the program and on what basis?

3. What is your reaction to the argument of the dissenting justices in Alliance that s 15(2) should not be assessed until after both steps of s 15(1), at least for the third type of case? Their rationale was that it is appropriate to assess the discriminatory impact of the program on the claimants before considering whether it can be saved. Does this rationale apply to the second type of case as well, that is, to “underinclusion” cases in which a different disadvantaged group or subgroup seeks to have an ameliorative program or law extended to them? If so, should the steps be reordered in this type of case as well, with s 15(2) coming after a full s 15(1) analysis? For a discussion, see Jonnette Watson Hamilton & Jennifer Koshan, "The Supreme Court, Ameliorative Programs and Disability: Not Getting It" (2013) 25 CJWL 56; Jena McGill, "Section 15(2), Ameliorative Programs and Proportionality Review" (2013) 63 SCLR (2d) 521; Jena McGill, "R v Kapp" (2018) 30:2 CJWL 221.

4. In Kapp, the Court characterized the claim as one of "reverse discrimination." This term has been popular in the United States, where—as noted in Kapp—the courts have tended to strike down affirmative action programs, using a "strict scrutiny" approach. But should the claims of relatively advantaged groups who seek to strike down ameliorative programs aimed at disadvantaged groups be seen as discrimination at all? What does a focus on substantive equality as the purpose of s 15 suggest about the use of the term "reverse discrimination"? For an alternative term, see the Women's Court of Canada judgment in Kapp by Kasari Govender and Tess Shelton, who propose that the term "equality regressive claim" be used instead: "R v Kapp" (2018) 30:2 CJWL 248.

In Cunningham, McLachlin CJ reiterated that "the purpose of s. 15(2) is to save ameliorative programs from the charge of 'reverse discrimination'" (at para 41); she also stated that s 15(2) ensures that "the charge of discrimination is not abused for purposes unrelated to an ameliorative program's object and the goal of substantive equality" (at para 49). Section 15(2) was applied in Cunningham to "save" the Metis Settlement Act, RSA 2000, c M-14 [MSA] as an ameliorative program, but were the claimants in Cunningham making a charge of "reverse discrimination" or "abusing" the language of "discrimination"? Recall that McLachlin CJ characterized the MSA as a "special type of ameliorative program" aimed at a constitutionally recognized Aboriginal group (at paras 54, 60). Does this characterization suggest that Cunningham should be restricted to its facts, leaving open the possibility of a different outcome under s 15(2) for other claims of underinclusion?

5. Another alternative for protecting legislation and government policies involving Indigenous peoples is s 25 of the Charter. Section 25 provides:

25 The guarantee in this Charter of certain rights and freedoms shall not be construed so as to abrogate or derogate from any aboriginal, treaty or other rights or freedoms that pertain to the aboriginal peoples of Canada including

- (a) any rights or freedoms that have been recognized by the Royal Proclamation of October 7, 1763; and
- (b) any rights or freedoms that now exist by way of land claims agreements or may be so acquired.

The first s 15(1) case where s 25 was argued in the Supreme Court was Corbiere v Canada (Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs), [1999] 2 SCR 203, 1999 CanLII 687, excerpted in Section II.C. An intervener, the Lesser Slave Lake Indian Regional Council, argued that s 25 should shield a First Nation's right to control its own membership, including who was entitled to live on the reserve and to vote in band council elections. The Court did not apply s 25, finding that it "would be inappropriate to articulate general principles" on the section because of the limited argument on the issue (at paras 20 [McLachlin and Bastarache JJ], 51-54 [L'Heureux Dubé JJ]).

In Kapp, Bastarache J wrote a concurring decision in which he decided the challenge to the 24-hour priority fishery was based on s 25 rather than s 15(2). After considering legislative history and academic and judicial commentary, Bastarache J found that s 25 was intended to work as a shield and not just as an interpretive provision, with the purpose of "protecting the rights of aboriginal peoples where the application of the Charter protections for individuals would diminish the distinctive, collective and cultural identity of an aboriginal group" (at para 89). He was of the view that the words "aboriginal, treaty or other rights or freedoms" in s 25 should be interpreted broadly so as to protect "federal, provincial and Aboriginal initiatives that seek to further interests associated with indigenous difference from Charter scrutiny" (at para 103). Justice Bastarache formulated a three-step approach to s 25:

[111] ... The first step requires an evaluation of the claim in order to establish the nature of the substantive Charter right and whether the claim is made out, prima facie. The second step requires an evaluation of the native right to establish whether it falls under s. 25. The third step requires a determination of the existence of a true conflict between the Charter right and the native right.

Applying this test, he found that although the priority fishing licence constituted a prima facie breach of s 15(1), the case involved fishing rights that were protected by s 25, and the conflict between those rights triggered the shield in s 25 (at paras 112-23).

Chief Justice McLachlin and Abella J, writing in obiter in light of their holding that s 15(2) protected the fishery, viewed the scope of s 25 more narrowly. They questioned whether s 25 should operate as a shield rather than as an interpretive provision and suggested that s 25 might protect "only rights of a constitutional character" (at para 63), indicating that [65] [t]hese issues raise complex questions of the utmost importance to the peaceful reconciliation of aboriginal entitlements with the interests of all Canadians ... [and] are best left for resolution on a case-by-case basis as they arise before the Court.

For critiques of the majority's lack of full engagement with s 25, see Sophia Moreau, "R v Kapp: New Directions for Section 15" (2008-2009) 40:2 Ottawa L Rev 283 at 297-98; Dominique Nouvet, "R v Kapp: A Case of Unfulfilled Potential" (2010) 8:1 Indigenous LJ 81 at 91-93.

Kapp remains the only Supreme Court decision in which s 25 has been addressed at any length. In Taypotat, discussed in Sections II.A, Note 12 following Andrews, and II.C, s 25 was not invoked by the Kahkewistahaw First Nation, although their argument emphasized the First Nation's collective adoption of the community election code and its education requirement. Gordon Christie has argued that community election codes could be seen as "aboriginal, treaty or other rights" under s 25 (see "Aboriginal Citizenship: Sections 35, 25 and 15 of Canada's Constitution Act, 1982" (2003) 7:4 Citizenship Studies 481 at 485-87). Recalling that Bastarache J's approach in Kapp was developed in the context of a s 15(1) challenge to a Canadian government-issued licence by largely non-Indigenous fishers, should his approach to s 25 apply in the same way to claims in which a First Nation member challenges their own government's laws or policies under s 15(1)? Would s 25 have been a better basis for resolving the claim in Taypotat, rather than relying on the lack of "arbitrary disadvantage" under s 15(1)? See Jennifer Koshan & Jonnette Watson Hamilton, "Kahkewistahaw First Nation v Taypotat—Whither Section 25 of the Charter?" (2016) 25:2 Const Forum Const 39.

6. How would s 15(2) have applied in Vriend if the Alberta government had invoked it to defend its decision not to include sexual orientation as a prohibited ground in its human rights legislation? Is human rights legislation the sort of ameliorative program that s 15(2) was intended to protect or is it better seen as "broad societal legislation" beyond the scope of s 15(2), similar to the Court's example of social assistance programs in Kapp (at para 55)?

7. Section 15(2) was not considered in Fraser v Canada (AG) (excerpted in Section II.A). Could the pension buy-back rights targeted at job-sharing employees have been defended by the government under s 15(2)? How would this approach differ from Brown and Rowe JJ's approach of considering the ameliorative nature of the pension scheme under s 15(1)? What does the failure to consider s 15(2) in Fraser suggest about the ongoing relevance of s 15(2) in cases involving underinclusive benefit schemes? See Carissima Mathen, "Equality Before the Charter: Reflections on Fraser v Canada" (2021) SCLR (2d) (forthcoming).

8. Should s 15(2) have been considered in R v CP in relation to the YCJA? Recall from the discussion of this case in Section II.A, Note 2 following Fraser, that Wagner CJ found the YCJA to be ameliorative overall under s 15(1) while Abella J focused on the impugned section of the YCJA, s 37(10), which in her view denied young persons the benefit of an automatic right of appeal that is available to adults under the Criminal Code. How does Wagner CJ's view of the YCJA align with the Court's decision in Kapp, where they suggested that "laws designed to restrict or punish behaviour would not qualify for s 15(2) protection" (at para 54)? If a law cannot be protected as "an ameliorative program" under s 15(2), should it be seen as ameliorative under s 15(1)?

9. David Schneiderman has argued that equality rights claims for inclusion in what the Court considers to be universalistic schemes—schemes which seemingly are intended to embrace everyone, including the middle class—are more likely to be successful than are claims seeking access to targeted or means-tested plans, where fundamental distinctions between classes, ... are built into the very structure of the program.

See "Universality vs Particularity: Litigating Middle Class Values Under Section 15" in Sheila McIntyre & Sandra Rodgers, eds, Diminishing Returns: Inequality and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (Toronto: LexisNexis Canada, 2006) 367 at 369. How does this argument play out when you compare Kapp and Cunningham with Vriend and Eldridge? More generally, do you think the Court has shown the right amount of deference to governments under s 15(2)?

IV. THE INTERPLAY BETWEEN SECTION 15, SECTION 1, AND REMEDIES

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In Andrews (excerpted in Section II.A), the judges agreed on their approach to s 15(1), including the point that it was inappropriate to consider the reasonableness of the differential treatment being reviewed under s 15(1); this was a matter for s 1 of the Charter. However, they split on the appropriate role for s 1 in equality cases. Justice McIntyre, dissenting in the result, favoured relaxing the Oakes test because "the section 15(1) guarantee is the broadest of all guarantees" and should not unduly hinder government from making the "innumerable legislative distinctions and categorizations" that are an unavoidable aspect of governing (at 185). He suggested that the "pressing and substantial objective" requirement of Oakes was "too stringent" in the context of equality claims (at 184). He favoured upholding violations of equality rights if governments were pursuing sound objectives in a reasonable manner. Applying this approach to the citizenship requirement at issue, McIntyre J concluded that it was a reasonable means of ensuring that members of the legal profession are qualified.

The majority judgments of Wilson and La Forest JJ disagreed with McIntyre J's approach to s 1. Justice Wilson stated (at 154) that the Oakes test remains an appropriate standard when it is recognized that not every distinction between individuals and groups will violate s. 15. If every distinction between individuals and groups gave rise to a violation of s. 15, then this standard might well be too stringent for application in all cases and might deny the community at large the benefits associated with sound and desirable social and economic legislation. This is not a concern, however, once the position that every distinction drawn by law constitutes discrimination is rejected as indeed it is in the judgment of my colleague, McIntyre J. Given that s. 15 is designed to protect those groups who suffer social, political and legal disadvantage in our society, the burden resting on government to justify the type of discrimination against such groups is appropriately an onerous one.

Justice La Forest wrote that, in contrast to McIntyre J's departure from Oakes, he preferred "to think in terms of a single test for s. 1," although it "must be approached in a flexible manner" (at 198). In the end, both Wilson and La Forest JJ concluded that the citizenship requirement was not closely tailored to the objective of ensuring that candidates for admission to the bar had a sufficient understanding of and commitment to Canadian institutions.

2. Justice McIntyre's dissenting approach to s 1 in Andrews has now faded into history, with courts applying the Oakes test in those s 15 cases where a violation of equality rights is found. However, few s 15 cases have reached s 1. This is explained in part by the continuing importation of s 1 considerations into the s 15 analysis by the Supreme Court (or some members thereof) in spite of Andrews, as discussed throughout this chapter. Section 15(1) cases may also fail to reach s 1 where s 15(2) is used to defend against the claimant group's challenge to an ameliorative program, or where s 25 is applied to shield Aboriginal rights claims from s 15 challenges (see Section III).

In s 15 cases that do reach s 1, the analysis may differ depending on the nature of the claim and whether it involves benefits or burdens. In the remainder of this note we review a number of cases discussing the justifiability of exclusions from benefits based on sex and sexual orientation. Cases involving justifications of burdens are dealt with in the next note.

In cases involving the deprivation of benefits or the failure to include a group in a benefit scheme, courts will typically focus on the overall purpose of the law, the impugned provisions, and the purpose of the exclusion.

One example of this approach is Vriend (excerpted in Section II.B), where the Court considered the purpose of Alberta's human rights legislation as a whole, the purpose of the protections against discrimination for specific groups, and the purpose of omitting sexual orientation from those provisions. Looking at the government's purpose at these different levels can assist courts in identifying whether a discriminatory omission or exclusion was made for a pressing and substantial reason, whether it was rationally connected to the overall objective of the legislation, and whether it met the minimal impairment and proportionality stages. The Court was unanimous that the omission of sexual orientation from Alberta's human rights legislation did not have a pressing and substantial objective, which was sufficient to dispose of the government's s 1 arguments. According to Iacobucci J:

[116] Often, the objective of an omission is discernible from the Act as a whole. Where it is not, one can look to the effects of the omission. ... As I noted above, the overall goal of the IRPA is the protection of the dignity and rights of all persons living in Alberta. The exclusion of sexual orientation from the Act effectively denies gay men and lesbians such protection. In my view, where, as here, a legislative omission is on its face the very antithesis of the principles embodied in the legislation as a whole, the Act itself cannot be said to indicate any discernible objective for the omission that might be described as pressing and substantial so as to justify overriding constitutionally protected rights. Thus, on either analysis, the respondents' case fails at the initial step of the Oakes test.

Recall that in Egan (discussed in Section II.A, Note 6 following Andrews and II.C), decided just three years before Vriend, five members of the Court found that the exclusion of same-sex couples from spousal benefits under the Old Age Security Act violated s 15(1), but one of those five—Sopinka J—found the violation justified under s 1. Because four other members of the Court had found no s 15 violation, Sopinka J's swing vote determined the outcome. He focused on the overall objective of the legislation, which was seen as the "alleviation of poverty of elderly spouses" (at 574). Justice Sopinka believed that it was reasonable for the government to take an incremental approach to achieve this objective, which it had done over time through the extension of the benefits from married spouses to those in common law relationships, for example. If Sopinka J had also examined the objective of excluding same-sex couples, do you think the result in Egan would have been different? Justice Sopinka also noted (at 572) that [i]t is not realistic for the Court to assume that there are unlimited funds to address the needs of all. A judicial approach on this basis would tend to make a government reluctant to create any new social benefit schemes.

Another example of a case involving underinclusive benefit-conferring legislation is M v H (excerpted in Section II.B). A majority of the Court found the exclusion of same-sex partners from the definition of "spouse" in the spousal support provisions of family legislation violated s 15. Under s 1, the objectives of both the spousal support scheme and the omission were considered by the majority (Iacobucci J) and in separate concurring judgments by Major and Bastarache JJ. Justice Iacobucci found that the objective of the scheme was [4] ... the equitable resolution of economic disputes that arise when intimate relationships between individuals who have been financially interdependent break down, and alleviating the burden on the public purse to provide for dependent spouses.

The exclusion of same-sex partners was not rationally connected to these objectives. According to Iacobucci J, "If anything, the goals of the legislation are undermined by the impugned exclusion" (at para 4). Justice Major generally concurred with these reasons.

Justice Bastarache wrote a lengthy s 1 analysis, in which he found that the primary legislative purpose of having extended spousal support obligations from married to common law couples was to address the disadvantaged economic position of women in nonmarital, opposite-sex relationships. He found that this objective was pressing and substantial. However, he agreed that it was necessary to also examine the reasons for excluding same-sex partners from the definition of spouse, and he could find no pressing and substantial reason for this exclusion. Even if the purposes of the exclusion were to promote the traditional family or economic equality in family relationships, the exclusion of same-sex partners bore no rational connection to these objectives. Justice Gonthier, dissenting, agreed with Bastarache J on the overall purpose of the law, but he applied this purpose under s 15(1) in accordance with the "correspondence factor" from the Law test and found that the exclusion of same-sex partners did not violate s 15.

The cost to government of extending the legislative benefits in Vriend and M v H were negligible—indeed, in M v H extending private spousal support obligations to same-sex couples was found to alleviate the burden on the public purse. Is the cost of extending the benefits in question another way to explain the difference between the outcomes in Vriend and M v H as compared with Egan?

More recently, in Fraser (excerpted in Section II.A), the majority decision of Abella J also focused on the purpose of excluding job-sharing RCMP members from full pension benefits and had difficulty identifying a pressing and substantial basis for this exclusion. Justice Abella reiterated that "it is the limitation on equality rights that must be justified, not the legislative scheme as a whole" (at para 125, emphasis in original). She went on to state:

[128] Job-sharing was clearly intended as a substitute for leave without pay for those members who could not take such leave "due to personal or family circumstances." It is unclear, then, what purpose is served by treating the two forms of work reduction differently when extending pension buy-back rights. The RCMP's plan provides buy-back rights when a full-time member reduces her hours from 40 to 0 to care for her child, but, inexplicably, withholds such rights if the same member for the same reasons reduces her hours from 40 to 10, 20, 30 or some other number. And this despite the RCMP benefitting from the member's services in the latter scenario. I see no justification for this limitation, let alone a pressing and substantial one.

How significant do you think it was to Abella J's s 1 analysis that job-sharing RCMP members had to pay the costs of "buying back" their full pension benefits themselves, paying both the employer's and the employee's contributions? For a discussion, see Sonia Lawrence, "Critical Reflections on Fraser: What Equality Are We Seeking?" (2021) 30:2 Const Forum Const 43.

In one of the 2018 pay equity cases—Centrale (discussed in Section II.A, Note 13 following Andrews)—the issue was also the exclusion of a particular group from benefits, namely employees in female-dominated positions where there were no male comparator groups, such as child care workers. These employees were not altogether excluded from pay equity benefits, however; rather, they were subject to a six-year delay in their receipt of pay equity while the Pay Equity Commission developed a methodology for assessing "work of equal value" in this context. Of the five-person majority who found that this delay violated s 15(1), four of the five found the delay to be justifiable under s 1. Justice Abella, writing for this group, accepted the government's argument that the delay was "necessary to finding the right approach" (at para 43). She also accepted that "the delay in developing and implementing a credible methodology is rationally connected to the objective of creating the possibility of an effective remedy" (at para 44). At the minimal impairment stage, while the six-year delay was "troubling," it was within reasonable bounds (at paras 48–50). Justice Abella also found that the delay struck a reasonable balance at the proportionality stage between the positive effects of Quebec's efforts to take a pioneering approach to pay equity and the negative consequences of the delay for employees, even though they would not get retroactive compensation for their unequal pay over the six-year period. Chief Justice McLachlin dissented on this point and found that the six-year delay could not be justified under s 1.

Although it was not cited by Abella J, the Court came to a similar conclusion that a delay in pay equity payments was justified under s 1 in Newfoundland (Treasury Board) v NAPE, 2004 SCC 66 [NAPE]. In NAPE, a legislated delay in pay equity was found to be justified under s 1 in light of a "fiscal crisis" in Newfoundland and Labrador (at para 85). For commentary on this decision, see Jennifer Kosan's Women's Court of Canada judgment, "Newfoundland (Treasury Board) v NAPE" (2006) 18:1 CJWL 321; Fay Faraday, "One Step-Forward, Two Steps Back? Substantive Equality, Systemic Discrimination and Pay Equity at the Supreme Court of Canada."

Does it help to think of Centrale and NAPE as examples of justifiable incrementalism in extending government benefits, similar to Sopinka J's reasoning in Egan? Do you think government arguments about budgetary or administrative considerations should be a pressing and substantial basis for refusing to extend, or delaying, benefits to members of disadvantaged groups? What are the implications of these decisions for cases involving positive obligations, such as Tanudjaja (discussed in Sections II.B, Note 6 following Eldridge and II.C)? Would it be more appropriate for courts to deal with cost concerns at the remedy stage, rather than under s 15 and/or s 1? See Schachter v Canada, [1992] 2 SCR 679, 1992 CanLII 74, discussed in Chapter 25.

3. In cases involving legislation that imposes discriminatory burdens rather than benefits, the legislation typically has a different sort of purpose. Many of these cases involve criminal or quasi-criminal legislation that has the objective of protecting other groups.

For example, in Ontario (AG) v G, discussed in Section II.A, Note 1 following Fraser, the sex offender registry could be seen as a "headwinds" or "burdens" type of case for persons found not criminally responsible by reason of mental disorder (NCRMD). However, because the burdens of the registry could be alleviated by way of "exit ramps" for some persons found guilty of sexual offences, but not for persons found NCRMD, this could also be seen as a case involving the discriminatory deprivation of a benefit. The Court unanimously agreed that the ongoing burden of the registry without the benefit of exit ramps for persons found NCRMD could not be justified under s 1, with the legislation failing at the minimal impairment stage. The same could be said of R v CP, also discussed in Section II.A at Note 2 following Fraser.

where at least some members of the Court considered the requirement to apply for leave to appeal to be a burden for young persons charged with criminal offences, but also saw this burden as the denial of the benefit of an automatic right of appeal that was accorded to adults in some circumstances.

A more straightforward case of government action imposing burdens would be the criminal cases discussed as examples of adverse effects discrimination in Section II.B, Note 2 following Eldridge, where laws such as mandatory minimum sentences may have an adverse impact on members of groups who are disproportionately criminalized—i.e., those who are racialized and Indigenous. In these types of cases, the government's overall goals of protecting victims of crime may be easily identified, but it may be harder to discern any objective behind the discriminatory impact of the law because, by definition, that impact is unintentional. How would the Oakes test apply in cases involving legislation that imposes burdens that adversely impact members of disadvantaged groups? Given what we know about the systemic inequalities of the criminal justice system, can the Oakes framework be used to require governments to justify their failure to consider how criminal law reforms will adversely impact racialized and Indigenous persons?

Generally speaking, is it helpful to think about cases involving benefits and burdens differently under s 1?

4. As we have seen in this chapter, courts have continued to struggle with whether considerations related to the government's objectives and actions—such as the ameliorative purpose of legislation and the reasonableness or relevance of distinctions—belong under s 15(1), s 15(2), or s 1. This debate has led to some decisions where the Court has split in many different directions. For example, in Quebec (AG) v A (discussed in Section II.A, Note 11 following Andrews), three members of the Court joined LeBel J in stating choice of relationship status was best considered under s 15, which led to a finding that the exclusion of common law couples from the provisions did not violate s 15. Four members of the Court, including McLachlin CJ, joined Abella J in holding that autonomy and choice of personal relationships were best considered under s 1 and concluded that the exclusion did violate s 15. Chief Justice McLachlin then used personal autonomy to justify the exclusion under s 1, with Deschamps and Charron JJ agreeing that the property exclusion could be justified, but not the support exclusion. Overall, the exclusion of common law couples from Quebec's family law provisions on spousal support and family property division was upheld by a majority of the Court.

We see a similar split in R v CP, where four judges in a decision written by Wagner CJ considered the ameliorative nature of the YCJA for accused young persons, complainants, and society under s 15(1) and concluded that there was no violation of s 15. Writing for three judges, Abella J postponed the consideration of the ameliorative nature of the YCJA to s 1 and found a violation of s 15(1). Justice Kasirer agreed with Abella J as to the violation of s 15 but found that the violation could be justified under s 1. Overall, the requirement for young persons to apply for leave to appeal was upheld by a 5–3 majority of the Court (with Côté J not addressing the Charter issues).

In his reasons in R v CP, Kasirer J observed that "there is something of a 'normative mismatch'" between s 15 and s 1 of the Charter because "section 15 could be seen as an attempt to protect from the 'tyranny of the majority' ... and section 1 brings back the idea that the needs of the whole might, on balance, justify discrimination" (at para 174, quoting Sonia Lawrence, "Equality and Anti-discrimination: The Relationship Between Government Goals and Finding Discrimination in Section 15" in P Oliver, P Macklem & N Des Rosiers, eds, The Oxford Handbook of the Canadian Constitution (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2017) 815 at 829). What is your reaction to Kasirer J's "normative mismatch" point? Is this an explanation for why courts continue to struggle with the interplay between equality/discrimination and justification analyses? Is this struggle in analytical approach inevitable in the context of systemic inequality and differing judicial ideologies about the role of governments and courts in this context?

5. Recall that in Ontario (AG) v G and R v CP, the Courts were presented with arguments under s 7 of the Charter in addition to s 15. This is not uncommon in equality rights claims that challenge laws and other government actions in the criminal justice context. Indeed, before these two recent cases, courts often ruled on the s 7 issue but not the s 15 issue (see Jennifer Kosan, "Redressing the Harms of Government (In)Action: A Section 7 Versus Section 15 Charter Showdown" (2013) 22 Const Forum Const 31). For example, in Carter v Canada (AG), 2015 SCC 5 (discussed in Chapter 22), the Court found that the criminal prohibition against assisted suicide violated s 7, but it did not consider the claimants' s 15 arguments. At trial, Smith J had found that the prohibition adversely affected persons with disabilities because they often could not die by suicide without assistance. At the Supreme Court, the s 7 violation was not justified under s 1, and the prohibition was struck down with a suspended declaration of invalidity.

In Ontario (AG) v G, the majority (Karakatsanis J) indicated that violations of different Charter rights might make a difference to the appropriate remedies:

[77] Given that I have concluded that Christopher's Law violates s. 15(1) in its application to persons found NCRMD and that G's s. 7 claim does not extend beyond those persons, it is not necessary to address whether Christopher's Law also violates s. 7. As I will explain, because the privacy and liberty interests of those found NCRMD are the very interests that are unequally burdened by Christopher's Law, they inform the remedy for the breach of s. 15(1). It is therefore not necessary to determine whether there is also a breach of s. 7 in order to inform the appropriate remedy. Further, addressing some of the s. 7 arguments would have an impact on the broader issue of the nature of the registry's effects on all registrants and whether the entire scheme complies with s. 7; such determinations are best left for another case.

How might the finding of multiple Charter violations affect the s 1 analysis and/or the analysis of remedies? For example, if the Court had considered s 15 arguments and adverse effects discrimination against persons with disabilities in Carter, rather than focusing on s 7, how might that have made a difference to the s 1 analysis and remedies? At what stage should we consider the concerns of persons with disabilities who argue that medical assistance in dying (MAiD) perpetuates systemic inequality by diminishing the value of disabled lives? See Isabel Grant & Elizabeth Sheehy, "Focus on Dignified Lives, Not Facilitated Deaths" The Lawyers Daily (24 March 2021), arguing that the new approach to MAiD adopted in Bill C-7 in 2021, which removed the requirement of a reasonably foreseeable natural death, has "dubious benefits" for people with disabilities and that, because women and Indigenous peoples experience disability at disproportionate rates, they are "less likely to have access to the resources necessary to ameliorate suffering and more likely to need to resist 'Do Not Resuscitate' orders and to justify the value of their lives." For the view that persons with disabilities "must have the same right to autonomy and end-of-life choice" as persons without disabilities and that the new MAiD regime includes adequate safeguards for persons with disabilities, see "Bill C-7: Myths and Facts," online: Dying with Dignity Canada <https://www.dyingwithdignity.ca/bill_c7_myths_and_facts#safeguards>. See also David Lepofsky, "Carter v Canada (Attorney General), The Constitutional Attack on Canada's Ban on Assisted Dying: Missing an Obvious Chance to Rule on the Charter's Disability Equality Guarantee" (2016) 76 SCLR (2d) 89.

6. In addition to cases in which courts must consider the justification of violations of s 15 under s 1, there are other cases where violations of other Charter rights or freedoms have included consideration of equality interests under s 1. See, for example, one of the freedom of expression cases discussed in Chapter 20, R v Keegstra, [\[1990\] 3 SCR 697, 1990 CanLII 24](#). In Keegstra, the majority found the criminal prohibition against hate speech to be justified under s 1, recognizing the importance of protecting the target groups from hate speech and Canada's "strong commitment to the values of equality and multiculturalism" under s 15 and s 27 of the Charter (Dickson CJ at 755). Can you think of other cases where the Court has considered equality values under s 1 of the Charter?

7. In Doré v Barreau du Québec, 2012 SCC 12, excerpted in Chapter 17, The Framework of the Charter, the Court developed an approach for Charter challenges to the actions of administrative decision-makers that was elaborated on in Loyola High School v Quebec (AG), 2015 SCC 12. The Doré/Loyola approach requires the Court to determine (1) if the administrative decision limits Charter rights or values, and (2) whether the limitation reflects a proportionate balancing of the Charter protections at issue in light of the statutory objectives and factual context.

There have been no Supreme Court cases to date where the Doré/Loyola approach has been used to assess administrative actions that are alleged to violate s 15(1). However, the Doré/Loyola approach was employed in Law Society of British Columbia v Trinity Western University, 2018 SCC 32 [LSBC v TWU] and Trinity Western University v Law Society of Upper Canada, 2018 SCC 33 [TWU v LSUC], in the context of decisions by two Canadian law societies to deny accreditation to a proposed law school at an evangelical Christian university. Trinity Western University (TWU) required students to abide by a Community Covenant Agreement, which prohibited "sexual intimacy that violates the sacredness of marriage between a man and a woman" (LSBC v TWU at para 1). TWU and a prospective law student argued that the law societies' decisions violated s 2(a) of the Charter. At the Supreme Court, a majority held that the decisions not to approve TWU's proposed law school struck a proportionate balance between the limit on religious freedom under s 2(a) and the statutory objectives that the law societies pursued, which included protection of the equality rights of LGBTQ2+ law students and their equal access to the legal profession. See LSBC v TWU (at para 40); TWU v LSUC (at para 20) (Abella, Moldaver, Karakatsanis, Wagner, and Gascon JJ). Imagine that TWU law school was approved and that an LGBTQ2+ law student faced disciplinary consequences from TWU for violating the Community Covenant's prohibition against sexual intimacy outside of heterosexual marriage. Assuming the Doré/Loyola approach applied to TWU's disciplinary decision, how would it apply to these facts? See Heather Shippley, "Sites of Resistance: LGBTQI+ Experiences at Trinity Western University" (2020) 35:1 CJLS 111. LANGUAGE RIGHTS

A. The Federal Bargain	24-6
B. Charter Language Rights	24-9
III. Interpreting Language Rights	24-9
IV. Proposals for Constitutional Amendment	24-35

I. INTRODUCTION

At every stage of Canada's constitutional development, language has been a matter of the highest importance. Surprisingly, this preoccupation with language does not appear explicitly in those parts of the Constitution where one might expect it. For example, neither ss 91 nor 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 contains a specific enumerated power on the subject of language. Instead, language is treated as an ancillary matter, permitting both levels of government to legislate with respect to it, subject to any specific limitations in the Constitution.

Section 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867 marked a compromise essential to Confederation by setting down rules for language use in government and judicial proceedings both federally and in Quebec. As noted in Chapter 4, The Late Nineteenth Century: The Courts Set an Initial Course, similar guarantees were inserted in the Manitoba Act, 1870.

The Charter provisions relating to language (ss 16-23) present a more modern understanding of entitlements for those who are members of French and English minority language communities. This pattern is reflected in the amendment provisions of the Constitution Act, 1982, which make special provision for changes to the Constitution with respect to language (ss 41(c), 43(b)).

In addition to these specific provisions, more general provisions may apply. While language is not included in the prohibited grounds of discrimination in the equality guarantee (s 15), it could someday be treated as an analogous ground, and language cases have arisen as division of powers concerns as well as freedom of expression claims under the Charter.

Before turning to language rights litigation in our courts, this chapter provides an introduction to the values and history underlying claims to constitutional protection of language rights. When you read the cases, you will see that the Supreme Court, at times, treats language claims like fundamental human rights and, at others, approaches them as less universal forms of entitlements not subject to the purposive mode of interpretation. The latter approach is based on the idea that language rights are rooted in historical, political compromises particular to Canada. As well, while language rights may involve individuals, they are also a form of group rights.

A Braën, "Language Rights" in Michel Bastarache, ed, Language Rights in Canada (Montreal: Éditions Yvon Blais, 1987) 3 at 25-30 (footnotes omitted)

The language issue has always been a dominant theme in Canadian life. Indeed, it was raised during the colonial period, from the first contacts between the French and English settlers and the native populations. ...

The French language arrived in this country at the beginning of the colonial period, with the first settlers from France. Contacts were quickly established between the French and English settlers who, in disregard of the native inhabitants, were in conflict over the possession of the territory. In 1713, by the Treaty of Utrecht, France surrendered to England its territory of Acadia which comprised, at that time, a large part of what are today the Maritime Provinces. The treaty preserved the freedom of the catholic religion, subject to the laws of England. No provision of the treaty referred to the language question but by the change in sovereignty, English became the language of administration. The English language rapidly became, especially after the Deportation of 1755, the only language of legislation and of the courts in the Maritime Provinces.

In Canada, with the surrender of Quebec in 1759, the evolution was different. The Articles of Capitulation of Quebec guaranteed the freedom of exercise of the catholic religion but did not refer to the question of language. Section 42 of the Articles of Capitulation of Montreal, 1760, provided for the continuation of the customs of the French population. Did this terminology form the basis for a certain protection of the French language? In any event, General Amherst merely stated that the inhabitants had become subjects of the king. Under the military government, caution seems to have been the guiding principle. The government allowed the use of the French language in the courts and in the drafting of ordinances. Indeed, this constitutes the origin of functional bilingualism in the legislation and in the administration of justice in Quebec.

In 1763, the Treaty of Paris officially ceded Canada to England. As in the former documents, freedom of exercise of the catholic religion is guaranteed but nothing is said on the issue of language. The Royal Proclamation of October 7, 1763, Murray's Commission on November 21, 1763 and the Instructions to Governor Murray, December 7, 1763 granted full scope to the Governor to introduce English private law and to promote the assimilation of the francophone population. This policy of assimilation, however, was rapidly overcome by the authorization to use the French language in the administration of justice. Increasing discontent on the part of the French-speaking population, political disturbances in the New England colonies and the desire to gain the trust of the francophone population of Canada resulted in the adoption by the British Parliament of the Quebec Act of 1774. This Act re-established French private law and guaranteed freedom of exercise of the catholic religion. None of its provisions dealt with language. At that time, however, language and religion were closely related. The debates and statutory registers of the legislative council were drafted in French and in English, as were the ordinances; bilingualism became established as a matter of course in the administration of justice.

After the Rebellion of 1837-1838, the constitution of 1791 was suspended. Lord Durham was appointed to conduct an inquiry. In his report he recommended, inter alia, the establishment of responsible government and the union of both provinces to ensure that the francophone population became a minority, in order to hasten its assimilation. In 1840, London adopted the Act of Union. Section 41 of that imperial Act abolished French as a language of legislation and provided that English be the only official language. The United Parliament mitigated this measure by adopting in 1848 an Act designed to establish a process of translation and of publication of the laws in both languages. The British Parliament repealed section 41 in 1848 and the courts seemed to pursue, during this period, a bilingual tradition. This system continued until Confederation, in 1867. Noting the fact, the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism has stated that Ontario, during 18 years, experienced a bilingual system.

The Constitution Act, 1867, contains only one provision granting language rights, section 93 of this Act [not being ...] germane to this issue. Section 133 specifies that everyone has a right to use the French or the English language in the debates or the business of the houses of Parliament of Canada and of Quebec. It provides moreover that the records and journals of those assemblies must be kept in both languages. Finally, everyone is entitled to the use of French or English before the courts established under the authority of the Parliament of Canada or that of Quebec. These provisions constitute, at the most, what has been termed "seminal official bilingualism."

Manitoba was created in 1870. Section 23 of the Manitoba Act, 1870 is analogous to section 133. Despite this, the French-speaking population having become a minority, the Legislative Assembly of that province adopted in 1890 an Act declaring English to be the only official language of legislation and the courts. The same year, the system of confessional schools was abolished and replaced by a public school system where the language of instruction was English. Except during a brief period where the Greenway-Laurier compromise was applied, that system was maintained. Only since the recent judicial challenges of the Act of 1890 has there been any important movement on the language question in that province.

The Northwest Territories and part of Rupert's Land were integrated with Canada in 1870 and placed under the authority of the Canadian Parliament. In 1877, the latter instituted bilingualism in the council and courts of those territories. A campaign on the part of opponents of the French fact incited the Canadian Parliament to amend its legislation in 1891 in order to enable the council to regulate its debate and records. Soon after that, in 1892 English unilingualism was decreed.

Saskatchewan and Alberta were admitted into the Union in 1905. The acts creating these provinces provide that the laws in force in those territories shall continue to apply thus making it arguable that the French language is endowed with some legal status. Recent judicial decisions have confirmed this point of view.

In Ontario, anti-catholic and anti-French pressure resulted in the adoption in 1912-1913, of regulation 17 which reduced to insignificant proportions the use of French as a language of instruction. Apart from the issue of official bilingualism, language in the educational context continued to be a problem in that province even after the adoption of the Constitutional Act, 1982. In 1986 a bill concerning government services in French was introduced.

Following the Laurendeau-Dunton report, the Canadian Parliament adopted, in 1969, its Official Languages Act. The Act was severely tested at the time of the air controllers' crisis in 1976. Also inspired by that report and directed by the Robichaud Government, New Brunswick, in 1968, adopted French and English as its two official languages. In 1981, an Act went as far as to recognize the equality of both official language communities. Despite this, the establishment of true bilingualism in that province appears a difficult objective, judging by the reactions to a recent report Towards Equality of Official Languages in New Brunswick (Bastarache-Poirier report).

On many occasions, Quebec has legislated in matters of language. However, the national question took on a new dimension with the adoption of the French Language Charter (Loi 101), in 1977. This Act provides that French be the only official language of legislation, of the administration of justice and of public administration.

Even if the language rights of the English-speaking minority are generally recognized, in particular its educational rights, some aspects of that Act are heavily criticized, such as the provisions dealing with the language of business signs and the language of instruction of new immigrants. An impressive series of court challenges has partly dismantled this legislative scheme.

Patriation of the Canadian constitution was effected by the adoption of the Constitution Act, 1982. Sections 16 to 22 of this Act set out the language guarantees of Canadians with respect to the Federal Government and the Government of New Brunswick. Section 23 affirms the right to instruction in an official minority language and to minority administered educational facilities. Since then, a number of court challenges have attempted to determine the scope of this section.

Justifying Strong Language Rights

Whether we are talking about official bilingualism at the federal level, Quebec's Bill 101, or New Brunswick's Bill 88, community rights such as these are often perceived as illiberal attacks on universal moral rights that protect autonomy. While it is true that an important strand of democratic tradition is conceived along those lines, it tends to obfuscate the justifications for these rights. Anglophones living in North America do not need to think about protecting the English language simply because market forces always privilege the dominant linguistic group. Moreover, allophone immigrants will choose to learn English as the dominant language in order to maximize their chances of integration and upward mobility. This process guarantees a continued supply (so to speak) of new anglophones and brings further pressures to assimilate all linguistic minorities, including French. Given these ... conditions, how could the Quebec state afford to be culturally neutral? How could the New Brunswick government not recognize community rights for Acadia? The rationale for state intervention in linguistic matters is no different from the rationale for intervening in matters such as social welfare, education, the environment and security: market forces benefit the powerful and, in this particular case, are incapable of sustaining linguistic minorities and of fostering proper relations between the various language groups of a given polity.

Many will object to such arguments, invoking the danger that strong language rights pose to individual freedoms. Language rights, they will say, should be limited to the protection of some of the conditions for personal autonomy, such as the right to freedom of action within one's own private affairs. These would include the rights against undue interference in private language use and against discrimination on the basis of language. Few are those who will deny us the right to speak our language at home and on the streets, to use it in letters and on the telephone, to keep our native names and surnames, to use our language within our cultural and religious institutions, newspapers, radio stations, and community centres. We could also add to this list the right to an interpreter in judicial proceedings, a language right derived from the right to a fair trial.

Why are these language rights more easily defensible? Because they are typically associated with state tolerance, or, put differently, they are rights against state interference rather than ones that require a positive state intervention. The right not to be interfered with within one's private sphere of language activity and that of not being discriminated against on the basis of language are derived from the right to privacy and fairness, respectively. They can be grounded in the interests of all citizens of a liberal polity, regardless of their particular community status. Were I the last person speaking my language, I would still have the right against undue interference and discrimination. For our purposes such rights can be called negative language rights, for the duties they involve are negative duties: not interfering in a person's language use, and treating everyone equally regardless of the language spoken . . .

... Positive state intervention is necessary to promote minority languages, for their vulnerability in a free market environment cannot be disputed. Unrestrained competition between languages will not bring about linguistic harmony, but a subordination of minority languages to the dominant language, and a subordination of the minority community to the dominant community. The idea of state neutrality is deceitful in this context, for laissez-faire de facto prejudices the dominant language in terms of its use and status. . .

As far as Quebec is concerned, the reasons for active state language planning are many, but most are primarily socioeconomic: despite its solid majority status—approximately 80% of the Quebecois have had French as a mother tongue during this century—French was long subordinate to English, especially in the economy where English was the language of those who held economic power. Before state intervention, French was used in the lower echelons of economic life, while English was used in the upper echelons, and so bilingualism was experienced differently depending if one was French- or English-speaking: "The social pressures for using French as a language of communication at work are more strongly felt by lower status anglophones, while the pressures to use English increases as francophones rise in the corporate world." In this cultural division of labour, the subordinate position of the French language and the subordinate position of French Canadians appeared as two sides of the same coin since francophones and anglophones were not equals in the economic realm. In short, French would tend to be relegated to the private sphere, in the homes, schools, and churches. . .

This situation was compounded by the widely held belief that even in French-speaking Quebec English is the language of prestige. As Gerard Bergeron notes, it was natural to believe so when generations after generations saw that all important things happen in English, and that knowing English opens the doors to the good life. Moreover, a study comparing French- and English-speakers of equal education and job status revealed that English-speakers were perceived by both anglophones and francophones as being more intelligent, having a better job and a higher education. The inferiority complex of French Canadians, reflecting a low self-esteem, led some to despise their origins and to identify with the Anglo-American lifestyle. There was some truth to the idea that capital spoke English and labour spoke French, and linguistic identity and self-esteem were certain to suffer from it. Not surprisingly, diagnosing this disequilibrium motivated a corresponding state intervention.

Another reason for state language planning remains the need to respond to [certain] factors which threaten Quebec's relative weight in the federation, not to mention French Canada's cultural security within Quebec itself. The decline of Quebec's population relative to the Canadian whole translates itself into a greater minority status for Quebec within the federation. Quebec's share of members of Parliament went from 33.5% in 1867 to 25.4% in 1990, and is expected to go down to 20% or less in about a century. In addition to weakening Quebec's political power in the federation, the demographic decline of the Quebecois population of French origins creates a cultural insecurity insofar as traditional cultural traits are lost.

Jacques Henripin cites three demographic challenges facing Quebec. First, the birth rate of the Quebecois (1.6 children per couple) is inferior to the required rate for replacing generations (2 children per couple); as a result, the population is growing old. A second problem is the high emigration rate towards other provinces. Anglophones leave Quebec at a rate fifteen times higher than francophones, allophones (those who have neither French nor English as a mother tongue) at a rate five times higher. This means that immigration, despite what is often believed, contributes little to counteracting the low birth rate since Quebec must accept three immigrants in order to keep one. A third problem relates to the difficult integration of immigrants in Montreal, in part because of the attraction that the English language has there. English is still the language which most immigrants adopt, although the situation is improving.

Before Bill 101, immigrant parents, especially those living in Montreal, would often choose English as the language of schooling for their children. In 1970, 8.3% of students in Montreal's English schools were French, while only 1.9% of students in French schools were English. Significantly, 22.5% of students in English schools were allophones, compared to merely 0.9% in French schools. And in 1961, language transfers of allophones toward French were in the proportion of 23.2% in Montreal, as compared with 56.6% in the rest of Quebec. Between 1945 and 1966, 80% of immigrants integrated into the anglophone community of Quebec, the great majority of them in Montreal.

Various studies and governmental reports have concurred that these concerns were and still are legitimate and, thus, that there are grounds for taking steps to ensure that the French language is protected in Quebec, namely by sending an unequivocal message to immigrants: French, not English, is the majority language in Quebec. Even the Supreme Court of Canada argued that the circumstances discussed above "favoured the use of the English language despite the predominance in Quebec of a francophone population ... prior to the enactment of the legislation at issue [Bill 101] ..." No one seriously challenges the difficulties French is facing in Quebec; what is debated is the scope of language legislation and its impact on other language rights.

As can be expected, Acadians also have had to face major sociodemographic obstacles, but with little or no collective means at their disposal. Assimilation has reached high levels in Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia, where by 1961 the majority of those of French extraction no longer declared French as their mother tongue. And of those who could still speak French, less than 40% spoke it at home by 1971.

II. LANGUAGE RIGHTS AND THE CONSTITUTION

A. THE FEDERAL BARGAIN

As noted above, although federalism as a system of government was adopted in part to deal with the claims of French-speaking Canadians, ss 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 are silent in respect to language. As noted in Chapter 3, From Contact to Confederation, the 1867 arrangements became acceptable to many Quebecois due to the opportunity that federalism offered for French-speakers to form a majority in Quebec and thus to make laws on a wide range of subjects, as opposed to the content of the division of powers in respect to language specifically.

As described earlier, s 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867 is the express, original constitutional bargain in respect to language. The section addresses the language issue in the context of parliamentary debate, legislative enactment, and court proceedings. It provides:

Either the English or the French Language may be used by any Person in the Debates of the Houses of the Parliament of Canada and of the Houses of the Legislature of Quebec; and both those Languages shall be used in the respective Records and Journals of those Houses; and either of those Languages may be used by any Person or in any Pleading or Process in or issuing from any Court of Canada established under this Act, and in or from all or any of the Courts of Quebec.

The Acts of the Parliament of Canada and of the Legislature of Quebec shall be printed and published in both those Languages.

This final version of s 133 was more stringent than its earlier drafts, which had merely permitted, as opposed to mandated, publication of legislative journals and laws in both English and French. The mandatory provision prevailed in order to preclude the possibility that the majority in the federal or Quebec legislatures might choose to publish parliamentary proceedings and enactments only in its own language and thus prejudice the minority language group.

Jones v AG of New Brunswick, [1975] 2 SCR 182, 1974 CanLII 164 addressed the ability of the federal Parliament to enact the Official Languages Act (now RSC 1985, c 31 (4th Supp)), which made English and French the official languages of Canada within federal institutions, such as Parliament and the courts under federal jurisdiction. The Supreme Court of Canada upheld the federal Act, as well as New Brunswick legislation (enacted under the s 92(14) class of subject "Administration of Justice in the Province"), which similarly stipulated that both French and English were the official languages of the courts of that province. The Court made clear that s 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867 set down minimum constitutional protection for language, but this did not preclude Parliament or a legislature from conferring additional "rights or privileges" or imposing additional "obligations" (at 192) in respect to the English and French languages. The only proviso was that the enacting legislature must conform to the rules of the division of powers.

The Court returned to the question of general legislative jurisdiction in respect to language in Devine v Quebec (AG), [1988] 2 SCR 790, 1988 CanLII 20. One issue before the Court was the legislative jurisdiction of the National Assembly to enact those parts of Quebec's Charter of the French Language, CQLR c C-11 that mandated the use of French, and in some instances French only, in commercial dealings. The Court ruled unanimously that this legislation fell within provincial legislative jurisdiction:

[14] ... In order to be valid, provincial legislation with respect to language must be truly in relation to an institution or activity that is otherwise within provincial legislative jurisdiction.

[16] ... It is true, as the preamble of the Charter of the French Language indicates, that one of its objects is "to make of French the language of ... commerce and business" but that object necessarily involves the regulation of an aspect of commerce and business within the province, whatever the nature of the effect of such regulation may be. The purpose and effect of the challenged provisions of Chapter VII of the Charter of the French Language entitled "The Language of Commerce and Business" is to regulate an aspect of the manner in which commerce and business in the province may be carried on and as such they are in relation to such commerce and business. That the overall object of the Charter of the French Language is the enhancement of the status of the French language in Quebec does not make the challenged provisions any less an intended regulation of an aspect of commerce within the province. As such, they fall within provincial legislative jurisdiction under the Constitution Act, 1867.

The 1867 language strictures set down in s 133 were applicable only to the federal government and to Quebec. Similar requirements were later applied to Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta. The Manitoba Act, 1870, SC 1870, c 3, s 23, passed by Parliament and confirmed by the UK Parliament, applied the s 133 type requirements to the new province of Manitoba: see British North America Act, 1871, ss 5 and 6. The North-West Territories Act, RSC 1886, c 50, s 110, a non-entrenched enactment, provided similar language guarantees for the territory that would become Saskatchewan and Alberta. These provisions reflected the fact that the population of these provinces at the time was largely French-speaking and was expected to stay that way.

In deliberate contradiction to the terms of the Manitoba Act, 1870, Manitoba passed the Official Language Act in 1890, which set down that English only would be the language of the legislature and the courts. Lower court rulings in 1892, 1909, and 1976 invalidated this enactment, finding it inconsistent with the requirements of the entrenched Manitoba Act. The Manitoba governments did not treat these decisions as authoritative, although they did not appeal them either. One might have expected that these decisions, and the failure of the Manitoba government to comply or appeal, would have become the subject of intense political debate, both in Manitoba and nationally. The demographic makeup of the province had changed so much in the intervening decades, however, that the French-speaking minority lacked the political clout to press their cause further. Moreover, as described in Chapter 4, the energy of that community was at the time directed at opposing provincial policies diminishing the opportunity for education in French in the denominational schools.

The question of the validity of the 1890 legislation finally reached the Supreme Court of Canada in Attorney General of Manitoba v Forest, [1979] 2 SCR 1032, 1979 CanLII 242. The Court ruled that the entrenched Manitoba Act provisions prevailed over the provincial enactment. This ruling raised the possibility that all the enactments of the Manitoba legislature since 1890 were invalid because they had been enacted only in English. In Re Manitoba Language Rights, [1985] 1 SCR 721, 1985 CanLII 33 [Manitoba Language Reference], the Supreme Court considered this possibility. It characterized the strictures of the Manitoba Act, requiring the enactment of all legislation in both English and French, as mandatory and not merely directory—with the consequence that the body of Manitoba legislation passed in breach of the language enactment requirement was invalid. To avoid a legal vacuum, the Court went on to recognize the temporary validity of these laws until the language requirements could be satisfied by translation, through a temporary suspension of the declaration of invalidity. (This aspect of the decision is discussed further in Chapter 25, Enforcement of Rights.) The Court identified the purpose of both s 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867 and of the Manitoba Act, 1870 as “to ensure full and equal access to the legislatures, the laws and the courts for francophones and anglophones alike” (at 739). The Court stated (at 744):

The importance of language rights is grounded in the essential role that language plays in human existence, development and dignity. It is through language that we are able to form concepts; to structure and order the world around us. Language bridges the gap between isolation and community, allowing humans to delineate the rights and duties they hold in respect of one another, and thus to live in society.

Similar litigation arose in Saskatchewan and Alberta in respect to the availability of French-language court proceedings. In R v Mercure, [1988] 1 SCR 234, 1988 CanLII 107, the accused applied to have the provincial court proceed with his trial in French on the basis of s 110 of the North-West Territories Act. The Supreme Court found that this Act was continued in force by s 16 of the Saskatchewan Act, 1905. Section 110 provided language rights substantially the same as s 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867. However, the Court differentiated the legal regime of language requirements in Saskatchewan from that in Manitoba. The Manitoba Act was constitutionally entrenched and bound the legislature of Manitoba; the Saskatchewan legislature, however, was free to alter the terms of the North-West Territories Act because it was not entrenched. Following this ruling, the Saskatchewan legislature enacted legislation dispensing with the language stipulations mirroring s 133—in part to avoid the necessity of having to translate and re-enact all its statutes passed only in English (Language Act, SS 1988-89, c L-6.1).

A similar holding with regard to Alberta, in R v Paquette, [1990] 2 SCR 1103, 1990 CanLII 37, led to similar legislation in that province (Languages Act/Loi linguistique, SA 1988, c L-7.5).

B. CHARTER LANGUAGE RIGHTS

As noted in Chapter 16, The Advent of the Charter, a number of commentators view language rights as the original core of the Charter project. Whether or not that is correct, ss 16 to 23 of the Charter constitute strong recognition of the major importance of language in Canadian constitutionalism. These sections recognize the official, equal status of English and French in the business of the federal and New Brunswick governments and also guarantee a level of minority language education throughout Canada. The detail and range of these provisions reflect fidelity to the idea of Canada as a country founded by English- and French-speaking people. With respect to minority language education, at least, the Constitution also espouses a form of “personality principle” of language, rather than a solely territorial one—provinces cannot opt for unilingualism, and an individual’s right to French or English education can be exercised throughout the country.

The provisions pose interesting questions about the continuing role of this idea of Canada in the context of a country that today possesses a dramatically different demographic makeup than it did in 1867, as well as greater sensitivity to both the historical and current claims of its Indigenous inhabitants.

Sections 16 to 23 contain a number of striking features. For example, s 16 introduces the language of equality into the formulation of language entitlements: “English and French are the official languages of Canada and have equality of status and equal rights and privileges as to their use in all institutions of the Parliament and government of Canada.” Sections 16(2), 17(2), 18(2), 19(2), and 20(2) bring New Brunswick into the regime of institutional bilingualism, discussed earlier in reference to the Prairie provinces. Added to the legislative and judicial contexts is the availability of communication with federal and New Brunswick government institutions in either English or French. Considerable pressure was brought to bear upon Ontario to take on these constitutional strictures as well, but the Ontario government has resisted on the ground that incremental, statutory adherence to institutional bilingualism was more acceptable in the prevailing political climate.

A further section concerning linguistic rights in New Brunswick was added on April 7, 1993, when the Constitution Act, 1982 was amended (under s 43 of that Act) to include the following:

16.1(1) The English linguistic community and the French linguistic community in New Brunswick have equality of status and equal rights and privileges, including the right to distinct educational institutions and such distinct cultural institutions as are necessary for the preservation and promotion of those communities.

(2) The role of the legislature and government of New Brunswick to preserve and promote the status, rights and privileges referred to in subsection (1) is affirmed.

III. INTERPRETING LANGUAGE RIGHTS

As you read the cases that follow, note the different approaches taken by the Supreme Court of Canada in the interpretation of language rights. The first case deals with s 133, while those following interpret Charter provisions.

Att Gen of Quebec v Blaikie[\[1979\] 2 SCR 1016, 1979 CanLII 21](#)

[Blaikie No 1 raised three issues regarding the interpretation of s 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867 in the context of Quebec's Charter of the French Language, which made French the official language of the province. The first issue was the content of s 133's requirement that "Acts" of "the Legislature of Quebec"—that is, the Quebec National Assembly—"be printed and published" in both English and French. The Supreme Court determined that the National Assembly of Quebec did not comply with s 133 when it produced merely unofficial English translations of its enactments, including subordinate legislation. The second issue was whether regulations issued under the authority of Quebec statutes were held to be "Acts" within s 133; the Court held that they were. The excerpt below deals with the third issue—whether the right to use English or French before "any of the Courts of Quebec" extended to adjudicative tribunals.]

THE COURT (Laskin CJ and Martland, Ritchie, Pigeon, Dickson, Beetz, Estey, Pratte, and McIntyre JJ):

[T]he reference in s. 133 to "any of the Courts of Quebec" ought to be considered broadly as including not only so-called s. 96 [of the Constitution Act, 1867] Courts but also Courts established by the Province and administered by provincially appointed Judges. It is not a long distance from this latter class of tribunal to those which exercise judicial power, although they are not courts in the traditional sense. If they are statutory agencies which are adjudicative, applying legal principles to the assertion of claims under their constituent legislation, rather than settling issues on grounds of expediency or administrative policy, they are judicial bodies, however some of their procedures may differ not only from those of Courts but also from those of other adjudicative bodies. In the rudimentary state of administrative law in 1867, it is not surprising that there was no reference to non-curial adjudicative agencies. Today, they play a significant role in the control of a wide range of individual and corporate activities, subjecting them to various norms of conduct which are at the same time limitations on the jurisdiction of the agencies and on the legal position of those caught by them. The guarantee given for the use of French or English in Court proceedings should not be liable to curtailment by provincial substitution of adjudicative agencies for Courts to such extent as is compatible with s. 96 of the British North America Act, 1867.

Two judgments of the Privy Council, which wrestled with similar questions of principle in the construction of the British North America Act, 1867 are, to some degree, apposite here. In Edwards v. Attorney General of Canada, [1930] A.C. 124, the "persons" case (respecting the qualification of women for appointment to the Senate under s. 24), there are observations by Lord Sankey of the need to give the British North America Act a broad interpretation attuned to changing circumstances: "The British North America Act," he said, at p. 136, "planted in Canada a living tree capable of growth and expansion within its natural limits." Dealing, as this Court is here, with a constitutional guarantee, it would be overly technical to ignore the modern development of non-curial adjudicative agencies which play so important a role in our society, and to refuse to extend to proceedings before them the guarantee to the right to use either French or English by those subject to their jurisdiction.

In Attorney General of Ontario v. Attorney General of Canada, [1947] A.C. 127 (the Privy Council Appeals Reference), Viscount Jowitt said in the course of his discussion of the issues, that "it is, as their Lordships think, irrelevant that the question is one that might have seemed unreal at the date of the British North America Act. To such an organic statute the flexible interpretation must be given which changing circumstances require" (at p. 154).

Although there are clear points of distinction between these two cases and the issue of the scope of s. 133, in its reference to the Courts of Quebec, they nonetheless lend support to what is to us the proper approach to an entrenched provision, that is, to make it effective through the range of institutions which exercise judicial power, be they called courts or adjudicative agencies. In our opinion, therefore, the guarantee and requirements of s. 133 extend to both.

It follows that the guarantee in s. 133 of the use of either French or English "by any person or in any pleading or process in or issuing from ... all or any of the Courts of Quebec" applies to both ordinary Courts and other adjudicative tribunals. Hence, not only is the option to use either language given to any person involved in proceedings before the Courts of Quebec or its other adjudicative tribunals (and this covers both written and oral submissions) but documents emanating from such bodies or issued in their name or under their authority may be in either language, and this option extends to the issuing and publication of judgments or other orders.

NOTES

1. In Attorney General of Quebec v Blaikie, [1981] 1 SCR 312, 1981 CanLII 14 [Blaikie No 2], the Court further elaborated on its earlier pronouncement by finding that subordinate legislation made by non-governmental officials or bodies, but subject to government approval, fell within the requirements of enactment in both English and French as did the rules of practice in the courts. In contrast, municipal by-laws and school board by-laws fell outside the requirements of s 133 because those regulations did not require governmental approval to be legally effective. In reaching these conclusions, the Court rejected the argument put forward by Quebec that its authority to amend its provincial constitution, under then s 92(1) of the Constitution Act, 1867, extended to alteration of the provisions of s 133 applicable to the province. A similar argument was rejected in the companion case, Attorney General of Manitoba v Forest, [1979] 2 SCR 1032, 1979 CanLII 242, with respect to the Manitoba Act.

2. The case that follows, Société des Acadiens, deals with language rights under s 19(2) of the Charter in court proceedings. It was decided on the same day as MacDonald v City of Montreal, [1986] 1 SCR 460, 1986 CanLII 65, which interpreted s 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867. In Société des Acadiens, the appellants objected that a member of the New Brunswick Court of Appeal, who sat on a leave to appeal application, did not have sufficient knowledge of French to understand their argument in that language, and thus their rights under s 19(2) of the Charter were infringed. In MacDonald, the appellant relied on s 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867 to object to the validity of a summons issued only in French by the Municipal Court of Montreal. Both cases reached the same result—the provisions guarantee the litigant the right to choose to use French or English in the course of judicial proceedings, but they do not guarantee that the proceedings themselves will be conducted in the language that they choose.

Société des Acadiens v Association of Parents

BEETZ J (Estey, Chouinard, Lamer, and Le Dain JJ concurring):

[53] It is my view that the rights guaranteed by s. 19(2) of the Charter are of the same nature and scope as those guaranteed by s. 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867

with respect to the courts of Canada and the courts of Quebec. As was held by the majority at pp. 498 to 501 in MacDonald, these are essentially language rights unrelated to and not to be confused with the requirements of natural justice. These language rights are the same as those which are guaranteed by s. 17 of the Charter with respect to parliamentary debates. They vest in the speaker or in the writer or issuer of court processes and give the speaker or the writer the constitutionally protected power to speak or to write in the official language of his choice. And there is no language guarantee, either under s. 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867, or s. 19 of the Charter, any more than under s. 17 of the Charter, that the speaker will be heard or understood, or that he has the right to be heard or understood in the language of his choice.

[54] I am reinforced in this view by the contrasting wording of s. 20 of the Charter. Here, the Charter has expressly provided for the right to communicate in either official language with some offices of an institution of the Parliament or Government of Canada and with any office of an institution of the Legislature or Government of New Brunswick. The right to communicate in either language postulates the right to be heard or understood in either language.

[55] I am further reinforced in this view by the fact that those who drafted the Charter had another explicit model they could have used had they been so inclined, namely s. 13(1) of the Official Languages of New Brunswick Act, R.S.N.B. 1973, c. O-1:

13(1) Subject to section 15, in any proceeding before a court, any person appearing or giving evidence may be heard in the official language of his choice and such choice is not to place that person at any disadvantage.

[56] Here again, s. 13(1) of the Act, unlike the Charter, has expressly provided for the right to be heard in the official language of one's choice. Those who drafted s. 19(2) of the Charter and agreed to it could easily have followed the language of s. 13(1) of the Official Languages of New Brunswick Act instead of that of s. 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867. That they did not do so is a clear signal that they wanted to provide for a different effect, namely the effect of s. 133. If the people of the Province of New Brunswick were agreeable to have a provision like s. 13(1) of the Official Languages of New Brunswick Act as part of their law, they did not agree to see it entrenched in the Constitution. I do not think it should be forced upon them under the guise of constitutional interpretation.

[57] The only other provision, apart from s. 20, in that part of the Charter entitled "Official Languages of Canada," which ensures communication or understanding in both official languages is that of s. 18. It provides for bilingualism at the legislative level. In MacDonald one can read the following passage, in the reasons of the majority, at p. 496:

Section 133 has not introduced a comprehensive scheme or system of official bilingualism, even potentially, but a limited form of compulsory bilingualism at the legislative level, combined with an even more limited form of optional unilingualism at the option of the speaker in Parliamentary debates and at the option of the speaker, writer or issuer in judicial proceedings or processes. Such a limited scheme can perhaps be said to facilitate communication and understanding, up to a point, but only as far as it goes and it does not guarantee that the speaker, writer or issuer of proceedings or processes will be understood in the language of his choice by those he is addressing.

[58] The scheme has now been made more comprehensive in the Charter with the addition of New Brunswick to Quebec—and Manitoba—and with new provisions such as s. 20. But where the scheme deliberately follows the model of s. 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867, as it does in s. 19(2), it should, in my opinion, be similarly construed.

[59] I must again cite a passage of the reasons of the majority, at p. 500, in MacDonald relating to s. 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867 but which is equally applicable, a fortiori, to the official languages provisions of the Charter:

This is not to put the English and the French languages on the same footing as other languages. Not only are the English and the French languages placed in a position of equality, they are also given a preferential position over all other languages. And this equality as well as this preferential position are both constitutionally protected by s. 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Without the protection of this provision, one of the two official languages could, by simple legislative enactment, be given a degree of preference over the other as was attempted in Chapter III of Title 1 of the Charter of the French Language, invalidated in Blaikie No. 1. English unilingualism, French unilingualism and, for that matter, unilingualism in any other language could also be imposed by simple legislative enactment. Thus it can be seen that, if s. 133 guarantees but a minimum, this minimum is far from being insubstantial.

[60] The common law right of the parties to be heard and understood by a court and the right to understand what is going on in court is not a language right but an aspect of the right to a fair hearing. It is a broader and more universal right than language rights. It extends to everyone including those who speak or understand neither official language. It belongs to the category of rights which in the Charter are designated as legal rights and indeed it is protected at least in part by provisions such as those of ss. 7 and 14 of the Charter

[61] The fundamental nature of this common law right to a fair hearing was stressed in MacDonald, in the reasons of the majority, at pp. 499-500:

It should be absolutely clear however that this common law right to a fair hearing, including the right of the defendant to understand what is going on in court and to be understood is a fundamental right deeply and firmly embedded in the very fabric of the Canadian legal system. That is why certain aspects of this right are entrenched in general as well as specific provisions of the Charter such as s. 7, relating to life, liberty and security of the person and s. 14, relating to the assistance of an interpreter. While Parliament or the Legislature of a province may, pursuant to s. 33 of the Charter, expressly declare that an Act or a provision thereof shall operate notwithstanding a provision included in s. 2 or ss. 7 to 15 of the Charter, it is almost inconceivable that they would do away altogether with the fundamental common law right itself, assuming that they could do so.

[62] While legal rights as well as language rights belong to the category of fundamental rights,

[i]t would constitute an error either to import the requirements of natural justice into ... language rights ... or vice versa, or to relate one type of right to the other Both types of rights are conceptually different To link these two types of rights is to risk distorting both rather than re-enforcing either.

[63] ... Unlike language rights which are based on political compromise, legal rights tend to be seminal in nature because they are rooted in principle. Some of them, such as the one expressed in s. 7 of the Charter, are so broad as to call for frequent judicial determination.

[64] Language rights, on the other hand, although some of them have been enlarged and incorporated into the Charter, remain nonetheless founded on political compromise.

[65] This essential difference between the two types of rights dictates a distinct judicial approach with respect to each. More particularly, the courts should pause before they decide to act as instruments of change with respect to language rights. This is not to say that language rights provisions are cast in stone and should remain immune altogether from judicial interpretation. But, in my opinion, the courts should approach them with more restraint than they would in construing legal rights.

[66] Such an attitude of judicial restraint is in my view compatible with s. 16 of the Charter, the introductory section of the part entitled "Official Languages of Canada."

[67] Section 19(2) being the substantive provision which governs the case at bar, we need not concern ourselves with the substantive content of s. 16, whatever it may be. But something should be said about the interpretative effect of s. 16 as well as the question of the equality of the two official languages.

[68] I think it is accurate to say that s. 16 of the Charter does contain a principle of advancement or progress in the equality of status or use of the two official languages. I find it highly significant however that this principle of advancement is linked with the legislative process referred to in s. 16(3), which is a codification of the rule in Jones v. Attorney General of New Brunswick, [1975] 2 S.C.R. 182. The legislative process, unlike the judicial one, is a political process and hence particularly suited to the advancement of rights founded on political compromise.

[69] One should also take into consideration the constitutional amending formula with respect to the use of official languages. Under s. 41(c) of the Constitution Act, 1982, the unanimous consent of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province is required for that purpose but "subject to section 43." Section 43 provides for the constitutional amendment of provisions relating to some but not all provinces and requires the "resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province to which the amendment applies." It is public knowledge that some provinces other than New Brunswick—and apart from Quebec and Manitoba—were expected ultimately to opt into the constitutional scheme or part of the constitutional scheme prescribed by ss. 16 to 22 of the Charter, and a flexible form of constitutional amendment was provided to achieve such an advancement of language rights. But again, this is a form of advancement brought about through a political process, not a judicial one.

[70] If however the provinces were told that the scheme provided by ss. 16 to 22 of the Charter was inherently dynamic and progressive, apart from legislation and constitutional amendment, and that the speed of progress of this scheme was to be controlled mainly by the courts, they would have no means to know with relative precision what it was that they were opting into. This would certainly increase their hesitation in so doing and would run contrary to the principle of advancement contained in s. 16(3).

[71] In my opinion, s. 16 of the Charter confirms the rule that the courts should exercise restraint in their interpretation of language rights provisions.

[72] I do not think the interpretation I adopt for s. 19(2) of the Charter offends the equality provision of s. 16. Either official language may be used by anyone in any court of New Brunswick or written by anyone in any pleading in or process issuing from any such court. The guarantee of language equality is not, however, a guarantee that the official language used will be understood by the person to whom the pleading or process is addressed.

[73] Before I leave this question of equality however, I wish to indicate that if one should hold that the right to be understood in the official language used in court is a language right governed by the equality provision of s. 16, one would have gone a considerable distance towards the adoption of a constitutional requirement which could not be met except by a bilingual judiciary. Such a requirement would have far reaching consequences and would constitute a surprisingly roundabout and implicit way of amending the judicature provisions of the Constitution of Canada.

[Chief Justice Dickson and Wilson J each wrote separate reasons concurring in the conclusion that the appeal should be dismissed. However, both took the view that the right to use either English or French in court included the right to be understood by the judge or judges hearing the case. Chief Justice Dickson left open the question of what techniques might satisfy this obligation—for example, the use of interpreters or simultaneous translation. Wilson J held that the judge's level of understanding "must be such that the full flavour of the argument can be appreciated."]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Whose interests are understood to be protected by s 19(2) of the Charter in this case, or by s 133 in MacDonald? Is the Court's approach to interpretation here consistent with its earlier approach in Blaikie?

2. What is the significance of the characterization of language rights as forged by historic political compromise? Is this characterization valid? Is the interpretive posture that flows from it inevitable?

3. The restrictive approach taken by Société des Acadiens and MacDonald to the interpretation of language rights attracted the Court's criticism in two judgments. The first is R v Beaulac, [1999] 1 SCR 768, 1999 CanLII 684. Beaulac concerned the interpretation of ss 530(1) and (4) of the Criminal Code which govern the language of criminal trials. In discussing the correct interpretation to be given to those provisions, Bastarache J (speaking for seven members of the Court) stated in obiter that "the existence of a political compromise is without consequence with regard to the scope of language rights" (at para 24); "[l]anguage rights must in all cases be interpreted purposively, in a manner consistent with the preservation and development of official language communities in Canada"; and "[t]o the extent that Société des Acadiens du Nouveau-Brunswick ... stands for a restrictive interpretation of language rights, it is to be rejected" (at para 25). Chief Justice Lamer and Binnie J, although concurring in Bastarache J's interpretation of the relevant provisions of the Criminal Code, expressly distanced themselves from this aspect of Bastarache J's judgment, stating that "[a] re-assessment of the Court's approach to Charter language rights developed in Société des Acadiens and reiterated in subsequent cases is not necessary or desirable in this appeal" (at para 5). However, in Arsenault-Cameron v Prince Edward Island, 2000 SCC 1, a case arising under s 23 of the Charter (discussed below), the Court unanimously approved Bastarache J's statements in Beaulac, stating that "the fact that constitutional language rights resulted from a political compromise is not unique to language rights and does not affect their scope" (at para 27). Neither Beaulac nor Arsenault-Cameron dealt squarely with s 19(2) of the Charter or s 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867, the two constitutional provisions at issue in Société des Acadiens and MacDonald, and so the specific holdings in those decisions have not been overruled. But in light of Beaulac and Arsenault-Cameron, would those cases be decided the same way today?

4. Michael MacMillan notes that there are two ways to justify language rights—on the theoretical basis that they share the essential elements of human rights, and on a more empirical or inductive basis that supports language rights on the basis of public attitudes and social practices: see Michael MacMillan, "Linking Theory to Practice: Comments on 'The Constitutional Protection of Language'" in David Schneiderman, ed, Language and the State: The Law and Politics of Identity (Cowansville, Que: Éditions Yvon Blais, 1991) at 59.

5. In MacDonald, Beetz J made a distinction between language rights and legal rights, explaining their interaction as follows:

[110] Suppose that a person is charged with a criminal offence drafted in either the French or the English language and that person does not understand the language of the charge. It goes without saying that this person cannot be asked to plead and be tried upon the charge in these circumstances. What will happen as a matter of practice as well as of law is that the judge will call upon a sworn interpreter to translate the charge into a language that the accused can understand. But this is so whether the accused speaks only German or Cantonese and has nothing to do with what s. 133 stands for. Provision is made for this different purpose by other enactments relating for instance to interpreters and under other principles of law some of which are now enshrined in the provisions of distinct constitutional or quasi-constitutional instruments, such as s. 2(g) of the Canadian Bill of Rights and s. 14 of the Charter, also relating to interpreters. ...

[114] It is axiomatic that everyone has a common law right to a fair hearing, including the right to be informed of the case one has to meet and the right to make full answer and defence. Where the defendant cannot understand the proceedings because he is unable to understand the language in which they are being conducted, or because he is deaf, the effective exercise of these rights may well impose a consequential duty upon the court to provide adequate translation. But the right of the defendant to understand what is going on in court and to be understood is not a separate right, nor a language right, but an aspect of the right to a fair hearing.

The constitutional right to an interpreter in s 14 of the Charter is discussed in R v Tran, [1994] 2 SCR 951, 1994 CanLII 56. For a skeptical treatment of "legislative bilingualism" in historically English-speaking provinces, see Caron v Alberta, 2015 SCC 56.

Does the above discussion of English and French, as differentiated from other languages, reflect the special place of English and French in the history of the Canadian Constitution, or does it depart from that history in recognition of Canada as a multicultural—and thus multilingual—society?

6. Section 23 of the Charter contains the minority language education guarantees. It is distinctive in that it imposes obligations on all provinces, unlike the institutional bilingualism provisions that currently apply to Quebec, New Brunswick, and Manitoba. But not all of s 23 applies in Quebec. By virtue of s 59 of the Constitution Act, 1982, s 23(1)(a) does not come into effect in Quebec until authorized by the "legislative assembly or government of Quebec." This provision reflects Quebec's concern that immigrants have tended to gravitate to the anglophone community. Therefore, access to English language education in Quebec depends on the parents being citizens who received primary school instruction in English in Canada.

Section 23 was the focus of one of the earliest Charter cases to reach the Supreme Court of Canada, AG (Que) v Quebec Protestant School Boards, [1984] 2 SCR 66, 1984 CanLII 32. The Court struck down the portions of Quebec's Charter of the French Language that gave access to English language schools only to the children of persons who had been educated in English in Quebec. This provision, known as the "Quebec clause," clashed with the "Canada clause" contained in s 23(1)(b), which offered minority language schooling in Quebec to the children of parents who had received primary instruction in English, not just in Quebec but in any other part of Canada. The judgment of the Court characterized the legislation as having the purpose of ousting the Canada clause of the Charter, rather than limiting its reach. Therefore, s 1 of the Charter could not save it.

7. The major Supreme Court judgment on s 23 of the Charter is Mahe v Alberta, immediately below. For the Court, this case was the first attempt at determining the scope of the rights to educational facilities for minority language groups. Note how the Court tries to set out some general principles for application in this and the many other fact situations that will arise across the country—in effect, initiating an ongoing dialogue between courts and legislatures about the appropriate design of minority language educational systems.

Mahe v Alberta[1990] 1 SCR 342, 1990 CanLII 133

DICKSON CJ (Wilson, La Forest, L'Heureux-Dubé, Sopinka, Gonthier, and Cory JJ concurring):

Section 23 is one component in Canada's constitutional protection of the official languages. The section is especially important in this regard, however, because of the vital role of education in preserving and encouraging linguistic and cultural vitality. It thus represents a linchpin in this nation's commitment to the values of bilingualism and biculturalism.

The appellants claim that their rights under s. 23 are not satisfied by the existing educational system in Edmonton nor by the legislation under which it operates, resulting in an erosion of their cultural heritage, contrary to the spirit and intent of the Charter. In particular, the appellants argue that s. 23 guarantees the right, in Edmonton, to the "management and control" of a minority-language school—that is, to a Francophone school run by a Francophone school board. Our task then is to determine the meaning of s. 23 of the Charter.

The appellants Jean-Claude Mahe and Paul Dubé are parents whose first language learned and still understood is French. The appellant Angeline Martel is a parent who received her primary school instruction in French. All three have school age children, and thus qualify under s. 23(1) of the Charter as persons who, subject to certain limitations, "have the right to have their children receive primary and secondary school instruction" in the language of the linguistic minority population of the province—in this case, the French language. They may therefore conveniently be called "s. 23 parents," and their children "s. 23 students." ...

At the heart of this appeal is the claim of the appellants that the term "minority language educational facilities" referred to in s. 23(3)(b) includes administration by distinct school boards. The respondent takes the position that the word "facilities" means a school building. The respondent submits that the rights of the Francophone minority in metropolitan Edmonton have not been denied because those rights are being met with current Francophone educational facilities.

• • •

The primary issue raised by this appeal is the degree, if any, of "management and control" of a French language school which should be accorded to s. 23 parents in Edmonton. (The phrase "management and control," it should be noted, is not a term of art: it appears to have been introduced in earlier s. 23 cases and has now gained such currency that it was utilized by all the groups in this appeal.) The appellants appear to accept that, with a few exceptions, the government has provided whatever other services or rights might be mandated in Edmonton under s. 23: their fundamental complaint is that they do not have the exclusive management and control of the existing Francophone schools. ...

There are two general questions which must be answered in order to decide this appeal: (1) do the rights which s. 23 mandates, depending upon the numbers of students, include a right to management and control; and (2) if so, is the number of students in Edmonton sufficient to invoke this right? I will begin with the first question.

It appeared to be common ground between the parties that if a right to management and control is provided by s. 23, it must be found in the right to "minority language educational facilities" set out in subs. (3)(b). Before this particular subsection can be examined, however, it is essential to consider two general matters: (1) the purpose of s. 23; and (2) the relationship between the different subsections and paragraphs which comprise s. 23. In interpreting s. 23, as in interpreting any provision of the Charter, it is crucial to consider the underlying purpose of the section. As to the second matter, the structure of s. 23 makes it imperative that each part of the section be read in the context of all of the constituent parts.

(1) The Purpose of Section 23

The general purpose of s. 23 is clear: it is to preserve and promote the two official languages of Canada, and their respective cultures, by ensuring that each language flourishes, as far as possible, in provinces where it is not spoken by the majority of the population. The section aims at achieving this goal by granting minority language educational rights to minority language parents throughout Canada.

My reference to cultures is significant: it is based on the fact that any broad guarantee of language rights, especially in the context of education, cannot be separated from a concern for the culture associated with the language. Language is more than a mere means of communication, it is part and parcel of the identity and culture of the people speaking it. It is the means by which individuals understand themselves and the world around them. The cultural importance of language was recognized by this Court in Ford v. Quebec (Attorney General), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 712, at pp. 748-49:

Language is not merely a means or medium of expression; it colours the content and meaning of expression. It is, as the preamble of the Charter of the French Language itself indicates, a means by which a people may express its cultural identity. [Emphasis added.]

Similar recognition was granted by the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, itself a major force in the eventual entrenchment of language rights in the Charter. At page 8 of Book II of its report, the Commission stated:

Language is also the key to cultural development. Language and culture are not synonymous, but the vitality of the language is a necessary condition for the complete preservation of a culture.

And at p. 19, in a comment on the role of minority language schools, the Commission added:

These schools are essential for the development of both official languages and cultures; ... the aim must be to provide for members of the minority an education appropriate to their linguistic and cultural identity. ... [Emphasis added.]

In addition, it is worth noting that minority schools themselves provide community centres where the promotion and preservation of minority language culture can occur; they provide needed locations where the minority community can meet and facilities which they can use to express their culture.

A further important aspect of the purpose of s. 23 is the role of the section as a remedial provision. It was designed to remedy an existing problem in Canada, and hence to alter the status quo ...

In my view the appellants are fully justified in submitting that "history reveals that s. 23 was designed to correct, on a national scale, the progressive erosion of minority official language groups and to give effect to the concept of the 'equal partnership' of the two official language groups in the context of education."

The remedial aspect of s. 23 was indirectly questioned by the respondent and several of the interveners in an argument which they put forward for a "narrow construction" of s. 23. ...

[Reference to Beetz J's comments on the political nature of language rights and the restrictive role of the courts in their interpretation is omitted.]

I do not believe that these words support the proposition that s. 23 should be given a particularly narrow construction, or that its remedial purpose should be ignored. Beetz J makes it clear in this quotation that language rights are not cast in stone nor immune from judicial interpretation. ... Beetz J's warning that courts should be careful in interpreting language rights is a sound one. Section 23 provides a perfect example of why such caution is advisable. The provision provides for a novel form of legal right, quite different from the type of legal rights which courts have traditionally dealt with. Both its genesis and its form are evidence of the unusual nature of s. 23. Section 23 confers upon a group a right which places positive obligations on government to alter or develop major institutional structures. Careful interpretation of such a section is wise: however, this does not mean that courts should not "breathe life" into the expressed purpose of the section, or avoid implementing the possibly novel remedies needed to achieve that purpose.

(2) The Context of Section 23(3)(b): An Overview of Section 23

The proper way of interpreting s. 23, in my opinion, is to view the section as providing a general right to minority language instruction. Paragraphs (a) and (b) of subs. (3) qualify this general right: para. (a) adds that the right to instruction is only guaranteed where the "number of children" warrants, while para. (b) further qualifies the general right to instruction by adding that where numbers warrant it includes a right to "minority language educational facilities." In my view, subs. (3)(b) is included in order to indicate the upper range of possible institutional requirements which may be mandated by s. 23 (the government may, of course, provide more than the minimum required by s. 23).

Another way of expressing the above interpretation of s. 23 is to say that s. 23 should be viewed as encompassing a "sliding scale" of requirement, with subs. (3)(b) indicating the upper level of this range and the term "instruction" in subs. (3)(a) indicating the lower level. The idea of a sliding scale is simply that s. 23 guarantees whatever type and level of rights and services is appropriate in order to provide minority language instruction for the particular number of students involved.

The sliding scale approach can be contrasted with that which views s. 23 as only encompassing two rights—one with respect to instruction and one with respect to facilities—each providing a certain level of services appropriate for one of two numerical thresholds. On this interpretation of s. 23, which could be called the "separate rights" approach, a specified number of s. 23 students would trigger a particular level of instruction, while a greater, specified number of students would require, in addition, a particular level of minority language educational facilities. Where the number of students fell between the two threshold numbers, only the lower level of instruction would be required.

The sliding scale approach is preferable to the separate rights approach, not only because it accords with the text of s. 23, but also because it is consistent with the purpose of s. 23. The sliding scale approach ensures that the minority group receives the full amount of protection that its numbers warrant. Under the separate rights approach, if it were accepted, for example, that "X" number of students ensured a right to full management and control, then presumably "X - 1" students would not bring about any rights to management and control or even to a school building. Given the variety of possible means of fulfilling the purpose of s. 23, such a result is unacceptable. Moreover, the separate rights approach places parties like the appellants in the paradoxical position of forwarding an argument which, if accepted, might ultimately harm the overall position of minority language students in Canada. If, for instance, the appellants succeeded in persuading this Court that s. 23 mandates a completely separate school board—as opposed to some sort of representation on an existing board—then other groups of s. 23 parents with slightly fewer numbers might find themselves without a right to any degree of management and control—even though their numbers might justify granting them some degree of management and control.

The only way to avoid the weaknesses of the separate rights approach would be to lower the numbers requirement—with the result that it would be impractical to require governments to provide more than the minimum level of minority language educational services. In my view, it is more sensible, and consistent with the purpose of s. 23, to interpret s. 23 as requiring whatever minority language educational protection the number of students in any particular case warrants. Section 23 simply mandates that governments do whatever is practical in the situation to preserve and promote minority language education.

There are outer limits to the sliding scale of s. 23. In general, s. 23 may not require that anything be done in situations where there are a small number of minority language students. There is little that governments can be required to do, for instance, in the case of a solitary, isolated minority language student. Section 23 requires, at a minimum, that “instruction” take place in the minority language: if there are too few students to justify a programme which qualifies as “minority language instruction,” then s. 23 will not require any programmes be put in place. However, the question of what is the “minimum” programme which could constitute “instruction,” and the further question of how many students might be required in order to warrant such a programme, are not at issue in this appeal and I will not be addressing them. The question at issue here concerns only the “upper level” of the possible range of requirements under s. 23—that is, the requirements where there are a relatively large number of s. 23 students.

In my view, the words of s. 23(3)(b) are consistent with and supportive of the conclusion that s. 23 mandates, where the numbers warrant, a measure of management and control. Consider, first, the words of subs. (3)(b) in the context of the entire section. Instruction must take place somewhere and accordingly the right to “instruction” includes an implicit right to be instructed in facilities. If the term “minority language educational facilities” is not viewed as encompassing a degree of management and control, then there would not appear to be any purpose in including it in s. 23. This common sense conclusion militates against interpreting “facilities” as a reference to physical structures. Indeed, once the sliding scale approach is accepted it becomes unnecessary to focus too intently upon the word “facilities.” Rather, the text of s. 23 supports viewing the entire term “minority language educational facilities” as setting out an upper level of management and control.

The foregoing textual analysis of s. 23(3)(b) is strongly supported by a consideration of the overall purpose of s. 23. That purpose, as discussed earlier, is to preserve and promote minority language and culture throughout Canada. In my view, it is essential, in order to further this purpose, that, where the numbers warrant, minority language parents possess a measure of management and control over the educational facilities in which their children are taught. Such management and control is vital to ensure that their language and culture flourish. It is necessary because a variety of management issues in education, e.g., curricula, hiring, expenditures, can affect linguistic and cultural concerns. I think it incontrovertible that the health and survival of the minority language and culture can be affected in subtle but important ways by decisions relating to these issues. To give but one example, most decisions pertaining to curricula clearly have an influence on the language and culture of the minority students.

Furthermore, as the historical context in which s. 23 was enacted suggests, minority language groups cannot always rely upon the majority to take account of all of their linguistic and cultural concerns. Such neglect is not necessarily intentional: the majority cannot be expected to understand and appreciate all of the diverse ways in which educational practices may influence the language and culture of the minority. . . .

Section 23 clearly encompasses a right to management and control. On its own, however, the phrase "management and control" is imprecise and requires further specification. This can be accomplished by considering what type of management and control is needed in order to fulfill the purpose of s. 23.

The appellants argue for a completely independent Francophone school board. Much is to be said in support of this position and indeed it may be said to reflect the ideal. . . . Historically, separate or denominational boards have been the principal bulwarks of minority language education in the absence of any provision for minority representation and authority within public or common school boards. Such independent boards constitute, for the minority, institutions which it can consider its own with all this entails in terms of opportunity of working in its own language and of sharing a common culture, interests and understanding and being afforded the fullest measure of representation and control. These are particularly important in setting overall priorities and responding to the special educational needs of the minority.

In some circumstances an independent Francophone school board is necessary to meet the purpose of s. 23. However, where the number of students enrolled in minority schools is relatively small, the ability of an independent board to fulfill this purpose may be reduced and other approaches may be appropriate whereby the minority is able to identify with the school but has the benefit of participating in a larger organization through representation and a certain exclusive authority within the majority school board. Under these circumstances, such an arrangement avoids the isolation of an independent school district from the physical resources which the majority school district enjoys and facilitates the sharing of resources with the majority board, something which can be crucial for smaller minority schools. By virtue of having a larger student population, it can be expected that the majority board would have greater access to new educational developments and resources. Where the number of s. 23 students is not sufficiently large, a complete isolation of the minority schools would tend to frustrate the purpose of s. 23 because, in the long run, it would contribute to a decline in the status of the minority language group and its educational facilities. Graduates of the minority schools would be less well-prepared (thus hindering career opportunities for the minority) and potential students would be disinclined to enter minority language schools.

Perhaps the most important point to stress is that completely separate school boards are not necessarily the best means of fulfilling the purpose of s. 23. What is essential, however, to satisfy that purpose is that the minority language group have control over those aspects of education which pertain to or have an effect upon their language and culture. This degree of control can be achieved to a substantial extent by guaranteeing representation of the minority on a shared school board and by giving these representatives exclusive control over all of the aspects of minority education which pertain to linguistic and cultural concerns.

To give but one example, the right to tax (which would accompany the creation of an independent school district), is not, in my view, essential to satisfy the concerns of s. 23 with linguistic and cultural security. Section 23 guarantees that minority schools shall receive public funds, but it is not necessary that the funds be derived through a separate tax base provided adequate funding is otherwise assured. Similar observations can be made in respect of other features of separate school districts.

It is not possible to give an exact description of what is required in every case in order to ensure that the minority language group has control over those aspects of minority language education which pertain to or have an effect upon minority language and culture. Imposing a specific form of educational system in the multitude of different circumstances which exist across Canada would be unrealistic and self-defeating. The problems with mandating "specific modalities" have been recognized by all of the courts in Canada which have considered s. 23. At this stage of early development of s. 23 jurisprudence, the appropriate response for the courts is to describe in general terms the requirements mandated. It is up to the public authorities to satisfy these general requirements. Where there are alternative ways of satisfying the requirements, the public authorities may choose the means of fulfilling their duties. In some instances this approach may result in further litigation to determine whether the general requirements mandated by the court have been implemented. I see no way to avoid this result, as the alternative of a uniform detailed order runs the real risk of imposing impractical solutions. Section 23 is a new type of legal right in Canada and thus requires new responses from the courts.

In my view, the measure of management and control required by s. 23 of the Charter may, depending on the numbers of students to be served, warrant an independent school board. Where numbers do not warrant granting this maximum level of management and control, however, they may nonetheless be sufficient to require linguistic minority representation on an existing school board. In this latter case:

- (1) The representation of the linguistic minority on local boards or other public authorities which administer minority language instruction or facilities should be guaranteed;
- (2) The number of minority language representatives on the board should be, at a minimum, proportional to the number of minority language students in the school district, i.e., the number of minority language students for whom the board is responsible;
- (3) The minority language representatives should have exclusive authority to make decisions relating to the minority language instruction and facilities, including:
 - (a) expenditures of funds provided for such instruction and facilities;
 - (b) appointment and direction of those responsible for the administration of such instruction and facilities;
 - (c) establishment of programs of instruction;
 - (d) recruitment and assignment of teachers and other personnel; and
 - (e) making of agreements for education and services for minority language pupils.

I do not doubt that in future cases courts will have occasion to expand upon or refine these words. It is impossible at this stage in the development of s. 23 to foresee all of the circumstances relevant to its implementation.

There are a few general comments I wish to add in respect of the above description. First, the matter of the quality of education to be provided to the minority students was not dealt with above because, strictly speaking, it does not pertain to the issue of management and control. It is, of course, an important issue and one which was raised in this appeal. I think it should be self-evident that in situations where the above degree of management and control is warranted the quality of education provided to the minority should in principle be on a basis of equality with the majority. This proposition follows directly from the purpose of s. 23. However, the specific form of educational system provided to the minority need not be identical to that provided to the majority. The different circumstances under which various schools find themselves, as well as the demands of a minority language education itself, make such a requirement impractical and undesirable. It should be stressed that the funds allocated for the minority language schools must be at least equivalent on a per student basis to the funds allocated to the majority schools. Special circumstances may warrant an allocation for minority language schools that exceeds the per capita allocation for majority schools. I am confident that this will be taken into account not only in the enabling legislation, but in budgetary discussions of the board.

With respect to funding, the reference point for determining the number of students will normally be the pupils actually receiving minority language education. During the period in which a minority language education programme is getting started, however, it would seem reasonable to budget for the number of students who can realistically be seen as attending the school once operations are well established. This may be one example of a special circumstance which calls for a higher allocation of funds for minority education programmes. It could also be seen, however, as a consideration which would equally be extended to a majority language programme during its start-up period.

Second, provincial and local authorities may, of course, give minority groups a greater degree of management and control than that described above. Section 23 only mandates a minimum level of management and control in a given situation; it does not set a ceiling.

Third, there are a variety of different forms of institutional structures which will satisfy the above guidelines. I have stressed this aspect of the flexibility of s. 23 before, but this feature bears repeating. The constant in any acceptable scheme of minority representation, however, will be the granting of representation proportional to the number of minority language students who fall under the responsibility of the particular school board.

Fourth, the persons who will exercise the measure of management and control described above are "s. 23 parents" or persons such parents designate as their representatives. I appreciate that because of the wording of s. 23 these parents may not be culturally a part of the minority language group. This could occasionally result in persons who are not, strictly speaking, members of the minority language group exercising some control over minority language education. This would be a rare occurrence, and is not reason to lessen the degree of management and control given to s. 23 parents.

Fifth, I wish to emphasize that the above description is only meant to cover the degree of management and control which, short of a separate school board, is required under s. 23 where the number of s. 23 students is significant enough to warrant moving towards the upper level of the sliding scale. Other degrees of management and control may be required in situations where the numbers do not justify granting full rights of management and control. What is required in any case will turn on what the "numbers warrant."

Finally, it should be noted that the management and control accorded to s. 23 parents does not preclude provincial regulation. The province has an interest both in the content and the qualitative standards of educational programmes. Such programmes can be imposed without infringing s. 23, in so far as they do not interfere with the linguistic and cultural concerns of the minority.

Denise Réaume & Leslie Green, "Education and Linguistic Security in the Charter"

(1989) 34 McGill LJ 777 (footnotes omitted)

I. The Value of Linguistic Security

Two mischievous notions about language rights have some currency in Canada. The first is that language rights are a mere product of political compromise and have no foundation in principle. The second contradicts the first. According to it, language rights are founded on the principle of survival: governments have a duty to ensure that minority languages continue into the future. These are not politically innocent notions, for each has implications for the way in which language rights should be interpreted and the weight they should be given. But they are both founded on mistakes.

The first confuses the genesis of constitutional rights with their justification. All rights entrenched in positive law have a particular form that attempts to make concrete certain abstract values which the law prizes. Every constitutional right thus marks a kind of compromise between competing interpretations of the values it protects; every one strikes some balance between legislative sovereignty and minority protections; every one can be protected only by a combination of non-interference and positive action on the part of government. Because these are features of all constitutional rights, they do not distinguish language rights from the rest and therefore provide no ground for interpreting them differently. That is why the Supreme Court of Canada, to whom this first mistake is due, has not been able to draw the proposed distinction between "compromise- and principle-based" rights in a consistent and persuasive way. Such truth as there is in the idea amounts to this: the courts must give effect to the terms of a constitutional agreement without, under the guise of interpretation, amending them. That claim is as harmless as it is sound. It does nothing to show what those terms are, nor how courts should proceed when they are equivocal. Thus, the claim that they originate in a compromise does not in fact justify the Court's recent policy of reading some language rights restrictively.

The second view, according to which minority language rights are rooted in the principle of survival, makes a different error. It confuses the justification of a right with the likely by-product of its exercise. Minority languages are under threat from a variety of sources, but they die out for a common reason: they are abandoned by their speakers. Language rights aim to protect speakers from certain pressures to abandon their languages. When linguistic choices are made in a secure environment, roughly, one without unfair pressure to conform to majority practices, they will in fact typically lead to a higher rate of survival. Does it follow, then, that the aim of language rights is to protect the endangered species of the linguistic world?

We can test that hypothesis by considering some policies aimed at ensuring language survival. Suppose, for example, that one of the majority English provinces required all French speakers to send their children to French schools and denied them access to English instruction. Or suppose that by residential zoning it attempted to reduce ... declining minorities [from marrying outside their group]. Set aside the question of whether these measures would violate other rights, and let us ask simply whether as far as language goes, they are aimed in the right direction. Could they be said to take at least one step towards justice? On reflection that seems dubious. The problem is not simply that language rights and other liberties are here in conflict, but that moral rights to language use are themselves violated by the policies in question. Prohibiting the minorities from learning the majority language and banning minority-language instruction offend common principles: they attack linguistic security by creating unfair pressures to conform. These pressures do not become acceptable when they are inflicted on a minority within the minority community itself. Draconian measures to promote minority languages may evince a kind of concern for the health of the languages, but they do not give appropriate concern for the interests of their speakers.

That security and not survival is the root value is suggested by considering the importance of language. Apart from its instrumental value in communication, language is also an important marker of identity. Those who wish to use minority languages do so partly as an expression of belonging to and identifying with a community. But language use has this valuable expressive dimension only if rooted in a free and fair context. Those who are forced to use a particular language cannot be thought thereby to express their identity. That does not mean that language must be consciously chosen. Language is only partially a realm of free choice. Children have a mother tongue long before they develop the capacity for reflective and informed choice about ethnic identification, and parents typically transmit their mother tongues as a matter of course. But these normal processes of social development contribute value to their outcomes only in circumstances which are fair and unbiased. Thus, while facilitating minority language education and requiring it both promote the survival of minority languages, this equivalence in consequences does not establish an equivalence in aim. The point of language rights is to give speakers a secure environment in which to make choices about language use, and in which ethnic identification can have positive value.

The confusion of survival and security is easily made, for the conditions threatening security also make survival less likely. Evidence of assimilation and decline among the francophone minorities made it clear that the lack of adequate protection in the 1867 constitution had exacerbated their demographic fragility, and the desire to remedy this was a driving force of the language rights provisions. Nonetheless, the decline of the minorities is a symptom and not itself a disease. It is presumptive evidence that there is strong and potentially unfair social pressure to abandon their language. But this evidence is rebuttable. It is possible (though not probable under normal circumstances) that even in a completely secure environment, some members of minority language groups would still make free and informed decisions to integrate with a majority community. The need to identify with a community may be deeply rooted in human nature, but we know that there is nonetheless much flexibility regarding the community with which one identifies.

These considerations suggest that it is not the survival of languages but the security of their speakers that justifies language rights. To have linguistic security in the fullest sense is to have the opportunity, without serious impediments, to live a full life in a community of people who share one's language. This opportunity is taken for granted by those in linguistically homogeneous societies and by those who speak the majority language in multilingual societies. Through sheer numbers they enjoy de facto linguistic security without need for special legal protections. No doors are closed, and no aspects of human fulfillment are unavailable on account of language. Abandoning one's mother tongue (oneself or on behalf of one's children) is of course a conceivable option for them, but not one to which they are driven by force of social circumstance and not one which will even be considered in the normal course of life. It is otherwise for members of linguistic minorities. Without special protections, minority language speakers are inevitably placed under strong pressures to abandon their mother tongue. Because of its central role in every aspect of human co-operation, people share a common interest in communicating with others. To be excluded from this is to be denied most of what is valued in life. The more restricted the existence available in one's mother tongue the more rational it becomes to take up the language that offers greater opportunities. This does not mean that the minority language speakers do not value their language or communities, any more than the decision of hold-up victims to part with their wallets means that they do not value their money. It means simply that there are some burdens that outweigh it, and some costs that it is unjust to expect them to bear. ...

The role of government in protecting linguistic security is thus easily explained. The familiar official language rights serve the interests of linguistic security by facilitating participation in activities under government control. Participation in political life involves communication with officials. A community that could not participate in the political life of its country would be severely handicapped, and, if participation must be on the majority's terms, then the incentive to assimilate is obvious. Similarly, the denial of government services, whether the court system or the kind of everyday help and advice that many government departments provide, turns the use of one's mother tongue into a handicap and sometimes even a source of shame. But, unlike ethnic groups, government has no mother tongue of its own. The choice of its working languages is a matter over which the government has complete control. Participation can therefore be guaranteed in one's own language without sacrificing the legitimate interests of others. How does education fit into the emerging picture?

The system of education, particularly at the primary and secondary levels, makes major contributions to the security of one's linguistic environment. Provision for minority language education is a complex good with many different facets. For convenience, we distinguish two main aspects. There are powerful individual benefits of children being able to learn in their mother-tongue The absence of minority language education is quite obviously a powerful assimilative force. Children grow up with a grasp of their mother tongue which is inadequate for the kind of adult pursuits which require strong communication skills. In such circumstances it is hardly surprising that people abandon their first language and do not teach it to their children. Before long, such a community ceases to be viable and its language, if it persists at all, has merely folkloric status.

Education cannot however be fully understood as an individual good. Minority language instruction benefits the linguistic group as well. It has collective benefits which flow from the language being a vehicle of instruction. For example, it provides and renews cultural capital. This is true at the level of both "high" and "popular" culture: the productive and appreciative capacities must be nurtured and trained through a comprehensive education. Musicians, writers, artists obviously depend on and draw on common cultural capital in representing and contesting the life of the community. But even folk and oral traditions, sporting culture, etc., all draw on a stock of common forms and images. In modern societies this capital is largely controlled by the educational system.

Other direct collective benefits are more instrumental: the education system provides jobs for members of the minority community. There are also indirect collective benefits For one thing, a community with public institutions will have greater visibility and status. More importantly, an educational facility such as a neighbourhood school is an important focus of social and cultural activities for the community, especially in smaller towns. And managing a school system by electing trustees, hiring teachers, setting policy, etc. are all important parts of the political life of such communities and contribute to their richness and vitality.

These are only some of the ways in which minority-language education enters the collective life of the community. Many of them exhibit interesting structural features. Some collective benefits are public goods in the economists' sense: none can be excluded from their benefits and they do not diminish with consumption. This is clearly the case with respect to the diffuse effects of a minority language education system on the security, status, and vitality of the community. And, where publicly funded education is the norm, it is true of educational options themselves: they become available to any parents who wish to take advantage of them. Moreover, the existence of these schools makes the entire community more vital in diffuse ways which generate benefits even for those who do not directly participate in its activities. For example, the increased use of minority languages obviously increases the instrumental value of being able to speak them, and this benefit accrues to all.

But minority-language instruction has further collective benefits which, though excludable, are social and non-rival. Where these flow from the inherent value of participating with others in some social activity, we call them participatory goods. A school plays a significant role in fostering human relationships, teaching co-operation, and imparting other social skills in a way that could not be achieved under a system of private individual tuition. Public education is the central means by which children are introduced to and can participate in the cultural traditions of their community. Management and control of an education system, similarly, provides a forum in which parents can exercise and develop skills of self-government. In all these ways, minority language education has a significant social role.

NOTES AND QUESTION

1. Mahe, in effect, sets up a dialogue between the legislative and judicial branches on the meaning of s 23, as governments attempt to implement the section. For further discussion by the Supreme Court of Canada, see Reference re Public Schools Act (Man), s 79(3), (4) and (7), [1993] 1 SCR 839, 1993 CanLII 119, where the Court was asked to determine the meaning of s 23(3)(b), the right to receive instruction in "minority language educational facilities." The Court concluded that s 23 requires that the educational facilities be of or belong to the minority group and includes a right to a distinct physical setting. However, as in Mahe, it declined to elaborate on what this might mean in a given fact situation. Again, the Court emphasized that the determination of whether facilities are appropriate can only be undertaken on the basis of a distinct geographic region. The Court also determined that the Manitoba Public Schools Act did not meet the province's constitutional obligations. Given the number of potential French-language students, s 23 required the establishment of an independent French-language school board under the exclusive management and control of the French-speaking language minority.

2. For a critique of the Mahe decision on the grounds that it is overly activist and a departure from the appropriate judicial reading of history, legislative purpose, and constitutional text, see Robert G Richards, "Mahe v Alberta: Management and Control of Minority Language Education" (1991) 36 McGill LJ 216 at 224:

The Court chose to overlook a fundamental point when it said that management and control must be read into section 23 because the historical absence of these rights had led to a failure to provide minority language education. Section 23 itself guarantees minority language instruction and facilities. Minority language groups no longer need political influence or control of school boards to get instruction and facilities. They have a constitutional right to them which can be enforced in court if necessary. The very purpose of section 23 is to break the link between the availability of minority language education and political control of school boards or legislatures.

Thus, it seems clear that the purpose and focus of section 23 would have been more appropriately stated in more concrete and specific terms than those chosen by the Chief Justice. As the section itself says, it is aimed at guaranteeing rights to primary and secondary education in the official minority language of each province. The preservation of cultural and linguistic integrity is not the direct object of section 23. The availability of minority language education will have an impact on assimilation but that is the effect of the section rather than its immediate purpose. Section 23 can easily become over-inflated if it is seen as being aimed directly at guaranteeing linguistic and cultural vitality.

3. Joseph Magnet, in Official Language of Canada (Cowansville, Que: Éditions Yvon Blais, 1995) at 80-83, is critical of the principle of linguistic security discussed by Réaume and Green, above. He argues that to create true linguistic security for minority language communities, government would have to intervene in language policy in an ambitious manner—and this is an unrealistic expectation. Moreover, he criticizes their attempt to justify language rights on a single basis because this approach ignores the complexity of the issue. For example, he identifies an additional justification for language rights—namely, that they manage conflict between Canada's linguistic communities.

4. The Supreme Court applied Mahe in Arsenault-Cameron (discussed above), in which the Court held that the right of a minority language community to management and control encompassed a right to control over the location of minority language instruction and facilities. In Arsenault-Cameron, parents from Summerside, Prince Edward Island and its environs challenged the decision of the provincial minister of education to provide bus transportation to a French-language school in a neighbouring district, as opposed to establishing a school in the Summerside area. The Court held that this decision was for the minority language community (in that case, acting through a French-language school board) to make because it would likely be based on "cultural or linguistic considerations" (at para 47) that are better understood by the minority language community itself. In addition to this purposive argument, the Court pointed to the text of s 23, in particular the term "wherever in the province" in s 23(3)(a), to support the conclusion that the right to management and control included a right to choice of location. Do you agree? The Court, however, stated that the right to choice of location is "subject to objective provincial norms and guidelines that are consistent with s. 23" (at para 54)—for example, those regarding "[s]chool size, facilities, transportation and assembly of students" (at para 53).

5. In both Mahe and the Manitoba Language Reference, above, the Court gave only declaratory relief that set out guidelines for future action by government in consultation with the minority language population. In other cases, plaintiffs have sought structural remedies. Indeed, the majority of claims for structural relief under the Charter have arisen in the context of minority language education rights. For example, in Marchand v Simcoe County Board of Education, 1986 CanLII 2671, 29 DLR \(4th\) 596 \(Ont H Ct J\), Sirois J ordered the defendant school board to provide the facilities and funding necessary to achieve instruction and facilities in the French-language secondary school equivalent to those in the English stream and to establish industrial arts and shop programs at the French-language secondary school equivalent to those in the English schools. In Doucet-Boudreau v Nova Scotia (Minister of Education), 2003 SCC 62, discussed in Chapter 25, a majority of the Court found that a trial judge was justified in retaining jurisdiction over the case and requiring the government to report back to the Court and the parties on its progress in making minority language schools available after the judge had issued a declaration that the s 23 minority language educational rights of francophones in Nova Scotia had been violated.

6. Lalonde v Ontario (Commission de restructuration des services de santé), 2001 CanLII 21164, 56 OR \(3d\) 505 \(CA\) presents an interesting variation on the language rights cases discussed above. In Lalonde, the Ontario Court of Appeal struck down the decision of the Ontario Health Services Restructuring Commission to close the Montfort Hospital. The hospital was the only hospital in the province where French-language services were available on a full-time basis. Moreover, because the working language of the hospital was French, it was the only hospital in the province where health care professionals were trained in French. The Court rejected constitutional challenges to the discussion to close the hospital on the basis of ss 15 and 16(3). However, the Court found that the commission had exercised its statutory discretion unreasonably by failing to consider, and to justify, any departure from the unwritten constitutional principle of the "protection of minorities" (at para 79) laid down by the Supreme Court in the Reference re Secession of Quebec, [\[1998\] 2 SCR 217, 1998 CanLII 793](#), excerpted in Chapter 2, Judicial Review and Constitutional Interpretation. The Government of Ontario decided not to appeal this judgment.

7. The legislative measures in the Ford case, immediately below, could be seen as an example of Quebec's vigorous efforts to protect linguistic security for francophones. Its importance in this chapter is to show how the Supreme Court has extended language rights protection beyond the explicit guarantees described so far and how it has tried to reconcile the interests of different linguistic communities when they come into conflict.

In interpreting s 2(b), the guarantee of freedom of expression, to include protection against the suppression of one's language by the state, the Court has given added protection not only to English and French minorities but also to other linguistic communities. Note, however, that there is a difference between s 2(b) and the language rights described so far because the latter confer positive rights whereas the guarantee in s 2(b) has been understood in primarily negative terms, restricting the state's ability to prevent the use of a language but not requiring that the state confer services. As well, the language rights guaranteed through s 2(b) are vulnerable to legislative override under s 33.

Ford v Quebec (AG)

[This case involved a challenge to ss 58 and 69 of the Quebec Charter of the French Language, which required that signs, posters, and commercial advertising be solely in the French language and that only the French version of a firm name be used. The legislation was attacked under both the Charter and the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms, CQLR c C-12. The editing here emphasizes the former. The override power found in s 33 of the Charter was also involved, and the parts of the judgment dealing with that issue are found in Chapter 17, The Framework of the Charter. The case also involved important rulings on freedom of expression, discussed in Chapter 20, Freedom of Expression.]

THE COURT (Dickson CJ and Beetz, McIntyre, Lamer, and Wilson JJ):

VII Whether the Freedom of Expression Guaranteed by Section 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and by Section 3 of the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms Includes the Freedom to Express Oneself in the Language of One's Choice

[39] In so far as this issue is concerned, the words "freedom of expression" in s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter and s. 3 of the Quebec Charter should be given the same meaning. As indicated above, both the Superior Court and the Court of Appeal held that freedom of expression includes the freedom to express oneself in the language of one's choice. ...

[40] The conclusion of the Superior Court and the Court of Appeal on this issue is correct. Language is so intimately related to the form and content of expression that there cannot be true freedom of expression by means of language if one is prohibited from using the language of one's choice. Language is not merely a means or medium of expression; it colours the content and meaning of expression. It is, as the preamble of the Charter of the French Language itself indicates, a means by which a people may express its cultural identity. It is also the means by which the individual expresses his or her personal identity and sense of individuality. That the concept of "expression" in s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter and s. 3 of the Quebec Charter goes beyond mere content is indicated by the specific protection accorded to "freedom of thought, belief [and] opinion" in s. 2 and to "freedom of conscience" and "freedom of opinion" in s. 3. That suggests that "freedom of expression" is intended to extend to more than the content of expression in its narrow sense.

[41] The Attorney-General of Quebec made several submissions against the conclusion reached by the Superior Court and the Court of Appeal on this issue, the most important of which may be summarized as follows: (a) in determining the meaning of freedom of expression the court should apply the distinction between the message and the medium which must have been known to the framers of the Canadian and Quebec Charters; (b) the express provision for the guarantee of language rights in ss. 16 to 23 of the Canadian Charter indicate that it was not intended that a language freedom should result incidentally from the guarantee of freedom of expression in s. 2(b); (c) the recognition of a freedom to express oneself in the language of one's choice under s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter and s. 3 of the Quebec Charter would undermine the special and limited constitutional position of the specific guarantees of language rights in s. 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867 and ss. 16 to 23 of the Canadian Charter that was emphasized by the Court in MacDonald v. City of Montreal, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 460 and Société des Acadiens du Nouveau-Brunswick Inc. v. Association of Parents for Fairness in Education, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 549; and (d) the recognition that freedom of expression includes the freedom to express oneself in the language of one's choice would be contrary to the views expressed on this issue by the European Commission of Human Rights and the European Court of Human Rights.

[42] The distinction between the message and the medium was applied by Dugas J. of the Superior Court in Devine v. Procureur général du Québec, [[1982] SC 355, aff'd 1986 CanLII 395, [1987] RJQ 50 (CA), rev'd in part [1988] 2 SCR 790, 1988 CanLII 20], in holding that freedom of expression does not include freedom to express oneself in the language of one's choice. It has already been indicated why that distinction is inappropriate as applied to language as a means of expression because of the intimate relationship between language and meaning. As one of the authorities on language quoted by the appellant Singer in the Devine appeal, J. Fishman, The Sociology of Language [Rowley, Mass: Newbury House Publishers, 1972], at p. 4, puts it: "... language is not merely a means of interpersonal communication and influence. It is not merely a carrier of content, whether latent or manifest. Language itself is content, a reference for loyalties and animosities, an indicator of social statuses and personal relationships, a marker of situations and topics as well as of the societal goals and the large-scale value-laden arenas of interaction that typify every speech community." As has been noted this quality or characteristic of language is acknowledged by the Charter of the French Language itself where, in the first paragraph of its preamble, it states: "Whereas the French language, the distinctive language of a people that is in the majority French-speaking, is the instrument by which that people has articulated its identity."

[43] The second and third of the submissions of the Attorney-General of Quebec, which have been summarized above, with reference to the implications for this issue of the express or specific guarantees of language rights in s. 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867, and ss. 16 to 23 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, are closely related and may be addressed together. These special guarantees of language rights do not, by implication, preclude a construction of freedom of expression that includes the freedom to express oneself in the language of one's choice. A general freedom to express oneself in the language of one's choice and the special guarantees of language rights in certain areas of governmental activity or jurisdiction—the legislature and administration, the courts and education—are quite different things. The latter have, as this court has indicated in MacDonald, supra, and Société des Acadiens, supra, their own special historical, political and constitutional basis. The central unifying feature of all of the language rights given explicit recognition in the Constitution of Canada is that they pertain to governmental institutions and for the most part they oblige the government to provide for, or at least tolerate, the use of both official languages. In this sense they are more akin to rights, properly understood, than freedoms. They grant entitlement to a specific benefit from the government or in relation to one's dealing with the government. Correspondingly, the government is obliged to provide certain services or benefits in both languages or at least permit use of either language by persons conducting certain affairs with the government. They do not ensure, as does a guaranteed freedom, that within a given broad range of private conduct, an individual will be free to choose his or her own course of activity. The language rights in the Constitution impose obligations on government and governmental institutions that are in the words of Beetz J. in MacDonald, a "precise scheme," providing specific opportunities to use English or French, or to receive services in English or French, in concrete, readily ascertainable and limited circumstances. In contrast, what the respondents seek in this case is a freedom as that term was explained by Dickson J. (as he then was) in R v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295 at p. 336: "Freedom can primarily be characterized by the absence of coercion or constraint. If a person is compelled by the State or the will of another to a course of action or inaction which he would not otherwise have chosen, he is not acting of his own volition and he cannot be said to be truly free. One of the major purposes of the Charter is to protect, within reason, from compulsion or constraint." The respondents seek to be free of the state imposed requirement that their commercial signs and advertising be in French only, and seek the freedom, in the entirely private or non-governmental realm of commercial activity, to display signs and advertising in the language of their choice as well as that of French. Manifestly the respondents are not seeking to use the language of their choice in any form of direct relations with any branch of government and are not seeking to oblige government to provide them any services or other benefits in the language of their choice. In this sense the respondents are asserting a freedom, the freedom to express oneself in the language of one's choice in an area of non-governmental activity, as opposed to a language right of the kind guaranteed in the Constitution. The recognition that freedom of expression includes the freedom to express oneself in the language of one's choice does not undermine or run counter to the special guarantees of official language rights in areas of governmental jurisdiction or responsibility. The legal structure, function and obligations of government institutions with respect to the English and French languages are in no way affected by the recognition that freedom of expression includes the freedom to express oneself in the language of one's choice in areas outside of those for which the special guarantees of language have been provided.

[44] The decisions of the European Commission of Human Rights and the European Court of Human Rights on which the Attorney-General of Quebec relied are all distinguishable on the same basis, apart from the fact that, as Bisson J.A. observed in the Court of Appeal, they arose in an entirely different constitutional context. They all involved claims to language rights in relations with government that would have imposed some obligation on government. ...

[The discussion about whether the guarantee of freedom of expression extends to commercial expression has been omitted. The Court concluded that the fact that the signs in issue had a commercial purpose did not remove the expression contained therein from the scope of protected freedom. Having found an infringement of freedom of expression, the Court turned to s 1 of the Canadian Charter and s 9.1 of the Quebec Charter.]

[72] The section 1 and s. 9.1 materials consist of some fourteen items ranging in nature from the general theory of language policy and planning to statistical analysis of the position of the French language in Quebec and Canada. The material deals with two matters of particular relevance to the issue in the appeal: (1) the vulnerable position of the French language in Quebec and Canada, which is the reason for the language policy reflected in the Charter of the French Language; and (2) the importance attached by language planning theory to the role of language in the public domain, including the communication or expression by language contemplated by the challenged provisions of the Charter of the French Language. As to the first, the material amply establishes the importance of the legislative purpose reflected in the Charter of the French Language and that it is a response to a substantial and pressing need. Indeed, this was conceded by the respondents both in the Court of Appeal and in this court. The vulnerable position of the French language in Quebec and Canada was described in a series of reports ... beginning ... in 1969 ... It is reflected in statistics referred to in these reports and in later studies forming part of the materials, with due adjustment made in the light of the submissions of the appellant Singer in Devine with respect to some of the later statistical material. The causal factors for the threatened position of the French language that have generally been identified are: (a) the declining birth rate of Quebec francophones resulting in a decline in the Quebec francophone proportion of the Canadian population as a whole; (b) the decline of the francophone population outside Quebec as a result of assimilation; (c) the greater rate of assimilation of immigrants to ... the anglophone community of Quebec; and (d) the continuing dominance of English at the higher levels of the economic sector. These factors have favoured the use of the English language despite the predominance in Quebec of a francophone population. Thus, in the period prior to the enactment of the legislation at issue, the "visage linguistique" of Quebec often gave the impression that English had become as significant as French. This "visage linguistique" reinforced the concern among francophones that English was gaining in importance, that the French language was threatened and that it would ultimately disappear. It strongly suggested to young and ambitious francophones that the language of success was almost exclusively English. It confirmed to anglophones that there was no great need to learn the majority language. And it suggested to immigrants that the prudent course lay in joining the anglophone community. The aim of such provisions as ss. 58 and 69 of the Charter of the French Language was, in the words of its preamble, "to see the quality and influence of the French language assured." The threat to the French language demonstrated to the government that it should, in particular, take steps to assure that the "visage linguistique" of Quebec would reflect the predominance of the French language.

[73] The section 1 and s. 9.1 materials establish that the aim of the language policy underlying the Charter of the French Language was a serious and legitimate one. They indicate the concern about the survival of the French language and the perceived need for an adequate legislative response to the problem. Moreover, they indicate a rational connection between protecting the French language and assuring that the reality of Quebec society is communicated through the "visage linguistique." The s. 1 and s. 9.1 materials do not, however, demonstrate that the requirement of the use of French only is either necessary for the achievement of the legislative objective or proportionate to it. That specific question is simply not addressed by the materials. Indeed, in his factum and oral argument the Attorney General of Quebec did not attempt to justify the requirement of the exclusive use of French. He concentrated on the reasons for the adoption of the Charter of the French Language and the earlier language legislation, which, as was noted above, were conceded by the respondents. The Attorney General of Quebec relied on what he referred to as the general democratic legitimacy of Quebec language policy without referring explicitly to the requirement of the exclusive use of French. Insofar as proportionality is concerned, the Attorney General of Quebec referred to the American jurisprudence with respect to commercial speech . . . He did, however, refer in justification of the requirement of the exclusive use of French to the attenuation of this requirement reflected in ss. 59 to 62 of the Charter of the French Language and the regulations. He submitted that these exceptions . . . indicate the concern for carefully designed measures and for interfering as little as possible with commercial expression. The qualifications of the requirement of the exclusive use of French in other provisions of the Charter of the French Language and the regulations do not make ss. 58 and 69 any less prohibitions of the use of any language other than French as applied to the respondents. The issue is whether any such prohibition is justified. In the opinion of this Court it has not been demonstrated that the prohibition . . . is necessary to the defence and enhancement of the status of the French language in Quebec or that it is proportionate to that legislative purpose. Since the evidence put to us by the government showed that the predominance of the French language was not reflected in the "visage linguistique" of Quebec, the governmental response could well have been tailored to meet that specific problem and to impair freedom of expression minimally. Thus, whereas requiring the predominant display of the French language, even its marked predominance, would be proportional to the goal of promoting and maintaining a French "visage linguistique" in Quebec and therefore justified under [s 9.1 of] the Quebec Charter and [s 1 of] the Canadian Charter, requiring the exclusive use of French has not been so justified. French could be required in addition to any other language or it could be required to have greater visibility than that accorded to other languages. Such measures would ensure that the "visage linguistique" reflected the demography of Quebec: the predominant language is French. This reality should be communicated to all citizens and non-citizens alike, irrespective of their mother tongue. But exclusivity for the French language has not survived the scrutiny of a proportionality test and does not reflect the reality of Quebec society. Accordingly, we are of the view that the limit imposed on freedom of expression by

s. 58 of the Charter of the French Language respecting the exclusive use of French on public signs and posters and in commercial advertising is not justified under s. 9.1 of the Quebec Charter. In like measure, the limit imposed on freedom of expression by s. 69 of the Charter of the French Language respecting the exclusive use of the French version of a firm name is not justified under either s. 9.1 of the Quebec Charter or s. 1 of the Canadian Charter.

Appeal dismissed.

NOTE

When Quebec enacted new legislation restricting the use of English in outdoor signs—and protected it from Charter scrutiny through the use of s 33 of the Charter—several anglophones from Quebec brought a complaint under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 19 December 1966, 999 UNTS 171 (entered into force 23 March 1976, accession by Canada 19 May 1976). Their argument, inter alia, was that the sign law violated art 19 of the Covenant, which reads in part:

2. Everyone shall have the right to freedom of expression; this right shall include freedom to seek, receive and impart information and ideas of all kinds, regardless of frontiers, either orally, in writing or in print, in the form of art, or through any other media of his choice.

3. The exercise of the rights provided for in paragraph 2 of this article carries with it special duties and responsibilities. It may therefore be subject to certain restrictions, but these shall only be such as are provided by law and are necessary:

(a) For respect of the rights or reputations of others;

(b) For the protection of national security or of public order (ordre public), or of public health and morals.

The United Nations Human Rights Committee took a position similar to the Supreme Court of Canada (Ballantyne v Canada, 359/1989, 385/1989), stating:

11.4 Any restriction of the freedom of expression must cumulatively meet the following conditions: it must be provided for by law, it must address one of the aims enumerated in paragraphs 3(a) and (b) of article 19, and must be necessary to achieve the legitimate purpose. While the restrictions on outdoor advertising are indeed provided for by law, the issue to be addressed is whether they are necessary for the respect of the rights of others. The rights of others could only be the rights of the francophone minority within Canada under article 27. This is the right to use their own language, which is not jeopardized by the freedom of others to advertise in other than the French language. Nor does the Committee have reason to believe that public order would be jeopardized by commercial advertising outdoors in a language other than French. The Committee notes that the State party does not seek to defend Bill 178 on these grounds. Any constraints under paragraphs 3(a) and 3(b) of article 19 would in any event have to be shown to be necessary. The Committee believes that it is not necessary, in order to protect the vulnerable position in Canada of the francophone group, to prohibit commercial advertising in English. This protection may be achieved in other ways that do not preclude the freedom of expression, in a language of their choice, of those engaged in such fields as trade. For example, the law could have required that advertising be in both French and English. A state may choose one or more official languages, but it may not exclude, outside the spheres of public life, the freedom to express oneself in a language of one's choice. The Committee accordingly concludes that there has been a violation of article 19, paragraph 2.

In 1993, Quebec changed its language legislation once again so as to permit the use of English on signs, provided French was predominant (Charter of the French Language, RSQ 1985, c C-11, s 58, as amended by SQ 1993, c 40). The override of the Charter, enacted in 1988 (SQ 1988, c 54, s 10), was not renewed. A constitutional challenge to s 58, on the basis of, inter alia, s 2(b), was rejected by the Quebec Court of Appeal in Enterprises WFH Ltée c Québec (Procureur Général du), 2001 CanLII 17598, [\[2001\] RJQ 2557 \(QL\) \(CA\)](#). The controversial aspect of the decision is that the Court permitted the Quebec government to rely on the factual findings of the trial Court in Ford, instead of requiring it to adduce new evidence.

IV. PROPOSALS FOR CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

As discussed in Chapter 26, Amending the Constitution, there have been two major efforts to amend the Constitution since 1982. Neither constitutional round included explicit provisions dealing with language. However, both the Meech Lake Accord (the 1987-90 round) and the Charlottetown Accord (the 1991-92 round) proposed amendments to recognize Quebec as a distinct society. These clauses proved controversial politically, which contributed to the demise of both proposals.

The Charlottetown Accord's distinct society clause was part of the "Canada clause" that was to be added to the Constitution Act, 1867:

2(1) The Constitution of Canada, including the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the following fundamental characteristics:

- (a) Canada is a democracy committed to a parliamentary and federal system of government and to the rule of law;
- (b) the Aboriginal peoples of Canada, being the first peoples to govern this land, have the right to promote their languages, cultures and traditions and to ensure the integrity of their societies, and their governments constitute one of the three orders of government in Canada;
- (c) Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society, which includes a French-speaking majority, a unique culture and a civil law tradition;
- (d) Canadians and their governments are committed to the vitality and development of official language minority communities throughout Canada;
- (e) Canadians are committed to racial and ethnic equality in a society that includes citizens from many lands who have contributed, and continue to contribute, to the building of a strong Canada that reflects its cultural and racial diversity;
- (f) Canadians are committed to a respect for individual and collective human rights and freedoms of all people;
- (g) Canadians are committed to the equality of female and male persons; and
- (h) Canadians confirm the principle of the equality of the provinces at the same time as recognizing their diverse characteristics.

(2) The role of the legislature and Government of Quebec to preserve and promote the distinct society of Quebec is affirmed.

(3) Nothing in this section derogates from the powers, rights or privileges of the Parliament or the Government of Canada, or of the legislatures or governments of the provinces, or of the legislative bodies or governments of the Aboriginal peoples of Canada, including any powers, rights or privileges relating to language and, for greater certainty, nothing in this section derogates from the aboriginal and treaty rights of the Aboriginal peoples of Canada.

Opinion on the possible legal effect of the distinct society clauses was divided. Proponents variously indicated that the clauses would have only, or mainly, symbolic effect. Some argued that the clause did no more than affirm what the Supreme Court had said in Ford, above—that Quebec, with a French-speaking majority constituting a minority in North America, might take special steps to protect its distinctive language and culture.

Critics viewed the clauses as designed to undermine the commitment to individual rights, including freedom of choice in the use of language, embodied in the Charter. Some critics were apprehensive that the clauses would create a hierarchy of more favoured rights at the expense of other rights and freedoms. For discussion of the history of constitutional amendments, including these controversial provisions, see Peter Russell, Constitutional Odyssey, 3rd ed (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2004).

Following the narrow defeat of the sovereignty proposal in the October 1995 Quebec referendum, the federal Parliament, on December 6, 1995 (House of Commons Debates, 35-1 at 17288), passed a resolution on the distinct society in the following terms:

That whereas the people of Quebec have expressed the desire for recognition of Quebec's distinct society:

- The House recognize that Quebec's is a distinct society within Canada;
- The House recognize that Quebec's distinct society includes its French-speaking majority, unique culture and civil law tradition;
- The House undertake to be guided by this reality;
- The House encourage all components of the legislative and executive branches of government to take note of this recognition and be guided in their conduct accordingly.

NOTE AND QUESTION

In 2019, Quebec enacted the Act respecting the laicity of the State, SQ 2019, c 12, initially known as Bill 21. The law bans the wearing of religious dress or symbols by persons performing certain public service functions where they are deemed to occupy a position of authority, such as police officers, government lawyers, and public school teachers. Widely viewed as a reaction to widespread disapproval of face-covering by Muslim women, the law has been criticized as impinging on religious freedom. When it enacted the law, however, the Quebec legislature invoked s 33 of the Charter—the notwithstanding clause—which appeared to eliminate the possibility of a constitutional challenge based on s 2 or ss 7-15 of the Charter. In 2021, a Quebec Superior Court judge confirmed this effect of the notwithstanding clause, although he was highly critical of the law's impact on minority groups. However, the judge went on to find that the law's application to teachers employed by anglophone school boards was contrary to the Charter's s 23. In his view, s 23 protects the autonomy of those school boards with respect to hiring decisions and, thus, was engaged by the ban. As s 33 does not apply to s 23, and the ban was not a "reasonable limit" under s 1, that portion of the law was declared unconstitutional. What do you think of this result?

I. INTRODUCTION

This chapter examines the remedial issues that arise after an unjustified constitutional violation has been established. Following this introduction, Section II deals with remedies available under s 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 for unconstitutional legislation. That section reads:

52(1) The Constitution of Canada is the supreme law of Canada, and any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect.

Section III deals with the range of remedies under s 24(1) of the Charter for governmental acts that unjustifiably violate Charter rights. Fundamental human rights and freedoms are meaningless absent effective means for their enforcement. In contrast to the Canadian Bill of Rights, SC 1960, c 44, the Charter includes, in s 24, an explicit remedial provision, which reads as follows:

24(1) Anyone whose rights or freedoms, as guaranteed by this Charter, have been infringed or denied may apply to a court of competent jurisdiction to obtain such remedy as the court considers appropriate and just in the circumstances.

Section 24(2) goes on to make explicit provision for the remedy of exclusion of evidence obtained in violation of Charter rights, a remedy that is often sought in the criminal law context, but which this chapter does not further consider.

Section 24 of the Charter does not apply to the enforcement of Aboriginal and treaty rights under s 35(1), but the courts have used similar remedies including injunctions, declarations, and damages to enforce s 35 rights. See Kent Roach, Constitutional Remedies in Canada, 2nd ed (Toronto: Thomson Reuters, 2013) ch 15. Note that art 40 of the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, UN GA res 61/295 provides:

Indigenous peoples have the right to access to and prompt decision through just and fair procedures for the resolution of conflicts and disputes with States or other parties, as well as to effective remedies for all infringements of their individual and collective rights. Such a decision shall give due consideration to the customs, traditions, rules and legal systems of the indigenous peoples concerned and international human rights.

What would effective and bi-jural remedies that respect both Indigenous laws and human rights look like? For arguments that they would seek prior and informed consent of Indigenous people and incorporate Indigenous law, see Brenda Gunn, "Remedies for Violations of Indigenous Peoples' Human Rights" (2019) 69 1 Supp UTLJ 150.

A. REMEDIES AND STANDING

In R v Big M Drug Mart Ltd, [1985] 1 SCR 295, 1985 CanLII 69, excerpted in Chapter 19, Freedom of Religion, the Court concluded that s 52 was available in cases where the constitutionality of the legislation was at issue and a declaration of invalidity was sought. Chief Justice Dickson, for the majority, commented at 313-14:

Section 24(1) sets out a remedy for individuals (whether real persons or artificial ones such as corporations) whose rights under the Charter have been infringed. It is not, however, the only recourse in the face of unconstitutional legislation. Where, as here, the challenge is based on the unconstitutionality of the legislation, recourse to s. 24 is unnecessary and the particular effect on the challenging party is irrelevant.

Section 52 sets out the fundamental principle of constitutional law that the Constitution is supreme. The undoubted corollary to be drawn from this principle is that no one can be convicted of an offence under an unconstitutional law. ...

Any accused ... may defend a criminal charge by arguing that the law under which the charge is brought is constitutionally invalid. Big M is urging that the law under which it has been charged is inconsistent with s. 2(a) of the Charter and by reason of s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982, it is of no force or effect.

Thus, a declaration of invalidity sought under s 52 is governed by more generous standing requirements than the relief available under s 24(1), which can only be brought by those whose own personal rights are infringed.

The Supreme Court has, however, placed some limits on the Big M expansion of standing under s 52(1). Corporations that cannot claim an infringement of their own Charter rights have not been allowed to bring independent civil actions seeking declarations of a law's invalidity, despite the fact that they are subject to regulation under the law in issue and to possible criminal or penal sanctions should they violate it: see Irwin Toy Ltd v Quebec (AG), [1989] 1 SCR 927, 1989 CanLII 87; Hy and Zel's Inc v Ontario (AG); Paul Magder Furs Ltd v Ontario (AG), [1993] 3 SCR 675, 1993 CanLII 30. This is in contrast to federalism cases where the fact that a corporation's interests are directly affected by a law is sufficient to ground standing, and, indeed, in Irwin Toy the corporation was granted standing to bring a federalism challenge to provincial legislation that prohibited advertising aimed at children, but not to bring a s 7 Charter challenge. Opinion is divided on this restriction of standing in Charter cases—for some, it is an unjustifiable limitation on judicial review; for others, it is a positive attempt to prevent the Charter, intended to protect individual rights and dignity, from being used to benefit corporate, economic interests. These issues of standing are further discussed in June M Ross, "Standing in Charter Declaratory Actions" (1995) 33 Osgoode Hall LJ 151.

Another way in which individuals or corporations may be allowed to argue the violation of another person's Charter rights, in addition to reliance on the Big M standing rule, is through a grant of public interest standing, discussed in Chapter 13, The Role of the Judiciary.

B. RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN SECTIONS 24 AND 52

Section 52 provides a variety of remedies for unconstitutional laws (including delegated legislation), while s 24(1) provides a variety of remedies for unconstitutional acts by public officials. This understanding was articulated by McLachlin CJ, writing for the Court in R v Ferguson, 2008 SCC 6, a case that raised the issue of whether a stand-alone remedy could be granted under s 24(1) (the remedy sought on the facts was a constitutional exemption) after a law was found to violate the Charter:

[58] ... [R]emedies for breaches of the Charter are governed by s. 24(1) of the Charter and s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982.

[59] When a law produces an unconstitutional effect, the usual remedy lies under s. 52(1), which provides that the law is of no force or effect to the extent that it is inconsistent with the Charter. ... Section 52 does not create a personal remedy. A claimant who otherwise has standing can generally seek a declaration of invalidity under s. 52 on the grounds that a law has unconstitutional effects either in his own case or on third parties

[60] Section 24(1), by contrast, is generally used as a remedy, not for unconstitutional laws, but for unconstitutional government acts committed under the authority of legal regimes which are accepted as fully constitutional The acts of government agents acting under such regimes are not the necessary result or "effect" of the law, but of the government agent's applying a discretion conferred by the law in an unconstitutional manner. Section 52(1) is thus not applicable. The appropriate remedy lies under s. 24(1).

[61] It thus becomes apparent that ss. 52(1) and 24(1) serve different remedial purposes. Section 52(1) provides a remedy for laws that violate Charter rights either in purpose or in effect. Section 24(1), by contrast, provides a remedy for government acts that violate Charter rights. It provides a personal remedy against unconstitutional government action and so, unlike s. 52(1), can be invoked only by a party alleging a violation of that party's own constitutional rights

As will be seen, however, s 24(1) remedies such as damages and exemptions from a suspended declaration of invalidity can be combined with s 52 remedies invalidating legislation to the extent of its inconsistency with the Charter in some cases.

C. JURISDICTION TO AWARD CHARTER REMEDIES

There are also complex rules governing jurisdiction to award Charter remedies. As a basic rule, the provincial superior courts will always have jurisdiction to award both a Charter remedy under s 24(1) and to declare laws of no force and effect to the extent of their inconsistency with the Constitution under s 52(1). Legislation that attempted to strip superior courts of such a core role would likely itself be found to be unconstitutional: see Chapter 13, The Role of the Judiciary.

At the same time, however, clear legislation can deprive other courts and tribunals of jurisdiction to award s 24(1) or s 52(1) remedies. In R v Conway, 2010 SCC 22, the Supreme Court attempted to clarify this complex area of law and concluded, given the important role of administrative tribunals, that it would be presumed that they could apply both forms of remedies "unless it is clearly demonstrated that the legislature intended to exclude the Charter from the tribunal's jurisdiction" (at para 81). In Nova Scotia (Workers' Compensation Board) v Martin; Nova Scotia (Workers' Compensation Board) v Laseur, 2003 SCC 54, the Court also articulated a presumption that administrative tribunals that can decide questions of law should also have the power to consider the Constitution (at para 42). There have been cases where the legislature has clearly displaced both presumptions: see Tétreault-Gadoury v Canada (Employment and Immigration Commission), [1991] 2 SCR 22, 1991 CanLII 12; Rio Tinto Alcan Inc v Carrier Sekani Tribal Council, 2010 SCC 43.

As discussed in the extract by Kent Roach, immediately below, the Charter, with its extensive array of remedial possibilities, has focused attention on the large degree of judicial discretion involved in the choice of constitutional remedies. This has prompted discussion of a sort hitherto largely absent from our constitutional tradition about the factors that should influence that choice.

Kent Roach, Constitutional Remedies in Canada

2nd ed (Toronto: Thomson Reuters, 2013) at 3.10-3.70 (footnotes omitted)

3.10 The main purpose of constitutional remedies outlined in this chapter is to provide effective and meaningful remedies for individual claimants and for society. The legitimate purposes of constitutional remedies include compensation and correction of the harms that constitutional violations have caused to individuals, the vindication of the values of the Constitution, and ensuring compliance with the constitution in the future for the benefit of society. As Chief Justice McLachlin has recognized: "remedies make things better. They heal wounds. They put things right. Remedies allow us to mend our wounds and carry on—as individuals and as a society."

3.20 The main constraints on constitutional remedies are the need to respect the respective roles of the courts, the executive and the legislature when providing remedies, the need to be fair to all affected parties, and the need to recognize an open-ended category of compelling social interests that would be harmed by a particular remedy or an immediate or fully retroactive remedy.

3.30 The principles of proportionality are also relevant to remedial decision-making both with respect to whether less drastic remedies will adequately achieve remedial purposes and with respect to whether governments can justify limiting remedies because of countervailing and competing social interests.

3.40 All of the above purposes, constraints and principles find support in the jurisprudence, but it is still necessary for judges to choose which ones to stress in particular contexts. A particular constitutional remedy need not serve only one purpose or recognize one constraint. Remedial decision-making is inevitably contextual.

3.50 In some contexts, different purposes and constraints may be more relevant than others. When responding to a deficient minority language school system or a long-standing violation of equality rights for example, it may be impossible for a court fully to compensate for the past harmful effects of a violation or even to ensure immediate compliance with the Constitution. In such institutional contexts, declarations and injunctions may be issued in order to change governmental behaviour in the future while, at the same time, balancing the interests affected by the remedy and respecting limits on the role of the judiciary. A remedy such as a declaration may be appropriate when a lack of compliance with the Charter first emerges, but less appropriate if there has been long-standing non-compliance. Governments can fail to comply with the constitution for a variety of reasons including a simple lack of attention to the need to comply, incompetence or even intransigence. The particular reasons for non-compliance may influence the type of remedy required.

3.60 Disagreements about the appropriate role of the judiciary lie at the heart of debate about remedial purposes and constraints. The goal of compensating and correcting constitutional violations is associated with a classical model of adjudication in which judges provide remedies for those who have suffered violations and attempt to restore victims to the position they occupied before the violation. Under such an approach, judges are only justified and competent to order remedies to the extent that they repair harms caused by a government's violation. Judges should leave more robust remedial ambitions to "the legislative and administrative direction of the community as the pursuit of distributive justice." On the other hand, when a violation is proven, they should insist on full compensation for the harms of the violation without attempting either to balance the affected interests or change governmental behaviour in the future. If a court focuses on correcting harms caused by proven violations, it will not have to worry about infringing the role of other branches of government to pursue distributive justice.

3.70 Constitutional remedies that attempt to regulate governmental behaviour to ensure compliance with the constitution in the future are associated with a public law model of adjudication which stresses that remedial decision-making is a more instrumental and contingent process than determining violations of constitutional rights. Judges do not attempt to deduce remedies from the nature of the harms caused by the violation, but rather fashion remedies to achieve compliance with the Constitution in the future. Courts can invoke the breadth of their remedial powers at equity to justify ordering remedies that respond to harms and conditions that may not be causally connected to proven violations and also to balance all the interests affected by the remedy. Courts are concerned with implementing their decisions, and to this end, they can delay and supervise the remedial process. Courts may also engage in remedial dialogue by suspending declarations of invalidity or inviting the parties to submit remedial proposals before approving final remedies. Such approaches recognize limits on judicial competence, the special expertise of the executive, and the ability of legislatures to fashion more comprehensive remedies. Courts that fashion remedies instrumentally may also be prepared to limit remedies to recognizing competing interests such as the need not to impair effective government. In some cases, this may mean a departure from the remedial norm of full retroactive relief, especially in cases where governments have relied in good faith on prior law.

The material that follows will provide a more detailed examination, first, of the variants on the declaration of invalidity available under s 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 and, second, of the individual remedies that may be ordered under s 24(1) of the Charter. For further discussion of the remedial issues raised by the Charter, see Robert J Sharpe & Kent Roach, The Charter of Rights and Freedoms, 7th ed (Toronto: Irwin Law, 2021) ch 18; Kent Roach, "Charter Remedies" in Peter Oliver, Patrick Macklem & Natalie Des Rosiers, eds, The Oxford Handbook of the Canadian Constitution (New York: Oxford University Press, 2017); Peter Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada, 5th ed (Toronto: Carswell, 2007) ch 40; Kent Roach, Constitutional Remedies in Canada, 2nd ed (Toronto: Thomson Reuters, 2013). II. REMEDIES UNDER SECTION 52(1) OF THE CONSTITUTION ACT, 1982

A. INTRODUCTION AND OVERVIEW

The focus of this section will be on the use of the declaration of invalidity under s 52 as a remedy for violations of rights under the Charter. A declaration that a law is invalid in its entirety may constitute an overly broad remedy in cases where only some parts of the law or some of its applications infringe the Charter. There are a variety of ways to structure more limited remedies that will save the permissible applications of the law and simply preclude those that are impermissible. Partial invalidation of laws may be accomplished through the techniques of severance, reading down, reading in, and constitutional exemptions.

A declaration of invalidity may also be a problematic remedy in the case of so-called underinclusive laws, where the problem with the law is that benefits being provided to some individuals are not being provided to others, creating a situation that violates the equality guarantees found in s 15 of the Charter. Striking down the law will have the result of depriving those who are currently entitled to benefits, as well as providing no benefit to the person challenging the law. In cases of underinclusive laws, the extension of benefits is a possible remedy that may be achieved either through severance of an explicit limitation on the operation of the law or by reading in an extension of benefits.

While these new remedial possibilities under the Charter have the advantage of preserving many socially useful laws and avoiding the creation of large legislative gaps, they also raise concerns about judicial usurpation of the legislative role. At what point do courts become subject to the charge that they are engaging in the rewriting or drafting of legislation, a task more appropriately left to the legislature?

Another remedial option, which avoids the legislative void created by the immediate nullification of a law and does not involve the judiciary in reshaping a new law that will meet the dictates of the Charter, is the temporary suspension of a declaration of invalidity for a period of time to allow Parliament or the provincial legislature to fill the void. Although attractive from the perspective of maintaining an appropriate judicial role, this remedy may fail to provide adequate redress for a violation of Charter rights because it allows a state of affairs that has been found to violate the Charter to persist for a period of time despite the violation. See Bruce Ryder, "Suspending the Charter" (2003) 21 SCLR (2d) 267; Grant Hoole, "Proportionality as a Remedial Principle: A Framework for Suspended Declarations of Invalidity" (2011) 49 Alta L Rev 107; Robert Leckey, "Enforcing Laws That Infringe Rights" (2016) Public Law 206; Robert Leckey, Common Law Bills of Rights (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2015); Carissima Mathen, "An Inconvenient Constitution? The Troubles with Suspended Declarations of Invalidity" (2021) 101 SCLR 345.

The first comprehensive treatment by the Supreme Court of Canada of the remedial issues raised by the Charter, and in particular of constitutionally underinclusive legislation and the use of suspended declarations of invalidity, is found in Schachter v Canada, immediately below. The Court has subsequently revised that part of Schachter that relates to suspended declarations of invalidity, but the case remains useful with respect to other s 52 remedies.

Schachter v Canada

[At the time this case was litigated, the Unemployment Insurance Act provided mothers who had given birth with 15 weeks of maternity benefits (s 30) and adoptive parents with 15 weeks of parenting leave, following the placement of their child with them, the benefits to be shared between the two parents according to their wishes (s 32). A father, whose claim for "paternity benefits" following the birth of his child was dismissed as not falling within the provisions of the Act, challenged the decision as a violation of his rights to equality under s 15 of the Charter. At trial, Strayer J found a violation of s 15 of the Charter in that s 32 discriminated between natural parents and adoptive parents with respect to parental leave. (No s 1 argument was made.) With respect to the issue of the appropriate remedy, Strayer J granted declaratory relief under s 24(1), extending to natural parents the same benefits as were granted to adoptive parents under s 32, without affecting a woman's right to maternity benefits. On appeal to the Federal Court of Appeal, the parties conceded a violation of s 15 of the Charter, and the only issue appealed was the jurisdiction of the trial judge to order the remedy granted. The Court of Appeal upheld Strayer J's decision. An appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of Canada.]

I. Reading In as a Remedial Option Under Section 52

A court has flexibility in determining what course of action to take following a violation of the Charter which does not survive s. 1 scrutiny. Section 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982 mandates the striking down of any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution, but only "to the extent of the inconsistency." Depending upon the circumstances, a court may simply strike down, it may strike down and temporarily suspend the declaration of invalidity, or it may resort to the techniques of reading down or reading in. ...

A. The Doctrine of Severance

The flexibility of the language of s. 52 is not a new development in Canadian constitutional law. The courts have always struck down laws only to the extent of the inconsistency using the doctrine of severance or "reading down." Severance is used by the courts so as to interfere with the laws adopted by the legislature as little as possible. Generally speaking, when only a part of a statute or provision violates the Constitution, it is common sense that only the offending portion should be declared to be of no force or effect, and the rest should be spared. ...

... [A]s Rogerson has pointed out (in "The Judicial Search for Appropriate Remedies Under the Charter: The Examples of Overbreadth and Vagueness" in Sharpe, ed., Charter Litigation (1987) at pp. 250-52), it is logical to expect that severance would be a more prominent technique under the Charter than it has been in division of powers cases. In division of powers cases the question of constitutional validity often turns on an overall examination of the pith and substance of the legislation rather than on an examination of the effects of particular portions of the legislation on individual rights. Where a statute violates the division of powers, it tends to do so as a whole. This is not so of violations of the Charter where the offending portion tends to be more limited.

Where the offending portion of a statute can be defined in a limited manner it is consistent with legal principles to declare inoperative only that limited portion. In that way, as much of the legislative purpose as possible may be realized. However, there are some cases in which to sever the offending portion would actually be more intrusive to the legislative purpose than the alternate course of striking down provisions which are not themselves offensive but which are closely connected with those that are. This concern is reflected in the classic statement of the test for severance in Attorney-General for Alberta v. Attorney-General for Canada, [1947] A.C. 503 (PC), at p. 518:

The real question is whether what remains is so inextricably bound up with the part declared invalid that what remains cannot independently survive or, as it has sometimes been put, whether on a fair review of the whole matter it can be assumed that the legislature would have enacted what survives without enacting the part that is ultra vires at all.

This test recognizes that the seemingly laudable purpose of retaining the parts of the legislative scheme which do not offend the Constitution rests on an assumption that the legislature would have passed the constitutionally sound part of the scheme without the unsound part. In some cases this assumption will not be a safe one. In those cases it will be necessary to go further and declare inoperative portions of the legislation which are not themselves unsound.

B. Reading In as Akin to Severance

This same approach should be applied to the question of reading in since extension by way of reading in is closely akin to the practice of severance. The difference is the manner in which the extent of the inconsistency is defined. In the usual case of severance the inconsistency is defined as something improperly included in the statute which can be severed and struck down. In the case of reading in the inconsistency is defined as what the statute wrongly excludes rather than what it wrongly includes. Where the inconsistency is defined as what the statute excludes, the logical result of declaring inoperative that inconsistency may be to include the excluded group within the statutory scheme. This has the effect of extending the reach of the statute by way of reading in rather than reading down.

A statute may be worded in such a way that it gives a benefit or right to one group (inclusive wording) [for example, "A benefits"] or it may be worded to give a right or benefit to everyone except a certain group (exclusive wording) [for example, "Everyone benefits except B"]. It would be an arbitrary distinction to treat inclusively and exclusively worded statutes differently. To do so would create a situation where the style of drafting would be the single critical factor in the determination of a remedy. ...

The first example would require the court to "read in" the words "and B," while the second example would require the court to "strike out" the words "except B." In each case, the result would be identical.

Accordingly, whether a court "reads in" or "strikes out" words from a challenged law, the focus of the court should be on the appropriate remedy in the circumstances and not on the label used to arrive at the result.

There is nothing in s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982 to suggest that the court should be restricted to the verbal formula employed by the legislature in defining the inconsistency between a statute and the Constitution. Section 52 does not say that the words expressing a law are of no force or effect to the extent that they are inconsistent with the Constitution. It says that a law is of no force or effect to the extent of the inconsistency. Therefore, the inconsistency can be defined as what is left out of the verbal formula as well as what is wrongly included.

C. The Purposes of Reading In and Severance

(i) Respect for the Role of the Legislature

The logical parallels between reading in and severance are mirrored by their parallel purposes. Reading in is as important a tool as severance in avoiding undue intrusion into the legislative sphere. As with severance, the purpose of reading in is to be as faithful as possible within the requirements of the Constitution to the scheme enacted by the Legislature. Rogerson makes this observation at p. 288:

Courts should certainly go as far as required to protect rights, but no further. Interference with legitimate legislative purposes should be minimized and laws serving such purposes should be allowed to remain operative to the extent that rights are not violated. Legislation which serves desirable social purposes may give rise to entitlements which themselves deserve some protection.

Of course, reading in will not always constitute the lesser intrusion for the same reason that severance sometimes does not. In some cases, it will not be a safe assumption that the legislature would have enacted the constitutionally permissible part of its enactment without the impermissible part. For example, in a benefits case, it may not be a safe assumption that the legislature would have enacted a benefits scheme if it were impermissible to exclude particular parties from entitlement under that scheme.

(ii) Respect for the Purposes of the Charter

Just as reading in is sometimes required in order to respect the purposes of the legislature, it is also sometimes required in order to respect the purposes of the Charter. The absolute unavailability of reading in would mean that the standards developed under the Charter would have to be applied in certain cases in ways which would derogate from the deeper social purposes of the Charter. ... [E]ven in situations where the standards of the Charter allow for more than one remedial response, the purposes of the Charter may encourage one kind of response more strongly than another.

This is best illustrated by the case of Attorney-General of Nova Scotia v. Phillips (1986), 34 D.L.R. (4th) 633 (N.S.C.A.). In that case, a form of welfare benefit was available to single mothers but not single fathers. This was held to violate s. 15 of the Charter since benefits should be available to single mothers and single fathers equally. However, the court held that s. 15 merely required equal benefit, so that the Charter would be equally satisfied whether the benefit was available to both mothers and fathers or to neither. Given this and the court's conclusion that it could not extend benefits, the only available course was to nullify the benefits to single mothers. The irony of this result is obvious.

Perhaps in some cases s. 15 does simply require relative equality and is just as satisfied with equal graveyards as equal vineyards, as it has sometimes been put (see [Evan H Caminker, "A Norm-Based Remedial Model for Underinclusive Statutes" (1986) 95 Yale LJ 1185], at p. 1186). Yet the nullification of benefits to single mothers does not sit well with the overall purpose of s. 15 of the Charter and for s. 15 to have such a result clearly amounts to "equality with a vengeance," as LEAF [Women's Legal Action and Education Fund], one of the intervenors in this case, has suggested. While s. 15 may not absolutely require that benefits be available to single mothers, surely it at least encourages such action to relieve the disadvantaged position of persons in those circumstances. In cases of this kind, reading in allows the court to act in a manner more consistent with the basic purposes of the Charter.

Reading in should therefore be recognized as a legitimate remedy akin to severance and should be available under s. 52 in cases where it is an appropriate technique to fulfil the purposes of the Charter and at the same time minimize the interference of the court with the parts of legislation that do not themselves violate the Charter.

Even where extension by way of reading in can be used to further the legislative objective through the very means the legislature has chosen, to do so may, in some cases, involve an intrusion into budgetary decisions which cannot be supported. This Court has held, and rightly so, that budgetary considerations cannot be used to justify a violation under s. 1. However, such considerations are clearly relevant once a violation which does not survive s. 1 has been established, s. 52 is determined to have been engaged and the Court turns its attention to what action should be taken thereunder.

Any remedy granted by a court will have some budgetary repercussions whether it be a saving of money or an expenditure of money. Striking down or severance may well lead to an expenditure of money. ... In determining whether reading in is appropriate then, the question is not whether courts can make decisions that impact on budgetary policy, it is to what degree they can appropriately do so. A remedy which entails an intrusion into this sphere so substantial as to change the nature of the legislative scheme in question is clearly inappropriate.

(v) Conclusion

It should be apparent from this analysis that there is no easy formula by which a court may decide whether severance or reading in is appropriate in a given case. While respect for the role of the legislature and the purposes of the Charter are the twin guiding principles, these principles can only be fulfilled with respect to the variety of considerations set out above which require careful attention in each case.

Without a mandate based on a clear legislative objective, it would be imprudent for me to take the course of reading the excluded group into the legislation. A consideration of the budgetary implications of such a course of action further underlines this conclusion. ... Here, the excluded group sought to be included likely vastly outnumbers the group to whom the benefits were already extended.

Given the nature of the benefit and the size of the group to whom it is sought to be extended, to read in natural parents would in these circumstances constitute a substantial intrusion into the legislative domain. This intrusion would be substantial enough to change potentially the nature of the scheme as a whole. If this Court were to dictate that the same benefits conferred on adoptive parents under s. 32 be extended to natural parents, the ensuing financial shake-up could mean that other benefits to other disadvantaged groups would have to be done away with to pay for the extension. Parliament and the provincial legislatures are much better equipped to assess the whole picture in formulating solutions in cases such as these. Clearly, the appropriate action for the Court to take is to declare the provision invalid but to suspend that declaration to allow the legislative body in question to weigh all the relevant factors in amending the legislation to meet constitutional requirements.

I think it significant and worthy of mention that in this case Parliament did amend the impugned provision following the launching of this action, and that that amendment was not the one that reading in would have imposed. Parliament equalized the benefits given to adoptive parents and natural parents but not on the same terms as they were originally conferred by s. 32. The two groups now receive equal benefits for ten weeks rather than the original fifteen. This situation provides a valuable illustration of the dangers associated with reading in when legislative intention with respect to budgetary issues is not clear. In this case, reading in would not necessarily further the legislative objective and it would definitely interfere with budgetary decisions in that it would mandate the expenditure of a greater sum of money than Parliament is willing or able to allocate to the program in question.

Disposition

In the result, the appeal is allowed and the judgment of the trial judge set aside. Normally, I would order that s. 32 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 ... be struck down pursuant to s. 52 and be declared to be of no force or effect, and I would further suspend the operation of this declaration to allow Parliament to amend the legislation to bring it into line with its constitutional obligations. There is, however, no need for a declaration of invalidity or a suspension thereof at this stage of this matter given the November 1990 repeal and replacement of the impugned provision.

B. SUSPENDED DECLARATIONS OF INVALIDITY AND EXEMPTIONS

Ontario (AG) v G

2020 SCC 38

[The Court revisited Schachter in affirming that a sex offender registry law that violated the s 15 rights of those found not criminally responsible of a sexual offence on account of mental disorder should be struck down subject to a 12-month suspended declaration and an exemption for the successful applicant, Mr G.]

KARAKATSANSIS J (Wagner CJ and Abella, Moldaver, Martin, and Kasirer JJ concurring):

[83] As I will explain, I conclude that suspensions of declarations of invalidity should be rare, granted only when an identifiable public interest, grounded in the Constitution, is endangered by an immediate declaration to such an extent that it outweighs the harmful impacts of delaying the declaration's effect. And when declarations are suspended, granting individual exemptions pursuant to s. 24(1) of the Charter will often balance the interests of the litigant, the broader public, and the legislature in a manner that is "appropriate and just."

[101] At the core of Schachter was its recognition that flexibility is necessary to arrive at appropriate remedies involving legislation, and its endorsement of remedies short of a full declaration of invalidity. Lamer C.J. made clear that "Depending upon the circumstances, a court may simply strike down, it may strike down and temporarily suspend the declaration of invalidity, or it may resort to the techniques of reading down or reading in" (p. 695).

[102] Different types of remedy can be granted because the circumstances may implicate general remedial principles in different ways. Schachter recognized the

"twin guiding principles" of "respect for the role of the legislature and the purposes of the Charter" (p. 715) that play a key role in determining the type of remedy that would be ordered.

[103] Schachter held that the first step in choosing the appropriate remedy is defining the extent of the inconsistency between the legislation and the Charter. The second step is determining the form of the declaration. Beyond the extent of the inconsistency, Schachter said that the form of a remedy would be influenced by courts' respect for the role of the legislature. The general rule is that tailored remedies should only be granted when a court can fairly conclude that the legislature would have enacted the law as it would be modified by the court (pp. 697 and 700).

[104] Schachter also endorsed the use of suspended declarations—declarations that legislation is unconstitutional, but whose effect is suspended for some period of time. Lamer C.J. reasoned that a delayed order could be justified based on the effect of an immediate declaration on the public and that, by contrast, the roles of courts and legislatures should not enter into the question of whether to suspend a declaration (p. 717).

[105] Finally, Schachter considered how s. 52(1) remedies could be combined with individual remedies for Charter violations. Lamer C.J. concluded that individual remedies under s. 24(1) of the Charter "will rarely be available in conjunction with" remedies involving legislation (p. 720).

[106] Much of Schachter remains good guidance three decades later. However, as I will explain, the jurisprudence on Charter remedies has built upon the foundation of Schachter and moved beyond it in some ways. While Schachter wisely advised courts to consider the principled basis for their remedial decisions, those remedial principles have since been further developed. In part, the guidelines Schachter endorsed for determining the extent of rights violations were tied to an articulation of the Oakes test that has since been overtaken. Aspects of its discussion of suspended declarations have been overlooked by courts and criticized in academic commentary for their failure to rely on coherent principles and encourage transparent application. Finally, its admonition against combining s. 52(1) and individual remedies has frequently not been followed.

(3) The Form and Breadth of Section 52(1) Declarations

[108] As our jurisprudence demonstrates, and the language of s. 52(1) directs, the first step in crafting an appropriate s. 52(1) remedy in a given case is determining the extent of the legislation's inconsistency with the Constitution. Courts should bear in mind both "the manner in which the law violates the Charter and the manner in which it fails to be justified under s. 1" (Schachter, at p. 702) in crafting tailored remedies. (While this general guideline remains useful, courts should bear in mind that the Oakes test has evolved since Schachter was decided, such that it now focuses on justifying the infringing measure rather than the law as a whole (compare Schachter, at pp. 703-5 and RJR-MacDonald, at para. 144).) The nature and extent of the underlying Charter violation lays the foundation for the remedial analysis because the breadth of the remedy ultimately granted will reflect at least the extent of the breach.

[109] Defining the extent of the constitutional defect by reference to the substantive violation of the Charter safeguards the rights of all those directly affected by ensuring that the law is cured of all its constitutional defects. It also serves the broader public interest in having government act in accordance with the Constitution. These remedies reach beyond the claimant—and can even be granted when the claimant is not directly affected by the law—because "[n]o one should be subjected to an unconstitutional law" (Nur, at para. 51; see also R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295, at p. 313). This step of the analysis therefore reflects the Charter's rights-protecting purpose, the public's interest in constitutional compliance, and the text of s. 52(1)—the law is of no force or effect to the full extent of its inconsistency with the Constitution.

[111] On the other hand, it also follows from s. 52(1) that to the extent they are not inconsistent with the Constitution, the public is entitled to the benefit of laws passed by the legislature. Tailored remedies that address the precise constitutional flaw can permit a court to both safeguard the constitutional rights of all those affected and preserve the constitutional aspects of the law. ...

[112] The second step is determining the form that a declaration should take. In doing so, Schachter explained that remedies other than full declarations of invalidity should be granted when the nature of the violation and the intention of the legislature allows for them. Full statutory schemes or Acts are rarely struck down in their entirety—to my knowledge, this Court has only done so on eight occasions. To ensure the public has the benefit of enacted legislation, remedies of reading down, reading in, and severance, tailored to the breadth of the violation, should be employed when possible so that the constitutional aspects of legislation are preserved (Schachter, at p. 700; Vriend, at paras. 149–50). Crucially, in Canada, the declaration issued cures the law's unconstitutionality. ...

[114] ... [I]f granted in the wrong circumstances, tailored remedies can intrude on the legislative sphere. ... If it appears unlikely that the legislature would have enacted the tailored version of the statute, tailoring the remedy would not conform to its policy choice and would therefore undermine parliamentary sovereignty (Schachter, at pp. 705–6; Hunter, at p. 169). The significance of the remaining portion of the statute must be considered, and tailored remedies should not be granted when they would interfere with the legislative objective of the law as a whole (Schachter, at pp. 705–15) [here the Court cited Vriend discussed above]. ...

[115] Lamer C.J. was also conscious of the limitation of the judicial role, explaining in Schachter that tailored remedies should not be granted when they do not "flo[w] with sufficient precision from the requirements of the Constitution," because although courts are capable of determining what the Constitution requires, they are not well-suited to making "ad hoc choices from a variety of options" (p. 707).

[116] In sum, consistent with the principle of constitutional supremacy embodied in s. 52(1) and the importance of safeguarding rights, courts must identify and remedy the full extent of the unconstitutionality by looking at the precise nature and scope of the Charter violation. ... This requires the court to determine whether the law's overall purpose can be achieved without violating rights. If a tailored remedy can be granted without the court intruding on the role of the legislature, such a remedy will preserve a law's constitutionally compliant effects along with the benefit that law provides to the public. The rule of law is thus served both by ensuring that legislation complies with the Constitution and by securing the public benefits of laws where possible.

[117] There are times when an immediately effective declaration of invalidity would endanger an interest of such great importance that, on balance, the benefits of delaying the effect of that declaration outweigh the cost of preserving an unconstitutional law that violates Charter rights.

[118] In total, this Court has suspended declarations of invalidity in 23 out of approximately 90 decisions in which it declared legislation to be of no force or effect for violating the Charter. The approach to suspensions has varied over the last 35 years. Suspensions were initially recognized to be available when necessary to protect against serious threats to the rule of law. Then, in Schachter, this Court took an approach to granting suspensions based on determining whether cases fit into one of a list of categories—threats to the rule of law, threats to public safety, or underinclusive benefits—based on the public interest in the law's interim application. Since then, many cases have gone beyond the Schachter categories to grant suspensions for other reasons, including concerns related to the roles and capacities of courts and legislatures. The 12 declarations of invalidity for Charter violations after Schachter between 1992 and 1997—from Zundel to Benner—took immediate effect. By contrast, between 2003 and 2015—from Trociuk to Carter—13 out of 17 s. 52(1) declarations were suspended. Those more recent cases have been criticized for suspending declarations too frequently and without sufficient explanation. This case gives the Court an opportunity to recalibrate the remedial principles that guide the judicial discretion to delay the effect of a declaration of invalidity.

[120] While ss. 52(1) does not explicitly provide the authority to suspend a declaration, in adjudicating constitutional issues, courts "may have regard to unwritten postulates which form the very foundation of the Constitution of Canada" (Manitoba Language Rights, at p. 752; see also R. v. Comeau, 2018 SCC 15, [2018] 1 S.C.R. 342, at para. 52).

[122] The idea that the effect of a declaration could be suspended originally aimed to protect against a potential emergency. In 1985, in Manitoba Language Rights, nearly all of Manitoba's legislation was declared unconstitutional for being enacted in English alone. The Court issued a temporary declaration that the laws were valid in order to give the legislature the chance to re-enact them. The Court grounded this move in the constitutional principle of the rule of law ... [which] requires the creation and maintenance of an actual order of positive laws to govern society; a legal vacuum, along with the inevitable legal chaos, would have violated that principle (p. 753). The period of temporary validity ran from the date of judgment "to the expiry of the minimum period necessary for translation, re-enactment, printing and publishing" (p. 767).

[123] The Court suspended the effect of a declaration of invalidity for the first time in a Charter case in Swain, in which automatic detention for those acquitted on what was then called the ground of "insanity" was found unconstitutional. Lamer C.J. suspended the declaration due to a concern that if the provision was immediately struck down, judges would have to free "those who may well be a danger to the public" (p. 1021).

[124] In Schachter, Lamer C.J. recognized three categories of cases in which suspensions could be granted: threats to the rule of law, threats to public safety, and underinclusive legislation (pp. 715-16). The first category flows directly from Manitoba Language Rights; the second corresponds with Swain; and the third category represents the circumstances of Schachter itself, in which immediate invalidity of the law would have deprived those entitled to financial benefits under the law without providing any remedy for those directly excluded from the benefits in question. All three categories reflect constitutionally grounded considerations, including recognizing the public's interest in legislation passed for its benefit. Suspending the effect of a declaration is one tool that allows courts to preserve the rights and entitlements that existing schemes extend to the public.

[125] Schachter's categorical approach has resulted in uncertainty about when suspensions will be granted. Some decisions have gone beyond the Schachter categories. ... In other cases, failing to fit into a Schachter category has been given as an explanation for declining to grant a suspension (Boudreault, at para. 98; Hislop, at para. 121). At times, the Court has provided no explanation for suspending the effect of its declaration (Mounted Police Association, at para. 158; Saskatchewan Federation of Labour, at para. 103). Academic commentators have noted the lack of transparent reasoning in some of this Court's decisions to grant suspensions (Roach (2004); Hoole, at pp. 118-23).

[126] A principled approach makes it possible to reconcile these cases on suspended declarations, and encourage consistency and transparency. As I will explain, the government bears the onus of demonstrating that a compelling public interest, like those included in Schachter, supports a suspension. These compelling interests cannot be reduced to a closed list of categories, but will be related to a remedial principle grounded in the Constitution—typically, the principle that the public is entitled to the benefit of legislation or that courts and legislatures play different institutional roles. The categorical approach in Schachter has been overtaken by the underlying remedial principles that animated those categories. ...

[127] As well, the relevance of some of the underlying principles has evolved in our jurisprudence. Lamer C.J. specifically noted in Schachter that “whether to delay the application of a declaration of [invalidity] should ... turn not on considerations of the role of the courts and the legislature, but rather on considerations ... relating to the effect of an immediate declaration on the public” (p. 717, emphasis added).

[128] Nonetheless, since the late 1990s, the general principle that courts and legislatures have different roles and competencies has informed how the Court exercises its jurisdiction to suspend the effect of its declarations for a period of time. ...

[129] ... In my view, Schachter and the cases that have come since are best reconciled by recognizing that allowing the legislature to fulfil its law making role can be a relevant consideration in whether to grant a suspension, but only when the government demonstrates that an immediately effective declaration would significantly impair the ability to legislate.

[130] In determining whether to exercise remedial discretion to suspend a declaration of invalidity, the Court should consider whether and to what extent the government has demonstrated that an immediately effective declaration would have a limiting effect on the legislature’s ability to set policy. In the vast majority of cases, as Bruce Ryder recognizes, “[a] suspended declaration neither enlarges nor diminishes the range of constitutional choices open to a legislature” (p. 285). For example, in M. v. H., in which the Court found unconstitutional the definition of “spouse” denying benefits to same-sex spouses, the effect of a declaration of invalidity was suspended because “if left up to the courts, these issues could only be resolved on a case-by-case basis at great cost to private litigants and the public purse. Thus ... the legislature ought to be given some latitude in order to address these issues in a more comprehensive fashion” (para. 147). However, an immediately effective declaration would not have prevented the legislature from addressing the issues more comprehensively in light of the Court’s decision. By contrast, there may be some cases where an immediate declaration could create legal rights that could narrow the range of constitutional policy choices available to the government or undermine the effectiveness of its policy choices. As I shall explain, this case offers an example of a situation in which the legal rights created by the declaration of invalidity could undermine the effectiveness of the legislature’s policy choices. Even so, avoiding such restrictions on the ability to legislate is but a relevant consideration, and may not be sufficient to justify a suspension of invalidity.

[131] The benefit achieved (or harm avoided) by the suspension must then be transparently weighed against countervailing fundamental remedial principles, namely the principles that Charter rights should be safeguarded through effective remedies and that the public has an interest in constitutionally compliant legislation. This includes considering factors such as the significance of the rights infringement (Bedford, at para. 167)—for example, the weight given to ongoing rights infringement will be especially heavy when criminal jeopardy is at stake—and the potential that the suspension will create harm such as legal uncertainty (Leckey, at pp. 594–95). ...

[132] However, a balancing approach does not mean that suspensions will be easier to justify. A categorical approach may have been intended to provide narrow circumstances in which an unconstitutional law may continue to apply temporarily, but it has not had that effect. A balancing approach permits courts to engage with the underlying principles and ensure that a delayed declaration is not ordered unless there are compelling reasons to do so. The appropriate balance will result in suspensions only in rare circumstances. Given the imperative language of s. 52(1), and the importance of the fundamental remedial principles of constitutional compliance and of providing an effective remedy that safeguards the rights of those directly affected, there is a strong interest in declarations with immediate effect. Indeed, leaving unconstitutional laws on the books can lead to legal uncertainty and instability, especially if those laws are criminal prohibitions, which compel multiple actors (including police, Crown prosecutors, and the public) to conduct themselves in a certain way (Leckey, at pp. 594–95). Public confidence in the Constitution, the laws, and the justice system is undermined when an unconstitutional law continues to have legal effect without a compelling basis. And, of course, the violation of constitutional rights weighs heavily in favour of an immediate declaration of invalidity. A principled approach requires these countervailing factors to be weighed and does not allow for a suspension to be granted simply because the case engages, for example, public safety. In practice, therefore, a principled approach is disciplined and would be more stringent than a categorical approach, because any suspension must be specifically justified.

[133] Thus, I agree with the submissions of the Asper Centre that the government bears the onus of demonstrating that the importance of another compelling interest grounded in the Constitution outweighs the continued breach of constitutional rights. In each case, the specific interest, and the manner in which an immediate declaration would endanger that interest, must be identified and, where necessary, supported by evidence. Suspensions of declarations of invalidity will be rare. Indeed, this aligns with this Court's recent practice. This Court has not suspended the effect of a declaration of invalidity since its decision in Carter over five years ago, making 13 immediately effective declarations that legislation was of no force or effect for violating the Charter over that period.

[135] In my view, the onus to demonstrate the appropriate length of time remains with the government and there is no “default” length of time such as 12 months. ... It is the government's responsibility to make a case for the length of the suspension it seeks.

[139] In sum, the effect of a declaration should not be suspended unless the government demonstrates that an immediately effective declaration would endanger a compelling public interest that outweighs the importance of immediate constitutional compliance and an immediately effective remedy for those whose Charter rights will be violated. The court must consider the impact of such a suspension on rights holders and the public, as well as whether an immediate declaration of invalidity would significantly impair the legislature's democratic authority to set policy through legislation. The period of suspension, where warranted, should be long enough to give the legislature the amount of time it has demonstrated it requires to carry out its responsibility diligently and effectively, while recognizing that every additional day of rights violations will be a strong counterweight against giving the legislature more time.

(5) Individual Remedies—Exemptions from Suspensions

[144] This Court has said that to be “appropriate and just,” a s. 24(1) remedy should meaningfully vindicate the right of the claimant, conform to the separation of powers, invoke the powers and function of a court, be fair to the party against whom the remedy is ordered, and allow s. 24(1) to evolve to meet the challenges of each case (Doucet-Boudreau, at paras. 55-59). In particular, an effective remedy ... will take into account the nature of the rights violation and the situation of the claimant, will be relevant to the claimant’s experience and address the circumstances of the rights violation, and will not be “smothered” in procedural delays and difficulties (para. 55). The court’s approach to s. 24(1) remedies must stay flexible and responsive to the needs of a given case (para. 59).

[145] This Court’s jurisprudence makes clear that granting individual remedies while the effects of declarations of invalidity are suspended can be appropriate and just. The Court granted a worker disability benefits for chronic pain during the suspension of a declaration that provisions were invalid for excluding chronic pain from the workers’ compensation system (Martin, at paras. 121-22). The Court has acquitted individuals of criminal or quasi-criminal charges stemming from unconstitutional laws despite suspending the effects of the declarations of invalidity (Guignard, at para. 32; Bain, at pp. 105 and 165; see also Corbiere, at paras. 22-23).

[146] A rule that individual claimants cannot be exempted from suspensions of declarations of invalidity would improperly fetter the broad discretion afforded under s. 24(1) of the Charter for courts to grant remedies they “consider[re] appropriate and just in the circumstances.” Remedial discretion is a fundamental feature of the Charter. A bar on exempting individual claimants would often be unfair to the claimant, especially given that it is a court’s decision to grant a suspension that makes the individual remedy necessary. ...

[147] In my view, when the effect of a declaration is suspended, an individual remedy for the claimant will often be appropriate and just. The importance of safeguarding constitutional rights weighs heavily in favour of an individual remedy. The concern for vindicating individual rights with effective remedies reaches back to Blackstone and Dicey, and continues to have force in the present day (see K. Roach, “Dialogic remedies” (2019), 17 I CON 860, at pp. 862-65).

[149] Like the decision of whether to suspend a declaration of invalidity despite the continued rights violation, there must be a compelling reason to deny the claimant an immediately effective remedy.

[152] Ultimately, the public is well served by encouraging litigation that furthers the public interest by uncovering unconstitutional laws. Claimants, unlike others similarly situated, invest time and resources to pursue matters in the public interest—and those investments can pay dividends for others directly affected, especially those without the means to challenge the law themselves. Thus, if an exemption is otherwise appropriate and just, they should be exempted from suspensions in the absence of a compelling reason not to. Exemptions from suspensions will often be necessary to balance the interests of the litigant, the broader public, and the legislature.

(6) General Remedial Principles for Legislation That Violates the Charter

[153] As I have explained, running through this Court's remedial practice—from determining the form and breadth of remedies involving legislation, to suspending the effect of those remedies, to exempting litigants from suspensions—are recurring touchstones. These guide the principled discretion that this Court exercises when granting remedies for legislation that violates the Charter.

[154] Safeguarding rights lies at the core of that remedial approach. Section 52(1) calls for courts to invalidate any legislation to the extent it violates the Charter. ... The fundamental principle that courts should provide meaningful remedies for the violation of constitutional rights (Doucet-Boudreau, at para. 25) shapes the form and breadth of the declaration, acts as a strong counterweight against suspending the effect of such a declaration, and weighs in favour of granting an individual remedy in tandem with a suspension.

[156] Another aspect of the rule of law, reflected in s. 52(1)'s caution that laws are of no force or effect only "to the extent of the inconsistency" with the Constitution, is the entitlement to a positive order of laws that organizes society and protects it from harm. The public has an interest in preserving legislation duly enacted by its democratically elected legislatures, to the extent it is not unconstitutional. This is why courts will tailor remedies to retain constitutional aspects of an unconstitutional law where possible and will temporarily suspend the effect of a declaration when an immediate order would undermine the public interest by depriving the public of laws passed for its benefit. In contrast, concerns about legal instability may weigh against suspension.

[157] Finally, running through this Court's remedial practice for unconstitutional legislation is respect for the role of the legislature coupled with an understanding of the duties of the judicial role. When determining the form and breadth of remedies, courts will preserve as much of the law as possible to respect the legislature's policy choices, following its discernible intention when doing so. But courts will not shrink from performing their duty to protect rights through s. 52(1) remedies, determining the full extent of inconsistencies with the Constitution and declaring legislation to be of no force or effect when necessary. Suspensions can be granted when the legislature's democratic role as policymaker would be so seriously undermined by an immediately effective declaration that it outweighs important countervailing principles. In such circumstances, if an exemption would undermine that role, it will weigh against an individual remedy.

[158] As I have explained, these constitutional considerations, drawn from our constitutional text and the broader architecture of our constitutional order and the rule of law, have repeatedly arisen in this Court's decisions on s. 52(1) remedies for Charter violations and give rise to four foundational principles:

- A. Charter rights should be safeguarded through effective remedies.
- B. The public has an interest in the constitutional compliance of legislation.
- C. The public is entitled to the benefit of legislation.
- D. Courts and legislatures play different institutional roles.

[159] In my view, these remedial principles provide the groundwork for meaningful remedies in different contexts. They provide guidance to courts and encourage them to transparently explain remedial results. They will not always lead to agreement on the correct outcome; their value is in transparency, helping those who disagree articulate their specific points of disagreement.

[178] Here, there is an ongoing threat to public safety, although it is limited as the group of individuals whose information would no longer be tracked consists entirely of persons who the Review Board has deemed do not pose a significant threat to public safety. The legislature's ability to address that gap in public safety would, however, be appreciably restricted by an immediate declaration. This is a close call. But on balance, the combination of these two legitimate interests (public safety and preserving the legislature's latitude to respond to the finding of unconstitutionality) justifies temporarily depriving those affected of the immediate benefit of this judgment and allowing the violation to persist.

[179] The parties agree with the 12-month suspension ordered by the Court of Appeal. I see no basis to interfere with that determination. However, in future, courts will expect more detailed submissions on the length of time required.

[The Court found that a 12-month suspended declaration of invalidity was justified for public safety and because an immediate declaration could compromise "the legislature's role as a policy-maker." The Court also granted an exemption for Mr G on the basis of his "spotless record" in the 17 years since he was not a significant risk of committing a criminal offence.

Justice Rowe in a separate judgment would have maintained the Schachter categorical approach, and Coté and Brown JJ in their separate judgment would also have suspended the declaration of invalidity on public safety grounds which they related to concerns about preserving the rule of law. They stated:]

[225] As we see it, there are three principal reasons why only a threat to the rule of law should warrant a suspended declaration of invalidity. First, this was what the Court envisioned in assuming for the first time the power to issue a suspended declaration in Reference re Manitoba Language Rights, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 721 ("Manitoba Reference"). Secondly, the Constitution commands such a result: the text contemplates immediate declarations as the norm, subject only to a rule of law concern. Thirdly, lessons learned in the wake of Schachter about the practical implications of suspended declarations reveal why a discretionary approach focused on "remedial principles" is undesirable, and why a constitutional tether to the rule of law is so essential.

[They also held ordering an exemption for Mr G in this case and in most cases would exceed the judicial role and warned at para 293: "Once suspended declarations are properly limited to the exceptional situations where the rule of law is imperilled, the concern for providing an immediate remedy to the claimant fades."]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. There is no textual authorization for the use of suspended declarations of invalidity. In contrast, s 172(1) of the South African Constitution (1996) expressly provides for suspended declarations of invalidity:

- 172(1) When deciding a constitutional matter within its power, a court
 - (a) must declare that any law or conduct that is inconsistent with the Constitution is invalid to the extent of its inconsistency; and
 - (b) may make any order that is just and equitable, including
 - (i) an order limiting the retrospective effect of the declaration of invalidity; and
 - (ii) an order suspending the declaration of invalidity for any period and on any conditions, to allow the competent authority to correct the defect.

Like the Supreme Court of Canada, the South Africa Constitutional Court has frequently used this new remedial device but has generally been more willing to impose conditions on what happens during the 6 to 24 months it has suspended a declaration of invalidity and not rely on individual exemptions as contemplated in Ontario v G: see Robert Leckey, "Remedial Practice Beyond Constitutional Text" (2016) 64 Am J Comp L 1.

2. The entire Court in Ontario v G accepted the ability to exempt applicants from a suspended declaration of invalidity with Coté and Brown JJ concluding that exemptions should only rarely be ordered when necessary to prevent irreparable harm to Charter rights. This represents a change from Carter v Canada (AG), 2016 SCC 4, where four judges in dissent opposed exemptions during a suspension on the basis that they "would create uncertainty, undermine the rule of law, and usurp Parliament's role. Complex regulatory regimes are better created by Parliament than by the courts" (Carter v Canada (AG), 2015 SCC 5 at para 125) and that "[t]hese considerations, in our view, continue to be compelling" (Carter [2016] at para 12). See also R v Albasir, 2021 SCC 48, affirming the ability to order exemptions from a suspended declaration of invalidity where the exemption is required as an effective remedy and would not "undermine the purpose of suspending the s. 52(1) declaration" (at para 67).

Is the Court's increased receptiveness to individual exemptions during suspended declarations of invalidity a positive development? Or should the Court following South African practice give broader directions to the executive about how unconstitutional laws should and should not be enforced during a suspended declaration of invalidity?

C. UNDERINCLUSIVE LAWS AND READING IN

The two cases that follow, Vriend v Alberta and M v H, illustrate different remedial responses to underinclusive laws through application of the factors laid out in Schachter. Note that while these cases, like Schachter, both involved equality rights under s 15 of the Charter, issues of underinclusiveness may also arise in other contexts where the right in issue is understood as imposing positive obligations on government: see, for example, Dunmore v Ontario (AG), 2001 SCC 94, excerpted in Chapter 21, Freedom of Association.

Vriend v Alberta

[\[1998\] 1 SCR 493, 1998 CanLII 816](#)

[In this case, also discussed in Chapter 18, Application, and Chapter 23, Equality Rights, the Supreme Court of Canada found that the omission of sexual orientation from the list of prohibited grounds of discrimination found in Alberta's human rights legislation—the Individual's Rights Protection Act [IRPA]—constituted an unjustifiable violation of s 15 of the Charter. The legislative history showed that the omission of sexual orientation was deliberate. The facts of the case, which are drawn on to some extent in the discussion of the appropriate remedy, involved a gay employee of a religious college who had been fired when his homosexuality was discovered. Unable to bring a complaint of discrimination under the IRPA because of the legislation's failure to protect against discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation, he challenged the omission as a violation of s 15 of the Charter. From a remedial perspective, Vriend is significant as one of the few cases in which the Supreme Court has extended constitutionally underinclusive legislation by reading in rather than striking it down. As will be seen, however, the use of this remedy was not without controversy and dissent.]

IACOBucci J (Lamer CJ and Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin, and Bastarache JJ concurring):

[129] Having found the exclusion of sexual orientation from the IRPA to be an unjustifiable violation of the appellants' equality rights, I now turn to the question of remedy under s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982. ...

[145] Once the Charter inconsistency has been identified, the next step is to determine which remedy is appropriate. In Schachter, this Court noted that, depending upon the circumstances, there are several remedial options available to a court in dealing with a Charter violation that was not saved by s. 1. These include striking down the legislation, severance of the offending sections, striking down or severance with a temporary suspension of the declaration of invalidity, reading down, and reading provisions into the legislation.

[146] Because the Charter violation in the instant case stems from an omission, the remedy of reading down is simply not available. Further, I note that given the considerable number of sections at issue in this case and the important roles they play in the scheme of the IRPA as a whole, severance of these sections from the remainder of the Act would be akin to striking down the entire Act.

[148] In Schachter, Lamer C.J. noted that when determining whether the remedy of reading in is appropriate, courts must have regard to the "twin guiding principles," namely, respect for the role of the legislature and respect for the purposes of the Charter Turning first to the role of the legislature, Lamer C.J. stated at p. 700 that reading in is an important tool in "avoiding undue intrusion into the legislative sphere. ... [T]he purpose of reading in is to be as faithful as possible within the requirements of the Constitution to the scheme enacted by the Legislature."

[150] As I discussed above, the purpose of the IRPA is the recognition and protection of the inherent dignity and inalienable rights of Albertans through the elimination of discriminatory practices. It seems to me that the remedy of reading in would minimize interference with this clearly legitimate legislative purpose and thereby avoid excessive intrusion into the legislative sphere whereas striking down the IRPA would deprive all Albertans of human rights protection and thereby unduly interfere with the scheme enacted by the Legislature.

[152] Turning to the second of the twin guiding principles, the respondents suggest that the facts of this case are illustrative of a conflict between two grounds, namely, religion and sexual orientation. If sexual orientation were simply read into the IRPA, the respondents contend that this would undermine the ability of the IRPA to provide protection against discrimination based on religion, one of the fundamental goals of that legislation. This result is alleged to be "inconsistent with the deeper social purposes of the Charter."

[153] I concluded above that the internal balancing mechanisms of the IRPA were an adequate means of disposing of any conflict that might arise between religion and sexual orientation. [The internal balancing mechanisms included a general defence that the discrimination was "reasonable and justifiable in the circumstances" (IRPA, s 11.1) and an exemption for bona fide occupational requirements.] Thus, I cannot accept the respondents' assertion that the reading in approach does not respect the purposes of the Charter. In fact, as I see the matter, reading sexual orientation into the IRPA as a further ground of prohibited discrimination can only enhance those purposes. The Charter, like the IRPA, is concerned with the promotion and protection of inherent dignity and inalienable rights. Thus, expanding the list of prohibited grounds of discrimination in the IRPA allows this Court to act in a manner which, consistent with the purposes of the Charter, would augment the scope of the IRPA's protections. In contrast, striking down or severing parts of the IRPA would deny all Albertans protection from marketplace discrimination. In my view, this result is clearly antithetical to the purposes of the Charter.

[154] In Schachter, supra, Lamer C.J. noted that the twin guiding principles can only be fulfilled if due consideration is given to several additional criteria which further inform the determination as to whether the remedy of reading in is appropriate. These include remedial precision, budgetary implications, effects on the thrust of the legislation, and interference with legislative objectives.

[155] As to the first of the above listed criteria, the court must be able to define with a "sufficient degree of precision" how the statute ought to be extended in order to comply with the Constitution. I do not believe that the present case is one in which this Court has been improperly called upon to fill in large gaps in the legislation. . . .

[160] Turning to budgetary repercussions, in the circumstances of the present appeal, such considerations are not sufficiently significant to warrant avoiding the reading in approach. On this issue, the trial judge stated (at p. 18):

There will undoubtedly be some budgetary impact on the Human Rights Commission as a result of the addition of sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination. But, unlike Schachter [above], it would not be substantial enough to change the nature of the scheme of the legislation. . . .

[161] As to the effects on the thrust of the legislation, it is difficult to see any deleterious impact. All persons covered under the current scope of the IRPA would continue to benefit from the protection provided by the Act in the same manner as they had before the reading in of sexual orientation. Thus, I conclude that it is reasonable to assume that, if the Legislature had been faced with the choice of having no human rights statute or having one that offered protection on the ground of sexual orientation, the latter option would have been chosen. As the inclusion of sexual orientation in the IRPA does not alter the legislation to any significant degree, it is reasonable to assume that the Legislature would have enacted it in any event.

[162] In addition, in Schachter, supra, Lamer C.J. noted that, in cases where the issue is whether to extend benefits to a group excluded from the legislation, the question of the effects on the thrust of the legislation will sometimes focus on the size of the group to be added as compared to the group originally benefited. . . .

[163] Lamer C.J. went on to note that, "[w]here the group to be added is smaller than the group originally benefitted, this is an indication that the assumption that the legislature would have enacted the benefit in any case is a sound one" (p. 712). In the present case, gay men and lesbians are clearly a smaller group than those already benefited by the IRPA. Thus, in my view, reading in remains the less intrusive option.

[164] The final criterion to examine is interference with the legislative objective. In Schachter, Lamer C.J. commented upon this factor as follows (at pp. 707-8):

The degree to which a particular remedy intrudes into the legislative sphere can only be determined by giving careful attention to the objective embodied in the legislation in question. . . . A second level of legislative intention may be manifest in the means chosen to pursue that objective.

[165] With regard to the first level of legislative intention, as I discussed above, it is clear that reading sexual orientation into the IRPA would not interfere with the objective of the legislation. Rather, in my view, it can only enhance that objective.

However, at first blush, it appears that reading in might interfere with the second level of legislative intention identified by Lamer C.J.

[166] As the Alberta Legislature has expressly chosen to exclude sexual orientation from the list of prohibited grounds of discrimination in the IRPA, the respondents argue that reading in would unduly interfere with the will of the Government. McClung J.A. shares this view. In his opinion, the remedy of reading in will never be appropriate where a legislative omission reflects a deliberate choice of the legislating body. He states that if a statute is unconstitutional, "the preferred consequence should be its return to the sponsoring legislature for representative, constitutional overhaul" (p. 35). However, as I see the matter, by definition, Charter scrutiny will always involve some interference with the legislative will.

[167] Where a statute has been found to be unconstitutional, whether the court chooses to read provisions into the legislation or to strike it down, legislative intent is necessarily interfered with to some extent. Therefore, the closest a court can come to respecting the legislative intention is to determine what the legislature would likely have done if it had known that its chosen measures would be found unconstitutional. As I see the matter, a deliberate choice of means will not act as a bar to reading in save for those circumstances in which the means chosen can be shown to be of such centrality to the aims of the legislature and so integral to the scheme of the legislation, that the legislature would not have enacted the statute without them.

[168] Indeed, as noted by the intervener Canadian Jewish Congress, if reading in is always deemed an inappropriate remedy where a government has expressly chosen a course of action, this amounts to the suggestion that whenever a government violates a Charter right, it ought to do so in a deliberate manner so as to avoid the remedy of reading in. In my view, this is a wholly unacceptable result.

[169] In the case at bar, the means chosen by the legislature, namely, the exclusion of sexual orientation from the IRPA, can hardly be described as integral to the scheme of that Act. Nor can I accept that this choice was of such centrality to the aims of the legislature that it would prefer to sacrifice the entire IRPA rather than include sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination, particularly for the reasons I will now discuss.

[170] As mentioned by my colleague Cory J., in 1993, the Alberta Legislature appointed the Alberta Human Rights Review Panel to conduct a public review of the IRPA and the Alberta Human Rights Commission. The Panel issued a report making several recommendations including the inclusion of sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination in all areas covered by the Act. The Government responded to this recommendation by deferring the decision to the judiciary: "This recommendation will be dealt with through the current court case Vriend ...".

[171] In my opinion, this statement is a clear indication that, in light of the controversy surrounding the protection of gay men and lesbians under the IRPA, it was the intention of the Alberta Legislature to defer to the courts on this issue. Indeed, I interpret this statement to be an express invitation for the courts to read sexual orientation into the IRPA in the event that its exclusion from the legislation is found to violate the provisions of the Charter. Therefore, primarily because of this and contrary to the assertions of the respondents, I believe that, in these circumstances, the remedy of reading in is entirely consistent with the legislative intention.

[174] With respect ... I do not accept that extending the legislation in this case is an undemocratic exercise of judicial power. ...

[176] ... [T]he concept of democracy means more than majority rule as Dickson C.J. so ably reminded us in [R v Oakes, [1986] 1 SCR 103, 1986 CanLII 46]. In my view, a democracy requires that legislators take into account the interests of majorities and minorities alike, all of whom will be affected by the decisions they make. Where the interests of a minority have been denied consideration, especially where that group has historically been the target of prejudice and discrimination, I believe that judicial intervention is warranted to correct a democratic process that has acted improperly. ...

[178] ... When a court remedies an unconstitutional statute by reading in provisions, no doubt this constrains the legislative process and therefore should not be done needlessly, but only after considered examination. However, in my view, the "parliamentary safeguards" remain. Governments are free to modify the amended legislation by passing exceptions and defences which they feel can be justified under s. 1 of the Charter. Thus, when a court reads in, this is not the end of the legislative process because the legislature can pass new legislation in response, as I outlined above (see also [Peter W Hogg & Allison A Bushell, "The Charter Dialogue Between Courts and Legislature" (1997) 35 Osgoode Hall LJ 75]). Moreover, the legislators can always turn to s. 33 of the Charter, the override provision, which in my view is the ultimate "parliamentary safeguard."

[179] On the basis of the foregoing analysis, I conclude that reading sexual orientation into the impugned provisions of the IRPA is the most appropriate way of remedying this underinclusive legislation. The appellants suggest that this remedy should have immediate effect. I agree. There is no risk in the present case of harmful unintended consequences upon private parties or public funds. ... Further, the mechanisms to deal with complaints of discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation are already in place and require no significant adjustment. ...

MAJOR J (dissenting in part on the issue of remedy):

[195] In my opinion, Schachter did not contemplate the circumstances that pertain here, that is, where the Legislature's opposition to including sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination is abundantly clear on the record. Reading in may be appropriate where it can be safely assumed that the legislature itself would have remedied the underinclusiveness by extending the benefit or protection to the previously excluded group. That assumption cannot be made in this appeal.

[196] The issue may be that the Legislature would prefer no human rights Act over one that includes sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination, or the issue may be how the legislation ought to be amended to bring it into conformity with the Charter. That determination is best left to the Legislature. ...

[200] The only remaining issue is whether the declaration of invalidity ought to be temporarily suspended. In Schachter, Lamer C.J. stated that a declaration of invalidity may be temporarily suspended where the legislation is deemed unconstitutional because of underinclusiveness rather than overbreadth, and striking down the legislation would result in the deprivation of benefits from deserving persons without thereby benefitting the individual whose rights have been violated.

[201] There is no intention to deprive individuals in Alberta of the protection afforded by the IRPA, but only to ensure that the legislation is brought into conformity with the Charter while simultaneously respecting the role of the legislature. I would therefore order that the declaration of invalidity be suspended for one year to allow the Legislature an opportunity to bring the impugned provisions into line with its constitutional obligations.

[1999] 2 SCR 3, 1999 CanLII 686

[The Supreme Court of Canada found that the exclusion of same-sex couples from the definition of "spouse" in s 29 of Ontario's Family Law Act, RSO 1990, c F.3 [FLA]—the definition that governed the right to claim spousal support—was an unjustifiable infringement of s 15 of the Charter. Thus, like Vriend, M v H involved legislation that was constitutionally underinclusive because of the omission of gays and lesbians. However, on the issue of remedy, the Court distinguished Vriend and chose to strike down the underinclusive legislation, subject to a six-month delayed declaration of invalidity, instead of utilizing the technique of reading in to extend the definition of spouse to include same-sex couples.]

IACOBUCCI J (Lamer CJ and Cory and McLachlin JJ concurring):

VI. Remedy

[136] Having found that the exclusion of same-sex couples from s. 29 of the FLA is unconstitutional and cannot be saved under s. 1 of the Charter, I must now consider the issue of remedy under s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982. In the court below, the words "a man and woman" were read out of the definition of "spouse" in s. 29 of the FLA and replaced with the words "two persons." The application of the order was suspended for a period of one year. With respect, I am not convinced that that is a suitable remedy in the circumstances of the present case.

[139] In determining whether the reading in/reading down option is more appropriate than either striking down or severance, the Court must consider how precisely the remedy can be stated, budgetary implications, the effect the remedy would have on the remaining portion of the legislation, the significance or long-standing nature of the remaining portion and the extent to which a remedy would interfere with legislative objectives . . . As to the first of these criteria, the remedy of reading in is only available where the Court can direct with a sufficient degree of precision what is to be read in to comply with the Constitution. Remedial precision requires that the insertion of a handful of words will, without more, ensure the validity of the legislation and remedy the constitutional wrong . . .

[140] In the present case, the defect in the definition of "spouse" can be precisely traced to the use of the phrase "a man and woman," which has the effect of excluding same-sex partners from the spousal support scheme under the FLA. I recognize that there is remedial precision in so far as reading down this phrase and reading in the words "two persons" will, without more "remedy the constitutional wrong." However, I am not persuaded that reading in will also "ensure the validity of the legislation."

[141] If the remedy adopted by the court below is allowed to stand, s. 29 of the FLA will entitle members of same-sex couples who otherwise qualify under the definition of "spouse" to apply for spousal support. However, any attempt to opt out of this regime by means of a cohabitation agreement provided for in s. 53 or a separation agreement set out in s. 54 would not be recognized under the Act. Both ss. 53 and 54 extend to common-law cohabitants but apply only to agreements entered into between "a man and woman." Any extension of s. 29 of the Act would have no effect upon these Part IV domestic contract provisions of the FLA, which do not rely upon the Part III definition of "spouse." Thus, same-sex partners would find themselves in the anomalous position of having no means of opting out of the default system of support rights. As this option is available to opposite-sex couples, and protects the ability of couples to choose to order their own affairs in a manner reflecting their own expectations, reading in would in effect remedy one constitutional wrong only to create another, and thereby fail to ensure the validity of the legislation.

[142] In addition, reading into the definition of "spouse" in s. 29 of the Act will have the effect of including same-sex couples in Part V of the FLA (Dependants' Claim for Damages), as that part of the Act relies upon the definition of "spouse" as it is defined in Part III. In my opinion, where reading in to one part of a statute will have significant repercussions for a separate and distinct scheme under that Act, it is not safe to assume that the legislature would have enacted the statute in its altered form. In such cases, reading in amounts to the making of ad hoc choices, which Lamer C.J. in Schachter, supra, at p. 707, warned is properly the task of the legislatures, not the courts.

[143] In cases where reading in is inappropriate, the court must choose between striking down the legislation in its entirety and severing only the offending portions of the statute. As noted by Lamer C.J. in Schachter, at p. 697, "[w]here the offending portion of a statute can be defined in a limited manner it is consistent with legal principles to declare inoperative only that limited portion. In that way, as much of the legislative purpose as possible may be realized."

[144] In the case at bar, striking down the whole of the FLA would be excessive as only the definition of "spouse" in Part III of the Act has been found to violate the Charter. This is not a case where the parts of the legislative scheme which do offend the Charter are so inextricably bound up with the non-offending portions of the statute that what remains cannot independently survive. As a result, it would be safe to assume that the legislature would have passed the constitutionally sound parts of the statute without the unsound parts. See Attorney-General for Alberta v. Attorney-General for Canada, [1947] A.C. 503, at p. 518; Schachter, supra, at p. 697.

[145] On the basis of the foregoing, I conclude that severing s. 29 of the Act such that it alone is declared of no force or effect is the most appropriate remedy in the present case. This remedy should be temporarily suspended for a period of six months. ...

[147] In addition, I note that declaring s. 29 of the FLA to be of no force or effect may well affect numerous other statutes that rely upon a similar definition of the term "spouse." The legislature may wish to address the validity of these statutes in light of the unconstitutionality of s. 29 of the FLA. On this point, I agree with the majority of the Court of Appeal which noted that if left up to the courts, these issues could only be resolved on a case-by-case basis at great cost to private litigants and the public purse. Thus, I believe the legislature ought to be given some latitude in order to address these issues in a more comprehensive fashion.

NOTE AND QUESTIONS

Can the Court's remedial decisions in Vriend and M v H be adequately reconciled? In M v H, was the Court overly concerned about the kind of "remedial detail" that had not deterred it in Vriend from using the remedy of reading in? Is it possible that the remedial choice in M v H was influenced by a concern that, in the wake of the decision, many other statutes denying benefits to same-sex couples would be open to constitutional challenge and that legislatures could provide more comprehensive solutions than any judicial remedy of reading in? Within the six-month period contemplated in M v H, the Ontario legislature in fact introduced legislation amending over 60 pieces of legislation in response to M v H. The law had prospective effect only and left the applicant without a remedy. The legislature used the separate category of "same-sex partners" (Bill 5, An Act to amend certain statutes because of the Supreme Court of Canada decision in M v H, SO 1999, c 6, s 25) rather than defining such people as spouses. It was subsequently unsuccessfully challenged under s 15. See Vincent v Ontario (AG), 1999 CanLII 14912, 70 CRR \(2d\) 365 \(Ont Sup Ct J\).

D. LIMITS ON RETROACTIVE RELIEF AND PROSPECTIVE RELIEF

The next case deals with the consequences of a remedy under s 52(1), in particular, whether departures from the remedial norm of retroactive relief can ever be justified.

As a result of the Court's decision in M v H, Parliament amended legislation to allow same-sex partners to receive survivor benefits under the self-funded Canada Pension Plan. Parliament, however, provided prospective relief only as of 2000, the date of the amendments. It did not provide fully retroactive benefits to 1985, the date at which the equality rights under s 15 of the Charter came into force. The appellants, representing a class of same-sex survivors, challenged s 72(1) of the Canada Pension Plan, RSC 1985, c C-8 (2nd Supp), which limited retroactive pension payments to 12 months after an application was received. The Supreme Court held that it was not necessary to decide whether this provision violated s 15 of the Charter because of its adverse effects on same-sex couples because the Court would not issue relief in the form of pension arrears retroactive to 1985.

Canada (AG) v Hislop

LeBEL and ROTHSTEIN JJ (McLachlin CJ and Binnie, Deschamps, and Abella JJ concurring):

[79] In substance, the position of the appellants is predicated on the traditional—often called Blackstonian—view that judges never make law, but merely discover it. In this perspective, the courts are said to apply the law as it really was or has been rediscovered. As a consequence of the declaration of nullity, the appellants claim that they are entitled to the full benefits of the law, in conformity with an understanding of the Constitution, which is deemed to have never changed.

[80] The supremacy clause, now enshrined at s. 52, is silent about the remedies which may flow from a declaration of nullity. Does it mean that such a declaration is always both prospective and retroactive? This does not appear to have been the position of our Court throughout the incremental development of the law of constitutional remedies after the adoption of the Charter. A body of jurisprudence now accepts the legitimacy of limiting the retroactive effect of a declaration of nullity and of fashioning prospective remedies in appropriate circumstances.

[86] ... Because courts are adjudicative bodies that, in the usual course of things, are called upon to decide the legal consequences of past happenings, they generally grant remedies that are retroactive to the extent necessary to ensure that successful litigants will have the benefit of the ruling: see S. Choudhry and K. Roach, "Putting the Past Behind Us? Prospective Judicial and Legislative Constitutional Remedies" (2003), 21 S.C.L.R. (2d) 205, at pp. 211 and 218. There is, however, an important difference between saying that judicial decisions are generally retroactive and that they are necessarily retroactive. When the law changes through judicial intervention, courts operate outside of the Blackstonian paradigm. In those situations, it may be appropriate for the court to issue a prospective rather than retroactive remedy. The question then becomes what kind of change and which conditions will justify the crafting of judicial prospective remedies.

[93] The determination of whether to limit the retroactive effect of a s. 52(1) remedy and grant a purely prospective remedy will be largely determined by whether the Court is operating inside or outside the Blackstonian paradigm. When the Court is declaring the law as it has existed, then the Blackstonian approach is appropriate and retroactive relief should be granted. On the other hand, when a court is developing new law within the broad confines of the Constitution, it may be appropriate to limit the retroactive effect of its judgment.

[94] The approach which our Court has adopted in respect of the crafting of constitutional remedies also flows from its understanding of the process of constitutional interpretation, which the "living tree" metaphor neatly describes. From the time Lord Sankey L.C. used these words to characterize the nature of the Canadian Constitution, courts have relied on this expression to emphasize the ability of the Constitution to develop with our country (Edwards v. Canada (Attorney General) (1929), [1930] A.C. 124 (P.C.), at p. 136). This Court has often stated that the Canadian Constitution should not be viewed as a static document but as an instrument capable of adapting with the times by way of a process of evolutionary interpretation, within the natural limits of the text, which "accommodates and addresses the realities of modern life"

[95] It is true that the "living tree" doctrine is not wedded to a particular model of the judicial function. At times, its application may reflect the fact that, in a case, the Court is merely declaring the law of the country as it has stood and that a retroactive remedy is then generally appropriate. In other circumstances, its use recognizes that the law has changed, that the change must be acknowledged and that, from a given point in time, the new law or the new understanding of some legal principle will prevail.

[96] The question is no longer the legitimacy of prospective remedies, but rather when, why and how judges may rule prospectively or restrict the retroactive effect of their decisions in constitutional matters. The key question becomes the nature and effect of the legal change at issue in order to determine whether a prospective remedy is appropriate. The legitimacy of its use turns on the answer to this question.

[99] Change in the law occurs in many ways. "Clear break with the past" catches some of its diversity. It can be best identified with those situations where, in Canadian law, the Supreme Court departs from its own jurisprudence by expressly overruling or implicitly repudiating a prior decision. Such clear situations would justify recourse to prospective remedies in a proper context. But other forms of substantial change may be as relevant, especially in constitutional adjudication, where courts must give content to broad, but previously undefined, rights, principles or norms. The definition of a yet undetermined standard or the recognition that a situation is now covered by a constitutional guarantee also often expresses a substantial change in the law. The right may have been there, but it finds an expression in a new or newly recognized technological or social environment. Such a legal response to these developments properly grounds the use of prospective remedies, when the appropriate circumstances are met. A substantial change in the law is necessary, not sufficient, to justify purely prospective remedies. Hence, we must now turn to what else must be considered once legal change has been established.

[100] Although the list of such factors should not be considered as closed, some of them appear more clearly compelling. They may include reasonable or in good faith reliance by governments ([Miron v Trudel, [1995] 2 SCR 418, 1995 CanLII 97], at para. 173; Mackin v. New Brunswick (Minister of Finance), [2002] 1 S.C.R. 405, 2002 SCC 13, at para. 78), or the fairness of the limitation of the retroactivity of the remedy to the litigants. Courts ought also consider whether a retroactive remedy would unduly interfere with the constitutional role of legislatures and democratic governments in the allocation of public resources ([Benner v Canada (Secretary of State), [1997] 1 SCR 358, 1997 CanLII 376], at para. 103; Schachter, at p. 710).

[101] A careful consideration of reliance interests is critical to this analytical process. Although legal mechanisms, such as the de facto doctrine, res judicata or the law of limitations, may mitigate the consequences of declaratory rulings in certain circumstances, they do not address every situation. Fully retroactive remedies might prove highly disruptive in respect of government action, which, on the basis of settled or broadly held views of the law as it stood, framed budgets or attempted to design social programs. Persons and public authorities could then become liable under a new legal norm. Neither governments nor citizens could be reasonably assured of the legal consequences of their actions at the time they are taken.

[102] The strict declaratory approach also hardly appears reconcilable with the well established doctrine of qualified immunity in respect of the adoption of unconstitutional statutes which our Court applied, for example, in cases such as Mackin and Guimond v. Québec (Attorney General), [1996] 3 S.C.R. 347. Where legislation is found to be invalid as a result of a judicial shift in the law, it will not generally be appropriate to impose liability on the government. As Gonthier J. wrote in Mackin, it is a general rule of public law that "absent conduct that is clearly wrong, in bad faith or an abuse of power, the courts will not award damages for the harm suffered as a result of the mere enactment or application of a law that is subsequently declared to be unconstitutional" (para. 78). The rationale for this qualified immunity, which applies equally to actions for damages based on the general law of civil liability and to claims for damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter, was aptly expressed by Gonthier J.:

Thus, the government and its representatives are required to exercise their powers in good faith and to respect the "established and indisputable" laws that define the constitutional rights of individuals. However, if they act in good faith and without abusing their power under prevailing law and only subsequently are their acts found to be unconstitutional, they will not be liable. Otherwise, the effectiveness and efficiency of government action would be excessively constrained. Laws must be given their full force and effect as long as they are not declared invalid. Thus it is only in the event of conduct that is clearly wrong, in bad faith or an abuse of power that damages may be awarded . . . [para. 79]

The same principles will apply in respect of claims for retroactive benefits under s. 15 of the Charter. Whether framed as a remedy under s. 52 or s. 24(1), it may be tantamount to a claim for compensatory damages flowing from the underinclusiveness of the legislation.

[103] People generally conduct their affairs based on their understanding of what the law requires. Governments in this country are no different. Every law they pass or administrative action they take must be performed with an eye to what the Constitution requires. Just as ignorance of the law is no excuse for an individual who breaks the law, ignorance of the Constitution is no excuse for governments. But where a judicial ruling changes the existing law or creates new law, it may, under certain conditions, be inappropriate to hold the government retroactively liable. An approach to constitutional interpretation that makes it possible to identify, in appropriate cases, a point in time when the law changed, makes it easier to ensure that persons and legislatures who relied on the former legal rule while it prevailed will be protected. In this way, a balance is struck between the legitimate reliance interests of actors who make decisions based on a reasonable assessment of the state of the law at the relevant time on one hand and the need to allow constitutional jurisprudence to evolve over time on the other.

[104] Having regard to the above-mentioned criteria, it is possible to distinguish this case from some cases where fully retroactive remedies were granted. Miron provides an example of when it would not be appropriate for courts to limit the retroactive effect of a s. 52(1) remedy. In Miron, the appellant was injured while a passenger in a vehicle driven by an uninsured driver. He made a claim for accident benefits against the insurance policy of his unmarried partner but his claim was denied on the basis that the policy covered only legally married spouses. Writing for the majority, McLachlin J. (as she then was) held that the distinction based on marital status was discriminatory under s. 15(1) of the Charter. She concluded that retroactive reading up of the legislation was an appropriate remedy, which entitled the appellant to the retroactive benefit of his partner's insurance policy.

[105] In Miron, it would not have been appropriate for the Court to limit the retroactive effect of the remedy and grant a purely prospective remedy. First, the government did not meet the threshold factor of showing a substantial change from the existing law. As early as 1980, the Ontario Legislature was able to agree on a formula to extend death benefits to certain unmarried persons. And in 1981, in the context of the Ontario Human Rights Code, the Legislature agreed on a definition of "spouse" as the person to whom a person of the opposite sex is married or with whom the person is living in a conjugal relationship outside marriage. In other words, Ontario's vehicle insurance legislation was out of step with the evolving understanding of "spouse" as it existed in other Ontario statutes. Therefore, the Court's holding in Miron—that the vehicle insurance legislation's definition of spouse violated s. 15—was not a substantial change from the existing law. To the contrary, it reflected an understanding of s. 15 of the Charter that was already understood by the Ontario Legislature in the context of the Ontario Human Rights Code and other provincial legislation. Because the finding of a s. 15 infringement in Miron did not represent a substantial change in the law, it would have been inappropriate to limit the retroactive effect of its decision.

[106] However, even if the government had succeeded in meeting the substantial change requirement, other factors militated against limiting the retroactive effect of the remedy. In reaching her conclusion, McLachlin J. drew support from three observations. First, she observed that the legislature had, since the accident occurred, amended the applicable legislation to include unmarried partners, thus allaying any concerns about interfering unduly with legislative objectives. The amended legislation provided "the best possible evidence of what the Legislature would have done had it been forced to face the problem the appellants raise[d]" (para. 180). Second, considerations of fairness to the successful litigant also weighed in favour of retroactivity, as providing a retroactive remedy in this case was the only means of "curl[ing] an injustice which might otherwise go unremedied": ibid. Third, McLachlin J. noted that the distinction based on marital status was unreasonable, even at the time the impugned legislation was enacted (para. 173). Because the Legislature ought to have known that the vehicle insurance legislation was out of step with a modern understanding of "spouse," it could not reasonably exclude common law spouses from insurance coverage.

[107] It should be noted that, in Miron, all of the factors discussed above—good faith reliance by governments, fairness to the litigants and the need to respect the constitutional role of legislatures—favoured a retroactive remedy. In a number of cases, however, these factors may pull in different directions, with some factors favouring a retroactive remedy and others favouring a purely prospective remedy. In such cases, once the "substantial change" threshold criterion is met, it may be appropriate to limit the retroactive effect of the remedy based on a balancing of these other factors. This balance must be struck on a case-by-case basis.

[108] A second situation that must be distinguished was considered by this Court in its recent judgment in Kingstreet Investments Ltd. v. New Brunswick (Finance), [2007] 1 S.C.R. 3, 2007 SCC 1, wherein it held that taxes collected pursuant to an ultra vires regulation are recoverable by the taxpayer. The difference between the result in Kingstreet and the type of situation in the present case may be understood in terms of a basic distinction between cases involving moneys collected by the government and benefits cases. Where the government has collected taxes in violation of the Constitution, there can be only one possible remedy: restitution to the taxpayer. In contrast, where a scheme for benefits falls foul of the s. 15 guarantee of equal benefit under the law, we normally do not know what the legislature would have done had it known that its benefits scheme failed to comply with the Charter. In benefits cases, a range of options is open to government. The excluded group could simply be included in the existing benefit scheme as was the result in Tétreault-Gadoury v. Canada (Employment and Immigration Commission), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 22. It could also be included in a modified benefit scheme, adopted by legislative amendments, as occurred in Schachter. Also, in Schachter, the Court alluded to the possibility of an elimination of the benefit (p. 702). In our political system, choosing between those options remains the domain of governments. This principle points towards limiting the retroactive effect of remedies in s. 15 benefits cases in which the other above-mentioned criteria are met.

(2) The Appropriate Remedy in This Case

(a) Limits on the Retroactive Effect of the Remedy in the Context of This Case

[109] Same-sex equality jurisprudence since 1985 is illustrative of the sort of legal shift that gives rise to new law and justifies consideration of prospective remedies. The factors mentioned above also weigh in favour of limiting the retroactive effect of the remedy in the context of this case.

(i) The Substantial Change in the Law

[110] This Court's decision in M. v. H. [[1999] 2 SCR 3, 1999 CanLII 686] marked a departure from pre-existing jurisprudence on same-sex equality rights. In 1995, a majority of this Court upheld the exclusion of same-sex partners from old age security legislation in [Egan v Canada, [1995] 2 SCR 513, 1995 CanLII 98], with four judges finding no s. 15(1) violation, and one judge concluding that the scheme was contrary to s. 15(1) but that it could be justified under s. 1. Four years later in M. v. H., eight members of this Court held that the exclusion of same-sex partners from the spousal support provisions under the Family Law Act was contrary to s. 15(1) and could not be saved under s. 1. M. v. H. thus marks a clear shift in the jurisprudence of the Court, where it moved away from the plurality's holding in Egan and came to a new understanding of the scope of equality rights.

[111] Bastarache J. disagrees with our conclusion on the nature of the change brought about by M. v. H. He cites lower court decisions rendered prior to Egan and before M. v. H. to show that the law on same-sex equality rights remained unsettled until M. v. H. However, in our system, the Supreme Court has the final word on the interpretation of the Constitution: Manitoba Language Rights Reference, at p. 745. A majority of the Court in Egan rejected the appellants' claim for equal benefits under the law. It was a fact that this Court held in Egan that the Constitution did not require equal benefits for same-sex couples. This fact changed only after M. v. H. when this Court held that it was unconstitutional to exclude same-sex couples from the definition of spouse in the Family Law Act. The threshold requirement for limiting the retroactive effect of the remedy has been satisfied. The Court must now consider other relevant factors. In this case, reliance interests, fairness concerns, the government's good faith, and the need to respect Parliament's legislative role all weigh in favour of limiting retroactive relief.

(ii) Reasonable Reliance

[112] Given the state of the jurisprudence prior to M. v. H., the exclusion of same-sex partners from the former CPP was based on a reasonable understanding of the state of s. 15(1) jurisprudence as it existed after Egan and before M. v. H. Admittedly, the Court in Egan was divided over whether to extend old age security benefits to same-sex couples, with four judges dissenting. After M. v. H., it became apparent that the Egan dissent had prevailed. However, the benefit of hindsight does not undermine the government's reasonableness in relying on Egan.

[113] In holding that the government reasonably relied on the pre-M. v. H. jurisprudence, we do not seek to justify the slowness of legislatures and courts alike in recognizing Charter rights. Rather, we acknowledge the fact that although the Constitution embodies the supreme law and the enduring values of this country, it is up to the courts to interpret and apply those provisions. In Manitoba Language Rights Reference, this Court held:

The Constitution of a country is a statement of the will of the people to be governed in accordance with certain principles held as fundamental and certain prescriptions restrictive of the powers of the legislature and government. It is, as s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982 declares, the "supreme law" of the nation, unalterable by the normal legislative process, and unsuffering of laws inconsistent with it. The duty of the judiciary is to interpret and apply the laws of Canada and each of the provinces, and it is thus our duty to ensure that the constitutional law prevails. [p. 745]

[114] The text of the Constitution establishes the broad confines of the supreme law, but it is up to the courts to interpret and apply the Constitution in any given context. The inviolability of the Constitution ensures that our nation's most cherished values are preserved, while the role of the courts in applying the Constitution ensures that the law is sufficiently flexible to change over time to reflect advances in human understanding. But it also means that the Constitution, at any snapshot in time, is only as robust as the court interpreting it. If the judiciary errs or is slow to recognize that previous interpretations of the Constitution no longer correspond to social realities, it must change the law. However, in breaking with the past, the Court does not create an automatic right to redress for the Court's prior ruling. Where the government's reliance on the unconstitutional law was reasonable because it was relying on this Court's jurisprudence, it will be less likely that a right to retroactive relief will flow from a subsequent declaration of invalidity of the unconstitutional law.

(iii) Good Faith

[115] Our comments above indicate that the government did not act in bad faith in failing to extend survivors' benefits to same-sex couples prior to M. v. H. It is significant that the survivors' benefit scheme under the former CPP was never struck down by a court of competent jurisdiction. Rather, recognizing the likely implications of this Court's ruling in M. v. H. for that scheme, Parliament endeavoured to pre-emptively correct the constitutional deficiencies therein by enacting remedial legislation. Because the government acted in good faith by attempting pre-emptively to correct a constitutional infirmity soon after it was discovered, it would be inappropriate to reach back further in time and impose a retroactive remedy.

(iv) Fairness to Litigants

[116] In seeking payment of arrears back as far as 1985, the Hislop class effectively asks this Court to overlook the evolution in the jurisprudence of same-sex equality rights that has taken place and to declare that the understanding to which we have come over that period of time was in fact the law in 1985. This position cannot be sustained. Although M. v. H. declares what the Constitution requires, it does not give rise to an automatic right to every government benefit that might have been paid out had the Court always interpreted the Constitution in accordance with its present-day understanding of it. M. v. H. was not a case like Miron where limiting the retroactive effect of the s. 52(1) remedy would have granted the "successful" claimant a hollow victory. In contrast, a purely prospective remedy in M. v. H. was not meaningless. M. v. H. resulted in wide scale amendments to federal and provincial legislation across the country to extend government benefits to same-sex couples. Equally important, M. v. H. helped usher in a new era of understanding of the equal human dignity of same-sex couples. One could not say that M. v. H. granted those litigants only a Pyrrhic victory.

(v) Respecting Parliament's Role

[117] Achieving an appropriate balance between fairness to individual litigants and respecting the legislative role of Parliament may mean that Charter remedies will be directed more toward government action in the future and less toward the correction of past wrongs. In the present case, the Hislop class' claim for a retroactive remedy is tantamount to a claim for compensatory damages flowing from the underinclusiveness of the former CPP. Imposing that sort of liability on the government, absent bad faith, unreasonable reliance or conduct that is clearly wrong, would undermine the important balance between the protection of constitutional rights and the need for effective government that is struck by the general rule of qualified immunity. A retroactive remedy in the instant case would encroach unduly on the inherently legislative domain of the distribution of government resources and of policy making in respect of this process.

(vi) Conclusion

[118] For the foregoing reasons, the retroactive relief sought by the Hislop class is unavailable under the law applicable to constitutional remedies. It is not therefore necessary to carry out a s. 15(1) analysis in respect of s. 72(1).

NOTE AND QUESTIONS

Justice Bastarache wrote separate concurring reasons that stressed that the denial of retroactive relief should depend on a general balance of interests and not on whether there was a substantial change in the law. He also indicated that, in his view, the Court's decision in M v H did not constitute a substantial change in the law. Do you agree with the majority that a substantial change in the law can justify a departure from retroactive relief? If so, is the Court's distinction between the recognition of same-sex spousal rights in M v H as a substantial change in the law and the recognition of common law spousal rights in Miron as not a substantial change in the law persuasive? Should courts refuse, as in Hislop, to decide whether rights were violated because the remedy of retroactive relief is not available? What does this tell us about the relationship between rights and remedies?

E. SEVERANCE AND READING DOWN

As noted in Schachter, severance is a remedy familiar from federalism cases and one that involves partial invalidation of the law: see, for example, Reference re Validity of Section 5(a) Dairy Industry Act, [1949] SCR 1, 1948 CanLII 2 [Margarine Reference], excerpted in Chapter 11, Criminal Law and Procedure. The Supreme Court has indicated that severance can be used to fulfill the purposes of the Charter while preserving those parts of the legislation that do not violate the Charter. It was used in Tétreault-Gadoury v Canada (Employment and Immigration Commission), [1991] 2 SCR 22, 1991 CanLII 12, in which, after finding a violation of s 15, the Court deleted the age 65 bar to unemployment insurance benefits. Is there any difference between this form of judicial amendment of laws, involving deletion of language, and reading in as discussed in Schachter and used in Vriend?

Reading down is also a remedy that has been used in federalism cases to avoid declaring a law to be of no force or effect. Reading down permits courts to save from invalidity a law that would be unconstitutional if given its broadest interpretation by giving the law a narrower interpretation that would preclude unconstitutional applications. For an example of reading down in the federalism context, see McKay v The Queen, [1965] SCR 798, 1965 CanLII 3. In McKay, a municipal by-law prohibiting the placement of signs on residential properties was interpreted so as not to apply to federal election signs. The Court concluded that such an application would have been ultra vires.

Reading down need not only be thought of as a remedy for invalidity; it also functions as a technique of interpretation to avoid invalidity. As such, the doctrine of reading down is rooted in notions of legislative intent: the narrowing interpretation is placed on the law because of a presumption that the legislature intended to act within the bounds of the Constitution. For an example of reading down as a technique of interpretation, see R v Butler, [1992] 1 SCR 452, 1992 CanLII 124, excerpted in Chapter 20, Freedom of Expression. In Butler, the Court chose to place a narrow constitutional reading on the obscenity provisions of the Criminal Code, thereby avoiding any finding of a Charter violation. Reading down was thus used in its traditional form as a preliminary interpretive device to keep the law within constitutional bounds rather than as an explicit remedy after a finding of a constitutional violation.

Stronger forms of reading down can also be used as a remedy for possible invalidity and can involve reading limitations into legislation. The Supreme Court of Canada was originally reluctant to save legislation through strong forms of reading in. In Hunter v Southam Inc, [1984] 2 SCR 145, 1984 CanLII 33, after finding that the broad search and seizure powers under the Combines Investigation Act violated s 8 of the Charter (freedom from unreasonable search and seizure), Dickson J, writing for a unanimous Court, rejected the federal government's request that the procedures required by s 8 of the Charter be read into the legislation, stating (at 169):

While the courts are guardians of the Constitution and of individuals' rights under it, it is the legislature's responsibility to enact legislation that embodies appropriate safeguards to comply with the Constitution's requirements. It should not fall to the courts to fill in the details that will render legislative lacunae constitutional.

In R v Sharpe, 2001 SCC 2, also discussed in Chapter 20, the Supreme Court of Canada used an explicit and strong remedy of reading in to save potentially overbroad legislation prohibiting the possession of child pornography. Certain exemptions were read into the law to narrow its scope and cure the potential overbreadth. Chief Justice McLachlin stated:

[111] Confronted with a law that is substantially constitutional and peripherally problematic, the Court may consider a number of alternatives. One is to strike out the entire law. This was the choice of the trial judge and the majority of the British Columbia Court of Appeal. The difficulty with this remedy is that it nullifies a law that is valid in most of its applications. Until Parliament can pass another law, the evil targeted goes unremedied. Why, one might well ask, should a law that is substantially constitutional be struck down simply because the accused can point to a hypothetical application that is far removed from his own case which might not be constitutional?

[112] Another alternative might be to hold that the law as it applies to the case at bar is valid, declining to find it unconstitutional on the basis of a hypothetical scenario that has not yet arisen. In the United States, courts have frequently declined to strike out laws on the basis of hypothetical situations not before the court, although less so in First Amendment (free expression) cases. While the Canadian jurisprudence on the question is young, thus far it suggests that laws may be struck out on the basis of hypothetical situations, provided they are "reasonable."

[113] Yet another alternative might be to uphold the law on the basis that it is constitutionally valid in the vast majority of its applications and stipulate that if and when unconstitutional applications arise, the accused may seek a constitutional exemption. ...

[114] I find it unnecessary to canvas any of these suggestions further because in my view the appropriate remedy in this case is to read into the law an exclusion of the problematic applications of s. 163.1, following Schachter v. Canada, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 679. Schachter suggests that the problem of peripheral unconstitutional provisions or applications of a law may be addressed by striking down the legislation, severing of the offending sections (with or without a temporary suspension of invalidity), reading down, or reading in. The Court decides on the appropriate remedy on the basis of "twin guiding principles": respect for the role of Parliament, and respect for the purposes of the Charter (p. 715). Applying these principles, I conclude that in the circumstances of the case reading in an exclusion is the appropriate remedy.

[115] To assess the appropriateness of reading in as a remedy, we must identify a distinct provision that can be read into the existing legislation to preserve its constitutional balance. In this case, s. 163.1 might be read as incorporating an exception for the possession of:

1. Self-created expressive material: i.e., any written material or visual representation created by the accused alone, and held by the accused alone, exclusively for his or her own personal use; and
2. Private recordings of lawful sexual activity: i.e., any visual recording, created by or depicting the accused, provided it does not depict unlawful sexual activity and is held by the accused exclusively for private use. ...

[121] Schachter, supra, holds that reading in will be appropriate only where (1) the legislative objective is obvious and reading in would further that objective or constitute a lesser interference with that objective than would striking down the legislation; (2) the choice of means used by the legislature to further the legislation's objective is not so unequivocal that reading in would constitute an unacceptable intrusion into the legislative domain; and (3) reading in would not require an intrusion into legislative budgetary decisions so substantial as to change the nature of the particular legislative enterprise. The third requirement is not of concern here. The first two inquiries—conformity with legislative objective and avoidance of unacceptable law-making—require more discussion.

[122] The first question is whether the legislative objective of s. 163.1(4) is evident. In my view it is. The purpose of the legislation is to protect children from exploitation and abuse by prohibiting possession of material that presents a reasoned risk of harm to children. This question leads to a second: whether reading in will further that objective. In other words, will precluding the offending applications of the law better conform to Parliament's objective than striking down the whole law? Again the answer is clearly yes. The applications of the law that pose constitutional problems are exactly those whose relation to the objective of the legislation is most remote. Carving out those applications by incorporating the proposed exception will not undermine the force of the law; rather, it will preserve the force of the statute while also recognizing the purposes of the Charter. The defects of the section are not so great that their exclusion amounts to impermissible redrafting The new exceptions resemble those that Parliament has already created and are consistent with its overall approach of catching mainstream child pornography reasonably linked to harm while excluding peripheral material that engages free speech values. Moreover, since the problematic applications lie on the periphery of the material targeted by Parliament, carving them out will not create an exception-riddled provision bearing little resemblance to the provision envisioned by Parliament. This suggests that excluding the offending applications of the law will not subvert Parliament's object. On the other hand, striking down the statute altogether would assuredly undermine Parliament's object, making it impossible to combat the lawfully targeted harms until it can pass new legislation.

[124] The second prong of Schachter, supra, is directed to the possibility that reading in, though recognizing the objective of the legislation, may nonetheless undermine legislative intent by substituting one means of effecting that intent with another. As we noted in Vriend v. Alberta, [1998] 1 S.C.R. 493, the relevant question is "what the legislature would ... have done if it had known that its chosen measures would be found unconstitutional" (para. 167). If it is not clear that the legislature would have enacted the legislation without the problematic provisions or aspects, then reading in a term may not provide the appropriate remedy. This concern has more relevance where the legislature has made a "deliberate choice of means" by which to reach its objective. Even in such a case, however, "a deliberate choice of means will not act as a bar to reading in save for those circumstances in which the means chosen can be shown to be of such centrality to the aims of the legislature and so integral to the scheme of the legislation, that the legislature would not have enacted the statute without them": Vriend, supra, at para. 167.

[125] In the present case it cannot be said that the legislature has made a deliberate choice of means in the sense that phrase was used in Vriend, supra. ... I see no evidence ... that Parliament saw the statute's application to the two problematic categories of materials (i.e., self-created expressive materials and private recordings that do not depict unlawful sexual activity) as an integral part of the legislative scheme. On the contrary, given that the risk to children posed by materials falling within these two categories is relatively remote, it seems reasonable to conclude that such materials are caught incidentally, not deliberately, and that Parliament would have excluded these two categories from the purview of the law had it been seized of the difficulty raised by their inclusion.

F. CONSTITUTIONAL EXEMPTIONS

When a constitutional exemption is granted, the law remains in force, but it is declared inapplicable, on a case-by-case basis, to individuals or groups whose Charter rights are infringed by its effects. In R v Ferguson, 2008 SCC 6, the Supreme Court of Canada expressed serious reservations about its use as a remedy for unconstitutional laws.

Ferguson involved an RCMP officer who was convicted of manslaughter. He argued that the mandatory minimum four-year sentence provided for the offence constituted, on the facts of his case, cruel and unusual punishment contrary to s 12 of the Charter. The trial judge ruled in his favour, relying on s 24(1) of the Charter to grant Ferguson a constitutional exemption from the mandatory minimum sentence and to impose a lesser sentence. The Supreme Court of Canada found that there was no basis for concluding that the mandatory minimum sentence constituted cruel and unusual punishment on the facts of the case. Nonetheless, the Court went on to discuss whether, if a violation of s 12 had been established, a constitutional exemption under s 24(1) would have been the appropriate remedy, or whether the only remedy should have been a declaration that the law was of no force and effect under s 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

The Court recognized the arguments in favour of utilizing constitutional exemptions:

[38] The argument in favour of recognizing constitutional exemptions is simply put. ... [W]here a mandatory minimum sentence that is constitutional in most of its applications generates an unconstitutional result in a small number of cases, it is better to grant a constitutional exemption in these cases than to strike down the law as a whole. The s. 52(1) remedy of declaring invalid a law that produces a result inconsistent with the Charter is a blunt tool. A law that may be constitutional in many of its applications—and indeed ruled constitutional on a reasonable hypotheticals analysis—is struck down because in one particular case, or in a few cases, it produces an unconstitutional result. Would it not be better, the argument goes, to allow the law to stand, while providing an individual remedy in those cases—arguably rare—where its application offends the Charter?

[39] ... More generally, granting constitutional exemptions for unconstitutional effects of mandatory minimum sentence laws fits well with the Court's practices of severance, reading in and reading out in order to preserve the law to the maximum extent possible: see Schachter v. Canada, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 679.

The Court went on, however, to conclude that these arguments were outweighed by "counter-considerations" (at para 40) and that it would be inappropriate to fashion a constitutional exemption under s 24(1) from a mandatory sentence under the Criminal Code. One such consideration was the remedial scheme under the Charter, with the Court ruling that any exemption from the application of a law could only be formulated as a remedy under s 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 and not under s 24(1) of the Charter. Chief Justice McLachlin, writing for the Court, stated:

[64] The highly discretionary language in s. 24(1), "such remedy as the court considers appropriate and just in the circumstances," is appropriate for control of unconstitutional acts. By contrast, s. 52(1) targets the unconstitutionality of laws in a direct non-discretionary way: laws are of no force or effect to the extent that they are unconstitutional.

A central consideration weighing against the use of a constitutional exemption on the facts of the case was a concern to avoid intruding on the role of Parliament:

[56] ... To allow constitutional exemptions for mandatory minimum sentences is, in effect, to read in a discretion to a provision where Parliament clearly intended to exclude discretion. ... It cannot be assumed that Parliament would have enacted the mandatory minimum sentencing scheme with the discretion that allowing constitutional exemptions would create. For the Court to introduce such a discretion would thus represent an inappropriate intrusion into the legislative sphere.

However, the Court also raised concerns related to the rule of law:

[69] Constitutional exemptions for mandatory minimum sentence laws raise concerns related to the rule of law and the values that underpin it: certainty, accessibility, intelligibility, clarity and predictability.

[70] ... [A] constitutional exemption under s. 24(1) is a personal remedy ... [and] is thus distinct from a s. 52 remedy that reads in an exception for a well-defined class of situations—as, for instance, the remedy in Sharpe. When a constitutional exemption is granted, the successful claimant receives a personal remedy under s. 24(1), but the law remains on the books, intact. ... The mere possibility of such a remedy thus necessarily generates uncertainty: the law is on the books, but in practice, it may not apply. As constitutional exemptions are actually granted, the law in the statute books will in fact increasingly diverge from the law as applied.

[71] Constitutional exemptions from mandatory minimum sentences leave the law uncertain and unpredictable It is up to judges on a case-by-case basis to decide when to strike down a minimum sentence that is inconsistent with the Charter, and when to grant an individual exemption under s. 24(1). But the Charter is silent on how a judge should make this decision . . . In theory, all violations could be remedied under s. 24(1), leaving no role for s. 52(1). . . Constitutional exemptions, it is suggested, should be confined to laws that usually operate constitutionally and only occasionally result in constitutional violations. But how is the judge to decide whether the case before her is rare? The bright line required for constitutional certainty is elusive.

[72] The divergence between the law on the books and the law as applied—and the uncertainty and unpredictability that result—exacts a price paid in the coin of injustice. First, it impairs the right of citizens to know what the law is in advance and govern their conduct accordingly—a fundamental tenet of the rule of law. Second, it risks over-application of the law; . . . the assumed validity of the law may prejudice convicted persons when judges must decide whether to apply it in particular cases. Third, it invites duplication of effort. The matter of constitutionality would not be resolved once and for all as under s. 52(1); in every case where a violation is suspected, the accused would be obliged to seek a constitutional exemption. In so doing, it creates an unnecessary barrier to the effective exercise of the convicted offender's constitutional rights, thereby encouraging uneven and unequal application of the law.

[73] A final cost of constitutional exemptions from mandatory minimum sentence laws is to the institutional value of effective law making and the proper roles of Parliament and the courts. Allowing unconstitutional laws to remain on the books deprives Parliament of certainty as to the constitutionality of the law in question and thus of the opportunity to remedy it. Legislatures need clear guidance from the courts as to what is constitutionally permissible and what must be done to remedy legislation that is found to be constitutionally infirm. In granting constitutional exemptions, courts would be altering the state of the law on constitutional grounds without giving clear guidance to Parliament as to what the Constitution requires in the circumstances . . . Bad law, fixed up on a case-by-case basis by the courts, does not accord with the role and responsibility of Parliament to enact constitutional laws for the people of Canada.

How can the restrictive approach to constitutional exemptions adopted in Ferguson be reconciled with the Court's willingness to consider using exemptions from suspended declarations of invalidity in Ontario v G? Is there as clear a line as the Court suggests between case-by-case exemptions from a law under s 24(1) of the Charter and reading down a law under s 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982 by reading in exemptions? Should different principles apply to remedial decision-making under s 52(1) and s 24(1) because the former is addressed at unconstitutional laws and the latter is directed at unconstitutional acts? Note that restrictions on combining s 24(1) remedies such as damages and s 52 declarations of invalidity will be discussed below.

III. REMEDIES UNDER SECTION 24(1) OF THE CHARTER

A. DECLARATIONS

In Little Sisters Book and Art Emporium v Canada, excerpted immediately below, a majority of the Supreme Court of Canada issued a declaration, under s 24(1) of the Charter, that the applicants' Charter rights had been violated because of the unconstitutional application of the challenged law, rather than the remedy requested—namely, striking down the law in its entirety under s 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982. As the minority reasons show, however, the majority's remedial choice was not uncontroversial.

The case, which is discussed in Chapter 20, involved a challenge, on the basis of ss 2(b) and 15 of the Charter, to provisions in the federal customs legislation that prohibited the importation of obscene publications and empowered customs officials to make the necessary determination of obscenity. The challenge was brought by a bookstore, Little Sisters, which alleged a customs practice of targeting material destined for gay and lesbian bookstores. Little Sisters had sought not only a recognition that its own rights had been violated because of the way in which the law had been applied to them but also a declaration of the law's invalidity on the ground, inter alia, that the procedure for determining obscenity was so cumbersome and procedurally defective that it could not be administered in a way that respected Charter rights. With the exception of a reverse-onus clause, a majority of the Court, in a judgment written by Binnie J, found no constitutional flaw in the legislation itself. Any problems were found to lie in the administration of the law, the appropriate remedy for which was a declaration under s 24(1) of the Charter. The majority also refused Little Sisters' request for an injunction restraining customs from applying the law so long as any risk of unconstitutional administration existed.

Little Sisters Book and Art Emporium v Canada

BINNIE J (McLachlin CJ and L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, Major, and Bastarache JJ concurring):

[154] In my view, the appellants have established that:

1. Section 152(3) of the Customs Act should not be construed and applied so as to place the onus on an importer to establish that goods are not obscene within the meaning of s. 163(8) of the Criminal Code. The burden of proving obscenity rests on the Crown or other person who alleges it.
2. The rights of the appellants under s. 2(b) and s. 15(1) of the Charter have been infringed in the following respects:
 - (a) They have been targeted as importers of obscene materials despite the absence of any evidence to suggest that gay and lesbian erotica is more likely to be obscene than heterosexual erotica, or that the appellants are likely offenders in this regard;
 - (b) In consequence of the targeting, the appellants have suffered excessive and unnecessary prejudice in terms of delays, cost and other losses in having their goods cleared (if at all) through Canada Customs;
 - (c) The reasons for this excessive and unnecessary prejudice include:
 - (i) failure by Customs to devote a sufficient number of officials to carry out the review of the appellants' publications in a timely way;
 - (ii) the inadequate training of the officials assigned to the task;
 - (iii) the failure to place at the disposal of these officials proper guides and manuals, failure to update Memorandum D9-1-1 and its accompanying illustrative manual in a timely way, and the failure to develop workable procedures to deal with books consisting mostly or wholly of written text;
 - (iv) failure to establish internal deadlines and related criteria for the expeditious review of expressive materials;
 - (v) failure to incorporate into departmental guides and manuals relevant advice received from time to time from the Department of Justice;

- (vi) failure to provide the appellants in a timely way with notice of the basis for detention of publications, the opportunity to make meaningful submissions on a re-determination, and reasonable access to the disputed materials for that purpose; and
- (vii) failure to extend to the appellants the equal benefit of fair and expeditious treatment of their imported goods without discrimination based on sexual orientation.

[155] It is apparent that this catalogue particularizes in greater detail the declaration issued by the trial judge, namely:

THIS COURT DECLARIES that Tariff Code 9956(a) of Schedule VII and s. 114 of the Customs Tariff, S.C. 1987, c. 41 (3rd Supplement) and ss. 58 and 71 of the Customs Act, S.C. 1986, c. 1 (2nd Supplement) have at times been construed and applied in a manner contrary to s. 2(b) and s. 15(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

[157] Having rejected that s. 52 argument, except as to the reverse onus provision, the remaining question is whether the Court should attempt to fashion a more structured s. 24(1) remedy. I conclude, with some hesitation, that it is not practicable to do so. The trial concluded on December 20, 1994. We are told that in the past six years, Customs has addressed the institutional and administrative problems encountered by the appellants. In the absence of more detailed information as to what precisely has been done, and the extent to which (if at all) it has remedied the situation, I am not prepared to endorse my colleague's conclusion that these measures are "not sufficient" (para. 262) and have offered "little comfort" (para. 265). Equally, however, we have not been informed by the appellants of the specific measures (short of declaring the legislation invalid or inoperative) that in the appellants' view would remedy any continuing problems.

[158] The most detailed suggestion the appellants have made in the way of a s. 24(1) remedy is the following request:

... in the final alternative an injunction restraining Customs from applying and administering the Customs Tariff, S.C. 1987, c. 41 (3rd Supplement) s. 114, Schedule VII, Code 9956(a) and the Customs Act, S.C. 1986 (2nd Supp.), s. 58 and s. 71, as amended, permanently or until such time as there is no risk that the unconstitutional administration will continue.

The first branch of the proposed injunction ("permanently") amounts to a s. 52 declaration of inoperability, which I do not consider justified. The second branch ("until such time") sets an unrealistic standard ("no risk"). If diluted to a call for constitutional behaviour, the result would add little to the general duty that falls on any government official to act in accordance with the Constitution, injunction or no injunction, and would scarcely advance the objectives of either clarity or enforceability. A more structured s. 24(1) remedy might well be helpful but it would serve the interests of none of the parties for this Court to issue a formal declaratory order based on six-year-old evidence supplemented by conflicting oral submissions and speculation on the current state of affairs. The views of the Court on the merits of the appellants' complaints as the situation stood at the end of 1994 are recorded in these reasons and those of my colleague Iacobucci J. These findings should provide the appellants with a solid platform from which to launch any further action in the Supreme Court of British Columbia should they consider that further action is necessary.

IACOBUCCI J (Arbour and LeBel JJ concurring) (dissenting in part):

[253] Given Smith J.'s finding that there were "grave systemic problems" in the administration of the law—a conclusion with which I wholeheartedly agree—the primarily declaratory remedy relied on by Binnie J. is simply inadequate. Systemic problems call for systemic solutions. I believe that Customs' history of improper censorship, coupled with its inadequate response to the declarations of the courts below, confirms that only striking down the legislation in question will guarantee vindication of the appellants' constitutional rights. Having concluded that the law must fall, I will offer some broad guidelines for future reform.

(i) Legislation Must Ensure Constitutional Application

[254] ... In this case, it is true that nothing in the Customs legislation itself forces Customs to ignore evidence of literary and artistic merit; to make decisions without even allowing written submissions from the parties affected; and to discriminate against gay and lesbian materials. However, the legislation does call for prior restraint by an investigatory rather than adjudicatory body, and does not provide for any meaningful safeguards aimed at preventing the inevitable flaws that result from such a system.

[255] Effectively, the respondents call on this Court to trust them. Indeed, when questioned at oral arguments about what guarantee we have that the mistakes of the past will not continue, counsel for the respondent Canada replied, "what may have occurred then, I trust will not occur now." ...

[256] In fact, the respondents' approach would mean that every unconstitutional law requires no more than a declaratory remedy; after all, Parliament is fully capable of amending a law to bring it into compliance with the Constitution at any time. I therefore disagree with Binnie J.'s conclusion that, with the exception of s. 152(3) of the Customs Act, a declaratory remedy is sufficient in this case. While the government is free to delegate powers, it must do so in a way that ensures—or at the very least attempts to ensure—that Charter rights will be respected.

(ii) Declaratory Relief Is Insufficient

[258] The need to strike down the Customs legislation as it applies to expressive materials is reinforced by comparison with the alternate remedy adopted by both the courts below, and by Binnie J. in this Court. Declarations are, in many cases, an appropriate constitutional remedy. As Kent Roach has summarized in his Constitutional Remedies in Canada (loose-leaf ed.), at para. 12.30, declarations are often preferable to injunctive relief because they are more flexible, require less supervision, and are more deferential to the other branches of government. However, declarations can suffer from vagueness, insufficient remedial specificity, an inability to monitor compliance, and an ensuing need for subsequent litigation to ensure compliance: see ibid., at para. 12.320.

[259] Mahe v. Alberta, [1990] 1 S.C.R. 342, illustrates the appropriate role of declaratory relief. In that case the Court held that Edmonton's school system violated s. 23 of the Charter because it did not grant sufficient "management and control" over French-language education to the linguistic minority. In determining the appropriate remedy, Dickson C.J. recognized, at pp. 391-92, that the impugned provisions of the School Act were "'permissive' provisions, that is, they do not prevent authorities from acting in accordance with the Charter, but neither do they guarantee that such compliance will occur." The Chief Justice declined to strike down the legislation, instead choosing to issue a declaration. He feared that "the result of a declaration of invalidity would be to create a legislative vacuum" (p. 392), which would potentially leave the appellants worse off. The Court therefore simply issued "a declaration in respect of the concrete rights which are due to the minority language parents in Edmonton under s. 23" (p. 392). Similarly, in [Eldridge v British Columbia (AG), [1997] 3 SCR 624, 1997 CanLII 327] the Court simply declared that services must be provided to the deaf instead of striking down the entire legislative scheme.

[260] The rationale behind the remedial choice in those cases does not apply to the present appeal. Striking down the applicability of the Customs legislation to expressive materials will not make the appellants worse off; it will fully vindicate their rights. While the appellants are admittedly not entitled to any particular legislative scheme, they are entitled to a remedy that will prevent further systematic and consistent violations of their constitutional rights. Only invalidating the impugned Customs legislation will achieve that goal.

[261] A final reason that declaratory relief is inappropriate in this case is the difficulties the appellants face in enforcing it. This case has been a massive undertaking for the appellants. Proving the constitutional violations recognized by Smith J. required the production of an enormous record. Unfortunately, if the appellants are unsatisfied with the government's compliance with the declaration affirmed by this Court, they have little choice but to try to assemble a similar record documenting the enforcement of the Customs regime since the declaration was made. This is obviously a heavy burden, and indeed unfair. A stronger remedy is necessary to vindicate the appellants' rights. ...

[262] In my respectful opinion, declaratory relief has already proven ineffective. As Roach, supra, at para. 13.884 has noted, "declaratory relief does not facilitate continued judicial supervision and may not be effective where governments do not take prompt and good faith steps to comply with the declaration." While obviously we lack evidence of the enforcement of the Customs regime since Smith J.'s declaration, I believe that the reforms thus far are not sufficient.

[Justice Iacobucci then reviewed the reforms, concluding: "With respect, I am not satisfied that these measures will remedy the 'grave systemic problems' found by Smith J. They are largely hortatory or permissive" (at para 265). Justice Iacobucci made several recommendations for reform, including the enactment of new legislation with appropriate safeguards for timely decisions and freedom of expression, the creation of a specialized administrative tribunal, and reliance on criminal prosecutions for obscenity.]

[281] No doubt there are many other steps that could be taken to improve the current system. I put these suggestions forward to show that there is a variety of approaches available to Parliament to underscore the importance of ensuring Canadians have access to as many expressive materials as possible while realizing the practical constraints that are involved. Because the present regime essentially treats books like any other commodity, I hope that Parliament will review and revise the current Customs legislation to reflect the seminal importance of freedom of expression in our Canadian democracy.

[282] ... In my opinion, the record in this appeal amply bears out Smith J.'s conclusion that there are "grave systemic" flaws in the enforcement of the Customs legislation. But I cannot agree that the remedy is simply to issue a declaration and take it on faith that Canada Customs—an agency which, it bears repeating, has a long and ignominious record of excessive censorship throughout this century—will reform its ways.

[283] I would therefore allow the appeal, set aside the judgment of the British Columbia Court of Appeal and declare, pursuant to s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982, that Schedule VII, Tariff Code 9956(a) (now Tariff Item 9989.00.00) is of no force and effect. I would suspend this declaration of invalidity for a period of 18 months to allow the government time to choose the preferred remedial option described in these reasons, and to take the related steps necessary to make the implementation of the chosen option effective.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Does the majority's judgment suggest that the Court might be inclined to sanction the use of structural injunctions (discussed below) in appropriate cases? What does the majority's judgment suggest about how such injunctions should be constructed and when they will be appropriate?
2. Is the minority's judgment an example of a court approving a structural injunction; or is it a case of recognizing the limitations of declarations as a remedy and inviting Parliament, as opposed to a court, to engage in structural reform? Note that Little Sisters continued to have problems with customs. The small bookstore started new litigation against customs but abandoned it when the Supreme Court held that it would not grant it advance costs on the basis that the appeal was not in the broader public interest. Little Sisters Book Store v Canada (Commissioner of Customs and Revenue), 2007 SCC 2.

3. In Canada (Prime Minister) v Khadr, 2010 SCC 3, the Supreme Court reversed a mandatory order that Canada request Omar Khadr's repatriation from the United States. (Khadr was detained at the US detention camp in Cuba, Guantanamo Bay.) The Court instead entered a declaration that Canada had violated Khadr's rights when it had sent officials to Guantanamo Bay to interrogate him in 2003 and 2004. The Court stated:

[39] Our first concern is that the remedy ordered below [the mandatory order] gives too little weight to the constitutional responsibility of the executive to make decisions on matters of foreign affairs in the context of complex and ever-changing circumstances, taking into account Canada's broader national interests. For the following reasons, we conclude that the appropriate remedy is to declare that, on the record before the Court, Canada infringed Mr. Khadr's s. 7 rights, and to leave it to the government to decide how best to respond to this judgment in light of current information, its responsibility for foreign affairs, and in conformity with the Charter.

The Court also justified its use of a declaration as opposed to a mandatory order by expressing concerns about the adequacy of the record:

[44] ... The record before us gives a necessarily incomplete picture of the range of considerations currently faced by the government in assessing Mr. Khadr's request. We do not know what negotiations may have taken place, or will take place, between the U.S. and Canadian governments over the fate of Mr. Khadr. As observed by Chaskalson C.J. in Kaunda v. President of the Republic of South Africa, [2004] ZACC 5, 136 I.L.R. 452, at para. 77: "The timing of representations if they are to be made, the language in which they should be couched, and the sanctions (if any) which should follow if such representations are rejected are matters with which courts are ill-equipped to deal." It follows that in these circumstances, it would not be appropriate for the Court to give direction as to the diplomatic steps necessary to address the breaches of Mr. Khadr's Charter rights.

After the Court's declaration that Khadr's rights had been violated, Canada issued a diplomatic note requesting that the United States not use the fruits of interrogation by Canadian officials in Omar Khadr's subsequent military commission proceedings. The United States declined to honour this request.

In subsequent litigation, a trial judge found that Khadr had still not received an effective remedy and that Canada had breached the common law duty of procedural fairness and the doctrine of fair expectations by not consulting Khadr and his lawyers before issuing the diplomatic note. This part of the decision is innovative and potentially requires that governments conform to common law obligations when responding to declarations. The trial judge in this case also retained jurisdiction and required Canada to propose another remedy, the adequacy of which Khadr would then be allowed to comment on: Khadr v Canada (Prime Minister), 2010 FC 715. The federal government was able to have this judgment stayed pending appeal, with Blais CJ expressing doubts about whether courts could require the government to make diplomatic representations as a remedy under s 24(1) or retain jurisdiction in such a context: Canada (Prime Minister) v Khadr, 2010 FCA 199. The appeal was subsequently declared moot in the light of Khadr's guilty plea in a military commission held at Guantanamo: Canada v Khadr, 2011 FCA 92. For further discussion of this case, see Amir Attaran & Jon Khan, "Solving the 'Khadr Problem': Retention of Jurisdiction" (2015) 34:2 NJCL 145; Kent Roach, "The Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics" (2010) 28 NJCL 115.

4. The Supreme Court's preference for declarations over mandatory orders as constitutional remedies is not, however, absolute. In Canada (AG) v PHS Community Services Society, 2011 SCC 44 (better known as the "Insite" case), excerpted in Chapter 22, The Right to Life, Liberty, and Security of the Person, the Court made a mandatory order—what is called "an order in the nature of mandamus" (at para 150)—requiring the federal minister of health to issue an exemption under the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act, SC 1996, c 19 [CDSA] to allow the continued operation of Insite, a safe injection site in downtown Vancouver. The Court concluded that the Minister's refusal to grant the exemption violated s 7 of the Charter because it was arbitrary and grossly disproportionate to the purposes of the Act, which were to protect public safety and health—the trial judge had found that the safe injection site had prevented the transmission of disease by the use of dirty needles and had not increased crime in the neighbourhood. The Court justified the choice of a mandatory order in the form of a mandamus over a declaration as follows:

[146] One option would be to issue a declaration that the Minister erred in refusing to grant a further exemption to Insite in May 2008, and return the matter to the Minister to reconsider the matter and make a decision that respects the claimants' Charter rights.

[147] However, this remedy would be inadequate.

[148] The infringement at stake is serious; it threatens the health, indeed the lives, of the claimants and others like them. The grave consequences that might result from a lapse in the current constitutional exemption for Insite cannot be ignored. These claimants would be cast back into the application process they have tried and failed at, and made to await the Minister's decision based on a reconsideration of the same facts. Litigation might break out anew. A bare declaration is not an acceptable remedy in this case.

[150] In the special circumstances of this case, an order in the nature of mandamus is warranted. I would therefore order the Minister to grant an exemption to Insite under s. 56 of the CDSA forthwith. (This of course would not affect the Minister's power to withdraw the exemption should the operation of Insite change such that the exemption would no longer be appropriate.) On the trial judge's findings of fact, the only constitutional response to the application for a s. 56 exemption was to grant it. The Minister is bound to exercise his discretion under s. 56 in accordance with the Charter. On the facts as found here, there can be only one response: to grant the exemption. There is therefore nothing to be gained (and much to be risked) in sending the matter back to the Minister for reconsideration.

What, if anything, justifies the decision to rely on a declaration in the Khadr case, but to use a more intrusive mandatory order in the Insite case? Can the difference be adequately explained by the Court's deference to the state's foreign affairs duties in Khadr? Do differences in the adequacy of the record in the cases also help explain the different remedial choices?

B. STRUCTURAL INJUNCTIONS

In drafting remedies for constitutional violations, US courts have made extensive use of complex supervisory orders called "structural injunctions" or "civil rights injunctions," the goal of which is to restructure institutions that have operated unconstitutionally in the past, resulting in systemic violations of rights. Such orders have resulted in US courts redrawing electoral boundaries, desegregating school systems by redrawing school boundaries and ordering the busing of children, and running prisons and mental hospitals. The civil rights injunction is a controversial remedy and has been criticized for allowing judges to exercise legislative and administrative powers: see Robert J Sharpe, "Injunctions and the Charter" (1984) 22 Osgoode Hall LJ 474, for the argument that, although institutional advantages clearly favour legislators and administrators in the task of designing structural changes in institutions to meet the demands of the Charter, if they fail to respond positively, the courts will be required to act. The majority of requests for structural remedies under the Charter thus far have arisen in the context of the minority language education rights guaranteed by s 23 of the Charter, which are discussed in Chapter 24, Language Rights. For further discussion of the structural injunction under the Charter, see, in addition to Sharpe's article, Nora Gillespie, "Charter Remedies: The Structural Injunction" (1990) 11 Adv Q 190; Ghislain Otis, "La Charte et la modification des programmes gouvernementaux [The Charter and the Modification of Governmental Programs]" (1991) 36 McGill LJ 1348; Christopher Manfredi, "Appropriate and Just in the Circumstances" (1994) 27 Can J Poli Sci 435; Kent Roach, Constitutional Remedies in Canada, 2nd ed (Toronto: Thomson Reuters, 2013) ch 13.

The next case concerns whether a trial judge was justified in retaining jurisdiction over a case and requiring the government to report back to the Court and the parties on its progress in making minority language schools available after the judge had issued a declaration that the s 23 minority language educational rights of francophones in Nova Scotia had been violated.

Doucet-Boudreau v Nova Scotia (Minister of Education)

IACOBUCCI and ARBOUR JJ (McLachlin CJ and Gonthier and Bastarache JJ concurring):

[41] Section 24(1) entrenches in the Constitution a remedial jurisdiction for infringements or denials of Charter rights and freedoms. The respondent makes various arguments suggesting that LeBlanc J. exceeded his jurisdiction by violating constitutional norms, statutory provisions, and common law rules. We will first deal with the extent of the remedial jurisdiction in s. 24(1) and the constitutional limits to that jurisdiction proposed by the respondent. Later we will discuss how statutes and common law rules might be relevant to the choice of remedy under s. 24(1) . . .

[51] The power of the superior courts under s. 24(1) to make appropriate and just orders to remedy infringements or denials of Charter rights is part of the supreme law of Canada. It follows that this remedial power cannot be strictly limited by statutes or rules of the common law. We note, however, that statutes and common law rules may be helpful to a court choosing a remedy under s. 24(1) insofar as the statutory provisions or common law rules express principles that are relevant to determining what is "appropriate and just in the circumstances."

(3) The Meaning of "Appropriate and Just in the Circumstances"

[52] What, then, is meant in s. 24(1) by the words "appropriate and just in the circumstances"? Clearly, the task of giving these words meaning in particular cases will fall to the courts ordering the remedies since s. 24(1) specifies that the remedy should be such as the court considers appropriate and just. Deciding on an appropriate and just remedy in particular circumstances calls on the judge to exercise a discretion based on his or her careful perception of the nature of the right and of the infringement, the facts of the case, and the application of the relevant legal principles. Once again, we emphasize McIntyre J.'s words in [Mills v The Queen, [1986] 1 SCR 863, 1986 CanLII 17], at p. 965:

It is difficult to imagine language which could give the court a wider and less fettered discretion. It is impossible to reduce this wide discretion to some sort of binding formula for general application in all cases, and it is not for appellate courts to pre-empt or cut down this wide discretion.

[53] With respect, the approach to s. 24 reflected in the reasons of LeBel and Deschamps JJ. would tend to pre-empt and reduce this wide discretion. Their approach would also, in this case, pre-empt and devalue the constitutional promise respecting language rights in s. 23. In our view, judicial restraint and metaphors such as "dialogue" must not be elevated to the level of strict constitutional rules to which the words of s. 24 can be subordinated. The same may be said of common law procedural principles such as functus officio which may to some extent be incorporated in statutes. Rather, as LeBel and Deschamps JJ. appear to recognize at paras. 135 and following, there are situations in which our Constitution requires special remedies to secure the very order it envisages.

[54] While it would be unwise at this point to attempt to define, in detail, the words "appropriate and just" or to draw a rigid distinction between the two terms, there are some broad considerations that judges should bear in mind when evaluating the appropriateness and justice of a potential remedy. These general principles may be informed by jurisprudence relating to remedies outside the Charter context, such as cases discussing the doctrine of functus and overly vague remedies, although, as we have said, that jurisprudence does not apply strictly to orders made under s. 24(1).

[55] First, an appropriate and just remedy in the circumstances of a Charter claim is one that meaningfully vindicates the rights and freedoms of the claimants. A meaningful remedy must be relevant to the experience of the claimant and must address the circumstances in which the right was infringed or denied. An ineffective remedy, or one which was "smothered in procedural delays and difficulties," is not a meaningful vindication of the right and therefore not appropriate and just [56] Second, an appropriate and just remedy must employ means that are legitimate within the framework of our constitutional democracy. . . [A] court ordering a Charter remedy must strive to respect the relationships with and separation of functions among the legislature, the executive and the judiciary. This is not to say that there is a bright line separating these functions in all cases. A remedy may be appropriate and just notwithstanding that it might touch on functions that are principally assigned to the executive. The essential point is that the courts must not, in making orders under s. 24(1), depart unduly or unnecessarily from their role of adjudicating disputes and granting remedies that address the matter of those disputes.

[57] Third, an appropriate and just remedy is a judicial one which vindicates the right while invoking the function and powers of a court. It will not be appropriate for a court to leap into the kinds of decisions and functions for which its design and expertise are manifestly unsuited. The capacities and competence of courts can be inferred, in part, from the tasks with which they are normally charged and for which they have developed procedures and precedent.

[58] Fourth, an appropriate and just remedy is one that, after ensuring that the right of the claimant is fully vindicated, is also fair to the party against whom the order is made. The remedy should not impose substantial hardships that are unrelated to securing the right.

[59] Finally, it must be remembered that s. 24 is part of a constitutional scheme for the vindication of fundamental rights and freedoms enshrined in the Charter. As such, s. 24 because of its broad language and the myriad of roles it may play in cases should be allowed to evolve to meet the challenges and circumstances of those cases. ...

(4) Application to This Case: The Remedy Ordered by the Trial Judge Was Appropriate and Just in the Circumstances

(a) The Reporting Order Effectively Vindicated the Rights of the Parents

[60] LeBlanc J. exercised his discretion to select an effective remedy that meaningfully vindicated the s. 23 rights of the appellants in the context of serious rates of assimilation and a history of delay in the provision of French-language education in Kingston (Greenwood, Chéticamp, Île Madame-Arichat (Petit de Grat), Argyle, and Clare). The facts as found by LeBlanc J. disclosed that continued delay could imperil the already vulnerable s. 23 rights, their exercise depending as it does on the numbers of potential students. As Freeman J.A. noted in dissent in the Court of Appeal, the reporting hearings were aimed at identifying difficulties with the timely implementation of the trial judge's order as they arose, instead of requiring fresh applications by the appellants every time it appeared that a party was not using its best efforts to comply with the judge's order.

[61] In the absence of reporting hearings, the appellant parents would have been forced to respond to any new delay by amassing a factual record by traditional means disclosing whether the parties were nonetheless using their best efforts. A new proceeding would be required and this might be heard by another judge less familiar with the case than LeBlanc J. All of this would have taken significant time and resources from parents who had already waited too long and dedicated much energy to the cause of realizing their s. 23 rights. ...

[62] In assessing the extent to which LeBlanc J.'s remedy was appropriate and just in the circumstances, it is useful to examine the options before the trial judge. In doing so we are not intending to usurp the role and discretion of the trial judge but only to gain a fuller understanding of the situation he faced. LeBlanc J. could have limited the remedy to a declaration of the rights of the parties, as the Court considered prudent in [Mahe v Alberta, [1990] 1 SCR 342, 1990 CanLII 133], at pp. 392-93. In Mahe, however, the primary issues before the Court concerned the scope and content of s. 23 of the Charter . . . After clarifying the content and scope of the s. 23 rights at issue, the Court chose the remedy of ordering a declaration of those rights. It did so to allow the government the greatest flexibility to fashion a response suited to the circumstances (p. 393). The assumption underlying this choice of remedy is that governments will comply with the declaration promptly and fully.

[63] . . . The general content of s. 23 in many cases is now largely settled . . . In the present case, for example, it was clear to and accepted by the parties from the start that the government was required to provide the homogeneous French-language facilities at issue. The entitled parents sought the assistance of the court in enforcing the full and prompt vindication of their rights after a lengthy history of government inaction.

[64] Our colleagues LeBel and Deschamps JJ. state at para. 140 of their reasons that the trial judge was not faced with a government which had understood its obligations but refused to comply with them. Our colleagues suggest that there was some issue as to what s. 23 demanded in the situation. With respect, this portrayal is directly at odds with the findings of fact made by the trial judge. At para. 198 of his reasons, the trial judge wrote:

It is apparent that the real issue between the parties is the date on which these programs and facilities are to be implemented. The Department, in its submissions, does not challenge the applicants' right and entitlement to these programs and facilities but point [sic] to a number of factors which ought to satisfy the applicants. The Conseil opposes the applicants' claim for an earlier implementation of the transition plan but supports the applicants in its [sic] demand for declaration that the Department ought to be directed to provide homogeneous facilities.

[65] ... According to the trial judge, the government did not deny the existence or content of the s. 23 rights of the parents but rather failed to prioritize those rights and delayed fulfilling its obligations. The government "did not give sufficient priority to the serious rate of assimilation occurring among Acadians and Francophones in Nova Scotia and the fact that rights established in s. 23 are individual rights" (para. 204) despite clear reports showing that assimilation was "reaching critical levels" (para. 215). ... These findings are not on appeal and it is not open for appellate judges to reverse these findings without proper justification. ...

[66] LeBlanc J. obviously considered that, given the Province's failure to give due priority to the s. 23 rights of its minority Francophone populations in the five districts despite being well aware of them, there was a significant risk that such a declaration would be an ineffective remedy. ... Where governments have failed to comply with their well understood constitutional obligations to take positive action in support of the right in s. 23, the assumption underlying a preference for declarations may be undermined. ... LeBlanc J. was entitled to conclude that he was not limited to declaring the appellant parents' rights and could take into consideration that the case before him was different from those in which declarations had been considered appropriate and just.

[67] Our colleagues LeBel and Deschamps JJ. suggest that the reporting order in this case was not called for since any violation of a simple declaratory remedy could be dealt with in contempt proceedings against the Crown. We do not doubt that contempt proceedings may be available in appropriate cases. The threat of contempt proceedings is not, in our view, inherently more respectful of the executive than simple reporting hearings in which a linguistic minority could discover in a timely way what progress was being made towards the fulfilment of their s. 23 rights. More importantly, given the critical rate of assimilation found by the trial judge, it was appropriate for him to grant a remedy that would in his view lead to prompt compliance. Viewed in this light, LeBlanc J. selected a remedy that reduced the risk that the minority language education rights would be smothered in additional procedural delay.

(b) The Reporting Order Respected the Framework of Our Constitutional Democracy

[68] The remedy granted by LeBlanc J. took into account, and did not depart unduly or unnecessarily from, the role of the courts in our constitutional democracy.

LeBlanc J. considered the government's progress toward providing the required schools and services (see, e.g., paras. 233-34). Some flexibility was built into the "best efforts" order to allow for unforeseen difficulties. It was appropriate for LeBlanc J. to preserve and reinforce the Department of Education's role in providing school facilities as mandated by s. 88 of the Education Act, as this could be done without compromising the entitled parents' rights to the prompt provision of school facilities.

[70] Our colleagues LeBel and Deschamps JJ. appear to consider that the issuance of an injunction against the government under s. 24(1) is constitutionally suspect and represents a departure from a consensus about Charter remedies (see para. 134 of the dissent). With respect, it is clear that a court may issue an injunction under s. 24(1) of the Charter. The power of courts to issue injunctions against the executive is central to s. 24(1) of the Charter which envisions more than declarations of rights. Courts do take actions to ensure that rights are enforced, and not merely declared. ... In this case, it was open to the trial judge in all the circumstances to choose the injunctive remedy on the terms and conditions that he prescribed.

(c) The Reporting Order Called on the Function and Powers of a Court

[71] Although it may not be common in the context of Charter remedies, the reporting order issued by LeBlanc J. was judicial in the sense that it called on the functions and powers known to courts. In several different contexts, courts order remedies that involve their continuing involvement in the relations between the parties Superior courts, which under the Judicature Acts possess the powers of common law courts and courts of equity, have "assumed active and even managerial roles in the exercise of their traditional equitable powers" (K. Roach, Constitutional Remedies in Canada (loose-leaf), at para. 13.60). A panoply of equitable remedies are now available to courts in support of the litigation process and the final adjudication of disputes. For example, prejudgment remedies [such as Mareva injunctions and Anton Piller orders, developed by the courts] involve the court in the preservation of evidence and the management of parties' assets prior to trial. In bankruptcy and receivership matters, courts may be called on to supervise fairly complex and ongoing commercial transactions relating to debtors' assets. Court-appointed receivers may report to and seek guidance from the courts and in some cases must seek the permission of the courts before disposing of property Similarly, the courts' jurisdiction in respect of trusts and estates may sometimes entail detailed and continuing supervision and support of their administration Courts may also retain an ongoing jurisdiction in family law cases to order alterations in maintenance payments or parenting arrangements as circumstances change. Finally, this Court has in the past remained seized of a matter so as to facilitate the implementation of constitutional language rights

[72] The difficulties of ongoing supervision of parties by the courts have sometimes been advanced as a reason that orders for specific performance and mandatory injunctions should not be awarded. Nonetheless, courts of equity have long accepted and overcome this difficulty of supervision where the situations demanded such remedies

[73] As academic commentators have pointed out, the range of remedial orders available to courts in civil proceedings demonstrates that constitutional remedies involving some degree of ongoing supervision do not represent a radical break with the past practices of courts The change announced by s. 24 of the Charter is that the flexibility inherent in an equitable remedial jurisdiction may be applied to orders addressed to government to vindicate constitutionally entrenched rights.

[74] The order in this case was in no way inconsistent with the judicial function. There was never any suggestion in this case that the court would, for example, improperly take over the detailed management and co-ordination of the construction projects. Hearing evidence and supervising cross-examinations on progress reports about the construction of schools are not beyond the normal capacities of courts.

(d) The Reporting Order Vindicated the Right by Means That Were Fair

[83] ... The respondent argues that it was subject to an overly vague remedy. In our opinion, the reporting order was not vaguely worded so as to render it invalid. While, in retrospect, it would certainly have been advisable for LeBlanc J. to provide more guidance to the parties as to what they could expect from the reporting sessions, his order was not incomprehensible or impossible to follow. In our view, the "reporting" element of LeBlanc J. remedy was not unclear in a way that would render it invalid.

[84] ... LeBlanc J.'s written order is satisfactory and clearly communicates that the obligation on government was simply to report. The fact that this was the subject of questions later in the process suggests that future orders of this type could be more explicit and detailed with respect to the jurisdiction retained and the procedure at reporting hearings.

[85] It should be remembered that LeBlanc J. was crafting a fairly original remedy in order to provide flexibility to the executive while vindicating the s. 23 right. It may be expected that in future cases judges will be in a better position to ensure that the contents of their orders are clearer. ... It may be more helpful in some cases for the trial judge to seek submissions on whether to specify a timetable with a right of the government to seek variation where just and appropriate to do so.

[86] Once again, we emphasize that s. 24(1) gives a court the discretion to fashion the remedy that it considers just and appropriate in the circumstances. The trial judge is not required to identify the single best remedy, even if that were possible. In our view, the trial judge's remedy was clearly appropriate and just in the circumstances.

(5) Conclusion

[87] Section 24(1) of the Charter requires that courts issue effective, responsive remedies that guarantee full and meaningful protection of Charter rights and freedoms. The meaningful protection of Charter rights, and in particular the enforcement of s. 23 rights, may in some cases require the introduction of novel remedies. A superior court may craft any remedy that it considers appropriate and just in the circumstances. In doing so, courts should be mindful of their roles as constitutional arbiters and the limits of their institutional capacities. Reviewing courts, for their part, must show considerable deference to trial judges' choice of remedy, and should refrain from using hindsight to perfect a remedy. A reviewing court should only interfere where the trial judge has committed an error of law or principle.

[88] The remedy crafted by LeBlanc J. meaningfully vindicated the rights of the appellant parents by encouraging the Province's prompt construction of school facilities, without drawing the court outside its proper role. The Court of Appeal erred in wrongfully interfering with and striking down the portion of LeBlanc J.'s order in which he retained jurisdiction to hear progress reports on the status of the Province's efforts in providing school facilities by the required dates. ...

LeBEL and DESCHAMPS JJ (Major and Binnie JJ concurring) (dissenting):

[91] The devil is in the details. Awareness of the critical importance of effectively enforcing constitutional rights should not lead to forgetfulness about the need to draft pleadings, orders and judgments in a sound manner, consonant with the basic rules of legal writing, and with an understanding of the proper role of courts and of the organizing principles of the legal and political order of our country. Court orders should be written in such a way that parties are put on notice of what is expected of them. Courts should not unduly encroach on areas which should remain the responsibility of public administration and should avoid turning themselves into managers of the public service. Judicial interventions should end when and where the case of which a judge is seized is brought to a close.

[92] In our respectful view, without putting in any doubt the desire of the trial judge to fashion an effective remedy to address the consequences of a long history of neglect of the rights of the Francophone minority in Nova Scotia, the drafting of his so-called reporting order was seriously flawed. It gave the parties no clear notice of their obligations, the nature of the reports or even the purpose of the reporting hearings. In addition, the reporting order assumed that the judge could retain jurisdiction at will, after he had finally disposed of the matter of which he had been seized, thereby breaching the constitutional principle of separation of powers. The order did so by reason of the way it was framed and the manner in which it was implemented. In our opinion, the reporting order was void, as the Court of Appeal of Nova Scotia found, and the appeal should be dismissed.

[97] The drafting of applications asking for injunctive relief, or of orders granting such remedies, can be a serious challenge for counsel and judges. The exercise of the court power to grant injunctions may lead, from time to time, to situations of non-compliance where it may be necessary to call upon the drastic exercise of courts' powers to impose civil or criminal penalties, including imprisonment Therefore, proper notice to the parties of the obligations imposed upon them and clarity in defining the standard of compliance expected of them must be essential requirements of a court's intervention. Vague or ambiguous language should be strictly avoided

[98] Unfortunately, the drafting of the present reporting order was anything but clear. Its brevity and apparent simplicity belie its actual complexity and the state of confusion and uncertainty in which it left not only all of the parties, but the trial judge himself at times. This order was final, not interim, and it was tied to the "best efforts order," which was not couched in terms liable to shed much light on the nature of the obligations of the respondents. Given that this part of the order was not challenged on appeal, we will not discuss it at length, but instead, will focus exclusively on the reporting order which is the object of this appeal.

[99] At first, when judgment was rendered, the reporting order read, at para. 245:

The applicants have requested that I should maintain jurisdiction. I agree to do so. I am scheduling a further appearance for Thursday, July 27, 2000 at 1:30 p.m., and at that time the respondents will report on the status of their efforts. I am requesting the respondents to utilize their best efforts to comply with this decision.

This drafting was slightly modified in the final order, dated December 14, 2000:

The Court shall retain jurisdiction to hear reports from the respondents respecting the respondents' compliance with this Order. The respondents shall report to this Court on March 23, 2001 at 9:30 a.m., or on such other date as the Court may determine.

[100] As Flinn J.A. observed in his reasons in the Court of Appeal ((2001), 194 N.S.R. (2d) 323, 2001 NSCA 104), nobody knew the exact nature of these reports. Their form and content were undefined. There was no indication as to whether they should be delivered orally or in writing or both nor as to how detailed they should be and what kind of supporting documents, if any, would be needed. The order also provided for hearings, but again, it left the parties in the dark as to the procedure, purpose or nature of these sessions of the court. The parties learned only shortly before these hearings that affidavits needed to be filed and deponents made available for cross-examination. Further, there seemed to be little direction, if any at all, as to what sort of evidence was required to be included for the purpose of the hearings. The nature of these hearings, as the process developed, appeared to become a cross between a mini-trial, an informal meeting with the judge and some kind of mediation session, for the purpose of monitoring the execution of the school-building program for Francophone students.

[101] The trial judge himself seemed unsure about the nature of the hearings he had ordered and of the process he had initiated. At first, he appeared to lean towards the view that those hearings were regular sessions of the court, that he had not issued a final order and that additional relief could be requested. For example, in the July 27, 2000 hearing, the trial judge stated that in the hearings, he "would have the opportunity to determine if the Respondents were indeed making every or best efforts to comply" (appellants' record, at p. 762). This a reiteration of a claim made earlier in that hearing (appellants' record, at p. 720). Similarly, in the August 9, 2000 hearing, the trial judge stated: "the amount of room I have with respect to a decision or direction or comment is very limited" (appellants' record, at pp. 997-98); this statement implies that the trial judge had the power, albeit limited, to make orders. However, after the setting down of his formal order, at the last hearing in March 2001, he commented that he could not grant further relief, that he had fully disposed of the matter in his order and accompanying reasons, which were released the previous summer. He added that the sessions had a solely informational purpose.

[102] In the meantime, schools were built or renovated and made available to Francophone students. It is difficult to determine whether those sessions accomplished anything in this respect. What these sessions certainly did was sow confusion, doubt and uncertainty about the obligations of the respondents and about the nature of a process that went on over several months. The trial judge appeared to view this process as open ended and indeterminate, with more sessions being scheduled as he wished. Nobody really knew when it all would come to an end.

[103] The uncertainty engendered by the reporting order was not merely inconvenient for the parties. In our view it amounted to a breach of the parties' interest in procedural fairness. One essential feature of a fair procedural rule is that its contents are clearly defined, and known in advance by the parties subject to it . . .

IV. The Appropriate Role of the Judiciary

[105] While superior courts' powers to craft Charter remedies may not be constrained by statutory or common law limits, they are nonetheless bound by rules of fundamental justice, as we have shown above, and by constitutional boundaries, as we shall see below. In the context of constitutional remedies, courts fulfill their proper function by issuing orders precise enough for the parties to know what is expected of them, and by permitting the parties to execute those orders. Such orders are final. A court purporting to retain jurisdiction to oversee the implementation of a remedy, after a final order has been issued, will likely be acting inappropriately on two levels. First, by attempting to extend the court's jurisdiction beyond its proper role, it will breach the separation of powers principle. Second, by acting after exhausting its jurisdiction, it will breach the functus officio doctrine. We will look at each of these breaches in turn.

1. The Separation of Powers

[106] Courts are called upon to play a fundamental role in the Canadian constitutional regime. When needed, they must be assertive in enforcing constitutional rights. At times, they have to grant such relief as will be required to safeguard basic constitutional rights and the rule of law, despite the sensitivity of certain issues or circumstances and the reverberations of their decisions in their societal environment. Despite—or, perhaps, because of—the critical importance of their functions, courts should be wary of going beyond the proper scope of the role assigned to them in the public law of Canada. In essence, this role is to declare what the law is, contribute to its development and to give claimants such relief in the form of declarations, interpretation and orders as will be needed to remedy infringements of constitutional and legal rights by public authorities. Beyond these functions, an attitude of restraint remains all the more justified, given that, as the majority reasons acknowledge, Canada has maintained a tradition of compliance by governments and public servants with judicial interpretations of the law and court orders.

[110] ... Aside from their duties to supervise administrative tribunals created by the executive and to act as vigilant guardians of constitutional rights and the rule of law, courts should, as a general rule, avoid interfering in the management of public administration.

[111] More specifically, once they have rendered judgment, courts should resist the temptation to directly oversee or supervise the administration of their orders. They should generally operate under a presumption that judgments of courts will be executed with reasonable diligence and good faith. Once they have declared what the law is, issued their orders and granted such relief as they think is warranted by circumstances and relevant legal rules, courts should take care not to unnecessarily invade the province of public administration. To do otherwise could upset the balance that has been struck between our three branches of government.

[112] This is what occurred in the present case. When the trial judge attempted to oversee the implementation of his order, he not only assumed jurisdiction over a sphere traditionally outside the province of the judiciary, but also acted beyond the jurisdiction with which he was legitimately charged as a trial judge. In other words, he was functus officio and breached an important principle which reflects the nature and function of the judiciary in the Canadian constitutional order

[115] If a court is permitted to continually revisit or reconsider final orders simply because it has changed its mind or wishes to continue exercising jurisdiction over a matter, there would never be finality to a proceeding

[117] In addition to this concern with finality, the question of whether a court is clothed with the requisite authority to act raises concerns related to the separation of powers, a principle that transcends procedural and common law rules. In our view, if a court intervenes, as here, in matters of administration properly entrusted to the executive, it exceeds its proper sphere and thereby breaches the separation of powers. By crossing the boundary between judicial acts and administrative oversight, it acts illegitimately and without jurisdiction. Such a crossing of the boundary cannot be characterized as relief that is “appropriate and just in the circumstances” within the meaning of s. 24(1) of the Charter.

V. Application of the Relevant Principles to the Present Case

[118] When the above principles are applied to the present facts, it is evident that McIntyre J.'s admonition in Mills v. The Queen, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 863, that s. 24(1) "was not intended to turn the Canadian legal system upside down" is à propos (p. 953). In our view, the trial judge's remedy undermined the proper role of the judiciary within our constitutional order, and unnecessarily upset the balance between the three branches of government. As a result, the trial judge in the present circumstances acted inappropriately, and contrary to s. 24(1).

[119] As we noted above, the trial judge equivocated on the question of whether his purported retention of jurisdiction empowered him to make further orders. Regardless of which position is taken, the separation of powers was still breached. On the one hand, if he did purport to be able to make further orders, based on the evidence presented at the reporting hearings, he was functus officio. We find it difficult to imagine how any subsequent order would not have resulted in a change to the original final order. This necessarily falls outside the narrow exceptions provided by functus officio, and breaches that rule.

[120] Such a breach would also have resulted in a violation of the separation of powers principle. By purporting to be able to make subsequent orders, the trial judge would have assumed a supervisory role which included administrative functions that properly lie in the sphere of the executive. These functions are beyond the capacities of courts. The judiciary is ill equipped to make polycentric choices or to evaluate the wide-ranging consequences that flow from policy implementation. This Court has recognized that courts possess neither the expertise nor the resources to undertake public administration. In Eldridge v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 624, at para. 96, it was held that in light of the "myriad options" available to the government to rectify the unconstitutionality of the impugned system, it was "not this Court's role to dictate how this is to be accomplished."

[121] In addition, if he purported to adopt a managerial role, the trial judge undermined the norm of co-operation and mutual respect that not only describes the relationship between the various actors in the constitutional order, but defines its particularly Canadian nature, and invests each branch with legitimacy. In Vriend v. Alberta, [1998] 1 S.C.R. 493, Iacobucci J. noted that "respect by the courts for the legislature and the executive role is as important as ensuring that the other branches respect each others' role and the role of the courts" (para. 136). He discussed the wording of provisions of the Charter that expressed this norm of mutual respect (para. 137), and remarked that this norm has "the effect of enhancing the democratic process" (para. 139).

[122] Similarly, McLachlin J. (as she then was) in the 1990 Weir Memorial Lecture reviewed the elements of our legal culture—including our political climate, our tradition of judicial restraint, and the system of references—that have contributed to a spirit of co-operation, rather than confrontation among the branches of government (B. M. McLachlin, "The Charter: A New Role for the Judiciary?" (1991), 29 Alta. L Rev. 540, at pp. 554-56). Moreover, referring to her reasons in Dixon v. British Columbia (Attorney General) (1989), 59 D.L.R. (4th) 247 (B.C.S.C.), she spoke to the importance of considerations of institutional legitimacy for a court crafting a remedy (at p. 557):

It was not for me, I felt, to dictate to the Legislature what sort of law they should enact; that was the responsibility of the elected representatives. But, again following a time-honoured judicial tradition, I offered advice on what limits on the principle of one person-one vote, might be acceptable.

[124] Therefore, just as the legislature should, after a judicial finding of a Charter breach retain independence in writing its legislative response, the executive should after a judicial finding of a breach, retain autonomy in administering government policy that conforms with the Charter. In our constitutional order, the legislature and the executive are intimately interrelated and are the principal loci of democratic will. Judicial respect for that will should extend to both branches.

[125] Thus, if the trial judge's initial suggestion that he could continue to make orders, and thereby effectively engage in administrative supervision and decision making accurately characterizes the nature of the reporting sessions, the order for reporting sessions breached the constitutional principle of separation of powers. Since no part of the Constitution can be interpreted to conflict with another, that order cannot be considered appropriate and just in the circumstances, under s. 24(1). The trial judge's order for reporting sessions should also be considered inappropriate because it put into question the Canadian tradition of mutual respect between the judiciary and the institutions that are the repository of democratic will.

[126] If, however, the trial judge's statement in the last session that he could not make further orders correctly characterized his remedial order, then he breached the separation of powers in another way. When considered in light of this constitutional principle and applied to the present facts, McLachlin C.J.'s proposition that "s. 24 should not be read so broadly that it endows courts and tribunals with powers that they were never intended to exercise" (R. v. 974649 Ontario Inc., [2001] 3 S.C.R. 575, 2001 SCC 81 ("Dunedin"), at para. 22) leads to the conclusion that the trial judge's remedy was not appropriate and just in the circumstances.

[127] The appellants argued that the trial judge retained jurisdiction only to hear reports, and that these hearings had purely "suasive" value. They also argued that the hearings were designed to hold "the Province's feet to the fire" (SCC hearing transcripts). They further suggested that the threat of having to report to the trial judge functioned as an incentive for the government to comply with the best efforts order. In the words of the appellants:

Is it a coincidence that, after a nine month delay (October 1999 to July 2000) the Province called for tenders eight days before the reporting hearing and "fast tracked" the school? The Province knew it would have to report on July 27. The Province ensured that a call for tenders and a construction schedule were in place for July 27.

[128] If this characterization of the trial judge's activity is accurate, then the order for reporting sessions did not result in the exercise of adjudicative, or any other, functions that traditionally define the ambit of a court's proper sphere. Moreover, it resulted in activity that can be characterized as political. According to the appellants' characterization, a primary purpose of the hearings was to put public pressure on the government to act. This kind of pressure is paradigmatically associated with political actors. Indeed, the practice of publicly questioning a government on its performance, without having any legal power to compel it to alter its behaviour, is precisely that undertaken by an opposition party in the legislature during question period.

[133] We would reiterate, at this point, the importance of clarity and certainty in the provisions of a court order. If the trial judge had precisely defined the terms of the remedy, in advance, then the ensuing confusion surrounding his role may not have occurred. Moreover, by complying with this essential element of fair procedure, he may have been able to avoid the constitutional breach of the separation of powers that followed.

VI. Neither a Breach of Procedural Fairness Nor of the Separation of Powers Was Appropriate

[134] ... [T]he trial judge's decision to provide injunctive relief already represented a departure from the cooperative norm that defines and shapes the relationships among the branches of the Canadian constitutional order. We do not deny that in the appropriate factual circumstances, injunctive relief may become necessary. However, the trial judge's order for reporting sessions then purported to go even further, and breached both a fundamental principle of procedural fairness and the constitutional principle of separation of powers.

[139] ... The facts here do not require us to decide whether previous government non-compliance can ever justify remedial orders that breach principles of procedural fairness and the separation of powers. The Government of Nova Scotia did not refuse to comply with either a prior remedial order or a declaration with respect to its particular obligations in the fact-situation at hand. No such order was made Therefore, it cannot be asserted that the trial judge's order has succeeded where less intrusive remedial measures failed.

[140] Moreover, what was required by the Government of Nova Scotia to comply with its obligations pursuant to s. 23 was not self-evident at trial. The present order, therefore, did not overcome governmental recalcitrance in the face of a clear understanding of what s. 23 required in the circumstances of the case. Remedies must be chosen in light of the nature and structure of the Canadian constitutional order, an important feature of which is the presumption of co-operation between the branches of government. Therefore, unless it is established that this constitutional balance has been upset by the executive's clear defiance of a directly applicable judicial order, increased judicial intervention in public administration will rarely be appropriate.

[143] In the present case, refusing superior courts the power to order reporting hearings clearly would not deny claimants' access to a recognized Charter remedy, as such an order is entirely idiosyncratic. More importantly, refusing superior courts this power would not deprive claimants of access to that which they are guaranteed by s. 23, namely, the timely provision of minority language instruction facilities. Indeed, if the appellants' characterization of the reporting hearings' purpose is correct, it is difficult to see how they could have been more effective than the construction deadline coupled with the possibility of a contempt order. ...

VII. Conclusion

[145] In the result, the trial judge breached both a principle of procedural fairness and the constitutional principle of separation of powers, and it is not clear that alternative, less-intrusive remedial measures, would not have achieved the ends sought. While a trial judge's decisions with respect to remedies are owed deference, we believe that this must be tempered when fundamental legal principles are threatened. In light of these principles, and in the presence of untested alternative remedies, we would find that the present trial judge's retention of jurisdiction was not appropriate and just under s. 24(1). The Court of Appeal was correct in declaring that the order to retain jurisdiction for the purposes of reporting sessions was of no force and effect.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Do you agree with the majority that the trial judge's order was fair and within his power? Or do you agree with the minority that it was unfair and exceeded the trial judge's powers?

2. The majority stressed the particular context of the history of denial of minority language education rights in Nova Scotia. To what extent is the remedial approach taken in this case based on the particular nature of rights to minority language schools? Could a similar approach ever be justified, as has been done in other countries, in relation to conditions of confinement in custodial institutions or with respect to health care rights? For a comparison of Doucet-Boudreau with a leading case from the South African Constitutional Court on structural interdicts to require governments to supply drugs to prevent mother-to-child HIV transmission, see Kent Roach & Geoff Budlender, "Mandatory Relief and Supervisory Jurisdiction: When Is It Appropriate, Just, and Equitable?" (2005) 122 SALJ 325.

3. Although the Court disagreed about the particular remedy devised in this case, it agreed that s 24(1) of the Charter provides a basis for an injunction against the government. Would this have changed the remedy in Little Sisters? If a judge is prepared to issue injunctive relief under s 24(1), what considerations should guide their exercise of remedial discretion? What will be the likely effect of the stress that the minority places on the clarity of the order and its enforceability? Should contempt powers ever be used to enforce a constitutional remedy? For commentary on this case, see Debra M MacAlister, "Case Comment: Doucet-Boudreau and the Development of Effective Section 24(1) Remedies: Confrontation or Cooperation" (2004) 16 NJCL 153; Kent Roach, "Principled Remedial Decision Making Under the Charter" (2004) 25 SCLR (2d) 101; Paul S Rouleau, Subrata Bhattacharjee & Nicolas Rouleau, "Revisiting Doucet-Boudreau: Perspectives on Remedies in Section 23 Cases" (2006) 32 SCLR (2d) 301.

4. The majority in Doucet-Boudreau suggested that the trial judge's order could have been improved by greater specificity. Is this a good thing? Will judges be in a position to make more specific orders? Would more specific orders increase concerns about the judiciary invading governmental functions? The importance of clear and enforceable orders was emphasized in Thibodeau v Air Canada, 2014 SCC 67, where the Supreme Court reversed a trial judge's decision to retain jurisdiction to ensure that Air Canada developed a "proper monitoring system and procedures to quickly identify, document and quantify potential violations of its" statutory bilingualism requirements within six months (at para 121). Justice Cromwell stated for the Court:

[126] Structural orders play an important, but limited, role in the enforcement of rights through the courts: Doucet-Boudreau v. Nova Scotia (Minister of Education), 2003 SCC 62, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 3, at para. 56. Orders of this nature are treated with special care because of two potential and related problems: first, insufficient clarity, which in turn may result in the second, namely the need for ongoing judicial supervision—ongoing supervision being something that courts only exceptionally undertake.

Does the Court's unanimous decision in Thibodeau resolve the differences between the majority and the minority in Doucet-Boudreau? If so, has the Court moved closer toward the majority or the minority position in Doucet-Boudreau? Will the emphasis on clear and enforceable orders make judges more or less willing to issue structural injunctions? For arguments that Thibodeau marks the ascendancy of the minority's approach, and that this inappropriately treats governmental defendants as if they were private defendants and will make structural injunctions even rarer in Canada after 2021, Roach argued what is required is a "declaration plus" where courts retain jurisdiction without ordering specific injunctions that can be enforced through contempt of court resulting in fines or even imprisonment. See Kent Roach, "Polycentricity and Queue Jumping in Public Law Remedies: A Two-Track Response" (2016) 66 UTLJ 3; Kent Roach, Remedies for Human Rights Violations (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2021) ch 7.

C. DAMAGES

Vancouver (City) v Ward

2010 SCC 27

McLACHLIN CJ (Binnie, LeBel, Deschamps, Fish, Abella, Charron, Rothstein, and Cromwell JJ concurring):

I. Introduction

[1] The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the fundamental rights and freedoms of all Canadians and provides remedies for their breach. The first and most important remedy is the nullification of laws that violate the Charter under s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. This is supplemented by s. 24(2), under which evidence obtained in breach of the Charter may be excluded if its admission would bring the administration of justice into disrepute, and s. 24(1)—the provision at issue in this case—under which the court is authorized to grant such remedies to individuals for infringement of Charter rights as it “considers appropriate and just in the circumstances.”

[2] The respondent Ward’s Charter rights were violated by Vancouver and British Columbia officials who detained him, strip searched his person and seized his car without cause. The trial judge awarded Mr. Ward damages for the Charter breaches, and the majority of the Court of Appeal of British Columbia upheld that award.

[3] This appeal raises the question of when damages may be awarded under s. 24(1) of the Charter, and what the amount of such damages should be. Although the Charter is 28 years old, authority on this question is sparse, inviting a comprehensive analysis of the object of damages for Charter breaches and the considerations that guide their award.

[4] I conclude that damages may be awarded for Charter breach under s. 24(1) where appropriate and just. The first step in the inquiry is to establish that a Charter right has been breached. The second step is to show why damages are a just and appropriate remedy, having regard to whether they would fulfill one or more of the related functions of compensation, vindication of the right, and/or deterrence of future breaches. At the third step, the state has the opportunity to demonstrate, if it can, that countervailing factors defeat the functional considerations that support a damage award and render damages inappropriate or unjust. The final step is to assess the quantum of the damages.

[5] I conclude that damages were properly awarded for the strip search of Mr. Ward, but not justified for the seizure of his car. I would therefore allow the appeal in part.

II. Facts

[6] On August 1, 2002, Prime Minister Chrétien participated in a ceremony to mark the opening of a gate at the entrance to Vancouver’s Chinatown. During the ceremony, the Vancouver Police Department (“VPD”) received information that an unknown individual intended to throw a pie at the Prime Minister, an event that had occurred elsewhere two years earlier. The suspected individual was described as a white male, 30 to 35 years, 5’9”, with dark short hair, wearing a white golf shirt or T-shirt with some red on it.

[7] Mr. Ward is a Vancouver lawyer who attended the August 1 ceremony. On the day, Mr. Ward, a white male, had grey, collar-length hair, was in his mid-40s and was wearing a grey T-shirt with some red on it. Based on his appearance, Mr. Ward was identified—mistakenly—as the would-be pie-thrower. When the VPD officers noticed him, Mr. Ward was running and appeared to be avoiding interception. The officers chased Mr. Ward down and handcuffed him. Mr. Ward loudly protested his detention and created a disturbance, drawing the attention of a local television camera crew. The television broadcast showed that Mr. Ward had a “very agitated look on his face,” “appeared to be yelling for the benefit of the onlookers” and was “holding back” as he was being escorted down the street.

[8] Mr. Ward was arrested for breach of the peace and taken to the police lockup in Vancouver, which was under the partial management of provincial corrections officers. Upon his arrival, the corrections officers instructed Mr. Ward to remove all his clothes in preparation for a strip search. Mr. Ward complied in part but refused to take off his underwear. The officers did not insist on complete removal and Mr. Ward was never touched during the search. After the search was completed, Mr. Ward was placed in a small cell where he spent several hours before being released.

[9] While Mr. Ward was at the lockup, VPD officers impounded his car for the purpose of searching it once a search warrant had been obtained. VPD detectives subsequently determined that they did not have grounds to obtain the required search warrant or evidence to charge Mr. Ward for attempted assault. Mr. Ward was released from the lockup approximately 4.5 hours after he was arrested and several hours after the Prime Minister had left Chinatown following the ceremony.

VI. Analysis

A. When Are Damages Under Section 24(1) Available?

(1) The Language of Section 24(1) and the Nature of Charter Damages

[16] Section 24(1) empowers courts of competent jurisdiction to grant “appropriate and just” remedies for Charter breaches. This language invites a number of observations.

[17] First, the language of the grant is broad. As McIntyre J. observed, “[i]t is difficult to imagine language which could give the court a wider and less fettered discretion”: Mills v. The Queen, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 863, at p. 965. The judge of “competent jurisdiction” has broad discretion to determine what remedy is appropriate and just in the circumstances of a particular case.

[18] Second, it is improper for courts to reduce this discretion by casting it in a strait-jacket of judicially prescribed conditions. To quote McIntyre J. in Mills once more, “[i]t is impossible to reduce this wide discretion to some sort of binding formula for general application in all cases, and it is not for appellate courts to pre-empt or cut down this wide discretion”: Mills, at p. 965.

[19] Third, the prohibition on cutting down the ambit of s. 24(1) does not preclude judicial clarification of when it may be “appropriate and just” to award damages. The phrase “appropriate and just” limits what remedies are available. The court’s discretion, while broad, is not unfettered. What is appropriate and just will depend on the facts and circumstances of the particular case. Prior cases may offer guidance on what is appropriate and just in a particular situation.

[20] The general considerations governing what constitutes an appropriate and just remedy under s. 24(1) were set out by Iacobucci and Arbour JJ. in Doucet-Boudreau v. Nova Scotia (Minister of Education), 2003 SCC 62, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 3. Briefly, an appropriate and just remedy will: (1) meaningfully vindicate the rights and freedoms of the claimants; (2) employ means that are legitimate within the framework of our constitutional democracy; (3) be a judicial remedy which vindicates the right while invoking the function and powers of a court; and (4) be fair to the party against whom the order is made: Doucet-Boudreau, at paras. 55-58.

[21] Damages for breach of a claimant's Charter rights may meet these conditions. They may meaningfully vindicate the claimant's rights and freedoms. They employ a means well-recognized within our legal framework. They are appropriate to the function and powers of a court. And, depending on the circumstances and the amount awarded, they can be fair not only to the claimant whose rights were breached, but to the state which is required to pay them. I therefore conclude that s. 24(1) is broad enough to include the remedy of damages for Charter breach. That said, granting damages under the Charter is a new endeavour, and an approach to when damages are appropriate and just should develop incrementally. Charter damages are only one remedy amongst others available under s. 24(1), and often other s. 24(1) remedies will be more responsive to the breach.

[22] The term "damages" conveniently describes the remedy sought in this case. However, it should always be borne in mind that these are not private law damages, but the distinct remedy of constitutional damages. As Thomas J. notes in Dunlea v. Attorney-General, [2000] NZCA 84, [2000] 3 N.Z.L.R. 136, at para. 81, a case dealing with New Zealand's Bill of Rights Act 1990, an action for public law damages "is not a private law action in the nature of a tort claim for which the state is vicariously liable but [a distinct] public law action directly against the state for which the state is primarily liable." In accordance with s. 32 of the Charter, this is equally so in the Canadian constitutional context. The nature of the remedy is to require the state (or society writ large) to compensate an individual for breaches of the individual's constitutional rights. An action for public law damages—including constitutional damages—lies against the state and not against individual actors. Actions against individual actors should be pursued in accordance with existing causes of action. However, the underlying policy considerations that are engaged when awarding private law damages against state actors may be relevant when awarding public law damages directly against the state. Such considerations may be appropriately kept in mind.

(2) Step One: Proof of a Charter Breach

[23] Section 24(1) is remedial. The first step, therefore, is to establish a Charter breach. This is the wrong on which the claim for damages is based.

(3) Step Two: Functional Justification of Damages

[24] A functional approach to damages finds damages to be appropriate and just to the extent that they serve a useful function or purpose. ...

[25] I therefore turn to the purposes that an order for damages under s. 24(1) may serve. For damages to be awarded, they must further the general objects of the Charter. This reflects itself in three interrelated functions that damages may serve. The function of compensation, usually the most prominent function, recognizes that breach of an individual's Charter rights may cause personal loss which should be remedied. The function of vindication recognizes that Charter rights must be maintained, and cannot be allowed to be whittled away by attrition. Finally, the function of deterrence recognizes that damages may serve to deter future breaches by state actors.

[30] In most cases, all three objects will be present. Harm to the claimant will evoke the need for compensation. Vindication and deterrence will support the compensatory function and bolster the appropriateness of an award of damages. However, the fact that the claimant has not suffered personal loss does not preclude damages where the objectives of vindication or deterrence clearly call for an award. Indeed, the view that constitutional damages are available only for pecuniary or physical loss has been widely rejected in other constitutional democracies

[31] In summary, damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter are a unique public law remedy, which may serve the objectives of: (1) compensating the claimant for loss and suffering caused by the breach; (2) vindicating the right by emphasizing its importance and the gravity of the breach; and (3) deterring state agents from committing future breaches. Achieving one or more of these objects is the first requirement for "appropriate and just" damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter.

(4) Step Three: Countervailing Factors

[32] As discussed, the basic requirement for the award of damages to be "appropriate and just" is that the award must be functionally required to fulfill one or more of the objects of compensation, vindication of the right, or deterrence of future Charter breaches.

[33] However, even if the claimant establishes that damages are functionally justified, the state may establish that other considerations render s. 24(1) damages inappropriate or unjust. A complete catalogue of countervailing considerations remains to be developed as the law in this area matures. At this point, however, two considerations are apparent: the existence of alternative remedies and concerns for good governance.

[34] A functional approach to damages under s. 24(1) means that if other remedies adequately meet the need for compensation, vindication and/or deterrence, a further award of damages under s. 24(1) would serve no function and would not be "appropriate and just." The Charter entered an existent remedial arena which already housed tools to correct violative state conduct. Section 24(1) operates concurrently with, and does not replace, these areas of law. Alternative remedies include private law remedies for actions for personal injury, other Charter remedies like declarations under s. 24(1), and remedies for actions covered by legislation permitting proceedings against the Crown.

[35] The claimant must establish basic functionality having regard to the objects of constitutional damages. The evidentiary burden then shifts to the state to show that the engaged functions can be fulfilled through other remedies. The claimant need not show that she has exhausted all other recourses. Rather, it is for the state to show that other remedies are available in the particular case that will sufficiently address the breach. For example, if the claimant has brought a concurrent action in tort, it is open to the state to argue that, should the tort claim be successful, the resulting award of damages would adequately address the Charter breach. If that were the case, an award of Charter damages would be duplicative. In addition, it is conceivable that another Charter remedy may, in a particular case, fulfill the function of Charter damages.

[36] The existence of a potential claim in tort does not therefore bar a claimant from obtaining damages under the Charter. Tort law and the Charter are distinct legal avenues. However, a concurrent action in tort, or other private law claim, bars s. 24(1) damages if the result would be double compensation: Simpson v. Attorney-General, [1994] 3 N.Z.L.R. 667 (C.A.), at p. 678.

[37] Declarations of Charter breach may provide an adequate remedy for the Charter breach, particularly where the claimant has suffered no personal damage. ...

[38] Another consideration that may negate the appropriateness of s. 24(1) damages is concern for effective governance. Good governance concerns may take different forms. At one extreme, it may be argued that any award of s. 24(1) damages will always have a chilling effect on government conduct, and hence will impact negatively on good governance. The logical conclusion of this argument is that s. 24(1) damages would never be appropriate. Clearly, this is not what the Constitution intends. Moreover, insofar as s. 24(1) damages deter Charter breaches, they promote good governance. Compliance with Charter standards is a foundational principle of good governance.

[39] In some situations, however, the state may establish that an award of Charter damages would interfere with good governance such that damages should not be awarded unless the state conduct meets a minimum threshold of gravity. This was the situation in Mackin v. New Brunswick (Minister of Finance), 2002 SCC 13, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 405, where the claimant sought damages for state conduct pursuant to a valid statute. The Court held that the action must be struck on the ground that duly enacted laws should be enforced until declared invalid, unless the state conduct under the law was "clearly wrong, in bad faith or an abuse of power": para. 78. The rule of law would be undermined if governments were deterred from enforcing the law by the possibility of future damage awards in the event the law was, at some future date, to be declared invalid. Thus, absent threshold misconduct, an action for damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter cannot be combined with an action for invalidity based on s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982: Mackin, at para. 81.

[40] The Mackin principle recognizes that the state must be afforded some immunity from liability in damages resulting from the conduct of certain functions that only the state can perform. Legislative and policy-making functions are one such area of state activity. The immunity is justified because the law does not wish to chill the exercise of policy-making discretion. As Gonthier J. explained:

The limited immunity given to government is specifically a means of creating a balance between the protection of constitutional rights and the need for effective government. In other words, this doctrine makes it possible to determine whether a remedy is appropriate and just in the circumstances. Consequently, the reasons that inform the general principle of public law are also relevant in a Charter context. [para. 79]

[41] The government argues that the Mackin principle applies in this case, and, in the absence of state conduct that is at least "clearly wrong," bars Mr. Ward's claim. I cannot accept this submission. Mackin stands for the principle that state action taken under a statute which is subsequently declared invalid will not give rise to public law damages because good governance requires that public officials carry out their duties under valid statutes without fear of liability in the event that the statute is later struck down. The present is not a situation of state action pursuant to a valid statute that was subsequently declared invalid. Nor is the rationale animating the Mackin principle—that duly enacted laws should be enforced until declared invalid—applicable in the present situation. Thus, the Mackin immunity does not apply to this case.

[42] State conduct pursuant to a valid statute may not be the only situation in which the state might seek to show that s. 24(1) damages would deter state agents from doing what is required for effective governance, although no others have been established in this case. It may be that in the future other situations may be recognized where the appropriateness of s. 24(1) damages could be negated on grounds of effective governance.

[45] If the claimant establishes breach of his Charter rights and shows that an award of damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter would serve a functional purpose, having regard to the objects of s. 24(1) damages, and the state fails to negate that the award is "appropriate and just," the final step is to determine the appropriate amount of the damages.

(5) Step Four: Quantum of Section 24(1) Damages

[46] The watchword of s. 24(1) is that the remedy must be "appropriate and just." This applies to the amount, or quantum, of damages awarded as much as to the initial question of whether damages are a proper remedy.

[47] As discussed earlier, damages may be awarded to compensate the claimant for his loss, to vindicate the right or to deter future violations of the right. These objects, the presence and force of which vary from case to case, determine not only whether damages are appropriate, but also the amount of damages awarded. Generally, compensation will be the most important object, and vindication and deterrence will play supporting roles. This is all the more so because other Charter remedies may not provide compensation for the claimant's personal injury resulting from the violation of his Charter rights. However, as discussed earlier, cases may arise where vindication or deterrence play a major and even exclusive role.

[48] Where the objective of compensation is engaged, the concern is to restore the claimant to the position she would have been in had the breach not been committed, as discussed above. As in a tort action, any claim for compensatory damages must be supported by evidence of the loss suffered.

[49] In some cases, the Charter breach may cause the claimant pecuniary loss. Injuries, physical and psychological, may require medical treatment, with attendant costs. Prolonged detention may result in loss of earnings. Restitutio in integrum requires compensation for such financial losses.

[50] In other cases, like this one, the claimant's losses will be non-pecuniary. Non-pecuniary damages are harder to measure. Yet they are not by that reason to be rejected. Again, tort law provides assistance. Pain and suffering are compensable. Absent exceptional circumstances, compensation is fixed at a fairly modest conventional rate, subject to variation for the degree of suffering in the particular case. In extreme cases of catastrophic injury, a higher but still conventionally determined award is given on the basis that it serves the function purpose of providing substitute comforts and pleasures

[51] When we move from compensation to the objectives of vindication and deterrence, tort law is less useful. Making the appropriate determinations is an exercise in rationality and proportionality and will ultimately be guided by precedent as this important chapter of Charter jurisprudence is written by Canada's courts. That said, some initial observations may be made.

[52] A principal guide to the determination of quantum is the seriousness of the breach, having regard to the objects of s. 24(1) damages. The seriousness of the breach must be evaluated with regard to the impact of the breach on the claimant and the seriousness of the state misconduct: see, in the context of s. 24(2), R. v. Grant, 2009 SCC 32, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 353. Generally speaking, the more egregious the conduct and the more serious the repercussions on the claimant, the higher the award for vindication or deterrence will be.

[53] Just as private law damages must be fair to both the plaintiff and the defendant, so s. 24(1) damages must be fair—or "appropriate and just"—to both the claimant and the state. The court must arrive at a quantum that respects this. Large awards and the consequent diversion of public funds may serve little functional purpose in terms of the claimant's needs and may be inappropriate or unjust from the public perspective. In considering what is fair to the claimant and the state, the court may take into account the public interest in good governance, the danger of deterring governments from undertaking beneficial new policies and programs, and the need to avoid diverting large sums of funds from public programs to private interests.

[55] In assessing s. 24(1) damages, the court must focus on the breach of Charter rights as an independent wrong, worthy of compensation in its own right. At the same time, damages under s. 24(1) should not duplicate damages awarded under private law causes of action, such as tort, where compensation of personal loss is at issue.

[56] A final word on exemplary or punitive damages. In Mackin, Justice Gonthier speculated that “[i]n theory, a plaintiff could seek compensatory and punitive damages by way of ‘appropriate and just’ remedy under s. 24(1) of the Charter”: para. 79. The reality is that public law damages, in serving the objects of vindication and deterrence, may assume a punitive aspect. Nevertheless, it is worth noting a general reluctance in the international community to award purely punitive damages

[57] To sum up, the amount of damages must reflect what is required to functionally serve the objects of compensation, vindication of the right and deterrence of future breaches, insofar as they are engaged in a particular case, having regard to the impact of the breach on the claimant and the seriousness of the state conduct. The award must be appropriate and just from the perspective of the claimant and the state.

B. Application to the Facts

[60] At trial, Justice Tysoe held that the provincial correction officers' strip search and the Vancouver Police Department's vehicle seizure violated Mr. Ward's right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure under s. 8 of the Charter. There are thus two distinct claims to consider.

(1) Damages for the Strip Search

[61] The first question is whether Mr. Ward has established entitlement to the s. 24(1) remedy of damages. This requires him to show: (1) a breach of his Charter rights; and (2) that an award of damages would serve a functional purpose in the circumstances, having regard to the objects of s. 24(1) damages. If these are established, the burden shifts to the state (step 3) to show why, having regard to countervailing factors, an award of damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter would be inappropriate. If the state fails to negate s. 24(1) damages, the inquiry moves to the final step, assessment of the appropriate amount of the damages.

[62] Here the first step is met. Justice Tysoe found that the strip search violated Mr. Ward's personal rights under s. 8 of the Charter. This finding is not challenged on this appeal. Nor is it suggested that the British Columbia Supreme Court is not an appropriate forum for the action.

[63] The second question is whether damages would serve a functional purpose by serving one or more of the objects of s. 24(1) damages—compensation, vindication and deterrence.

[64] In this case, the need for compensation bulks large. Mr. Ward's injury was serious. He had a constitutional right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure, which was violated in an egregious fashion. Strip searches are inherently humiliating and degrading regardless of the manner in which they are carried out and thus constitute significant injury to an individual's intangible interests: R. v. Golden, 2001 SCC 83, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 679, at para. 90.

[65] The corrections officers' conduct which caused the breach of Mr. Ward's Charter rights was also serious. Minimum sensitivity to Charter concerns within the context of the particular situation would have shown the search to be unnecessary and violative. Mr. Ward did not commit a serious offence, he was not charged with an offence associated with evidence being hidden on the body, no weapons were involved and he was not known to be violent or to carry weapons. Mr. Ward did not pose a risk of harm to himself or others, nor was there any suggestion that any of the officers believed that he did. In these circumstances, a reasonable person would understand that the indignity resulting from the search was disproportionate to any benefit which the search could have provided. In addition, without asking officers to be conversant with the details of court rulings, it is not too much to expect that police would be familiar with the settled law that routine strip searches are inappropriate where the individual is being held for a short time in police cells, is not mingling with the general prison population, and where the police have no legitimate concerns that the individual is concealing weapons that could be used to harm themselves or others

[66] In sum, the Charter breach significantly impacted on Mr. Ward's person and rights and the police conduct was serious. The impingement on Mr. Ward calls for compensation. Combined with the police conduct, it also engages the objects of vindication of the right and deterrence of future breaches. It follows that compensation is required in this case to functionally fulfill the objects of public law damages.

[67] The next question is whether the state has established countervailing factors that would render s. 24(1) damages inappropriate or unjust.

[68] The state has not established that alternative remedies are available to achieve the objects of compensation, vindication or deterrence with respect to the strip search. Mr. Ward sued the officers for assault, as well as the City and the Province for negligence. These claims were dismissed and their dismissal was not appealed to this Court. While this defeated Mr. Ward's claim in tort, it did not change the fact that his right under s. 8 of the Charter to be secure against unreasonable search and seizure was violated. No tort action was available for that violation and a declaration will not satisfy the need for compensation. Mr. Ward's only recourse is a claim for damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter. Nor has the state established that an award of s. 24(1) damages is negated by good governance considerations, such as those raised in Mackin.

[69] I conclude that damages for the strip search of Mr. Ward are required in this case to functionally fulfill the objects of public law damages, and therefore are prima facie "appropriate and just." The state has not negated this. It follows that damages should be awarded for this breach of Mr. Ward's Charter rights.

[70] This brings us to the issue of quantum. As discussed earlier, the amount of damages must reflect what is required to functionally fulfill the relevant objects of s. 24(1) compensation, while remaining fair to both the claimant and the state.

[71] The object of compensation focuses primarily on the claimant's personal loss: physical, psychological, pecuniary, and harm to intangible interests. The claimant should, in so far as possible, be placed in the same position as if his Charter rights had not been infringed. Strip searches are inherently humiliating and thus constitute a significant injury to an individual's intangible interests regardless of the manner in which they are carried out. That said, the present search was relatively brief and not extremely disrespectful, as strip searches go. It did not involve the removal of Mr. Ward's underwear or the exposure of his genitals. Mr. Ward was never touched during the search and there is no indication that he suffered any resulting physical or psychological injury. While Mr. Ward's injury was serious, it cannot be said to be at the high end of the spectrum. This suggests a moderate damages award.

[72] The objects of vindication and deterrence engage the seriousness of the state conduct. The corrections officers' conduct was serious and reflected a lack of sensitivity to Charter concerns. That said, the officers' action was not intentional, in that it was not malicious, high-handed or oppressive. In these circumstances, the objects of vindication and deterrence do not require an award of substantial damages against the state.

[73] Considering all the factors, including the appropriate degree of deference to be paid to the trial judge's exercise of remedial discretion, I conclude that the trial judge's $5,000 damage award was appropriate.

(2) Damages for the Car Seizure

[77] The object of compensation is not engaged by the seizure of the car. The trial judge found that Mr. Ward did not suffer any injury as a result of the seizure. His car was never searched and, upon his release from lockup, Mr. Ward was driven to the police compound to pick up the vehicle. Nor are the objects of vindication of the right and deterrence of future breaches compelling. While the seizure was wrong, it was not of a serious nature. The police officers did not illegally search the car, but rather arranged for its towing under the impression that it would be searched once a warrant had been obtained. When the officers determined that they did not have grounds to obtain the required warrant, the vehicle was made available for pickup.

[78] I conclude that a declaration under s. 24(1) that the vehicle seizure violated Mr. Ward's right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure under s. 8 of the Charter adequately serves the need for vindication of the right and deterrence of future improper car seizures.

VII. Disposition

[79] The appeal is allowed in part. The award against the City in the amount of $100 is set aside, substituted by a declaration under s. 24(1) that the vehicle seizure violated Mr. Ward's right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure under s. 8 of the Charter. The award of damages against the Province in the sum of $5,000 for breach of Mr. Ward's s. 8 Charter rights is confirmed.

Appeal allowed in part.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The clear four-part structure in Ward for awarding damages under s 24(1) of the Charter is not applied in all cases. If harm is caused by legislation that is found to be unconstitutional, damages will be awarded under s 24(1) only if, in addition to a Charter violation and a functional justification for the award of damages, the state has "acted negligently, in bad faith or by abusing its powers": Mackin v New Brunswick (Minister of Finance); Rice v New Brunswick, 2002 SCC 13 at para 82. This additional fault requirement is related to the Court's reluctance to combine a s 24(1) remedy (damages) with a declaration of invalidity under s 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. It is also related to a sense that, when legislating, the state should benefit from both a presumption that its laws are constitutional and a qualified immunity. Some state actors may benefit from a qualified immunity, even in cases where legislation does not specifically authorize actions that violate the Charter. In Henry v British Columbia (AG), 2015 SCC 24, a majority of the Court imposed a fault requirement just short of malice when an applicant sought damages under s 24(1) for the prosecutor's failure to disclose material. Justice Moldaver stressed that such a fault requirement was necessary, in addition to a Charter violation, to ensure that prosecutorial conduct was not chilled. The Chief Justice dissented and, as in Ward, would not have required fault in addition to the Charter violation. Note that fault requirements or qualified immunities as contemplated by the Court in both Mackin and Henry do not provide absolute immunity. A trial judge subsequently held that prosecutors had failed to make disclosure with the sufficient level of fault and awarded Henry, who had been wrongfully convicted and imprisoned for 23 years, $7.5 million in damages under s 24(1) in order to vindicate his Charter rights and deter similar violations in the future: Henry v British Columbia, 2016 BCSC 1038.

2. In Conseil scolaire francophone de la Colombie-Britannique v British Columbia, 2020 SCC 13, the Supreme Court refused to extend the Mackin qualified immunity that protects governments from having to pay damages imposed by unconstitutional laws unless they act with fault such as an abuse of power or bad faith to all governmental policies that authorized violations of Charter rights. Chief Justice Wagner stated for the majority:

[166] The trial judge awarded damages to the CSF as a remedy for the infringement of s. 23 resulting from the inadequate funding of school transportation. The Court of Appeal, relying on Ward and Mackin, reversed the trial judge's decision and cited the government's limited immunity in this regard. It held that concerns for good governance justify affording governments immunity for decisions made in accordance with any type of government policy that is subsequently found to constitute an infringement. In my view, this was an error. There is no government immunity for decisions made in accordance with government policies.

[172] An overly broad application of the limited government immunity could in fact have undesirable effects. It would permit a government to avoid liability for damages simply by showing that its unlawful actions are authorized by its policies.

[173] This concern is accentuated by the fact that government policies do not usually result from a public process and that the "government policy" concept has not been defined. Does it concern any form of directives or guidelines issued by the government? If so, the immunity the Court is being asked to recognize would be very broad. In contrast, a law is an easily identifiable instrument. It is the product of a vote taken by a legislative body. The preparation of a law is a transparent public process that is central to the democratic process. It is therefore appropriate to give the government, in respect of a well-defined instrument such as a law, an immunity that it is nonetheless inadvisable to give it for undefined instruments with unclear limits, such as government policies. The latter approach would reduce the chances of obtaining access to justice and an appropriate and just remedy for individuals whose rights have been infringed. The effect of expanding the scope of the government immunity like this is that bringing an action for damages in response to a Charter infringement would become illusory.

Justices Brown and Rowe would have extended the Mackin qualified immunity to violations authorized by governmental policies with the exception of s 23 of the Charter because that right explicitly mandates positive action. They argued:

[285] Before this Court, the appellants have argued that Mackin immunity applies only to legislation—not to policies. The Chief Justice shares this view. We respectfully disagree. We say that the immunity generally applies to policies. Indeed, while our colleague sees this issue as never before having been considered (at para. 169), this Court's jurisprudence has consistently framed this principle in broad terms that encompass policies. Moreover, the same rationale is engaged regardless of the vehicle for governmental action. We say respectfully that this jurisprudence should be viewed as dispositive of the broad issue of whether Mackin applies to policies. As we will discuss, however, an exception is warranted for s. 23.

[286] In Mackin itself, the Court formulated the immunity in undeniably broad terms:

According to a general rule of public law, absent conduct that is clearly wrong, in bad faith or an abuse of power, the courts will not award damages for the harm suffered as a result of the mere enactment or application of a law that is subsequently declared to be unconstitutional ... In other words "i]nvalidity of governmental action, without more, clearly should not be a basis for liability for harm caused by the action" ... In the legal sense, therefore, both public officials and legislative bodies enjoy limited immunity against actions in civil liability based on the fact that a legislative instrument is invalid. [Emphasis added; emphasis in original deleted; citations omitted; para. 78.]

Do you agree that Mackin settled the issue and that qualified immunity applies when a Charter violation was authorized by policies developed by the executive and not just on the basis of violations authorized by legislation? Should it? Is any qualified immunity that requires a Charter applicant to establish governmental fault in addition to a Charter violation and a need for damages to compensate, vindicate or deter Charter violations even necessary given the third countervailing factor stage of the analysis in Ward? Note that qualified immunity often prevents the award of damages for violations of rights in the American Bill of Rights. The George Floyd Justice in Policing Act (HR 1280—117th Congress (2021–22), not enacted by both houses of Congress) passed by the House of Representatives but not the Senate would repeal qualified immunity.

3. Constitutional damage awards in the United States are driven by a concern about over-deterring individual governmental officials in the exercise of their duties. Are these concerns compelling under Ward, where damages were awarded not against individual officials but against the state directly? For arguments that the system of awarding damages against governments is superior because it allows the government to take steps to minimize the costs of violations, see Peter H Shuck, Suing Government (New Haven, Conn: Yale University Press, 1983).

4. To what extent does the third part of the Ward analysis, which allows the government to demonstrate that damages are not appropriate because of good governance concerns and the availability of alternative remedies, resemble the analysis under s 1 of the Charter? Can proportionality principles taken from s 1 help guide and make more transparent the exercise of remedial discretion? On this, see Kent Roach, "A Late Spring: Charter Damages After Ward v Vancouver" (2011) 29 NJCL 145.

5. One issue with respect to damages is how courts should value violation of Charter rights. In particular, concerns have been expressed that the quantum of $5,000 damages awarded in Ward was too low in light of the serious violation caused by the unconstitutional strip search as well as the economics of litigation, especially in cases where the government, if successful, could claim costs from the unsuccessful plaintiff. Should higher damages be awarded? Would this raise concerns about impinging on good governance? Note that because of the generally low quantum of Charter damage awards that such claims are increasingly aggregated in the form of class actions.

I. NEGOTIATING A CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT PROCEDURE

The year is 1864. You are a legal advisor to one of the delegates at the Charlottetown Conference, a key meeting that would lead to Confederation in 1867. Delegates at this conference have agreed to discuss the terms of union, including the rules that would ultimately appear in what we identify today as the Constitution Act, 1867. In the briefing materials you prepare for the delegate for whom you work, do you offer advice on how to design a procedure that will allow Canadians in the future to make alterations to the Constitution Act, 1867 after it later becomes law? If yes, why is it important to specify such a procedure in advance? If no, what do you gain and lose by keeping the Constitution Act, 1867 silent on how it can be revised?

Assume you have prepared advice on how to design a procedure to alter what would become the Constitution Act, 1867. What is the content of your advice? Do you include specific details about who may initiate the change, who may ratify the change, and who may promulgate the change? Do you include limitations on what in the initial text can later be changed? And what about the possibility of changing the Constitution Act, 1867 during periods of emergency: does your advice make it easier or harder to make changes at a time of stress, trauma, and presumably of great need in the country?

Class activity: Assemble yourselves into separate groups, each representing a different set of delegates at the Charlottetown Conference. Try to negotiate an agreement on whether to include such a procedure in the Constitution Act, 1867, and also on the finer points of the procedure. Did you succeed? What challenges did you encounter? What opportunities did you identify for common ground? In preparation for your negotiations, you may find it useful to read this overview of constitutional amendment: Markus Böckenförde, Constitutional Amendment Procedures: International IDEA Constitution-Building Primer 10, 2nd ed (Stockholm, Sweden: IDEA, 2017), online (pdf): <<https://www.idea.int/sites/default/files/publications/constitutional-amendment-procedures-primer.pdf>>.

As you read the materials in this chapter, keep in mind your early intuitions and expectations about whether, why, and how to create a procedure to update the Constitution Act, 1867 and other constitutional laws that form part of the Constitution of Canada. Does the way Canadians amend the Constitution align with your first intuitions and expectations?

Our objective for this chapter is to introduce you to the design, history, and operation of constitutional amendment in Canada, with specific attention to how the relevant case law and academic analysis evaluates how the Constitution of Canada manages to balance enough flexibility to allow for change when it is needed but rigid enough to protect the fundamental commitments of the Constitution from easy repeal or replacement.

II. INTRODUCTION: WHY AMEND?

A constitution and procedures for its amendment are like hockey and pucks—one can hardly work as it is supposed to without the other. It is no surprise, then, that only a few of the world's constitutions—by one count fewer than 4 percent—do not codify amendment procedures authorizing alterations to their text: see Francesco Giovannoni, "Amendment Rules in Constitutions" (2003) 115 Public Choice 37 at 37. Why do almost all constitutional designers choose to write amendment procedures into their constitutional texts? There is certainly some soft pressure to conform to what appears to be a global norm of entrenching rules of constitutional amendment. But "other constitutions have them, so ours should too" just does not seem like a good enough reason to justify including anything in a constitution, especially because the process of constitution-making ordinarily involves fiercely competing interests, finite time and resources, and high costs in the event of failure.

The main purpose of amendment is evident in the word itself. The verb "to amend" derives from the Latin emendare, meaning "to free from fault": see Walter W Skeat, A Concise Etymological Dictionary of the English Language (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1885) at 133. Where a political community identifies something in need of updating in its codified constitution or discovers an outright error in its text, the actors authorized to amend the constitution can initiate the process of constitutional amendment to free their constitution from the observed fault without having to write an altogether new constitution. This orderly process of piece-meal and peaceful constitutional change has many advantages over its alternatives. Would anyone prefer to live with a faulty constitution unsuited to the times or to risk outright revolutionary change accompanied perhaps by violence and the need to start from scratch?

Not all constitutional amendments are adopted in an orderly process, nor are they all done in piecemeal fashion. Here in Canada, as we show in Section III of this chapter, the successful patriation of the Constitution in 1982 and the failed Meech Lake and Charlottetown accords were far from orderly, and they were all efforts at wholesale constitutional transformation. These exceptions to how constitutional amendment has typically unfolded in Canada reinforce the rule that the procedures for constitutional amendment are designed to provide a clear and actionable roadmap for the amending actors to respond to the changing political, social, and economic needs of the country. At their best, amendment procedures in constitutional democracies aggregate and translate popular preferences into constitutional rules while balancing these preferences against the larger backdrop of a commitment to constitutionalism, human rights, and the rule of law.

Still, as Peter Hogg has quite rightly observed, “[i]t is always difficult to amend a country’s constitution”: see Peter W Hogg, “The Difficulty of Amending the Constitution of Canada” (1993) 31 Osgoode Hall LJ 41 at 60. Yet whether the process of amendment is ever successfully used, it is still important for a constitution to include amendment procedures. Perhaps the most basic motivation is to distinguish the constitutional text from ordinary law. Constitutions are generally altered only with recourse to procedures that are more demanding than the simple majority votes required to change or repeal an ordinary statute. Constitutions can confer fundamental rights and freedoms, create and constrain public institutions, and establish rules for the exercise of democracy. It is commonly asserted that the content of constitutions ought to be insulated from change by the variable whims of electoral majorities. Do you agree?

III. CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT IN CANADA BEFORE 1982

The power of constitutional amendment is an important marker of sovereignty. As the materials that follow show, until 1982, this power was not fully exercisable by Canadian actors.

A. CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT AT CONFEDERATION

The British North America Act, 1867 (BNA Act; since renamed the Constitution Act, 1867) did not include a procedure for its own amendment in Canada by Canadian actors. The Act instead remained amendable by the same body that had written it to begin with—the Parliament of the United Kingdom. There were a few exceptions. First, s 92(1) of the 1867 Act (since repealed) authorized a provincial legislature to amend its own constitution as to the matters falling within its jurisdiction. And s 101 of the Act authorized the Parliament of Canada to make amendments concerning courts:

101. The Parliament of Canada may, notwithstanding anything in this Act, from Time to Time, provide for the Constitution, Maintenance, and Organization of a General Court of Appeal for Canada, and for the Establishment of any additional Courts for the better Administration of the Laws of Canada.

When compared with the otherwise plenary amendment power of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, these narrow domestic powers were a reminder that the BNA Act was essentially a colonial statute. The British Statute of Westminster later began to transform the Act from a colonial statute to a quasi-constitution. As discussed in Chapter 1, Introduction, the Statute of Westminster provided that no subsequent British statute would apply to Canada unless it had been enacted at the request and with the consent of Canada. Canadian legislative bodies were also authorized to repeal or amend imperial statutes applicable to Canada, with one major exception: the BNA Act. The result was that the Parliament of the United Kingdom retained its power over constitutional amendments to the most significant parts of the Constitution of Canada. But this exception was softened by a practice, adopted at the 1930 imperial conference, that the Parliament of the United Kingdom would amend the Constitution of Canada only at the request and with the consent of Canada. See William Livingston, "The Amending Power of the Canadian Parliament" (1951) 45 Am Polit Sci Rev 437 at 437, 438, 441.

In 1949, the Parliament of the United Kingdom passed the British North America (No 2) Act, 1949, which conferred on the Parliament of Canada the power to amend, by simple majority, a limited category of matters concerning the "Constitution of Canada." The amendment was inserted into the British North America Act, 1867, as s 91(1):

91. ... [T]he exclusive Legislative Authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,

(1) The amendment from time to time of the Constitution of Canada, except as regards matters coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the provinces, or as regards rights or privileges by this or any other Constitutional Act granted or secured to the Legislature or the Government of a province, or to any class of persons with respect to schools or as regards the use of the English or the French language or as regards the requirements that there shall be a session of the Parliament of Canada at least once each year, and that no House of Commons shall continue for more than five years from the day of the return of the Writs for choosing the House: provided, however, that a House of Commons may in time of real or apprehended war, invasion or insurrection be continued by the Parliament of Canada if such continuation is not opposed by the votes of more than one-third of the members of such House.

Some critics feared that the amendment would allow the Parliament of Canada to amend the Constitution in respect of matters of importance to provinces without their consent. FR Scott explored the basis for this concern in an important article published the year after the amendment was adopted:

It is clear that the refusal of the Canadian government to consult with the provinces before the adoption of the amendment, as urged by the Conservative party and by several provincial premiers, indicates its rejection of the compact theory of Confederation. Mr. St. Laurent in effect admitted this ... though he stressed that his proposal involved no change except a change of the venue where the amendments can be made, since only matters "within the exclusive concern of the federal authorities" were being dealt with. As no one knows, however, just what such matters may be, and as the provinces might take a different view from that of the Canadian government, or even of the Supreme Court were the question referred to it, we must consider this unilateral action by the federal Parliament as further evidence against the claims of those who would treat the constitution as a compact, either in law or in political theory.

As already noted, the federal amending power is an all-inclusive power, the "amendment from time to time of the Constitution of Canada," subject to certain exceptions. The phrase "the Constitution of Canada" includes the provincial constitutions. There is no separate "federal" constitution; the constitution is a single body of law setting up and apportioning authority to different organs of the state, some federal and some provincial. If the section had stopped there, it would have crystallized into law the present practice by which, through the joint address, Ottawa can secure any amendment it desires from the Parliament of the United Kingdom. But the section goes on to [stipulate] that the federal power of amendment shall not extend over [a number of subjects]

In thus limiting its amending powers the federal Parliament has indicated its willingness to give a protection to provincial and minority rights which did not formerly exist. Formerly, only convention restrained Parliament from requesting any amendment—even one affecting so fundamental a right as the right to the two official languages in section 133 of the British North America Act. Now Parliament has withdrawn certain defined classes of matters from its competence, leaving them to be amended by a process to be agreed upon at the Dominion–provincial conference. ... However, should there be a failure to achieve agreement on the amending procedure for matters falling within any of the excepted classes ... , then presumably the former conventional method of amendment in London after a joint address from Ottawa will continue. This would indeed create an anomalous situation, since Ottawa would then possess both processes of amendment itself—one, over exclusively federal matters, by its own legislation, and the other, over all other matters, by joint address that Westminster cannot refuse to implement. In either case a mere majority vote in both Houses is sufficient for the adoption of the amendment. There may be political wisdom in consulting with the provinces before adopting a joint address requesting an amendment affecting provincial rights, but there is certainly no legal necessity for so doing.

See FR Scott, "The British North America (No 2) Act, 1949" (1950) 8 UTLJ 201 at 201, 202, 203-4. As Scott notes, the Parliament of Canada did not consult the provinces about the 1949 amendment. Should it have? On the one hand, the amendment did not affect the powers or prerogatives of the provinces, so on what basis could the provinces object? On the other hand, the amendment conferred a power that, as Scott suggests, Parliament could conceivably deploy to amend the Constitution in respect of provincial matters. Had you been a legal adviser to Prime Minister St Laurent at the time, would you have advised him to consult with the provinces? What information would assist you in making such a determination?

B. TOWARD A DOMESTIC AMENDMENT PROCEDURE

The 1949 amendment did not withdraw from the Parliament of the United Kingdom the power to formalize constitutional amendments to the Constitution of Canada. But by then, the power of constitutional amendment in Canada was divided—Canada would approve the amendment before officially requesting its entrenchment by the Parliament of the United Kingdom, and the United Kingdom, no longer able to exercise the discretion to deny Canada's request, would thereafter formalize the constitutional amendment by passing a parliamentary statute.

There remained the question how Canada might forward an amendment concerning matters of federal–provincial concern. It was clear that the Parliament of Canada had the legal authority to make the request unilaterally. But only a multilateral process of federal–provincial consultation and approval could clothe it with the necessary political authority. By 1965, four general principles could be identified from a historical study of the procedures that had been used since Confederation to make amendments to the BNA Act:

The first general principle ... is that [n]o Act of the United Kingdom Parliament affecting Canada is therefore passed unless it is requested and consented to by Canada. Conversely, every amendment requested by Canada in the past has been enacted.

The second general principle is that the sanction of Parliament is required for a request to the British Parliament for an amendment to the British North America Act. This principle ... has not been violated since 1895. The procedure invariably is to seek amendments by a joint Address to the Canadian House of Commons and Senate to the Crown.

The third general principle is that no amendment to Canada's Constitution will be made by the British Parliament merely upon the request of a Canadian province.

The fourth general principle is that the Canadian Parliament will not request an amendment directly affecting federal–provincial relationships without prior consultation and agreement with the provinces. This principle did not emerge as early as others but since 1907, and particularly since 1930, has gained increasing recognition and acceptance. The nature and degree of provincial participation in the amending process, however, have not lent themselves to easy definition.

There have been five instances—in 1907, 1940, 1951, 1960 and 1964—of federal consultation with all provinces on matters of direct concern to all of them. There has been only one instance up to the present time in which an amendment was sought after consultation with only those provinces directly affected by it. This was the amendment of 1930, which transferred to the Western provinces natural resources that had been under the control of the federal government since their admission to Confederation. There have been ten instances [in 1871, 1875, 1886, 1895, 1915, 1916, 1943, 1946, and twice in 1949] of amendments to the Constitution without prior consultation with the provinces on matters that the federal government considered were of exclusive federal concern. In the last four of these, one or two provinces protested that federal–provincial consultations should have taken place prior to action by Parliament.

See Guy Favreau, The Amendment of the Constitution of Canada (Ottawa: Queen's Printer, 1965) at 15–16. As we will see below, in Section IV, Constitutional Amendment After 1982, the fourth general principle would feature prominently in the Supreme Court of Canada's reasons in Re: Resolution to amend the Constitution, [1981] 1 SCR 753, 1981 CanLII 25 [Patriation Reference].

Whether the practice of prior provincial consultation had matured into a convention was critical to designing a fully domestic amendment procedure for Canada. If it had, there would be a political requirement to entrench the convention into the amendment process. But had the practice been a mere practice all along—not a convention—there would be less pressure as a political matter, and certainly none rooted in constitutional law, to translate the practice into a constitutionally entrenched rule requiring provincial consultation for constitutional amendments involving matters of federal–provincial relations.

Serious efforts to design a domestic process of constitutional amendment had begun even before the coming into force of the Statute of Westminster. There were nearly 15 failed attempts to negotiate a constitutional amendment procedure. Spurred by the Balfour Report in 1926, the prime minister and the premiers of the provinces gathered the next year at an intergovernmental conference to begin the work of “patriating” the Constitution.

The search for an amending formula became known as the patriation debate.

Agreement on amending procedures would allow Canadians to “patriate” the Constitution. The words “patriate” and “patriation” were devised by Canadians (as an alternative to “repatriate” or “repatriation”) to acknowledge the legal reality that the British North America Act, 1867, although largely developed by British North Americans in British North America, had never been legally domiciled in Canada and subsequently sent abroad. Hence, legally, the Constitution could not be repatriated or brought back home again after an absence. This legal distinction did not affect French language usage in Canada, which consistently employed the word “rapatriement.”

The patriation debate, launched by the Balfour Report in 1926, would be marked by many attempts to resolve the issue and would last 56 years. Canada would become, with the adoption of the Statute of Westminster in 1931, an independent state in all respects except that the British Parliament would retain legislative authority over the British North America Act and its amendments, until the patriation issue was concluded in 1982.

See James Ross Hurley, Amending Canada's Constitution: History, Processes, Problems and Prospects (Ottawa: Minister of Supply and Services Canada, 1996) at 25. For a detailed account of the many steps toward Canada's adoption of its new process of constitutional amendment, see Hurley at 25–67.

Canadian actors tried and tried again until they finally succeeded, almost six decades later, in bringing the Constitution home. Their efforts culminated with the adoption of the Constitution Act, 1982, which included in its text a complicated escalating structure of constitutional amendment, reviewed in Section IV, which follows.

Class activity: Hurley details over one dozen failed efforts to negotiate a homegrown plan for patriation. See Hurley, Amending Canada's Constitution at 25-67, online (pdf): <http://publications.gc.ca/collections/collection_2014/priv/CP32-63-1995-eng.pdf>. Pick one of those failed attempts and conduct additional research about it. Why was that specific plan inadequate to rally the agreement of all actors? What could have been done to reach an agreement on your chosen proposal? Was it missing something essential, or did it include something disqualifying?

IV. CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT AFTER 1982

A. DESIGN ISSUES

If you participated in the class activity on the 1864 Charlottetown negotiations (see Section I, above), you would have recognized the many difficult issues that arise in designing an amending formula.

In the Canadian context, two have predominated. The first is the locus of sovereignty—that is, what or who should be vested with the power of constitutional amendment. Should the power be directly vested with citizens, or with the governments that are accountable to them? If the former, should an elected constituent assembly deliberate on constitutional amendments in advance of voting on them, or would ratification by a popular referendum with universal suffrage suffice? If the latter, are legislative assemblies the appropriate governmental institutions, and if so, given the federal nature of our polity, should some combination of legislative assemblies (both provincial and federal) be necessary to achieve constitutional change? Should certain groups, such as Indigenous peoples in Canada, be required to consent to amendments affecting their rights? As these questions make clear, identifying the locus of sovereignty for constitutional change is parasitic on an underlying conception of the nature of the political community whose terms of association are found in that constitutional document. And to the extent that there is a lack of an agreement on that conception—as is arguably the case in Canada—the process for constitutional amendment becomes a forum through which competing conceptions of the Canadian political community come into conflict.

Closely related to the first issue is a second: the correct balance to be struck between stability and flexibility. On the one hand, a constitution is meant to provide a framework within which the ordinary politics of political communities take place. If this framework were easily subject to change, it would be more difficult for it to provide a set of background rules for political decision-making. Moreover, since a constitution often addresses controversial issues, making constitutional change difficult arguably protects political decision-making because it reduces the capacity for constitutional politics to crowd out ordinary politics—that is, the politics of non-constitutional issues. On the other hand, a constitution that is too difficult to change may be incapable of responding to the changing nature of the political community or to fundamental challenges to the constitutional order itself. An overly rigid constitution risks becoming illegitimate, a “suicide pact,” rather than the foundation for the ongoing existence and functioning of a political order. The balance between stability and flexibility plays out in the level of support required for constitutional change. For example, should there be a super-majority requirement within legislative assemblies? Is a simple majority sufficient for referenda?

B. THE LAW AND CONVENTION OF PROVINCIAL CONSENT

The process for amending the Canadian Constitution—often referred to as the amending formula—has been a source of ongoing controversy. This exploded in 1980 when, in the face of failure to secure the agreement of the provinces on what would become the Constitution

Act, 1982, the federal government announced its intention to secure the necessary constitutional amendment without provincial consent.

The federal move prompted a series of constitutional references before several provincial courts of appeal that were heard together by the Supreme Court in the 1981 Patriation Reference, excerpted below. The provinces argued that Canadian constitutional practice had crystallized into a legal requirement for provincial consent to constitutional changes affecting provincial interests. The federal government took the position that no such consent was required. Moreover, the provinces made the additional argument that a constitutional convention existed for provincial consent, a position that the federal government rejected as well. A majority of the Court held, in a 7–2 ruling, that there was no legal requirement of provincial consent. But a slightly smaller six-person majority also held that a constitutional convention had been established requiring a “substantial degree” of provincial consent to amendments affecting the provinces’ interests.

Re: Resolution to amend the Constitution

[Reproduced first are the majority reasons on the issue of whether there was a legal requirement for provincial consent.]

LASKIN CJ and DICKSON, BEETZ, ESTEY, McINTYRE, CHOUINARD, and LAMER JJ:

The References in question here were prompted by the opposition of six provinces, later joined by two others, to a proposed Resolution which was published on October 2, 1980 and intended for submission to the House of Commons and as well to the Senate of Canada. It contained an address to be presented to Her Majesty the Queen in right of the United Kingdom respecting what may generally be referred to as the Constitution of Canada. The address laid before the House of Commons on October 6, 1980, was in these terms:

... An Act to give effect to a request by the Senate and House of Commons of Canada

Whereas Canada has requested and consented to the enactment of an Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom to give effect to the provisions hereinafter set forth and the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled have submitted an address to Her Majesty requesting that Her Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a Bill to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom for that purpose.

Be it therefore enacted by the Queen’s Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

1. The Constitution Act, 1981 set out in Schedule B to this Act is hereby enacted for and shall have the force of law in Canada and shall come into force as provided in that Act.
2. No Act of Parliament of the United Kingdom passed after the Constitution Act, 1981 comes into force shall extend to Canada as part of its law.
3. So far as it is not contained in Schedule B, the French version of this Act is set out in Schedule A to this Act and has the same authority in Canada as the English version thereof.
4. This Act may be cited as the Canada Act.

... The proposed Resolution, as the terms of the address indicate, includes a statute which, in turn, has appended to it another statute providing for the patriation of the British North America Act (and a consequent change of name), with an amending procedure, and a Charter of Rights and Freedoms including a range of provisions (to be entrenched against legislative invasion) which it is unnecessary to enumerate. ... Although there was general agreement on the desirability of patriation with an amending procedure, agreement could not be reached at conferences preceding the introduction of the proposed Resolution into the House of Commons, either on the constituents of such a procedure or on the formula to be embodied therein, or on the inclusion of a Charter of Rights.

There are two broad aspects to the matter under discussion which divide into a number of separate issues: (1) the authority of the two federal Houses to proceed by resolution where provincial powers and federal–provincial relationships are thereby affected and (2) the role or authority of the Parliament of the United Kingdom to act on the Resolution. The first point concerns the need of legal power to initiate the process in Canada; the second concerns legal power or want of it in the Parliament of the United Kingdom to act on the Resolution when it does not carry the consent of the provinces.

The submission of the eight provinces which invites this Court to consider the position of the British Parliament is based on the Statute of Westminster, 1931 in its application to Canada. The submission is that the effect of the Statute is to qualify the authority of the British Parliament to act on the federal Resolution without previous provincial consent where provincial powers and interests are thereby affected, as they plainly are here. This issue will be examined later in these reasons.

The proposition was advanced on behalf of the Attorney General of Manitoba that a convention may crystallize into law and that the requirement of provincial consent to the kind of resolution that we have here, although in origin political, has become a rule of law. (No firm position was taken on whether the consent must be that of the governments or that of the legislatures.)

In our view, this is not so. No instance of an explicit recognition of a convention as having matured into a rule of law was produced. The very nature of a convention, as political in inception and as depending on a consistent course of political recognition ... is inconsistent with its legal enforcement.

Turning now to the authority or power of the two federal Houses to proceed by resolution to forward the address and appended draft statutes to Her Majesty the Queen for enactment by the Parliament of the United Kingdom. There is no limit anywhere in law, either in Canada or in the United Kingdom (having regard to s. 18 of the British North America Act, as enacted by 1875 (U.K.), c. 38, which ties the privileges, immunities and powers of the federal Houses to those of the British House of Commons) to the power of the Houses to pass resolutions. Under s. 18 aforesaid, the federal Parliament may by statute define those privileges, immunities and powers, so long as they do not exceed those held and enjoyed by the British House of Commons at the time of the passing of the federal statute.

It is said, however, that where the resolution touches provincial powers, as the one in question here does, there is a limitation on federal authority to pass it on to Her Majesty the Queen unless there is provincial consent. If there is such a limitation, it arises not from any limitation on the power to adopt resolutions but from an external limitation based on other considerations which will shortly be considered.

• • •

For the moment, it is relevant to point out that even in those cases where an amendment to the British North America Act was founded on a resolution of the federal Houses after having received provincial consent, there is no instance, save in the British North America Act, 1930 where such consent was recited in the resolution. The matter remained, in short, a conventional one within Canada, without effect on the validity of the resolution in respect of United Kingdom action. ...

This Court is being asked, in effect, to enshrine as a legal imperative a principle of unanimity for constitutional amendment to overcome the anomaly—more of an anomaly today than it was in 1867—that the British North America Act contained no provision for effecting amendments by Canadian action alone. ...

The effect of those [provincial] views, if they are correct . . . , [is] to leave at least the formal amending authority in the United Kingdom Parliament. Reference will be made later to the ingredients of the arguments on legality. The effect of the present Resolution is to terminate any need to resort to the United Kingdom Parliament in the future. ...

The provincial contentions asserted a legal incapacity in the federal Houses to proceed with the Resolution which is the subject of the References and of the appeals here. Joined to this assertion was a claim that the United Kingdom Parliament had, in effect, relinquished its legal power to act on a resolution such as the one before this Court, and that it could only act in relation to Canada if a request was made by "the proper authorities." ... It is not that the provinces must be joined in the federal address to Her Majesty the Queen; that was not argued. Rather their consent (or, as in the Saskatchewan submission, substantial provincial compliance or approval) was required as a condition of the validity of the process by address and resolution and, equally, as a condition of valid action thereon by the United Kingdom Parliament.

The Court was invited to regard the Balfour Declaration of 1926 as embracing the provinces of Canada (and, presumably, the states of the sister dominion, Australia) in its reference to "autonomous communities." That well-known statement of principle ... is as follows:

They are autonomous Communities within the British Empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the Crown, and freely associated as members of the British Commonwealth of Nations.

It is impossible to seek nourishment for the provincial position in these appeals in this Declaration. The provinces did not come into the picture in the march to the Statute of Westminster, 1931 until after the 1929 Conference on the Operation of Dominion Legislation, although to a degree before the Imperial Conference of 1930. ...

Although the Balfour Declaration cannot, of itself, support the assertion of provincial autonomy in the wide sense contended for, it seems to have been regarded as retroactively having that effect by reason of the ultimate enactment of the Statute of Westminster, 1931 ... [which stated inter alia]:

2(1) The Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865, shall not apply to any law made after the commencement of this Act by the Parliament of a Dominion.

(2) No law and no provision of any law made after the commencement of this Act by the Parliament of a Dominion shall be void or inoperative on the ground that it is repugnant to the law of England, or to the provisions of any existing or future Act of Parliament of the United Kingdom, or to any order, rule or regulation made under any such Act, and the powers of the Parliament of a Dominion shall include the power to repeal or amend any such Act, order, rule or regulation in so far as the same is part of the law of the Dominion. ...

7(1) Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to apply to the repeal, amendment or alteration of the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1930, or any order, rule or regulation made thereunder.

(2) The provisions of section two of this Act shall extend to laws made by any of the Provinces of Canada and to the powers of the legislatures of such Provinces,

(3) The powers conferred by this Act upon the Parliament of Canada or upon the legislatures of the Provinces shall be restricted to the enactment of laws in relation to matters within the competence of the Parliament of Canada or of any of the legislatures of the Provinces respectively.

The Colonial Laws Validity Act was intended to be a liberating statute, releasing colonial legislatures from subservience to British common law (subject to Privy Council authority) and from subservience to British statute law unless such statute law applied expressly or by necessary implication to the colony. ... Following the Imperial Conference of 1930 and as a result of the Dominion–Provincial Conference of 1931, the provinces obtained an assurance that they too would benefit by the repeal of the Colonial Laws Validity Act and by being empowered to repeal any British legislation made applicable to them. This was achieved by s. 7(2) of the Statute of Westminster, 1931. There did not appear to be any need to include them in s. 4.

The most important issue was, however, the position of the Dominion vis-à-vis the British North America Act. What s. 7(1), reinforced by s. 7(3), appeared to do was to maintain the status quo ante; that is, to leave any changes in the British North America Act (that is, such changes which, under its terms, could not be carried out by legislation of the provinces or of the Dominion) to the prevailing situation, namely, with the legislative authority of the United Kingdom Parliament being left untouched. ...

It was also urged upon this Court that s. 7(1), which in terms ("Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to apply to ... the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1930") removes the British North America Act (at least as it then stood) from the application of any terms of the Statute of Westminster, 1931 was addressed to ss. 2 and 3 and not to s. 4. The argument goes that s. 7(1) does not exclude the application of s. 4; that s. 4 must be read in its preclusive effect on a dominion as having the provinces in view; that the "request and consent" which must be declared in a British statute to make it applicable to Canada, is the request and consent of the Dominion and the provinces if the statute is one affecting provincial interests or powers. ...

Nothing in the language of the Statute of Westminster, 1931 supports the provincial position yet it is on this interpretation that it is contended that the Parliament of the United Kingdom has relinquished or yielded its previous omnipotent legal authority in relation to the British North America Act, one of its own statutes. ...

At least with regard to the amending formula the process in question here concerns not the amendment of a complete constitution but rather the completion of an incomplete constitution.

We are involved here with a finishing operation Were it otherwise, there would be no need to resort to the Resolution procedure invoked here, a procedure which takes account of the intergovernmental and international link between Canada and Great Britain. There is no comparable link that engages the provinces with Great Britain. Moreover, it is to confuse the issue of process, which is the basic question here, with the legal competence of the British Parliament The legal competence of that Parliament, for the reasons already given, remains unimpaired, and it is for it alone to determine if and how it will act.

Support for a legal requirement of provincial ... is, finally, asserted to lie in the preamble of the British North America Act itself, and ... the nature of Canadian federalism. ...

What is stressed is the desire of the named provinces "to be federally united ... with a Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom." The preamble speaks also of union into "One Dominion" and of the establishment of the Union "by Authority of Parliament," that is the United Kingdom Parliament. What, then, is to be drawn from the preamble as a matter of law? A preamble, needless to say, has no enacting force but, certainly, it can be called in aid to illuminate provisions of the statute in which it appears. ...

There is not and cannot be any standardized federal system from which particular conclusions must necessarily be drawn. ... Allocations of legislative power differ as do the institutional arrangements through which power is exercised. This Court is being asked by the provinces which object to the so-called federal "package" to say that the internal distribution of legislative power must be projected externally, as a matter of law, although there is no legal warrant for this assertion and, indeed, what legal authority exists (as in s. 3 of the Statute of Westminster, 1931) denies this provincial position.

At bottom, it is this distribution, it is the allocation of legislative power as between the central Parliament and the provincial legislatures, that the provinces rely on as precluding unilateral federal action The Attorney General of Canada was pushed to the extreme by being forced to answer affirmatively the theoretical question whether in law the federal government could procure an amendment to the British North America Act that would turn Canada into a unitary state. That is not what the present Resolution envisages because the essential federal character of the country is preserved under the enactments proposed by the Resolution.

... There is here, however, an unprecedented situation in which the one constant since the enactment of the British North America Act in 1867 has been the legal authority of the United Kingdom Parliament to amend it. The law knows nothing of any requirement of provincial consent, either to a resolution of the federal Houses or as a condition of the exercise of United Kingdom legislative power.

What is central here is the untrammelled authority at law of the two federal Houses to proceed as they wish in the management of their own procedures and hence to adopt the Resolution which is intended for submission to Her Majesty for action thereon by the United Kingdom Parliament. The British North America Act does not, either in terms or by implication, control this authority or require that it be subordinated to provincial assent. Nor does the Statute of Westminster, 1931 interpose any requirement of such assent. ...

[The next excerpt is from the majority reasons on the issue of a constitutional convention requiring substantial provincial consent.]

MARTLAND, RITCHIE, DICKSON, BEETZ, CHOUINARD, and LAMER JJ:

... The issue raised by the question is essentially whether there is a constitutional convention that the House of Commons and Senate of Canada will not proceed alone. The thrust of the question is accordingly on whether or not there is a conventional requirement for provincial agreement, not on whether the agreement should be unanimous assuming that it is required. ...

The main purpose of constitutional conventions is to ensure that the legal framework of the constitution will be operated in accordance with the prevailing constitutional values or principles of the period

Being based on custom and precedent, constitutional conventions are usually unwritten rules. Some of them, however, may be reduced to writing and expressed in the proceedings and documents of imperial conferences, or in the preamble of statutes such as the Statute of Westminster, 1931, or in the proceedings and documents of federal–provincial conferences. They are often referred to and recognized in statements made by members of governments.

The conventional rules of the constitution present one striking peculiarity. In contradistinction to the laws of the constitution, they are not enforced by the courts. One reason for this situation is that, unlike common law rules, conventions are not judge-made rules. They are not based on judicial precedents but on precedents established by the institutions of government themselves. Nor are they in the nature of statutory commands which it is the function and duty of the courts to obey and enforce. Furthermore, to enforce them would mean to administer some formal sanction when they are breached. But the legal system from which they are distinct does not contemplate formal sanctions for their breach.

Perhaps the main reason why conventional rules cannot be enforced by the courts is that they are generally in conflict with the legal rules which they postulate and the courts are bound to enforce the legal rules.

It was submitted by counsel for Canada, Ontario and New Brunswick that there is no constitutional convention

It was submitted by counsel for Manitoba, Newfoundland, Quebec, Nova Scotia, British Columbia, Prince Edward Island and Alberta that the convention does exist, [and] that it requires the agreement of all the provinces and that the second question in the Manitoba

Counsel for Saskatchewan agreed that the question be answered in the affirmative but on a different basis. He submitted that the convention does exist and requires a measure of provincial agreement. Counsel for Saskatchewan further submitted that the Resolution before the Court has not received a sufficient measure of provincial consent.

We wish to indicate at the outset that we find ourselves in agreement with the submissions made on this issue by counsel for Saskatchewan.

... We adopt the following passage of Sir W. Ivor Jennings, The Law and the Constitution (5th ed., 1959), at p. 136:

We have to ask ourselves three questions: first, what are the precedents; secondly, did the actors in the precedents believe that they were bound by a rule; and thirdly, is there a reason for the rule? A single precedent with a good reason may be enough to establish the rule. A whole string of precedents without such a reason will be of no avail, unless it is perfectly certain that the persons concerned regarded them as bound by it.

[Here, the majority discussed the Favreau White Paper, mentioned above, and the various amendments made to the Constitution. They noted that five of twenty-two amendments "directly affected federal–provincial relationships in the sense of changing provincial legislative powers" (at 891), each of which "was agreed upon by each province whose legislative authority was affected" (at 893). The majority continued:]

In negative terms, no amendment changing provincial legislative powers has been made since Confederation when agreement of a province whose legislative powers would have been changed was withheld.

There are no exceptions.

In 1965, the White Paper had stated that

The nature and the degree of provincial participation in the amending process ... have not lent themselves to easy definition.

Nothing has occurred since then which would permit us to conclude in a more precise manner.

Nor can it be said that this lack of precision is such as to prevent the principle from acquiring the constitutional status of a conventional rule. If a consensus had emerged on the measure of provincial agreement, an amending formula would quickly have been enacted and we would no longer be in the realm of conventions. ...

Furthermore, the Government of Canada and the governments of the provinces have attempted to reach a consensus on a constitutional amending formula in the course of ten federal-provincial conferences held in 1927, 1931, 1935, 1950, 1960, 1964, 1971, 1978, 1979 and 1980 (see Gérald A. Beaudoin ... [Le partage des pouvoirs (Laval, Quebec: Laval University, 1980)], at p. 346). A major issue at these conferences was the quantification of provincial consent. No consensus was reached on this issue. But the discussion of this very issue for more than fifty years postulates a clear recognition by all the governments concerned of the principle that a substantial degree of provincial consent is required.

It would not be appropriate for the Court to devise in the abstract a specific formula which would indicate in positive terms what measure of provincial agreement is required for the convention to be complied with. Conventions by their nature develop in the political field and it will be for the political actors, not this Court, to determine the degree of provincial consent required.

It is sufficient for the Court to decide that at least a substantial measure of provincial consent is required and to decide further whether the situation before the Court meets with this requirement. The situation is one where Ontario and New Brunswick agree with the proposed amendments whereas the eight other provinces oppose it. By no conceivable standard could this situation be thought to pass muster. It clearly does not disclose a sufficient measure of provincial agreement. Nothing more should be said about this.

The federal character of the Canadian Constitution was recognized in innumerable judicial pronouncements. ...

The federal principle cannot be reconciled with a state of affairs where the modification of provincial legislative powers could be obtained by the unilateral action of the federal authorities. ...

It was contended by counsel for Canada, Ontario and New Brunswick that the proposed amendments would not offend the federal principle and that, if they became law, Canada would remain a federation. The federal principle would even be re-inforced, it was said, since the provinces would as a matter of law be given an important role in the amending formula.

It is true that Canada would remain a federation if the proposed amendments became law. But it would be a different federation made different at the instance of a majority in the Houses of the federal Parliament acting alone. It is this process itself which offends the federal principle.

We have reached the conclusion that the agreement of the provinces of Canada, no views being expressed as to its quantification, is constitutionally required for the passing of the "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" and that the passing of this Resolution without such agreement would be unconstitutional in the conventional sense.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Catalytic effect. This decision has been credited with forcing the federal government and the provinces back to the negotiating table because although the Court acknowledged the legality of a unilateral federal move, it effectively declared such a move illegitimate. The negotiations culminated in an agreement between the federal government and the nine provinces other than Quebec. In a later case raising the issue of whether Quebec's agreement to constitutional change was required for the requirement of substantial consent, the Court concluded that there was no convention of a Quebec veto—that is, Quebec need not grant consent for amendments to be valid: Re: Objection by Quebec to a Resolution to amend the Constitution, [1982] 2 SCR 793, 1982 CanLII 219.

2. Unanimous or substantial agreement? The Court relied on the Jennings test to evaluate whether a convention of provincial consent to amendments involving provincial legislative powers existed. Andrew Heard has observed that the Supreme Court appeared to assume that there must be a consistent and unanimous voice across the actors in order for a convention to exist. Such an assumption is not found in Jennings's writings on the subject or in subsequent academic discussions on the matter . . . Had the members of the Supreme Court looked at the broader literature from the 1960s and 1970s about constitutional amendment, they would have found a widespread belief that unanimity was considered necessary to any broad constitutional package being negotiated.

See Andrew Heard, Canadian Constitutional Conventions: The Marriage of Law and Politics (Toronto: Oxford University Press, 2014) at 176-77.

3. The precedents. The Court determined that only five of all previous amendments in Canada were relevant to determining whether, and if so, how much, provincial consent was required to make an amendment affecting federal–provincial relations. But there had been a total of 22 amendments to the BNA Act by the time the Court heard the Patriation Reference (reviewed in detail by the Court at 888-91). Should only 5 of these 22 previous amendments have been relevant to the Court's determination? Should all of them be examined to arrive at an answer? More than five? Fewer than five? Were some more relevant than others?

4. Conventions in courts. In the common law tradition, courts do not enforce conventions, but they do recognize them, as the Court did in the Patriation Reference. The Court (at 880-81) explained the basis for this distinction between enforcement and recognition (see above).

But does it really matter that the Court does not enforce a convention if it recognizes it as valid? Recognition may be an equally effective, albeit indirect, way of enforcing a convention, provided the Court is perceived by political actors and the public as authoritative on the matter.

And what is the difference between the authoritative recognition of the existence of a convention and its enforcement? Perhaps very little, as Farrah Ahmed, Richard Albert, and Adam Perry argue:

A rule may be enforced simply by drawing a person's attention, and if necessary the attention of the community, to her violation or would-be violation. Once a light is shone on her conduct in this way, the person may take it upon herself to either correct her behavior or to make amends. This is a mild response compared to other forms of enforcement. What nonetheless makes this a kind of enforcement is that the person has not been allowed to violate the rule without consequence.

If it seems strange to define declaration as a kind of enforcement, consider an example from England and Wales. A standard administrative law remedy is a declaration that an administrative act is unlawful. The declaration does not invalidate the act, nor does it lead to damages or the like, nor even does it impose any ongoing obligation. Even so, declarations ... are considered "one of the most important remedies in review proceedings." The reason is that the government almost invariably responds to a declaration by taking steps to avoid or correct for the illegality. Declarations enforce administrative law standards because the government is committed to acting lawfully, and because the government treats the court as an authority regarding its legal obligations Conventions can likewise be enforced by judges through declarations. Suppose there is a general legal duty to comply with conventions. If a constitutional actor breaks a convention, then (provided any conditions regarding standing, justiciability, and the like were satisfied) a complainant could obtain a declaration of illegality. The declaration would be a form of legal enforcement, because it would be an exercise of legal authority.

Conventions can also be enforced through declarations as a form of non-legal enforcement. The scenario we have in mind parallels the legal case: the would-be convention-violator is committed to complying with her conventional obligations, and the person or body making the declaration is regarded as an authority on what the convention requires. The authority need not be a court. In the United Kingdom, for example, the Ministerial Code contains most of the important conventions applicable to ministers. The arbiter of what the Code requires is the prime minister, and her decisions are treated by ministers as conclusive. When the prime minister declares that some act would contravene the Code, other actors treat the matter as settled, and act accordingly. In this way, the prime minister enforces the Code. But of course, a court could also be treated as an authority on conventions. In such a case, a court's declaration that an act is not convention-compliant would be a form of non-legal enforcement. Yet it would be a formal type of judicial enforcement.

[I]n the Patriation Reference, the Supreme Court stopped short of what it considered to be enforcing a convention. The Court believed that it could not enforce conventions because "they are generally in conflict with the legal rules which they postulate and the courts are bound to enforce the legal rules." The Court specified that "unlike common law rules, conventions are not judge-made rules. They are not based on judicial precedents but on precedents established by the institutions of government themselves. Nor are they in the nature of statutory commands which it is the function and duty of the courts to obey and enforce." And so, concluded the Court, "to enforce them would mean to administer some formal sanction when they are breached. But the legal system from which they are distinct does not contemplate formal sanctions for their breach." ...

The Court's declaration followed from a threatened violation of the convention. The declaration prevented the convention from being violated with impunity, given the political pressure the declaration placed on political actors, who ultimately tailored their conduct to the convention. The analysis of enforcement we offered in Section 2 of this article suggests that the Court's declaration in the Patriation Reference amounted to enforcement.

See Farrah Ahmed, Richard Albert & Adam Perry, "Judging Constitutional Conventions" (2019) 17 Int'l J Const L 787.

Indeed, as William Lederman has argued, judicial recognition of a convention may induce voluntary compliance:

I suggest that the non-enforceability of conventions by the Court is of only marginal importance, at least in nearly all situations. In nearly all cases, the power authoritatively to ... declare the terms of established constitutional conventions will be enough to attract voluntary compliance from the political actors. At the end of the day, if the prestige of the Supreme Court of Canada and the legitimacy of its power of judicial review in our federal system are widely accepted by the official political actors and by the people at large, the judicial declaration will induce willing compliance. If there is no such official and general acceptance of the role of the Court, what effective enforcement measures would be possible anyway? Fortunately, it appears that we do have this kind of acceptance in Canada.

See William Lederman, Comment: "The Supreme Court of Canada and Basic Constitutional Amendment: An Assessment of Reference Re Amendment of the Constitution of Canada (Nos 1, 2 and 3)" (1982) 27 McGill LJ 527 at 537-38.

The Court's choice to recognize a constitutional convention may not have been without consequence. According to Adam Dodek, the Supreme Court has "unnecessarily invited future controversy and conflict between the courts and the executive." Dodek actually suggests that what the Court did amounted to "declaration," something more than mere "recognition"—the Court has opened itself to the possibility that it would inaccurately articulate the relevant constitutional convention and thereby "set the stage for confusion, conflict and potential crisis": see Adam Dodek, "Courting Constitutional Danger: Constitutional Conventions and the Legacy of the Patriation Reference" (2011) 54 SCLR (2d) 117 at 131, 138, 141.

5. The case for unilateralism. The Court held hearings on April 28-30 and again on May 1 and 4, 1981, and issued its reasons on September 28 of the same year. This four-month period may have offered then Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau an opportunity to go it alone. This route was suggested by Bruce Ackerman and Robert Charney:

[W]hy didn't Trudeau call an extraordinary national referendum on the proposed Liberal constitution: Charter of Rights, patriation, amending procedure, the works? The Supreme Court had already made it impossible to repatriate by Canada's 114th Dominion Day on the sheer assertion of parliamentary sovereignty. Why waste the summer in the way it was wasted—for, as you will recall, constitutional discussion did in fact tend to peter out as Canadians turned their attention to the problems of energy pricing and a bank rate that was rising to record heights. ...

So far as we can tell, moreover, Trudeau might well have won such a referendum in a big way Indeed, such a referendum would have given Trudeau that wide electoral support from all regions of the country that his Liberal Party so evidently lacked in a normal parliamentary election. To make the mystery more complete, . . . the prime minister was perfectly aware of the legitimating power of a national referendum. His own proposal for replacing the constitution's interim amending procedure contemplated a special referendum if seven premiers, representing 80 per cent of the Canadian population, could agree on a counter-proposal to Trudeau's own general amending procedure. . . .

Why, then, did Trudeau not break the impasse caused by provincial opposition and judicial delay by calling the Canadian People to the polls to speak on the legitimacy of the Liberal constitution? . . . Wouldn't a landslide victory have vastly enhanced the perceived legitimacy of the liberal nationalist effort at repatriation?

See Bruce Ackerman & Robert Charney, "Canada at the Constitutional Crossroads" (1984) 34 UTLJ 117 at 128-30.

6. Autochthony. The view advanced by Ackerman and Charney appears to have been rooted in the concept of autochthony. As Peter Hogg explains:

[A]utochthony requires that a constitution be indigenous, deriving its authority solely from events within Canada. . . . The legal force of the Canada Act 1982 and the Constitution Act, 1982, like other United Kingdom statutes extending to Canada, depends upon the power over Canada of the United Kingdom Parliament. These instruments have an external rather than a local root. If patriation means the securing of constitutional autochthony, I conclude that it has not been achieved.

See Peter Hogg, "Patriation of the Canadian Constitution: Has It Been Achieved?" (1983) 8 Queen's LJ 123 at 125-26. Hogg did not believe that patriation made the Constitution of Canada autochthonous. Would a national referendum as suggested by Ackerman and Charney have done the trick? Is the Canadian Constitution autochthonous today? Does it matter if it is not?

7. Indigenous peoples. Can we consider patriation to have been "autochthonous" in the sense of deriving its authority from an inclusive process that gave voice to all persons? For Indigenous peoples, one scholar argues that patriation was both a "monumental achievement" and a "monumental defeat":

For Indigenous people, the Constitution Act, 1982 represents a contradiction or a constitutional paradox. It is both an instrument of colonization and an instrument of decolonization. Despite all of the efforts to place their issues on the constitutional table and protect Indigenous rights (ultimately through the inclusion of section 25 and 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982), most Aboriginal organizations viewed the amended constitution as a major defeat. All of the national and all but one provincial Indigenous organization (the Métis Association of Alberta) walked away from the constitutional table or rejected the amended constitution because it failed to offer sufficient protection to Indigenous peoples, or to enunciate an appropriate and detailed understanding of what sections 25 and 35 recognized, affirmed, and protected.

Although easily construed as a monumental defeat, patriation also represented a monumental victory for Indigenous peoples. ... With the entrenchment of section 35, Aboriginal and treaty rights were recognized and affirmed, arguably as sui generis rights originating within Indigenous nations or the agreements between Indigenous nations and settler society. Moreover, section 25 affords these rights further protection from the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

C. THE CONSTITUTION'S AMENDING FORMULA

If we define sovereignty as the power to make the final choice about how to structure the institutions of government, how to allocate powers, and how to reflect this in a Constitution, then patriation formalized Canada's sovereignty by transferring that power to Canadian political institutions. But, as it turns out, there is not one single-decision rule for amending the Canadian Constitution. Rather, there are five rules—five rules that make up the amending formula, as it is called—contained in part V of the Constitution Act, 1982, each of which purports to apply to different types or categories of amendments:

1. The "general amending formula," or the "7/50 formula," found in s 38(1), requires the consent of the Parliament of Canada and the legislative assemblies of two-thirds of the provinces having at least 50 percent of the population of all the provinces. This general amending formula gives no province alone a veto on amendment, which has been a source of dissatisfaction in Quebec. This procedure is the only one in the Constitution subject to time limits: an amendment cannot be proclaimed until one year after the initiation of the amendment process unless every province has indicated assent or dissent (s 39(1)), and an amendment dies unless it has received the appropriate degree of support within three years of the start of the process (s 39(2)). Section 38(3) permits a province to opt out of an amendment derogating from its legislative powers, proprietary rights, or other rights and privileges. If the amendment transfers legislative powers from the provinces in relation to education or cultural matters, the province opting out is also entitled to reasonable compensation (s 40). Section 38 is the default formula for constitutional amendments—that is, it applies to amendments that do not fall under the other amending formulas. Moreover, s 42 specifically assigns some amendments to s 38—for example, “the principle of proportionate representation of the provinces in the House of Commons” (s 42(1)(a)) (the amendments specified by s 42 cannot be the subject of opting out).

2. The “unanimity procedure,” found in s 41, requires that consent be provided by Parliament and the legislative assemblies of all the provinces in relation to amendments to the office of the Queen, the governor general, and the lieutenant governor of a province; the minimum number of members to which a province is entitled in the House of Commons as of 1982 (because of the “Senate floor rule” found in s 51A of the Constitution Act, 1867); the general use of the English and French languages; the composition of the Supreme Court of Canada; and any amendment to the amending formula.
3. The “bilateral procedure,” found in s 43, deals with provisions of the Constitution affecting only some provinces. Where an amendment is in relation to a provision affecting one or more but not all provinces, only the legislative assemblies of the provinces affected and Parliament need consent to the amendment.
4. The “federal unilateral procedure,” in s 44, allows Parliament alone to make amendments to the federal executive or the House of Commons or Senate (provided amendments to the Houses of Parliament do not affect their powers or their method of selection in ways protected by other parts of the amending formula). Section 44 replaces the old s 91(1) of the Constitution Act, 1867, which was similarly worded.
5. The “provincial unilateral procedure” in s 45 replaces the old s 92(1) of the Constitution Act, 1867 and permits the province to amend its constitution, provided that the amendment does not affect matters governed by other parts of the amending formula, such as the office of the lieutenant governor.

In addition to part V, s 35.1 provides that amendments affecting Aboriginal rights or changes to s 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867 will be preceded by a constitutional conference of first ministers and representatives of Indigenous peoples. However, s 35.1 does not impose a duty to obtain the consent of Indigenous peoples.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Using part V. The amending formula in part V of the Constitution Act, 1982 has been used successfully on 11 occasions since 1982. The “7/50” formula has been used only once to pass the Constitutional Amendment Proclamation, 1983. Most notably, this amendment altered the Aboriginal rights provisions in ss 25 and 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982; added ss 35(3), 35(4), 35.1; and amended s 25(b). Section 44 has been relied on by Parliament three times. The Constitution Act, 1985 (Representation) repealed and replaced s 51 of the Constitution Act, 1867 (which had been amended many times since 1867) to lay down new rules governing representation in the House of Commons; the Constitution Act, 1999 (Nunavut) amended the relevant provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867 to provide for the representation of Nunavut in the House of Commons and the Senate; and the Fair Representation Act (2011) replaced s 51(1) of the Constitution Act, 1867 to readjust the number of members of the House of Commons and provincial representation in it.

The remaining seven amendments have been made through s 43, and have all involved the federal government and one other province. For example, s 43 was used in 1993 to extend language rights in New Brunswick by adding s 16.1 to the Constitution Act, 1982. The most controversial amendments involving s 43 have concerned denominational school rights in Newfoundland (three amendments) and Quebec (one amendment). The Newfoundland amendments all involved changes to term 17 of the Newfoundland Terms of Union (which were constitutionalized by the Newfoundland Act, 12 & 13 Geo VI, c 22 (UK)). Term 17 replaced s 93 of the Constitution Act, 1867 with respect to Newfoundland, and entrenched a set of denominational school rights. In 1987, term 17 was amended to extend those rights to Pentecostal schools (Constitution Amendment, 1987). However, in 1997 (Constitution Amendment, 1997 (Newfoundland Act)), and again in 1998 (Constitution Amendment, 1998 (Newfoundland Act)), term 17 was amended first to dilute and then to remove the constitutional protection accorded to denominational schools. Both these amendments were made after province-wide referenda in which a majority of Newfoundlanders voted in favour of the amendments.

During the parliamentary debate surrounding the first amendment, religious groups argued (unsuccessfully) that Parliament should approve the proposed amendment because of the impact on minority rights. Is there a federal obligation to enact such a measure simply because the majority in the province so wishes? Conversely, does the federal Parliament owe a special obligation to protect the denominational school rights of minority groups who are liable to be outvoted in the political process?

The second amendment was challenged in the courts on the ground that the appropriate amending formula was s 38, not s 43, because denominational school rights were elements of national citizenship. The challenge was rejected on the grounds that term 17 applied only to Newfoundland, and hence s 43 was the appropriate provision to amend it: Hogan v Newfoundland (AG), 2000 NFCA 12, leave to appeal refused, [2000] SCCA No 191 (QL). The Quebec amendments also abolished denominational school rights in that province by providing, in a new s 93A, that s 93 no longer applied to Quebec (Constitutional Amendment, 1999 (Quebec)). A similar constitutional challenge was rejected by the Quebec courts: Potter c Québec (Procureur général du), 2001 CanLII 20663, [2001] RJQ 2823 (CA), leave to appeal refused, [2002] CSCR No 13 (QL). Do you agree with these holdings?

2. Population and power. The general amending formula creates asymmetries among provinces with regard to their power to drive or block an amendment. A professor of mathematics has concluded that “under paragraph 38(1)(b), the provinces are not all equal. The inequality is a consequence of the different provincial populations and the requirement that, to succeed, an amendment must be supported by a coalition of at least seven provinces containing at least one-half of the total population of the provinces.” As a result, at the time he conducted his study, “an amendment supported by all provinces except Ontario and Quebec will fail, whereas one supported by all except British Columbia and Alberta will succeed”: see D Marc Kilgour, “A Formal Analysis of the Amending Formula of Canada’s Constitution Act, 1982” (1983) 16 Can J Polit Sci 771 at 772. Does this exacerbate regional divisions in Canada? Is there any other way to design the general amending formula without requiring unanimity?

3. Opting out. The right to opt out provided in s 38(3) is not without its critics. On one view, the incompleteness of the opt-out right—it does not authorize compensation on all matters—has the potential to generate provincial inequalities:

Consider, for example, environmental protection, which falls under both federal and provincial jurisdiction. If the other provinces agreed to hand over all authority in this area to Ottawa, Quebec could express its disagreement and withdraw from such a constitutional amendment; it would not, however, have a constitutional right to receive any federal funding for environmental projects, since they would fall outside the areas of education and culture. The citizens of Quebec, by paying federal taxes, would be paying for the environmental protection of all the provinces while at the same time taking on the expense of their own protection system. In other words, except for matters of culture and education, a province choosing to opt out of a particular amendment would see its citizens doubly taxed.

See Gil Rémillard, "The Constitution Act, 1982: An Unfinished Compromise" (1984) 32 Am J Comp L 269 at 277. Do you agree with Rémillard that the opt-out right raises the risk of provincial inequalities?

4. Public participation in the amendment process. The amendment procedure in part V of the Constitution Act, 1982 imposes no requirement of public participation (such as a referendum) and has been criticized for being elitist and undemocratic. We will consider this criticism in more detail below after we examine the failed attempts at constitutional reform associated with the Meech Lake and Charlottetown accords.

5. A complicated process. Writing in the year of patriation, an American scholar observed that "perhaps as a reflection of the complex politics of Canadian federalism, the new domestic amendment procedures are unusually complicated." It reflected, he said, "the inescapable fact" that "Canada is a society of weak national loyalties." For him, "an amendment process which reflects the decentralized quality of such a society is neither good nor bad. It is only accurate": see Walter Dellinger, "The Amending Process in Canada and the United States: A Comparative Perspective" (1982) 45 Law & Contemp Probs 283 at 297, 302. Do you agree that Canada's amendment formula is too complicated? Would we be better served with only one amendment procedure to amend any part of the Constitution? If so, how would you design that single procedure? What degree of provincial agreement would be necessary, if any, to amend the Constitution? One scholar has argued that the varying levels of difficulty reflected in the five procedures of Canada's amending formula serve an important purpose: the hierarchy of amendment difficulty signals which provisions of the Constitution are more important, and therefore harder to amend, than others: see Richard Albert, "The Expressive Function of Constitutional Amendment Rules" (2013) 59 McGill LJ 225.

6. Amending the amending formula. Section 49 of the Constitution Act, 1982 required the prime minister to convene a first ministers' conference by 1997 in order to review the amending formula:

A constitutional conference composed of the Prime Minister of Canada and the first ministers of the provinces shall be convened by the Prime Minister of Canada within fifteen years after this Part comes into force to review the provisions of this Part.

The amending formula was discussed at a meeting of first ministers on June 20-21, 1996, but so little time was devoted to them—only a few minutes, it is said—that one observer has stated that "clearly no review of the provisions of Part V was actually conducted": see John D Whyte, "A Constitutional Conference ... Shall Be Convened ...": Living with Constitutional Promises" (1996) 8 Const Forum Const 15 at 16. The prime minister at the time nonetheless declared after the meeting that the constitutional obligation imposed by s 49 had been fulfilled. Do you believe the first ministers should have devoted more time to reviewing the amending formula? Why do you think they spent so little time on them? Had you been sitting at the first ministers' table on the day the amending formula came up for discussion, how would you have suggested it be amended, if at all?

7. Thinking about part V. There remain many open questions about the amending formula. For further readings, see Benoit Pelletier, "Amending the Constitution of Canada" in Peter Oliver, Patrick Macklem & Nathalie Des Rosiers, The Oxford Handbook of the Canadian Constitution (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2017) at 253; Kate Glover, "Hard Amendment Cases in Canada" in Richard Albert, Xenophon Contiades & Alkmene Fotiadou, The Foundations and Traditions of Constitutional Amendment (Oxford: Hart, 2017) at 273; Sébastien Grammon, "The Protective Function of the Constitutional Amending Formula" (2017) Rev Const Std 171; Hoi L Kong, "Deliberative Constitutional Amendments" (2015) 41 Queen's LJ 105; Warren J Newman, "Living with the Amending Procedures: Prospects for Future Constitutional Reform in Canada" (2007) 37 SCLR (2d) 383; Katherine Swinton, "Amending the Canadian Constitution: Lessons from Meech Lake" (1992) 42 UTLJ 139; Peter W Hogg, "Formal Amendment of the Constitution

D. FAILED CONSTITUTIONAL REFORMS: MEECH LAKE AND CHARLOTTETOWN

Alongside the eleven constitutional amendments that have been made since 1982, there have been two significant failures: the Meech Lake Accord and the Charlottetown Accord. Both accords began as efforts to win Quebec's acceptance of the 1982 constitutional amendments. The Meech Lake Accord included constitutional recognition of Quebec as a distinct society, entrenchment of the Supreme Court of Canada and provincial nomination of its justices, an increase in the number of items requiring unanimity under the amending formula, and controls on the federal spending power. Many of these elements reappeared in the Charlottetown Accord, along with changes to the distribution of powers, an entrenched Aboriginal right to self-government, an elected Senate with equal provincial representation, and a guaranteed level of Quebec representation in the House of Commons. How did we get to these efforts at wholesale constitutional reform in Canada so soon after the Patriation Reference? Richard Simeon offers a useful summary:

For many, the exclusion of Quebec grievously undermined the legitimacy of the new constitutional order. In the short run, it meant that Quebec would proclaim a blanket use of the "notwithstanding clause" exempting all Quebec legislation from challenge under important sections of the new Charter; and that Quebec would refuse to engage in further discussion of constitutional renewal. In the longer run, it was feared that, however muted the Quebec independence movement now seemed, the imposition of the constitution on Quebec would be a powerful weapon in the hands of a future separatist movement. Many commentators felt that the country had reneged on a moral commitment, the 1980 promise that a "no" vote in the referendum was a vote for a renewed federalism and that no constitution could be fully secure without the voluntary accession of the second largest province, and the only one with a French-speaking majority.

From this perspective, then, the overriding constitutional question which remained was to find some way to "[b]ring Quebec in" to the Canadian constitutional family. Two essential conditions had to be met First, there had to be a federal government in office which placed reconciliation with Quebec at the top of its agenda, and, more important, which was prepared to accept at least some of the fundamental assumptions about the distinctive character of Quebec which had underlain the aspirations of all Quebec governments since the Quiet Revolution of the 1960s. Second, there must be a government in Quebec which was equally committed to this goal, and which was unequivocally federalist in orientation.

The first condition was met with the federal election of September, 1984. The new Conservative government was pledged to "national reconciliation"—including restoring harmony to the embittered state of federal–provincial relations and, more particularly, to constitutional reconciliation with Quebec (Mulroney, 1984). The second condition was met with the defeat of the PQ and the election of the federalist Liberals under Robert Bourassa in 1985.

See Richard Simeon, "Meech Lake and Shifting Conceptions of Canadian Federalism" (1988) 14 Can Pub Pol'y S7 at S8-S9.

1. The Meech Lake Accord

For the rest of the story of how the Meech Lake Accord came to be, we now turn to Mary Dawson, the person responsible for drafting all constitutional amendments starting in 1981 and the lead legal adviser to the Government of Canada on constitutional matters from 1986 until her retirement. In 2012, Dawson gave a lecture at McGill University in which she offered a glimpse, from her unique perspective, into Canada's constitutional evolution:

The constitutional negotiations known as the "Quebec Round" began quietly, indeed secretly. The foundation was laid in May 1986 at a symposium at Mont Gabriel, Quebec, where the Quebec minister of intergovernmental affairs confirmed Quebec's five conditions for acceptance of the patriation package of 1982. The Government of Quebec was asking for changes to the constitution that would have symbolic meaning but that it felt would have minimal impact on the constitution for those outside Quebec. The changes would relate to Quebec's distinctiveness, immigration agreements, the Supreme Court of Canada, the federal spending power, and the amending formula. This relatively short list was in sharp contrast to the much longer lists of demands that had been coming from Quebec in recent years.

The provincial premiers agreed, in August 1986 at a meeting in Edmonton, to make the issues identified by Quebec their first priority and to set aside their other priorities until Quebec's demands had been addressed. Prime Minister Mulroney had written to them earlier in the summer to request that they consider this approach. ...

Through the fall of 1986 and the winter of 1987, a series of bilateral meetings took place out of the public eye. . . . During this period, federal officials began to work on draft amendments with their Quebec counterparts. As a rule, no paper was exchanged. ...

While the Government of Quebec was reaching out to the rest of Canada through this process, at the same time it appeared to be doing everything that it could to avoid what it would consider to be yet another humiliation in the event of a public failure to achieve its modest set of conditions. ...

When all the governments met at Meech Lake on April 30, 1987, the five conditions of Quebec had been well canvassed even though there had only been one meeting of officials, held early in March. ...

The main point of contention was the "distinct society" clause, and this was the last component of the package to be agreed upon. ...

Although the first ministers had before them detailed draft provisions for most of the elements of the package, the Meech Lake Communiqué issued that night contained only general descriptions of these various elements. The one exception was the distinct society clause. ...

The agreement covered the five elements requested by Quebec, some of them generalized to apply to all provinces either at or before the April 30 meeting at Meech Lake or in the months immediately following that meeting, and there was a sixth element added at the April 30 meeting. This addition was to entrench in the constitution a requirement for annual first ministers' conferences, which were to cover Senate reform and fisheries roles and responsibilities, as well as for annual first ministers' conferences on the economy.

It was also agreed that, until the Senate amendments were achieved, Senate appointments were to be made from lists provided by the provinces, so long as they were acceptable to the federal government. Senate reform was a high priority for the Western provinces. In recognition that this was intended to be the Quebec Round, detailed proposals for Senate reform were not developed, but the interim arrangement was included in the package. This procedure was to apply until comprehensive Senate amendments were made.

The Meech Lake Communiqué of April 30, 1987, was approved unanimously by the prime minister and the premiers of all the provinces, including Quebec, and was met with great enthusiasm and the hope that this might be the end of our constitutional difficulties. That mood held through the technical discussions over the next month or two at the officials' level as small changes were discussed.

The Meech Lake Accord contained within it many items that required unanimous approval for constitutional amendment—for example, changes to the amending formula—as well as items that could be approved under the general formula in s 38. As a consequence, the question of how the different amending formulas would interact was an important one. In theory, the Accord could have been voted on by legislative assemblies in two ways. The first route would have been to vote on each component separately according to the appropriate amending formula. This approach would have raised the possibility that some aspects of the Accord would have been adopted, but others rejected, an unacceptable political outcome because the package represented a compromise that its proponents believed stood or fell together. The second route was to present the amendments for approval as a package. The requirements of ss 38 and 41 were taken to apply to the entire package, meaning that unanimous approval was required within three years. The Accord died in June 1990, having failed to meet these requirements. The Charlottetown Accord, which was voted down in a national referendum in 1992, also contained a mix of amendments, some requiring approval under s 38, others under s 41.

The choice to apply the three-year time limit to ratify the Meech Lake Accord was controversial. Gordon Robertson, a former high-ranking civil servant in Canada, argued that there should be no time limit on its ratification. Robert Hawkins responded that the three-year time limit did indeed apply to the Meech Lake Accord. In a subsequent response written that same year, Ted Morton considered the implications of removing the three-year time limit in the middle of the ratification process and proposed a solution to improve the amendment process going forward:

Every discussion and every legislative vote since the details of the Meech Lake Accord were agreed to by the eleven first ministers in June, 1987, have assumed that the Accord had to be ratified within a three year time limit or die. This apparently unanimous understanding was recently challenged by Gordon Robertson

For Mr. Robertson, it follows that since the Meech Lake Accord can only be ratified under the unanimity rule of Section 41, it does not have any time limit. ...

To uncover the flaw in Mr. Robertson's logic, one must separate out what Meech Lake has blended together: two separate amending formulas. ... If the first ministers had had the foresight to separate their amendments into two distinct proposals—a section 38 package and a section 41 package—there would be no controversy about time limits. (The section 38 package would have one; the section 41 package would not). Unfortunately, this is not the case. The result is confusion: Which amending rules govern the Meech Lake Accord?

Mr. Robertson's solution is to subsume the section 38 amendments under the section 41 requirements—unanimity, and no time limit. ...

Since the Accord is a package, it must be approved by the procedure necessary for whatever part or parts of the package requires the highest level of approval. That "highest level" is unanimity of the legislatures of all the provinces. Constitutional changes that require unanimity must be made pursuant to Section 41 and this is what is being done.

Mr. Robertson's argument is plausible but not persuasive. Another solution is to import the three year time limit of section 38 into the section 41 procedure. The result is a procedure that requires unanimity (per section 41) and imposes a three year time limit (per section 38). This is truly "the highest level of approval," to use Mr. Robertson's own phrase, and it is the option the first minister (and the rest of Canada) thought they were choosing in the Spring of 1987. It is certainly as plausible as the Robertson option, and for the same reasons. While there are irrefutable reasons for preferring the unanimity requirement of section 41 to the "7/50 rule" of section 38, there is not any obvious reason for jettisoning the three year time limit. True, this makes it more difficult to gain approval for the Accord, but this may be its virtue not its vice.

The Meech Lake Accord ... contain[s] a very distinctive—and it turns out, controversial—vision of Canada's future. Surely when constitutional changes of this magnitude and extent are contemplated, it makes sense to require the highest degree of political consensus to effect these changes. ...

One conclusion is the intriguing possibility that the Accord itself may be invalid and "unratifiable," because it violates the "manner and form" requirements of the Constitution by lumping together matters that must be treated separately.

A less draconian solution is that when governments combine section 38 and section 41 amendments into a single constitutional "package," they must meet the full requirements of both sections: unanimity and the three year time limit. This approach satisfies all the requirements of both amending formulas. With the June, 1990 deadline approaching, Mr. Robertson's modest proposal would be a welcome lifeboat indeed.

The problem is that it would be much more than a lifeboat. It would be an indefinite extension of Meech Lake into the future, without end! Is it really acceptable that constitutional change as far-reaching as Meech Lake should hang in the balance for five, ten, twenty years[?]

Political logic also precludes another recently rumored solution to the "deadline problem": retrospectively dividing the Accord into two separate packages—section 38 amendments and section 41 amendments.

While this division is probably what should have been done at the outset—in June, 1987—it is much too late to do it now. How many times have Meech critics been told that the Accord is a "seemless webb" [sic], to be accepted or rejected intact. For governments suddenly to reverse themselves on this issue would be perceived as a hypocritical[;] ... would further poison the well of public opinion[;] and further divide the country.

The lesson for the future seems clear. At a minimum, future proposals to amend the Constitution must not mix section 38 and section 41 type amendments in a single "package." Serious consideration should be given to adding a time limit to the section 41 amending formula. [Its] omission was probably an oversight in the first place. More generally, the very concept of a "package" approach to constitutional amendments may no longer be politically acceptable. This type of constitutional deal-making—consummated by eleven first ministers, behind closed doors, and then presented as a fait accompli—is a hangover from the pre-Charter era.

The Charter has created the perception that the Constitution is no longer the exclusive preserve of the First Ministers. As the opposition to Meech Lake has so clearly demonstrated, there are now many groups in Canadian society who see themselves as stakeholders in the "new" constitution. These "Charter Canadians," as they have been labelled, are not going to accept exclusion from future constitutional changes. While the initiative for proposing constitutional amendments will still rest with Canada's eleven first ministers, they will have to defend any future changes in a public process that allows all interested parties to participate in a meaningful manner.

See FL Morton, "How Not to Amend the Constitution" (1989-90) 12:4 Can Parliamentary Rev 9.

Had you been advising the first ministers on whether or not the Constitution of Canada requires the three-year limit to apply to the Meech Lake Accord, what would have been your advice? Would your answer have been different if the first ministers had asked you for your advice not about what the Constitution requires but about what would make it more likely for the Accord to be approved? Setting aside the Meech Lake Accord, do you think it is a good idea to impose a time limit to approve an amendment? Is it a good idea for all kinds of possible constitutional amendments or only for certain kinds?

The sequence of events leading ultimately to the defeat of the Meech Lake Accord suggests that defeat was a result of much more than the three-year time limit alone. As Ian Peach explains, the Accord faced substantial resistance from many corners of the country:

By the time of the 1988 federal election, support for the Meech Lake Accord was beginning to unravel. The concerns of Indigenous peoples provided a key platform for those seeking amendment to the Accord. From this began to arise a greater understanding of Indigenous claims among the public and sympathy for their constitutional aspirations. Thus, when Elijah Harper stood up against the passage of the Meech Lake Accord, he was strongly backed by not only Indigenous groups, such as the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs (who provided Harper with direct support and encouragement), the Assembly of First Nations, the Inuit Tapirikat of Canada, the Native Council of Canada, and the Dene Nation but also by many Canadians who applauded his action and viewed him as championing their own dislike of the Accord. ...

Premiers who were elected subsequent to the negotiation of the Accord also articulated concerns about it As well, in the wake of Quebec premier Bourassa's decision to use the notwithstanding clause to preserve Quebec's sign law, Manitoba premier Gary Filmon ... declared that he would not bring the Accord forward to the Manitoba legislature unless substantial changes were made to it. ... [I]t became clear by the spring of 1990 that something had to be done to secure acceptance of the Accord in the three provinces that had not yet approved it.

Several provinces [...] expressed concerns about the exclusion of Indigenous peoples, among others. In an effort to move beyond the impasse that had developed over the Accord, [New Brunswick Premier Frank] McKenna introduced a "companion resolution" to the Accord in the New Brunswick Legislative Assembly on 21 March 1990, as a strategy to address concerns about the Accord and secure the necessary support to allow its passage in the New Brunswick, Newfoundland, and Manitoba legislatures. On 27 March 1990, the government of Brian Mulroney decided to study this option with the establishment of the Special Committee to Study the Proposed Companion Resolution to the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord, commonly known as the Charest Committee.

The Charest Committee tabled its report on 17 May 1990. The report generally agreed with the content of the New Brunswick companion resolution and recommended its adoption. On the treatment of Indigenous issues, the committee recommended that the companion resolution provide for a separate process of constitutional conferences every three years, beginning no later than one year after the companion resolution came into force, and that first ministers recognize Indigenous peoples in the body of the constitution, building on the "Canada clause" proposed by Manitoba.

With the results of the Charest Committee and the provincial studies in hand, the Mulroney government called a final First Ministers Conference for 3 June 1990 [T]he outcome was an agreement by all premiers to secure passage of the Accord and the companion resolution by the 23 June 1990 deadline. Among other elements, the agreed-upon companion resolution contained a commitment to future constitutional conferences on Indigenous issues. The commitment to future discussions instead of addressing Indigenous issues directly in the companion resolution, however, generated a negative reaction among Indigenous leaders, who argued that it continued the "two founding nations" myth and the hierarchy of recognition contained in the Meech Lake Accord itself. Indigenous leaders also protested their exclusion from the June 1990 First Ministers Conference.

Three days after the conclusion of the June 1990 First Ministers Conference, Premier Filmon attempted to introduce a resolution to approve the Accord into the Manitoba legislature, but [legislative assembly member] Elijah Harper refused to provide the necessary unanimous consent to introduce the motion. Four days later, on June 16th, the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs made public its intention to defeat the Meech Lake Accord. The following day, Prime Minister Mulroney sent Senator Lowell Murray and others to negotiate with the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs in an attempt to persuade them to end their efforts to defeat the Accord, but to no avail. Although Premier Filmon eventually introduced the motion to approve the Accord on June 20th, there was insufficient time for the legislature to approve it prior to a scheduled adjournment on June 22nd. With passage in Manitoba impossible, Premier Wells adjourned the Newfoundland House of Assembly for an indeterminate period on June 22nd, thereby cancelling the proposed free vote on a motion to approve the Meech Lake Accord and ensuring the Accord's defeat.

See Ian Peach, "The Power of a Single Feather: Meech Lake, Indigenous Resistance and the Evolution of Indigenous Politics in Canada" (2011) 16 Rev Const Stud 1 at 8-11 (footnotes omitted).

Although one cannot know for certain, it is likely that the Manitoba legislature would have approved the resolution had it been put to a vote, and Newfoundland's House of Assembly would have thereafter approved the resolution as well, thus making the Meech Lake Accord official. But history took a different path, and, for better or worse, the name Elijah Harper will forever be linked to the defeat of the Meech Lake Accord. Harper, you will remember, was the Manitoba member of the Legislative Assembly (MLA) who refused to give his consent to allow the Manitoba premier to introduce the resolution to approve the Accord. Below is how he was remembered in an obituary written shortly after his death:

Not since Louis Riel in the late 19th century had a person of aboriginal descent had such an impact on Canadian history. Except in mid-June, 1990, Elijah Harper, a 40-year-old Ojibwa-Cree and Manitoba MLA, made his bold stand peacefully, though defiantly, holding an eagle feather.

In his opposition to the Meech Lake Accord, which included Quebec's five demands before it would sign the Constitution of 1982, Mr. Harper became an instant media sensation. He was the Canadian Press newsmaker of 1990 and the subject of hundreds of newspaper and television stories and commentaries. He became an overnight celebrity, and people started wearing T-shirts with his photograph on them and badges that proclaimed, "Elijah Harper for Prime Minister." A CTV movie, Elijah, was even made about him in 2007.

For Mr. Harper, however, his refusal to support the accord was always much more than a quest for his 15 minutes of fame. Indeed, he did not even want it. "I don't like this notoriety," he told former Manitoba NDP premier Howard Pawley in the midst of the deliberations. "I am looking forward to getting back to the trapline and looking at the stars at night."

Nonetheless, few images from the constitutional battles of the 1980s and 90s are as memorable as that of Mr. Harper, with his long black hair pulled back in a ponytail sitting in the Manitoba Legislature with an eagle feather in his hand refusing to give his consent so that Manitoba premier Gary Filmon could introduce a motion to ratify the accord by the June 23, 1990, deadline.

As Mr. Filmon recalls, Mr. Harper spoke to him before the crucial session began. "I don't want to do this," he told Mr. Filmon, "but I have to do it for my people." Added Jack London, who was at the time the legal counsel for the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs (AMC): "The emotional toll on Elijah was immense. But he did not take his decision lightly or without considerable thoughtfulness."

Mr. Filmon, head of a Conservative minority government, required unanimous consent from all MLAs to introduce the motion for debate, which was to be followed by 10 days of public hearings. It was going to be close to meet the deadline. Yet eight times between June 12 and June 21, on each occasion that the Speaker asked if there was unanimity to proceed, Mr. Harper said, "No, Mr. Speaker."

The next day, the Manitoba legislature adjourned without voting on the accord, essentially killing it (a deed completed when, soon after, Newfoundland premier Clyde Wells refused to allow a vote on the accord).

In Ottawa, prime minister Brian Mulroney was naturally livid that a technicality could derail his prized accord. Later, in one of Mr. Mulroney's unguarded conversations with Peter C. Newman, he put it like this, "Aboriginals are not to blame for Meech Lake's failure despite Elijah Harper's stupidity. ... He turned down a sweetheart deal."

Mr. Harper saw the situation much differently. A spiritual man, he had a dignified calming influence on Manitoba and Canadian politics. "I was listening to the people," Mr. Harper said in 2005 when Mr. Mulroney's comments became public. "When he says I'm stupid, he calls our people stupid. We're not stupid. We're the First Nations people. We're the very people who welcomed his ancestors to this country and he didn't want to recognize us in the Constitution."

Elijah Harper died on May 17 from cardiac failure resulting from complications from diabetes and kidney problems.

See Allan Levine, "Native Leader Elijah Harper Helped Scuttle Meech Lake," The Globe and Mail (20 May 2013), online: <<http://www.theglobeandmail.com/news/politics/native-leader-elijah-harper-helped-scuttle-meech-lake/article12033338>>.

There were many criticisms levelled against the Meech Lake Accord. As one scholar has written:

Women's organizations, aboriginal peoples and multicultural groups were among the more vigorous dissenters from the Accord. Many women were concerned that the loose language of the Accord, referring to certain Charter guarantees but not to others, would undermine sexual equality which was not expressly mentioned. Aboriginal peoples were dismayed that a constitutional agreement could be concluded with such secrecy and swiftness to meet Quebec's demands when no progress had been made towards their quest for self-determination at four successive constitutional conferences.

See WH McConnell, "The Meech Lake Accord: Laws or Flaws" (1988) 52 Sask L Rev 115; see also Beverley Baines, "Women's Equality Rights and the Meech Lake Accord" (1988) 52 Sask L Rev 265 (arguing that Meech Lake put the Charter-based equality rights of women in jeopardy); David Taras, "Television and Public Policy: The CBC's Coverage of the Meech Lake Accord" (1989) 15 Can Pub Pol'y 322 (arguing that media coverage was oriented toward conflict and gave Canadians a distorted view of what was at stake); Thomas J Courchene, "Meech Lake and Socio-Economic Policy" (1988) 14 Can Pub Pol'y S63 (arguing that the implications for socio-economic management were positive).

In an important article written shortly after the demise of the Meech Lake Accord, Roderick Macdonald summarized the five major legal critiques of the Accord that had gained traction by the fall of 1988, fewer than two years before its defeat:

The first of these to emerge was the "progressive" critique, in which the Meech Lake Accord was condemned for the succor which it offered to the discredited constitutional agenda of federal/provincial relations, language rights, and provincialism. The Meech Lake Accord was also criticized on this basis for reinforcing the political ethic of executive federalism and elite accommodation. Implied in this critique was the more general claim that traditional (or pre-1982) constitutional politics in Canada was outdated because it served only the interests of the country's political and economic elites. Those who advanced this claim were especially anxious to argue that the 1982 round empowered ordinary Canadians and enfranchised previously excluded constituencies.

Closely linked with this first critique was a second—the "Charter" argument. These skeptics of the Meech Lake Accord were deeply troubled by the "distinct society" clause. They feared, notwithstanding their quasi-entrenchment in 1982, that modern and more fundamental concerns about the relationship of individual and state were being moved once again to the bottom of the constitutional agenda; and] that Canadian and Quebec politicians had conspired successfully to recapture legislative authority to override recent constitutional gains relating to respect for individual liberty, to the promotion of equality, and to the greater enfranchisement of women.

The "distinct society" clause also provided a focus for the third, or "provincial egalitarian" critique of the Meech Lake Accord. On this view, the clause was inimical to a true federalism. By creating a special status for one province it fundamentally undermined the notion of equality of citizens, regardless of provincial residence, upon which Canadian political institutions were argued to have been built. Many who took this position also suggested that the clause would confer additional legislative jurisdiction on Quebec, not exercisable by other provinces.

A fourth criticism of the Meech Lake Accord, the "centralist" critique, found its roots in the belief, first advanced by Sir John A. Macdonald a century ago, that the federal government must be ascendant for Canada to resist assimilation by the United States. Critics argued that the spending power provisions of the agreement would enfeeble the federal government. These provisions would also operate a massive power shift to larger and more economically self-sufficient provinces such as British Columbia, Alberta, Ontario, and Quebec at the expense of the country's poorer provinces. Coupled with this critique ... was the assertion that, by giving up exclusive control over national institutions such as the Senate and the Supreme Court, the central government was destroying ... the quasi-unitary model of federalism upon which the country was built.

A final objection ... may be characterized as the "paralysis" critique. Many early Meech Lake Accord opponents argued that the extension to all provinces of a constitutional veto over amendments relating to federal institutions such as the Senate would nullify all hope for their reform. ... Also connected with this concern was the belief that other pressing items of constitutional reform—Western alienation, Aboriginal rights, the accession of the territories to provincehood, multiculturalism, and regional economic disparity—would never be addressed.

See Roderick A Macdonald, "... Meech Lake to the Contrary Notwithstanding (Part I)" (1991) 29 Osgoode Hall LJ 253 at 269-70.

Quite apart from the content of the Meech Lake Accord, many questioned the process by which the text had been written and ultimately proposed to Canadians. See Brian Schwartz, "Fathoming Meech Lake" (1987) 17 Man LJ 1 at 4.

Perhaps the most vocal critic of all was former Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, the driving force behind the patriation of Canada's Constitution. After the Prime Minister and the provincial premiers had agreed in principle to the Accord, Trudeau published the following:

What a magician this Mr. (Brian) Mulroney is, and what a sly fox! ...

In a single master stroke, this clever negotiator has thus managed to approve the call for Special Status (Jean Lesage and Claude Ryan), the call for Two Nations (Robert Stanfield), the call for a Canadian Board of Directors made up of the 11 first ministers (Allan Blakeney and Marcel Faribault), and the call for a Community of Communities (Joe Clark).

He has not quite succeeded in achieving sovereignty-association, but he has put Canada on the fast track for getting there. It doesn't take a great thinker to predict that the political dynamic will draw the best people to the provincial capitals, where the real power will reside, while the federal capital will become a backwater for political and bureaucratic rejects.

What a dark day for Canada was this April 30, 1987! In addition to surrendering to the provinces important parts of its jurisdiction (the spending power, immigration), in addition to weakening the Canadian Charter of Rights, the Canadian state made subordinate to the provinces its legislative power (Senate) and its judicial power (Supreme Court); and it did this without hope of ever getting any of it back (a constitutional veto granted to each province). It even committed itself to a constitutional "second round" at which the demands of the provinces will dominate the agenda.

All this was done under the pretext of "permitting Quebec to fully participate in Canada's constitutional evolution." As if Quebec had not, right from the beginning, fully participated in Canada's constitutional evolution!

The possibility exists, moreover, that in the end Mr. Bourassa, true to form, will wind up repudiating the Meech Lake accord, because Quebec will still not have gotten enough. And that would inevitably clear the way for the real saviours: the separatists.

As for Mr. Mulroney, he had inherited a winning hand.

But since 1982, Canada had its Constitution, including a Charter which was binding on the provinces as well as the federal government. From then on, the advantage was on the Canadian government's side; it no longer had anything very urgent to seek from the provinces; it was they who had become the supplicants. ... Even a united front of the 10 provinces could not have forced the federal government to give ground: With the assurance of a creative equilibrium between the provinces and the central government, the federation was set to last a thousand years!

Alas, only one eventuality hadn't been foreseen: that one day the government of Canada might fall into the hands of a weakling. It has now happened. And the Right Honourable Brian Mulroney, PC, MP, with the complicity of 10 provincial premiers, has already entered into history as the author of a constitutional document which—if it is accepted by the people and their legislators—will render the Canadian state totally impotent. That would destine it, given the dynamics of power, to eventually be governed by eunuchs.

See Pierre Elliott Trudeau, "Say Good-bye to the Dream of One Canada," La Presse and the Toronto Star (27 May 1987).

2. The Charlottetown Accord

After the failure of the Meech Lake Accord, the first ministers went back to the drawing board. In contrast to the closed-door process that had produced the Meech Lake Accord, the Charlottetown process was more open. Patrick Monahan has argued that the process surrounding the Charlottetown Accord illustrates the democratic potential of constitutional amendment in Canada. The federal government established the Citizens Forum on Canada's Future (chaired by Keith Spicer) in November 1990, and established a joint House–Senate committee to consider proposals for changes to the amending formula (the Beaudoin–Edwards Committee) in December 1990. The federal government's constitutional proposals were then released in September 1991. Initially, these proposals were put before a second joint House–Senate committee (the Beaudoin–Dobbie Committee). However, in response to public demand for greater participation, the federal government convened five conferences held in early 1992, attended by federal and provincial politicians, interest groups' representatives, and everyday Canadians. The final phase of the Charlottetown process was an intergovernmental negotiation, in which governments and Indigenous representatives were the sole participants. See Patrick J Monahan, "The Sounds of Silence" in Kenneth McRoberts & Patrick J Monahan, eds, The Charlottetown Accord, the Referendum, and the Future of Canada (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1993) at 222.

The Charlottetown process culminated in a national referendum on October 26, 1992, asking Canadians the following question: "Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992?" See Government of Canada, "Proclamation Directing a Referendum Relating to the Constitution of Canada, SI/92-180, Registration 1992-10-07" (last modified 10 January 2022), online: Justice Laws Website <<https://lois-laws.justice.gc.ca/eng/regulations/SI-92-180/FullText.html>>. This agreement was the package of amendments known as the Charlottetown Accord—an ambitious group of proposals agreed to by Canada's first ministers, including the leaders of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, as well as Indigenous leaders. In an article published the year after the failure of the Accord, Robert Vipond explained what the Accord had sought to do and how the referendum came to be.

Robert C Vipond, "Seeing Canada Through the Referendum: Still a House Divided"

(1993) 23 Publius 39 at 40-47

The failure of Meech was particularly bitter because this was the first time in living memory that the government of Quebec had actually accepted the risk of agreeing to a multilateral and comprehensive package of constitutional reforms with English Canada, only to have the agreement scuttled by provincial legislatures in English Canada. ... For many Quebecers, the rejection of Meech entailed the rejection of Quebec.

The powerful sense of rejection ... had several consequences. [I]t pushed support for greater Quebec sovereignty to unprecedented heights—60-65 percent in some polls. ... [T]he death of Meech led Bourassa to announce that he would boycott all multilateral intergovernmental negotiations Within Quebec itself, the failure of Meech produced two large-scale efforts to chart Quebec's constitutional future on its own terms and, if necessary, unilaterally.

The first, popularly known as the Allaire report, was commissioned by the governing Liberal party in Quebec and was adopted as party policy in March 1991. The second, the Bélanger-Campeau Commission, was a sort of Quebec "Estates General" and included representatives from the Quebec National Assembly, business, labor, the cooperative movement, and the arts community among others. ... Both called for a referendum in Quebec, by the end of October 1992, on Quebec's constitutional future.

Bourassa accepted the referendum recommendation, but he also left open the possibility that a constitutional referendum in Quebec could be framed around a new federalist constitutional proposal from the rest of Canada—should one be forthcoming. Bourassa thus purchased some maneuverability at the same time as he "laid down the gauntlet to the Rest of Canada."

The rest of Canada was initially slow to respond

... However reluctantly, the federal and provincial governments concluded that the national unity question was perhaps even more urgent than ever before, that sentiment favoring separation in Quebec had grown dangerously since the failure of Meech, and that it therefore was crucial to respond fairly (though not cravenly) to Quebec's constitutional demands.

This time, however, the approach would be different. ... As Richard Johnston observed, the basic idea was to create a constitutional logroll, in which the rest of Canada would get something it wanted out of constitutional reform in return for accommodating Quebec. With that premise in place, the Quebec round of constitutional negotiations gave way to the Canada round.

Two candidates for inclusion on the constitutional agenda stood out. One was Senate reform. ...

The other compelling subject of constitutional reform was aboriginal self-government. ...

The demands for Senate reform and aboriginal self-government arose from radically different grievances, but both were couched in the powerful language of equality. ...

There was also the question of process. If the intergovernmental class learned nothing else from Meech, it learned that the prevailing constitutional reform process was deeply flawed. One problem was essentially tactical and, in principle, easily corrected. By the terms of the Constitution Act of 1982, constitutional amendments proceed differently according to their subject matter When the accord was negotiated in 1987, the first ministers agreed to submit all of the amendments to the more rigorous requirement of unanimity rather than sever the package into two distinct lots. The clear, yet largely unforeseen, consequence of this tactic was to straitjacket the process This time the federal government promised that things would be different, either by uncoupling the two sorts of amendments or by leaving those that required unanimity to another day.

The other process problem ran considerably deeper. In the fallout from Meech, the intergovernmental class learned very quickly that the Canadian public would no longer tolerate the closed processes of "executive federalism" (i.e., high-level intergovernmental bargaining). Determined not to repeat the error, virtually all of the governments engaged in constitutional discussions set about to create a more open and consultative process that would forestall the sort of populist and democratic criticism that helped to derail Meech.

The challenge of creating a constitutional package that could negotiate these different and often cross-cutting priorities was formidable. Quebec's demand for significant—even massive—decentralization was unacceptable to those who looked to the national government for leadership on matters of redistributive social and economic policy and who wanted a strong Ottawa to resist the pressures of continental economic integration. One possible solution was to create an "asymmetrical" federal system in which Quebec would have jurisdiction over a number of policy areas not available to the other provinces, thus giving Quebec the control it wanted without producing wholesale decentralization. Yet, the argument that asymmetry is a legitimate and well established part of Canadian federalism was simply no match for the sleek principle, now become orthodoxy, that provincial equality or uniformity is a fundamental and inviolable constitutional value.

Senate reform posed a different sort of problem. Quebec, already wary of its declining demographic position in Canada, could never support a scheme that would reduce its representation to that of any other province—especially if one of the other goals of institutional reform was to create the conditions under which the Senate could stand up effectively to the House of Commons. What Senate reformers were less prepared for was the still more fundamental question concerning the definition of representation. [W]hy assume that territorial identity is the best or only basis of representation? Why not, alternatively, create a Senate that would be apportioned on the basis of gender, dividing representation equally between women and men?

Even the question of aboriginal self-government proved nettlesome. One might have thought that recognizing a right of self-government for aboriginal peoples was morally unambiguous and politically compelling, but it was not. For one thing, it was unclear what would happen if the claims of aboriginal self-government conflicted with those of Quebecois self-determination.

The federal government tabled its constitutional proposals before Parliament in September 1991. Most of the subjects addressed by the Meech Lake Accord reappeared, albeit in slightly different form. The reform of national representative institutions received prominent treatment. The government proposed some recalibration of the division of powers toward the provinces. It also recommended the entrenchment of a lavish "Canada Clause," an introductory constitutional statement "to affirm the identity and aspirations of the people of Canada." Once tabled, these proposals were considered by an all-party, special joint parliamentary committee. The Beaudoin-Dobbie Committee subsequently held hearings across Canada on the proposals and, after considerable tribulation and six mini-constitutional assemblies, produced a refined version of the federal proposals at the end of February 1992.

Despite [a number of] missteps, the outlines of a constitutional reform package began to take shape by the spring of 1992. ... [M]ultilateral meetings continued throughout the summer of 1992 until an agreement was reached in Charlottetown in late August. Quebec, British Columbia, and Alberta were already committed to holding constitutional referenda. Following suit, the federal government announced that it would introduce legislation calling for a full national referendum on the Charlottetown Accord, to be held 26 October 1992.

... [T]he Charlottetown Accord was a complex compromise among several divergent constitutional claims. First, the accord attempted to respond to Quebec's constitutional demands by replicating the major elements of Meech, albeit with several new twists. Like Meech, the Charlottetown Accord included a provision delimiting the federal spending power, another guaranteeing Quebecois representation on the Supreme Court, and a third that would give Quebec (and any other province) a veto over constitutional amendments that would materially alter national institutions. Finally, Charlottetown followed Meech in recognizing Quebec as a "distinct society" However, the clause was more narrowly circumscribed than its predecessor in Meech, and it was placed within a larger statement of the fundamental values underlying the Canadian nation—the Canada Clause.

Second, Charlottetown proposed several changes to the division of powers, all of them essentially decentralizing in nature.

Third, the Charlottetown Accord envisioned important changes to the structure and functioning of Parliament. Responding to calls for Senate reform, the upper house would be reconstituted, providing equal representation for each province Under the proposal, the Senate would not be a "confidence chamber" in the sense that its disagreement with the House of Commons would not bring down the government. Rather, in most cases, the Senate was to have a suspensive veto that, when exercised, would trigger a joint sitting with the House of Commons. Concurrently, the House of Commons would be enlarged, principally to compensate large provinces (e.g., Ontario and Quebec) for the equalization of representation in the Senate. Moreover and more controversially, the final negotiations with Bourassa produced a provision to guarantee Quebec at least 25 percent of the seats in the House of Commons in perpetuity, a hedge against the demographic trends that show Quebec's population declining as a proportion of Canada's population.

Fourth, the Charlottetown Accord enshrined the "inherent right" of aboriginal self-government, recognizing aboriginal governments as one of three orders of government in the country. The self-government provisions tugged in different directions. On one hand, Charlottetown committed itself to an "inherent" right of self-government that would allow aboriginal peoples "to safeguard and develop their languages, cultures, economies, identities, institutions, and traditions." On the other hand, aboriginal laws would be subject both to the Charter of Rights (though aboriginal governments, like others, would be allowed to use the override clause), and to the requirement that aboriginal laws be consistent with "peace, order, and good government in Canada." How aboriginal self-government was to be realized was left to a series of political agreements that would define the process. To buy time for this process to take shape, the accord explicitly delayed judicial enforcement of the self-government provisions for five years.

It was perhaps inevitable that even the supporters of the Charlottetown Accord would have difficulty finding a common thread to hold this sprawling agreement together. In point of fact, however, there was a basic idea that underlay both the accord and other recent attempts at constitutional reform, namely, the idea of inclusion. ... The Meech Lake Accord, for its part, attempted to respond to modern Quebec nationalism ... by reinforcing what was different about Quebec. Paradoxical or not, the explicit purpose of Meech remained, as Mulroney repeatedly said, to bring Quebec "back into the constitutional family."

In an important sense, Charlottetown was but the next stage of this inclusionary constitutional politics ... Yet there was one crucial difference ... Both in 1982 and again at the time of Meech, the communities that stood to gain from the inclusionary thrust of the effort largely supported constitutional reform. This time they did not—at least not among the general citizenry. Put to the test of a national referendum, the Charlottetown Accord was defeated in Quebec, rejected decisively in western Canada, and both supported and opposed by aboriginal communities. In short, the accord was unpopular in the very communities that were meant to benefit most from its provisions.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The outcome. The people of Canada voted against the Charlottetown Accord. Canadian electors outside Quebec rejected the Accord by a margin of 54.3 percent to 45.7 percent. In British Columbia, 68.3 percent voted against; in Manitoba, Alberta, and Saskatchewan, the votes against were, respectively, 61.6 percent, 60.2 percent, and 55.3 percent. In Yukon, the final vote was 56.3 against, and in Nova Scotia, the Accord was rejected by 51.2 percent of voters. Only in New Brunswick (61.8 percent), Newfoundland (63.2 percent), the Northwest Territories (61.3 percent), and Prince Edward Island (73.9 percent) did a significant majority of the province or territory support the Accord. In Ontario, the Accord secured the approval of the slimmest majority (50.1 percent): see Elections Canada, "The 1992 Federal Referendum: A Challenge Met—Report of the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada" (17 January 1994), online (pdf): Government of Canada <https://publications.gc.ca/collections/collection_2013/elections/SE1-8-2-1992-1-eng.pdf> at 58. In Quebec, where 83 percent of the province turned out to vote, the Accord was rejected by a majority of voters: see Référendums au Québec, online: Elections Quebec <<https://www.electionsquebec.qc.ca/francais/tableaux/referendums-quebec-8484.php>>.

2. Mega-constitutional politics. Peter Russell has argued that in the wake of the Meech Lake and Charlottetown accords, the politics of constitutional reform has become so-called mega-constitutional: see Peter H Russell, Constitutional Odyssey: Can Canadians Become a Sovereign People?, 3rd ed (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2004). The characteristic feature of mega-constitutional politics is the unwillingness of various constitutional actors to undertake piecemeal or incremental constitutional reform through constitutional amendment, tackling issues one at a time—for example, Senate reform and the spending power. Instead, complex amendment packages of the sort found in the Meech Lake and Charlottetown accords will be the norm for major constitutional amendment proposals into the foreseeable future. Arguably, one of the legal implications of mega-constitutional politics is that ss 38 and 41 will apply cumulatively to future packages of constitutional amendments, making major amendments extraordinarily difficult, if not impossible, as we discuss in Section V of this chapter. But it appears that piecemeal or incremental constitutional reform outside the procedures in part V of the Constitution Act, 1982 has since become a new strategy, and may perhaps be more probable now than pursuing major reforms using the procedures in part V. We have seen evidence of this new strategy of non-constitutional reform with respect to the process for Senate appointments. We discuss these reforms and their implications in Section V of this chapter.

3. Is part V undemocratic? Alan Cairns has argued that the dominance of governments in the amending formula is inconsistent with popular sovereignty and the "citizens' constitution" enshrined with the Charter of Rights in 1982:

The amending formula defines Canada as a country of governments presiding over and speaking for the national and provincial communities that federalism sustains. Its implicit assumption is that only the cleavages defined by federalism have to be catered to in the amending formula, and they can be represented by governments. The Charter, however, defines Canadians as a single community of rights-bearers, makes only limited concessions to provincialism, and clearly engenders a non-deferential attitude toward those who wield government power. The community message of the Charter contradicts the community message of the amending formula. The Charter, in addition to defining Canadians in terms of rights, also singles out specific categories for particular recognitions and rights—women, official-language minorities, multicultural Canadians, and others. By so doing it states that the federal–provincial cleavage, and the communities derived from it, do not exhaust the constitutionally significant identities that Canadians now possess. Succinctly, the Charter states what the amending formula denies, that "federalism is not enough"—that Canadians are more than a federal people.

See Alan C Cairns, Charter Versus Federalism: The Dilemmas of Constitutional Reform (Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press, 1991) at 6-8. Do you agree with Cairns? If so, should there be some guarantee of popular input in the amendment process? Should it come at the stage of formulating an amendment—for example, in the form of a constituent assembly—or at the time of approval—for example, in a referendum? Cairns levelled his criticism at the process that led to the negotiation of the Meech Lake Accord, which occurred almost entirely behind closed doors and with minimal input from legislatures (which were presented with the Accord by first ministers as a fait accompli), let alone citizens. Matthew Mendelsohn agrees, but takes a different route to reach the same answer that citizens must participate in the process of constitutional reform. He argues that the key is to "elaborate an appropriate process for the inclusion of the public in a nonmajoritarian manner" because we in Canada "have not yet fully accepted that the requirement of citizen participation must go beyond ratification in a referendum." He adds that "the process of constitutional reform is flawed because the negotiation process relies on elites and brokerage, while the ratification process is public and majoritarian, with public participation grafted onto institutions that remain essentially unchanged in their requirement of executive leadership": see Matthew Mendelsohn, "Public Brokerage: Constitutional Reform and the Accommodation of Mass Publics" (2000) 33 Can J Polit Sci 245 at 271.

4. A constitutional convention requiring a referendum. Some commentators have argued that resorting to a referendum during the Charlottetown process established a constitutional convention of popular ratification of amendments. Do you think a convention exists that there should be a referendum before any constitutional amendment? Before a package of major constitutional changes? What about prior to a major reform to our electoral system—even though part V makes no express mention of whether any of its five procedures should be used to formalize changes to Canada's electoral system? For the view that a convention might exist, see Jeffrey Simpson, "The Referendum and Its Aftermath" in Kenneth McRoberts & Patrick J Monahan, eds, The Charlottetown Accord, the Referendum, and the Future of Canada (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1993) 193 at 193; Roger Gibbins & David Thomas, "Ten Lessons from the Referendum" (1992) 15 Can Parliamentary Rev 3 at 3. For the view that a convention might not exist, see Benoit Pelletier, "Reinventing Canada: The Challenges that Canada Faces in the Twenty-First Century" (2010) 4 JPP 133 at 142; Peter Meekison, "Canada's Quest for Constitutional Perfection" (1993) 4 Const Forum Const 55 at 56. For a framework to answer the question on your own, see Richard Albert, "The Conventions of Constitutional Amendment in Canada" (2016) 53 Osgoode Hall LJ 399 at 413-15, 422-33.

5. Lessons learned. Immediately after the defeat of the Accord, Kathy Brock suggested three lessons that could be learned from the failure of the Charlottetown Accord. First, "in future any rounds of macro-constitutional change must necessarily be inclusive and open." Second, "the roles and responsibilities of the political leaders must be significantly altered." Brock specifies that "leaders must be responsible to public demands but willing to make independent decisions and then to defend those decisions before the public in terms that are meaningful to them." And third, "any amendments intended to respond to the needs of specific groups or provinces within the Canadian community must strengthen the nation as a whole." Brock concludes her third lesson by suggesting that "perhaps the Economist summed up this aspect of the Canadian mind-set when it observed that Canada is the only country that could have a popular revolution in favour of the status quo": see Kathy L Brock, "Learning from Failure: Lessons from Charlottetown" (1993) 4 Const Forum Const 29 at 31-32. Are these the only lessons to be learned from the failure of the Charlottetown Accord?

6. Money and the referendum. The Charlottetown Accord campaign complicates what we know about the effect of money in politics. It is commonly believed that the expenditure of money—in advertisements, individual voter contact, and get-out-the-vote operations—can determine outcomes in elections. Supporters of the Charlottetown Accord spent $11.25 million to promote it while its opponents spent $883,000 against it: see Stephen Tierney, Constitutional Referendums: The Theory and Practice of Republican Deliberation (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2012) at 115. How can we explain the Accord's rejection in light of this imbalance in expenditures? Could it be that money does not matter as much in politics as we might think?

7. Markets and the referendum. In the course of the Charlottetown campaign, some supporters resorted to financial arguments to persuade voters to approve the Accord. They argued that economic disaster would befall Canada if the Accord were rejected; the other side described this argument as a scare tactic. The day after Canada rejected the Accord, the TSE 300 (a now-obsolete stock market index linked to the performance of 300 stocks listed on the Toronto Stock Exchange) rose 48.27 points, and the one-month treasury bill rate fell 0.45 percent—both evidence that the financial market did not collapse as had been predicted: see Pauline M Shum, "The Canadian Constitutional Referendum: Using Financial Data to Assess Economic Consequences" (1995) 28 Can J Economics 794 at 795.

8. The root causes of amendment failure. In her study of modern efforts to reform the Constitution of Canada, Jamie Cameron traces the roots of the problems all the way back to Confederation.

Jamie Cameron, "Legality, Legitimacy and Constitutional Amendment in Canada" in Richard Albert & David R Cameron, Canada in the World: Comparative Perspectives on the Constitution of Canada (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2017) at 81-97

Patriation came in 1982 at high cost: Quebec was dealt a grave insult that largely robbed patriation of legitimacy in that province and radically escalated the danger of separation. Quebec's exclusion and the gaping legitimacy deficit it caused set off a chain reaction that further imperiled the fragile status of constitutional reform and threatened Canada's durability as a nation. On its face, the Meech Lake Accord (MLA) was a well-intentioned reform initiative aimed at completing patriation by healing the wounds of 1982 through a "Quebec Round" which would redress the province's grievances. Unanimous agreement at the level of executive federalism anchored the Accord's legitimacy, gestured in humility toward amend-making with Quebec, and initially augured well for the MLA's acceptance.

By courting Quebec's agenda, entertaining asymmetric arrangements and privileging Quebec as a distinct society, the MLA ignored pent-up demands and expectations for movement on women's and aboriginal rights, as well as on Senate reform. Over the MLA's three-year ratification period from 1987 to 1990, the legitimacy of prioritizing Quebec and sidelining other issues steadily declined. Process deficits were a further, critical aggravation: the MLA process was closed, lacking in transparency and non-inclusive; it shut out newly empowered voices that had the resources, political will and visibility to confront the bygone legitimacy of executive federalism. Three years after its announcement was celebrated, the Accord failed for want of ratification on 23 June 1990. The text of the Accord required unanimity and, as the deadline neared, the Manitoba and Newfoundland legislatures refused to ratify the MLA.

In a climate of escalating anxiety over Canada's future, Meech Lake's defeat made the next initiative inevitable. ... The "Canada Round" was the result of an expedited but nationally inclusive process of democratic renewal, which proposed constitutional reforms across a range of institutional and substantive issues. Addressing the substantive and procedural deficits of the MLA backfired, however, because the Charlottetown Accord's unwieldy reforms did not register as authentic in the democratic domain. ...

Each of the post-patriation textual initiatives set a high threshold for the legality of constitutional reform. But in each instance, the proposals for change were misaligned with pre-existing and developing expectations of what legitimizes constitutional change. The lesson and legacy of the Accords is that constitutional reform cannot be attempted again, with any realistic prospect of success, until that threshold misalignment is addressed. ...

In the aftermath of failed reform, the amendment process was described as "deeply dysfunctional," because managing concurring and competing legitimacies spun out of control, creating a "widespread sense of powerlessness" and perception that constitutional change had been rendered impossible. Time has not substantially altered that assessment. ... There is little doubt that reform cannot realistically be initiated again until the legality and legitimacy of constitutional amendment are better aligned.

Patriation and the Accords were high-stakes initiatives, and each gambled in its own way on the legitimacy of constitutional reform. Legitimacy deficits that were unquestionably situational found strong voice in the fractures, expectations, demands, and emotions in play at a time when Canada's survival was in peril. Those dynamics spiraled during the patriation crisis and could not be contained when the follow-up Accords were proposed. Though the "current states of affairs" and factual rigidities of this narrative are compelling, the particulars of Canada's extended patriation crisis were forged in the longer history of amendment and a text that never provided for the legality—or legitimacy—of change. It is the central purpose of this article to show that Canada's experience of amendment in and after 1982 is vitally connected to the primal challenge since Confederation in 1867, and that has been to define the terms of Canada's amendment sovereignty. That could and can only be done by bringing the legality and legitimacy of change into alignment. A project that has been a key preoccupation throughout is, today, still the unfinished work of Canada's 150-year-old Constitution.

... It is instructive that Part V's amendment rules place Canada at the extreme end of spectrum of textual rigidity, but perhaps more telling that a textual measure dramatically understates the obstacles to constitutional change. In principle, textual singularity is incomplete as a measure of amendment rigidity because it fails to validate a host of non-quantitative elements—including situational or factual rigidities—which play a determinative role in enabling and disabling constitutional change. Significantly, it also fails to account for amendment rigidities which are grounded in legitimacy deficits that compromise or subvert the process of change. As shown in this chapter, these points have particular salience for Canada's amendment history.

This, then, is the object lesson for Canada, and for theories of amendment and amendment rigidity more generally. Just as a regime of legality is necessary to legitimize amendments to a constitutional text, legality has limits and is not sufficient where extra-textual legitimacy deficits undermine the authority and acceptability of constitutional change.

E. IS COMPREHENSIVE CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM POSSIBLE?

The failure of the Meech Lake and Charlottetown accords has raised the question whether constitutional amendment on such a scale is possible in Canada. Before we can determine whether major reforms are possible, it is helpful to understand why the two most recent constitutional amendment packages in Canada failed to succeed. Two scholars have developed a theory of "amending process overload" that may explain constitutional amendment failure in Canada.

Christopher P Manfredi & Michael Lusztig, "Why Do Formal Amendments Fail? An Institutional Design Analysis"

(1998) 50 World Politics 377 at 381-93

[W]e argue that conditions are ripe for amending process overload where (1) constitutions are difficult to amend, (2) the institutional structure allows for the existence of numerous constitutional actors (both state and societal), and (3) the existing constitutional language and judicial practice provide for a wide range of interpretation.

The proximate cause of amending process overload is what might be termed redistributive indeterminacy. Redistributive indeterminacy entails uncertainty on the part of constitutional actors about the redistributive impact of constitutional modification. This redistributive indeterminacy has three sources: what we call amending process rigidity, interpretive fluidity, and institutional inclusiveness. In turn, redistributive indeterminacy manifests itself in two ways, through what we refer to as regulative rule demands and interpretive rule demands.

[H]igh levels of amending process rigidity increase the importance of redistributive indeterminacy. Mistakes are more difficult to redress. Rather than imitating the fluidity of the legislative process, high amending process rigidity ensures that each amendment is treated as a discrete issue. As a result, not only are groups less willing to compromise on their demands for the sake of maintaining policy coalitions, but these groups are also more likely to make their demands in unambiguous language that is invulnerable to interpretations that may run counter to the sponsoring group's intent.

Interpretive fluidity is a second variable impacting on redistributive indeterminacy, and it is a function of how much scope constitutional language leaves for interpretation. ... Indeed, judicial interpretation is especially important because it alone has the status of constitutional law; it is therefore more authoritative and less easily challenged or altered than other types of interpretation. Thus, while political actors must be concerned with future interpretation by all sources, it is judicial interpretation that contributes most to interpretive fluidity.

... Occasionally certain groups, typically those that have historically not had political status and that have fared poorly in the public policy arena, will seek ambiguous language in proposed constitutional amendments. They do this as an innocuous means of entrenching constitutional objectives, subsequently hoping for the chance of favorable interpretations through the courts. The aboriginal movement in Canada attempted this strategy in both the 1981 Patriation Round and the 1992 Charlottetown Round. By contrast, groups that are more firmly established in the political process are more likely to seek the entrenchment of carefully worded amendments, even if it is more difficult to secure agreement on such amendments. This is because groups that enjoy a high degree of political status do not want to risk losing gains already made to the vagaries of interpretively fluid constitutional language.

Of course, as mentioned, interpretive fluidity is more contentious where constitutions feature high levels of amending process rigidity. It is especially contentious in circumstances where there is a large and indeterminate number of constitutional actors—thus the importance of our third variable.

The relevance of the institutional inclusiveness variable is based on the presumption that constitutionally entrenched institutions reflect the interests of those who brought about their creation. ... [T]he constitutional arena is confined to those who can mobilize for special or enhanced constitutional status

... The number and types of groups that can claim enhanced constitutional status is conditioned by constitutional rules in two ways. First, rules can specifically privilege certain groups. A federal constitution, for example, privileges national and subnational governments to the exclusion of other collectivities. This explicit recognition of status provides a power base that privileged groups seek to protect and, where possible, expand. The history and development of Canadian constitutional politics can be understood from such a perspective.

The second means by which rules condition enhanced constitutional status is that they have the potential to provide market niches for aggressive new political entrepreneurs. Indeed, an externality associated with the construction of certain types of rules is that such rules may provide unanticipated opportunities for groups to acquire enhanced constitutional status.

Redistributive indeterminacy conditioned by the three factors described above manifests itself in two types of demands by constitutional actors: regulative rule demands and interpretive rule demands. Regulative rule demands are direct attempts to reduce the ambiguity of redistributive indeterminacy. ...

Constitutional actors also make demands for interpretive rules to clarify the impact of existing rules and principles. In other words, they seek to ensure that the redistributive impact of rules and policies will be as favorable as possible

Both regulative and interpretive rule demands are attempts by groups to overcome redistributive indeterminacy by limiting the maneuverability of judicial decision makers. These demands are typically contentious and invite counterdemands by groups that are hostile or even indifferent to such demands. Such counterdemands are most likely, we argue, where a large number of constitutional actors perceive a one-shot opportunity to amend an interpretively fluid constitution. This perception, in turn, increases the likelihood that the politics of constitutional modification will generate multiple demands for regulative and interpretive rules designed to ensure particular policy outcomes. The result is a degree of overload that may cause the amending process to collapse. . . .

The 1982 amending formula intensifies amending process rigidity in two ways. First and most obviously, it gives all provinces a veto over many comprehensive reforms. Thus, all constitutional actors are aware that constitutional change will be more difficult to achieve than in the past. The result is an incentive for elites to front-load their constitutional demands into one omnibus package, rather than deal with issues sequentially and discretely. . . .

Second, the 1982 amending formula intensifies amending process rigidity through the inclusion of a sunset clause (section 29(2)), whereby all amendments must be ratified by the appropriate legislatures within three years of the date that the first legislature ratifies. Section 29(2) therefore creates an incentive for provinces to delay ratification in the hopes of extracting concessions . . . Provinces that delay ratification can thus make public demands for concessions that are very difficult to retract. As such, bargaining that once took place in private—so-called elite accommodation—is subjected to a second, more public round of bargaining in the ratification stage. It is in this second stage that the original agreement can potentially break down. The Charlottetown Accord process institutionalized this second round of bargaining through the use of a nationwide series of referenda.

The post-1982 era also witnessed a number of problems associated with interpretive fluidity

The Constitution Act (1982) entrenched a weak commitment to aboriginal rights under sections 25 and 35. However, the act left the precise meaning and function of aboriginal rights undefined, to be worked out in a series of constitutional conferences held between 1983 and 1987. Thus, aboriginal leaders came to the bargaining table in 1983 with regulative rule demands regarding a native charter of rights and freedoms and an aboriginal veto. In addition, they made a series of interpretive rule demands dedicated to clarifying the operation of native self-government . . . These interpretive rule demands have been fairly consistent since 1983. Indeed, it was intransigence on the part of many governmental actors that led to the failure of constitutional conferences on aboriginal rights in 1983, 1984, 1985, and 1987. It also explains why, in June 1990, aboriginal leaders rejoiced in the irony that Elijah Harper—a native Indian—was afforded the opportunity to scuttle the Meech Lake Accord single-handedly.

The Charlottetown Accord affords the best illustration of the problems associated with the amending process overload model. By 1992 the degree of amending process rigidity inherent in the 1982 amending formula was apparent to all constitutional actors. Thus, these actors were not willing, as were the Western provinces during the Meech Lake negotiations, for example, to postpone discussion of their objectives to future constitutional rounds. There was a general consensus that Charlottetown represented a one-shot opportunity to effect constitutional change and that opportunities missed were opportunities lost. The result was a host of regulative rule demands that contributed in part to the Charlottetown Accord's ballooning to sixty amendments—a dramatic increase from the seven amendments contained in the Meech Lake Accord. . . .

Interpretive fluidity also played an important role at Charlottetown. The most controversial component of the Meech Lake Accord was the Distinct Society Clause . . . At Charlottetown other constitutional actors had become aware of the potential significance of interpretive clauses on the redistributive impact of existing constitutional language. As a result of a number of (often contradictory) interpretive rule demands by constitutional actors, the Charlottetown Accord included a "Canada Clause" that sought to accommodate these demands. The clause was an ensemble that recognized both the equality of the provinces and Quebec's status as a distinct society; it committed Canadians to a respect for individual and collective rights, without specifying how inevitable clashes between the two might be resolved; and it committed Canadians to racial, ethnic, and gender equality, despite the fact that racial and ethnic equality were already guaranteed under section 15 of the charter and gender equality was guaranteed under section 15 and section 28. The only rationale for this redundancy would be to influence the redistributive impact of competing rights claims and hence to privilege certain social cleavages over others. Interpretive fluidity and the interpretive rule demands that resulted also account in large part for the size of the Charlottetown Accord. Indeed, a full twenty-two amendments were dedicated to interpreting "aboriginal rights" as they exist under sections 25 and 35 of the Constitution Act (1982).

Finally, the Charlottetown Accord also conforms to the third source of amending process overload described in our model: it featured unprecedented societal input. ... Indeed, the referendum campaign witnessed the emergence of a number of societal opinion leaders who evidently carried a good deal of influence with their respective constituents. The referenda resulted in the defeat of the accord in most provinces, as well as at the aggregate level.

In summary, the 1982 Constitution Act was a watershed document in more than the obvious ways, since it changed the institutional context of constitutional modification in Canada. It transformed a flexible and exclusive modification environment without the unique interpretive fluidity of rights-based litigation into one that was inflexible, inclusive, and dominated by judicial interpretation of individual rights. As a result, a much higher level of redistributive indeterminacy became attached to proposals for constitutional modification. The impact of this change became fully apparent during the Charlottetown Accord process, when amending process overload contributed to the accord's ultimate failure.

It is one thing to look backward to understand why the Meech Lake and Charlottetown accords failed. But what about the future of constitutional reform in Canada? Michael Lusztig argues that major amendment proposals like the ones in the Meech Lake and Charlottetown accords are "doomed to fail" because they create the wrong incentives and they require compromises too great for political actors to swallow. See Michael Lusztig, "Constitutional Paralysis: Why Canadian Constitutional Initiatives Are Doomed to Fail" (1994) 27 Can J Polit Sci 747 at 748.

Another way to describe the Constitution of Canada is to call it unamendable. Many constitutions around the world expressly identify rules, principles, procedures, symbols, and values as unamendable, meaning that no measure of support for changing any of them is sufficient to amend them in any way. For example, republicanism is unamendable in France, as is secularism in Turkey and human dignity in Germany. The Constitution of Canada is not unamendable in the same manner, yet it may nonetheless be unamendable in the sense that major constitutional reform is now virtually impossible. Richard Albert has argued that the Constitution of Canada is "constructively unamendable" for matters that are in theory amendable using the general amending formula or the unanimity procedure:

Constructive unamendability "takes root where the political climate makes it practically unimaginable, though nonetheless always theoretically possible, to achieve the necessary agreement from political actors to entrench a formal amendment. This type of unamendability derives from deep divisions among political actors who reach the point of stalemate in their dialogic interactions. Under these conditions, formal amendment becomes impossible unless constitutional politics somehow manages to perform heroics to break the stalemate. The stalemate may itself derive from political incompatibilities, unpalatable pre-conditions to formal amendment, or a simple unwillingness to entertain thoughts of formal amendment despite the constitutional text authorizing the change political actors are unwilling to attempt. Alternatively or in addition, the stalemate may derive from the structural design of the constitution, for instance, a complex horizontal and/or vertical separation of powers that creates multiple veto points along the path to formal amendment.”

See Richard Albert, “Constructive Unamendability in Canada and the United States” (2014) 67 SCLR (2d) 181 at 195.

Even if the Constitution of Canada is constructively unamendable today, it may not be tomorrow as political forces realign into a configuration more open to major constitutional change. In addition, moments of crisis or emergency could overcome the present constructive unamendability of the Constitution, if indeed, it has reached this point of stasis. Kate Glover cautions that we should not overdo claims of the impossibility or complexity of constitutional amendment in Canada. The reason why is important for democracy and legitimacy in Canadian constitutional law and government:

When we start from the position that Part V is unclear and difficult to apply, political actors can too easily avoid the hard work of negotiating multilateral reform. They can rely on interpretive uncertainties to feed claims about political impossibilities and to challenge alternative proposals. Further, when we frame our understanding of Part V in terms of complexity, the courts become the default site for resolving disputes about formal amending procedure. The courts’ involvement has benefits. It ensures that the issues are canvassed in a public forum. It provides the opportunity for a range of perspectives to be heard. And, it can resolve disputes that stall reform, providing analytical frameworks for future deliberations. But there are downsides. A judge-centric approach to understanding Part V grounds constitutional legitimacy in judicial interpretation rather than in the effective action of government or the lived experience of the community. That is, it shifts beliefs about where governance happens. Moreover, when procedural issues are resolved judicially, the actors involved in the amending process miss out on the potential benefits of working through problems of procedure cooperatively before sitting down to negotiate the merits of particular reforms. The potential benefits include building collegiality, articulating common ends, narrowing issues, enhancing political investment in the amending process, learning others’ positions, adjusting expectations, constructing frameworks for further negotiation, accommodating competing interests, reconciling rights and responsibilities, suspending absolutes, agreeing to disagree, and so on.

See Kate Glover, “Complexity and the Amending Formula” (2015) 24 Const Forum Const 9 at 10.

The amendment process overload thesis helps explain why the Meech Lake and Charlottetown accords failed. The theory of mass input/legitimization predicts that future constitutional amendment proposals are unlikely to succeed. The idea of constructive unamendability suggests that the Constitution of Canada may be just as unamendable, if only temporarily, as some of the world’s constitutions that explicitly take certain items off the amendment table. These theories, however, have consequences not only for how we think about the Constitution but also about how its meaning changes over time, and who does the changing. When, if ever, might it be profitable for a constitution to be difficult, and perhaps even impossible, to amend? Are there certain periods of time in the life of a constitutional democracy when we might want to discourage major constitutional reforms or at least complicate them more than would ordinarily be the case?

V. MODERN CHALLENGES TO CONSTITUTIONAL CHANGE

A. INDIGENOUS PEOPLES AND RESTORATIVE JUSTICE

1. Section 35.1

In 1983, the Constitution of Canada was amended to include a “commitment to participation” for Indigenous peoples in future constitutional conferences. See Government of Canada, “Constitutional Amendment Proclamation, 1983, SI/84-102” (1 October 1995), online: Solon.org <https://www.solon.org/Constitutions/Canada/English/cap_1983.html>. The commitment reads as follows:

Commitment to participation in constitutional conference

35.1 The government of Canada and the provincial governments are committed to the principle that, before any amendment is made to Class 24 of section 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867, to section 25 of this Act or to this Part,

(a) a constitutional conference that includes in its agenda an item relating to the proposed amendment, composed of the Prime Minister of Canada and the first ministers of the provinces, will be convened by the Prime Minister of Canada; and

(b) the Prime Minister of Canada will invite representatives of the aboriginal peoples of Canada to participate in the discussions on that item.

Section 35.1 was passed as an amendment to the Constitution of Canada using s 38, requiring approval resolutions from both houses of Parliament and seven of the ten provinces, whose total population amounts to at least half of the total provincial population. That was the first and only successful use s 38.

Section 35.1 requires that any amendment proposal affecting three specific sections of the Constitution must be preceded by a constitutional conference of first ministers and representatives of Indigenous peoples. Those three sections are, first, s 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867, which concerns the legislative authority of Parliament as to “Indians, and Lands reserved for the Indians”; second, s 25 of the Constitution Act, 1982, which concerns “aboriginal, treaty or other rights or freedoms that pertain to the aboriginal peoples of Canada” in relation to land claims agreements and the Royal Proclamation of 1763; and, third, s 35.1 itself.

This commitment to participation does not impose a duty to obtain the consent of Indigenous peoples. Should the Constitution be revised to give Indigenous peoples the right to withhold consent on amendments affecting these matters? If yes, how would consent be obtained—directly from the Indigenous peoples in Canada, from their representatives, or in some other way?

Nonetheless, s 35.1 “affirms by implication that Aboriginal ‘peoples’ have a distinct constitutional character and role. That unique character is political and governmental in nature.” See Paul LAH Chartrand, “Indigenous Peoples: Negotiating Constitutional Reconciliation and Legitimacy in Canada” (2011) 19 Waikato L Rev 14 at 20. Chartrand offers further background on s 35.1:

Section 35.1 itself resulted from national conferences on constitutional reform at which the participants were all Canadian first ministers and representatives of the Aboriginal peoples of Canada. Representatives of the Aboriginal peoples of Canada have, since the 1980s participated in intergovernmental meetings on national and provincial political issues.

An Aboriginal “people” is a distinct constitutional entity that has governmental functions and that has a distinct role in constitutional statecraft. The history of Aboriginal peoples, in particular the negotiations and agreements leading to the historic treaties with the First Nations, demonstrates that Aboriginal peoples are distinct constitutional entities whose consent matters for constitutional legitimacy.

It will be recalled that s 35.1 constitutionalises the commitment of the federal and provincial governments to the “principle” that Aboriginal peoples have a role in constitutional reform on matters that affect their interests and rights. If this is a principle then s 35.1 ought to be read so as to apply beyond the specific provisions that are listed in s 35.1 and to include all provisions of the Constitution that affect the interests and rights of Aboriginal peoples, including the relevant provisions of the Constitution Act 1930. This interpretation makes the present argument applicable to the intention of First Nations to seek changes to the lands and natural resources provisions in that Constitutional document, as mentioned above.

The principle that Aboriginal peoples’ representatives have a legitimate role in governmental and intergovernmental affairs in Canada is reinforced by the federal policy first adopted in 1995 which recognises the inherent right of self-government and leads to negotiations on the modern treaties with First Nations.

See Chartrand at 20-21. For more background, see Patrick Macklem & Douglas Sanderson, From Recognition to Reconciliation: Essays on the Constitutional Entrenchment of Aboriginal and Treaty Rights (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2016).

Moving from 1983 to 1992, the agreement that was reached on final text of the Charlottetown Accord acknowledged the insufficiency of s 35.1. This is clear in both the length and detail that was proposed to replace what currently appears in s 35.1. Here is what was proposed to replace s 35.1:

35.1(1) The Aboriginal peoples of Canada have the inherent right of self-government within Canada.

(2) The right referred to in subsection (1) shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the recognition of the governments of the Aboriginal peoples of Canada as constituting one of three orders of government in Canada.

(3) The exercise of the right referred to in subsection (1) includes the authority of duly constituted legislative bodies of the Aboriginal peoples, each within its own jurisdiction,

(a) to safeguard and develop their languages, cultures, economies, identities, institutions and traditions, and

(b) to develop, maintain and strengthen their relationship with their lands, waters and environment, so as to determine and control their development as peoples according to their own values and priorities and to ensure the integrity of their societies.

(4) Where an issue arises in any proceedings in relation to the scope of the inherent right of self-government, or in relation to an assertion of that right, a court or tribunal

(a) before making any final determination of the issue, shall inquire into the efforts that have been made to resolve the issue through negotiations under section 35.2 and may order the parties to take such steps as may be appropriate in the circumstances to effect a negotiated resolution; and

(b) in making any final determination of the issue, shall take into account subsection (3).

(5) Neither the right referred to in subsection (1) nor anything in subsection 35.2(1) creates new aboriginal rights to land or abrogates or derogates from existing aboriginal or treaty rights to land, except as otherwise provided in self-government agreements negotiated under section 35.2.

35.2(1) The government of Canada, the provincial and territorial governments and the Aboriginal peoples of Canada, including the Indian, Inuit and Metis peoples of Canada, in the various regions and communities shall negotiate in good faith the implementation of the right of self-government, including issues of

- (a) jurisdiction,
- (b) lands and resources, and
- (c) economic and fiscal arrangements, with the objective of concluding agreements elaborating relationships between governments of aboriginal peoples and the government of Canada and provincial or territorial governments.

(2) Negotiations referred to in subsection (1) may be initiated only by the representatives or governments of the Aboriginal peoples concerned, and shall, unless otherwise agreed by the parties to the negotiations, be conducted in accordance with the process for negotiations outlined in an accord entered into by the government of Canada, the provincial and territorial governments and representatives of the aboriginal peoples.

(3) All the Aboriginal peoples of Canada shall have equitable access to negotiations referred to in subsection (1).

(4) Agreement negotiated under this section may provide for bodies or institutions of self-government that are open to the participation of all residents of the region to which the agreement relates as determined by the agreement.

(5) The parties to negotiations referred to in subsection (1) shall have regard to the different circumstances of the various aboriginal peoples of Canada.

(6) Where an agreement negotiated under this section

(a) is set out in a treaty or land claims agreement, or in an amendment to a treaty including a land claims agreement, or

(b) contains a declaration that the rights of the aboriginal peoples set out in the agreement are treaty rights, the rights of the Aboriginal peoples set out in the agreement are treaty rights under subsection 35(1).

(7) Nothing in this section abrogates or derogates from the rights referred to in section 35 or 35.1, or from the enforceability thereof, and nothing in subsection 35.1(3) or in this section makes those rights contingent on the commitment to negotiate under this section.

35.3(1) Except in relation to self-government agreements concluded after the coming into force of this section, section 35.1 shall not be made the subject of judicial notice, interpretation or enforcement for five years after this section comes into force.

(2) For greater certainty, nothing in subsection (1) prevents the justiciability of disputes in relation to

(a) any existing rights that are recognized and affirmed in subsection 35(1), including any rights relating to self-government, when raised in any court; or

(b) the process of negotiations under section 35.2.

(3) Nothing in subsection (1) abrogates or derogates from section 35.1 or renders section 35.1 contingent on the happening of any future event, and subsection (1) merely delays for five years judicial notice, interpretation or enforcement of that section.

35.4(1) Except as otherwise provided by the Constitution of Canada, the laws of Canada and the laws of the provinces and territories continue to apply to the Aboriginal peoples of Canada, subject nevertheless to being displaced by laws enacted by legislative bodies of the Aboriginal peoples according to their authority.

(2) No aboriginal law or any other exercise of the inherent right of self-government under section 35.1 may be inconsistent with federal or provincial laws that are essential to the preservation of peace, order and good government in Canada.

(3) For greater certainty, nothing in this section extends the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada or the legislatures of the provinces or territories.

35.5(1) Subsections 6(2) and (3) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms do not preclude a legislative body or government of the Aboriginal peoples of Canada from exercising authority pursuant to this Part through affirmative action measures that have as their object the amelioration of conditions of individuals or groups who are socially or economically disadvantaged or the protection and advancement of aboriginal languages and cultures.

(2) For greater certainty, nothing in this section abrogates or derogates from section 15, 25 or 28 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms or from section 35.7 of this Part.

35.6(1) The treaty rights referred to in subsection 35(1) shall be interpreted in a just, broad and liberal manner taking into account their spirit and intent and the context of the specific treaty negotiations relating thereto.

(2) The government of Canada is committed to establishing treaty processes to clarify or implement treaty rights and, where the parties agree, to rectify terms of the treaties, and is committed, where requested by the Aboriginal peoples of Canada concerned, to participating in good faith in the process that relates to them.

(3) The governments of the provinces and territories are committed, to the extent that they have jurisdiction, to participating in good faith in the processes referred to in subsection (2), where jointly invited by the government of Canada and the Aboriginal peoples of Canada concerned or where it is specified that they will do so under the terms of the treaty concerned.

(4) The participants in the processes referred to in subsection (2) shall have regard to, among other things and where appropriate, the spirit and intent of the treaties, as understood by the aboriginal peoples concerned.

(5) For greater certainty, all those Aboriginal peoples of Canada who have treaty rights shall have equitable access to the processes referred to in this section.

(6) Nothing in this section abrogates or derogates from any rights of the Aboriginal peoples of Canada who are not parties to a particular treaty.

35.7 Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the rights of the Aboriginal peoples of Canada referred to in this Part are guaranteed equally to male and female persons.

[35.8* The government of Canada and the provincial governments are committed to the principle that, before any amendment described in section 45.1 is made,

(a) a constitutional conference that includes in its agenda an item relating to the proposed amendment, composed of the Prime Minister of Canada and the first ministers of the provinces will be convened by the Prime Minister of Canada; and

(b) The Prime Minister of Canada will invite representatives of the aboriginal peoples of Canada to participate in the discussions on that item.]

(* SQUARE BRACKETED ITEM: The final wording of this provision (based on existing section 35.1 added in 1984) is to be revisited when the consent mechanism is finalized for section 45.1, at which time concerns will be addressed in respect of amendments directly referring to Aboriginal peoples in some but not all regions of Canada).

35.9(1) At least four constitutional conferences on aboriginal issues composed of the Prime Minister of Canada, the first ministers of the provinces, representatives of the Aboriginal peoples of Canada and elected representatives of the governments of the territories shall be convened by the Prime Minister of Canada, the first to be held no later than 1996 and the three subsequent conferences to be held one every two years thereafter.

(2) Each conference convened under subsection (1) shall have included in its agenda such items as are proposed by the representatives of the Aboriginal peoples of Canada.

35.91 For greater certainty, nothing in this part extends the powers of the legislative authorities or governments of the territories.

The differences between the two are vast. How does the Charlottetown version improve upon the current version? Are there improvements you would make to the Charlottetown version? What would they be? And which of part V's amendment procedures would be required to bring them into law?

2. The Uluru Statement from the Heart

Canada is, of course, not the only jurisdiction currently working toward reconciliation. A fellow Commonwealth country, Australia, is currently in the midst of a national discussion on whether and how to amend its constitution.

In December 2015, the Government of Australia and the Opposition agreed on a 16-member Referendum Council "to consult widely throughout Australia and take the next steps towards achieving constitutional recognition of the First Australians." Referendum Council, Discussion Paper on Constitutional Recognition of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Peoples (October 2016) at 1, online (pdf): <https://www.referendumcouncil.org.au/sites/default/files/2016-12/referendum_council_discussion_paper.pdf>.

The Referendum Council was interested in the views of Australians on whether the constitution should be reformed and, if so, how. The driving force behind these efforts was to invite Australians to "think about some specific proposals for symbolic and practical reform and how they might ensure that the Constitution treats Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples more fairly" (at 1). The Referendum Council also committed to consulting with Indigenous peoples in a forum and format designed and led by Indigenous peoples themselves.

Amending the Constitution of Australia requires a referendum, hence the name of the commission created in Australia. Here is the Australian amendment procedure:

This Constitution shall not be altered except in the following manner:

The proposed law for the alteration thereof must be passed by an absolute majority of each House of the Parliament, and not less than two nor more than six months after its passage through both Houses the proposed law shall be submitted in each State and Territory to the electors qualified to vote for the election of members of the House of Representatives.

But if either House passes any such proposed law by an absolute majority, and the other House rejects or fails to pass it, or passes it with any amendment to which the first-mentioned House will not agree, and if after an interval of three months the first-mentioned House in the same or the next session again passes the proposed law by an absolute majority with or without any amendment which has been made or agreed to by the other House, and such other House rejects or fails to pass it or passes it with any amendment to which the first-mentioned House will not agree, the Governor-General may submit the proposed law as last proposed by the first mentioned House, and either with or without any amendments subsequently agreed to by both Houses, to the electors in each State and Territory qualified to vote for the election of the House of Representatives.

When a proposed law is submitted to the electors the vote shall be taken in such manner as the Parliament prescribes. But until the qualification of electors of members of the House of Representatives becomes uniform throughout the Commonwealth, only one-half the electors voting for and against the proposed law shall be counted in any State in which adult suffrage prevails.

And if in a majority of the States a majority of the electors voting approve the proposed law, and if a majority of all the electors voting also approve the proposed law, it shall be presented to the Governor-General for the Queen's assent.

No alteration diminishing the proportionate representation of any State in either House of the Parliament, or the minimum number of representatives of a State in the House of Representatives, or increasing, diminishing, or otherwise altering the limits of the State, or in any manner affecting the provisions of the Constitution in relation thereto, shall become law unless the majority of the electors voting in that State approve the proposed law.

In this section, Territory means any territory referred to in section one hundred and twenty-two of this Constitution in respect of which there is in force a law allowing its representation in the House of Representatives.

See Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act, s 128.

In May 2017, First Nations from across Australia issued what is known as the Uluru Statement from the Heart. The Uluru Statement calls for two reforms: a First Nations Voice to Parliament and a Makarrata Commission. These reforms would require a constitutional amendment, which is possible only with a referendum.

The first reform would create a permanent institution to express the views of First Nations to the Parliament and to the government on issues affecting First Nations. The second reform would create a commission to oversee treaty-making and truth-telling in accordance with the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, UN GA res 61/295.

Here is the full text of the Uluru Statement:

Our Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander tribes were the first sovereign Nations of the Australian continent and its adjacent islands, and possessed it under our own laws and customs. This our ancestors did, according to the reckoning of our culture, from the Creation, according to the common law from 'time immemorial', and according to science more than 60,000 years ago.

This sovereignty is a spiritual notion: the ancestral tie between the land, or 'mother nature', and the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples who were born therefrom, remain attached thereto, and must one day return thither to be united with our ancestors. This link is the basis of the ownership of the soil, or better, of sovereignty. It has never been ceded or extinguished, and co-exists with the sovereignty of the Crown.

How could it be otherwise? That peoples possessed a land for sixty millennia and this sacred link disappears from world history in merely the last two hundred years?

With substantive constitutional change and structural reform, we believe this ancient sovereignty can shine through as a fuller expression of Australia's nationhood.

Proportionally, we are the most incarcerated people on the planet. We are not an innately criminal people. Our children are aliened from their families at unprecedented rates. This cannot be because we have no love for them. And our youth languish in detention in obscene numbers. They should be our hope for the future.

These dimensions of our crisis tell plainly the structural nature of our problem. This is the torment of our powerlessness.

We seek constitutional reforms to empower our people and take a rightful place in our own country. When we have power over our destiny our children will flourish. They will walk in two worlds and their culture will be a gift to their country.

We call for the establishment of a First Nations Voice enshrined in the Constitution.

Makarrata is the culmination of our agenda: the coming together after a struggle. It captures our aspirations for a fair and truthful relationship with the people of Australia and a better future for our children based on justice and self-determination.

We seek a Makarrata Commission to supervise a process of agreement-making between governments and First Nations and truth-telling about our history.

In 1967 we were counted, in 2017 we seek to be heard. We leave base camp and start our trek across this vast country. We invite you to walk with us in a movement of the Australian people for a better future.

See "The Uluru Statement from the Heart" (2017), online: Referendum Council <<https://ulurustatement.org/the-statement>>.

Here in Canada, the Truth and Reconciliation Commission issued a report enumerating 94 Calls to Action. But none called expressly for constitutional reform in Canada. Could Canada benefit from its equivalent of the Referendum Council created in Australia to examine how the Constitution of Canada should be reformed to advance the objectives of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission Report? Could Canada benefit from its equivalent of the Uluru Statement, tailored to the specificities of the history and context of the Canadian experience?

B. CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT AND QUEBEC SOVEREIGNTY

1. A Quebec Veto and the Regional Veto Act

Quebec governments have pressed for the inclusion of a Quebec veto in the amending formula. To date they have been unsuccessful, except for the list of matters in s 41 (the unanimity formula), which gives a veto to all the provinces. The Meech Lake and Charlottetown accords would have expanded the list of matters subject to s 41. Would this have been advisable?

In October 1995, a referendum on sovereignty was narrowly defeated in Quebec (discussed below). This prompted the federal Parliament to enact An Act respecting constitutional amendments, SC 1996, c 1 (the Regional Veto Act), which provides a regional veto—including a veto for Quebec—in the form of a federal government promise not to propose any constitutional amendment without the agreement of the five regions of Canada, except in circumstances where a province affected can exercise a veto or opt out of the amendment. The Act reads:

(1) No Minister of the Crown shall propose a motion for a resolution to authorize an amendment to the Constitution of Canada, other than an amendment in respect of which the legislative assembly of a province may exercise a veto under section 41 or 43 of the Constitution Act, 1982 or may express its dissent under subsection 38(3) of that Act, unless the amendment has first been consented to by a majority of the provinces that includes:

- (a) Ontario;
- (b) Quebec;
- (c) British Columbia.

(d) two or more of the Atlantic provinces that have, according to the then latest general census, combined populations of at least fifty per cent of the population of all the Atlantic provinces; and

(e) two or more of the Prairie provinces that have, according to the then latest general census, combined populations of at least fifty per cent of the population of all the Prairie provinces;

(2) In this section,

Atlantic provinces means the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland and Labrador;

Prairie provinces means the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Does this make the amending formula unnecessarily rigid? As we discuss below in Section VI, the Constitution of Canada is already difficult to amend. The Regional Veto Act makes it harder. But is it now too hard?

Two scholars have shown that the effect of the Regional Veto Act is to end the legal equality of the provinces in the constitutional amendment process. Whereas part V of the Constitution Act, 1982 treats all provinces equally, with no province having any special power in the amendment process, the Regional Veto Act creates two classes of provinces—those with veto power, and those without: see Andrew Heard & Tim Swartz, "The Regional Veto Formula and Its Effects on Canada's Constitutional Amendment Process" (1997) 30 Can J Polit Sci 339. There is another point to note: the Regional Veto Act now imposes new requirements for a constitutional amendment under s 38—requirements that do not appear in part V of the Constitution Act, 1982. Do either of these provide grounds to argue that the Regional Veto Act is constitutionally invalid?

2. Quebec Secession

In recent years, discussions of the amending formula have centred on the potential secession of Quebec. This issue has attracted the attention of legal commentators because of the 1995 sovereignty referendum in that province, which rejected sovereignty by an extremely narrow margin. Part of the federal government's response was to convince Quebecers that the road to independence would be costly and difficult. In particular, the federal government sought to respond to the view, asserted by some Quebec sovereigntists, that a "yes" vote would automatically effect the legal secession of the province. They did this by asserting that a "yes" vote had no concrete legal effect and would at best result in a political process of intergovernmental negotiations that might culminate in a package of constitutional amendments that would have to comply with the rules spelled out in part V to become effective. The centrepiece of this part of the federal strategy—referred to as "Plan B"—was the posing of the following three reference questions to the Supreme Court of Canada on September 30, 1996:

1. Under the Constitution of Canada, can the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally?
2. Does international law give the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec the right to effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally? In this regard, is there a right to self-determination under international law that would give the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec the right to effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally?
3. In the event of a conflict between domestic and international law on the right of the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec to effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally, which would take precedence in Canada?

See Order in Council PC 1996-1497 (30 September 1996) as cited in Reference re Secession of Quebec, [1998] 2 SCR 217, 1998 CanLII 793 at para 2.

The expectation among legal commentators was that the Court would answer the first two questions in the negative and that, as a consequence, it would decline to answer the third question. With respect to question 1, it was thought that the Court would simply point out that although the Constitution contains no provisions governing secession of a province, the Constitution does not expressly prohibit it, meaning that secession is legally possible. However, what secession requires is a constitutional amendment and, hence, compliance with the amending formulas in part V of the Constitution Act, 1982. The legal secession of a province from Canada would require many constitutional amendments: for one list, see Peter Russell & Bruce Ryder, Ratifying a Postreferendum Agreement on Quebec Sovereignty (Toronto: CD Howe Institute, 1997). Legal commentators generally assumed that most of the required changes would engage amending formulas other than s 45 (the provincial unilateral procedure) because the required changes would go much further than the constitution of a province. And because every other amending formula requires the consent of the federal government, it was thought that the Court would simply hold that a unilateral secession, by definition, is unconstitutional.

In its advisory opinion, the Supreme Court confounded those expectations. The following extract contains the part of the Court's judgment dealing specifically with the constitutionality of unilateral secession. The earlier portions of the judgment, in which the Court set out the principles of the Canadian Constitution on which it drew to deal with the secession issue, are found in Chapter 2, Judicial Review and Constitutional Interpretation.

Reference re Secession of Quebec

[1998] 2 SCR 217, 1998 CanLII 793

THE COURT (Lamer CJ and L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin, Iacobucci, Major, Bastarache, and Binnie JJ):

[83] Secession is the effort of a group or section of a state to withdraw itself from the political and constitutional authority of that state, with a view to achieving statehood for a new territorial unit on the international plane. In a federal state, secession typically takes the form of a territorial unit seeking to withdraw from the federation. Secession is a legal act as much as a political one. By the terms of Question 1 of this Reference, we are asked to rule on the legality of unilateral secession “[u]nder the Constitution of Canada.” This is an appropriate question, as the legality of unilateral secession must be evaluated, at least in the first instance, from the perspective of the domestic legal order of the state from which the unit seeks to withdraw. ...

[84] The secession of a province from Canada must be considered, in legal terms, to require an amendment to the Constitution, which perforce requires negotiation. The amendments necessary to achieve a secession could be radical and extensive. Some commentators have suggested that secession could be a change of such a magnitude that it could not be considered to be merely an amendment to the Constitution. We are not persuaded by this contention. It is of course true that the Constitution is silent as to the ability of a province to secede from Confederation but, although the Constitution neither expressly authorizes nor prohibits secession, an act of secession would purport to alter the governance of Canadian territory in a manner which undoubtedly is inconsistent with our current constitutional arrangements. The fact that those changes would be profound, or that they would purport to have a significance with respect to international law, does not negate their nature as amendments to the Constitution of Canada.

[85] The Constitution is the expression of the sovereignty of the people of Canada. It lies within the power of the people of Canada, acting through their various governments duly elected and recognized under the Constitution, to effect whatever constitutional arrangements are desired within Canadian territory, including, should it be so desired, the secession of Quebec from Canada. ... By the terms of this Reference, we have been asked to consider whether it would be constitutional in such a circumstance for the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec to effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally.

[86] The “unilateral” nature of the act is of cardinal importance and we must be clear as to what is understood by this term. In one sense, any step towards a constitutional amendment initiated by a single actor on the constitutional stage is “unilateral.” We do not believe that this is the meaning contemplated by Question 1, nor is this the sense in which the term has been used in argument before us. Rather, what is claimed by a right to secede “unilaterally” is the right to effectuate secession without prior negotiations with the other provinces and the federal government. At issue is not the legality of the first step but the legality of the final act of purported unilateral secession. The supposed juridical basis for such an act is said to be a clear expression of democratic will in a referendum in the province of Quebec. This claim requires us to examine the possible juridical impact, if any, of such a referendum on the functioning of our Constitution, and on the claimed legality of a unilateral act of secession.

[87] Although the Constitution does not itself address the use of a referendum procedure, and the results of a referendum have no direct role or legal effect in our constitutional scheme, a referendum undoubtedly may provide a democratic method of ascertaining the views of the electorate on important political questions on a particular occasion. The democratic principle identified above would demand that considerable weight be given to a clear expression by the people of Quebec of their will to secede from Canada, even though a referendum, in itself and without more, has no direct legal effect, and could not in itself bring about unilateral secession. Our political institutions are premised on the democratic principle, and so an expression of the democratic will of the people of a province carries weight, in that it would confer legitimacy on the efforts of the government of Quebec to initiate the Constitution's amendment process in order to secede by constitutional means. In this context, we refer to a "clear" majority as a qualitative evaluation. The referendum result, if it is to be taken as an expression of the democratic will, must be free of ambiguity both in terms of the question asked and in terms of the support it achieves.

[88] The federalism principle, in conjunction with the democratic principle, dictates that the clear repudiation of the existing constitutional order and the clear expression of the desire to pursue secession by the population of a province would give rise to a reciprocal obligation on all parties to Confederation to negotiate constitutional changes to respond to that desire. The amendment of the Constitution begins with a political process undertaken pursuant to the Constitution itself. In Canada, the initiative for constitutional amendment is the responsibility of democratically elected representatives of the participants in Confederation. Those representatives may, of course, take their cue from a referendum, but in legal terms, constitution-making in Canada, as in many countries, is undertaken by the democratically elected representatives of the people. The corollary of a legitimate attempt by one participant in Confederation to seek an amendment to the Constitution is an obligation on all parties to come to the negotiating table. The clear repudiation by the people of Quebec of the existing constitutional order would confer legitimacy on demands for secession, and place an obligation on the other provinces and the federal government to acknowledge and respect that expression of democratic will by entering into negotiations and conducting them in accordance with the underlying constitutional principles already discussed.

[89] What is the content of this obligation to negotiate? At this juncture, we confront the difficult inter-relationship between substantive obligations flowing from the Constitution and questions of judicial competence and restraint in supervising or enforcing those obligations. This is mirrored by the distinction between the legality and the legitimacy of actions taken under the Constitution. We propose to focus first on the substantive obligations flowing from this obligation to negotiate; once the nature of those obligations has been described, it is easier to assess the appropriate means of enforcement of those obligations, and to comment on the distinction between legality and legitimacy.

[90] The conduct of the parties in such negotiations would be governed by the same constitutional principles which give rise to the duty to negotiate: federalism, democracy, constitutionalism and the rule of law, and the protection of minorities. Those principles lead us to reject two absolutist propositions. One of those propositions is that there would be a legal obligation on the other provinces and federal government to accede to the secession of a province, subject only to negotiation of the logistical details of secession. ...

[91] For both theoretical and practical reasons, we cannot accept this view. We hold that Quebec could not purport to invoke a right of self-determination such as to dictate the terms of a proposed secession to the other parties: that would not be a negotiation at all. As well, it would be naive to expect that the substantive goal of secession could readily be distinguished from the practical details of secession. The devil would be in the details. The democracy principle, as we have emphasized, cannot be invoked to trump the principles of federalism and rule of law, the rights of individuals and minorities, or the operation of democracy in the other provinces or in Canada as a whole. No negotiations could be effective if their ultimate outcome, secession, is cast as an absolute legal entitlement based upon an obligation to give effect to that act of secession in the Constitution. Such a foregone conclusion would actually undermine the obligation to negotiate and render it hollow.

[92] However, we are equally unable to accept the reverse proposition, that a clear expression of self-determination by the people of Quebec would impose no obligations upon the other provinces or the federal government. The continued existence and operation of the Canadian constitutional order cannot remain indifferent to the clear expression of a clear majority of Quebecers that they no longer wish to remain in Canada. ... The rights of other provinces and the federal government cannot deny the right of the government of Quebec to pursue secession, should a clear majority of the people of Quebec choose that goal, so long as in doing so, Quebec respects the rights of others. Negotiations would be necessary to address the interests of the federal government, of Quebec and the other provinces, and other participants, as well as the rights of all Canadians both within and outside Quebec.

[93] Is the rejection of both of these propositions reconcilable? Yes, once it is realized that none of the rights or principles under discussion is absolute to the exclusion of the others. This observation suggests that other parties cannot exercise their rights in such a way as to amount to an absolute denial of Quebec's rights, and similarly, that so long as Quebec exercises its rights while respecting the rights of others, it may propose secession and seek to achieve it through negotiation. ... A political majority that does not act in accordance with the underlying constitutional principles we have identified puts at risk the legitimacy of the exercise of its rights.

[94] In such circumstances, the conduct of the parties assumes primary constitutional significance. The negotiation process must be conducted with an eye to the constitutional principles we have outlined, which must inform the actions of all the participants in the negotiation process.

[95] Refusal of a party to conduct negotiations in a manner consistent with constitutional principles and values would seriously put at risk the legitimacy of that party's assertion of its rights, and perhaps the negotiation process as a whole. ...

[96] No one can predict the course that such negotiations might take. The possibility that they might not lead to an agreement amongst the parties must be recognized. ... Of course, secession would give rise to many issues of great complexity and difficulty. These would have to be resolved within the overall framework of the rule of law, thereby assuring Canadians resident in Quebec and elsewhere a measure of stability in what would likely be a period of considerable upheaval and uncertainty. Nobody seriously suggests that our national existence, seamless in so many aspects, could be effortlessly separated along what are now the provincial boundaries of Quebec. As the Attorney General of Saskatchewan put it in his oral submission:

A nation is built when the communities that comprise it make commitments to it, when they forego choices and opportunities on behalf of a nation, ... when the communities that comprise it make compromises, when they offer each other guarantees, when they make transfers and perhaps most pointedly, when they receive from others the benefits of national solidarity. The threads of a thousand acts of accommodation are the fabric of a nation

[97] In the circumstances, negotiations following such a referendum would undoubtedly be difficult. While the negotiators would have to contemplate the possibility of secession, there would be no absolute legal entitlement to it and no assumption that an agreement reconciling all relevant rights and obligations would actually be reached. It is foreseeable that even negotiations carried out in conformity with the underlying constitutional principles could reach an impasse. We need not speculate here as to what would then transpire. Under the Constitution, secession requires that an amendment be negotiated.

[98] The respective roles of the courts and political actors in discharging the constitutional obligations we have identified follows ineluctably from the foregoing observations. In the Patriation Reference [Re: Resolution to amend the Constitution, [1981] 1 SCR 753, 1981 CanLII 25], a distinction was drawn between the law of the Constitution, which, generally speaking, will be enforced by the courts, and other constitutional rules, such as the conventions of the Constitution, which carry only political sanctions. It is also the case, however, that judicial intervention, even in relation to the law of the Constitution, is subject to the Court's appreciation of its proper role in the constitutional scheme.

[100] The role of the Court in this Reference is limited to the identification of the relevant aspects of the Constitution in their broadest sense. ... The Court has no supervisory role over the political aspects of constitutional negotiations. Equally, the initial impetus for negotiation, namely a clear majority on a clear question in favour of secession, is subject only to political evaluation, and properly so. ... Only the political actors would have the information and expertise to make the appropriate judgment as to the point at which, and the circumstances in which, those ambiguities are resolved one way or the other.

[101] If the circumstances giving rise to the duty to negotiate were to arise, the distinction between the strong defence of legitimate interests and the taking of positions which, in fact, ignore the legitimate interests of others is one that also defies legal analysis. The Court would not have access to all of the information available to the political actors, and the methods appropriate for the search for truth in a court of law are ill-suited to getting to the bottom of constitutional negotiations. To the extent that the questions are political in nature, it is not the role of the judiciary to interpose its own views on the different negotiating positions of the parties, even were it invited to do so. Rather, it is the obligation of the elected representatives to give concrete form to the discharge of their constitutional obligations which only they and their electors can ultimately assess. ...

[104] Accordingly, the secession of Quebec from Canada cannot be accomplished by the National Assembly, the legislature or government of Quebec unilaterally, that is to say, without principled negotiations, and be considered a lawful act. ... However, the continued existence and operation of the Canadian constitutional order cannot remain unaffected by the unambiguous expression of a clear majority of Quebecers that they no longer wish to remain in Canada. The primary means by which that expression is given effect is the constitutional duty to negotiate in accordance with the constitutional principles that we have described herein. In the event secession negotiations are initiated, our Constitution, no less than our history, would call on the participants to work to reconcile the rights, obligations and legitimate aspirations of all Canadians within a framework that emphasizes constitutional responsibilities as much as it does constitutional rights.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Clear majority, clear question, and the duty to negotiate. Until the judgment, it had been thought that referenda played no role in constitutional amendment. Indeed, an earlier draft of part V would have permitted amendment on the basis of a positive result in a national referendum; this procedure was ultimately removed. The central holding in the Secession Reference is that "a decision of a clear majority of the population of Quebec on a clear question to pursue secession" (at para 93) would trigger a duty to negotiate the required constitutional amendments to give effect to the desire to secede. However, the Court did not define "clear majority" or "clear question." Commentators have given the clear majority requirement varying interpretations: a super-majority requirement—for example, 60 percent or two-thirds; a simple majority but with the results free from doubt that could be created, for example, by voting irregularities; or a majority of eligible voters, as opposed to simply a majority of votes cast. What do you think? On the issue of what a clear question would be, the Court says no more than that the question should be on secession. Would this preclude posing a question that omitted any reference to secession—for example, a question that referred to sovereignty, or to renewed federalism? In this context, consider the question posed to voters in the 1995 referendum:

Do you agree that Quebec should become sovereign, after having made a formal offer to Canada for a new economic and political partnership, within the scope of the bill respecting the future of Quebec and of the agreement signed on June 12, 1995?

See Secrétariat du Québec aux relations canadiennes, "Historical Background" (last visited 22 November 2021) at para 19, online: Gouvernement de Québec <<https://www.ssrc.gouv.qc.ca/relations-canadiennes/politique-affirmation/rappels-historiques-en.asp>>.

Is this question "a clear question to pursue secession"? Recall that the Court did not specify who the parties to constitutional negotiations would be—that is, which parties would be under the duty to negotiate. The judgment refers variously to "the other provinces and the federal government" (at paras 86, 88, 151), "the representatives of two legitimate majorities" (at para 93), and "participants in Confederation" (at paras 69, 88, 149, 150). Does this mean that negotiations would be bilateral—that is, between Quebec and the federal government—or multilateral? If the negotiations are multilateral, would they be limited to representatives of the federal and provincial governments, or would they include Indigenous peoples?

2. No judicial supervision. Arguably, the ambiguities in the judgment would not have posed a difficulty if the Court had indicated its future willingness to flesh out the legal framework governing secession and to supervise both the process and outcome of constitutional negotiations. However, the Court declined to do so, effectively leaving the interpretation and application of the rules of the Canadian Constitution governing secession to "the political actors." Is this the normal division of labour between courts and legislatures in constitutional interpretation? If not, what reasons did the Court give for departing from this norm? Are these reasons convincing? Consider the following explanation offered by Sujit Choudhry and Robert Howse:

[O]nce we examine the political context surrounding the Quebec Secession Reference, it becomes evident that the Court acted in the face of the failure of federal political institutions to face the challenge posed by the referendum process in Quebec to the legitimacy of the Canadian constitutional order . . . Before the reference questions had been issued, it was entirely open to the federal government to lay down principles governing referenda and secession.

See Sujit Choudhry & Robert Howse, "Constitutional Theory and the Quebec Secession Reference" (2000) 13 Can JL & Jur 143.

Both the federal Parliament and the Quebec National Assembly have accepted the Court's invitation to contextualize the constitutional norms regarding secession: see An Act to give effect to the requirement for clarity as set out in the opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Quebec Secession Reference, SC 2000, c 26 (the federal Clarity Act) and An Act respecting the exercise of the fundamental rights and prerogatives of the Québec people and the Québec State, SQ 2000, c 46 (Quebec's Fundamental Rights Act). On what constitutes a clear majority, s 2 of the Clarity Act provides:

2(1) Where the government of a province, following a referendum relating to the secession of the province from Canada, seeks to enter into negotiations on the terms on which that province might cease to be part of Canada, the House of Commons shall, except where it has determined pursuant to section 1 that a referendum question is not clear, consider and, by resolution, set out its determination on whether, in the circumstances, there has been a clear expression of a will by a clear majority of the population of that province that the province cease to be part of Canada.

- (2) In considering whether there has been a clear expression of a will by a clear majority of the population of a province that the province cease to be part of Canada, the House of Commons shall take into account
- the size of the majority of valid votes cast in favour of the secessionist option;
 - the percentage of eligible voters voting in the referendum; and
 - any other matters or circumstances it considers to be relevant.

(3) In considering whether there has been a clear expression of a will by a clear majority of the population of a province that the province cease to be part of Canada, the House of Commons shall take into account the views of all political parties represented in the legislative assembly of the province whose government proposed the referendum on secession, any formal statements or resolutions by the government or legislative assembly of any province or territory of Canada, any formal statements or resolutions by the Senate, any formal statements or resolutions by the representatives of the Aboriginal peoples of Canada, especially those in the province whose government proposed the referendum on secession, and any other views it considers to be relevant.

(4) The Government of Canada shall not enter into negotiations on the terms on which a province might cease to be part of Canada unless the House of Commons determines, pursuant to this section, that there has been a clear expression of a will by a clear majority of the population of that province that the province cease to be part of Canada.

By contrast, s 4 of the Fundamental Rights Act provides (citations omitted):

When the Québec people [are] consulted by way of a referendum under the Referendum Act, the winning option is the option that obtains a majority of the valid votes cast, namely fifty percent of the valid votes cast plus one.

Do these provisions potentially conflict? How? If they do, do you think the Court will intervene in a subsequent case? Note that the Court did seem to suggest that it would pronounce on the correct amending formula for achieving secession (although the note below raises some questions about this).

3. Secession without a constitutional amendment? In the Secession Reference, the Court refers to the need for a constitutional amendment to effect secession, states that the constitutional negotiations to secure such an amendment could be unsuccessful, and refuses to speculate on what the consequences of a failure of negotiations would be. However, consider the following paragraph:

[103] To the extent that a breach of the constitutional duty to negotiate in accordance with the principles described above undermines the legitimacy of a party's actions, it may have important ramifications at the international level. Thus, a failure of the duty to undertake negotiations and pursue them according to constitutional principles may undermine that government's claim to legitimacy which is generally a precondition for recognition by the international community. Conversely, violations of those principles by the federal or other provincial governments responding to the request for secession may undermine their legitimacy. Thus, a Quebec that had negotiated in conformity with constitutional principles and values in the face of unreasonable intransigence on the part of other participants at the federal or provincial level would be more likely to be recognized than a Quebec which did not itself act according to constitutional principles in the negotiation process. Both the legality of the acts of the parties to the negotiation process under Canadian law, and the perceived legitimacy of such action, would be important considerations in the recognition process. In this way, the adherence of the parties to the obligation to negotiate would be evaluated in an indirect manner on the international plane.

Does this passage effectively create a right to unilateral secession after good-faith negotiations? If so, can this be squared with the Court's holding that unilateral secession is unconstitutional?

Conversely, does it explain the Court's statement that a right to unilateral secession is "the right to effectuate secession without prior negotiations with the other provinces and the federal government" (at para 86), as opposed to the right to secede without prior consent? Does it leave the enforcement of the rules of the Canadian Constitution governing secession to the international community?

4. Section 45, Quebec Nationhood, and the French Language. In November 2006, the House of Commons adopted a motion recognizing that "the Quebecois form a nation within a united Canada." See "House Passes Motion Recognizing Quebecois as Nation," CBC News (27 November 2006), online: <<https://www.cbc.ca/news/canada/house-passes-motion-recognizing-quebecois-as-nation-1.574359>>. Fifteen years later, in May 2021, the National Assembly of Quebec introduced Bill 96, an omnibus bill intended to protect the French language in Quebec. One of the Bill's provisions proposes to amend the Constitution Act, 1867 using Quebec's power to unilaterally amend its provincial constitution under s 45 of the Constitution Act, 1982. Here is the text of the proposal:

159. The Constitution Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Victoria, c. 3 (U.K.); 1982, c. 11 (U.K.)) is amended by inserting the following after section 90:

"FUNDAMENTAL CHARACTERISTICS OF QUEBEC"

"90Q.1. Quebecers form a nation."

"90Q.2. French shall be the only official language of Quebec. It is also the common language of the Quebec nation."

See Bill 96, An Act respecting French, the official and common language of Québec, 2nd Sess, 42nd Leg, 2021 (adopted in principle 3 November 2021), online: <<http://www.assnat.qc.ca/en/travaux-parlementaires/projets-loi/projet-loi-96-42-1.html>>.

What is the scope of a province's power under s 45? By its own terms and the design of part V of the Constitution Act, 1982, the provincial unilateral amendment power in s 45 is limited expressly to those matters that do not exceed the scope of a province's jurisdictional authority. But are there additional limitations? Consider this analysis:

Several implicit constitutional issues also limit the scope of section 45. For one thing, provinces cannot unilaterally amend their constitution in a way that would jeopardize the conditions of the 1867 union or the federal principle. The same can be said of section 93 of the Constitution Act, 1867, which recognizes denominational education rights, and therefore is a limit to section 45. Furthermore, provisions considered indispensable for the implementation of the federal principle were declared ultra vires to section 92(1) in OPSEU, and thus escape the scope of section 45. Accordingly, the unilateral secession of a province was deemed unconstitutional in Reference re Secession of Quebec.

Another important implicit limit to the unilateral modification of provincial constitutions constitutional rights and freedoms. Every right protected in the Charter constitutes a limit to section 45. The only way to circumvent this limit is for a province to invoke the notwithstanding clause found in section 33. Then again, this clause applies only to sections 2 and 7–15 of the Charter, and has a five-year sunset clause. Even before the entrenchment of the Charter, there was the belief that the Canadian Constitution encompassed an implied bill of rights. This theory was based on the fact that the Constitution was similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom. Although not all constitutionalists agree on the merits of this theory, it could still be a limit on section 45.

Furthermore, provincial legislatures cannot delegate their powers—for example, via deliberative referendums—under section 45. This conclusion is based on In re The Initiative & Referendum Act (Manitoba), which posited that allowing provincial laws to be adopted or modified directly by citizens instead of the legislature was ultra vires section 92(1). It was also confirmed in obiter dictum in OPSEU. Finally, provinces cannot unilaterally remove subject-matter jurisdictions from section 96 courts, which are administered by the provinces but appointed by the federal government, as determined by case law.

Class activity: Assemble yourselves into two pairs of two separate groups. In the first pairing, one group will make the case that Quebec may use its power in s 45 to insert the newly proposed s 90Q.1 into the Constitution Act, 1867. The other group in the first pairing will argue that s 45 does not grant Quebec this authority. In the second pairing, one group will make the case that Quebec may use its power in s 45 to insert the newly proposed s 90Q.2 into the Constitution Act, 1867. The other group in this second pairing will argue that s 45 does not grant Quebec this authority. Which side in each pairing is more compelling to you?

5. Section 43 and Quebec's future in Canada. It has long been assumed that securing Quebec's constitutional future in Canada would require the use of either the general amending formula in s 38 or the unanimity procedure in s 41. For some matters of constitutional importance, it is clear that recourse to one of these sections is mandatory; but for others, it is an open question that David Cameron and Jacqueline Krikorian have recently answered by suggesting that the bilateral procedure in s 43 could be used to amend the Constitution to give Quebec the reassurance and recognition that many of its political leaders have in the past demanded.

David R Cameron & Jacqueline D Krikorian,
"Recognizing Quebec in the Constitution of Canada:
Using the Bilateral Constitutional Amendment Process"

(2008) 58 UTLJ 389 at 414-20

Canada has ... been trapped in an unsatisfactory state of irresolution with respect to national unity since 1982. Quebec—as reflected in its government, its legislature, and, arguably, its people—has not assented to the constitutional arrangements by which it is governed. While this appears at the moment to make little difference in the day-to-day lives of ordinary citizens, it is a state of affairs widely regarded as unsatisfactory for a constitutional democracy. Moreover, it is seen by many as exposing the country to an unacceptable risk of fracture should a crisis arise. Yet while many would acknowledge that there remains some unfinished business as far as Quebec is concerned, doing nothing seems to be the best option available to policy makers. There has been a sense that an impasse between Quebec and the rest of Canada is better than another round of failed constitutional talks.

To date, Quebec's constitutional concerns have not been addressed in a manner that would make it acceptable for its residents, its government, or its legislature to formally consent to the 1982 Constitution. For reasons outlined above, events are at an impasse. The recent success of the initiative of the government of Canada, however, appears to suggest that there may be an opportunity for progress. Building on the resolution recognizing the Québécois as a nation within Canada, the House of Commons and the National Assembly could introduce a bilateral constitutional amendment that would give official status to the French language in the province of Quebec and possibly recognize the French culture in the province.

A bilateral constitutional amendment addressing language issues is expressly permitted under s. 43 of the Constitution Act, 1982. New Brunswick, in conjunction with the federal government, adopted such an amendment for this very purpose when it bestowed a kind of enhanced status on the French and English languages. Moreover, the Supreme Court of Canada has already both accepted and endorsed the notion that French is the predominant language in Quebec. In [Ford v Quebec (AG), [1988] 2 SCR 712, 1988 CanLII 19], it held that the National Assembly could adopt a law providing that French would have greater public visibility than English, expressly stating that the government of Quebec could require the French language to be given predominance on signage in order to reflect the "visage linguistique" of the province. In the process, the Court effectively acknowledged and endorsed the notion that the vitality of the French language and culture in Quebec is a valid public-policy goal.

In this context, it would be possible for the governments of Canada and Quebec to use New Brunswick's bilateral constitutional amendment as a precedent to introduce a measure that builds upon the essence of the November 2006 House of Commons resolution recognizing the Québécois nation in Canada. We are arguing, in other words, that a bilateral constitutional amendment is a potential process by which the long-standing concerns of Quebec could begin to be addressed in the Constitution. Our overall objective here is not to provide solutions to the constitutional impasse, or even the text of a possible provision; rather, our goal is to map out a process by which the real and valid concerns of the francophone community in Quebec might successfully be addressed and to indicate the issues that could be considered if and when such discussions should occur.

We envision that such an amendment would reaffirm Quebec's existing legislative authority and act as an interpretive provision that informs how the Constitution is read and understood in Quebec. We are not advocating a measure that allocates new powers or redistributes existing heads of power; such a proposal would change the nature and balance of Canadian federalism and require the consent of all the provinces. Rather, we are arguing for consideration of a bilateral constitutional amendment that pertains only to Quebec. To this end, we believe there are at least two options worthy of consideration. The first is to introduce an amendment to s. 16 of the Charter dealing with official languages, while the second is to introduce a provision similar in nature to s. 27 of the Charter that would apply exclusively to Quebec.

The focus of the proposed bilateral constitutional amendment would pertain to the French language, and possibly the French culture, in Quebec. It could entrench French as the official language of the province and acknowledge that the National Assembly has the authority to both preserve and protect Quebec's distinct cultural institutions. Such a provision would, in effect, simply reflect the existing status of the French language in Quebec by constitutionalizing the raison d'être of the provisions legally enacted in Bill 101 . . . [A] constitutional amendment of this nature would entrench the status of one of the core elements of the Québécois nation in the province, as well as beginning to address one of Quebec's legitimate core concerns, namely, the amendment of the Canadian Constitution in 1982 without Quebec's priorities being addressed and without Quebec's consent. In this sense, our proposal is positive in nature—to constitutionalize the rights of the French community, not to detract or take away from the existing rights of anglophones in the province. In fact, a provision in the proposed bilateral amendment expressly recognizing and protecting the existing rights of the English community in the province of Quebec would be an essential part of any bilateral amendment, in order to reassure the anglophone community in the province that their status has not been altered.

A second option for a bilateral amendment recognizing the predominance of French in Quebec would be to adopt a provision akin to s. 27 of the Charter:

27. This Charter shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians.

Section 27 ... informs how the Constitution is to be interpreted, but it does not give special powers or legislative authority to one government or community over another; rather, it acknowledges the importance and value that Canadians accord to multiculturalism and provides an assurance that these considerations will give guidance to any court that must render a decision in a constitutional challenge to a government measure or action.

We believe that a provision similar in nature to s. 27 could be introduced as a bilateral constitutional amendment, with the proviso that it applied to Quebec. ... It is our position that the Québécois nation is no less deserving of recognition in the Constitution than is our multicultural heritage and that, in the context of Quebec, such recognition is extremely important both politically and symbolically.

... [W]e would suggest that the nature of the bilateral amendment should be focused on the use and status of the French language and, possibly, the French culture. The overwhelming success of the Canadian government's resolution recognizing the Québécois as a nation—which Harper explained was specifically linked to the French language—suggests that Parliament accepts that the specificity of Quebec and the French language is a distinctive feature of the Quebec reality, a position that is obviously accepted by the National Assembly of Quebec.

... [I]t is worth noting that one of the main reasons that the Meech Lake and Charlottetown Accords were so strongly contested was not simply the fact that the amendments required the consent of other provinces but also that each purported to declare something about the country as a whole This is not the case with the suggestions we have put forward. The bilateral amendment process involves two government actors—the National Assembly and government of Quebec, on the one hand, and Parliament and the government of Canada, on the other—not all the provinces and territories. Furthermore, the amendment makes no attempt to capture a Canadian vision and situate Quebec within it; rather, it identifies one vital element in Quebec's existing laws and complex reality and offers that element a degree of constitutional recognition.

Such a bilateral amendment would serve two important public-policy objectives. First, the constitutional provision would have considerable symbolic importance for Canadians both inside and outside of Quebec. ...

A second rationale for this type of bilateral amendment is that it would be used as an interpretive aid in any future constitutional litigation challenging measures to promote or protect the French language in Quebec Although Quebec legislation entrenching French language rights might still be found to violate, for example, the Charter's freedom-of-expression or equality measures, a bilateral constitutional amendment of this nature would, in effect, mandate the courts to carefully balance the language rights of the Québécois community within the province and the rights of the individual before striking down a contested statute. ...

We recognize that this proposal may provoke controversy because some may feel that it has the potential to affect the standing of the English minority in Quebec. In the years since the passage of Bill 101, however—through court cases, legislative adjustment, and social adaptation—Quebec has achieved a condition of "linguistic peace," in which the anglophone minority, by and large, has accepted the basic provisions of Bill 101, has learned French, and has accommodated itself to the position of English in the linguistic landscape of Quebec. The proposed amendment would recognize contemporary reality and give greater security to the French language and to francophones within the framework of the Constitution of Canada. We also believe that, in the "big picture," by assuring the Québécois nation that they have a secure future within the Canadian federation, we would be providing stability and security to the anglophone community in Quebec.

QUESTIONS

Does your reading of s 43 accommodate the range of amendments that Cameron and Krikorian suggest is possible? Would amendments of the kind suggested be accepted as legitimate outside Quebec? Would Quebec be satisfied by amendments like these without their being approved by the rest of Canada?

C. CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT AND ALBERTA SOVEREIGNTY

While secessionist sentiment appears to have declined for now in Quebec, it appears to have risen in Alberta, and there now exists a federal political party with the capacity to harness the energies of Albertans and more generally of persons elsewhere in Western Canada. Founded in 2019 as the Wexit Party—a play on Brexit to promote the West's exit from Canada—today the party is known as the Maverick Party.

On November 9, 2019, the Premier of Alberta created the Fair Deal Panel. In his mandate letter to the Panel, the Premier acknowledged the forces that had led to the creation of Wexit:

Recent public opinion surveys suggest that as many as one third of Albertans support the concept of separating from the Canadian federation, and that three quarters of Albertans understand or sympathise with this sentiment. Many Albertans who indicate support for federalism are demanding significant reforms that will allow the province to develop its resources, and play a larger role in the federation, commensurate with the size of its economy and contribution to the rest of Canada.

See Letter from the Premier to the Fair Deal Panel, 9 November 2019, online (pdf): Government of Alberta <<https://www.alberta.ca/external/news/letter-from-premier-to-panel.pdf>>.

The Panel's nine members were directed to "listen to Albertans and their ideas for Alberta's future," focusing on "ideas that would strengthen [the] province's economic position, give [it] a bigger voice within Confederation, or increase provincial power over institutions and funding in areas of provincial jurisdiction." See Letter from the Premier at 1.

In its final report submitted in May 2020, the Fair Deal Panel wrote that it "encourages the Government of Alberta to act vigorously and swiftly ... to secure a fair deal for Albertans. Some Albertans believe that the only way to get Ottawa and other provinces to pay attention to unfairness and misunderstandings is to use the threat of separation Listening to Albertans, the panel understands their anger But we do not believe the threat of secession is a constructive negotiating strategy. However, we believe that if the federal government and the rest of Canada do not respond positively and quickly to Albertans' demands for a fair deal, then support for secession will only grow. The panel also wishes to make clear ... the best option is to achieve a fairer deal for Albertans, and for all Canadians, within Confederation. How will we know when we have a fair deal for Alberta? In the panel's opinion, we will know when Albertans trust people in Ottawa to act in this province's best interests, and when Alberta's position within the Canadian federation has been equitably reset." See Fair Deal Panel, Report to Government, May 2020 at 8, online (pdf): Government of Alberta <<https://open.alberta.ca/dataset/d8933f27-5f81-4cbb-97c1-f56b45b09a74/resource/d5836820-d81f-4042-b24e-b04e012f4cde/download/fair-deal-panel-report-to-government-may-2020.pdf>>.

The Panel's final report made 25 recommendations. One of its recommendations urged the Government of Alberta to proceed with a referendum on equalization, "asking a clear question along the lines of: 'Do you support the removal of Section 36, which deals with the principle of equalization, from the Constitution Act, 1982?'" (Fair Deal Panel Report at 7, 16-18).

On June 7, 2021, the Premier introduced a motion in the Legislative Assembly to propose the following question for a referendum to be held on October 18, 2021: "Should Section 36(2) of the Constitution Act, 1982—Parliament and the Government of Canada's commitment to the principle of making equalization payments—be removed from the Constitution?" See Referendum Question on Equalization Introduced, 7 June 2021, online: Government of Alberta <<https://www.alberta.ca/release.cfm?xID=793270E30BF4E-EC74-8973-B92812EA0E3AB9F3>>.

Asked to explain his motivation, the Premier of Alberta explained that a "yes" vote on the referendum would give the province a strong claim to request negotiations to change the equalization formula in Canada.

Equalization would require either a change of federal policy or a constitutional amendment using the procedure outlined in s 38 of the Constitution Act, 1982, otherwise known as the 7/50 formula. Given that, what do you suppose was the strategy behind the equalization referendum, since a successful referendum will not on its own change equalization?

D. SENATE REFORM

Since Confederation, the Senate has been the subject of several reform proposals. No major constitutional amendments have been made with regard to the function of the institution, but it has been amended in two noteworthy ways over the years. First, the size of the Senate, as detailed in s 22 of the Constitution Act, 1867, has changed. In its initial version, s 22 created a Senate consisting of three regional divisions—Ontario, Quebec, and the maritime provinces (Nova Scotia and New Brunswick), each with 24 senators. When Prince Edward Island joined Canada in 1873, it was given four senators, and Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were reduced to ten seats each. In 1915, the Senate was reorganized into four regional divisions to accommodate a new Western division. This new division consisted of already-admitted provinces—Alberta, British Columbia, Manitoba, and Saskatchewan—and it was given an equal complement of 24 senators. The addition of Newfoundland into Canada in 1949 entitled the province to six senators. The Yukon and the Northwest Territories were given one senator each in 1975, and, in 1999, the new territory of Nunavut was also given one senator.

A second noteworthy change was an amendment to its terms of service. At Confederation, according to s 29 of the Constitution Act, 1867, a senator could serve for life. In 1965, a mandatory retirement age of 75 for all new senators was imposed.

Heather Hughson, "Senate Reform: The First 125 Years"

(21 September 2015), online: Policy Options <<http://policyoptions.irpp.org/magazines/september-2015/the-future-of-the-senate/senate-reform-the-first-125-years>>

The Senate is an institution about which we—citizens, academics, and politicians alike—know very little, except that we dislike it, and so concocting new ideas for reform is something of a Canadian pastime. But as significant as Senate reform could be, it has always had a low priority. Few governments have the political will to see through a plan whose benefits will not be immediately visible to voters and whose potential costs, in the event of failure, could be astronomically high. The result is a long trail of discarded and forgotten alternative Senate models, dating back nearly all the way to Confederation.

Most of the delegates at the 1864 Quebec conference, where the institutions of government for Canada were conceived, had direct experience with elected upper houses, and many of them were even the same people who had pushed for the change to election in the united Province of Canada (now Ontario and Quebec) and Prince Edward Island only a few years earlier. Despite this, the delegates at the conference were nearly unanimous in their disapproval . . . Their eventual solution was to have a second chamber that was democratically illegitimate by design, so that it could not challenge the House of Commons for parliamentary supremacy yet could still perform vital democratic functions.

Delegates at the Quebec conference spent more time discussing the Senate—its functions, purpose and design—than any other institution of governance. Nevertheless, dissatisfaction arose almost immediately. Long-standing concerns about regional or provincial representation at the federal level had not been dispelled by a Senate where seats were distributed equally by region but the regions had no choice in who those representatives would be; and subsequent proposals have overwhelmingly aimed to make the Senate into a proper chamber of federalism, usually by devolving powers to the provinces in some way.

This tendency appears clearly in the very first times that Senate reform came to the floor of Parliament, in 1874 and 1875, when Liberal MP David Mills tabled a motion calling for the devolution of Senate appointment powers to the provinces, calling federal appointment “inconsistent with the Federal principle.” Although the Commons agreed to the 1875 resolution, he never produced any actual plan for reform and eventually withdrew his motion; but the same phrase appeared again in a motion at [the] 1893 Liberal Party convention, where it received unanimous support. Devolution first appeared in an official party campaign platform in 1908 under Robert Borden’s Liberal-Conservatives, and it became such a frequent fixture in election campaigns that by 1925, when it appeared once more in the Liberal Party’s campaign platform, Conservative Leader Arthur Meighen sarcastically remarked, “So that old bird is to be provided with wooden wings and told to fly again.” Devolution, in some form or another, remained the dominant model for Senate reform in Canada until the 1980s.

It was not until the 1960s that Senate reform began to look like a credible possibility—because Canadian federalism had evolved to include more power-sharing between levels of government and a greater role for the provinces in national affairs. . . .

During this time of increased interest in upper house reform, one small change was actually implemented: the introduction of mandatory retirement at age 75 in 1965. . . .

Real Senate reform came to the national agenda in 1969, when the government of Pierre Trudeau accepted in principle some degree of devolution that would secure formal and direct expression of provincial interests in the Senate, though no agreement was reached regarding the specifics. . . .

The turning point was the government’s 1978 White Paper on constitutional reform, which set out a two-stage plan for patriating the Constitution. [The first stage . . .] included the creation of a new upper house, the House of the Federation, which would be indirectly elected by the provincial and federal legislatures and have a 120-day suspensive veto over parliamentary legislation. What followed was a back-and-forth series of plans for Senate reform as part of a constitutional overhaul, as the federal government asserted the right to proceed unilaterally while the provinces demanded to be involved in the reform of a central institution of Canadian federalism. ... The unilateral approach ended with the Supreme Court's 1979 ruling on upper house reform, which required provincial consultation for anything that would "affect the fundamental features, or essential characteristics, given to the Senate as a means of ensuring regional and provincial representation in the federal legislative process."

The Senate was left nearly untouched during the patriation of the Constitution in 1982, ... because Canadian political thought about the Senate was undergoing a paradigm shift. In 1981, the Canada West Foundation published a booklet advocating a completely different model from any seen before. The Triple-E model called for an equal number of senators per province, direct election of senators and effective powers capable of challenging the House of Commons. In a few years, it completely replaced "devolution plus" as the default model for upper house reform, particularly in the western provinces

What happened next warrants a much longer account in the history of Senate reform, as the plans changed quickly and frequently. But it was that haphazard and overly complicated approach that made the Meech Lake and Charlottetown Accords particularly frustrating for reformers

Major Senate reform was a key part of the Charlottetown Accord, preparations for which began almost immediately after the demise of Meech. At the end of a series of meetings with all provinces but Quebec, Premier Bob Rae of Ontario agreed to a Triple-E Senate, on the condition that the House of Commons would have seats distributed purely on the basis of population, which would give Ontario an additional 18 MPs. The agreement, however, was rejected [by] Quebec, and a final round of negotiations produced a "One and a Half E" Senate plan. There would be an equal number of seats, but provinces could decide whether to appoint or elect those senators. The third E, effectiveness, was dropped entirely, with the Senate reduced to a very brief suspensive veto, after which any disputes would be resolved in a joint sitting, where senators would be outnumbered by MPs by over five to one. It was a quintessentially Canadian plan, combining features of nearly every prior popular proposal in an attempt to create a hybrid chamber that would satisfy all types of reformers, but ultimately it satisfied none, and the Accord was defeated.

The difficulty of large-scale constitutional amendment suggested that Senate reform, if it were to happen at all, would occur outside of the multilateral amendment procedures in part V of the Constitution Act, 1982. A minority Conservative government elected in 2006 began with a Senate term-limits bill that would have set an eight-year term limit for new senators: see Bill S-4, An Act to amend the Constitution Act, 1867 (Senate tenure), 1st Sess, 39th Parl, 2006 (first reading 30 May 2006). The government then proposed to establish a framework for consultative provincial and territorial elections to fill vacancies: see Bill C-20, An Act to provide for consultations with electors on their preferences for appointments to the Senate, 2nd Sess, 39th Parl, 2007 (first reading 13 November 2007). Neither of these bills went anywhere, but after winning a majority in the federal general elections of May 2011, the government reintroduced both proposed reforms in a single bill: see Bill C-7, An Act respecting the selection of senators and amending the Constitution Act, 1867 in respect of Senate term limits, 1st Sess, 41st Parl, 2011 (first reading 21 June 2011). These reforms entailed recourse to the federal unilateral amendment procedure in s 44—or so the government thought. In 2014, the Supreme Court weighed in on these and other possible reforms.

2014 SCC 32 (footnotes omitted)

THE COURT (McLachlin CJ and LeBel, Abella, Rothstein, Cromwell, Moldaver, Karakatsanis, and Wagner JJ):

I. Introduction

[1] The Senate is one of Canada's foundational political institutions. It lies at the heart of the agreements that gave birth to the Canadian federation. Yet from its first sittings, voices have called for reform of the Senate and even, on occasion, for its outright abolition.

[2] The Government of Canada now asks this Court [by way of a reference] to answer essentially four questions: (1) Can Parliament unilaterally implement a framework for consultative elections for appointments to the Senate? (2) Can Parliament unilaterally set fixed terms for Senators? (3) Can Parliament unilaterally remove from the Constitution Act, 1867 the requirement that Senators must own land worth $4,000 in the province for which they are appointed and have a net worth of at least $4,000? and (4) What degree of provincial consent is required to abolish the Senate?

[3] We conclude that Parliament cannot unilaterally achieve most of the proposed changes to the Senate, which require the consent of at least seven provinces representing, in the aggregate, at least half of the population of all the provinces. We further conclude that abolition of the Senate requires the consent of all of the provinces. Abolition of the Senate would fundamentally change Canada's constitutional structure, including its procedures for amending the Constitution, and can only be done with unanimous federal-provincial consensus.

III. The Senate

[13] It is appropriate to briefly introduce the institution at the heart of this Reference.

[14] The framers of the Constitution Act, 1867 sought to adapt the British form of government to a new country, in order to have a "Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom": preamble. They wanted to preserve the British structure of a lower legislative chamber composed of elected representatives, an upper legislative chamber made up of elites appointed by the Crown, and the Crown as head of state.

[15] The upper legislative chamber ... was modeled on the British House of Lords, but adapted to Canadian realities. As in the United Kingdom, it was intended to provide "sober second thought" on the legislation adopted by the popular representatives in the House of Commons However, it played the additional role of providing a distinct form of representation for the regions that had joined Confederation and ceded a significant portion of their legislative powers to the new federal Parliament While representation in the House of Commons was proportional to the population of the new Canadian provinces, each region was provided equal representation in the Senate irrespective of population. This was intended to assure the regions that their voices would continue to be heard in the legislative process even though they might become minorities within the overall population of Canada

[16] Over time, the Senate also came to represent ... ethnic, gender, religious, linguistic, and Aboriginal groups that did not always have a meaningful opportunity to present their views through the popular democratic process

[17] Although the product of consensus, the Senate rapidly attracted criticism and reform proposals. Some felt that it failed to provide "sober second thought" and reflected the same partisan spirit as the House of Commons. Others criticized it for failing to provide meaningful representation of the interests of the provinces as originally intended, and contended that it lacked democratic legitimacy.

[18] In the years immediately preceding patriation of the Constitution, proposals for reform focused mainly on three aspects: (i) modifying the distribution of seats in the Senate; (ii) circumscribing the powers of the Senate; and (iii) changing the way in which Senators are selected for appointment. These proposals assumed the continued existence of an upper chamber, but sought to improve its contribution to the legislative process.

[19] In 1978, the federal government tabled a bill to ... [readjust] the distribution of seats between the regions; remov[e] the Senate's absolute veto over most legislation and replac[e] it with an ability to delay the adoption of legislation; and giv[e] the House of Commons and the provincial legislatures the power to select Senators: Constitutional Amendment Act, 1978 (Bill C-60), June 20, 1978, cls. 62 to 70. The bill was not adopted and, in 1980, this Court concluded that Parliament did not have the power under the Constitution as it then stood to unilaterally modify the fundamental features of the Senate or to abolish it: Reference re: Authority of Parliament in relation to the Upper House, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 54 ("Upper House Reference").

[20] ... The question before us now is not whether the Senate should be reformed or what reforms would be preferable, but rather how the specific changes set out in the Reference can be accomplished under the Constitution. ...

IV. The Part V Amending Procedures

[21] The statute that created the Senate—the Constitution Act, 1867—forms part of the Constitution of Canada and can only be amended in accordance with the Constitution's procedures for amendment: s. 52(2) and (3), Constitution Act, 1982. Consequently, we must determine whether the changes contemplated in the Reference amend the Constitution and, if so, which amendment procedures are applicable.

[22] Before answering these questions, we discuss constitutional amendment in Canada generally. We examine in turn the nature and content of the Constitution of Canada, the concept of constitutional amendment, and the Constitution's procedures for amendment.

A. The Constitution of Canada

[23] The Constitution of Canada is "a comprehensive set of rules and principles" that provides "an exhaustive legal framework for our system of government": Reference re Secession of Quebec, [1998] 2 S.C.R. 217 ("Secession Reference"), at para. 32. It defines the powers of the constituent elements of Canada's system of government—the executive, the legislatures, and the courts—as well as the division of powers between the federal and provincial governments And it governs the state's relationship with the individual. Governmental power cannot lawfully be exercised, unless it conforms to the Constitution

[24] The Constitution of Canada is defined in s. 52(2) of the Constitution Act, 1982 as follows:

- 52. ...
 - (2) The Constitution of Canada includes
 - (a) the Canada Act 1982, including this Act;

- (b) the Acts and orders referred to in the schedule; and
- (c) any amendment to any Act or order referred to in paragraph (a) or (b).

The documents listed in the Schedule to the Constitution Act, 1982 as forming part of the Constitution include the Constitution Act, 1867. Section 52 does not provide an exhaustive definition of the content of the Constitution of Canada: Supreme Court Act Reference, at paras. 97-100; Secession Reference, at para. 32.

[25] The Constitution implements a structure of government and must be understood by reference to "the constitutional text itself, the historical context, and previous judicial interpretations of constitutional meaning": Secession Reference, at para. 32; see generally H. Cyr, "L'absurdité du critère scriptural pour qualifier la constitution" (2012), 6 J.P.P.L. 293. The rules of constitutional interpretation require that constitutional documents be interpreted in a broad and purposive manner and placed in their proper linguistic, philosophic, and historical contexts Generally, constitutional interpretation must be informed by the foundational principles of the Constitution, which include principles such as federalism, democracy, the protection of minorities, as well as constitutionalism and the rule of law

[26] These rules and principles of interpretation have led this Court to conclude that the Constitution should be viewed as having an "internal architecture," or "basic constitutional structure": Secession Reference, at para. 50 The notion of architecture expresses the principle that "[t]he individual elements of the Constitution are linked to the others, and must be interpreted by reference to the structure of the Constitution as a whole": Secession Reference, at para. 50 In other words, the Constitution must be interpreted with a view to discerning the structure of government that it seeks to implement. The assumptions that underlie the text and the manner in which the constitutional provisions are intended to interact with one another must inform our interpretation, understanding, and application of the text.

B. Amendments to the Constitution of Canada

[27] The concept of an "amendment to the Constitution of Canada," within the meaning of Part V of the Constitution Act, 1982, is informed by the nature of the Constitution and its rules of interpretation. As discussed, the Constitution should not be viewed as a mere collection of discrete textual provisions. It has an architecture, a basic structure. By extension, amendments to the Constitution are not confined to textual changes. They include changes to the Constitution's architecture.

C. The Part V Amending Procedures

[28] Part V of the Constitution Act, 1982 provides the blueprint for how to amend the Constitution of Canada It tells us what changes Parliament and the provincial legislatures can make unilaterally, what changes require substantial federal and provincial consent, and what changes require unanimous agreement.

(2) The Amending Procedures

[32] Part V contains four categories of amending procedures. The first is the general amending procedure (s. 38, complemented by s. 42), which requires a substantial degree of consensus between Parliament and the provincial legislatures. The second is the unanimous consent procedure (s. 41), which applies to certain changes deemed fundamental by the framers of the Constitution Act, 1982. The third is the special arrangements procedure (s. 43), which applies to amendments in relation to provisions of the Constitution that apply to some, but not all, of the provinces. The fourth is made up of the unilateral federal and provincial procedures, which allow unilateral amendment of aspects of government institutions that engage purely federal or provincial interests (ss. 44 and 45).

(a) The General Amending Procedure

[34] The process set out in s. 38 is the general rule for amendments to the Constitution of Canada. It reflects the principle that substantial provincial consent must be obtained for constitutional change that engages provincial interests. Section 38 codifies what is colloquially referred to as the "7/50" procedure—amendments to the Constitution of Canada must be authorized by resolutions of the Senate, the House of Commons, and legislative assemblies of at least seven provinces whose population represents, in the aggregate, at least half of the current population of all the provinces. Additionally, it grants to the provinces the right to "opt out" of constitutional amendments that derogate from "the legislative powers, the proprietary rights or any other rights or privileges of the legislature or government of a province."

[35] By requiring significant provincial consensus while stopping short of unanimity, s. 38 "achieves a compromise between the demands of legitimacy and flexibility". J. Cameron, "To Amend the Process of Amendment," in G.-A. Beaudoin et al., Federalism for the Future: Essential Reforms (1998), 315, at p. 324. Its "underlying purpose ... is to protect the provinces from having their rights or privileges negatively affected without their consent": Monahan and Shaw, at p. 192.

[36] The s. 38 procedure represents the balance deemed appropriate by the framers of the Constitution Act, 1982 for most constitutional amendments, apart from those contemplated in one of the other provisions in Part V. Section 38 is thus the procedure of general application for amendments to the Constitution of Canada. As a result, the other procedures in Part V should be construed as exceptions to the general rule.

[37] Section 42 complements s. 38 by expressly identifying certain categories of amendments to which the 7/50 procedure in s. 38(1) applies [here the Court quoted the section]

[38] This provision serves two purposes. First, the express inclusion of certain matters in s. 42 provided the framers of the Constitution Act, 1982 with greater certainty that the 7/50 procedure would apply to amendments in relation to those matters Second, the provincial right to "opt out" from certain amendments contemplated in s. 38(2) to (4) does not apply to the categories of amendments in s. 42. This ensures that amendments made under s. 42 will apply consistently to all the provinces and allows the changes contemplated in the provision to be implemented in a coherent manner throughout Canada.

[39] Section 42(1)(b) of the Constitution Act, 1982 expressly makes the general amendment procedure applicable to amendments in relation to "the powers of the Senate and the method of selecting Senators." We discuss below the meaning of this statutory language and its bearing on the questions before us.

(b) The Unanimous Consent Procedure

[40] Section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982 sets out an amending procedure requiring unanimous consent in relation to certain matters:

41. An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great

Seal of Canada only where authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province:

- (a) the office of the Queen, the Governor General and the Lieutenant Governor of a province;
- (b) the right of a province to a number of members in the House of Commons not less than the number of Senators by which the province is entitled to be represented at the time this Part comes into force;
- (c) subject to section 43, the use of the English or the French language;
- (d) the composition of the Supreme Court of Canada; and
- (e) an amendment to this Part.

[41] Section 41 requires the unanimous consent of the Senate, the House of Commons, and all the provincial legislative assemblies for the categories of amendments . . . It is an exception to the general amending procedure. It creates an exacting amending procedure that is designed to apply to certain fundamental changes to the Constitution of Canada. . . .

(c) The Special Arrangements Procedure

[43] Section 43 applies to amendments in relation to provisions of the Constitution of Canada that apply to some, but not all, of the provinces. The determination of its scope and of the effects of its interaction with other provisions of Part V presents significant conceptual difficulties . . . We will limit our remarks on s. 43 to what is necessary to answer the Reference questions before us.

[44] At the very least, s. 43 is triggered when a constitutional amendment relates to a provision of the Constitution of Canada that contains a "special arrangement" applicable only to one or several, but not all, of the provinces. In such cases, the use of the 7/50 procedure would overshoot the mark, by making adoption of the amendment contingent upon the consent of provinces to which the provision does not apply. Section 43 also serves to ensure that those provisions cannot be amended without the consent of the provinces for which the arrangement was devised: Monahan and Shaw, at p. 210.

(d) The Unilateral Federal and Provincial Procedures

[45] Sections 44 and 45 of the Constitution Act, 1982 provide for unilateral federal and provincial procedures of amendment:

[44] Subject to sections 41 and 42, Parliament may exclusively make laws amending the Constitution of Canada in relation to the executive government of Canada or the Senate and House of Commons.

[45] Subject to section 41, the legislature of each province may exclusively make laws amending the constitution of the province.

[46] These sections fulfill the same basic function as ss. 91(1) and 92(1) of the Constitution Act, 1867, which were repealed when the Constitution Act, 1982 was enacted . . .

[48] . . . [S]s. 44 and 45 give the federal and provincial legislatures the ability to unilaterally amend certain aspects of the Constitution that relate to their own level of government, but which do not engage the interests of the other level of government. This limited ability to make changes unilaterally reflects the principle that Parliament and the provinces are equal stakeholders in the Canadian constitutional design. Neither level of government acting alone can alter the fundamental nature and role of the institutions provided for in the Constitution. This said, those institutions can be maintained and even changed to some extent under ss. 44 and 45, provided that their fundamental nature and role remain intact.

V. How Can the Senate Changes Contemplated in the Reference Be Achieved?

[The Court went on to conclude that the majority of the changes to the Senate contemplated in the Reference could only be achieved through amendments to the Constitution, with substantial federal–provincial consensus. The implementation of consultative elections and senatorial term limits was found to require the consent of the Senate, the House of Commons, and the legislative assemblies of at least seven provinces representing, in the aggregate, half the population of all the provinces (s 38 and s 42(1)(b), Constitution Act, 1982). A full repeal of the property qualifications was found to require the consent of the legislative assembly of Quebec (s 43, Constitution Act, 1982). As for Senate abolition, it was found to require the unanimous consent of the Senate, the House of Commons, and the legislative assemblies of all Canadian provinces (s 41(e), Constitution Act, 1982). Select portions from the reasoning on these issues have been included below.]

A. Consultative Elections

[50] [Section 24] of the Constitution Act, 1867 provides for the formal appointment of Senators by the Governor General In practice, constitutional convention requires the Governor General to follow the recommendations of the Prime Minister of Canada

[51] The Attorney General of Canada (supported by the attorneys general of Saskatchewan and Alberta as well as one of the amici curiae) submits that implementing consultative elections for Senators does not constitute an amendment to the Constitution of Canada. He argues that this reform would not change the text of the Constitution Act, 1867, nor the means of selecting Senators. He points out that the formal mechanism for appointing Senators—summons by the Governor General acting on the advice of the Prime Minister—would remain untouched. Alternatively, he submits that if introducing consultative elections constitutes an amendment to the Constitution, then it can be achieved unilaterally by Parliament under s. 44 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

[52] In our view, the argument that introducing consultative elections does not constitute an amendment to the Constitution privileges form over substance. It reduces the notion of constitutional amendment to a matter of whether or not the letter of the constitutional text is modified. This narrow approach is inconsistent with the broad and purposive manner in which the Constitution is understood and interpreted, as discussed above. While the provisions regarding the appointment of Senators would remain textually untouched, the Senate's fundamental nature and role as a complementary legislative body of sober second thought would be significantly altered.

[53] We conclude that each of the proposed consultative elections would constitute an amendment to the Constitution of Canada and require substantial provincial consent under the general amending procedure, without the provincial right to "opt out" of the amendment (s. 42). ...

(1) Consultative Elections Would Fundamentally Alter the Architecture of the Constitution

[54] The implementation of consultative elections would amend the Constitution of Canada by fundamentally altering its architecture. It would modify the Senate's role within our constitutional structure as a complementary legislative body of sober second thought.

[55] The Constitution Act, 1867 contemplates a specific structure for the federal Parliament, "similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom": preamble. The Act creates both a lower elected and an upper appointed legislative chamber: s. 17. It expressly provides that the members of the lower chamber—the House of Commons—"shall be elected" by the population of the various provinces: s. 37. By contrast, it provides that Senators shall be "summoned" (i.e. appointed) by the Governor General: ss. 24 and 32.

[56] The contrast between election for members of the House of Commons and executive appointment for Senators is not an accident of history. The framers of the Constitution Act, 1867 deliberately chose executive appointment of Senators in order to allow the Senate to play the specific role of a complementary legislative body of "sober second thought."

[57] As this Court wrote in the Upper House Reference, "[i]n creating the Senate in the manner provided in the Act, it is clear that the intention was to make the Senate a thoroughly independent body which could canvass dispassionately the measures of the House of Commons": p. 77 (emphasis added). The framers sought to endow the Senate with independence from the electoral process to which members of the House of Commons were subject, in order to remove Senators from a partisan political arena that required unremitting consideration of short-term political objectives.

[58] Correlatively, the choice of executive appointment for Senators was also intended to ensure that the Senate would be a complementary legislative body, rather than a perennial rival of the House of Commons in the legislative process. Appointed Senators would not have a popular mandate—they would not have the expectations and legitimacy that stem from popular election. This would ensure that they would confine themselves to their role as a body mainly conducting legislative review, rather than as a coequal of the House of Commons. . . .

[60] The proposed consultative elections would fundamentally modify the constitutional architecture we have just described and, by extension, would constitute an amendment to the Constitution. They would weaken the Senate's role of sober second thought and would give it the democratic legitimacy to systematically block the House of Commons, contrary to its constitutional design.

[61] Federal legislation providing for the consultative election of Senators would have the practical effect of subjecting Senators to the political pressures of the electoral process and of endowing them with a popular mandate. Senators selected from among the listed nominees would become popular representatives. . . .

[62] The Attorney General of Canada counters that this broad structural change would not occur because the Prime Minister would retain the ability to ignore the results of the consultative elections[.] . . . [T]he purpose of [Bills C-20 and C-7] is clear: to bring about a Senate with a popular mandate. We cannot assume that future prime ministers will defeat this purpose by ignoring the results of costly and hard-fought consultative elections . . . A legal analysis of the constitutional nature and effects of proposed legislation cannot be premised on the assumption that the legislation will fail to bring about the changes it seeks to achieve.

[63] In summary, the consultative election proposals set out in the Reference questions would amend the Constitution of Canada by changing the Senate's role within our constitutional structure from a complementary legislative body of sober second thought to a legislative body endowed with a popular mandate and democratic legitimacy.

[The Court went on to add that s 42 expressly made the general amending procedure applicable to a change of this nature and that the proposed change was beyond the scope of the unilateral federal amending procedure in s 44 both because it was covered by s 42 and because it involved a change to the Senate's fundamental nature and role.]

B. Senatorial Tenure

[71] It is not disputed that a change in the duration of senatorial terms would amend the Constitution of Canada, by requiring a modification to the text of s. 29 of the Constitution Act, 1867 ... [which provides that a Senator who is summoned to the Senate shall hold his place in the Senate until he attains the age of 75 years]. The question before us is which Part V procedure applies to amend this provision.

[73] In essence, the Attorney General of Canada proposes a narrow textual approach to this issue. Section 44 of the Constitution Act, 1982 provides: "Subject to sections 41 and 42, Parliament may exclusively make laws amending the Constitution of Canada in relation to ... the Senate" Neither s. 41 nor s. 42 expressly applies to amendments in relation to senatorial tenure. It follows, in his view, that the proposed changes to senatorial tenure are captured by the otherwise unlimited power in s. 44 to make amendments in relation to the Senate.

[74] We agree that the language of s. 42 does not encompass changes to the duration of senatorial terms. However, it does not follow that all changes to the Senate that fall outside of s. 42 come within the scope of the unilateral federal amending procedure in s. 44

[75] We are unable to agree with the Attorney General of Canada's interpretation of the scope of s. 44. ... The history, language, and structure of Part V indicate that s. 38, rather than s. 44, is the general procedure for constitutional amendment. Changes that engage the interests of the provinces in the Senate as an institution forming an integral part of the federal system can only be achieved under the general amending procedure. Section 44, as an exception to the general procedure, encompasses measures that maintain or change the Senate without altering its fundamental nature and role.

[78] The question is thus whether the imposition of fixed terms for Senators engages the interests of the provinces by changing the fundamental nature or role of the Senate. ... In our view, this question must be answered in the affirmative.

[79] As discussed above, the Senate's fundamental nature and role is that of a complementary legislative body of sober second thought. The current duration of senatorial terms is directly linked to this conception of the Senate. ...

[80] The imposition of fixed senatorial terms is a significant change to senatorial tenure. We are not persuaded ... that the fixed terms contemplated in the Reference are a minor change because they are equivalent in duration to the average term historically served by Senators. ... Fixed terms provide a weaker security of tenure. They imply a finite time in office and necessarily offer a lesser degree of protection from the potential consequences of freely speaking one's mind on the legislative proposals of the House of Commons.

[81] It may be possible, as the Attorney General of Canada suggests, to devise a fixed term so lengthy that it provides a security of tenure which is functionally equivalent to that provided by life tenure. However, it is difficult to objectively identify the precise term duration that guarantees an equivalent degree of security of tenure. ...

[82] ... The imposition of fixed terms, even lengthy ones, constitutes a change that engages the interests of the provinces as stakeholders in Canada's constitutional design and falls within the rule of general application for constitutional change—the 7/50 procedure in s. 38.

C. Property Qualifications

[The Court found that the removal of the net worth requirements would not alter the fundamental nature of the Senate and was exactly the kind of amendment intended to be covered by the unilateral federal amendment power in s 44].

• • •

[91] Similarly, the removal of the real property requirement (s. 23(3), Constitution Act, 1867) would not alter the fundamental nature and role of the Senate. However, the removal of the real property requirement for Quebec's Senators would constitute an amendment in relation to a special arrangement [for senators from that province]. It would thus attract the special arrangements procedure and require the consent of Quebec's National Assembly (s. 43, Constitution Act, 1982).

VI. Senate Abolition: How Can It Be Achieved?

[95] Finally, the Reference asks which of two possible procedures applies to abolition of the Senate: the general amending procedure or the unanimous consent procedure?

[96] The Attorney General of Canada argues that the general amending procedure applies because abolition of the Senate falls under matters which Part V expressly says attract that procedure—amendments in relation to "the powers of the Senate" and "the number of members by which a province is entitled to be represented in the Senate" (s. 42(1)(b) and (c)). Abolition, it is argued, is simply a matter of "powers" and "members": it literally takes away all of the Senate's powers and all of its members. Alternatively, the Attorney General of Canada argues that since abolition of the Senate is not expressly mentioned anywhere in Part V, it falls residually under the general amending procedure.

[97] We cannot accept the Attorney General's arguments. Abolition of the Senate is not merely a matter of "powers" or "members" under s. 42(1)(b) and (c) of the Constitution Act, 1982. Rather, abolition of the Senate would fundamentally alter our constitutional architecture—by removing the bicameral form of government that gives shape to the Constitution Act, 1867—and would amend Part V, which requires the unanimous consent of Parliament and the provinces (s. 41(e), Constitution Act, 1982).

A. Abolishing the Senate Does Not Fall Within Section 42(1)(b) and (c)

[102] To interpret s. 42 as embracing Senate abolition would depart from the ordinary meaning of its language and is not supported by the historical record. The mention of amendments in relation to the powers of the Senate and the number of Senators for each province presupposes the continuing existence of a Senate and makes no room for an indirect abolition of the Senate. Within the scope of s. 42, it is possible to make significant changes to the powers of the Senate and the number of Senators. But it is outside the scope of s. 42 to altogether strip the Senate of its powers and reduce the number of Senators to zero.

B. Abolishing the Senate Would Alter the Part V Amending Formula

[103] The Attorney General of Canada argues that Senate abolition can be accomplished without amending Part V and that it therefore does not fall within the scope of s. 41(e), which requires unanimous federal–provincial consent for amendments to Part V. He argues that the Senate can be abolished without textually modifying the provisions of Part V. The references to the Senate in Part V would simply be viewed as “spent” and as devoid of legal effect.

[106] We disagree with these submissions. Once more, the Attorney General privileges form over substance. Part V is replete with references to the Senate and gives the Senate a role in all of the amending procedures, except for the unilateral provincial procedure Part V was drafted on the assumption that the federal Parliament would remain bicameral in nature, i.e. that there would continue to be both a lower legislative chamber and a complementary upper chamber. Removal of the upper chamber from our Constitution would alter the structure and functioning of Part V. Consequently, it requires the unanimous consent of Parliament and of all the provinces (s. 41(e)).

[107] ... [T]he notion of an amendment to the Constitution of Canada is not limited to textual modifications—it also embraces significant structural modifications of the Constitution. The abolition of the upper chamber would entail a significant structural modification of Part V. Amendments to the Constitution of Canada are subject to review by the Senate. The Senate can veto amendments brought under s. 44 and can delay the adoption of amendments made pursuant to ss. 38, 41, 42, and 43 by up to 180 days: s. 47, Constitution Act, 1982. The elimination of bicameralism would render this mechanism of review inoperative and effectively change the dynamics of the constitutional amendment process. The constitutional structure of Part V as a whole would be fundamentally altered.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The motivations for the Reference. It is worth asking why this matter was referred to the Supreme Court to begin with. Adam Dodek has considered the possibilities and concluded that the choice was both reactive and proactive:

For over a year and a half Bill C-7 was stalled in the House of Commons, reportedly due to internal opposition within the Conservative caucus. And this came after Senate reform legislation was shifted from the Senate to the House due to opposition within the Conservative Senatorial ranks. However, the Harper Government could not simply abandon its commitment to Senate reform without significant political cost, as the Prime Minister had personally invested much political capital in the issue. Abandoning Senate reform would have injured Mr. Harper as a leader and would have hurt the image of [the] Conservative Party with its followers who actively, and often fervently, supported Senate reform. ... Mr. Harper was forced to demonstrate some action, and referring his legislation to the Supreme Court for a ruling both demonstrated action and bought him some time while the matter was under consideration by the Supreme Court.

In November 2013, Prime Minister Harper gave a speech to Conservative Party members in which he blamed "the courts" for standing in the way of Senate reform, presumably referring to the ruling of the Québec Court of Appeal against the government's unilateral Senate reform proposals, but also presaging the Supreme Court of Canada's hearing of the Senate Reform Reference later that same month. ... On the day that the Supreme Court issued its "advisory opinion," the Prime Minister "shut the door" on his "career pledge to reform the Senate" and blamed the Supreme Court for stranding Canadians with a scandal-plagued Senate. ...

Whether the Prime Minister expected to "lose" the reference or not, the case was a political win-win for the Harper Government. If the Supreme Court ruled in his favour, the Prime Minister could proceed unilaterally with enacting Bill C-7. In the face of a green light from Supreme Court and pressure from the Senate scandal, it is hard to imagine that internal caucus opposition would have been sufficient to overcome the Prime Minister's will to implement his reforms to the Senate. If the Supreme Court ruled against him, as it did, then the Prime Minister would be able to claim—as he did—that he had tried but that the Supreme Court had thwarted his attempts at Senate reform. The Senate Reform Reference thus presented an opportunity for the Harper Government to both obtain political sanction and deflect political blame for desired policy choices.

A critical factor in explaining the timing of the Harper Government's decision to bring the reference is ... the proactive strike. ... On May 2, 2012, the Québec government initiated a reference of its own to its Court of Appeal [A] ruling on the constitutionality of Bill C-7 by the Supreme Court became inevitable because there is an automatic right of appeal from a provincial court of appeal reference to the Supreme Court of Canada. ... The decision of the Québec government forced the Harper Government's hand; it had to act. By initiating a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada, the Harper Government could frame the questions and have some control over the timing and the process. Thus the decision to bring the reference can be seen as both a reaction to the Government of Québec and as a proactive strike to get ahead of the Québec Court of Appeal decision and attempt to best defend the Harper Government's strategy of federal unilateralism.

See Adam Dodek, "The Politics of the Senate Reform Reference: Fidelity, Frustration, and Federal Unilateralism" (2015) 60 McGill LJ 623 at 653-56. The reference procedure has been discussed in Chapter 13, The Role of the Judiciary. Do the government's motivations for referring this matter of Senate reform to the Supreme Court give fodder to detractors of the reference procedure, who argue that the procedure politicizes the judiciary? Or are these motivations squarely within the type we expect to lead to a reference? This was not the first time the Court was asked to advise the government on Senate reform; the earlier occasion, referred to in the Senate Reform Reference was Re: Authority of Parliament in relation to the Upper House, [1980] 1 SCR 54, 1979 CanLII 169 [Upper House Reference]. For further discussion of the use of references as political strategy, see Carissima Mathen, Courts Without Cases: The Law and Politics of Advisory Opinions (Oxford: Hart, 2019) ch 9.

2. The Court in constitutional reform. One possible consequence of the Senate Reform Reference is that the Court may have assured itself a central role in future constitutional reforms. Although the Court has in the past invoked the idea that the Constitution has an "internal architecture," this time the Court relied on the idea of the Constitution's "architecture" to conclude that the proposed reforms to the Senate would not be possible without recourse to the multilateral amendment procedures in part V. But the Court did not explain precisely what that architecture entails in connection with the amending formula. There may have been good reasons for the Court not to give a full account of the Constitution's architecture and which changes to it would require recourse to which particular amendment procedure. The Court has reserved to itself future room to identify and define the specificities of the Constitution's architecture, and in doing so it has all but ensured that it will be an integral player in any effort to amend the Constitution in a materially significant way, whether or not the amendment touches the Senate. Is this a positive development, in your view? Dennis Baker and Mark Jarvis have suggested that it may not be:

At one time, the Court told Canadians that "constitutional conventions plus constitutional law equal the total constitution of the country"; now Canadians have learned to expect novel constitutional components to appear whenever they are necessary to determine the outcome of a particular constitutional controversy. If it is not in the text, perhaps it is in the architecture? By failing to restrict itself to constitutional law, the Court has expanded the potential effect of constitutional entrenchment. Whatever the "constitutional architecture" is, it appears to be beyond the reach of ordinary statutes.

And given that "constitutional architecture" might bolster an argument that one must consider not only the form but also the substance of a reform, it becomes important for other political actors to know precisely what it entails. While we can read the constitutional text, we can only guess what the Court sees behind it. There is a certain irony in that, as the Court delves further into more informal and expansive interpretations in judgments across a variety of fields, it forces other political actors to undertake more formal and narrow amendments.

This approach privileges the Court over other institutions in controlling the content of the Constitution.

See Dennis Baker & Mark Jarvis, "The End of Informal Constitutional Change in Canada?" in Emmett Macfarlane, ed, Constitutional Amendment in Canada (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2016) 185 at 200-1.

3. Deliberation in democracy. The proposal for consultative elections would have improved the democratic pedigree of the Senate insofar as its new members would have been elected by voters, assuming provinces and territories had adopted the plan. Yet, the Court concluded that the government could not enact this constitutional reform unilaterally using the amendment power in s 44. The Court's interpretation of part V therefore appears to be rooted in a commitment not to just any kind of democracy but to a particular vision of deliberative democracy. As Yasmin Dawood has argued, "[t]he Court's interpretation of the amending procedures is based on a fundamental democratic commitment to consultation and deliberation between and among the relevant stakeholders." She adds that, according to the Court's reasons in the Senate Reform Reference, "constitutional change cannot take place through unilateral decision making by Parliament even if the proposed reforms improve the democratic caliber of a given institution": see Yasmin Dawood, "The Senate Reference: Constitutional Change and Democracy" (2015) 60 McGill LJ 737 at 760. Should the Court have placed less emphasis on the procedure proposed by the government to reform the Senate in light of the likelihood that the Senate would have become more democratic? Why should process stand in the way of a favourable outcome?

4. Reimagining the Senate's role. If you could give the Senate a new role, what function or functions would you give to it? One proposal suggests assigning the Senate the task of reviewing the constitutionality of bills proposed by the House of Commons with the purpose of ameliorating the democratic deficit created by the institution of judicial review of legislation, and therefore contributing to the overall democratic legitimacy of the constitutional order.

In this role, the Senate "would be acting as a chamber of 'sober second thought,' not as to the desirability of the policies advanced in the relevant bills, but as to their consistency with the constitution": see Joel I Colón-Ríos & Allan C Hutchinson, "Constitutionalizing the Senate: A Modest Democratic Proposal" (2015) 60 McGill LJ 599 at 617-18. Although controversial, there may be a lot to commend in this proposal. It gives the Senate a role that actually matters in improving Parliament's legislative output, by helping the House of Commons steer its bills clear of constitutional invalidity. There would, of course, be no guarantee of constitutional validity until the Supreme Court has addressed the matter, but the senatorial review of bills for constitutionality could help reassure the House that its bills were consistent with the Constitution. The proposal could also contribute to better use and management of judicial resources; presumably, the Senate's review could point the House of Commons' attention to problem areas in its bills and thereby perhaps reduce future claims of constitutional invalidity, which would, in turn, foster more efficient use of scarce judicial resources. That said, Parliament already employs legal counsel to help evaluate bills for constitutionality, and the government is advised by the Department of Justice on the constitutional validity of its bills. The proposal might therefore be duplicative, at least in part, of the roles of other actors in the legislative process. Do you think this proposal is a good idea?

5. Senate reform after the Reference. A new majority Liberal government elected in October 2015 undertook an important reform to the method of selecting persons for eventual appointment to the Senate. The new method involved two stages. In the first stage, introduced in early 2016, a new Independent Advisory Board for Senate Appointments was convened to give advice to the prime minister to fill vacancies in the Senate. The first batch of individuals selected through this new method was appointed in March 2016. The second stage of the new method of senatorial selection began in July 2016. In this new phase—intended by the government to be permanent—individual Canadians can apply to be considered by the advisory board, which will in turn choose from among those applicants to make recommendations to the prime minister for Senate vacancies. The purpose of these reforms was to create an independent appointments process that would, according to the new government, lessen the partisanship and improve the effectiveness of the Senate. The effect of these reforms has been to avoid the familiar and indissoluble problems that have felled prior large-scale efforts at constitutional reform across many Canadian public institutions. This incremental approach is also non-constitutional in the sense that it is said by the government not to require a constitutional amendment. Do you think this new method of senatorial selection is a good idea? Do you believe it can be adopted—it is already in use—without a constitutional amendment? For a defence and explanation of an early version of this new method of selecting senators, see Stephane Dion, "Time for Boldness on Senate Reform, Time for the Trudeau Plan" (2015) 24 Const Forum Const 61. For a deep dive into Senate reform, with the appropriate distance of time since the Senate Reform Reference, see Emmett Macfarlane, Constitutional Pariah (Vancouver: UBC Press, 2021).

6. The Senate and reconciliation. As you contemplate the possibility of Senate reform, it is worth wondering whether the Senate, despite its shortcomings, can be a site of reconciliation. One scholar makes just this point:

The under-representation of Indigenous people and Nations in the Senate (and Canada's other central political institutions) is an important challenge that must be tackled if the Senate is to become an institution for reconciliation. It is interesting to note that the Senate has historically been much better than the House of Commons in representation for Aboriginal people ... and that trend has continued in the contemporary period. Approximately 11.6% of the current senators identify as Aboriginal, and historically about 2.5% of all senators since Confederation have been Aboriginal people. In comparison, 3.1% of the members of the most recent (42nd) Parliament were Aboriginal people, and only approximately 1% of all members historically have identified as Aboriginal. This difference is likely due to the prime minister's discretion in the appointment process for the Senate, which has been recognized as a better tool than elections for increasing minority representation in political institutions.

Why is the direct representation of Indigenous people important for reconciliation? Some would critique this notion as being essentialist and would argue that representation of Indigenous people (or any other minority population) does not guarantee fairer or more just policy-making in relation to members of that population. I share the view of Melissa Williams (2005, 26), who argues that "fair political representation of marginalised groups requires the legislative presence of those groups." "Sharing the River: Aboriginal Representation in Canadian Political Institutions" in Robert C Thomsen and Nanette L Hale, eds, Canadian Environments: Essays in Culture, Politics and History (Brussels: Peter Lang, 2005) 25 at 26.

Both Indigenous and non-Indigenous scholars see the potential for a critical role for Indigenous people in Canada's political institutions like legislatures and the Senate. Williams's argument relies on two fundamental concepts in social justice: voice and trust.

The concept of trust relates to the fact that Indigenous people have little reason to trust that a majority settler political institution would act in the best interests of Indigenous Peoples or, relating to the concept of voice, even know what those interests might be. The issue of broken trust is a recurring theme in Canada's and the Crown's relationship with Indigenous Peoples, stretching from the early days of treaty-making. ...

For the Senate to truly be an institution of reconciliation, ... seats need to be reserved for members of Indigenous Nations. This goes beyond simply increasing the number of Indigenous people in the Senate. ... These types of reforms do not effectively challenge the dominant institutional culture. Instead, reserved seats as a mechanism for reconciliation ensures that Indigenous people are able to represent the interests of Indigenous Nations in the Senate in a treaty federalism relationship. As Richard Simeon argues, "To maintain unity in territorially divided societies, 'building out' through devolution and decentralization needs to be accompanied by 'building in,' ensuring that regional minorities have an effective voice and presence at the center." See "Constitutional Design and Change in Federal Systems: Issues and Questions" (2009) 39 Publius 241 at 247-48. Applying this concept to Indigenous Peoples and their place in Canada suggests that moving toward a more decentralized model of Indigenous-state relationship based in reconciliation and treaty federalism requires a concurrent move to "build in" Indigenous Peoples to Canada's central institutions, including the Senate. This move would have the additional positive benefit recognized by Williams (supra at 49), who aptly states, "Symbolically, separate representation for Aboriginal peoples within the Senate would represent Aboriginal peoples as a distinct partner in Canadian confederation." ... The UNDRIP affirms that Indigenous Peoples have the right to participate in central state institutions if they choose to do so (United Nations 2007). The creation of reserved seats would give Indigenous Peoples a similar institutional status to the provinces and territories, which would aid in the recognition of their coexisting sovereignties in the relationship of treaty federalism.

The distribution of seats is likely one of the more contentious questions in regard to reserved representation for Indigenous people in the Senate. The provinces and territories guard their number of seats in the Senate very closely, so removing seats from one or more of the provinces and territories to accommodate reserved Indigenous representation would likely be out of the question. A longstanding convention has been in place since 1873 that "no province or region has lost Senators as a result of other entries to Confederation" so it makes sense that this convention would have to be followed in constituting Indigenous Nations as another partner in Confederation. ... The clear path forward is adding seats to achieve the goal of reserved representation, as recommended in the Charlottetown Accord. The question then becomes, how many seats? ... It makes sense that the minimum number of seats must be four—one for First Nations, one for the Inuit, one for the Métis Nation, and one for off-reserve, non-treaty, and non-Status Indigenous people, as represented by the four national Indigenous organizations. ...

... One option for reserved Indigenous representation would be to treat Indigenous Peoples as the equivalent of a new province and award them six seats [as was done for the provinces admitted to Confederation after 1867]. ...

A more radical option would be to consider Indigenous Peoples as a separate entity deserving of its own allotment of seats equivalent to a region, so 24 seats in total. Those 24 seats could be subdivided evenly, allowing each Indigenous group to have 6 seats equivalent to province within the "region." This would arguably be the best fit with a framework of reconciliation and treaty federalism, as it recognizes both the diversity of Indigenous Peoples and their individual contributions as founding partners in Confederation.

Should neither of these options prove persuasive, yet another option is to allot seats based on population. ... While seats in the Senate have not historically been allotted based strictly on population, this option might be a path toward compromise with those who are concerned about the threat to conventional understandings of federalism or undermining of the power of the provinces, as it can be justified based on population.

This section has provided four different options for moving forward. The 24-seat solution outlined above would arguably be the allotment that best reflects a vision of treaty federalism, which I see as the best analytical framework for moving toward a new relationship between the Canadian state and Indigenous Peoples. Nevertheless, the final number ... would have to be determined through dialogue ... as recommended in the Charlottetown Accord. While reaching consensus will likely be difficult, having this dialogue is a fundamental part of moving toward a relationship of reconciliation.

E. THE STATUS OF THE SUPREME COURT

In this section, we return to the Supreme Court of Canada, a subject discussed in a number of chapters.

The importance of the Supreme Court in Canada's constitutional order was confirmed by part V of the Constitution Act, 1982. You will recall (see Section IV.C above) that part V creates five procedures to amend the Constitution, and two require a larger aggregation of majorities than the others. Different features of the Court are entrenched under each of these two amendment procedures: first, any amendment to the "composition of the Supreme Court of Canada" requires the use of the unanimity procedure in s 41(d); and second, any other change to the Supreme Court of Canada not related to its "composition" but that nonetheless amounts to an amendment to the Constitution of Canada requires the use of the general amending formula in s 38, as stated in s 42(d).

Patriation left open a question about the status of the Supreme Court: was the Supreme Court Act, RSC 1985, c S-26, which established the Court, considered part of the Constitution of Canada? Section 52(2) of the Constitution Act, 1982 tells us that "the Constitution of Canada includes ... the Acts and orders referred to in the schedule" appended to the Act. The Supreme Court Act is not listed. What are we to make of this? On one reading, this is an insignificant omission because s 52(2), by using the term "includes," is not exhaustive. On another reading, however, the omission of such an important Act could not have been without reason—but what is it? Still another reading is that it would have been redundant to list the Act since part V already protected the Supreme Court's composition and other constitutional features.

The question is far from an academic one. On the contrary, it has real consequences. If the Constitution of Canada does not "include" the Supreme Court Act, then Parliament can freely use its legislative authority under s 101 to make amendments to it. But if the Constitution of Canada does "include" it, then Parliament's powers require some clarification. This was the subject of controversy in the Supreme Court Act Reference, also known as the Nadon Reference, discussed in Chapter 13.

Reference re Supreme Court Act, ss 5 and 6

2014 SCC 21 (most footnotes omitted; some integrated into text)

[In October 2013, Justice Nadon of the Federal Court of Appeal was appointed to the Supreme Court of Canada pursuant to s 6 of the Supreme Court Act. Section 6 stipulates that three of the nine judges of the Supreme Court should be appointed "from among the judges of the Court of Appeal or of the Superior Court of the Province of Québec or from among the advocates of that Province."

Justice Nadon was not at that time a member of the barreau du Québec, although he had previously been a member for more than ten years. A lawyer filed suit in Federal Court to have the appointment vacated on the basis that it was not authorized under s 6 of the Supreme Court Act. Parliament then amended the Act to provide, via declaratory provisions, that for the purpose of s 6 of the Act, an appointee to the Supreme Court was from among the advocates of the province of Quebec if, at any time, they were an advocate of at least ten years' standing at the bar of that province. The governor in council then referred two questions to the Supreme Court. The first question asked whether a person who was, at any time, an advocate of at least ten years' standing at the barreau du Québec qualified for appointment under s 6 of the Act as being "from among the advocates of that Province." The second question asked whether Parliament could enact legislation to make such a person eligible for appointment in the event that they did not qualify under the statute in its unamended form.

By a majority of six to one, the Supreme Court answered both questions in the negative. The portion of the judgement dealing with question one has been reproduced in Chapter 13. Here we include excerpts from the Court's reasons on question two.]

McLACHLIN CJ and LeBEL, ABELLA, CROMWELL, KARAKATSANIS, and WAGNER JJ:

V. Question 2

A. The Issue

(2) Can Parliament enact legislation that requires that a person be or has previously been a barrister or advocate of at least 10 years standing at the bar of a province as a condition of appointment as a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada or enact the annexed declaratory provisions as set out in clauses 471 and 472 of the Bill entitled Economic Action Plan 2013 Act, No. 2 [which were subsequently enacted as ss 5.1 and 6.1 of the Supreme Court Act]?

[72] In light of our conclusion that appointments to the Court under s. 6 require current membership of the Barreau du Québec or of the Court of Appeal or Superior Court of Quebec, in addition to the criteria set out in s. 5, it is necessary to consider the second question, which is whether Parliament can enact declaratory legislation that would alter the composition of the Supreme Court of Canada.

[73] The Attorney General of Canada argues that the eligibility requirements for appointments under s. 6 have not been entrenched in the Constitution, and that Parliament retains the plenary power under s. 101 of the Constitution Act, 1867 to unilaterally amend the eligibility criteria under ss. 5 and 6.

[74] We disagree [with the Attorney General of Canada on this point]. Parliament cannot unilaterally change the composition of the Supreme Court of Canada. Essential features of the Court are constitutionally protected under Part V of the Constitution Act, 1982. Changes to the composition of the Court can only be made under the procedure provided for in s. 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982 and therefore require the unanimous consent of Parliament and the provincial legislatures. Changes to the other essential features of the Court can only be made under the procedure provided for in s. 42 of the Constitution Act, 1982, which requires the consent of at least seven provinces representing, in the aggregate, at least half of the population of all the provinces.

[The majority quoted s 41(d) and s 42(1)(d) of part V.]

[75] We will first discuss the history of how the Court became constitutionally protected, and then answer the Attorney General of Canada's arguments on this issue. Finally, we will discuss the effect of the declaratory provisions enacted by Parliament.

B. Evolution of the Constitutional Status of the Supreme Court

(1) The Supreme Court's Evolution Prior to Patriation

[77] At Confederation, there was no Supreme Court of Canada. Nor were the details of what would eventually become the Supreme Court expounded in the Constitution Act, 1867. It was assumed that the ultimate judicial authority for Canada would continue to be the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in London. ...

[78] The Constitution Act, 1867, however, gave Parliament the authority to establish a general court of appeal for Canada [under s 101]

[79] ... Sir John A. Macdonald, who was Canada's Prime Minister and Minister of Justice from 1867 to 1873 ... introduced bills for the establishment of the Supreme Court in 1869 and again in 1870 in the House of Commons. Both bills, which did not reserve any seats on the Court for Quebec jurists, faced staunch opposition from Quebec in Parliament. ...

[81] The bill that finally became the Supreme Court Act was introduced in 1875 by the federal Minister of Justice The new Supreme Court had general appellate jurisdiction over civil, criminal, and constitutional cases. In addition, the Court was given an exceptional original jurisdiction not incompatible with its appellate jurisdiction, for instance to consider references from the Governor in Council

[82] Under the authority newly granted by the Statute of Westminster, 1931, Parliament abolished criminal appeals to the Privy Council in 1933 Of even more historic significance, in 1949, it abolished all appeals to the Privy Council This had a profound effect on the constitutional architecture of Canada.

[83] ... [It] meant that the Supreme Court of Canada inherited the role of the Council under the Canadian Constitution. As a result, the Court assumed the powers and jurisdiction "no less in scope than those formerly exercised in relation to Canada by the Judicial Committee" , including adjudicating disputes over federalism. The need for a final, independent judicial arbiter of disputes over federal–provincial jurisdiction is implicit in a federal system

[84] In addition, the elevation in the Court's status empowered it to exercise a "unifying jurisdiction over the provincial courts" The Supreme Court became the keystone to Canada's unified court system. It "acts as the exclusive ultimate appellate court in the country"

[85] With the abolition of appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the continued existence and functioning of the Supreme Court of Canada became a key matter of interest to both Parliament and the provinces. The Court assumed a vital role as an institution forming part of the federal system. It became the final arbiter of division of powers disputes, and became the final word on matters of public law and provincial civil law. Drawing on the expertise of its judges from Canada's two legal traditions, the Court ensured that the common law and the civil law would evolve side by side, while each maintained its distinctive character. The Court thus became central to the functioning of legal systems within each province and, more broadly, to the development of a unified and coherent Canadian legal system.

[86] The role of the Supreme Court of Canada was further enhanced as the 20th century unfolded. In 1975, Parliament amended the Supreme Court Act to end appeals as of right to the Court in civil cases (S.C. 1974-75-76, c. 18). This gave the Court control over its civil docket, and allowed it to focus on questions of public legal importance. As a result, the Court's "mandate became oriented less to error correction and more to development of the jurisprudence"

[87] As a result of these developments, the Supreme Court emerged as a constitutionally essential institution engaging both federal and provincial interests. Increasingly, those concerned with constitutional reform accepted that future reforms would have to recognize the Supreme Court's position within the architecture of the Constitution.

(2) The Supreme Court and Patriation

[88] ... The Constitution Act, 1982 enhanced the Court's role under the Constitution and confirmed its status as a constitutionally protected institution.

[89] Patriation of the Constitution [in 1982] was accompanied by the adoption of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which gave the courts the responsibility for interpreting and remedying breaches of the Charter. Patriation also brought an explicit acknowledgement that the Constitution is the "supreme law of Canada" [here the Court cited the supremacy clause, s 52]. The existence of an impartial and authoritative judicial arbiter is a necessary corollary of the enactment of the supremacy clause. The judiciary became the "guardian of the constitution" As such, the Supreme Court of Canada is a foundational premise of the Constitution. With the adoption of the Constitution Act, 1982, "the Canadian system of government was transformed to a significant extent from a system of Parliamentary supremacy to one of constitutional supremacy"

[90] Accordingly, the Constitution Act, 1982 confirmed the constitutional protection of the essential features of the Supreme Court. Indeed, Part V of the Constitution Act, 1982 expressly makes changes to the Supreme Court and to its composition subject to constitutional amending procedures.

[91] Under s. 41(d), the unanimous consent of Parliament and all provincial legislatures is required for amendments to the Constitution relating to the "composition of the Supreme Court." The notion of "composition" refers to ss. 4(1), 5 and 6 of the Supreme Court Act, which codify the composition of and eligibility requirements for appointment to the Supreme Court of Canada as they existed in 1982. By implication, s. 41(d) also protects the continued existence of the Court, since abolition would altogether remove the Court's composition.

[92] The textual origin of Part V was the "April Accord" of 1981 (Constitutional Accord: Canadian Patriation Plan (1981)), to which eight provinces, including Quebec, were parties. The explanatory notes to this Accord confirm that the intention was to limit Parliament's unilateral authority to reform the Supreme Court Pointedly, the explanatory note to s. 41(d) states: "This clause would ensure that the Supreme Court of Canada is comprised of judges a proportion of whom are drawn from the Bar or Bench of Québec and are, therefore, trained in the civil law" The intention of the provision was demonstrably to make it difficult to change the composition of the Court, and to ensure that Quebec's representation was given special constitutional protection.

[93] ... Requiring unanimity for changes to the composition of the Court gave Quebec constitutional assurance that changes to its representation on the Court would not be effected without its consent. ... [This requirement precluded] the possibility that Quebec's seats on the Court could have been reduced or altogether removed without Quebec's agreement.

[94] Section 42(1)(d) applies the 7/50 amending procedure to the essential features of the Court, rather than to all of the provisions of the Supreme Court Act. The express mention of the Supreme Court of Canada in s. 42(1)(d) is intended to ensure the proper functioning of the Supreme Court. This requires the constitutional protection of the essential features of the Court, understood in light of the role that it had come to play in the Canadian constitutional structure by the time of patriation. These essential features include, at the very least, the Court's jurisdiction as the final general court of appeal for Canada, including in matters of constitutional interpretation, and its independence.

[95] In summary, the Supreme Court gained constitutional status as a result of its evolution into the final general court of appeal for Canada, with jurisdiction to hear appeals concerning all the laws of Canada and the provinces, including the Constitution. This status was confirmed in the Constitution Act, 1982, which made modifications of the Court's composition and other essential features subject to stringent amending procedures.

C. The Arguments of the Attorney General of Canada

[96] The Attorney General of Canada argues (i) that the mention of the Supreme Court in the Constitution Act, 1982 has no legal force, and (ii) that the failed attempts to entrench the eligibility requirements in the Meech Lake Accord of 1987 and the Charlottetown Accord of 1992 demonstrate that Parliament and the provinces understood those requirements not to have been entrenched in 1982.

(1) The "Empty Vessels" Theory

[97] The Attorney General of Canada contends that the Supreme Court is not protected by Part V, because the Supreme Court Act is not enumerated in s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982 as forming part of the Constitution of Canada. He essentially argues that the references to the "Supreme Court" in ss. 41(d) and 42(1)(d) are "empty vessels" to be filled only when the Court becomes expressly entrenched in the text of the Constitution . . . It follows from this, he argues, that Parliament retains the power to unilaterally make changes to the Court under s. 101 of the Constitution Act, 1867 until such time as the Court is expressly entrenched.

[98] This contention is unsustainable. It would mean that the framers would have entrenched the Court's exclusion from constitutional protection . . . It would also mean that the provinces agreed to insulate this unilateral federal power from amendment except through the exacting procedures in Part V.

[99] Accepting this argument would have two practical consequences that the provinces could not have intended. First, it would mean that Parliament could unilaterally and fundamentally change the Court, including Quebec's historically guaranteed representation, through ordinary legislation. Quebec, a signatory to the April Accord, would not have agreed to this, nor would have the other provinces. Second, it would mean that the Court would have less protection than at any other point in its history since the abolition of appeals to the Privy Council. This outcome illustrates the absurdity of denying Part V its plain meaning. The framers cannot have intended to diminish the constitutional protection accorded to the Court, while at the same time enhancing its constitutional role under the Constitution Act, 1982.

[100] ... By setting out in Part V how changes were to be made to the Supreme Court and its composition, the clear intention was to freeze the status quo in relation to the Court's constitutional role, pending future changes This reflects the political and social consensus at the time that the Supreme Court was an essential part of Canada's constitutional architecture.

[101] It is true that at Confederation, Parliament was given the authority through s. 101 of the Constitution Act, 1867 to "provide for the Constitution, Maintenance, and Organization of a General Court of Appeal for Canada." ... The unilateral power found in s. 101 of the Constitution Act, 1867 has been overtaken by the Court's evolution in the structure of the Constitution, as recognized in Part V of the Constitution Act, 1982. As a result, what s. 101 now requires is that Parliament maintain—and protect—the essence of what enables the Supreme Court to perform its current role.

(2) The Meech Lake Accord and the Charlottetown Accord

[102] The Attorney General of Canada argues that the Meech Lake Accord and the Charlottetown Accord would have expressly entrenched the qualifications for appointment to the Court in the Constitution, and that the failure to adopt these constitutional amendments means that the qualifications for appointment to the Court are not entrenched.

[103] We cannot accept this argument. As discussed above, the enactment of the Constitution Act, 1982 protected the status quo regarding the Supreme Court. That expressly included the Court's composition, of which Quebec's representation on the Court is an integral part. The Meech Lake Accord and the Charlottetown Accord would have reformed the appointment process for the Court, and would have required that the Quebec judges on the Court be appointed from a list of candidates submitted by Quebec. These failed attempts at reform are evidence only of attempts at a broader reform of the selection process, but they shed no light on the issue of the Court's existing constitutional protection. The failure of the Meech Lake Accord and Charlottetown Accord simply means that the status quo regarding the Court's constitutional role remains intact.

D. The Effects of the Declaratory Provisions Enacted by Parliament

[104] Changes to the composition of the Supreme Court must comply with s. 41(d) of the Constitution Act, 1982. Sections 4(1), 5 and 6 of the Supreme Court Act codify the composition of and eligibility requirements for appointment to the Supreme Court of Canada as they existed in 1982.

[105] Both the general eligibility requirements for appointment and the specific eligibility requirements for appointment from Quebec are aspects of the composition of the Court. It follows that any substantive change in relation to those eligibility requirements is an amendment to the Constitution in relation to the composition of the Supreme Court of Canada and triggers the application of Part V of the Constitution Act, 1982. Any change to the eligibility requirements for appointment to the three Quebec positions on the Court codified in s. 6 therefore requires the unanimous consent of Parliament and the 10 provinces.

[106] Since s. 6.1 of the Supreme Court Act (cl. 472 of Economic Action Plan 2013 Act, No. 2) substantively changes the eligibility requirements for appointments to the Quebec seats on the Court under s. 6, it seeks to bring about an amendment to the Constitution of Canada on a matter requiring unanimity of Parliament and the provincial legislatures. The assertion that s. 6.1 is a declaratory provision does not alter its import. Section 6.1 is therefore ultra vires of Parliament acting alone. ...

[At the same time as it amended the Supreme Court Act to add s 6.1, Parliament had also amended the Act to confirm eligibility for appointment under s 5 on the basis of current or former standing at the bar for ten years. The majority concluded that this amendment was valid because it simply confirmed the status quo.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The process of constitutionalization. How does a law become constitutional in nature, or constitutionalized? A law can become constitutionalized at the time a constitution is written—in this case, the authors of the constitution choose to exempt a law from the ordinary legislative process and instead make it amendable only by a special procedure, usually more difficult than that required to pass or amend an ordinary law. A law can also become constitutionalized over time as it acquires some special public salience. There is today increasing attention given to the phenomenon of a constitutional statute or a quasi-constitutional law. These are laws that were passed in the ordinary legislative process, but which have become politically entrenched in the sense that there is unlikely to be any political will to repeal them. In the United States, this is best reflected by the concept of a “superstatute”: see William N Eskridge Jr & John Ferejohn, “Super-Statutes” (2001) 50 Duke LJ 1215. In the United Kingdom, Adam Perry and Farrah Ahmed have theorized the concept of a constitutional statute that is “quasi-entrenched”: see Adam Perry & Farrah Ahmed, “The Quasi-Entrenchment of Constitutional Statutes” (2014) 73 Cambridge LJ 514. The Supreme Court Act Reference suggests another way that a law can become constitutional: by judicial interpretation. The Court explained that the “essential features of the Court” (at para 94), detailed in the Supreme Court Act, are now subject to the general amending formula. These essential features, the Court wrote, “include, at the very least, the Court’s jurisdiction as the final general court of appeal for Canada, including in matters of constitutional interpretation, and its independence” (at para 94). What about Parliament’s historical power under s 101? The Court explained that “Parliament undoubtedly has the authority under s. 101 to enact routine amendments necessary for the continued maintenance of the Supreme Court, but only if those amendments do not change the constitutionally protected features of the Court” (at para 101). Are you persuaded by how the Court arrived at its conclusion that the Constitution of Canada does indeed “include” those parts of the Supreme Court Act that reflect the Court’s “essential features”?

2. The Court as historian. The Court’s reasons in the Reference rely on its reading of its own historical evolution from Confederation to Patriation. There are questions, however, about whether the Court’s reading of evolution is complete; it may be that a selective account of history was written to reinforce the conclusion that the Court sought to reach. The following account invites us to dig deeper into the Court’s reading of history:

This reading of the historical record is reasonably convincing, but it does seem rather convenient ... in portraying the Court’s inevitable trajectory towards the apex of Canada’s constitutional structure. For instance, abolition of appeals to the Privy Council can be seen as yet another one of Canada’s slow, halting steps along the path towards independence—perhaps a halfway marker between the Statute of Westminster, 1931 and patriation—rather than a positive affirmation of the role of a cherished national institution ... Canadian independence required the termination of appeals to the Privy Council, but “a realistic appraisal of the quality and stature of the Supreme Court [in the 1920s] demanded a delay.” In 1947, when the way had been cleared for abolition, the “government continued to hesitate, a good indication that public opinion was still ambivalent.” The Supreme Court’s metamorphosis into a "keystone" could be read as emerging due to historical happenstance rather than popular or political acclaim.

There are several interesting omissions from the Court's account of its journey. I discuss these in ascending order of importance. First, the Court gave little weight to the understanding of the actors in post-patriation constitutional reform efforts. For example, the drafters of the Meech Lake Accord proposed to add new sections to the Constitution Act, 1867 in order to formally entrench the Court. In this process, unanimity was required for anything touching the composition of the Court while the general amending formula applied to all other changes. Though not conclusive, this historical precedent lends itself to the argument that the Court was not immediately entrenched in 1982. More could have been done to address the argument.

Second, although the abolition of automatic civil appeals has generally been seen as a significant event in the Court's evolution, it remains the case that there are criminal appeals as of right. Accordingly, the Court's control over its own docket is not absolute, and its freedom to focus on matters of fundamental legal importance not unfettered. Third, it is notable that the Court does not mention its controversial, patriation-enabling decision in the Reference Re Resolution to amend the Constitution (Patriation Reference). [See the discussion of the Reference above.] ... Its own decision [there] paved the way for the very patriation process that "enhanced the Court's role under the Constitution and confirmed its status as a constitutionally protected institution."

Fourth, there is no discussion of the clauses in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (Charter)—which was entrenched by the adoption of the Constitution Act, 1982—that allow for the limitation of some protected rights. Notably, the notwithstanding clause contained in section 33 permits Parliament or a provincial legislature to expressly declare that legislation "shall operate notwithstanding" certain provisions of the Charter. The presence of this power has not prevented the emergence of a "highly juridical orientation to constitutionalism"

Here, the Court's own adoption of a proportionality test that gave it the authority to determine whether limits on Charter rights can be justified, and its own retention of the final word as to the compatibility of legislative modifications with judicial decisions, solidified its position at the apex of Canada's constitutional order. My point is not that the Court's ultimate conclusion was wrong, but that it relied on a supporting narrative that was somewhat selective. A fuller, more critical account highlights just how historically contingent the Court's ascent was and how the Court itself paved part of the way.

See Paul Daly, "A Supreme Court's Place in the Constitutional Order: Contrasting Recent Experiences in Canada and the United Kingdom" (2015) 41 Queen's LJ 1 at 9-14 (footnotes omitted).

3. The Court's "essential features." The Reference made clear that the Court's "essential features" are constitutionally protected under part V, either under the unanimity procedure or the general amending formula. What was made much less clear, however, is the identity and scope of those essential features. We know from the Reference that they include the Court's composition and independence, as well as its jurisdiction as the final court of appeal. But, as one scholar observes, "we still do not have an exhaustive list of the Court's 'essential' features, leaving considerable uncertainty as to what future reforms will or will not require constitutional amendment." As a result, "considering Canada's difficulty in achieving reform via constitutional amendment, in practice the Supreme Court might end up unpacking its own composition and 'essential features' on a case-by-case basis": see Erin Crandall, "DIY 101: The Constitutional Entrenchment of the Supreme Court" in Emmett Macfarlane, ed, Constitutional Amendment in Canada (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2016) 211 at 222-23. The choice to refrain from giving an exhaustive list of its own essential features could have been made by the Court for strategic reasons of self-preservation and also to reassert its authority as the ultimate interpreter of the Constitution of Canada. In this way, the Court's reasons in the Reference would have the effect of entrenching the Court against future changes without the Court first agreeing to them. Setting aside the constitutional politics of the Reference, should the Court, in the interest of the clarity of our constitutional law, have delineated its essential features?

VI. COMPARATIVE AND THEORETICAL PERSPECTIVES ON CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

A. THE WORLD'S MOST RIGID CONSTITUTION?

We know from the recent failures of comprehensive constitutional amendment in the Meech Lake and Charlottetown accords that the Constitution of Canada can sometimes be extraordinarily difficult to amend.

What makes the Constitution so hard to amend is not only the difficulty of assembling the necessary approvals from the majorities required by the general amending formula in s 38 and the unanimity procedure in s 41. (With one exception, neither procedure has been successfully used: see Section IV.C, above.) It is that the requirements for constitutional amendment go beyond those found in part V. As discussed above (see Section V.B.1), the 1996 Regional Veto Act requires the consent of a majority of provinces—including British Columbia, Ontario, Quebec, and at least two each from the Atlantic and Prairie provinces, representing at least half of the regional population—before an amendment using the general amending formula in s 38 is even proposed.

There are also laws—for example, in Alberta and British Columbia—mandating a binding provincial referendum before the legislative assembly votes on a major amendment requiring provincial approval: see Constitutional Referendum Act, RSA 2000, c C-25, ss 2(1), 4; Constitutional Amendment Approval Act, RSBC 1996, c 67, s 1; Referendum Act, RSBC 1996, c 400, s 4. Similar laws have been passed across the country authorizing (but not requiring) binding or advisory referenda before the legislative assembly votes on an amendment. These provincial laws drive home a point made by Carissima Mathen that both the general and unanimity formulas render the prospect of change vulnerable to idiosyncratic regional demands. In particular, the prospect that a single province could block an otherwise deeply popular change is open to criticism on the grounds of unfairness and, even, imperilling national unity.

See Carissima Mathen, "The Federal Principle: Constitutional Amendment and Intergovernmental Relations" in Emmett Macfarlane, ed, Constitutional Amendment in Canada (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2016) 65 at 75.

And, as we have discussed above (see Section IV.D) in connection with the Charlottetown Accord, some scholars have suggested that there now exists a constitutional convention requiring a national referendum before a major constitutional amendment is completed. What therefore makes the Constitution so difficult to amend is not only part V itself, but the legal and political infrastructure that has developed around it: see Richard Albert, "The Difficulty of Constitutional Amendment in Canada" (2015) 53 Alta L Rev 85 at 96-105.

How difficult is it to amend the Constitution of Canada in comparison with the constitutions of the world? Scholars have tried to answer this question. For example, Arendt Lijphart has concluded from a study sample of 36 countries that Canada ranks among the world's most rigid constitutions with respect to the majorities required for amendment, tied with Argentina, Australia, Germany, Japan, Korea, Switzerland, and the United States, each of which he identifies as requiring supermajorities exceeding two-thirds: see Arendt Lijphart, Patterns of Democracy: Government Forms and Performance in Thirty-Six Countries, 2nd ed (New Haven, Conn: Yale University Press, 2012) at 208. Another scholar, Astrid Lorenz, studying 39 countries, concludes that Canada is tied with Chile and Switzerland, with an index of difficulty of 7.0, behind Belgium (9.5), the United States and Bolivia (9.0), and the Netherlands (8.5), followed by Australia, Denmark, and Japan, three countries tied at 8.0: see Astrid Lorenz, "How to Measure Constitutional Rigidity: Four Concepts and Two Alternatives" (2005) 17 J Theor Polit 339 at 358–59.

In what is today the most referenced study of amendment difficulty, Donald Lutz generated a ranking of 36 countries, not including Canada, in which the United States holds the top score for amendment difficulty (5.10), followed by Switzerland and Venezuela (4.75), with Australia (4.65) and Costa Rica (4.10) next: see Donald Lutz, Principles of Constitutional Design (New York: Cambridge University Press, 2006) at 170. Applying Lutz's methods to Canada, one scholar posited that the unanimity procedure would have scored 5.00, ranking Canada as the second on the list in terms of amendment difficulty. Measuring the unanimity procedure plus the requirements of the Regional Veto Act plus the provincial referenda required by some provinces prior to approving an amendment would have generated a score of 8.00, well above the United States, thought by most to be the world's most difficult constitution to amend: see Albert, "The Difficulty of Constitutional Amendment in Canada," above at 94–100.

Does it matter that our Constitution is difficult to amend? Recall from Section I of this chapter that one of the reasons why constitutions contain amendment procedures is to distinguish the constitutional text from an ordinary law, the former made harder to amend than the latter. But is it possible for the rules of constitutional amendment to be too difficult? What are the consequences of having a constitution that cannot be amended when it is necessary to make changes to the polity? Are there advantages to having a rigid constitution? One of the world's most difficult constitutions ever to amend—perhaps the most difficult—was the Articles of Confederation, the first constitution the United States adopted after its declaration of independence. The Articles of Confederation required the agreement of each of the 13 states to make any amendment. Many attempts were made, but all of them failed. After years of failed efforts to amend the Articles of Confederation, the people of the United States decided to start afresh by ratifying a new constitution in defiance of the Articles. That constitution has survived to this day: see Richard S Kay, "The Illegality of the Constitution" (1987) 4 Const Commentary 57.

B. FORMAL AND INFORMAL AMENDMENT

Our discussion of constitutional amendment has so far implicitly involved what we can identify as "formal" constitutional amendment as opposed to "informal" constitutional amendment. A formal constitutional amendment alters the text of the constitution, the term "formal" being roughly though not completely analogous to "written." In contrast, an informal constitutional amendment changes the meaning of the constitution without altering its text. The term "informal" here is, again, roughly though not completely analogous to "unwritten." Both these kinds of constitutional changes—written and unwritten—are evident in Canada, although the terminology is not uniformly accepted. A complicating factor is that Canada has no single master-text constitution in which we would expect to find most of our most important constitutional rules.

A constitution can change informally in many ways. It can change informally as a result of a new constitutional convention that is integrated, without any change to the text, into the larger body of constitutional commitments. It can change when a statute of some particular significance becomes more important than an ordinary statute and achieves what we might call quasi-constitutional status. A constitution can also change informally by executive action, by implicit repeal, and also by treaty, to name a few methods of informal constitutional change.

The most common way the Constitution of Canada has changed informally is by judicial interpretation. As Allan Hutchinson has observed, the courts "have become the preferred site for effecting important changes in the constitutional order." Hutchinson moreover argues that this method of constitutional change is "less democratic" than the set of procedures established in part V to update the Constitution: see Allan Hutchinson, "Constitutional Change and Constitutional Amendment: A Canadian Conundrum" in Xenophon Contiades, ed, Engineering Constitutional Change: A Comparative Perspective on Europe, Canada and the USA (Abington, UK: Routledge, 2013) 51 at 56-57. Hutchinson is not alone in taking this view of informal constitutional change by judicial interpretation in Canada. Dale Gibson has expressed what seems to be an even stronger view on what he has called "judicial amendment" in Canada.

Dale Gibson, "Founding Fathers-in-Law: Judicial Amendment of the Canadian Constitution"

(1992) 55 Law & Contemp Probs 261 at 261-62, 266-68, 271-72, 276-80
(footnotes omitted)

[In The Prince] Machiavelli [warned] that constitutional amendment is "dangerous to carry through." Judicial amendment is as dangerous as formal amendment, though the danger lies chiefly in the consequences rather than in the implementation. No nine people, however wise and well informed, possess the individual or collective powers of imagination necessary to foresee fully the ramifications of major alterations to the constitutional norms upon which their nation's legal and governmental structures are founded. Even if they did, they would lack the range of experience and the moral authority required for sound determinations as to the direction such alterations should take. This is not to say that the democratic process necessarily produces better results, but only that there is danger in entrusting constitutional change to the unaided judicial process. . . .

Judicial amendment of the Canadian Constitution was not invented by the Supreme Court of Canada. Its predecessor as Canada's court of last resort, the Judicial Committee of the British Privy Council, began the process. One of the Privy Council's most audacious amendments concerned the power bestowed on the Parliament of Canada by section 91(2) of the Constitution Act, 1867, to make laws in relation to "the regulation of trade and commerce."

The fact that it was listed second among the enumerated heads of federal jurisdiction, immediately after "the public debt and property," and ahead of such vital matters as taxation, postal service, defence, navigation and shipping, currency, coinage, and banking, must say something about the significance of federal regulation of trade and commerce in the eyes of those who negotiated, drafted, and debated the 1867 Constitution. The fact that it was expressed in more expansive language than the equivalent provision to the United States Constitution was certainly no accident. But a relentless progression of restrictive Privy Council rulings between the 1880s and the 1920s pared the power to the point where it could be described by Justice Idington of the Supreme Court of Canada as "the old forlorn hope, so many times tried, unsuccessfully."

The Privy Council did not admit that it was "amending" the Constitution. . . Viscount Haldane claimed that the Judicial Committee's duty "now, as always, is simply to interpret the British North America Act." . . . To classify an "interpretation" of section 91(2) that lacked any textual support, deprived the provision of any independent application . . . as anything less than outright amendment serves only to obfuscate constitutional realities . . .

I do not contend that every major constitutional ruling by the courts involves amendment. The amending decisions with which this article is concerned are relatively rare. ...

The judicial decisions I classify as amendments ... are those that, whatever the sweep of their impact, are not capable of having been products of a fair construction of the Constitution Acts or of other documents of the Canadian Constitution. In "fair construction" I include not just obvious interpretations, but also imaginative rulings that, while perhaps unexpected, can be shown to flow logically from words or implications in the text.

It should not be supposed that I necessarily object to judicial amendments of the Constitution. The point of the earlier examples was not to criticize substance but to illustrate process. ... Nor do I find fault in general with the fact that major constitutional amendments are made by courts. Observers of a more populist persuasion than I may consider it inappropriate for judicial appointees, lacking a democratic mandate, to engage in outright alteration of the country's most fundamental legal and political document. I do not—not absolutely, at any rate. There are, indeed, compelling reasons to believe that occasional judicial amendment of the Constitution is positively beneficial, and sometimes unavoidable. [Here Gibson cites the onerous conditions for amendment of the Constitution of Canada.] ...

The fact that judges amend the Constitution is not ... always a problem in itself. It is inevitable in some circumstances, and at times beneficial. The undemocratic nature of the process is a legitimate cause for concern, however. Some think that it is dangerous even to acknowledge publicly that courts sometimes amend constitutions. They seem to fear that the electorate will then insist that the power be taken away. In my view, that is a misplaced concern. The public already knows what the courts are doing, and I think its respect for the judiciary is less likely to be damaged by an open acknowledgement of the truth than by a transparent denial that the courts are going beyond mere "interpretation."

It is nevertheless anomalous that a democratic constitution should be capable of outright amendment by an undemocratic institution and undemocratic procedures. Therefore, courts should exercise self-restraint in these matters, permitting themselves to engage in constitutional amendment only when it is either inevitable that they do so, or when it would clearly be detrimental to the nation to leave the matter to the formal amendment process. In all other circumstances, judges should restrict their interpretation to the (rather generous, after all) forms of judicial review that fall within the scope of fair construction.

Hutchinson and Gibson are making two different claims, though each claim is related to the other in an important way at its core. Both are pointing to a particular phenomenon of constitutional change in Canada—that courts have changed the meaning of the Constitution in a way that suffers from a democratic deficit. But whereas Hutchinson stops short of identifying this kind of constitutional change by judicial interpretation as an "amendment," Gibson in fact labels it a "judicial amendment." What is at stake in calling a change an amendment? Do you agree with Gibson's critique of the Court? Taking Gibson's critique as well-founded, is there a way to prevent "judicial amendment"?

Lest we conclude that judicial "amendment" is something to be discouraged, it is worth nothing that courts are often compelled to act in the face of legislative inaction, delay, or stalemate. If courts do, in fact, amend the Constitution in an informal way, it may be because political actors are unable or unwilling to do so using the formal methods that part V offers.

As Adrian Vermeule has observed, the alternative to formal constitutional amendment, where it is difficult for whatever reason, is “judicially developed constitutional law, which itself changes over time in response to political, social, and cultural shifts”—what we might describe as a “judicial updating” of the Constitution if we are not comfortable with the idea of “judicial amendment”: see Adrian Vermeule, “Constitutional Amendments and the Constitutional Common Law” in Richard W Bauman & Tsvi Kahana, eds, The Least Dangerous Branch: The Role of Legislatures in the Constitutional State (New York: Cambridge University Press, 2006) 229 at 243, 245.

Another method of informal amendment in Canada may be described as “para-constitutional.” This informal method of constitutional change is quite common in Canada, though has yet to be well-theorized until recently. As you read the excerpted passages to follow, consider the relative ease or difficulty of para-constitutional engineering alongside other forms of informal amendment: how would you rank the many methods of informal amendment on an ascending scale of difficulty? And does this ascending scale of difficulty map onto an ascending or descending scale of democratic legitimacy? What criteria do you use to evaluate democratic legitimacy?

Johanne Poirier & Jesse Hartery, “Para-Constitutional Engineering and Federalism: Informal Constitutional Change Through Intergovernmental Agreements”

[W]e use the concept of para-constitutionality to explore the impact of intergovernmental agreements on federal constitutional orders. The reason is twofold.

First, the concepts of “para-constitutionality” or “para-constitutional engineering,” adapted from legal sociology, have been used in the past to describe the function played by intergovernmental agreements in federal systems. Both ICC [Informal Constitutional Change] and para-constitutionality are umbrella concepts sharing a similar objective: accounting for constitutional alterations that take place without recourse to amendment procedures. The two theoretical frameworks developed somewhat in parallel, partly in different “epistemic communities.” One mostly interested in constitutional change writ large, and largely in English language literature. The other in federal studies. We suggest that bringing para-constitutionality into conversation with ICC—and its more specific theories—is a worthwhile comparative law exercise. These two lines of scholarship might overlap, but they also use different examples, terms and experiences to enrich the analysis.

In addition, we believe there is added-value to the theory of para-constitutionality, particularly when we consider the two distinct etymologies of the prefix “para.”

Borrowed from the Greek παρά, “para” means “beside” (as in “parallel”). Of Latin descent, the prefix paro has a more aggressive connotation and signifies “against” or to “ward off.” Political actors can therefore act “para-constitutionally” in two inter-related ways ...

The Greek “para” entails creating norms “beside”—in parallel to—official law. Para-constitutional instruments and processes circumvent the (“big C” or “small c”) constitution without necessarily contradicting it. ... This dimension of “para” points to the fact that, irrespective of the formal constitutional/unconstitutional status in positive constitutional law, instruments of public policy may have the effect of modifying the constitution, sometimes deliberately, sometimes not. And often, this will be achieved in incremental, and rather opaque, ways.

By contrast, "para-constitutionality" in the Latin sense is concerned with another set of questions. It is essentially a synonym of "unconstitutional." It describes instruments and processes that go against the Constitution. ...

Rules and practices that are constitutionally invalid can enjoy undeniable effectiveness for long periods of time. This will be the case until they are declared unconstitutional by a judge, to the extent that there is a judicial conduit for their constitutional review, or until political actors bring them into compliance with the Constitution. ... In other words, they may play a Greek style para-constitutional function, while the verdict on their para-constitutionality in the Latin sense is suspended or unknown.

The Greek/Latin distinction of para-constitutionality has the advantage of constantly reminding us of what we are concerned with in discussions on ICC. ...

Constitutional politics in Canada have always been executive-led. ... Through agreements, federal partners can circumvent the constitution "Greek-style," whether or not the result is actually consistent with the constitution ("Latin style").

Intergovernmental agreements ("IGAs") are pragmatic instruments negotiated between federal partners. These malleable contract-like instruments perform a wide range of functions, both explicit and implicit. ...

In most cases, the avowed objective of IGAs is to coordinate the exercise of exclusive—but interrelated—powers or to clarify the respective responsibilities of distinct orders of government in the context of concurrent or shared jurisdiction. ... The purpose of these agreements is not usually to amend the constitution, but to operationalize it in a context where the implementation of coherent public policies requires intergovernmental collaboration.

That being said, IGAs can also play a role in restructuring federal constitutions, on the margins of their formal architectures. They can: (1) distort the distribution of legislative powers; (2) serve as alternatives to formal constitutional reforms; and (3) contribute to gradually transforming, in an ad hoc fashion, largely dualist federal systems into integrated federal ones, without providing them with the legal and institutional safeguards that are usually associated with integrated federations [such as ...] Australia, Brazil, Canada, India, Spain, and the United States.

In Canada, [the status of IGAs] is particularly blurry. Depending on the way they are drafted and their content, some may generate binding "contractual" obligations between the executives who enter into them. However, they cannot generate law of general application

And yet, in Canada, the vast majority of IGAs are not incorporated at all. Under traditional norms of public law, they do not feature in the hierarchy of legal norms. In positive law, they do not even trump unilateral regulations of either order of government. Nevertheless, in practice, they can be highly effective in structuring relations between orders of government. Moreover—and perhaps more surprisingly—courts have occasionally treated non-incorporated IGAs as binding on third parties "as if they were law," generally in the name of cooperative federalism. In other words, courts can discretely turn a blind eye to public law orthodoxy to safeguard complex negotiated schemes. [Here Poirier and Hartery note that IGAs remain subject to legislative abrogation.]

Hence, IGAs in Canada are often at the centre of administrative inter-delegation The constitutionality of this type of "oblique" delegation has long been recognized by the Supreme Court of Canada. And yet, as mentioned above, these agreements have the effect of transforming, in an ad hoc manner, the dualist architecture of the Canadian federation whereby each order of government has its own legislative and executive institutions. We do not necessarily decry this constitutional creativity, which can rationalize public action, but wish to underscore its Greek-style para-constitutional impact.

In Canada, IGAs can also serve as a substitute for constitutional reforms that are deemed unattainable. This was the case, for example, with a series of IGAs adopted in the mid-1990s in the wake of the failed Meech Lake and Charlottetown Accords. Faced with the impossibility of constitutional reform, the federal government undertook to demonstrate that the federation could be modernized "administratively" through agreements that did not require formal constitutional amendments (sometimes even without the assistance of legislative bodies). The goal was clearly to achieve some form of constitutional renewal by "contract." In other cases, constitutional mutations proceed incrementally, pragmatically, arguably not even intentionally. The long-term effect, however, is to transform the Constitution as it is lived.

Intergovernmental agreements therefore represent parallel mechanisms of public action, which bypass or restructure the federal constitution

C. AN UNCONSTITUTIONAL CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT?

It has become common for courts around the world to rule that a formal constitutional amendment is unconstitutional. How can that be? Imagine that amending actors follow all of the rules outlined in the Constitution to pass an amendment, with all required majorities or supermajorities properly assembled to approve an amendment. Further, imagine that the amendment is approved by all relevant bodies and that it is promulgated and subsequently entered into the text of the Constitution. This is often the kind of constitutional amendment that courts have invalidated as unconstitutional.

The seeds for finding an amendment unconstitutional were planted in India in 1951, only one year after the Constitution came into force when the Indian Supreme Court was asked whether the amendment power admitted of any limits. The Court answered no: see Sri San-kari Prasad Singh Deo v Union of India, 1951 AIR 458, 1952 SCR 89. Subsequently, however, the Court held that the power to amend the constitution could not be used to violate fundamental rights: see Golaknath v State of Punjab, 1967 AIR 1643, 1967 SCR (2) 762. Shortly thereafter, the Court again narrowed the power holding that it could not be used to violate the "basic structure" of the Constitution: see Kesavananda Bharati Sripadagalvaru v Kerala, 1973 AIR 1361, 1973 SCC (4) 225 at para 1198. This basic structure of the Indian Constitution is not laid out anywhere in the Constitution; it is instead a judicially constructed notion of constitutional coherence that seeks to defend the Constitution from changes that are inconsistent with its own foundations.

A key case in the modern history of the Indian Constitution is Minerva Mills Ltd v Union of India & Ors, 1980 AIR 1789, 1981 SCR (1) 206. For our purposes, the relevant part of the case concerned an amendment to the amendment formula in the Indian Constitution. Section 55 of the Constitution (Forty-second Amendment) Act, 1976 inserted two new subsections into art 368, which authorizes the two Houses of Parliament to amend the Constitution with a simple majority, subject to a few exceptions for amendments that require the approval of at least half of the states. The 42nd amendment introduced subss 4 and 5 into art 368:

(4) No amendment of this Constitution ... shall be called in question in any court on any ground.

(5) For the removal of doubts, it is hereby declared that there shall be no limitation whatever on the constituent power of Parliament to amend by way of addition, variation or repeal the provisions of this Constitution under this article.

The effect of the amendment was to shield all constitutional amendments from the Supreme Court's power of judicial review. In Minerva Mills, the Indian Supreme Court declared this amendment unconstitutional.

Minerva Mills Ltd & Ors v Union of India & Ors

1980 AIR 1789, 1981 SCR (1) 206

CHANDRACHUD CJ:

In Keshavananda Bharati this Court held by a majority that though by Article 368 Parliament is given the power to amend the Constitution, that power cannot be exercised so as to damage the basic features of the Constitution or so as to destroy its basic structure. The question for consideration in this group of petitions ... is whether [s 55] of the Constitution (42nd Amendment) Act, 1976 transgress[es] that limitation, on the amending power.

... The Preamble [to the Constitution] assures to the people of India a polity whose basic structure is described therein as a Sovereign Democratic Republic; Parliament may make any amendments to the Constitution as it deems expedient so long as they do not damage or destroy India's sovereignty and its democratic, republican character. Democracy is not an empty dream. It is a meaningful concept whose essential attributes are recited in the preamble itself: Justice, social, economic and political; Liberty of thought, expression, belief, faith and worship, and Equality of status and opportunity. Its aim, again as set out in the preamble, is to promote among the people an abiding sense of "Fraternity assuring the dignity of the individual and the unity of the Nation." The newly introduced clause 5 of Article 368 demolishes the very pillars on which the preamble rests by empowering the Parliament to exercise its constituent power without any "limitation whatever." No constituent power can conceivably go higher than the sky-high power conferred by clause 5, for it even empowers the Parliament to "repeal the provisions of this Constitution," that is to say, to abrogate the democracy and substitute for it a totally antithetical form of Government. ... The power to destroy is not a power to amend.

Since the Constitution had conferred a limited amending power on the Parliament, the Parliament cannot under the exercise of that limited power enlarge that very power into an absolute power. Indeed, a limited amending power is one of the basic features of our Constitution and, therefore, the limitations on that power cannot be destroyed. In other words, Parliament cannot, under Article 368, expand its amending power so as to acquire for itself the right to repeal or abrogate the Constitution or to destroy its basic and essential features. The donee of a limited power cannot by the exercise of that power convert the limited power into an unlimited one.

Since, for the reasons above mentioned, clause 5 of Article 368 transgresses the limitations on the amending power, it must be held to be unconstitutional.

The newly introduced clause 4 of Article 368 must suffer the same fate as clause 5 because the two clauses are inter-linked. Clause 5 purports to remove all limitations on the amending power while clause 4 deprives the courts of their power to call in question any amendment of the Constitution. ... The conferment of the right to destroy the identity of the Constitution coupled with the provision that no court of law shall pronounce upon the validity of such destruction seems to us a transparent case of transgression of the limitations on the amending power Clause 4 of Article 368 is in one sense an appendage of Clause 5, though we do not like to describe it as a logical consequence of Clause 5. If it be true, as stated in clause 5, that the Parliament has unlimited power to amend the Constitution, courts can have no jurisdiction to strike down any constitutional amendment as unconstitutional. Clause 4, therefore, says nothing more or less than what clause 5 postulates. If clause 5 is beyond the amending power of the Parliament, clause 4 must be equally beyond that power and must be struck down as such.

The idea of an unconstitutional constitutional amendment has migrated across the globe. Although the doctrine has yet to reach Canada, it is prominent in its neighbour, the United States. To date, there has yet to be a federal invalidation of a federal constitutional amendment, but federal and state courts have often invalidated state constitutional amendments. Consider one example, below, in which the United States Supreme Court, in a 6–3 decision, held unconstitutional an amendment to the Colorado Constitution that infringed the fundamental rights of gays and lesbians to participate in the political process.

Romer v Evans

517 US 620, 116 S Ct 1620 (1996)

KENNEDY J (Stevens, O'Connor, Suter, Ginsberg, and Breyer JJ concurring):

One century ago, the first Justice Harlan admonished this Court that the Constitution "neither knows nor tolerates classes among citizens." Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537, 559 ... (1896) (dissenting opinion). Unheeded then, those words now are understood to state a commitment to the law's neutrality where the rights of persons are at stake. The Equal Protection Clause enforces this principle and today requires us to hold invalid a provision of Colorado's Constitution.

The enactment challenged in this case is an amendment to the Constitution of the State of Colorado, adopted in a 1992 statewide referendum. The parties and the state courts refer to it as "Amendment 2," its designation when submitted to the voters. ... [T]he cities of Aspen and Boulder and the City and County of Denver each had enacted ordinances which banned discrimination in many transactions and activities, including housing, employment, education, public accommodations, and health and welfare services. ... What gave rise to the statewide controversy was the protection the ordinances afforded to persons discriminated against by reason of their sexual orientation. ... Amendment 2 repeals these ordinances to the extent they prohibit discrimination on the basis of "homosexual, lesbian or bisexual orientation, conduct, practices or relationships." Colo. Const., Art. II, 30b.

Yet Amendment 2, in explicit terms, does more than repeal or rescind these provisions. It prohibits all legislative, executive or judicial action at any level of state or local government designed to protect the named class, a class we shall refer to as homosexual persons or gays and lesbians. The amendment reads:

"No Protected Status Based on Homosexual, Lesbian, or Bisexual Orientation. Neither the State of Colorado, through any of its branches or departments, nor any of its agencies, political subdivisions, municipalities or school districts, shall enact, adopt or enforce any statute, regulation, ordinance or policy whereby homosexual, lesbian or bisexual orientation, conduct, practices or relationships shall constitute or otherwise be the basis of or entitle any person or class of persons to have or claim any minority status, quota preferences, protected status or claim of discrimination. This Section of the Constitution shall be in all respects self-executing." Ibid.

Sweeping and comprehensive is the change in legal status effected by this law. So much is evident from the ordinances that the Colorado Supreme Court declared would be void by operation of Amendment 2. Homosexuals, by state decree, are put in a solitary class with respect to transactions and relations in both the private and governmental spheres. The amendment withdraws from homosexuals, but no others, specific legal protection from the injuries caused by discrimination, and it forbids reinstatement of these laws and policies.

• • •

Amendment 2's reach may not be limited to specific laws passed for the benefit of gays and lesbians. It is a fair, if not necessary, inference ... that it deprives gays and lesbians even of the protection of general laws and policies that prohibit arbitrary discrimination in governmental and private settings. ...

The Fourteenth Amendment's promise that no person shall be denied the equal protection of the laws must co-exist with the practical necessity that most legislation classifies for one purpose or another, with resulting disadvantage to various groups or persons. We have attempted to reconcile the principle with the reality by stating that, if a law neither burdens a fundamental right nor targets a suspect class, we will uphold the legislative classification so long as it bears a rational relation to some legitimate end. ...

Amendment 2 fails, indeed defies, even this conventional inquiry. First, the amendment has the peculiar property of imposing a broad and undifferentiated disability on a single named group, an exceptional and, as we shall explain, invalid form of legislation. Second, its sheer breadth is so discontinuous with the reasons offered for it that the amendment seems inexplicable by anything but animus toward the class that it affects; it lacks a rational relationship to legitimate state interests.

It is not within our constitutional tradition to enact laws of this sort. Central both to the idea of the rule of law and to our own Constitution's guarantee of equal protection is the principle that government and each of its parts remain open on impartial terms to all who seek its assistance. ... Respect for this principle explains why laws singling out a certain class of citizens for disfavored legal status or general hardships are rare. A law declaring that in general it shall be more difficult for one group of citizens than for all others to seek aid from the government is itself a denial of equal protection of the laws in the most literal sense. ...

• • •

A second and related point is that laws of the kind now before us raise the inevitable inference that the disadvantage imposed is born of animosity toward the class of persons affected. ... Even laws enacted for broad and ambitious purposes often can be explained by reference to legitimate public policies which justify the incidental disadvantages they impose on certain persons. Amendment 2, however, in making a general announcement that gays and lesbians shall not have any particular protections from the law, inflicts on them immediate, continuing, and real injuries that outrun and belie any legitimate justifications that may be claimed for it. We conclude that, in addition to the far-reaching deficiencies of Amendment 2 that we have noted, the principles it offends, in another sense, are conventional and venerable; a law must bear a rational relationship to a legitimate governmental purpose, and Amendment 2 does not.

We must conclude that Amendment 2 classifies homosexuals not to further a proper legislative end but to make them unequal to everyone else. This Colorado cannot do. A State cannot so deem a class of persons a stranger to its laws. Amendment 2 violates the Equal Protection Clause, and the judgment of the Supreme Court of Colorado is affirmed.

It is so ordered.

Consider a third instance of a court exercising the power to invalidate a constitutional amendment. In 2000, the Constitutional Court of Taiwan issued an extraordinary judgment that found both procedural and substantive grounds upon which to invalidate constitutional amendments.

Constitutional Court of Taiwan

Interpretation No 499, 2000/03/24

A constitutional amendment as a state act pertaining to the constitution is null and void inasmuch as a manifest and gross flaw occurs in the amendment procedure. A procedural flaw is considered manifest where the facts of the flaw can be determined without further investigation, whereas it is gross where the facts of the flaw alone render the procedure illegitimate. With such procedural flaws, a constitutional amendment violates the basic norm that underpins the validity of constitutional amendments. The amendment process for the disputed Additional Articles, which passed the third reading by the National Assembly on September 4, 1999, contravenes the principle of openness and transparency as set out above and is not in conformity with Article 38, Paragraph 2 of the Rules of the National Assembly (now defunct). Due to disputed procedural irregularities in which manifest flaws transpired without any further inquiry, the general public was not informed of how the Delegates of the National Assembly (hereinafter "Delegates") exercised their amending power. Thus, the constitutional principle that requires the Delegates to be accountable to both their constituents and their nominating political parties ... was not adhered to. With such a manifest and gross flaw, the act of disputed constitutional amendment violates the basic norm that underpins the validity of constitutional amendments.

The National Assembly is a constitutionally-established organ with its competence provided for in the Constitution. The Additional Articles, enacted by the National Assembly via the exercise of its amending power, are at the same level of hierarchy as the original texts of the Constitution. Some constitutional provisions are integral to the essential nature of the Constitution and underpin the constitutional normative order. If such provisions are open to change through constitutional amendment, adoption of such constitutional amendments would bring down the constitutional normative order in its entirety. Therefore, any such constitutional amendment shall be considered illegitimate, in and of itself. Among various constitutional provisions, Article 1 (the principle of a democratic republic), Article 2 (the principle of popular sovereignty), Chapter II (the protection of constitutional rights), and those providing for the separation of powers and the principle of checks and balances are integral to the essential nature of the Constitution and constitute the foundational principles of the entire constitutional order. All the constitutionally-established organs must adhere to the constitutional order of liberal democracy, as emanating from the said constitutional provisions, on which the current Constitution is founded.

Article 1, Paragraph 3, Second Sentence of the Additional Articles provides, "The term of office of the Third National Assembly shall be extended to the day when the term of office of the Fourth Legislative Yuan expires;" Article 4, Paragraph 3, First Sentence provides, "The term of office of the Fourth Legislative Yuan shall be extended to June 30, 2002." Thereby, the term of office of the Third National Assembly will be extended by two years and forty-two days, and the term of office of the Fourth Legislative Yuan by five months, respectively. Pursuant to the principle of popular sovereignty, the power and authority of political representatives originate directly from the authorization of the people. Hence, the legitimacy of representative democracy lies in the adherence of elected political representatives to their social contract with the electorate. Its cardinal principle is that the new election must take place at the end of the fixed electoral term unless just cause exists for not holding the election. Failing that, representative democracy will be devoid of legitimacy. ... The just cause for not holding the election alluded to above must be consistent with the holdings of J.Y. Interpretation No. 31, which stipulated, "The State has been undergoing a severe calamity, which has made the election of both the Second Legislative Yuan and the Second Control Yuan de facto impossible." In this case, no just cause for not holding re-elections can be found to justify the disputed extension of the terms of both the Third National Assembly and the Fourth Legislative Yuan. ...

The amendment process of Articles 1, 4, 9, and 10 of the Additional Articles, adopted by the Third National Assembly by secret ballot in its Fourth Session, Eighteenth Meeting on September 4, 1999, is in contravention of the principle of openness and transparency and also violates the then-governing Article 38, Paragraph 2 of the Rules of the National Assembly, to the extent of constituting manifest and gross flaws. It therefore violates the basic norm that underpins the validity of constitutional amendments. Among the disputed Additional Articles, Article 1, Paragraphs 1 to 3 and Article 4, Paragraph 3 are in normative conflict with those provisions of the Constitution that are integral to its essential nature and underpin the constitutional normative order. Such conflict shall be proscribed under the constitutional order of liberal democracy. Hence, the disputed Articles 1, 4, 9, and 10 of the Additional Articles shall be null and void from the date of announcement of this Interpretation. The Additional Articles promulgated on July 21, 1997, shall continue to apply. It is so ordered.

The primary function of legal interpretation is to resolve the issues of concurrence of norms (Normenkonkurrenz) and conflict of norms (Normen-konflikt), including doubts as to the gaps resulting from conflicting norms enacted at different times (which is considered an axiom in legal theory. See Karl Larenz, Methodenlehre der Rechtswissenschaft, 6th ed., 1991, S. 313ff.; Emil[ilo] Betti, Allgemeine Auslegungslehre als Methodik der Geisteswissenschaften, 1967, S. 645ff.). This is also the province and duty of any constitutional court. As regards the petitioners' claim that manifest and gross flaws existed in the disputed amendment process, it raises the question as to whether the constitutional amendment in question was faithfully carried out in accordance with the procedural requirements laid down in the Constitution and the Rules of the National Assembly. The answer to that question involves the choice of various standards of constitutional review and will be addressed separately. The other four claims are formed around the inter-provisional conflict or contradiction arising from the newly amended Additional Articles vis-à-vis the provisions of the Constitution and the Additional Articles. They also concern the petitioners' exercise of their powers. It is noted that even the supplementary written statement of the authority concerned dated January 19, 2000, submits that "the Constitutional Court can make interpretations on petitions to resolve the conflicts among, or ambiguities about, constitutional provisions, as long as such provisions are in effect." As the present petitions request this Court to resolve the conflicts or ambiguities caused by the newly amended Additional Articles, the jurisdiction of this Court is beyond question. ...

The Constitution is the supreme law of the land. Constitutional amendment greatly affects the stability of the constitutional order and the welfare of the people and must be therefore faithfully carried out by the designated body in accordance with the principle of due process. [Under the Constitution as it stood] on July 21, 1997, the National Assembly, on behalf of the people, is the sole constitutional organ that has the power to amend the Constitution. ... Accordingly, it is imperative that the National Assembly observe the requirements of due process in the exercise of its power of amendment and fully reflect the will of the people. In the enactment and amendment of the Additional Articles, the process of the National Assembly must be open and transparent Considering that constitutional amendment is the direct embodiment of popular sovereignty, the fact that the National Assembly never used a secret ballot in the previous nine rounds of constitutional amendments, including during the enactment and amendment of the Temporary Provisions and the Additional Articles, speaks to the principle of popular sovereignty. When the Delegates and their political parties are accountable to their constituents through such open and transparent amendment process, the constituents are able to hold them accountable through recall or re-election. Thus, the provision for the secret ballot in Article 38, Paragraph 2 of the Rules of the National Assembly shall not be applied to voting on any constitutional amendment. Not only must the readings for the adoption of a constitutional amendment comply with the Constitution strictly, but their procedures also need to conform to the constitutional order of liberal democracy (see J.Y. Interpretation No. 381).

[The Court then addressed numerous procedural flaws, including the fact that a secret ballot was used at second and third reading.]

Among the ... procedural flaws, the use of a secret ballot is a manifest and gross one. Within the bounds of the Constitution and legislation, the National Assembly may make its rules of procedure ex officio to carry out its powers on such matters as the quorum, the majority threshold, the introduction of bills, and methods of voting. Article 38, Paragraph 2 of the Rules of the National Assembly provides, "The chairperson shall have the prerogative in deciding the method of voting stated in the last paragraph, be it a show of hands, standing, electronic voting, or balloting. The vote shall remain to be cast by open ballot provided that more than one-third of the Delegates present request to do so, notwithstanding the chairperson's ruling on a secret ballot." While this rule is applicable to voting about general matters, adopting a constitutional amendment by secret ballot is in contravention of the above-stated principle of openness and transparency The said Records indicate that a secret ballot had been proposed as the voting method for all the constitutional amendment bills in the second and third readings before the second reading started. Out of the 242 Delegates present, 150 voted in favor of this proposal. In the meantime, a counterproposal was submitted in accordance with Article 38, Paragraph 2 of the Rules of the National Assembly, demanding that all the constitutional amendment bills be voted on by open ballot. Eighty-seven out of the 242 Delegates present, more than one-third of the Delegates present, voted in favor of this counterproposal [Contrary to Article 38, Paragraph 2 of the Rules of the National Assembly, the secret ballot was adopted by a simple majority as the voting method for the constitutional amendment bills. This also deviated from the voting method used for constitutional amendment bills in constitutional practice. The general public was thus left uninformed as to how the Delegates exercised their power of amendment ... In conclusion, the petitioners' claim that the process of amendment in question had manifest and gross flaws is sustained. To this extent, this amendment of the Constitution violates the basic norm that underpins the validity of constitutional amendments.

In response to the argument of the authority concerned for the secret ballot on the basis of free mandate, it is noted that most modern democracies adopt free mandate vis-à-vis imperative mandate, under which political representatives are not merely the delegates of their constituents but are rather elected to represent the entire nation. Although political representatives are privileged from being questioned in any other place about their speeches and the votes they cast in the parliament and are not subject to recall under free mandate, it does not follow that political representatives are completely unconstrained by public opinion or their political parties. More importantly, in contrast to the constitutions of most Western democracies, our Constitution explicitly provides that political representatives at all levels are recallable (see Article 133 of the Constitution and J.Y. Interpretation No. 401). Against such a backdrop, the current system is not purely one of free mandate. Hence, free mandate cannot justify the deviation of the authority concerned from the Rules of the National Assembly to adopt a secret ballot.

... All constitutionally-established organs must adhere to the constitutional order of liberal democracy, as emanating from the said constitutional provisions, on which the current Constitution is founded (see Article 5, Paragraph 5 of the Additional Articles and J.Y. Interpretation No. 381). The power of the National Assembly, being a constitutionally-established organ, is conferred by the Constitution and thus must be governed thereby. ... [I]n the event that a constitutional amendment contravenes the constitutional order of liberal democracy, as emanating from the said foundational principles, it betrays the trust of the people, shakes the foundation of the Constitution, and thus must be checked by other constitutional organs. Such a check on the designated body that makes amendments is part of the self-defense mechanism of the Constitution. Thus, a constitutional amendment that contravenes the foundational principles of the Constitution and therefore causes normative conflict within the constitutional order shall be denied legitimacy.

Can you imagine a constitutional amendment being ruled unconstitutional in Canada? The Canadian experience with judicial pronouncements on constitutional amendments may be described as "pre-ratification amendment review."

Richard Albert, Constitutional Amendments: Making, Breaking, and Changing Constitutions

(Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2019) at 223-26

The Canadian Supreme Court has a long history of advising lawmakers through its reference jurisdiction on how and whether to amend the constitution. In current practice, lawmakers will ask the Court for its opinion on whether an amendment bill or proposal is constitutional. Although the Court has the power to decline to answer, the Court generally agrees to give guidance to lawmakers—and lawmakers typically follow the Court's advice.

In the Patriation Reference, the essence of the question before the Court was whether the federal government was bound by law to secure the consent of none, some, most, or all of the provinces before undertaking a major constitutional reform. The Court ultimately advised by a margin of 7–2 that there was no judicially enforceable law requiring the federal government to secure the agreement of the provinces. The Court also advised, by a margin of 6–3, that the federal government was bound by a legally unenforceable constitutional convention requiring it to secure substantial provincial consent before seeking to amend the constitution on a significant matter affecting federal-provincial relations. The Court's advisory opinion exercised what seems to have been binding political effect on lawmakers despite its formally advisory legal function.

In the high stakes involved in constitutional renewal at the time—especially with the continuing risk of Quebec's secession—we might have expected the force of political will to overrun a mere advisory opinion. Then prime minister Pierre Trudeau had threatened to go over the heads of the provinces directly to the people in a national referendum that would have legitimated the new constitution as the people's own. Yet the Court's Solomonic answer to the question whether the federal government was required to secure the consent of the provinces for this major reform compelled the federal government to drop its plan to proceed unilaterally without provincial consultation and consent, and instead to proceed multilaterally in conformity with the Court's declaration that "a substantial measure of provincial consent is required."

The federal government's initial preference for a referendal route to Patriation echoed the core of its proposal for an amendment formula. Trudeau had proposed in his "People's Package" that the constitution would be amendable in one of two ways: according to the Victoria Formula or by referendum in the face of provincial stalemate on a proposed amendment. But ultimately the chosen path followed the Court's advice in the Patriation Reference. Bruce Ackerman and Robert Charney are right that Trudeau missed an opportunity when he relented in the face of the Court's advisory opinion. Trudeau could have—and in their view should have—called a national referendum on the new constitution, both to break the stalemate among premiers and to give Canada its democratic moment—a moment that Canada, decades later, has yet to live.

The prime minister's choice at the time to take the non-referendal path to Patriation and instead to accept the Court's advice had three important consequences for making and remaking the constitution in Canada. First, it set an important precedent that the Court would be consulted on major questions concerning constitutional reform. Second, the political choice to consult the Court using the reference procedure and to abide by the Court's ruling entailed the collateral consequence that the Court's advice on constitutional reform would [be] followed in all but the most extraordinary circumstances. And, third, the prime minister's choice to accept the Court's advice bolstered the legitimacy of Court as an institution properly involved in overseeing the process of constitutional amendment in Canada. When Trudeau ceded his ground, the Court grew in status and importance, both real and perceived. No major national constitutional change to Canada's Constitution involving the federal and provincial government could henceforth be made without the Court weighing in on how the change could be made if indeed it could be made at all.

In 1998, sixteen years after Patriation, lawmakers returned to the Court in another case of constitutional change in Canada. In the Secession Reference, lawmakers asked the Court for its advice on whether and how Quebec could leave Confederation. The Court constructed a legal-political framework within which lawmakers could negotiate the terms of a province's exit from Canada. With notable exceptions, lawmakers on both sides of the secession debate have found victory in the Court's judgment—evidence that lawmakers recognize, if not accept, the Court's role in giving advice on a fundamental matter of political self-understanding and constitutional change.

Another sixteen years later, in 2014, lawmakers again turned to the Court to resolve two disputes on the meaning and scope of the amendment rules in the constitution. Both the Senate Reform Reference and the Supreme Court Act Reference confirmed that lawmakers will go to the Court for answers on whether, how, and by whom the constitution may be amended—even where that amendment affects the Court’s own powers. Both of the 2014 references locate enormous interpretive authority within the Court on future constitutional amendment in Canada. ... The lesson from these 2014 references is that political actors cannot today make an amendment that affects either of these open-textured concepts without the approval of the Supreme Court of Canada.

We can understand what the Court did in each of these periods of constitutional change since and including Patriation as directing political decision-making on both procedural and substantive grounds in a pre-ratification review of constitutional change. The Court’s advisory opinion in the Patriation Reference was a pre-ratification procedural review on the process lawmakers could lawfully and legitimately use to patriate the constitution. The Court also engaged in a form of pre-ratification substantive review because the procedure the Court suggested lawmakers should follow was dictated by the content of the constitutional changes lawmakers wished to make. Had the constitutional changes not involved federal-provincial relations as they did, the Court would not have given the same instructions on how lawmakers should proceed. The Court’s pre-ratification review of the Patriation package was therefore both substantive and procedural.

The same is true of the Secession Reference, the Senate Reform Reference, and the Supreme Court Act Reference. In each of these, the Court was asked for advice on how lawmakers could make major changes to the constitution before the changes had been promulgated. How a province can secede from the country, how to reform the Senate, and how to change the structure of the Court—these constitutional questions were the heart of the matter in each of these three references, and for each question the Court laid out the process the constitution requires lawmakers to follow.

Pre-ratification review of constitutional amendment gives the Supreme Court of Canada considerable power. It allows the Court to achieve the same result that foreign courts achieve when they invalidate a duly-passed constitutional amendment. Yet the Canadian Court avoids having to nullify the expressed will of the people and their elected representatives. This makes it less likely that the Court will fear the consequences of defying popular will and more likely that the Court will feel liberated to review the amendment question on the merits without worrying about the fallout from undoing an amendment that has already been promulgated with the support of the people. Pre-ratification review in Canada relieves the Court of the pressure it might otherwise feel to approve a popularly supported amendment—one that has survived the veto gates in the amendment process and by the fact of its survival enjoys a considerable measure of legal and sociological legitimacy. Put another way, pre-ratification review frees the Court to do what other courts do when they invalidate an amendment, but without confronting the strongest version of the counter-majoritarian critique that faces any court daring to invalidate a promulgated constitutional amendment.

Conceivably, a constitutional amendment could one day be proclaimed that would only later be challenged in court. If it were, how would Canadian courts respond? Could the Canadian Supreme Court follow the path of the Indian Supreme Court and adopt an equivalent to the basic structure doctrine? For discussion and comparison, see Vivek Krishnamurthy, "Colonial Cousins: Explaining India and Canada's Unwritten Constitutional Principles" (2009) 34 Yale J Int'l L 207.

We know that superior and appellate courts in Canada have weighed in on the constitutional validity of a constitutional amendment: see Hogan v Newfoundland (AG), 2000 NFCA 12, leave to appeal to SCC refused, [2000] SCCA No 191 (QL); Potter c Québec (Procureur général du), 2001 CanLII 20663, [\[2001\] RJQ 2823 \(CA\)](#), leave to appeal to SCC refused, [2002] CSCR No 13 (QL). But the Supreme Court of Canada has not yet faced this question. Scholars have nonetheless explored the possibility of an unconstitutional amendment in Canada: see Richard Albert, "The Theory and Doctrine of Unconstitutional Constitutional Amendment in Canada" (2015) 41 Queen's LJ 153.

The judicial power to invalidate a constitutional amendment raises a similar problem of legitimacy as that raised by the institution of judicial review: see the discussion in Chapter 2, Judicial Review and Constitutional Interpretation. The problem is magnified in the case of constitutional amendment. In Section I of this chapter, it was suggested that the power of constitutional amendment is an incident of democracy and a marker of sovereignty. You will recall that the context for this discussion was a question concerning who should possess the power to amend the Constitution of Canada—the Parliament of the United Kingdom, or Canada itself. Today Canada possesses the power of constitutional amendment, settling the question whether Canada is a sovereign state. But on the horizon may await another question concerning sovereignty. Which institution or institutions possess the power of constitutional amendment as a final matter in Canada—the institutions authorized by part V of the Constitution Act, 1982 to amend the Constitution, or the Supreme Court, which could one day be presented with an occasion to declare a constitutional amendment unconstitutional? Only if that day ever comes will we know with certainty where in Canada the ultimate power of constitutional amendment resides.
