At the second stage of the test, Wilson J concluded that "the Tribunal [was] acting sufficiently like a court that it [could] not pass this stage of the test" (at 277). However, at the third stage—examining the institutional setting within which the judicial function was being exercised—she concluded that the Board's exercise of an essentially judicial function was "a necessarily incidental aspect of the broader social policy goal of providing minimum standards of protection for non-unionized employees" (at 282).]

Appeal allowed.

Another important development regarding s 96 occurred in MacMillan Bloedel Ltd v Simpson, [1995] 4 SCR 725, 1995 CanLII 57.

Chief Justice Lamer, writing for the majority, argued that certain "core" powers of the superior courts, including the power to try individuals for contempt of court, could not be transferred to other courts without a formal constitutional amendment. He expanded on the concept of "core powers" as follows:

[15] ... The superior courts have a core or inherent jurisdiction which ... cannot be removed ... by either level of government, without amending the Constitution. Without this core jurisdiction,

s. 96 could not be said either to ensure uniformity in the judicial system throughout the country or to protect the independence of the judiciary. Furthermore, the power of superior courts to fully control their own process is, in our system where the superior court of general jurisdiction is central, essential to the maintenance of the rule of law itself.

[37] ... In the constitutional arrangements passed on to us by the British and recognized by the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867, the provincial superior courts are the foundation of the rule of law itself. Governance by rule of law requires a judicial system that can ensure its orders are enforced and its process respected. In Canada, the provincial superior court is the only court of general jurisdiction and as such is the centre of the judicial system. None of our statutory courts has the same core jurisdiction as the superior court and therefore none is as crucial to the rule of law. To remove the power to punish contempt ex facie by youths would maim the institution which is at the heart of our judicial system. Destroying part of the core jurisdiction would be tantamount to abolishing the superior courts of general jurisdiction, which is impermissible without constitutional amendment.

[41] In light of its importance to the very existence of a superior court, no aspect of the contempt power may be removed from a superior court without infringing all those sections of our Constitution which refer to our existing judicial system as inherited from the British, including ss. 96-101, s. 129, and the principle of the rule of law recognized both in the preamble and in all our conventions of governance.

As a result, the s. 96 test now reflects the following approach, summarized in the majority opinion in the Reference re Code of Civil Procedure (Que), art 35, 2021 SCC 27 (discussed in further detail in the next note):

[64] Until MacMillan Bloedel, this Court's decisions protected the superior courts' role by limiting grants of their historical jurisdiction. In MacMillan Bloedel, the Court applied the three-step Residential Tenancies test to an exclusive grant to youth courts of the power to punish young persons for ex facie contempt of court—a power that was traditionally exercised by superior courts. The application of that test was seen as deficient because it did not prevent the removal of this significant power from the superior courts. This Court thought it was necessary to interpret the nucleus of the superior courts as also protecting their core jurisdiction (Sobeys, at p. 264). Otherwise, there was a risk that gaps in the Residential Tenancies test would undermine the role of superior courts either by allowing the creation of parallel courts with certain powers essential to the superior courts' role or by allowing the defining features of superior courts to be removed.

[65] To preserve the essence of the superior courts, this Court therefore added a second test to the analysis of constitutionality under s. 96. It held that when the core jurisdiction of superior courts is affected, courts must ask whether the legislation has the effect of removing any of the attributes of the superior courts' core jurisdiction (MacMillan Bloedel, at paras. 18 and 27). Core jurisdiction includes "critically important jurisdictions which are essential to the existence of a superior court of inherent jurisdiction and to the preservation of its foundational role within our legal system" (Reference re Residential Tenancies Act (N.S.), at para. 56, per Lamer C.J., concurring). These defining features enable a superior court "to fulfil itself as a court of law" (MacMillan Bloedel, at paras. 30, 35 and 38 (emphasis deleted), quoting I. H. Jacob, "The Inherent Jurisdiction of the Court" (1970), 23 Current Legal Problems 23, at p. 27). Their "inherent" nature is attributable to the fact that they are derived not from legislation, but "from the very nature of the court as a superior court of law" (para. 30, quoting Jacob, at p. 27). If such an attribute is removed, the measure is unconstitutional.

It can be challenging to determine precisely what is meant by "core jurisdiction." The Reference Re Civil Code contains a number of descriptions that are not entirely identical. A particularly concise statement from the majority opinion (at para 68) is:

[C]ore jurisdiction includes the inherent jurisdiction and inherent powers of a superior court recognized in MacMillan Bloedel: namely, review of the legality and constitutional validity of laws, enforcement of its orders, control over its own process, and its residual jurisdiction as a court of original general jurisdiction.

The majority describes the purpose of core jurisdiction as enabling "superior courts to ensure the maintenance of the rule of law in our legal system" (para 51). Core jurisdiction is clearly linked to the doctrine of separation of powers.

We can now consider this advisory opinion in more detail.

NOTE: REFERENCE RE CODE OF CIVIL PROCEDURE (QUE), ART 35

Reference re Code of Civil Procedure (Que), art 35

[In 2021, the Supreme Court of Canada advised that a provision granting the Court of Québec exclusive jurisdiction to hear civil cases was unconstitutional. The matter began as an application for declaratory judgment filed by the Chief Justices of the Superior Court of Quebec against art 35 of the Code of Civil Procedure [CCP]. Art 35 granted the Court of Quebec exclusive jurisdiction to hear civil cases involving monies lower than $85,000. As well, several statutes granted the Court of Quebec the power to review the decisions of certain administrative bodies which, by virtue of case law, entitled the Court's decisions to be treated with judicial deference in any subsequent appeals.]

The Government of Québec took over the litigation by initiating a reference to the Court of Appeal. That Court concluded that the exclusive jurisdiction over certain civil claims, but not the obligation of deference, was inconsistent with s 96.

In a 4–3 opinion, the Supreme Court of Canada dismissed the appeals on both questions.

Writing for the majority, Coté and Martin JJ stated that s 96 has always prohibited the creation of "parallel courts":]

[31] This Court's jurisprudence on s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 upholds the two fundamental principles underlying this provision, namely national unity and the rule of law. The case law has sought to safeguard the compromise reached at Confederation by preserving the unitary nature of our judicial system. To achieve this objective, the Court has, over the years, developed various tests designed to protect the status of the superior courts. The creation of courts that mirror the superior courts has always been considered an important limit that cannot be overstepped. All the tests have had the purpose, among others, of precluding such an outcome. If the role of the superior courts were undermined by the creation of parallel courts, Canada's judicial system would be stripped of its unitary nature and could be transformed into a dualistic system like that of the United States.

[The majority outlined six (non-exhaustive) factors they thought especially relevant to determining the existence of a prohibited parallel court (para 88):

the scope of the jurisdiction being granted, whether the grant is exclusive or concurrent, the monetary limits to which it is subject, whether there are mechanisms for appealing decisions rendered in the exercise of the jurisdiction, the impact on the caseload of the superior court of general jurisdiction, and whether there is an important societal objective.

They went on to consider those six factors in turn:]

[98] [scope of the jurisdiction] Whether a grant of jurisdiction is vast or limited is a question of degree. For example, jurisdiction over civil disputes is more vast than jurisdiction over contract law, which is in turn more vast than jurisdiction over employment contracts, which is more vast than jurisdiction over individual contracts of employment, which, finally, is more vast than jurisdiction over unjust dismissals. The more vast the granted jurisdiction is, the more likely it is that the provincial court will resemble a superior court of general jurisdiction. In contrast, a limited or specific grant will be less likely to make the provincial court resemble a superior court of general jurisdiction.

[99] In the case at bar, art. 35 para. 1 C.C.P. grants to the Court of Québec almost the entirety of the law of obligations for claims of less than $85,000. This is not just any area of jurisdiction. The law of obligations, the real heart of private law, is the foundation of a multitude of specialized subfields. In fact, it is difficult to imagine a more central field

[102] [exclusive or concurrent jurisdiction] In the instant case, civil suits concerning contractual and extracontractual matters for less than $85,000 have been removed from the Superior Court's jurisdiction. ... [T]his accounts for more than 20,000 cases a year. ... This removal of jurisdiction undermines the Superior Court's role as the cornerstone of a unitary system of justice. ...

[In considering the third factor, the monetary limit, the majority noted that the Court of Appeal had taken as a starting point the original limit, in 1867, of $100 for inferior courts. The majority thought that comparing the historical and current monetary limits "produces a quantitative benchmark that can be used to contrast the historical role of inferior courts with the role played by a court with provincially appointed judges today" (at para 107). While cautioning against a purely mathematical calculation, the majority stated a preference for a "reasonable connection" (at para 110) between the two. The majority then adopted a comparative approach based on nominal GDP which led them to state:]

[118] ... [A] ceiling of $100 in 1867 is equivalent today, Canada-wide, to an amount somewhere between $63,698 and $66,008. The current ceiling of $85,000 is 29 percent more than the higher of these two amounts. This certainly suggests that the Court of Québec's role is greater than the historical role of the inferior courts, but this expanded role is not in itself entirely disproportionate given the gap between the current and historical ceilings and the methodological challenge of accurately converting historical monetary data. The monetary ceiling must be considered in its context in order to determine whether it undermines the role of the Quebec Superior Court by impermissibly infringing on its general private law jurisdiction. The figures must not obscure what is at issue here: the limits on the exclusive grant of a large block of jurisdiction that has an impact on the whole of Quebec civil law. When the transfer of a large block of jurisdiction affects one of the most fundamental branches of private law, the scope of the limits to which it is subject must be considerable.

[The fourth factor, appeal mechanisms, created an imbalance between Quebec (which permits direct appeals to the Court of Appeal) and most of the other provinces (which require appeals to proceed first to a superior court). In the majority's view, that contributed to the sense that art 35 "transforms the Court of Québec into a prohibited parallel court that undermines the role of the superior court of general jurisdiction" (at para 123). The majority drew no conclusions about the fifth factor—the impact on the superior court's caseload. With respect to the sixth factor—pursuit of an important societal objective—the majority acknowledged Quebec's desire to increase access to justice. The majority was skeptical that ceding jurisdiction to inferior courts would improve access to justice more than other methods, such as giving superior courts "sufficient resources" (at para 126). They found that the evidence did not clearly demonstrate that the impugned law facilitates access to justice, and concluded:]

[141] In our opinion, art. 35 para. 1 C.C.P. in its current form infringes s. 96. Its constitutional infirmity does not arise from the high monetary limit alone, but from the combination with all the other factors. It would be possible to imagine a grant of jurisdiction that does not exclude the superior court from a field of law that is so vast and so fundamental. That is not, however, this legislation. Here, there is an exclusive grant of a vast area of jurisdiction at the core of Quebec's private law to a court with provincially appointed judges that operates like a superior court in every respect. The grant, if it is subject to no limits other than a monetary one, transforms the Court of Québec into a s. 96 court. In other words, art. 35 para. 1 C.C.P. encroaches impermissibly on the role the Constitution reserves to the superior court of general jurisdiction.

[The majority's analysis of the second question relating to judicial deference is omitted. In short, the majority decided that the question had become moot due to other developments in administrative law (at para 149).]

Chief Justice Wagner (Rowe J concurring) disagreed with the majority's conclusion regarding art 35. They characterized art 35 as conferring civil jurisdiction over contractual and extracontractual obligations that had never been vested exclusively in s 96 courts. They emphasized that ss 96 and 92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867 reflect an important Confederation compromise over the administration of justice—one that would be undermined by giving to s 96 courts an overly broad scope that would limit the provinces' ability to address complex and emerging legislative challenges in that area.

Writing separately, Abella J also concluded that art 35 was constitutional.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. You will have encountered the notion of "progressive" or "living tree" constitutionalism—an approach to interpreting the constitution so as not to render it frozen in time—in Edwards v Canada (AG), 1929 CanLII 438, [\[1929\] UKPC 86](#) [The Persons Case]. In the modern era, the approach appears in Charter cases, though it has also extended to other areas. Does the general approach to s 96 discussed thus far seem consistent or inconsistent with the idea that the constitution should not remain frozen? If you find it inconsistent, might there nevertheless be good reasons for that?

2. The majority's analysis is extremely technical. For example, it delves into units of economic measurement and comparison and tries to determine how many thousands of dollars "margin" there is to superior court jurisdiction. Is this kind of analysis useful? Inevitable? Is the Court properly equipped to engage in it in a systematic and predictable fashion?

B. SECTION 96 CONSTRAINTS ON PARLIAMENT

While the Supreme Court's initial s 96 jurisprudence dealt with provincial laws, those principles have since expanded to include Parliament itself. Essentially, the Court has affirmed the idea that the superior courts' core jurisdiction is beyond the reach of all legislative action and, indeed, is a product of the separation of powers.

Typical cases involve parliamentary attempts to assign criminal law jurisdiction under s 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867. In the McEvoy, Reference re Young Offenders Act (PEI), and MacMillan Bloedel cases, Parliament had transferred traditional superior court jurisdiction over criminal trials to a provincial inferior court. The idea was to create a "unified criminal court" that would combine the criminal jurisdiction of the inferior and superior courts. Such a court, its supporters argued, would jettison the hierarchical system of inferior and criminal courts, provide a more general approach to the independence of the judiciary, streamline the complexity of the judiciary set at Confederation, and rationalize criminal procedure.

McEvoy v Attorney General of New Brunswick and Attorney General of Canada

THE COURT (Laskin CJ and Ritchie, Dickson, Beetz, Estey, Chouinard, and Wilson JJ):

The questions ... [relate to the proposal to establish] a unified criminal court in New Brunswick.

[The questions were:

1. Is it constitutionally permissible for Parliament to confer exclusive jurisdiction on a provincial inferior court to try all indictable offences under the Criminal Code?
2. Is it constitutionally permissible for Parliament to confer jurisdiction on a provincial inferior court to try all indictable offences under the Criminal Code if that jurisdiction is concurrently held by the provincial superior courts?
3. Is it constitutionally permissible for a provincial legislature to create an inferior court to exercise jurisdiction from Parliament to try all indictable offences under the Criminal Code if that jurisdiction is exclusive? If that jurisdiction is concurrent with that exercised by the provincial superior courts?]

... The New Brunswick Court of Appeal answered all three questions in the affirmative.

In general terms the issue is whether s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 is a bar to a plan whereby the federal government and a provincial government would [...] transfer the criminal jurisdiction of Provincial Superior Courts to a new court to be called the "unified criminal court" the judges of which would be provincially appointed.

There is no doubt that jurisdiction to try indictable offences was part of the Superior Court's jurisdiction in 1867; ... Nor does anyone argue that inferior courts had concurrent jurisdiction to try indictable offences in 1867. ... [N]one of the other considerations which might save the scheme from the force of s. 96 apply here. The proposed court is obviously a judicial body; its judicial aspect does not change colour when considered in the factual setting in which the court will operate; nor will the court exercise administrative powers to which its adjudicative functions are incidental. The proposed body is clearly and only a criminal court.

... It has long been the rule that s. 96, although in terms an appointing power, must be addressed in functional terms lest its application be eroded. ... [A]s we view the matter, the result is to defeat the new statutory Court because it will effectively be a s. 96 Court.

Sections 96, 97, 98, 99 and 100 are couched in mandatory terms. They do not rest merely on federal statutory powers as does s. 91(27). ...

What is being contemplated here is not one or a few transfers of criminal law power, ... but a complete obliteration of Superior Court criminal law jurisdiction. Sections 96 to 100 do not distinguish between courts of civil jurisdiction and courts of criminal jurisdiction. They should not be read as permitting the Parliament of Canada through use of its criminal law power to destroy Superior Courts

Parliament can no more give away federal constitutional powers than a province can usurp them. ... Section 96 bars Parliament from altering the constitutional scheme envisaged by the judicature sections of the Constitution Act, 1867 just as it does the provinces from doing so.

The traditional independence of English Superior Court judges has been raised to the level of a fundamental principle of our federal system by the Constitution Act, 1867

Nor is much gained for the proposed new provincial statutory court by providing for concurrent Superior Court jurisdiction. The theory behind the concurrency proposal is presumably that a Provincial court with concurrent rather than exclusive powers would not oust the Superior Courts' jurisdiction, at least not to the same extent; since the Superior Courts' jurisdiction was not frozen as of 1867, it would be permissible to alter that jurisdiction so long as the essential core of the Superior Courts' jurisdiction remained; s. 96 would be no obstacle because the Superior Court would retain jurisdiction to try indictable offences. With respect, we think this overlooks the fact that what is being attempted here is the transformation by conjunct action of an inferior court into a superior court. Section 96 is, in our view, an insuperable obstacle to any such endeavour.

We would, therefore, allow the appeal and answer all three questions in the negative

Appeal allowed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. McEvoy left several questions unanswered. First, does s 96 prevent Parliament from transferring judicial functions from provincial superior courts to s 101 federal courts (also considered in many respects to be superior courts)? Second, is it only "wholesale" transfers of superior court powers to inferior courts and tribunals that are beyond Parliament's competence? Are "piecemeal," or modest, transfers permissible? (For discussion, see Robin Elliot, "Case Comment, New Brunswick Unified Criminal Court Reference" (1984) 18 UBC L Rev 127.)

2. The issue of transferring criminal jurisdiction has arisen, notably, with respect to young offenders. Criminal defendants under the age of 18 are subject to a special legislative regime: the Youth Criminal Justice Act, SC 2002, c 1 (known for many years as the Young Offenders Act). The law sets out distinct legal proceedings and greatly reduced punishment (note, however, that everyone is subject to the same criminal law—the definitions of offences set out in the Criminal Code remain constant regardless of an offender's age).

The practice of transferring such jurisdiction was challenged in Reference re Young Offenders Act (PEI), [1991] 1 SCR 252, 1991 CanLII 11713. Under s 2 of the Act, Prince Edward Island designated its provincial inferior court as the Youth Court for the purpose of all cases involving a young person as defined by the Act. This transfer was held to be valid. McEvoy was distinguished on the basis of the novelty of a jurisdiction over offences allegedly committed by young persons—a jurisdiction that, in those terms, did not exist at Confederation.

A second case dealing with young offenders is MacMillan Bloedel Ltd v Simpson, [1995] 4 SCR 725, 1995 CanLII 57. We discussed the case, above, for its important modification to the overall test for s 96. Here, we look briefly at the precise law in issue. A young offender who disobeyed an injunction was tried and convicted in superior court of criminal contempt. On appeal, he argued that because the contempt did not occur in the face of a superior court, he should have been tried in a youth court. The dispute was whether Parliament could make a grant of exclusive jurisdiction to such a court in the case of an offence (contempt of court) traditionally within the jurisdiction of a superior court.

Emphasizing that there are certain core powers of the superior courts that cannot be constitutionally transferred to other courts, Lamer CJ decided that proceedings for contempt of court is one of them. In dissent, McLachlin J rejected the idea of a fixed set of immutable, non-transferrable superior court functions. She based her reasoning on the idea that "a strict separation of judicial and legislative powers is not a feature of the Canadian Constitution" (at para 52). Note that the idea of the separation of powers to which McLachlin J referred is no longer persuasive.

In Cooper v Canada (Human Rights Commission); Bell v Canada (Human Rights Commission), [1996] 3 SCR 854, 1996 CanLII 152, Lamer CJ, concurring in the result but writing his own reasons, stated:

[10] One of the defining features of the Canadian Constitution, in my opinion, is the separation of powers [among the three branches of government—the legislature, the executive, and the judiciary]. ...

[11] ... [T]he absence of a strict separation of powers does not mean that the Canadian Constitution does not recognize and sustain some notion of the separation of powers. This is most evident in the Court's jurisprudence on s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Although the wording of this provision suggests that it is solely concerned with the appointment of judges, through judicial interpretation—an important element of which has been the recognition that s. 96 must be read along with ss. 97-100 as part of an integrated whole—s. 96 has come to guarantee the core jurisdiction of the superior courts against legislative encroachment. As I recently noted in MacMillan Bloedel v. Simpson, [1995] 4 S.C.R. 725, at 753:

Governance by rule of law requires a judicial system that can ensure its orders are enforced and its process respected. [Emphasis added.]

As this passage makes clear, the existence of the courts is definitional to the notion of constitutionalism in Canada.

C. SECTION 96 AND THE ENTITLEMENT TO REVIEW AND APPEAL

In addition to limits on certain bodies' ability to adjudicate trial-level or "first instance" disputes, s 96 imposes constraints on those bodies' appellate and review functions, as well as their capacity to render "final" decisions. The constraints reflect the traditional role of the superior courts to review the decisions of administrative tribunals and inferior courts.

The Supreme Court set down the basic structure of those constraints in Crevier v AG (Québec), excerpted below. Within an administrative regime, legislatures may create a two-stage structure of proceedings—that is, a first instance process and an appeal process—so long as two considerations are satisfied. First, the arrangement must be integrated into the general policy initiative. Second, there must be no bar to judicial review exercised by the provincial superior courts. That second stipulation rests on the idea that the superior courts' ability to review the decisions of statutory tribunals and inferior courts is part of their core jurisdiction. For federal tribunals, such review takes place within the Federal Court system.

[The Professional Code, RSQ 1977, c C-26, [the Code] of Quebec governed 38 professional corporations, each of which was required to create a discipline committee with jurisdiction over every complaint brought under the Code. The Professions Tribunal, made up of six provincial court judges designated by the chief judge, received appeals from any decision of a discipline committee. It was empowered to confirm, alter, or quash any decision it reviewed.

The Code barred the Superior Court from reviewing those decisions.]

LASKIN CJ (Martland, Ritchie, Dickson, Beetz, Estey, McIntyre, Chouinard, and Lamer JJ concurring):

The Court of Appeal majority viewed the preclusive words of s. 194 [which shielded the decision of the Professions Tribunal from judicial review] as not touching the power and right of the Superior Court to issue a writ of evocation where there has been [an] excess of jurisdiction. Section 194 itself, however, does not recognize this supervisory authority of the Superior Court. ... Even if it were otherwise and the supervisory authority of the Superior Court on questions of jurisdiction was expressly preserved, it would still not be a complete answer to [a s 96 claim].

Three issues arise from the reasons in the Court of Appeal. The first, which I think may be quickly disposed of ... [is that] the Professions Tribunal is given no function other than that of a general tribunal of appeal The Professions Tribunal is not so much integrated into any scheme as it is sitting on top of [it]

The second issue ... concerns the effect upon s. 96 of a privative clause of a statute which purports to insulate a provincial adjudicative tribunal from any review of its decisions. Is it enough to deflect s. 96 if the privative clause is construed to preserve superior court supervision over questions of jurisdiction[?] In my opinion, where a provincial Legislature purports to insulate one of its statutory tribunals from any curial review of its adjudicative functions ... such provincial legislation must be struck down as unconstitutional

It is true that this is the first time that this Court has declared unequivocally that a provincially-constituted statutory tribunal cannot constitutionally be immunized from review of decisions on questions of jurisdiction. ... I can think of nothing that is more the hallmark of a superior court than the vesting of power in a provincial statutory tribunal to determine the limits of its jurisdiction without appeal or other review.

... Where ... questions of law have been specifically covered in a privative enactment, this Court ... has not hesitated to recognize this limitation on judicial review as serving the interests of an express legislative policy The same considerations do not, however, apply to issues of jurisdiction which are not far removed from issues of constitutionality. It cannot be left to a provincial statutory tribunal, in the face of s. 96, to determine the limits of its own jurisdiction without appeal or review.

[The third issue considered by Lamer CJ related to an earlier case, Attorney General (Que) v Farrah, [1978] 2 SCR 638, 1978 CanLII 195, where the Court unanimously declared a similar, albeit more narrow, administrative structure unconstitutional. Chief Justice Lamer found that in both cases "there was a purported exclusion of the reviewing authority of any other court, whether by appeal or by evocation" (at 239).]

In the result, I would allow the appeal. ...

Appeal dismissed.

D. SECTION 96 AND ACCESS TO JUSTICE

The Supreme Court has applied s 96 to constrain provincial legislation that impedes access to the superior courts for litigating disputes. In the case that follows, the court struck down fees meant to recoup some of the costs of the court system. The invocation of the rule of law, in this case, is mirrored in Section IV, below, which focuses on judicial independence.

Trial Lawyers Association of British Columbia v British Columbia (AG)

McLACHLIN CJ (LeBel, Abella, Moldaver, and Karakatsanis JJ concurring):

[1] The issue in this case is whether court hearing fees imposed by the Province of British Columbia that deny some people access to the courts are constitutional. ...

[4] Ms. Vilardell [initiated a proceeding for custody of a child and an interest in the marital home against her common-law spouse.] ... [T]o get a trial date, she had to undertake in advance to pay a court hearing fee. At the outset of the trial, Ms. Vilardell asked the judge to relieve her from paying the hearing fee. The judge reserved his decision on this request until the end of the trial, so he could address the question of ability to pay after hearing evidence respecting the parties' means, circumstances, and entitlement to property.

[5] The parties were not represented by lawyers, and the hearing took 10 days. The hearing fee amounted to some $3,600—almost the net monthly income of the family Ms. Vilardell is not an "impoverished" person She was unemployed in the year leading up to the trial; the "family" income appears to have come mainly from her partner. ... [A]fter legal fees had depleted her savings, she could not afford the hearing fee.

[The Court noted that the Supreme Court Civil Rules, BC Reg 168/2009 permits a judge to exempt someone from paying the fee.]

[21] Hearing fees fall squarely within the "administration of justice" [under s 92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867] and may be used to defray some of the cost of administering the justice system, to encourage the efficient use of court resources, and to discourage frivolous or inappropriate use of the courts.

[24] ... [The province's] ... power to impose hearing fees must be consistent with s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 and the requirements that flow by necessary implication from s. 96

[26] ... [T]he interpretation of s. 92(14) must be consistent not only with other express terms of the Constitution, but with requirements that "flow by necessary implication from those terms": British Columbia v. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., 2005 SCC 49, [2005] 2 S.C.R. 473, at para. 66, per Major J. ...

[29] [Sections 92(14) and 96] ... [t]aken together ... have been held to provide a constitutional basis for a unified judicial presence throughout the country: MacMillan Bloedel Ltd. v. Simpson, [1995] 4 S.C.R. 725, at paras. 11 and 52. ...

[31] ... The question is ... whether legislating hearing fees that prevent people from accessing the courts infringes on the core jurisdiction of the superior courts.

[32] The historic task of the superior courts is to resolve disputes between individuals and decide questions of private and public law. Measures that prevent people from coming to the courts to have those issues resolved are at odds with this basic judicial function. ... [Such measures strike] at the core of the jurisdiction of the superior courts protected by s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867. ...

[37] ... The right of Canadians to access the superior courts flows by necessary implication from the express terms of s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 as we have seen. It follows that the province does not have the power under s. 92(14) to enact legislation that prevents people from accessing the courts [British Columbia v Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., 2005 SCC 49 at para 66].

[38] While this suffices to resolve the fundamental issue of principle in this appeal, the connection between s. 96 and access to justice is further supported by considerations relating to the rule of law. This Court affirmed that access to the courts is essential to the rule of law in B.C.G.E.U. v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 214. As Dickson C.J. put it, "[t]here cannot be a rule of law without access, otherwise the rule of law is replaced by a rule of men and women who decide who shall and who shall not have access to justice" (p. 230). ...

[40] ... If people cannot challenge government actions in court, individuals cannot hold the state to account—the government will be, or be seen to be, above the law. If people cannot bring legitimate issues to court, the creation and maintenance of positive laws will be hampered, as laws will not be given effect. And the balance between the state's power to make and enforce laws and the courts' responsibility to rule on citizen challenges to them may be skewed: Christie v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2005 BCCA 631, 262 D.L.R. (4th) 51, at paras. 68-9, per Newbury J.A.

[46] ... A fee that is so high that it requires litigants who are not impoverished to sacrifice reasonable expenses in order to bring a claim may, absent adequate exemptions, be unconstitutional because it subjects litigants to undue hardship, thereby effectively preventing access to the courts.

[48] ... A hearing fee scheme can include an exemption for the truly impoverished, but the hearing fees must be set at an amount such that anyone who is not impoverished can afford them

[51] The trial judge held that the primary purpose of the hearing fee scheme is to provide an incentive for efficient use of court time and a disincentive for lengthy and inefficient trials (para. 309). The secondary purpose of the scheme is to provide sufficient revenue to offset the costs of providing civil justice To put it in other words, the Province's aim is to establish a revenue-neutral trial service.

[52] The trial judge, affirmed by the Court of Appeal, found that B.C.'s hearing fees go beyond these purposes and limit access to courts [F]or many litigants, bringing a claim would require sacrificing reasonable expenses.

[The majority noted that the fees imposed here amounted to the plaintiff's net monthly income and were imposed on her regardless of whether she contributed to or controlled the length of the proceeding.]

[58] I agree with the view of the trial judge that the plain meaning of the words "impoverished" and "indigent" does not cover people of modest means who are nonetheless prevented from having a trial because of the hearing fees

[60] Other objections to the exemption provision can be raised. Litigants are required to come before the court, explain why they are indigent and beg the court to publicly acknowledge this status and excuse the payment of fees. This is arguably an affront to dignity and imposes a significant burden on the potential litigant of adducing proof of impoverishment—a burden she may be unable or unwilling to assume. ...

[62] Moreover, the plaintiff who is required to pay the hearing fee may not control the length or efficiency of the trial—the defendant may be responsible for prolonging the matter. ...

[63] Most fundamentally, unlike cost awards, the imposition of the hearing fees at issue are not dependent on efficiency or the merit of one's claim. The hearing fees imposed by this scheme escalate to $800 per day after 10 days of trial—the highest price tag in the country—without any relationship to the efficiency of the proceeding. These hearing fees do not promote efficient use of court time; at best they promote less use of court time.

[64] I conclude that the hearing fee scheme prevents access to the courts in a manner inconsistent with s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 and the underlying principle of the rule of law. It therefore falls outside the Province's jurisdiction under s. 92(14) to administer justice.

[68] The proper remedy is to declare the hearing fee scheme as it stands unconstitutional and leave it to the legislature or the Lieutenant Governor in Council to enact new provisions, should they choose to do so.

ROTHSTEIN J (dissenting):

[80] Courts do not have free range to micromanage the policy choices of governments acting within the sphere of their constitutional powers. ...

[82] ... In the absence of a violation of a clear constitutional provision, the judiciary should defer to the policy choices of the government and legislature. ...

[83] ... In a constitutional democracy such as ours, courts must be wary of subverting democracy and its accountability mechanisms beneath an overly expansive vision of constitutionalism.

[87] This is not to deny that universal, free (or at least affordable) access to courts is a laudable goal; it is merely to say that s. 96 and the unwritten principle of the rule of law cannot be used to force provincial governments to expend funds or forego cost recovery to bring this goal to fruition. ...

[90] ... The cases cited by the majority speak of the inability of governments to remove "core or inherent jurisdiction," as doing so "emasculates the court, making it something other than a superior court" The hearing fees are a financing mechanism and do not go to the very existence of the court as a judicial body or limit the types of powers it may exercise. ...

[91] ... It is true that this Court has, on occasion, turned to unwritten principles to fill in "gaps in the express terms of the constitutional text" But there are no such gaps in the text of s. 92(14). ...

[92] There is no express right of general access to superior courts for civil disputes in the text of the Constitution. Rather, the Constitution specifies the particular instances in which access to courts is guaranteed. ...

[93] ... So long as the courts maintain their character as judicial bodies and exercise the core functions of courts, the demands of the Constitution are satisfied. ...

[94] This purported constitutional right to access the courts circumvents the careful checks and balances built into the structure of the Charter. Unlike Charter rights, rights read into s. 96 are absolute. They are not subject to s. 1 justification or the s. 33 notwithstanding clause. These provisions reflect a recognition that, in certain circumstances, governments will be permitted to enact legislation or take action that places limits on Charter rights. ...

[98] ... The majority acknowledges that imposing hearing fees is a permissible exercise of the province's jurisdiction according to the written constitutional text—that is, s. 92(14) (para. 23). But they ultimately conclude that the hearing fees fall outside the province's jurisdiction in part because the fees are inconsistent with the unwritten principle of the rule of law (paras. 38-40). ... [T]he rule of law, an unwritten principle, cannot be used to support striking down the hearing fee scheme.

Appeal allowed and cross-appeal dismissed.

NOTE AND QUESTION

According to Rothstein J, the Charter provides the principal way to safeguard individual rights. In that respect, he noted, its internal limiting mechanisms (like s 1) matter. By contrast, s 96 has no such limiting features. Therefore, the Court should hesitate to use it in cases invoking individual rights. Does he have a point?

IV. THE INDEPENDENCE OF THE JUDICIARY

The Court's rulings on the independence of the judiciary were originally based on interpretation and extrapolation from constitutional text. Later rulings have an expanded scope, applying constitutional principles to interpret text as well as to fill in textual gaps.

This trend in Supreme Court cases reflects developments in the United Kingdom and other constitutional democracies. Below is a list of "generally accepted conditions" for judicial independence:

1. guaranteed tenure with removal from office only for reasons of incapacity or misconduct that renders them unfit for judicial office
2. a merit-based appointment and promotion process
3. fair and secure remuneration protected from external influence
4. adequate systemic funding to enable judges to fulfil their functions
5. protection for jurisdiction including the authority to decide matters of a judicial nature, and to determine whether any particular issue submitted for judicial decision falls within their competence as defined by law.
6. personal immunity against suit for the exercise of judicial functions
7. rules providing for recusal and disqualification in particular cases, as well as rules banning activities incompatible with judicial office
8. protection against improper use of complaints
9. an independent legal profession
10. a general attitude of respect for the law and the legal system within politics.

See Graham Gee, Robert Hazell, Kate Malleson & Patrick O'Brien, The Politics of Judicial Independence in the UK's Changing Constitution (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2015) at 9-10; see also Tokyo Principles of the Independence of the Judiciary in the LAWASIA Region (1982); UN General Assembly, UN Basic Principles on the Independence of the Judiciary (1985); Commonwealth (Latimer House) Principles on the Three Branches of Government (2003); Bangalore Principles of Judicial Independence (The Hague, 2002).

A number of judicial independence cases relate to judges' salaries.

Section 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867 stipulates that salaries and benefits be fixed and provided by Parliament. In The Queen v Beauregard, [1986] 2 SCR 56 at 75, 1986 CanLII 24, the Court found the provision to have the following rationale:

[T]he essence of judicial independence for superior court judges is complete freedom from arbitrary interference by both the executive and the legislature. Neither the executive nor the legislature can interfere with the financial security of superior court judges.

While the Court ruled that under s 100, Parliament can modify judicial benefits such as pensions, it stated (at para 39) that:

If there were any hint that a federal law dealing with these matters was enacted for an improper or colourable purpose, or if there was discriminatory treatment of judges vis-à-vis other citizens, then serious issues relating to judicial independence would arise and the law might well be held to be ultra vires s. 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

In a series of appeals heard together and known as the Ref re Remuneration of Provincial Judges (or the Provincial Judges Reference), the Court considered judicial remuneration in regard to provincially appointed judges. The textual focus was s 11(d) of the Charter, which guarantees the right to a fair trial. A question arose as to whether this guarantee constrained the power of the province to reduce the salary of the judges of provincial courts.

LAMER CJ (L'Heureux-Dubé, Sopinka, Gonthier, Cory, and Iacobucci JJ concurring):

[7] ... Litigation, and especially litigation before this Court ... is a very serious business. In these cases, it is even more serious because litigation has ensued between two primary organs of our constitutional system—the executive and the judiciary

[8] The task of the Court in these appeals is to explain the proper constitutional relationship between provincial court judges and provincial executives, and thereby assist in removing the strain on this relationship. The failure to do so would undermine "the web of institutional relationships ... which continue to form the backbone of our constitutional system" (Cooper v. Canada (Human Rights Commission), [1996] 3 S.C.R. 854, at para. 3).

[9] ... [T]he purpose of the constitutional guarantee of financial security—found in s. 11(d) of the Charter, and also in the preamble to and s. 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867, is not to benefit the members of the courts Financial security must be understood as ... an aspect of judicial independence, which in turn is not an end in itself. Judicial independence is valued because it serves important societal goals—it is a means to secure those goals.

[10] One of these goals is the maintenance of public confidence in the impartiality of the judiciary Another ... is the maintenance of the rule of law, one aspect of which is the constitutional principle that the exercise of all public power must find its ultimate source in a legal rule.

[82] These appeals were all argued on the basis of s. 11(d), the Charter's guarantee of judicial independence and impartiality.

[83] ... Notwithstanding the presence of s. 11(d) of the Charter, and ss. 96-100 of the Constitution Act, 1867, I am of the view that judicial independence is at root an unwritten constitutional principle, in the sense that it is exterior to the particular sections of the Constitution Acts. The existence of that principle, whose origins can be traced to the [British] Act of Settlement of 1701, is recognized and affirmed by the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867. The specific provisions of the Constitution Acts, 1867 to 1982, merely "elaborate that principle in the institutional apparatus which they create or contemplate": Switzman v. Elbling, [1957] S.C.R. 285 at p. 306, per Rand J.

[85] ... [T]here are serious limitations to the view that the express provisions of the Constitution comprise an exhaustive and definitive code for the protection of judicial independence. ... [First,] the range of courts ... protected by the written provisions of the Constitution contains large gaps. ... [Section] 99, on its terms, only protects the security of tenure of superior court judges. Moreover, ss. 96-100 do not apply to provincially appointed inferior courts, otherwise known as provincial courts.

[86] ... [B]y its express terms, s. 11(d) is limited in scope as well—it only extends the envelope of constitutional protection to bodies which exercise jurisdiction over offences.

[87] ... [Second,] some of those provisions, by their terms, do not appear to speak to this objective.

[88] ... Section 96 seems to do no more than confer the power to appoint judges of the superior, district, and county courts. ... However, through a process of judicial interpretation, s. 96 has come to guarantee the core jurisdiction of the courts which come within the scope of that provision. ... The rationale for the provision has also shifted, away from the protection of national unity, to the maintenance of the rule of law through the protection of the judicial role.

[89] ... This jurisprudential evolution undermines ... the argument that the written text of the Constitution is comprehensive and definitive in its protection of judicial independence. The only way to explain the interpretation of ss. 96 and 100, in fact, is by reference to a deeper set of unwritten understandings

[93] ... There are many important reasons for the preference for a written constitution over an unwritten one, not the least of which is the promotion of legal certainty and through it the legitimacy of constitutional judicial review. Given these concerns, which go to the heart of the project of constitutionalism, it is of the utmost importance to articulate what the source of those unwritten norms is.

[94] In my opinion, the existence of many of the unwritten rules of the Canadian Constitution can be explained by reference to the preamble of the Constitution Act, 1867 [text of the preamble omitted]. ... Although the preamble has been cited by this Court on many occasions, its legal effect has never been fully explained. On the one hand, although the preamble is clearly part of the Constitution, it is equally clear that it "has no enacting force" [S]trictly speaking, it is not a source of positive law

[95] But the preamble does have important legal effects In the words of Rand J., the preamble articulates "the political theory which the Act embodies": Switzman, supra, at p. 306. It recognizes and affirms the basic principles which are the very source of the substantive provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867. ... As such, the preamble is not only a key to construing the express provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867, but also invites the use of those organizing principles to fill out gaps in the express terms of the constitutional scheme. It is the means by which the underlying logic of the Act can be given the force of law.

[96] ... The preamble speaks of the desire of the founding provinces "to be federally united into One Dominion," and thus, addresses the structure of the division of powers. Moreover, by its reference to "a Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom," the preamble indicates that the legal and institutional structure of constitutional democracy in Canada should be similar to that of the legal regime out of which the Canadian Constitution emerged. ...

[Chief Justice Lamer set out a number of examples in which the judiciary had extrapolated legal doctrines from unwritten constitutional principles from the preamble—namely, the doctrines of full faith and credit, paramountcy, suspended declarations of invalidity, the constitutional status of the privileges of provincial legislatures, the federal power to regulate political speech, and the implied limits on legislative sovereignty with respect to political speech.]

[104] These examples ... illustrate the special legal effect of the preamble. The preamble identifies the organizing principles of the Constitution Act, 1867, and invites the courts to turn those principles into the premises of a constitutional argument that culminates in the filling of gaps in the express terms of the constitutional text.

[105] The same approach applies to the protection of judicial independence. ...

[106] The historical origins of the protection of judicial independence in the United Kingdom, and thus in the Canadian Constitution, can be traced to the Act of

Settlement of 1701. ... [T]hat Act was the "historical inspiration" for the judicature provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867. ... In the same way that our understanding of rights and freedoms has grown, such that they have now been expressly entrenched through the enactment of the Constitution Act, 1982, so too has judicial independence grown into a principle that now extends to all courts, not just the superior courts of this country.

[107] ... [T]he express provisions of the Constitution should be understood as elaborations of the underlying, unwritten, and organizing principles found in the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867. ...

[108] ... As this Court has said before, there are three branches of government—the legislature, the executive, and the judiciary [Courts,] in other words, are equally "definitional to the Canadian understanding of constitutionalism" ... as are political institutions. It follows that the same constitutional imperative—the preservation of the basic structure ... extends protection to the judicial institutions of our constitutional system.

[111] [In Valente v The Queen, [1985] 2 SCR 673, 1985 CanLII 25 (Valente No 2)] ... this Court laid down the interpretive framework for s. 11(d)'s guarantee of judicial independence and impartiality. Le Dain J., speaking for the Court, began by drawing a distinction between impartiality and independence. ... Impartiality was defined as "a state of mind or attitude of the tribunal in relation to the issues and the parties in a particular case" (Valente [(No. 2)], supra, at p. 685 (emphasis added)). ... Independence, by contrast, focussed on the status of the court or tribunal. ...

[112] Le Dain J. went on in Valente [(No 2)] to state that independence was premised on the existence of a set of "objective conditions or guarantees" (p. 685), whose absence would lead to a finding that a tribunal or court was not independent. ... However, he [supplemented] the requirement for objective conditions with what could be interpreted as a further requirement: that the court or tribunal be reasonably perceived as independent. The reason for this additional requirement was that the guarantee of judicial independence has the goal not only of ensuring that justice is done in individual cases, but also of ensuring public confidence in the justice system. ... [T]he objective guarantees must be viewed as those guarantees that are necessary to ensure a reasonable perception of independence

[113] ... [As stated] by Howland C.J.O. in ... R. v. Valente (No. 2) (1983), 2 C.C.C. (3d) 417 (Ont. C.A.), at pp. 439-40:

The question that now has to be determined is whether a reasonable person, who was informed of the relevant statutory provisions, their historical background and the traditions surrounding them, after viewing the matter realistically and practically would conclude [that the tribunal or court was independent].

[115] The three core characteristics identified by Le Dain J. are security of tenure, financial security, and administrative independence. Valente laid down (at p. 697) two requirements for security of tenure for provincial court judges: those judges could only be removed for cause "related to the capacity to perform judicial functions," and after a "judicial inquiry at which the judge affected is given a full opportunity to be heard." Unlike the judicature provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867, which govern the removal of superior court judges, s. 11(d) of the Charter does not require an address by the legislature in order to dismiss a provincial court judge.

[116] Financial security was defined in these terms (at p. 706):

The essential point ... is that the right to salary of a provincial court judge is established by law, and there is no way in which the executive could interfere with that right in a manner to affect the independence of the individual judge. [Emphasis added.]

[117] Finally, the Court defined the administrative independence of the provincial court, as control by the courts "over the administrative decisions that bear directly and immediately on the exercise of the judicial function" (p. 712).

[118] The three core characteristics of judicial independence—security of tenure, financial security, and administrative independence—should be contrasted with what I have termed the two dimensions of judicial independence ... the individual independence of a judge and the institutional or collective independence of the court or tribunal of which that judge is a member. ... The two different dimensions of judicial independence are related in the following way (Valente [(No 2)], supra, at p. 687):

The relationship between these two aspects of judicial independence is that an individual judge may enjoy the essential conditions of judicial independence but if the court or tribunal over which he or she presides is not independent of the other branches of government, in what is essential to its function, he or she cannot be said to be an independent tribunal.

[123] ... Individual independence was referred to as the "historical core" of judicial independence, and was defined as "the complete liberty of individual judges to hear and decide the cases that come before them" (p. 69). It is necessary for the fair and just adjudication of individual disputes. By contrast, the institutional independence of the judiciary was said to arise out of the position of the courts as organs of and protectors "of the Constitution and the fundamental values embodied in it—rule of law, fundamental justice, equality, preservation of the democratic process

[124] ... The institutional independence of the courts emerges from the logic of federalism, which requires an impartial arbiter to settle jurisdictional disputes Institutional independence also inheres in [Charter rights] adjudication ... against the state. ... Taken together, it is clear that the institutional independence of the judiciary is "definitional to the Canadian understanding of constitutionalism" (Cooper, supra, at para. 11).

[125] ... [T]he institutional independence of the judiciary reflects a deeper commitment to the separation of powers between and amongst the legislative, executive, and judicial organs of government: see Cooper, supra, at para. 13.

[126] ... I am well aware that provincial courts are creatures of statute However, there is no doubt that these statutory courts play a critical role in enforcing the provisions and protecting the values of the Constitution. ... [I]t is clear therefore that provincial courts must be granted some institutional independence.

[Chief Justice Lamer cited a number of features of provincial courts that warrant their protection, including their remedial powers with respect to enforcement of the Constitution; their enforcement of a number of Charter rights, particularly but not exclusively in criminal cases; their role in policing the division of powers; and their frequent interaction with the rights accorded to Indigenous peoples in Canada under s 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982.]

[131] ... [W]hat is the institutional or collective dimension of financial security? To my mind, financial security for the courts as an institution has three components, which all flow from the constitutional imperative that ... the relationship between the judiciary and the other branches of government be depoliticized. ... [I]n the context of institutional or collective financial security, this imperative demands that the courts both be free and appear to be free from political interference through economic manipulation ... , and that they not become entangled in the politics of remuneration

[133] First, as a general constitutional principle, the salaries of provincial court judges can be reduced, increased, or frozen However, any changes to or freezes in judicial remuneration require ... an independent body ... to set or recommend the levels of judicial remuneration. Those bodies are often referred to as commissions Governments are constitutionally bound to go through the commission process. The recommendations of the commission would not be binding on the executive or the legislature. Nevertheless, ... if the executive or the legislature chooses to depart from them, it has to justify its decision—if need be, in a court of law. ... [W]hen governments propose to single out judges as a class for a pay reduction, the burden of justification will be heavy.

[134] Second, under no circumstances is it permissible for the judiciary [either collectively or individually] to engage in negotiations over remuneration Any such negotiations would be fundamentally at odds with judicial independence. ... [S]alary negotiations are indelibly political, because remuneration from the public purse is an inherently political issue. Moreover, negotiations would undermine the appearance of judicial independence When I refer to negotiations, I utilize that term as it is traditionally understood in the labour relations context. Negotiations over remuneration and benefits, in colloquial terms, is a form of "horse-trading." The prohibition on negotiations therefore does not preclude expressions of concern or representations by chief justices and chief judges, and organizations that represent judges, to governments regarding the adequacy of judicial remuneration.

[135] Third, and finally, any reductions to judicial remuneration, including de facto reductions ... by inflation, cannot take those salaries below a basic minimum level ... required for the office of a judge. Public confidence in the independence of the judiciary would be undermined if judges were paid at such a low rate that they could be perceived as susceptible to political pressure through economic manipulation, as is witnessed in many countries.

[136] ... [T]hese appeals raise the issue of judges' salaries. However, the same principles are equally applicable to judges' pensions and other benefits.

[137] I also note that ... financial security need not be adhered to in cases of dire and exceptional financial emergency precipitated by unusual circumstances, for example, such as the outbreak of war or pending bankruptcy. In those situations, governments need not have prior recourse to a salary commission before reducing or freezing judges' salaries.

[139] The separation of powers requires, at the very least, that some functions must be exclusively reserved to particular bodies However, there is also another aspect of the separation of powers—the notion that the principle requires that the different branches of government only interact, as much as possible, in particular ways. ...

[140] What is at issue here is the character of the relationships between the legislature and the executive on the one hand, and the judiciary on the other. These relationships should be depoliticized. When I say that those relationships are depoliticized, I do not mean to deny that they are political in the sense that court decisions (both constitutional and non-constitutional) often have political implications, and that the statutes which courts adjudicate upon emerge from the political process. What I mean instead is the legislature and executive cannot, and cannot appear to, exert political pressure on the judiciary, and conversely, that members of the judiciary should exercise reserve in speaking out publicly on issues of general public policy that are or have the potential to come before the courts, that are the subject of political debate, and which do not relate to the proper administration of justice.

[141] To be sure, [depoliticization] is largely governed by convention ... [which does] not have the force of law in Canada However, to my mind, the depoliticization of these relationships is so fundamental to the separation of powers, and hence to the Canadian Constitution, that the provisions of the Constitution, such as s. 11(d) of the Charter, must be interpreted in such a manner as to protect this principle.

[142] The depoliticized relationships ... create difficult problems when it comes to judicial remuneration. On the one hand, remuneration from the public purse is an inherently political concern, in the sense that it implicates general public policy

[143] On the other hand, ... judges ... are not civil servants. Civil servants are part of the executive; judges, by definition, are independent of the executive. The three core characteristics of judicial independence—security of tenure, financial security, and administrative independence—are a reflection of that fundamental distinction, because they provide a range of protections to members of the judiciary to which civil servants are not constitutionally entitled.

[189] I recognize that the constitutional prohibition against salary negotiations places the judiciary at an inherent disadvantage compared to other persons paid from the public purse, because they cannot lobby the executive and the legislature with respect to their level of remuneration. ... [T]he mandatory involvement of an independent commission serves as a substitute for negotiations, because it provides a forum in which members of the judiciary can raise concerns Moreover, a commission serves as an institutional sieve which protects the courts from political interference through economic manipulation, a danger which inheres in salary negotiations.

[190] ... The purpose of the collective or institutional dimension of financial security is not to guarantee a mechanism ... which is fair to the economic interests of judges. Its purpose is to protect an organ of the Constitution which in turn is charged with the responsibility of protecting that document and the fundamental values contained therein. If judges do not receive the level of remuneration that they would otherwise receive under a regime of salary negotiations, then this is a price that must be paid.

[192] Finally, I turn to the question of whether the Constitution—through the vehicle of either s. 100 or s. 11(d)—imposes some substantive limits on the extent of salary reductions for the judiciary. ...

[193] I have no doubt that the Constitution protects judicial salaries from falling below an acceptable minimum level. ... If salaries are too low, there is always the danger, however speculative, that members of the judiciary could be tempted to adjudicate cases in a particular way Perhaps more importantly, in the context of s. 11(d), there is the perception that this could happen. ... I want to make it very clear that the guarantee of a minimum salary is not meant for the benefit of the judiciary. Rather, financial security is a means to the end of judicial independence, and is therefore for the benefit of the public. ...

[196] ... [A] minimum acceptable level of judicial remuneration is not a device to shield the courts from the effects of deficit reduction. Nothing would be more damaging to the reputation of the judiciary and the administration of justice than a perception that judges were not shouldering their share of the burden in difficult economic times. Rather, as I said above, financial security is one of the means whereby the independence of an organ of the Constitution is ensured. Judges are officers of the Constitution, and hence their remuneration must have some constitutional status.

NOTES

1. In the aftermath of this major advisory opinion, the Supreme Court has had occasion to consider other claims to independence, illustrated by the following cases.

2. In Provincial Court Judges' Assn of New Brunswick v New Brunswick (Minister of Justice); Ontario Judges' Assn v Ontario (Management Board); Bodner v Alberta; Conférence des juges du Québec v Quebec (AG); Minc v Quebec (AG), 2005 SCC 44, the Court addressed the judicial independence of provincial inferior courts once again, in considering challenges to the rejection by four provincial governments of the recommendations of judicial compensation commissions. The Court elaborated on the standard of rationality required for such rejections, indicating the need for "legitimate," "complete," and "meaningful" reasons, based on the facts, and rendered "in good faith." Three of the provinces met that standard; one did not. If a reviewing court determined that a province had failed to meet the rationality standard, the appropriate remedy was to send the matter for reconsideration, rather than issue a mandatory order.

3. In Ocean Port Hotel Ltd v British Columbia (General Manager, Liquor Control and Licensing Branch), 2001 SCC 52, the Court considered whether a provincial administrative tribunal must enjoy independence in order to carry out its adjudicative function, which included the imposition of penalties. Chief Justice McLachlin noted (at paras 23-24) that while administrative tribunals make quasi-judicial rulings, they do not enjoy express constitutional protection of their independence because they are part of the executive branch of government charged with the role of implementing government policy. Accordingly, it falls to Parliament and the legislatures to provide for their composition and structure, including the provision for elements of independence as deemed warranted.

4. In Federation of Law Societies, discussed below, the independence of the bar was at issue.

NOTE: CANADA (AG) V FEDERATION OF LAW SOCIETIES OF CANADA

In Canada (AG) v Federation of Law Societies of Canada, 2015 SCC 7, the Court considered the importance of the independence of the bar to the rule of law. In order to deter and identify money laundering and terrorist financing, federal legislation imposed duties on financial intermediaries, including lawyers, to keep records that included verification of the identity of the persons on whose behalf they paid or received money.

The Federation of Law Societies challenged the regime's application to lawyers as a violation of s 7 of the Charter. The Supreme Court read down the statute so as to exclude its application to legal counsel and law firms. Justice Cromwell, for the majority of the Court, concluded that the lack of protection for solicitor-client privilege infringed ss 7 and 8 of the Charter and, in particular, that the interference with a lawyer's duty of commitment to the client's cause constituted a breach of the principles of fundamental justice. In doing so, he quoted with approval the following passage from Attorney General of Canada v Law Society of British Columbia, [\[1982\] 2 SCR 307, 1982 CanLII 29](#) at para 98:

The independence of the Bar from the state in all its pervasive manifestations is one of the hallmarks of a free society. Consequently, regulation of these members of the law profession by the state must, so far as by human ingenuity it can be so designed, be free from state interference, in the political sense, with the delivery of services to the individual citizens in the state, particularly in fields of public and criminal law. The public interest in a free society knows no area more sensitive than the independence, impartiality and availability to the general public of the members of the Bar and through those members, legal advice and services generally. [Emphasis added at 335-36.]

[101] Various international bodies have also broadly affirmed the fundamental importance of preventing state interference with legal representation. The Basic Principles on the Role of Lawyers adopted by the Eighth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders state that "adequate protection of the human rights and fundamental freedoms to which all persons are entitled ... requires that all persons have effective access to legal services provided by an independent legal profession": U.N. Doc. A/CONF.144/28/Rev.1 (1991), at p. 119. Similarly, the Council of Bars and Law Societies of Europe's Charter of Core Principles of the European Legal Profession emphasizes lawyers' "freedom ... to pursue the client's case," including it as the first of 10 "core principles" (p. 5 (online)). The International Bar Association's International Principles on Conduct for the Legal Profession, adopted in 2011, also emphasize committed client representation as the first principle governing lawyers' conduct: "A lawyer shall maintain independence and be afforded the protection such independence offers in giving clients unbiased advice and representation" (p. 5 (online)).

[113] The information gathering and record retention provisions of this scheme serve important public purposes. They help to ensure that lawyers take significant steps so that when they act as financial intermediaries, they are not assisting money laundering or terrorist financing. The scheme also serves the purpose of requiring lawyers to be able to demonstrate to the competent authorities that this is the case. In order to pursue these objectives, Parliament is entitled, within proper limits ... to impose obligations beyond those which the legal profession considers essential to effective and ethical representation. Lawyers have a duty to give and clients are entitled to receive committed legal representation as well as to have their privileged communications with their lawyer protected. Clients are not, however, entitled to make unwitting accomplices of their lawyers let alone enlist them in the service of their unlawful ends.

V. JUDICIAL APPOINTMENTS

A. INTRODUCTION

The following passage encapsulates the Canadian judicial appointments process for most of the country's history:

The power to shape our courts determines Canada's legal landscape for years to come. Yet that power is subject to relatively few constitutional constraints. Section 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 states that "The Governor General shall appoint the Judges of the Superior, District, and County Courts [in each Province]." The appointment power for these courts is followed by sparse criteria for selection, and some basic guarantees of security of tenure. Provincial courts are not mentioned. While there is a provision for Parliament to create a "General Court of Appeal for Canada," the power to appoint to such a court is not specified. Even for those courts where an appointment power is included, the process is marked by an exceptionally narrow corridor. Subject to a few exceptions a blank slate is provided to the Governor-in-Council (in essence, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice). Canada is operating a 21st-century judiciary bound by 19th-century rules concerning judge-making.

See Carissima Mathen, "Choices and Controversy: Judicial Appointments in Canada" (2008) 58 UNBLJ 52 at 52-53.

In the past 50 or so years, most constitutional democracies have created stable, merit-driven, formalized processes for appointments to replace the secretive, executive prerogative. That includes a formal application or nomination process. It also involves expert, professional, and lay scrutiny of candidates by committees or commissions which consult with relevant professional and social bodies. These committees make their evaluations according to a formalized list of criteria and generally seek to diversify the judiciary so as to reflect society as a whole. While most of the process is conducted in private with strong confidentiality standards, the work of the committee is shared with the public through websites that set out general information and frequent reports. The process for Supreme Court appointments, which is more elaborate, is detailed separately below.

The modern mode of appointment is understood to reflect respect for the rule of law and the independence of the judiciary. It also acknowledges the judiciary's important role within a constitutional democracy by providing a degree of accountability and transparency. As you read through the material in this section, consider the extent to which the modifications to the original appointments process appropriately respond to the country's current identity, challenges, and needs.

B. APPOINTMENTS TO PROVINCIAL COURTS

The provinces have led the way in modernization. While there is no single template, the basic arrangement is to prepare a short list based on formal applications initiated by the candidate at their own initiative or by the suggestion of others. Sometimes the process generates a pool of vetted candidates for consideration for appointment as vacancies arise. Another approach is a search process dedicated to filling a particular vacancy when it materializes.

The vetting process includes inquiries into professional qualifications, including years of practice and indicia of good standing in one's professional and personal life. A judicial selection committee, made up of members of the judiciary, lawyers, and lay people, consults widely with reference to the chosen criteria to select candidates to interview and later rank. At that stage, the attorney general considers the recommendations and makes the nominee known to Cabinet, which then notifies the lieutenant governor to proceed with the appointment.

C. APPOINTMENTS TO SUPERIOR AND FEDERAL COURTS

Compared with provincial processes, federal appointments have not been formalized and modernized to the same extent. Under the leadership of Prime Minister Stephen Harper, from 2006 to 2015, the system set aside some of the progressive changes adopted by previous governments to emphasize merit and increase transparency and accountability. In effect, it reverted to the old pattern of executive prerogative based on political considerations.

With respect to superior and Federal court judges, until 1988, the customary pattern was for the minister of justice to receive private recommendations and consult with regional ministers before making the selection. While the process was not necessarily ideological, various studies over the years indicated that appointments frequently reflected partisan leanings: John Willis, "Methods of Appointing Judges—An Introduction" (1967) 4 Can Legal Stud 216; William H Angus, "Judicial Selection in Canada—The Historical Perspective" (1967) 4 Can Legal Stud 220; Canadian Bar Association, Report of the Canadian Bar Association Committee on the Appointment of Judges in Canada (Ottawa: Canadian Bar Foundation, 2005).

In recent years, the process has been completely revamped. The new arrangement requires formal applications to the Office of the Commissioner for Judicial Affairs, which performs the initial screening of qualifications. Candidates must personally apply; it is no longer possible to be nominated by a third party.

Judicial appointments advisory committees, which are constituted for each province and territory, then provide an intensive examination of the candidates. Most committees are composed of seven voting members representing the bench, bar, and general public. The Committee for the Tax Court of Canada has five members.

D. APPOINTMENTS TO THE SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

1. Introduction

On its face, the Supreme Court Act contains very few criteria for appointment. Judges must be lawyers with a minimum of ten years, membership in the bar. In addition, the Act designates three seats for Quebec. Notwithstanding these limited parameters, a practice has emerged whereby the Court's composition reflects the regions of the country: Ontario has three seats, the Western provinces two, and the Atlantic provinces one. In 2014, the Supreme Court issued an advisory opinion in connection with the appointment of Marc Nadon J. That opinion has had a significant impact on how to think about the Court's composition and essential features. The Nadon reference is addressed below.

Historically, the prime minister selected Supreme Court justices on the advice of the minister of justice. From 1875 to 1949, when the Supreme Court was subordinate to the Privy Council, most of its appointees had held electoral office, and a good number had sat in Cabinet. Some were active politicians at the time of appointment; others were unsuccessful politicians.

The process also operated behind closed doors. Appearing before a committee of Parliament in 2003, Justice Minister Irwin Cotler characterized the process as "unknown" (Mathen, "Choices and Controversy" at 57) rather than secretive or partisan. He then described a process that commenced with the identification of candidates from the relevant province or region, followed by extensive consultation on the merits of the candidates with senior judges, attorneys general, and officials of the Canadian Bar Association and law societies of the relevant provinces. The focus was on professional qualifications, capacity, personal characteristics, and diversity. For candidates already on the bench seeking promotion, the screening included an examination of the quality of their judgments. The minister of justice would then discuss the leading candidates with the prime minister, who would select a preferred candidate to present to Cabinet and, eventually, the governor general.

In recent years, changes to this process have involved members of Parliament. This began in 2004 when the Liberal government appointed an Interim Ad Hoc Committee on the Appointment of Supreme Court Judges. At the end of the evaluation process described above, the Committee privately reviewed the qualifications of the two candidates considered the most suitable, and then advised the prime minister of their conclusions. After the prime minister had made his selection, the minister of justice, at a public, televised hearing, explained the process, delineated the prime minister's nominees' qualifications, and then answered questions from a committee. The governor general's appointment of the two nominees—Justices Abella and Charron—followed this hearing.

In 2005, Cotler announced a new, merit-driven, confidential process for Supreme Court appointments. An intervening election produced a new government headed by Prime Minister Harper. Harper largely jettisoned the process but did appoint an Ad Hoc Committee, composed of parliamentarians, to interview the nominee, Rothstein J, in a televised hearing. This novel step increased parliamentary engagement and attracted strong public interest.

Some commentators favour greater parliamentary involvement as a way to maintain a proper balance between the power of the judiciary and the power of Parliament and to provide a modicum of accountability and transparency. Critics, though, are wary of the introduction of the ideological questioning and political machinations that epitomize the Senate hearings into appointments to the US Supreme Court. They also question whether political involvement can undermine merit-based criteria for appointment. For example, the best candidates may not agree to be exposed to public review before the appointment is made or to undergo evaluation in a situation where confidentiality may not be fully preserved.

The hearing held just before Rothstein J's appointment did not end this debate for a number of reasons. The committee, composed of MPs, was ad hoc. The parliamentarians did not have the benefit of parliamentary privilege, and, perhaps for that reason, their questioning was superficial and restrained. Justice Rothstein's judicial record did not raise any particular "red flags" for those concerned about so-called activist judicial decision-making. The MPs were not experts, had little time to prepare for the hearing, and played no role in the actual appointment.

In 2008, a different minister of justice decided to enlarge the parliamentary involvement in the appointment. He prepared a list of candidates to be reviewed by a new body, the Supreme Court Selection Panel, composed of five members of Parliament—two government members and one each from the other parties. This panel was to produce a short list of three for consideration by the prime minister and minister of justice. The nominee would be questioned by an ad hoc parliamentary committee.

During an intense political period, Prime Minister Harper chose to revert to the older mode of executive appointment. He appointed Cromwell J in the absence of either a panel's recommendation or a hearing. He also took the unusual step of making the appointment while Parliament was prorogued. (For commentary on the exercise of the appointment power when the government is in restricted "caretaker" mode, see Michael Plaxton, "The Caretaker Convention and Supreme Court Appointments" (2016) 72 SCLR (2d) 449.)

In 2011, Binnie and Charron JJ each announced their intention to retire, producing two Ontario vacancies. The appointments of Moldaver and Karakatsanis JJ included these steps: the compilation of a list of candidates in the Department of Justice, deliberation by the ad hoc parliamentary Supreme Court Selection Panel to narrow down the list to six names, the prime minister's selection of the preferred candidates on the advice of the minister of justice, and a public hearing in which the nominees answered questions from the members of an ad hoc committee of Parliament in a public televised hearing. This was also the process followed for the appointment of Wagner J in 2012.

Then, in 2013, a series of events transpired, leading to the most dramatic moment in Canadian judicial appointments history. It would profoundly change the Supreme Court of Canada.

2. The Supreme Court Act Reference

In September of 2013, Prime Minister Harper announced the appointment of Marc Nadon, a justice of the Federal Court of Appeal, to a Quebec seat on the Supreme Court soon to be vacated by Fish J. Justice Nadon's appointment raised the issue of whether the Supreme Court Act permitted a sitting Federal Court judge to take one of the three seats allocated to Quebec jurists. Section 6 of the Act stipulates that three of the Court's nine judges should be appointed "from among the judges of the Court of Appeal, or of the Superior Court of the Province of Quebec or from among the advocates of that Province" (emphasis added). At the time of his appointment, Nadon J was not a member of the barreau du Québec, although he had been for more than ten years prior to his appointment to the Federal Court. A question, therefore, arose whether s 6 required current membership in the Quebec bar. The government had sought a legal opinion on this issue prior to announcing the appointment. The opinion, provided by retired Supreme Court Justice Binnie and supported by retired Charron J and constitutional expert Peter Hogg, affirmed Nadon J's eligibility. In October, an ad hoc meeting of MPs, with 48 hours' notice, had the opportunity to question Nadon J in a televised session. The governor general then made the appointment.

Proceedings challenging the nomination were immediately commenced in the Federal Court by a Toronto lawyer. The government responded with a budget implementation bill to introduce two amendments to the Supreme Court Act in the form of declaratory provisions. Of most relevance, s 6.1 provided that, for the purpose of s 6 of the Act, an appointee to the Supreme Court would be considered to be from among the advocates of the province of Québec if, at any time, they were an advocate of at least ten years standing at the bar of that province. Immediately after the amendments were introduced, the governor in council referred two questions to the Supreme Court. The first question asked whether a person who was, at any time, an advocate of at least ten years standing at the barreau du Québec could be considered under s 6 of the Act as being "from among the advocates of that Province." The second question asked whether Parliament could enact legislation to make such a person eligible for appointment in the event that they did not qualify under the statute in its unamended form, thus engaging the issue of the validity of s 6.1. (By the time the reference was heard, in early 2014, the amendments had passed into law.)

By a 6–1 majority, the Supreme Court answered both questions in the negative. The Court's reasons in the reference decision were multifaceted. The majority engaged in statutory interpretation of both the original provisions in the Supreme Court Act regarding the three Quebec seats on the Supreme Court and the new declaratory provisions. A review of the declaratory provisions precipitated analysis of the 1982 constitutional amending formula, as applied to Supreme Court appointments and, by extension, the status of the Supreme Court as both a statutory and constitutional institution. This was the first time a court in a common law system had ever invalidated a judicial appointment.

McLACHLIN CJ (LeBel, Abella, Cromwell, Karakatsanis, and Wagner JJ concurring):

I. Introduction

[1] [Section 6 of the] Supreme Court Act provides that three of the nine judges of the Supreme Court of Canada must be appointed "from among the judges of the Court of Appeal or of the Superior Court of the Province of Quebec or from among the advocates of that Province"

[2] The first [question in this Reference] is whether a person who was at any time an advocate of at least 10 years standing at the Barreau du Québec [in the past] qualifies for appointment under s. 6 as being "from among the advocates of that Province." If the answer to the first question is no, the second question arises. It is whether Parliament can enact legislation to make such a person eligible for appointment to one of the three Quebec seats on the Court. The answer to these questions—which on their face raise issues of statutory interpretation—engage more fundamental issues about the composition of the Court and its place in Canada's legal and constitutional order.

III. Background

[11] On October 22, 2013, the Governor General in Council referred the two questions ... to this Court for hearing and consideration pursuant to s. 53 of the Supreme Court Act. On the same day, Bill C-4, Economic Action Plan 2013 Act, No. 2, was introduced in the House of Commons. Clauses 471 and 472 of Bill C-4 proposed to amend the Supreme Court Act by adding ss. 5.1 and 6.1. These provisions were subsequently passed and received Royal Assent on December 12, 2013: S.C. 2013, c. 40. The new s. 6.1 seeks to make it clear that a former member of the Quebec bar is eligible for appointment under s. 6.

[12] Sections 5, 5.1, 6 and 6.1 of the Act now read as follows:

5. Any person may be appointed a judge who is or has been a judge of a superior court of a province or a barrister or advocate of at least ten years standing at the bar of a province.

5.1 For greater certainty, for the purpose of section 5, a person may be appointed a judge if, at any time, they were a barrister or advocate of at least 10 years standing at the bar of a province.

6. At least three of the judges shall be appointed from among the judges of the Court of Appeal or of the Superior Court of the Province of Quebec or from among the advocates of that Province.

6.1 For greater certainty, for the purpose of section 6, a judge is from among the advocates of the Province of Quebec if, at any time, they were an advocate of at least 10 years standing at the bar of that Province.

IV. Question 1

A. The Issue

(1) Can a person who was, at any time, an advocate of at least 10 years standing at the Barreau du Québec be appointed to the Supreme Court of Canada as a member of the Supreme Court from Quebec pursuant to sections 5 and 6 of the Supreme Court Act?

[13] Section 5 of the Supreme Court Act sets out the general eligibility requirements for appointment to the Supreme Court of Canada by creating four groups of people who are eligible for appointment: (1) current judges of a superior court of a province, including courts of appeal, (2) former judges of such a court, (3) current barristers or advocates of at least 10 years standing at the bar of a province, and (4) former barristers or advocates of at least 10 years standing.

[14] Section 6 of the Act sets out the specific eligibility requirements for appointment to the Supreme Court as a judge for the province of Quebec. The provision expressly identifies two categories of people who are eligible for appointment: (1) judges of the Court of Appeal and Superior Court of Quebec, and (2) members of the Quebec bar.

[15] The question in this reference is whether the second category in s. 6 of the Act encompasses both current and former members of the Quebec bar, or whether it limits eligibility to current members of the bar. Justice Nadon does not belong to the first category—he was not a judge of the Court of Appeal or of the Superior Court of Quebec—and was not a current member of the Quebec bar at the time of his appointment. He is, however, a former member of the Quebec bar of more than 10 years standing. His eligibility for appointment thus turns on the scope of the second category—i.e. on whether a person is eligible for appointment to the Supreme Court of Canada under s. 6 of the Act on the basis of former membership of the Quebec bar.

[17] In our view, s. 6 narrows the pool from the four groups of people who are eligible under s. 5 to two groups who are eligible under s. 6. By specifying that three judges shall be selected from among the members of a specific list of institutions, s. 6 requires that persons appointed to the three Quebec seats must, in addition to meeting the general requirements of s. 5, be current members of these institutions.

[18] We come to this conclusion for four main reasons. First, the plain meaning of s. 6 has remained consistent since the original version of that provision was enacted in 1875, and it has always excluded former advocates. Second, this interpretation gives effect to important differences in the wording of ss. 5 and 6. Third, this interpretation of s. 6 advances its dual purpose of ensuring that the Court has civil law expertise and that Quebec's legal traditions and social values are represented on the Court and that Quebec's confidence in the Court be maintained. Finally, this interpretation is consistent with the broader scheme of the Supreme Court Act for the appointment of ad hoc judges.

B. General Principles of Interpretation

[19] The Supreme Court Act was enacted in 1875 as an ordinary statute under the authority of s. 101 of the Constitution Act, 1867 (S.C. 1875, c. 11). ... Parliament's authority to amend the Act is now limited by the Constitution. Sections 5 and 6 of the Supreme Court Act reflect an essential feature of the Supreme Court of Canada—its composition—which is constitutionally protected under Part V of the Constitution Act, 1982. As such, they must be interpreted in a broad and purposive manner and understood in their proper linguistic, philosophic and historical context: Hunter v. Southam Inc., [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145, at pp. 155-56; Edwards v. Attorney-General for Canada, [1930] A.C. 124 (P.C.), at p. 136; R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295, at p. 344.

C. Legislative History of Sections 5 and 6

[20] The eligibility requirements for appointments from Quebec are the result of the historic bargain that gave birth to the Court in 1875. Sections 5 and 6 in the current Act descend from the original eligibility provision found in s. 4 of the 1875 Act. ... There have been no substantive changes to the criteria for appointments from Quebec since the Act was introduced in 1875.

[36] The Attorney General of Canada argues that ss. 5 and 6 must be read together as complementary provisions, so that the requirement of at least 10 years standing at the bar applies to appointments from Quebec. Since s. 6 makes no reference to how many years an appointee must have been at the bar, reading it without s. 5 would lead to the absurd result that a highly inexperienced lawyer would be eligible for appointment to the Court, the Attorney General says.

[37] We agree that ss. 5 and 6 must be read together. We also agree that the requirement of at least 10 years standing at the bar applies to appointments from Quebec. We disagree, however, with the Attorney General's ultimate conclusion that reading these provisions together in a complementary way permits the appointment of former advocates of at least 10 years standing to the Quebec seats on the Court. Section 6 does not displace the general requirements under s. 5 that apply to all appointments to the Supreme Court. Rather, it makes additional specifications in respect of the three judges from Quebec. One of these is that they must currently be a member of the Quebec bar.

[38] We reach this conclusion based on the plain meaning and purpose of s. 6, and the surrounding statutory context.

(1) The Plain Meaning of Section 6

[45] ... [O]n a plain reading, s. 5 creates four groups of people eligible for appointment: current and former judges of a superior court and current and former barristers or advocates of at least 10 years standing at the bar. But s. 6 imposes a requirement that persons appointed to the three Quebec seats must, in addition to meeting the general requirements of s. 5, be current members of the listed Quebec institutions. Thus, s. 6 narrows eligibility to only two groups for Quebec appointments: current judges of the Court of Appeal or Superior Court of Quebec and current advocates of at least 10 years standing at the bar of Quebec.

(2) The Purpose of Section 6

[46] This textual analysis is consistent with the underlying purpose of s. 6. The Attorney General of Canada submits that the purpose of s. 6 is simply to ensure that three members of this Court are trained and experienced in Quebec civil law and that this purpose is satisfied by appointing either current or former Quebec advocates, both of whom would have civil law training and experience.

[47] ... [A] review of the legislative history reveals an additional and broader purpose.

[48] Section 6 reflects the historical compromise that led to the creation of the Supreme Court. Just as the protection of minority language, religion and education rights were central considerations in the negotiations leading up to Confederation ... , the protection of Quebec through a minimum number of Quebec judges was central to the creation of this Court. A purposive interpretation of s. 6 must be informed by and not undermine that compromise.

[49] The purpose of s. 6 is to ensure not only civil law training and experience on the Court, but also to ensure that Quebec's distinct legal traditions and social values are represented on the Court, thereby enhancing the confidence of the people of Quebec in the Supreme Court as the final arbiter of their rights. Put differently, s. 6 protects both the functioning and the legitimacy of the Supreme Court as a general court of appeal for Canada. This broader purpose was succinctly described by Professor Russell in terms that are well supported by the historical record:

... [T]he antipathy to having the Civil Code of Lower Canada interpreted by judges from an alien legal tradition was not based merely on a concern for legal purity or accuracy. It stemmed more often from the more fundamental premise that Quebec's civil-law system was an essential ingredient of its distinctive culture and therefore it required, as a matter of right, judicial custodians imbued with the methods of jurisprudence and social values integral to that culture. [Emphasis in original.]

(Peter H. Russell, The Supreme Court of Canada as a Bilingual and Bicultural Institution (1969), at p. 8.)

[50] At the time of Confederation, Quebec was reluctant to accede to the creation of a Supreme Court because of its concern that the Court would be incapable of adequately dealing with questions of the Quebec civil law

[51] The bill creating the Supreme Court was passed only after amendments were made responding specifically to Quebec's concerns. Most significantly, the amended bill that became the Supreme Court Act provided that two of the six judges "shall be taken from among the Judges of the Superior Court or Court of Queen's Bench, or the Barristers or Advocates of the Province of Quebec": s. 4 of the 1875 Act.

[55] Government and opposition members alike saw the two seats (one third) for Quebec judges as a means of ensuring not only the functioning, but also the legitimacy of the Supreme Court as a federal and bijural institution.

[56] Viewed in this light, the purpose of s. 6 is clearly different from the purpose of s. 5. Section 5 establishes a broad pool of eligible candidates; s. 6 is more restrictive.

Its exclusion of candidates otherwise eligible under s. 5 was intended by Parliament as a means of attaining the twofold purpose of (i) ensuring civil law expertise and the representation of Quebec's legal traditions and social values on the Court, and (ii) enhancing the confidence of Quebec in the Court. Requiring the appointment of current members of civil law institutions was intended to ensure not only that those judges were qualified to represent Quebec on the Court, but that they were perceived by Quebecers as being so qualified.

[58] ... Parliament could have adopted different criteria to achieve the twofold objectives of s. 6—for instance by requiring a qualitative assessment of a candidate's expertise in Quebec's civil law and legal traditions—but instead it chose to advance the provision's objectives by specifying objective criteria for appointment to one of the Quebec seats on the Court. In the final analysis, lawmakers must draw lines. The criteria chosen by Parliament might not achieve perfection, but they do serve to advance the provision's purpose: see Michael Plaxton and Carissima Mathen, "Purposive Interpretation, Quebec, and the Supreme Court Act" (2013), 22 Const. Forum 15, at pp. 20–22.

[59] We earlier concluded that a textual interpretation of s. 6 excludes former advocates from appointment to the Court. We come to the same conclusion on purposive grounds. The underlying purpose of the general eligibility provision, s. 5, is to articulate minimum general requirements for the appointment of all Supreme Court judges. In contrast, the underlying purpose of s. 6 is to enshrine the historical compromise that led to the creation of the Court by narrowing the eligibility for the Quebec seats. Its function is to limit the Governor in Council's otherwise broad discretion to appoint judges, in order to ensure expertise in civil law and that Quebec's legal traditions and social values are reflected in the judges on the Supreme Court, and to enhance the confidence of the people of Quebec in the Court.

[61] Some of the submissions before us relied heavily on the context provided by constitutional negotiations following the patriation of the Constitution in 1982, particularly on Quebec's agreement to proposed constitutional reforms that would have explicitly rendered Federal Court and Federal Court of Appeal judges eligible for appointment to one of the Quebec seats on the Court. The Charlottetown Accord went furthest by stipulating that it was entrenching the current Supreme Court Act requirement of "nine members, of whom three must have been admitted to the bar of Quebec (civil law bar)" (Consensus Report on the Constitution: Charlottetown (1992), at p. 8). This showed, it was argued, that these eligibility requirements were acceptable to Quebec.

[62] We do not find this argument compelling. The Meech Lake and Charlottetown negotiations over the eligibility requirements for the Court took place in the context of wider negotiations over federal–provincial issues, including greater provincial involvement in Supreme Court appointments. In the case of Quebec, the proposed changes would have diminished the significance of s. 6 as the sole safeguard of Quebec's interests on the Supreme Court by requiring the Governor General in Council to make an appointment from a list of names submitted by Quebec. In this context, we should be wary of drawing any inference that there was a consensus interpretation of s. 6 different from the one that we adopt.

[69] We therefore conclude that s. 5 establishes general eligibility requirements for a broad pool of persons eligible for appointment to the Supreme Court of Canada. In respect of the three Quebec seats, s. 6 leads to a more restrictive interpretation of the eligibility requirements in order to give effect to the historical compromise aimed at protecting Quebec's legal traditions and social values.

[70] We conclude that a person who was, at any time, an advocate of at least 10 years standing at the Barreau du Québec, may be appointed to the Supreme Court pursuant to s. 5 of the Supreme Court Act, but not s. 6. The three appointments under s. 6 require, in addition to the criteria set out in s. 5, current membership of the Barreau du Québec or of the Court of Appeal or Superior Court of Quebec. Therefore, a judge of the Federal Court or Federal Court of Appeal is ineligible for appointment under s. 6 of the Act.

[71] We note in passing that the reference questions do not ask whether a judge of the Federal Court or Federal Court of Appeal who was a former advocate of at least 10 years standing at the Quebec bar could rejoin the Quebec bar for a day in order to be eligible for appointment to this Court under s. 6. We therefore do not decide this issue.

2. The second half of the majority opinion, dealing with question 2 and the validity of the government's attempt to revise the eligibility criteria through the addition of s. 6.1 to the Supreme Court Act, can be found in Chapter 26, Amending the Constitution. It is that portion of the judgment that discusses the evolution of the Court, its constitutional status, and how the amending formula in part V of the Constitution Act, 1982 applies to changes to the Court.

3. Justice Moldaver dissented. He read the eligibility criteria in s. 5 to be applicable to all appointments, including those filling a Quebec seat on the Court. Accordingly, current and former members of the Quebec bar having at least ten years standing, as well as current and former judges of the Quebec superior courts, would meet the eligibility requirements for a Quebec seat. He also read ss. 5 and 6 together. While s. 5 provided for general eligibility rules, s. 6 merely provided an additional proviso relating to the three Quebec seats.

Justice Moldaver then rejected the claim that the sections rendered ineligible former advocates of at least ten years' standing at the Quebec bar. He considered an additional requirement of current membership at the Quebec bar as unconnected to this objective. In his view, the words "from among," in s. 6, had no temporal significance given the context. Rather, these words referred to those eligible under s. 5. This reading also had the advantage of avoiding the absurd possibility that an individual having only one day's standing at the Quebec bar could nonetheless be eligible. It could not possibly forward the objective of the sections to read s 6 as requiring a former advocate of at least ten years standing at the Quebec bar, or a former judge of the Quebec Court of Appeal or Superior Court, to rejoin the Quebec bar for one day in order to be considered for appointment.

4. Near the beginning of its opinion, the majority included this somewhat puzzling paragraph:

[6] The practical effect is that the appointment of Justice Nadon and his swearing-in as a judge of the Court were void ab initio. He remains a supernumerary judge of the Federal Court of Appeal.

This paragraph is puzzling because it seems to grant an actual remedy—declaring the appointment ab initio and, in effect, reinstating Nadon J to his former position. But the Court was delivering a reference, which is merely advisory (discussed in Section VII). Consider the following passage from Carissima Mathen & Michael Plaxton, The Tenth Justice: Judicial Appointments, Marc Nadon and the Supreme Court Act Reference (Vancouver: UBC Press, 2020) 183–84:

[Nadon] remains surprised that the majority declared his appointment void ab initio. Advisory opinions are, by definition, nonbinding and involve no parties formally seeking redress. For that reason, there were never any written or oral arguments concerning the legal status of Marc Nadon's appointment to the Supreme Court. "No arguments were made, and I was not represented," he said. He likes to joke with students that "I may still be a Supreme Court judge in law"—a tenth justice. The order-in-council appointing him was never revoked. "If I had a hundred thousand dollars to burn," Nadon mischievously re-marked, "it would be fun to challenge" that aspect of the opinion. Ultimately, he suggested, it would have been better if the continued validity of his appointment had been properly litigated in the Federal Court—if [the Toronto lawyer] had been allowed to proceed with his initial claim.

What do you think motivated the Court to make the declaration that it did in paragraph 6? Was it right to do so?

NOTE: THE “MAINVILLE REFERENCE”

With respect to the specific issue of eligibility for appointment to a Quebec seat, the precedential importance of the Supreme Court's decision in the Supreme Court Act Reference is unclear. The rules applicable to membership in the Quebec bar may no longer preclude membership for all judges. The Code of Professional Conduct of Lawyers, CQLR c B-1, r 3.1 now provides that the judicial office on certain courts is incompatible with legal practice but does not refer to the federal courts or the Supreme Court of Canada in that respect.

As well, in Quebec (AG) v Canada (AG), 2015 SCC 22, the Supreme Court of Canada rejected a challenge to the appointment of Justice Robert Mainville, a Federal Court judge, to the Quebec Court of Appeal. Section 98 of the Constitution Act, 1867 states that appointment to the “courts of Quebec” must be made “from the Bar of that Province.” The question was whether a candidate’s connection to the “Bar of Quebec” had to be current. Initiating a reference to the Quebec Court of Appeal, the Quebec government argued that, following the Nadon reference, s 98 should be interpreted in the same way as s 6 of the Constitution Act, 1867, thus rendering judges of the federal courts ineligible for appointment to the superior courts of Quebec. Concluding that s 98 arose in an entirely different statutory and historical context, the Court of Appeal advised that Mainville J’s appointment was valid. Understanding the purpose of s 98 as ensuring that judges of the superior courts would be legally trained and trained in local law, the Court of Appeal interpreted the section to require only that a person appointed to one of the courts of Quebec had been admitted to the barreau du Québec or was such a member when appointed. A contrary interpretation would have cast doubt on a common practice of promoting Quebec trial court judges (who are not "current" members of the bar) to the Quebec Court of Appeal. In very brief reasons, the Supreme Court of Canada upheld that conclusion. The implication is that it would have been possible to appoint Nadon J to the Supreme Court in a two-step process that provided him with a short-term appointment to the Quebec Court of Appeal, to satisfy the strictures of ss 5 and 6 of the Supreme Court Act. Does this development support Moldaver J's concern that the majority's interpretation in the Supreme Court Act Reference was, essentially, absurd? For a different view of the absurdity argument, see Carissima Mathen, "The Shadow of Absurdity and the Challenge of Easy Cases: Reflections on the Supreme Court Act Reference" (2015) 71 SCLR 161 at 178-80.

3. Current Issues

In 2014, additional detail relating to the Nadon appointment came to light. It was reported that the initial short list consisted of six persons, four of whom were judges on the Federal Court or Federal Court of Appeal. The final list of three later produced by the parliamentary committee included Nadon; Trudel J, also from the Federal Court of Appeal; and Bich J of the Quebec Court of Appeal.

The publication of the inner workings of the parliamentary screening committee constituted a serious breach of confidentiality. As a result, Prime Minister Harper reverted to a process of full executive control. The next three Supreme Court appointments—Gaston, Côté, and Brown JJ—were announced after the appointment had been made, with very little information provided for the selection.

In August 2016, a newly elected Liberal government announced a different process for appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada. One precipitating factor was the need to fill the vacancy resulting from the unexpected early retirement of Cromwell J. Another was the commitment to address long-standing calls for a stable, responsive, and merit-driven process.

The new process, which thus far has been used to appoint Rowe, Martin, Kasirer, and Jamal JJ, formalizes the creation of the applicant pool. Qualified applicants must complete a detailed questionnaire and consent to the release of information from relevant law societies and a general background check. The questionnaire requires a comprehensive review of the applicant's qualifications, including personal information, references, statutory qualifications, education, extensive professional history, an annotated dossier of five judgments or other legal writing, an account of the applicant's disposition of five significant cases or matters while in legal practice or on the bench, information pertaining to personal suitability and integrity on any matter that "could reflect negatively on oneself or the judiciary," and a description of any serious physical or mental health problem. The questionnaire also calls for a number of long-form answers on the role of the judiciary in Canada's legal system and the role of a judge in a constitutional democracy. The application package is submitted to the Office of the Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs.

After initial screening by the Federal Judicial Affairs Office, the applications are sent to the Independent Advisory Board for the Supreme Court of Canada Judicial Appointments. The members of this body hold at pleasure renewable five-year appointments. Most of its members have professional qualifications, and some may be drawn from the public. The governor general designates one advisory board member to act as chairperson.

The advisory board is empowered to enlarge the applicant pool by encouraging qualified applicants to apply. It also consults with the chief justice of the Supreme Court of Canada and other key stakeholders. The advisory board's work culminates in a non-binding shortlist of three to five nominees sent to the prime minister, accompanied by statements setting out each candidate's compliance with the long-standing statutory criteria as well as other criteria specified in the new arrangements for appointment.

The minister of justice has the opportunity to consult on the shortlist of candidates with the chief justice of Canada, relevant provincial and territorial attorneys general, and the relevant Cabinet ministers and opposition justice critics, as well as the members of certain standing committees of Parliament. On the basis of these consultations, the minister of justice will advise the prime minister. The prime minister may ask the advisory board for more names.

After the prime minister selects his nominee, members of Parliament have the opportunity to participate in a formal public process that presents the nominee to them and to the Canadian public.

In the final public element in the process, the advisory board prepares a report describing its fulfillment of its responsibilities, including its expenditures, statistics on the applications received, and any recommendations for improving the appointment process. For further documentation pertaining to the new process, see Justin Trudeau, News Release, "Prime Minister Announces New Supreme Court of Canada Judicial Appointments Process" (2 August 2016), online: Government of Canada <<https://pm.gc.ca/en/news/news-releases/2016/08/02/prime-minister-announces-new-supreme-court-canada-judicial>>.

Reaction to the new process has been positive in regard to its transparency, accountability, and merit orientation. Some, though, have criticized the process as unduly onerous and, therefore, discouraging to certain candidates. Another concern is that the addition of diversity considerations, including bilingualism, may undermine the conventional practice of allocating seats on the Court geographically.

One of the longest-lived traditions in Supreme Court appointments is its regional composition. Increasingly, however, that seems to run up against other imperatives to render the Court more representative of the country that it serves. The following excerpt discusses some of these issues.

Carissima Mathen & Michael Plaxton, The Tenth Justice: Judicial Appointments, Marc Nadon and the Supreme Court Act Reference

(Vancouver: UBC Press, 2020) (footnotes omitted)

[T]here are a number of unwritten conventions pertaining to regional representation. The Supreme Court Act says only that Quebec must have three representatives on the court. In practice, though, it is generally accepted that Ontario, too, must have three judges. In addition, there must be at least one judge from the Maritime provinces. Until recently, it was sometimes said that Manitoba, Alberta, and Saskatchewan should be represented by one judge between them—with each province alternating in turn—and that British Columbia should have the post that remained. Since the Nadon Reference, these conventions have been the subject of much public attention and have given rise to considerable controversy, particularly as they have come into tension with contemporary views about the value of gender and racial diversity. ... In 2015, when the Harper government was seeking a replacement for Justice Rothstein, many suggested that the province of Saskatchewan was due—by convention, they claimed, it was Saskatchewan's turn. After all, the province had not been represented on the Supreme Court of Canada since the retirement of Justice Emmett Hall in 1973. There were also skeptics who argued that, for precisely that reason, no such convention existed. As one commentator observed: "If there is a convention that the next appointment should come from Saskatchewan, it is hardly rock-solid—and arguably shouldn't be. The very fact that the last four Western Canadian appointments have come from Manitoba and Alberta could be taken as evidence that no such convention exists. (Such is the nature of conventions: they guide until they don't)." At the very least, it was noted further, "[A] government that is prepared to push against the boundaries of convention, or game them somewhat, [could] credibly say that it is not bound to make its next selection from a Saskatchewan pool." Ultimately, Harper appointed Justice Russell Brown of the Alberta Court of Appeal.

The issue of regional representation took on far greater public significance in 2016, when Justice Cromwell announced his retirement. This time, the concern was that Atlantic Canada might lose its representative on the court, in that Prime Minister Trudeau might appoint an Indigenous person from outside the region. [The Prime Minister had suggested] that the new application process would be open to "any Canadian lawyer or judge who fits the criteria." ...

There were expressions of discontent from both the Premier of Nova Scotia and the justice minister for Newfoundland and Labrador. Conservative member of Parliament Lisa Raitt suggested that the prime minister's announcement reflected a view in government that Atlantic Canada was a backwater. Professor Wayne MacKay stated:

I think it's a really big mistake to go against the long-standing convention of regional representation on the court, it's one of our most important policy-making institutions now, and to have no Atlantic voice in that institution would be contrary to the basic principles of Confederation. ...

On 19 September 2016, the Atlantic Provinces Trial Lawyers Association announced that it had filed an application with the Nova Scotia Supreme Court. In obvious reliance on the Nadon Reference, the association sought a declaration that "the Prime Minister's proposed departure from the constitutional convention of regional representation on the Supreme Court of Canada amounts to an amendment to the Constitution that requires unanimous consent of the provinces." That was almost certainly a bridge too far: though the court might well agree that there was a convention of regional representation, it is difficult to imagine it holding that the convention was part of the "law" governing Supreme Court appointments and as such could not be changed without constitutional amendment. After all, the court has been careful to distinguish between conventions and law precisely on the basis that the latter is enforceable whereas the former is not. In any event, the case was rendered moot by the appointment of Justice Rowe, who hailed from Newfoundland. But it is interesting to wonder what might have been. ...

The issue of regional representation was reopened with the retirement of Chief Justice Beverley McLachlin [in 2017]. At the outset, Trudeau announced that the government would comply with the convention of regional representation—or, at least, one reading of it. The press release stated:

Candidates may demonstrate that they satisfy the geographical requirement by reference to their bar membership, judicial appointment, or other relationship with Western Canada (British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba) and Northern Canada (Yukon, Northwest Territories and Nunavut).

Immediately, the president of the Canadian Bar Association expressed gratification at this development. Moreover, there were expressions of approval at the decision to include the territories in "western Canada." But some were unhappy at the idea that British Columbia, which for more than twenty-five years had held a seat on the court, might find itself with no distinctive representative of its own. Some commentators insisted that the court should have a member who was familiar with British Columbia's unique culture and traditions. (Ironically, such suggestions vaguely echo those of Arthur Bunster who, in 1875, argued that British Columbia, like Quebec, should have a statutory guarantee of representation on the Supreme Court.) The need for regional representation tied into calls for more (i.e., some) Indigenous representation on the court. Tasneem Karbani remarked:

With McLachlin's departure, British Columbia no longer has representation or a voice on the Supreme Court. This lack of representation also ties in with the concerns about Indigenous representation. The issues that involve Indigenous groups in British Columbia are often unique from those in the rest of Canada. The Supreme Court stands to lose out on both a British Columbia perspective and Indigenous perspective by having a judicial appointment that neither represents the region or Indigenous peoples.

QUESTIONS

1. Does the combination of statutory, linguistic, and diversity criteria make filling Supreme Court seats too complicated?
2. Assuming that the relevant procedures under part V of the Constitution Act, 1982 could be satisfied, should the Supreme Court be required to have at least one Indigenous jurist?

VI. JUDICIAL SECURITY OF TENURE

Security of tenure is critically important to judicial independence. Prior to Confederation, judges held office at the "pleasure" of the executive. Then, s 99 of the Constitution Act, 1867 provided that federally appointed judges served for life, conditional only on "good behaviour." The provision brought Canadian superior courts into line with the independence afforded the superior courts in the United Kingdom. A constitutional amendment later provided for a retirement age of 75.

Section 99 also permitted the governor general the power to terminate a judicial appointment, based on an "Address of the Senate and House of Commons." To date, this has never occurred.

The need for an administrative structure for processing allegations against sitting judges became apparent in the 1960s, after an inquiry into the question of whether to remove Ontario Supreme Court Justice Leo Landreville from the bench. The first stage of inquiry was conducted under the Inquiries Act. A second stage was conducted by a subcommittee of members of Parliament. The recommendation was for removal. Though he eventually resigned, Landreville J challenged the legitimacy of the inquiry process in court. Ten years later, the Federal Court ruled that the inquiry had exceeded its mandate.

The federal Judges Act, RSC 1985, c J-1 now provides a formal administrative structure for investigating complaints against superior court judges. The Canadian Judicial Council (CJC), set up in 1971, oversees the process. The chief justice of Canada acts as chair of the council, which is made up of the chief justices and associate chief justices of the superior courts and federal courts. The council's responsibilities are twofold. First, it examines allegations of misconduct to determine if they warrant investigation. Second, it runs a public inquiry for serious and well-founded allegations to provide a basis for a recommendation to the minister of justice on the question of removal. The decision to seek removal of a judge by Parliament lies with the minister, not the CJC. The public inquiry process was designed to insure judicial accountability, without undermining the constitutional principle of judicial independence, through a process that is fair, efficient, and transparent.

Complaints may be submitted by anyone—lawyers, parties to a particular case, or members of the public. Most complaints are dismissed informally on the basis that they are not relevant or are trivial, vexatious, or not in the public interest. An inquiry committee is set up if the matter is sufficiently serious to warrant a judge's removal.

Under s 63(1), the minister of justice or a provincial attorney general may require the council to commence an inquiry. In Cosgrove v Canadian Judicial Council, 2007 FCA 103, leave to appeal to SCC refused, 2007 CanLII 66738, s 63(1) was challenged as infringing judicial independence. The Federal Court of Appeal held that s 63(1) was constitutional, and the Supreme Court denied leave to appeal.

The criteria for recommendations for removal from office include a determination that a judge has become permanently incapacitated or disabled; is unable to carry out the duties of the office due to age, illness, or misconduct; has failed to carry out these duties; or was situated in a position incompatible with these duties. The general concern is whether conduct falling within these categories has undermined public confidence in the judge's ability to execute the judicial role. Since 1971, the CJC has recommended the removal of a judge in three instances, invariably prompting resignations by the judges under review.

In the last few years, there have been a number of controversies concerning alleged judicial misconduct at both the judicial and federal levels. Consider the following cases. In your opinion, did the judge's conduct merit discipline?

1. While he sat on the Alberta Provincial Court, Robin Camp acquitted a defendant of sexual assault. The acquittal was overturned by the Alberta Court of Appeal (R v Wagar, 2015 ABCA 327), which found that Camp J's conduct and reasons for judgment disclosed numerous serious errors of law. Court transcripts showed that Camp questioned the complainant's morals, called her attempts to fight off an attack "ineffectual," repeatedly referred to her as the "accused," and remarked that "sex and pain sometimes go together" (at 52). Perhaps most notoriously, when the complainant was giving evidence about the assault, alleged to have occurred in a bathroom, Camp asked her: "[W]hy couldn't you just keep your knees together?" (at 40).

Sometime after the trial, Camp was appointed to the Federal Court of Canada. He was thus subject to the federal complaint system described above.

2. On November 9, 2016, the day after Donald Trump was elected President of the United States, Ontario Provincial Court Judge Bernd Zabel walked into court wearing a red "MAKE AMERICA GREAT AGAIN" baseball hat. The incident attracted widespread public criticism. A few days later, Zabel J apologized and acknowledged that he should not have worn the hat in court. Eighty-one complaints were filed.

At a hearing before the Ontario Judicial Council, Zabel J testified that he purchased the hat as historical memorabilia at a time when it seemed highly unlikely that Trump would win. Zabel J stated that he thought "it would add a bit of humour by starting off the day with the hat, which was very ill-fitting—it looks very silly on me." He admitted that when he passed two colleagues in the hall, one of them asked: "Are you out of your mind?" After the clerk registrar announced that Court was in session, Zabel J stated: "Just in celebration of a historic night in the United States. Unprecedented." He took off the hat and placed it on the dais with the MAGA phrase visible to those in the courtroom.

Following media coverage of the incident, some members of the public and legal community expressed concern about Zabel J's capacity (real or perceived) to render fair judgments. They cited Trump's conduct throughout the 2016 campaign, including derogatory comments about women, a proposed temporary ban on Muslims entering the United States, the deportation of undocumented immigrants, and a plan to build a wall along the Mexican border. There were no complaints from individuals actually in the courtroom on the day in question. In fact, one of those persons wrote a letter in support of Zabel, as did other members of the legal profession.

3. Section 55 of the Judges Act prohibits judges from engaging in any occupation or business other than their judicial duties.

In 2018, Ontario Superior Court Justice Patrick Smith accepted an appointment as the Interim Dean of Law at Lakehead University. The Law School, which was established in 2013, has as its mandate "Aboriginal and Indigenous Law, Natural Resources and Environmental Law, and Sole/Small Town Practice." The faculty had recently lost its dean, a Native American named Angelique EagleWoman, who resigned after experiencing what she alleged to be institutional racism.

Justice Smith sought and received support from the Chief Justice of the Superior Court and, subsequently, express permission from the federal Minister of Justice for a six-month leave. The approval contained a number of limitations to ensure that he provide solely "academic leadership" (as opposed to, say, fundraising and faculty hiring).

Many years earlier, Smith J had faced criticism after sentencing a First Nations chief to six months in jail for contempt of court. The chief was charged after refusing a mining company permission to access traditional territory. That case, along with some others rendered by the judge, became the focus of negative media attention,

The CJC, of its own accord, initiated an investigation into Smith J's acceptance of the decanal position. The CJC cited, in part, Smith J's failure to consider "the possible public controversy associated with the reaction from First Nations chiefs and ... the political environment or the potential effect on the prestige of judicial office" (at para 36).

See Smith v Canada (AG), 2020 FC 629.

4. In 2021, a controversy arose regarding the alleged involvement of a federal judge in the hiring of a new Director of the International Human Rights Program (IHRP) of the Faculty of Law at the University of Toronto. A search committee had decided upon an international law scholar named Valentina Azarova. After some initial negotiations, the hiring process was halted. The university cited timing and immigration concerns. It then emerged that a judge of the Tax Court of Canada, David Spiro, had corresponded with university officials to alert them to concerns from the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs that Azarova's hiring would be met with controversy and could harm the university's reputation. The concerns related to Azarova's past scholarship on the Israeli–Palestinian conflict.

A number of complaints lodged with the CJC alleged that by his conduct, Judge Spiro had "put the integrity and impartiality of the Tax Court of Canada in jeopardy, and cause[d] any party or lawyer before the Court who is Palestinian, Arab, or Muslim to reasonably fear bias" (at 26 [Scott]).

See Craig M Scott, "Letter of April 21, 2021, from Craig Scott to Canadian Judicial Council Review Panel in Justice David Spiro Proceeding (CJC File 20-0260) Concerning the Reliability of the University of Toronto Cromwell Report & For the Record," (21 April 2021), online: Osgoode Hall Law School <https://digitalcommons.osgoode.yorku.ca/cgi/viewcontent.cgi?article=1220&context=public_writing>; Canadian Judicial Council, Press Release, "Canadian Judicial Council Completes its Review of the Matter Involving the Honourable DE Spiro" (21 May 2021), online: <<https://cjc-ccm.ca/en/news/canadian-judicial-council-completes-review-matter-involving-honourable-de-spiro>>.

VII. LITIGATING THE CONSTITUTION

We end this chapter with a very brief overview of the ways in which constitutional issues reach the courts for adjudication. Constitutional litigation addresses broad issues of public concern but is conducted within the basic framework developed for the litigation of private law claims. This section outlines a number of special rules and procedures developed to accommodate the particular requirements of public law. It begins with a look at the critical advisory function of Canadian courts, which accounts for a significant proportion of constitutional jurisprudence.

A. THE REFERENCE FUNCTION OF CANADIAN COURTS

Constitutional disputes reach the courts in a variety of ways. Sometimes constitutional issues are raised in the course of ongoing civil or criminal proceedings. In civil cases between private parties, one party may challenge the validity of a law that the other party relies on. In the context of a prosecution, the accused might raise a constitutional challenge to the provision that is the basis of the criminal or penal charges. In other cases, an independent action may be commenced by someone seeking a declaration that a particular law is invalid on constitutional grounds.

Constitutional issues may also reach the courts by means of a process initiated by the executive branch of the state, known as the reference procedure. The following excerpt provides a description of this distinctive function:

Carissima Mathen, Courts Without Cases: The Law and Politics of Advisory Opinions

(Oxford: Hart, 2019) ch 1 (footnotes omitted)

The reference function first appeared in Canadian law in 1875. It was inserted into the federal statute—the Supreme and Exchequer Court Act—that brought into existence the Supreme Court of Canada. The function has remained in place ever since, not just for the Supreme Court but for other courts as well. It sets Canada somewhat apart from similar Anglo-American legal systems. There are few comparators to Canadian references in the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand or the US federal judiciary. The function also sets Canada apart from those legal systems with specialist “constitutional courts.” Numerous countries, in Europe and elsewhere, have instituted courts that are singularly authorised to consider constitutional issues. Those constitutional courts receive issues in numerous ways, including as references. Thus, Canada is not unique in permitting advisory opinions. What is more unusual, however, is to have the same court perform both an adjudicative and an advisory function.

References resemble cases in a few ways. Like cases, references involve questions about the law, put to law’s primary arbiters: courts. References display the procedural trappings of litigation. They feature participants, materials, oral advocacy and written reasons provided by judges. And when the body of references is compared to the body of cases, it can be very difficult to tell them apart . . .

In at least two respects, though, references and cases are distinct. First, references do not involve a “plaintiff” in the ordinary meaning of that term. In Canada, a reference is virtually always initiated by the government, but in doing so it does not make a legal claim against anyone else. It simply puts questions to a court for an answer. . . . Of course, the government typically offers arguments to assist a court in arriving at an answer and, indeed, often has a clear opinion on what the answer to the questions it has posed should be. And that opinion will tend to correspond with what the government perceives to be in its legal or political interest. Certainly, the actor who initiates a reference is expected to make submissions to the court. But even if it does not, the proceeding can continue. That fact marks a sharp difference from cases. If, in an ordinary case, a plaintiff refused to take a position on one or more of the issues, the opposing party (respondent) almost certainly would prevail. The same does not necessarily apply to references. I say “not necessarily” because if the initiating government declines to offer any argument on a question, the court may, in turn, decline to provide an answer. But, especially in proceedings where the court has agreed to receive submissions from additional participants, such as other Attorneys General or advocacy groups, the court might well decide to answer the question anyway.

Another distinction between references and cases has to do with the status, in law, of the answers that each proceeding provides. When a court decides a case, it issues a judgment, which binds the parties, and also, in certain instances, binds other courts in how they decide cases—and thus it may be said that it binds generally.

References do not engage the court’s power in the same way. The court provides an answer but that answer does not take the form of a judgment. The reference, supposedly, is not backed by the power of law and the court is not entitled to directly impose consequences on parties. That does not mean, of course, that references have no practical consequences. ... [T]hey do have consequences, sometimes highly significant ones. But the consequences are considered to be ancillary or collateral to what the court has done. This distinction is often expressed as the idea that references are not legally binding.

Think of the decisions you have encountered throughout this book. How many have been references? Were you even aware of that fact as you were reading them?

Legislation in each province empowers the provincial cabinet to initiate references to its court of appeal (and in the case of British Columbia, to the Superior Court). Appeals from the appellate court rulings in reference cases are allowed as of right—without seeking permission—to the Supreme Court of Canada.

The reference procedure departs from the common law requirement that courts consider legal issues in the context of concrete disputes between interested parties who are best situated to make the most pertinent arguments and present the relevant facts. For this reason, art III of the US Constitution requires a “case or controversy” for the Supreme Court to hear a case. However, advisory jurisdiction akin to the Canadian arrangements is a common feature of modern constitutions.

To its detractors, the reference procedure politicizes the judiciary by requiring consideration of hypothetical issues. However, references are often mounted to formalize, expedite, or consolidate proceedings raising the same or similar challenges. In these instances, the issue may be so important that the provincial or federal government in question wants to have carriage of the case or to shift the cost from private parties to the state. In addition, the reference procedure affords a variety of ways to bring the factual nexus to the courts.

The reference procedure provides a relatively quick mechanism for obtaining a definitive answer on a question of constitutional validity because it bypasses the trial level proceeding. The government that has carriage of the case can ensure expeditious preparation when the importance of the case warrants. In some cases, the reference procedure is invoked to obtain a determination of validity before a particular piece of legislation comes into force in order to avoid the complications and costs of reliance on an unconstitutional law.

References produce advisory opinions that do not carry the precedential weight of decisions made in the context of ordinary litigation. In practice, however, references are considered as authoritative as other court judgments. Perhaps the strongest indication of the important role of the reference procedure is the fact that references have not only been numerous, but many have delineated significant areas of constitutional theory and doctrine.

The Supreme Court has on occasion refused to answer a reference question—for example, where the question lacks sufficient legal content, where it is ambiguous or imprecise, or where the information submitted to the court is inadequate. An example is Reference re Same-Sex Marriage, 2004 SCC 79. The Reference arose when, instead of appealing a series of losses in provincial appellate courts to the Supreme Court, the federal Executive converted the matter into a reference. At paras 61 to 71, the Court refused to answer the final question: whether an opposite-sex requirement for marriage was consistent with the Charter. The Court set out a “unique combination of factors” (at para 71) supporting its refusal. The same-sex couples who had initiated the litigation in the provincial courts had secured declarations of their entitlement to marry. They had relied on the finality of the lower court judgments and acquired rights entitled to protection when they entered into marriages on the basis of these rulings. Any certainty in the matter would depend on the Court confirming those lower court rulings. An advisory opinion to the contrary would not dislodge those rights but would undermine them unfairly. In addition, answering this question would not ensure uniformity of provincial law on the question. Further, the Court clearly believed that it was inappropriate for the federal government to bring this reference question to the Court when it had not taken the opportunity to appeal the constitutional question to the Supreme Court for a legal determination after it lost at the appellate court level.

Professor Mathen writes:

In examining the Supreme Court’s assertion that it may refuse to answer a reference question, several points are noteworthy. The first point is that the stated reasons for refusal constitute, for all intents and purposes, a doctrine of “reference justiciability.” Mootness, prematurity, insufficient factual context, lack of specificity—all of these reasons constrain the courts’ intervention in issues that do not correspond to the limits, integral to the separation of powers, that are imposed on the court in view of their role as legal arbiters. Thus, reference justiciability plausibly demonstrates an intention by the Court to retain first and foremost a legal role. [Mathen’s second point, discussing references where the Court asserted the ability to refuse while nonetheless answering the question, is omitted.]

The third point is the most striking. The Court has never explained the source of its discretion. Nor has it reconciled such refusals with the plain, mandatory language of its enabling statute. Section 53(4) of the Supreme Court Act proclaims, inter alia, that “it is the duty of the Court to hear and consider it and to answer each question so referred, and the Court shall certify to the Governor in Council, for his information, its opinion on each question[.]” ... Yet, the Court has never mentioned that aspect of its reference function.

At times, the omission seems deliberate. For example, in the Same-Sex Marriage Reference, the Court “reproduced and interpreted the first three subsections of section 53 of the Supreme Court Act which detail the authority of the Governor General in Council to refer questions to the Court” but did not mention “the fourth subsection detailing the Court’s duty on a reference.” One would have thought that final subsection particularly material to the Court’s decision to decline to answer Question 4.

What can explain such a pattern?

It may be that even though section 53(4) of the Supreme Court Act squarely articulates a “duty,” the Court does not feel that the language is material. It may be that no one has ever put the question squarely to the Court. Or, it may be that the Court believes that it is operating in a different register—one where its institutional and functional independence supersedes any countervailing directive from another branch.

The latter point seems the most likely. That is, the Court has never explicitly considered the obligation framed in section 53(4) because the Court does not consider it relevant to its current context, a context that, at least in part, presumes that its institutional independence must prevail.

The Supreme Court functions as the chief constitutional arbiter and the primary interpreter of its norms; and it enjoys independence from the other branches. Any doubts about that independence appear to have been laid to rest by the 2014 Supreme Court Act Reference [where] the Court stated that it is no longer a creature of statute that can be repealed at Parliament's command. ...

The Supreme Court Act Reference arose because of a question about the eligibility requirements for judges appointed to the Court. But to the extent that the Court's conclusion rests on the need to maintain its status as an independent arbiter, it might well resist an expectation to answer a reference question it views as inappropriate. ...

Thus, the unwritten constitutional principle of judicial independence, articulated as an aspect of the separation of powers, best explains the Court's repeated insistence that it can not be compelled to answer any reference question the executive chooses to put before it. The doctrine insulates the Court from being in a truly subordinate position to the executive, and provides a check of sorts on the latter. This is not, of course, to say that refusal doctrine is a cure-all for the political consequences of the advisory function. But it is an important part of the fuller picture of executive–judicial relations when an advisory function is in play.

B. ORDINARY LITIGATION RULES

1. Standing

The rules of standing determine who has a sufficient interest in a legal issue to raise it before a court. Historically, common law standing rules required that a law directly affect an individual's own interests in a way that is different from the law's impact on the public at large (the "special-prejudice" test). Such rules were intended to prevent "officious intermeddlers" from clogging the courts, as well as to ensure a concrete factual context for the adjudication of disputes. The traditional common law rules of standing are typically satisfied where a law is being challenged on federalism or Charter grounds in the course of ongoing legal proceedings. This, however, is not necessarily the case where an independent action is commenced seeking a declaration that a law is unconstitutional, and it is in that context that the issue of standing generally arises. For further discussion of some of the complexities of standing in Charter cases, see Chapter 25, Enforcement of Rights.

The traditional common law rules of standing precluded private citizens from bringing constitutional challenges in the public interest because that role was the exclusive domain of the attorney general, at the federal or provincial level, as the chief law officer of the Crown. But in a series of cases, the Supreme Court of Canada significantly broadened the rules of standing in constitutional cases, creating a new category of "public interest standing" to be granted at the discretion of the courts: see Thorson v Attorney General of Canada, [1975] 1 SCR 138, 1974 CanLII 6; Nova Scotia Board of Censors v McNeil, [1976] 2 SCR 265, 1975 CanLII 14; Minister of Justice of Canada v Borowski, [1981] 2 SCR 575, 1981 CanLII 34. These cases recognized the special significance of constitutional issues and the private citizen's interest in ensuring that governments act within constitutional bounds. A fourth case, Finlay v Minister of Finance of Canada, [1986] 2 SCR 607, 1986 CanLII 6, extended the rules for public interest standing to non-constitutional, public law issues.

Until 2012, the test that was applied to determine public interest standing was that summarized by Martland J writing for the majority in Borowski (at 598):

[T]o establish status as a plaintiff in a suit seeking a declaration that legislation is invalid, if there is a serious issue as to its invalidity, a person need only to show that he is affected by it directly or that he has a genuine interest as a citizen in the validity of the legislation and that there is no other reasonable and effective manner in which the issue may be brought before the Court.

In Canadian Council of Churches v Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), [1992] 1 SCR 236, 1992 CanLII 116, the Court applied the test for public interest standing to a public interest group challenging a number of provisions contained in the new Immigration Act, which had not yet come into force. Stringently applying the third part of the test, the Court determined that there was ample opportunity for refugee claimants to challenge the various provisions, and it refused standing to the group, which had demonstrated a strong commitment to fairness in the immigration and refugee process. The Court expressed concern that the interest group's challenge was too expansive and that it would lack factual underpinning as to the actual operation of the provisions in question.

However, in Canada (AG) v Downtown Eastside Sex Workers United Against Violence Society, 2012 SCC 45, the Supreme Court of Canada, in a unanimous decision authored by Cromwell J, reformulated the test for public interest standing, softening the third part of the test and more generally allowing for greater discretion and flexibility:

[1] The law of standing answers the question of who is entitled to bring a case to court for a decision. Of course it would be intolerable if everyone had standing to sue for everything, no matter how limited a personal stake they had in the matter. Limitations on standing are necessary in order to ensure that courts do not become hopelessly overburdened with marginal or redundant cases, to screen out the mere "busybody" litigant, to ensure that courts have the benefit of contending points of view of those most directly affected and to ensure that courts play their proper role within our democratic system of government The traditional approach was to limit standing to persons whose private rights were at stake or who were specially affected by the issue. In public law cases, however, Canadian courts have relaxed these limitations on standing and have taken a flexible, discretionary approach to public interest standing, guided by the purposes which underlie the traditional limitations.

[2] In exercising their discretion with respect to standing, the courts weigh three factors in light of these underlying purposes and of the particular circumstances. The courts consider whether the case raises a serious justiciable issue, whether the party bringing the action has a real stake or a genuine interest in its outcome and whether, having regard to a number of factors, the proposed suit is a reasonable and effective means to bring the case to court The courts exercise this discretion to grant or refuse standing in a "liberal and generous manner"

[20] ... [T]he three elements identified in Borowski are interrelated factors that must be weighed in exercising judicial discretion to grant or deny standing. These factors, and especially the third one, should not be treated as hard and fast requirements or free-standing, independently operating tests. Rather, they should be assessed and weighed cumulatively, in light of the underlying purposes of limiting standing and applied in a flexible and generous manner that best serves those underlying purposes.

On the facts of the case, the Court granted public interest standing to an organization (the Society) devoted to improving the working conditions of sex workers living in Vancouver's downtown eastside that wanted to bring a comprehensive challenge to the prostitution provisions in the Criminal Code. In applying the third part of the test, the fact that there were other possible ways of bringing these issues before the courts was not determinative. The Court took into account the practical reality that it was unlikely that persons charged under the prostitution provisions would bring a claim similar to the Society's and that the inherent unpredictability of criminal trials would make it difficult for a party to raise the kind of challenge raised by the Society. The existence of a civil case in another province raising some of the same issues was likewise not found to be determinative.

2. Notice Requirements

Governments have an interest in defending constitutional challenges to their legislation. The early case of Russell v The Queen (1882), 7 App Cas 829, 51 LJPC 77 (UKJCPC) (found in Chapter 4, The Late Nineteenth Century: The Courts Set an Initial Course) is often cited as an example of a significant constitutional decision made with no governmental participation. In response to this concern, constitutional notice requirements have been in place since the late 19th century. These stipulations, included in legislation dealing with the rules of litigation practice, require litigants to notify the affected attorneys general of any constitutional issues raised in the courts.

If the attorney general is already a party to the litigation, the notice provisions serve to provide the details of the particular constitutional claim and the time and place for the hearing. If the issue arises in private litigation, the notice provisions provide this information as well as the opportunity to participate in the litigation as intervenors, who may make written and oral submissions on the constitutional issues and have carriage of any appeal. If the intervention takes place at the trial level, the intervening attorney general may be permitted to submit evidence as well. (The general arrangement for non-governmental intervention is discussed further below.)

In each province, constitutional notice requirements apply to provincially administered courts and, in some cases, administrative boards and tribunals as well. Although the provincial legislation varies, the general approach is to require litigants raising a constitutional issue to notify the federal attorney general and the attorney general of the province in question.

For constitutional cases reaching the Supreme Court of Canada on appeal, the appellant must file a notice of constitutional question and serve it on any attorney general not already a party to the appeal: see ss 33(2)-(4) of the Rules of the Supreme Court of Canada, SOR/2002-156:

(2) In the case of an appeal that raises an issue in respect of the constitutional validity or applicability of a statute, regulation or common law rule, or the inoperability of a statute or regulation, a notice of constitutional question in Form 33B shall be filed by the appellant, as a schedule to the notice of appeal, or by the respondent, if the issue has been raised by the respondent, within 30 days after leave to appeal has been granted or after the filing of the notice of appeal in respect of an appeal for which leave is not required.

(3) On the same day as the notice of constitutional question is filed, a copy of it shall be served by email on all other parties to the appeal and on any attorney general who is not already a party to the appeal together with hyperlinks to

- (a) the judgment granting the application for leave to appeal and the reasons for judgment of the court appealed from;
- (b) the legislative provisions at issue; and
- (c) if applicable, the relevant provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and any other legislative provision relied on by the party.

(4) Within four weeks after the service of a notice of constitutional question, an attorney general who intends to participate in the appeal shall serve on all other parties and file with the Registrar a notice of intervention in Form 33C without being required to obtain leave to intervene.

3. Parties and Intervenors

Constitutional issues often affect the interests of a wide range of persons and groups. Apart from constitutional references, which envision broad participation by interested and affected parties, participation in constitutional litigation is, as a starting point, confined to the parties to the litigation. In cases where a private party has commenced a court proceeding to directly challenge a piece of legislation (or a regulation promulgated under statute or an executive order), the attorney general, or another cabinet minister or government official or body, will be the respondent. As noted above, when an attorney general intervenes in litigation between private parties pursuant to a notice of constitutional question, they take on the status of intervenor and may make written or oral submissions on the constitutional issues.

Other interested and affected persons and groups may apply to the Court to be allowed to participate as intervenors under the applicable procedural rules. At the Supreme Court of Canada, for example, intervention is governed by ss 55-59 of the Rules of the Supreme Court of Canada. Section 55 provides: "Any person interested in an application for leave to appeal, an appeal or a reference may make a motion for intervention to a judge." The judge, in granting intervention, may "impose any terms and conditions and grant any rights and privileges that the judge may determine, including whether the intervener is entitled to adduce further evidence or otherwise to supplement the record" (s 59(b)). The intervenor is not allowed to present oral argument, unless authorized by the judge as per s 59(2), nor can the intervenor introduce new issues unless ordered by the judge as per s 59(3). Since the adoption of the Charter, intervention by public interest groups has become a common feature of constitutional litigation. In some instances, cases have attracted a large number of intervenors.

Where constitutional issues arise in the course of private litigation or in the context of a criminal or penal prosecution, a request for intervention requires the Court to balance a variety of considerations. These include, on one hand, concerns about unfairness to the parties or the accused, the cost to all participants of additional participants, and any delay in resolving the specific dispute. On the other hand, the Court will consider the potential usefulness of the intervenor's contribution to full consideration of the constitutional issue. In reference cases, where private interests are not exclusively at stake, intervention raises fewer concerns. The courts may nonetheless place some limits on the number of intervenors to avoid repetition and irrelevancy, or require intervenors to work together on their submissions.

I. INTRODUCTION

We are witnessing a reconfiguration of the Canadian federation through the Supreme Court of Canada's case law on Indigenous issues. In the process, the Court is recasting the country's constituent actors in profound yet uncertain ways. This includes questions about the place of Indigenous nations in the constitutional sphere. It opens space for considering Indigenous legal traditions within and beyond Canadian law. As the constitution expands, the Court has difficulty extending their opinions to their limit. In true common law fashion, it sleepwalks along diverse paths, "theorizing" as it goes, since cases appear as seemingly isolated incidents.

Constitutional law's reconfiguration should prompt us to make explicit the varied epistemological and ontological understandings of law (in general) and constitutional law (in particular). In studying constitutional law, we rarely refer to our implicit epistemological assumptions, which concern how we know what "law" is, and the basis for asserting that something is indeed law. Moreover, we do not consider questions about law's ontology, which involves the elements that make up such "law." This is generally true for both Indigenous and non-Indigenous peoples.

The failure to explicitly identify our assumptions about the very idea of "constitution" and "law" prevents us from considering the fragility of all knowledge, including legal knowledge. As a result, we do not see that concepts such as constitutions and law are always abstract reifications of what is "out there." When we do not see that conceptual constructs about law are mere hypotheses, unfortunately, we have difficulty evaluating the strengths and weaknesses of these concepts. Freedom to question what flows from our assumptions is diminished when we fail to understand what underlies them. For instance, as one author underlined, by equating law with inanimate abstract norms, by conceiving the concept of law as a noun rather than a as verb—that is, as a hierarchy of rules rather than, in the words of Lon L. Fuller, “a complex syste[m] of order that came into existence, not by a single act of creation, but through the cumulative effect of countless purposive directions of human effort”—we fail to grasp the relational character of law and constitutional law. By doing so, we lose sight of the human interactions hidden under the veil of notions such as “autonomy and rights,” “aboriginal title,” “sovereignty,” “peoples,” and “nation,” etc.”

See Jean Leclair, “Invisibility, Wilful Blindness and Impending Doom: The Future (If Any) of Canadian Federalism” in C Hughes Tuohy et al, eds, Policy Transformation in Canada: Is the Past Prologue? (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2019) 106 at 107.

This insight suggests that a study of constitutional law should draw attention to its various conceptual assumptions.

In this book thus far, you have been introduced to many views about law in general and constitutional law in particular. With the revitalization of Indigenous legal traditions, Canadian constitutional law is being shaken by the advent of different ways of conceiving and creating law. The law is also changing because Indigenous actors are asserting their right to be recognized as this nation’s founders and first polities. As old ideas are challenged, new perspectives are introduced. All the while, the Court attempts to metabolize these changes without jettisoning its settled legal categories. This is a difficult task, and this chapter will reveal where fractures, gaps, and inconsistencies have arisen in the jurisprudence. These challenges are apparent even as constructive opportunities arise from the Court’s jurisprudence.

Thus, this chapter asks you to consider whether Canada’s constitution will recognize the incontrovertible reality of Indigenous difference. This raises further questions about how we will conceptualize the relevant legal actors in Canada’s federation. It should cause us to ask: what is our federal ontology? One implication of the resurgence of Indigenous law and the rise of Indigenous constitutionalism is that the country can no longer be simply thought of as a set of “equal provinces” or of “two nations.” Canada is also filled with Indigenous nations. In the process of considering Indigenous differences, this opens questions about the place of other groups in our society. Moreover, we will ask you to consider whether Canada’s constitutional ontology only allows for groups. In turn, we also ask: are these nations made up of culturally homogenous and unanimous members? Too often, that is how we refer to the Quebec nation or the Rest of Canada (ROC). Will this be the case for Indigenous nations? Or can they be more than racialized ethnicities or groups? Can they exercise political and legal power as nations filled with complex lineages, identities, backgrounds, and ideas? In short, this chapter asks you to consider the relationship of Canada’s Indigenous constitution to Canada’s colonial constitution.

These ontological questions are normative—they are used to evaluate Canada’s constitution and make judgments about its legitimacy and legality. They raise questions about whether we will imagine constitutional law in terms of exclusivity and/or otherness, or in terms of “double aspect” and interrelatedness. This leads to issues about what institutional shapes the interpretation of Canada’s constitution creates. Is the Supreme Court helping us to imagine a polity where Indigenous communities are endowed with inherent powers, or one where they are defined according to an asphyxiated understanding of cultural distinctiveness?

The above questions highlight one of this chapter’s objectives, which is to provide an introductory picture of the multiple bases of legitimacy upon which Canada’s constitutional system rests. You will see that the ongoing contact and relationship between Indigenous and state legal systems call for nuanced approaches. We invite you to read this chapter with Nigerian author Chimamanda Ngozi’s caution: “Beware the danger of a single story” (Chimamanda Ngozi, “The Danger of a Single Story” (2009), online (video): Ted.com

<https://www.ted.com/talks/chimamanda_adichie_the_danger_of_a_single_story/transcript?language=en>.

As an introductory point, one of the ways complexity is revealed in understanding Indigenous peoples' interaction with the constitution is through their diversity.

There are over one-and-a-half million people of Indigenous ancestry in Canada today. They represent almost 5 percent of Canada's population. They are members of Indigenous nations that existed before the arrival of the French, British, and other early settlers who initiated the Dominion of Canada. The term "Aboriginal" conceals the great diversity among peoples descended from those who lived in North America prior to the arrival of Europeans. Indigenous peoples are distinguished from one another by different social, cultural, economic, political, and spiritual traditions. Their languages may be as different from one another as English is to Mandarin, or as Hindi is to Hawaiian. Indigenous peoples in Canada are divided into 11 distinct language families and are further separated into 50 different linguistic groupings. In British Columbia, where six of the language families are located, these differences are often found merely by crossing from one mountain valley into the next.

Despite the diversity that exists among the first peoples of Canada, the text of s 35(2) of the Constitution Act, 1982 makes only three distinctions among Aboriginal peoples (as Indigenous peoples are labelled in that text): the Indian, Inuit, and Métis. While courts have been somewhat sensitive to the greater multiplicity of Indigenous groups than this section may suggest, the terms Indian, Inuit, and Métis continue to form the predominant classification to describe differences among Indigenous peoples.

The federal government has maintained the term "Indian" as a category to recognize certain Indigenous people as holding status under its Indian Act, RSC 1985, c I-5. Thus, the term continues to have legal relevancy, as Indian status entitles its holder to a specific set of rights and obligations set out in treaties, legislation, and other government policies and programs. In 2019 there were 1,008,955 registered status Indians in Canada. This number had grown from 670,000 in 2000. First Nations people who are not registered by the government under federal procedures are referred to as non-status Indians. They constitute approximately 14 percent of the Indigenous population in Canada.

The Inuit are the Indigenous peoples of the circumpolar north. Historically known and misnamed as the Eskimo, they are divided between Alaska, Russia, Greenland, and Canada. Inuit people speak Inuktitut (although there are about 20 different dialects), and they number over 60,000 people in 53 Canadian communities. Most of the Inuit in Canada are found in the Northwest Territories, Quebec, Labrador, and Nunavut, the latter territory being formed in 1999 as a result of a land claim agreement with the Inuit of the eastern Arctic. There is no federal Inuit registry, and thus the status/non-status distinction does not exist in this group.

There are over 587,000 Métis people in Canada. The origins of the Métis peoples are entwined with the historical fabric of Canada. It was in the territory west of the Ottawa valley and the Great Lakes that they first evolved into a new and distinct grouping that eventually affected Indigenous rights in Canada. The Métis originally formed as the result of 19th-century unions between male fur traders and primarily Indigenous women on the Canadian plains; this population of mixed ancestry forged a common cultural, political, and ethnic identity. This shared identity led to the creation of the Métis nation that negotiated and fought for recognition when Manitoba and parts of the old North-Western Territory were being ushered into Confederation. Although the Métis under Louis Riel achieved some limited success in causing Canada to take account of their rights, for most of the country's history, numerous federal administrations treated the group as if they had no distinct rights. For example, the federal government acted as though it had no obligations to the Métis, and largely presumed that they would be assimilated into the general population. Other groups have arisen to claim Métis rights throughout the country as Indigenous people from different regions of the country married non-native traders and created distinct political and cultural identities that have legal significance for Aboriginal rights today.

II. INDIGENOUS CONSTITUTIONALISM

John Borrows, "Indigenous Constitutionalism: Pre-existing Legal Genealogies in Canada"

in Nathalie Des Rosiers, Patrick Macklem & Peter Oliver, eds, The Oxford Handbook of the Canadian Constitution (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2017) ch 2 at 13

The territory we now call Canada has a rich, varied, and ancient legal history. Prior to European arrival Indigenous peoples regulated their affairs and addressed their disputes by reference to a vast array of laws, practices, customs, and traditions. Although (like every human society) they did not always abide by their highest values they nevertheless had recognizable sources of authority which guided their governance and collective decision-making. Indigenous peoples "constituted" their societies in different ways—through, inter alia, Confederacies, House-structures, Leagues, Chieftainships, Tribes, Bands, and extended kin-based groupings. These structures facilitated world views which enhanced relationships of peace, friendship, and respect. At the same time, they were not always successful in cultivating goodwill. War, conflict, and social disorder were painful and periodic facts of life, as is the case with all peoples. Indigenous constitutional law prior to European arrival was complex. It produced tremendous innovations in human care and sustainable land use while struggling to deal with humanity's inevitable limitations.

Like all legal systems, Indigenous constitutional structures were entangled with their broader life ways. Furthermore, these structures were fluid and changed through time. They shifted, transformed, or retrenched in accordance with the ebb and flow of political, economic, and social considerations at play across the continent. Long and complicated legal genealogies preceded European arrival in North America. Indigenous constitutional arrangements continued to develop after Europeans contact too. In fact, Indigenous legal orders renew themselves even in the present day. All living traditions must adapt and change in order to stay relevant amidst changing circumstances. The presence of law is a necessary but not sufficient condition for securing any society's health, stability, and vitality. Law must always be seen in its broader light to understand it can never be an autonomous source of power. This is as true in a historical context as it is in the present day. Law draws upon wider social networks even as it simultaneously constitutes those relationships.

One example of Indigenous constitutionalism can be found amongst the Anishinaabe of central and western Canada. Anishinaabe people are the second largest Indigenous people in Canada, and the fourth largest Indigenous nation in the United States, after the Navajo, Cherokee and Lakota nations. They live within the Great Lakes watershed, surrounding large parts Lakes Superior, Huron and Michigan, and occupying the farmlands and woodlands north of Lake Ontario and Lake Erie. They are found in Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, and even have small communities in Alberta and British Columbia. They also have reservations in the forests and prairies of northern Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota and North Dakota. Historically, the Anishinaabe were organized as clans in a loose confederacy more recently called the Council of the Three Fires. People from these groups collectively refer to themselves as the Anishinaabe, meaning "people" or "good people," though there are many possible interpretations of their name. Despite these labels they may be more easily recognized as the Odawa, Potawatomi, and Ojibwe people. Many still live in mixed "Three Fires" communities in their ancient homelands, while others have spread throughout the continent living in cities, towns and villages throughout the United States and Canada.

[The following is excerpted from Aaron Mills, Karen Drake & Tanya Muthusamipillai, "An Anishinaabe Constitutional Order" in the Honourable Justice Patrick Smith, ed, Reconciliation in Canadian Courts: A Guide for Judges to Aboriginal and Indigenous Law, Context and Practice (Ottawa: National Judicial Institute, 2017) 260.]

Anishinaabe epistemology corresponds to an Anishinaabe conception of truth. Basil Johnston explains that the Anishinaabemowin phrase, "w'dae'b'awae" means "he or she is telling the truth, is correct, is right." But the truth referred to in this phrase is not absolute; it is a qualified truth, one that is circumscribed by the speaker's experience, perception, and command of language at that time. What one knows is a result of one's own lived experience and active personal engagement, and so is always bounded by the limits of that experience. This conception helps to explain why an elder will so often say that she or he does not know much at all. Such statements are incongruous from within a western epistemology, according to which Anishinaabe elders are authorities on Anishinaabe traditions. But as Leanne Simpson explains, "you'll always hear from our Elders what appears to be them 'qualifying' their teachings with statements that position them as learners, that position their ideas as their own understandings, and place their teachings within the context of their own lived experience." ...

Aadizookaanan and an Anishinaabe Constitutional Order

The following three Aadizookaanan, or stories, reflect an Anishinaabe constitutional order, which in turn give rise to Anishinaabe legal processes, which in turn give rise to Anishinaabe law. Our analyses of the first two stories highlight the tripartite framework of an Anishinaabe constitutional order. Our analysis of the third story identifies a key principle of Anishinaabe constitutionalism: the democratic principle. Insofar as Anishinaabe Aadizookaanan reflect constitutional and legal principles, it may be tempting to treat them as analogous to Canadian judicial decisions. However, Anishinaabe Aadizookaanan differ from judicial decisions in at least the following four ways. First, although Aadizookaanan reflect constitutional and legal principles, they are not authorities for law in the way that judicial decisions are authorities for common law principles. That is, Aadizookaanan are not the source of the law. Rather, the source may be some interaction within the natural world or the actions of community members which give rise to a consensus regarding the principle at issue.

Second, judicial decisions are meant to be fully comprehensible on a first reading, at least to those with the requisite training. Stories, in contrast, are often understood in a layered way. The different layers of meaning within a story can provide guidance that varies from person to person or even within the life of one and the same person, depending on his or her life experiences each time the story is heard. In other words, stories do not embody an objective, absolute truth; they require a listener or reader to be actively engaged in meaning-making. Our analysis of the following three stories reflects our understandings, based on our own experiences to date. ...

Third and most important, case law abstracts law from facts, intending that law should apply across all contexts. That is to say, case law—like all other sources of law in the common law tradition—presents law as rules: rights and reciprocal obligations standardized within a common citizenship. Aadizookaanan, on the contrary, present law as responsibilities: gifts and reciprocal needs that vary across distinct kinds of relationships. The law that lives in an Anishinaabe story is specific to its relational context; it cannot be disembedded, generalized, and transplanted elsewhere.

Finally (and directly connected to the third point), judicial decisions require a narrow kind of reason which reflects a liberal conception of rationality: we are—at law at least—primarily, thinking agents. Working effectively with case law requires finely honed critical and analytical thinking skills. Reasoning in the context of Anishinaabe law frequently makes demands upon one's whole self: body, mind, spirit, and heart. "Reasoning" has less to do with an anthropocentric form of rationality, and more to do with the provision of reasons.

a) The Vision of Kitche Manitou

The following account is drawn from Basil Johnston's version of "The Vision of Kitche Manitou." It begins with a poem in which people ask elders: Who gave each creature his or her gift? For example, who gave the rose the gift of beauty? Who gave the bear the gift of a sense of timing? Who gave me my vision? Finally, the narrator asks:

Who gave to us
The gifts we do not own
But borrow and pass on?

Johnston then provides a prose account of the earth's creation. Kitche Manitou, the Great Spirit, had a vision of all things. Kitche Manitou dreamt of a sky, sun, and moon, of mountains and forests, of flowers and vegetables, of crawling, flying, and swimming beings. Kitche Manitou also saw the birth and end of things, feeling wind and rain, and experiencing sadness and love. In these experiences Kitche Manitou realized that these experiences had to be brought into being. One by one, being by being, Kitche Manitou brought the world into existence. Out of nothing Kitche Manitou made rock, water, fire, and wind and gave each a unique power that became its soul-spirit. From these four substances, Kitche Manitou created the sun, stars, moon, and earth. From water, to wind, to air, from mountains, valleys, islands, and rivers, from plant beings to animal beings, Kitche Manitou gave each a unique power and nature. Last of all, Kitche Manitou created humankind. Humans were the least in the order of dependence, and weakest in bodily powers, but humanity had the greatest gift: the power to dream. Then, Kitche Manitou "made The Great Laws of Nature for the well being and harmony of all things and all creatures." The Great Laws of Nature governed all of the activity of the natural world, including "the place and movement of sun, moon, earth and stars; ... the powers of wind, water, fire, and rock; ... the rhythm and continuity of lift, birth, growth, and decay." Kitche Manitou's vision was brought into existence.

This story reflects the tripartite structure of Anishinaabe constitutionalism. The first constitutional feature revealed is the ontological condition of interdependence. ... [Remember that ontology considers concepts such as existence, being, becoming, and reality and includes how entities are grouped into basic categories.] Humans are not dominant over the natural world. Humans are "last in the order of creation, least in the order of dependence, and weakest in bodily powers." If all animals and plants ceased to exist, humans could not survive. Of all parts of the natural world, we are the most dependent. But our relationship with the rest of the natural world is more accurately described not merely as one of dependence, but of interdependence. We need each other, and this is why we were given gifts to pass on.

The second constitutional feature pertains to our gifts: it is the relational logic of mutual aid. ... Each being has its own gift. The gifts of the rose, the bear, humans, and others are described in the poem. Kitche Manitou conferred a special power and nature—or in other words, a gift—on each and every aspect of the natural world, including rocks, water, fire, and wind. There is a legal word for this sacred gifting in Anishinaabemowin: we say "miinigowiziwin." It refers to the fact that Kitche Manitou has gifted all of creation with what we need to have a good life together. As such, these are gifts "we do not own/But borrow and pass on." In other words, our gifts are not ours to profit from; we are not to use them to benefit only ourselves. We pass them on; that is, we must give our gifts away. In another of Basil Johnston's stories, a boy named Southwind says to his grandmother, "No'okomiss, the flower gift that I received; it was really meant for you, wasn't it?" She replies: "In a way it is. But it was meant for everybody. But that's the way all human gifts are." It is the connection developed from the constant flow of gifts meeting one another's needs that coordinates interaction and sustains community cohesion, not the formal and detached bindingness of a social contract.

The third constitutional feature pertains to the ends towards which political community is oriented: harmony. ... The natural world, in its natural state, is not chaotic and lawless. There is no state of nature in the sense of an original, disordered position from which we escape by entering into a social contract to create a civil society where we impose human-made laws on each other. On the contrary, all aspects of the natural world are already imbued with law—The Great Laws of Nature—and are ordered. These laws govern all aspects of the natural world, including human life. When these laws are followed, the result is harmony. Importantly—and this is a critical distinction—"harmony" does not mean "non-conflict," but rather "non-disconnection." It is a state of shared openness to the gifts and needs of self and of other.

b) The Great Law

The following account of "The Great Law" is drawn from the version orated by Randy Councillor and recorded and revised by Art Przybilla. Rabbit usually ate a wide variety of plants and as a result did not overtax any one species of plant. But one summer the roses were especially delicious, and so Rabbit ate nothing but roses. Roses eventually became scarce and as a result Bee was unable to make as much honey as usual. Bee did not know the cause of the rose shortage, and frequently lamented the problem to all of the other animals. The other animals lost patience with Bee's complaints and ignored him.

Hummingbird, though, listened to Bee and to determine the extent of the issue, went on a search for roses. After searching widely but finding no roses, Hummingbird and Bee called a Great Council of all the animals. Even at the Great Council, the other animals did not listen to Bee, until Bear realized and explained that the lack of roses meant that he would not have enough honey for winter, and would have to eat some of the other animals instead. The other animals then became concerned that they might be eaten by Bear or, like Fox, have to compete with Bear for food.

The birds then flew to the four directions of the earth in search of roses. All were unsuccessful except Hummingbird who returned with a single half-dead Rose. The animals used all of their combined knowledge to nurse Rose back to health. When she was strong enough to talk, the animals asked what had happened and Rose explained that Rabbit had eaten all of the roses except for her. Bear was so angry that he yanked Rabbit by the ears, which then became stretched. Bear eventually tossed Rabbit into the angry crowd and told them to kill Rabbit. But Rose told them to stop. Rose explained that all of the animals were at fault—even Bear—as they failed to listen to Bee when Bee first told them about the issue. In fact, the animals had broken the greatest of all the Great Laws, namely, the one that "tells us that all living things must watch over all other living things and Mother Earth." And so Rabbit's ears remained stretched to remind all to listen, and roses received thorns to keep them safe from rabbits.

This story again illustrates the tripartite structure of Anishinaabe constitutionalism. However unlike the last story, this one identifies the three core constitutional features through the stacking errors of the animals in the story. It requires the reader to engage with it in a slightly different way, and to reason for oneself. It also introduces several Anishinaabe constitutional principles (which, recall, are not about rules, but rather how to orient oneself in relationship); we address only one of these here: the democratic principle. With respect to the first structural feature of Anishinaabe constitutionalism—interdependence—each of the animals lost sight of the fact that it is in a relationship of interdependence with the others. Rabbit failed to appreciate how his eating all of the roses would affect Bee’s ability to make honey, which would affect Bear’s diet, which in turn would affect other animals who might then be eaten by Bear or have to compete with Bear for food. The other animals also failed to appreciate this interdependence when they ignored Bee’s initial complaints.

With respect to the second structural feature of Anishinaabe constitutionalism—mutual aid—the majority of animals declined to render aid, opting out of the mutual aid framework which involves a cycle of (i) gifting, which generates (ii) gratitude, which in turn generates (iii) reciprocity, which then generates further (i) gifting, and so on. When the animals initially ignored Bee, they withheld their gifts—such as the birds’ ability to search for roses—which would have helped to meet the needs of all other animals.

With respect to the third structural feature of Anishinaabe constitutionalism—harmony—when the animals opt out of the mutual aid framework, closing themselves off from one another, the result is a sequence of calamity culminating in Rabbit’s ears getting stretched and Rabbit almost being killed. Harmony is finally restored when the animals are reminded of their responsibility to “watch over” each other, which they can fulfill by rendering mutual aid. Rabbit’s stretched ears serve as an ongoing reminder of this responsibility. In this way, the Anishinaabe constitutional order—including interdependence, mutual aid, and harmony—is encoded on the physiognomy of rabbits.

This story also illustrates the democratic principle. Although we use the term “democratic principle,” we mean something closer to participatory democracy, as opposed to representational democracy. Once Bee and Hummingbird realized the extent of the problem, rather than try to address it by themselves, they called a Great Council of all the animals. Each animal used its unique gifts to contribute toward the solution. The birds flew in all directions to find signs of roses and when Rose was found half-dead, they all used their gifts to nurse Rose back to health. No animal was left out of the decision-making process.

c) Beaver Gives a Feast

The following account of “Beaver Gives a Feast” draws from the version recorded in F.G. Speck’s collection. Beaver was the Chief of the animals. From time to time, Beaver decided to give a feast to which he invited all of the other animals. Each time Beaver passed the food to his guests, he also passed wind. This sent silly Otter into hysterics. Other guests cautioned Otter: “You mustn’t laugh when Beaver does that; he is our chief.” But every time Beaver passed wind at one of his feasts, Otter would laugh. Finally, the animals told Otter that he must not attend the next feast. “You must not come; you never keep your mouth shut; you always laugh,” they explained. While Otter obliged, he told the others to ask Beaver to send him his share of the food in the size of Otter’s forearm. Otter has a very small forearm. The others agreed and attended the feast. Beaver noticed that Otter was not among his guests and asked, “Where, indeed, is Otter? I like him because he is so funny.” The people told Beaver that Otter did not come but asked Beaver to send him his share of food. Beaver cut a piece the size of Otter's forearm and sent it back to Otter.

This story further illustrates the democratic principle, mentioned above, which is one principle that flows from the tripartite structure of an Anishinaabe constitutional order. Here, we see how authority works within Anishinaabe political community, namely, through persuasive compliance. ... Beaver is the leader, but he does not exercise coercive authority or use force in a top-down way, as a western sovereign does in the form of the executive branch of government. Instead, authority rests with the community members; it was the community members who told Otter to stay home and the evidence that they truly possess power is that even though Otter enjoyed the feasts, he complied with the direction from the community. The community members have not delegated their authority upward to Beaver, but rather retain it themselves.

Power is diffuse, spread throughout the community, not concentrated in the position of the leader, whose role is rather that of facilitator and coordinator. Although Beaver enjoys Otter's company, Beaver respects the community's decision that Otter is not to attend the feasts. Beaver does not order Otter to attend or overrule the direction of the community. Instead, Beaver exercises persuasive leadership. He organizes and facilitates community gatherings, but does not impose his own will over them. It is Beaver's ability to effectively coordinate interaction within the community—in part via the provision of gifts in the form of holding feasts, and in part because of his demeanour, as evidenced by his attitude to Otter, who laughs at him—that persuades others to heed his judgment. Despite being prohibited from attending the feasts, Otter's need is not overlooked; the community brings him his share of food. Otter only asks for a small portion of food, presumably because that is all he needs. He does not take more than he needs.

An Anishinaabe Constitutional Order

To understand the significance of a constitutional order (whether Anishinaabe or otherwise), it is helpful to understand the relationship between a constitutional order and a society's related institutions. Aaron Mills explains this relationship—in the context of both Indigenous and non-Indigenous societies—using a tree model. The following account of Mills's tree model of legality is reproduced with minor adaptations from his article entitled "The Lifeworlds of Law: On Revitalizing Indigenous Legal Orders Today."

The roots of a society are its lifeworld: the story it tells of creation, which reveals what there is in the world (ontology) and how we can know (epistemology). Creation stories disclose what a person is, what a community is, and what freedom looks like. [Ask yourself, what are Canada's creation stories regarding the nation state?] The trunk is a constitutional order: the structure generated by the roots, which organizes and manifests these understandings as political community. [Ask yourself, what is your view of Canada's constitutional structure?] The branches are our legal traditions, the set of processes and institutions we engage to create, sustain, and unmake law. [Ask yourself, what process and institutions seem necessary to common law traditions, civil law traditions, and Indigenous legal traditions?] The trunk [the constitutional order] conditions the branches [the legal traditions]: it doesn't determine what they'll look like, but it powerfully shapes them. A constitutional order similarly settles which legal processes are legitimate within it, but without ever determining a necessary given set of processes as the legitimate ones. Subject to the conditions the trunk [the constitutional order] will support, legal processes and their institutions may vary considerably in object, scope, and means. Law [particular obligations, duties, entitlements, responsibilities, regulations, resolution of disputes], like leaves, experiences a still higher level of conditioning. It's subject to the branches, which are subject to the trunk, which is subject to what the roots will bear. All are intimately connected but never so tightly as to eliminate difference.

No two trees are the same even if they're both white birch, the same age, and growing right next to one another. Similarly, while two Anishinaabe communities may have nearly identical constitutional structures, they will have laws that differ. Each level of legality within the lifeworld-law relationship is both empowered and constrained by the levels below. Every people is a tree. We tell different stories of creation (even those of us who don't acknowledge doing so or who explicitly disclaim a view of creation) and the story we tell powerfully conditions the constitutional order we bring into being. For all societies, that constitutional order will shape legal processes and institutions, and thus ultimately what we count as law.

This isn't quite the full image, however. Unlike Canada's constitutional image of a "living tree," no tree is actually freestanding. The roots are buried in and wrapped tightly against earth. The tree is grounded in something beyond itself. A "rooted" lifeworld doesn't reflect the spontaneous ideas of those standing within it. Indigenous societies are all different and have unique creation stories. But all are of something common: the earth beneath and all around us. What varies is how we understand it.

John Borrows, Anishinaabe Language and Law

In contemporary debates, the Anishinaabe use the word chi-inaakonige to describe a configuration of a community's constitutional relationships. Chi means great or large and inaakonige means to act on an object through making a judgment, deciding things a certain way, or agreeing on something. Anishinaabe language is 70-80% comprised of verbs. Action is the focus of Anishinaabe constitutionalism. It cannot be compressed into a single concept, nor can it be summarized in a single sentence. For Anishinaabe people, constitutioning is a fluid verb; it is a practice, rather than a fixed noun or idea. This is why it cannot be captured or frozen as one thing. Constitutioning is always in motion; it joins or separates diverse persons, places and things to one another in the wider world. As explained in the above excerpt, Anishinaabe constitutionalism is relational. Since it functions like a verb, it sustains, negates, regulates, inflects, modifies, and/or transforms relationships and states of being through time. Recognizing, respecting and creating space for differences of opinion is of its key functions. Like all other legal traditions, Anishinaabe law flowing from its ongoing constitution is subject to continual revision and modification within its own contexts. It is a living legal tradition.

As with other constitutional traditions there are many manifestations of Anishinaabe law. They can be positivistic and expressed through written constitutions, statutes and regulations. This concept is embodied in the word kinwezhewewm, meaning rules and standards. Anishinaabe law can also flow from deliberation, persuasion, discussion and agreement. Tribal Court decisions in the United States are a prime example of these practices. Anishinaabe law is also formed through analogy, particularly in relation to the environment and physical world. These practices are included in ideas expressed by the word akinomaagewin. For example, Anishinaabe constitutionalism can draw guidance from the respect and deference owed to rocks, plants, and animals which are an important part of most Anishinaabe relationships. Many stories, songs and ceremonies are used to communicate these broader issues. Furthermore, as explained above Anishinaabe constitutionalism also finds support in their broader "creational" teachings, related to who we are and how we should live their lives. The term mino-bimaadiziwin, living-well, is often used to describe and express these aspirations. Anishinaabe people also live by customary laws, called Anishinaabe-izhitwaawinan. These customs are formed through implicit behaviors developed through time, which provide resources for reasoning related to constitutional law.

As noted, some Anishinaabe communities have drafted written constitutions to bolster, highlight and support their unwritten constitutional laws. One example comes from the Anishinabek Nation which is a group of over 43 reserve communities in Ontario. While Anishinaabe clans and other unwritten provisions are at the heart of their constitution, the Anishinaabe Chi-Naaknigewin of the Anishinabek Nation Constitution contains the following clauses: Article 1—Interpretation; In this Law; Article 2—Official Languages of the Anishinabek Nation; Article 3—E'Dbendaagzijig of the Anishinabek Nation; Article 4—Principles of Government Structure of the Anishinabek Nation; Article 5—The Anishinabek Nation Law-Making Powers; Article 6—Anishinabek Nation E'Dbendaagzijig Participation and Consultation; Article 7—Institutions of the Anishinabek Nation Government; Article 8—Relationship of Laws; Article 9—Constitutional Amendment; Article 10—Admission of First Nations to the Anishinabek Nation; Article 11—Withdrawing of First Nations from the Anishinabek Nation

The Preamble to the Chi-Naaknigewin, called Ngo Dwe Waangizid Anishinaabe (One Anishinaabe Family) reads as follows:

Debenjiged gii'saan anishinaaben akiing giibi dgwon gaadeni mnidoo waadiziwin.

Creator placed the Anishinaabe on the earth along with the gift of spirituality.

Shkode, nibi, aki, noodin, giibi dgosdoonan wii naagdowendmang maanpii shkagmigaang.

Here on mother earth, there were gifts given to the Anishinaabe to look after; fire, water, earth and wind.

Debenjiged gii miinaan gechtwa wendaagog Anishinaaben waa naagdoonjin ninda niizhwaaswi kino maadwinan.

The Creator also gave the Anishinaabe seven sacred gifts to guide them. They are:

Zaagidwin, Debewin, Mnaadendmowin, Nbwaakaawin, Dbaadendiziwin, Gwe-kwaadziwin miinwa Aakedhewin.

Love, Truth, Respect, Wisdom, Humility, Honesty and Bravery.

Debenjiged kiimiingona dedbinwe wi naagdowendiwin.

Creator gave us sovereignty to govern ourselves.

Ka mnaadendanaa gaabi zhiwebag miinwaa nango megwaa ezhwebag, miinwa geyaabi waa ni zhiwebag.

Indigenous First Nations from many of the 43 communities of the Anishinabek Nation have also drafted their own constitutions which relate to the Anishinabek Constitution. These constitutional documents contain provisions which relate to the broader Anishinabek Nation, the waters, rocks, plants, insects, fish animals and other living beings, their own people and the federal and provincial governments. For example, the Wikwemikong Chi-Naaknigewin contains a preamble and then clauses relating to: 1.0 Anishinabeaadziwin; 2.0 Supreme Law; 3.0 The Wiikwemkoong Chief and Council; 4.0 Jurisdiction and Authority; 5.0 Law-Making Process; 6.0 Enforcement of Wiikwemkoong Laws; 7.0 Governance; 8.0 Review and Appeal of Administrative Decisions; 9.0 Review and Challenging Laws; 10.0 Accountability; 11.0 Conflict of Interest; 12.0 Equal Protection and Benefit of Law; 13.0 Rights of Wiikwemkoong Anishinaabek; 14.0 The Elders Council; 15.0 The Justice Council; 16.0 Reasonable Limits; 17.0 Ratification; 18.0 Amendment of the Wiikwemkoong Gchi-Naaknigewin; 19.0 Definitions.

The Anishinabek Nation has negotiated a Governance Agreement and Fiscal Agreement with the Federal government to recognize and further implement their constitutional regimes. For the Anishinabek Nation this process is designed to recognize their inherent rights. As they have proclaimed: "The Anishinabek member First Nations have never relinquished any authority to other governments such as Canada. Although member First Nations have maintained that they are their own government, they are not recognized as such in Nation-to-Nation affairs. Through the proposed Governance Agreement, other governments will recognize member First Nations and the Anishinabek Nation as individual governments with legal status parallel to the federal and provincial governments." III. COMMON LAW FOUNDATIONS OF CONSTITUTIONAL RECOGNITION

There has been a search for appropriate ways to constitute peaceful relationships between Indigenous and non-Indigenous peoples ever since their first encounters in North America, discussed in Chapter 3, From Contact to Confederation. Chiefs and elders, legislators and judges, fur traders, farmers, and others have all accessed their own particular legal traditions in an attempt to create a workable order between the groups. As a result of these efforts, constitutional law in relation to Indigenous peoples has become an amalgam of different legal sources. Its doctrines are informed by, inter alia, the traditional laws and customs of Indigenous peoples, French and British colonial practice, executive proclamations, British legislative action, treaties, Privy Council rulings and decisions of the senior appellate courts of the United States and Australia, international law, and various sections of the British North America Acts and Constitution Act, 1982. As contemporary Canadian legal institutions sort through these various legal orders in answering the questions that come before them, the quest for reconciliation between Indigenous peoples and the Crown is gaining momentum. The responses generated by this search are changing our understanding of constitutional law in Canada.

Most, if not all, constitutional issues involving Indigenous peoples occur against the backdrop of Aboriginal rights with respect to land. Before 1982, apart from treaties that establish "reserves" for the exclusive use and enjoyment of Indigenous peoples, which, generally speaking, are regulated by the federal Indian Act, Anglo-Canadian law conceptualized Indigenous rights with respect to land as "Aboriginal title"—a common law entitlement that vested in Indigenous peoples, initially at least, by virtue of the Royal Proclamation of 1763. As noted in Chapter 3, the Royal Proclamation was issued in the aftermath of the Treaty of Paris, in which France ceded what is now Quebec to Great Britain. The Royal Proclamation also declared that lands possessed by Indians throughout British territories in America were reserved for their exclusive use, unless previously ceded to the Crown. Specifically, it stated that Nations or Tribes of Indians with whom We are connected, and who live under our Protection, should not be molested or disturbed in the Possession of such Parts of our Dominions and Territories as, not having been ceded or purchased by Us, are reserved to them, or any of them, as their Hunting Grounds.

It also stipulated that "lands and territories not included within the limits of [the governments created under the Royal Proclamation, including that of Quebec], or within the limits of the territory granted to the Hudson's Bay Company" be reserved under the King's protection and dominion for the use of the Indians. Not only were these lands reserved, but they could not be purchased, settled, or taken by British subjects without the Crown's consent and prior issuance of a licence. Practically, that meant that the Crown alone possessed the initial right to acquire the Indigenous territory to which the Proclamation referred.

Until the Supreme Court of Canada's decision in Calder v Attorney General of British Columbia, [1973] SCR 313, 1973 CanLII 4, the Royal Proclamation was generally viewed by the judiciary as the sole Anglo-Canadian legal source of Indigenous rights. In 1888, for example, the Privy Council in St Catherine's Milling & Lumber Co v The Queen (1888), 14 App Cas 46, 10 CRAC 13 (UKJCPC) held that Aboriginal title existed in common law because the Royal Proclamation declared that Indigenous peoples had certain rights to their territory. The Privy Council held further that Aboriginal title was but a burden on the underlying title of the Crown and gave rise to rights that were merely personal and usufructuary in nature that could be extinguished by the exercise of the Crown's sovereign power.

An exception to this idea of the source of Indigenous rights lay with the famous decision by Monk J in Connolly v Woolrich (1867), 17 RJRQ 75, 1 CNLC 70 (SC), discussed below in an excerpt from a report by the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples. As the Royal Commission indicates, Connolly v Woolrich suggests that Indigenous peoples hold rights to their territory not because of what the Royal Proclamation may have said about the matter but because Indigenous rights emanate from Indigenous legal systems that predate the establishment of colonies on the continent.

In about 1802, a young Quebec lad by the name of William Connolly left his home near Montreal and went west to seek his fortune in the fur trade with the North-West Company. A year or so later, William married a young woman of the Cree Nation, Suzanne by name. Suzanne had an interesting background. She was born of a Cree mother and a French-Canadian father and was the stepdaughter of a Cree chief at Cumberland House, located west of Lake Winnipeg. The union between William and Suzanne was formed under Cree law by mutual consent, with a gift probably given to Suzanne's stepfather. It was never solemnized by a priest or minister. Marriages of this kind were common in the fur trade during that era.

William and Suzanne lived happily together for nearly 30 years and had six children, one of whom later became Lady Amelia Douglas, the wife of the first governor of British Columbia. William Connolly prospered in the fur trade. He was described by a contemporary as "a veritable bon garçon, and an Emeralder of the first order." When the North-West Company merged with the Hudson's Bay Company, he continued on as a chief trader and was later promoted to the position of chief factor.

In 1831, William left the western fur trade and returned to the Montreal area with Suzanne and several of their children. Not long after, however, William decided to treat his first marriage as invalid and he married his well-to-do second cousin, Julia Woolrich, in a Catholic ceremony. Suzanne eventually returned west with her younger children and spent her final years living in the Grey Nuns convent at St. Boniface, Manitoba, where she was supported by William and later by Julia. When William died in the late 1840s, he willed all his property to Julia and their two children, cutting Suzanne and her children out of the estate.

Several years after Suzanne's death in 1862, her eldest son, John Connolly, sued Julia Woolrich for a share of his father's estate. This famous case, Connolly v. Woolrich, was fought through the courts of Quebec and was eventually appealed to the Privy Council in Britain before being settled out of court. The judgement delivered in the case sheds a remarkable light on the constitutional status of Aboriginal nations and their relations with incoming French and English settlers.

In support of his claim, John Connolly argued that the marriage between his mother and William Connolly was valid under Cree law and that the couple had been in "community of property," so that each partner to the marriage was entitled to one-half of their jointly owned property. When William died, only his half-share of the property could be left to Julia, with the other half passing automatically to Suzanne as his lawful wife. On Suzanne's death, her children would be entitled to inherit her share of the estate, now in the hands of Julia.

The initial question for the Quebec courts was whether the Cree marriage between Suzanne and William was valid. The lawyer for Julia Woolrich argued that it was not valid. He maintained that English common law was in force in the northwest in 1803 and that the union between Suzanne and William did not meet its requirements. Moreover, he said, in an argument that catered to the worst prejudices of the times, the marriage customs of so-called uncivilized and pagan nations could not be recognized by the court as validating a marriage even between two Aboriginal people, much less between an Aboriginal and a non-Aboriginal person.

The Quebec Superior Court rejected Julia Woolrich's arguments. It held that the Cree marriage between Suzanne and William was valid and that their eldest son was entitled to his rightful share of the estate. This decision was maintained on appeal to the Quebec Court of Queen's Bench.

In his judgement, Justice Monk of the Superior Court stated that he was prepared to assume, for the sake of argument, that the first European traders to inhabit the northwest brought with them their own laws as their birthright. Nevertheless, the region was already occupied by "numerous and powerful tribes of Indians; by Aboriginal nations, who had been in possession of these countries for ages." Assuming that French or English law had been introduced in the area at some point, "will it be contended that the territorial rights, political organization, such as it was, or the laws and usages of the Indian tribes, were abrogated; that they ceased to exist, when these two European nations began to trade with the aboriginal occupants?" Answering his own question in the negative, Justice Monk wrote: "In my opinion, it is beyond controversy that they did not, that so far from being abolished, they were left in full force, and were not even modified in the slightest degree, in regard to the civil rights of the natives."

Justice Monk supported this conclusion by quoting at length from Worcester v. Georgia, a landmark case decided in 1832 by the United States Supreme Court under Chief Justice Marshall. Justice Marshall, describing the policy of the British Crown in America before the American Revolution, states:

Certain it is, that our history furnishes no example, from the first settlement of our country, of any attempt on the part of the Crown to interfere with the internal affairs of the Indians farther than to keep out the agents of foreign powers, who, as traders or otherwise, might seduce them into foreign alliances. The king purchased their lands when they were willing to sell, at a price they were willing to take; but never coerced a surrender of them. He also purchased their alliance and dependence by subsidies;

but never intruded into the interior of their affairs, or interfered with their self-government, so far as respected themselves only. [Emphasis supplied by Justice Monk.]

According to this passage, the British Crown did not interfere with the domestic affairs of its Indian allies and dependencies, so that they remained self-governing in internal matters. Adopting this outlook, Justice Monk concluded that he had no hesitation in holding that “the Indian political and territorial rights, laws, and usages remained in full force” in the northwest at the relevant time. This decision portrays Aboriginal peoples as autonomous nations living within the protection of the Crown but retaining their territorial rights, political organizations and common laws.

A number of lessons can be drawn from Connolly v. Woolrich. First, the sources of law and authority in Canada are more diverse than is sometimes assumed. They include the common laws and political systems of Aboriginal nations in addition to the standard range of Euro-Canadian sources.

Second, in earlier times, the history of Canada often featured close and relatively harmonious relations between Aboriginal peoples and newcomers. The fur trade, which played an important role in the economy of early Canada, was based on long-standing alliances between European fur traders and Aboriginal hunters and traders. At the personal level, these alliances resulted in people of mixed origins, who sometimes were assimilated into existing groups but in other cases coalesced into distinct nations and communities, as with the Métis of Red River.

Connolly v. Woolrich demonstrates that newcomers have sometimes found it convenient to forget their early alliances and pacts with Aboriginal peoples and to construct communities that excluded them and suppressed any local roots. Despite these efforts, however, the courts have periodically upheld the original relationship between newcomers and Aboriginal peoples and enforced the rights it embraced. Among these was the right of Aboriginal peoples to conduct their affairs under their own laws, within a larger constitutional framework linking them with the Crown.

The decision in Connolly v. Woolrich stands in contrast, then, to the common impression that Aboriginal peoples do not have any general right to govern themselves. It is often thought that all governmental authority in Canada flows from the Crown to Parliament and the provincial legislatures, as provided in the constitution acts—the basic enactments that form the core of our written constitution. According to this view, since the constitution acts do not explicitly recognize the existence of Aboriginal governments, the only governmental powers held by Aboriginal peoples are those delegated to them by Parliament or the provincial legislatures

This outlook assumes that all law is found in statutes or other written legal instruments. Under this view, if a right has not been enshrined in such a document, it is not a legal right. At best, it is regarded as only a moral or political right, which does not have legal status and so cannot be enforced in the ordinary courts. Since the constitution acts do not explicitly acknowledge an Aboriginal right of self-government, such a right does not exist as a matter of Canadian law.

However, this view overlooks important features of our legal system. The laws of Canada spring from a great variety of sources, both written and unwritten, statutory and customary. It has long been recognized, for example, that the written constitution is based on fundamental unwritten principles, which govern its status and interpretation. In Quebec, the general laws governing the private affairs of citizens trace their origins in large part to a body of French customary law, the Coutume de Paris, which was imported to Canada in the 1600s and embodied in the Civil Code of Lower Canada in 1866. In the other provinces, the foundation of the general private law system is English common law, a body of unwritten law administered by the courts, with its roots in the Middle Ages. English common law has never been reduced to statutory form, except in partial and fragmentary ways. Over the years, it has become a supple legal instrument, capable of being adapted by the courts to suit changing circumstances and social conditions.

Given the multiple sources of law and rights in Canada, it is no surprise that Canadian courts have recognized the existence of a special body of "Aboriginal rights." These are not based on written instruments such as statutes, but on unwritten sources such as long-standing custom and practice. ...

The doctrine of Aboriginal rights is not a modern innovation, invented by courts to remedy injustices perpetrated in the past. ... [T]he doctrine was reflected in the numerous treaties of peace and friendship concluded in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries between Aboriginal peoples and the French and British Crowns. Aboriginal rights are also apparent in the Royal Proclamation of 1763 and other instruments of the same period, and in the treaties signed in Ontario, the west, and the northwest during the late nineteenth and early twentieth century. These rights are also considered in the many statutes dealing with Aboriginal matters from earliest times and in a series of judicial decisions extending over nearly two centuries. As such, the doctrine of Aboriginal rights is one of the most ancient and enduring doctrines of Canadian law.

The principles behind the decision in Connolly v. Woolrich form the core of the modern Canadian law of Aboriginal rights. This body of law provides the basic constitutional context for relations between Aboriginal peoples and the Crown and oversees the interaction between general Canadian systems of law and government and Aboriginal laws, government institutions and territories.

Justice Monk's views in Connolly v. Woolrich on the territorial and political rights of Indigenous peoples initially received little judicial attention in Canada. In fact, soon after Confederation, Canada worked to undermine nation-to-nation relationships with Indigenous peoples and acted to diminish and marginalize collective and individual capacities. As the Truth and Reconciliation Commission of Canada observed in Honouring the Truth, Reconciling for the Future: Summary of the Final Report of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission of Canada (2015), vol 1, "Honouring the Truth, Reconciling for the Future" at 1-3 (footnotes omitted):

For over a century, the central goals of Canada's Aboriginal policy were to eliminate Aboriginal governments; ignore Aboriginal rights; terminate the Treaties; and, through a process of assimilation, cause Aboriginal peoples to cease to exist as distinct legal, social, cultural, religious, and racial entities in Canada. The establishment and operation of residential schools were a central element of this policy, which can best be described as "cultural genocide."

Physical genocide is the mass killing of the members of a targeted group, and biological genocide is the destruction of the group's reproductive capacity. Cultural genocide is the destruction of those structures and practices that allow the group to continue as a group. States that engage in cultural genocide set out to destroy the political and social institutions of the targeted group. Land is seized, and populations are forcibly transferred and their movement is restricted. Languages are banned. Spiritual leaders are persecuted, spiritual practices are forbidden, and objects of spiritual value are confiscated and destroyed. And, most significantly to the issue at hand, families are disrupted to prevent the transmission of cultural values and identity from one generation to the next.

In its dealing with Aboriginal people, Canada did all these things.

Canada asserted control over Aboriginal land. In some locations, Canada negotiated Treaties with First Nations; in others, the land was simply occupied or seized. The negotiation of Treaties, while seemingly honourable and legal, was often marked by fraud and coercion, and Canada was, and remains, slow to implement their provisions and intent.

On occasion, Canada forced First Nations to relocate their reserves from agriculturally valuable or resource-rich land onto remote and economically marginal reserves. Without legal authority or foundation, in the 1880s Canada instituted a "pass system" that was intended to confine First Nations people to their reserves. Canada replaced existing forms of Aboriginal government with relatively powerless band councils whose decisions it could override and whose leaders it could depose. In the process, it disempowered Aboriginal women, who had held significant influence and powerful roles in many First Nations, including the Mohawks, the Carrier, and Tlingit.

Canada denied the right to participate fully in Canadian political, economic, and social life to those Aboriginal people who refused to abandon their Aboriginal identity. Canada outlawed Aboriginal spiritual practices, jailed Aboriginal spiritual leaders, and confiscated sacred objects.

And, Canada separated children from their parents, sending them to residential schools. This was done not to educate them, but primarily to break their link to their culture and identity. In justifying the government's residential school policy, Canada's first prime minister, Sir John A. Macdonald, told the House of Commons in 1883:

When the school is on the reserve the child lives with its parents, who are savages; he is surrounded by savages, and though he may learn to read and write his habits, and training and mode of thought are Indian. He is simply a savage who can read and write. It has been strongly pressed on myself, as the head of the Department, that Indian children should be withdrawn as much as possible from the parental influence, and the only way to do that would be to put them in central training industrial schools where they will acquire the habits and modes of thought of white men.

These measures were part of a coherent policy to eliminate Aboriginal people as distinct peoples and to assimilate them into the Canadian mainstream against their will. Deputy Minister of Indian Affairs Duncan Campbell Scott outlined the goals of that policy in 1920, when he told a parliamentary committee that "our object is to continue until there is not a single Indian in Canada that has not been absorbed into the body politic." These goals were reiterated in 1969 in the federal government's Statement on Indian Policy (more often referred to as the "White Paper"), which sought to end Indian status and terminate the Treaties that the federal government had negotiated with First Nations.

Indeed, it was only in 1973, with the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Calder, above, that Canadian law began to return to recognizing pre-existing Aboriginal rights. In that year, the Court recognized Aboriginal title as a common law entitlement separate and distinct from the Royal Proclamation of 1763. With Judson and Hall JJ writing the principal judgments, the Court split evenly on the major issue of whether Nisga'a Aboriginal title to ancestral territory had been extinguished by general land enactments in British Columbia. The Court also split on the issue of whether the Royal Proclamation was applicable to Indigenous territory in that province. Justices Judson and Hall were in agreement, however, that Aboriginal title existed in Canada (at least where it has not been extinguished by appropriate legislative action) independently of the Royal Proclamation of 1763. Justice Judson stated expressly that the Proclamation was not the "exclusive" source of Indian title (at 322-23, 328). Justice Hall said that "aboriginal Indian title does not depend on treaty, executive order or legislative enactment" (at 390).

In 1884, in a case called Guerin v The Queen, [1984] 2 SCR 335, 1984 CanLII 25, the Supreme Court of Canada agreed with Hall J and found that Indian title was an independent legal interest which predated and survived in spite of Crown assertions of sovereignty. Only Dickson J discussed the nature of Indian interests in land as it relates to governmental obligations as follows:

Guerin v The Queen

DICKSON J (Beetz, Chouinard, and Lamer JJ concurring):

In recognizing that the Proclamation is not the sole source of Indian title the Calder decision went beyond the judgment of the Privy Council in St. Catherine's Milling & Lumber Co. v. The Queen (1888), 14 App. Cas. 46. In that case Lord Watson acknowledged the existence of aboriginal title but said it had its origin in the Royal Proclamation. In this respect Calder is consistent with the position of Chief Justice Marshall in the leading American cases of Johnson v. M'Intosh, 8 Wheaton 543 (1823), and Worcester v. State of Georgia, 6 Peters 515 (1832), cited by Judson and Hall JJ. in their respective judgments.

In Johnson v. M'Intosh Marshall C.J., although he acknowledged the Proclamation of 1763 as one basis for recognition of Indian title, was none the less of [the] opinion that the rights of Indians in the lands they traditionally occupied prior to European colonization both predated and survived the claims to sovereignty made by various European nations in the territories of the North American continent. The principle of discovery which justified these claims gave the ultimate title in the land in a particular area to the nation which had discovered and claimed it. In that respect at least the Indians' rights in the land were obviously diminished; but their rights of occupancy and possession remained unaffected. Marshall C.J. explained this principle as follows, at pp. 573-74:

The exclusion of all other Europeans, necessarily gave to the nation making the discovery the sole right of acquiring the soil from the natives, and establishing settlements upon it. ... It was a right which all asserted for themselves, and to the assertion of which, by others, all assented.

These relations which were to exist between the discoverer and the natives, were to be regulated by themselves. The rights thus acquired being exclusive, no other power could interpose between them.

In the establishment of these relations, the rights of the original inhabitants were, in no instance, entirely disregarded, but were necessarily, to a considerable extent, impaired. They were admitted to be the rightful occupants of the soil, with a legal as well as just claim to retain possession of it, and to use it according to their own discretion; but their rights to complete sovereignty, as independent nations, were necessarily diminished, and their power to dispose of the soil at their own will, to whomsoever they pleased, was denied by the original fundamental principle, that discovery gave exclusive title to those who made it. [Emphasis is mine.]

The principle that a change in sovereignty over a particular territory does not in general affect the presumptive title of the inhabitants was approved by the Privy Council in Amodu Tijani v. Secretary, Southern Nigeria (Secretary), [1921] 2 A.C. 399. That principle supports the assumption implicit in Calder that Indian title is an independent legal right which, although recognized by the Royal Proclamation of 1763, none the less predates it. ...

In the St. Catherine's Milling case, supra, the Privy Council held that the Indians had a "personal and usufructuary right" [at 54] in the lands which they had traditionally occupied. Lord Watson said that "there has been all along vested in the Crown a substantial and paramount estate, underlying the Indian title, which became a plenum dominium whenever the title was surrendered or otherwise extinguished" (at p. 55). He reiterated this idea, stating that the Crown "has all along had a present proprietary estate in the land, upon which the Indian title was a mere burden" (at p. 58). This view of aboriginal title was affirmed by the Privy Council in the Star Chrome case. In Amodu Tijani, supra, Viscount Haldane, advertising to the St. Catherine's Milling and Star Chrome decisions, explained the concept of a usufructuary right as a "mere qualification of or burden on the radical or final title of the Sovereign" (p. 403). He described the title of the Sovereign as a pure legal estate, but one which could be qualified by a right of "beneficial user" that did not necessarily take the form of an estate in land. Indian title in Canada was said to be one illustration "of the necessity for getting rid of the assumption that the ownership of land naturally breaks itself up into estates, conceived as creatures of inherent legal principle" [at 403]. Chief Justice Marshall took a similar view in Johnson v. M'Intosh, supra, saying, "All our institutions recognize the absolute title of the Crown, subject only to the Indian right of occupancy" (p. 588). ...

Indians have a legal right to occupy and possess certain lands, the ultimate title to which is in the Crown. While their interest does not, strictly speaking, amount to beneficial ownership, neither is its nature completely exhausted by the concept of a personal right. It is true that the sui generis interest which the Indians have in the land is personal in the sense that it cannot be transferred to a grantee, but it is also true, as will presently appear, that the interest gives rise upon surrender to a distinctive fiduciary obligation on the part of the Crown to deal with the land for the benefit of the surrendering Indians. These two aspects of Indian title go together, since the Crown's original purpose in declaring the Indians' interest to be inalienable otherwise than to the Crown was to facilitate the Crown's ability to represent the Indians in dealings with third parties. The nature of the Indians' interest is therefore best characterized by its general inalienability, coupled with the fact that the Crown is under an obligation to deal with the land on the Indians' behalf when the interest is surrendered. Any description of Indian title which goes beyond these two features is both unnecessary and potentially misleading.

NOTE

In Guerin, Dickson CJ interpreted Calder as deriving common law Aboriginal title from Indigenous peoples' historic occupation and possession of their ancestral lands. No mention is made of Connolly v Woolrich or the possibility that Indigenous legal systems might be the source of Aboriginal rights. As you read the cases in the remainder of this chapter, look for instances in which the judiciary treats Indigenous laws and Indigenous legal orders to be potential legal sources of Aboriginal rights.

IV. THE CONSTITUTIONAL ENTRENCHMENT OF ABORIGINAL RIGHTS

Despite the development of a common law framework for Indigenous rights in Canada, the centuries-long legal history of Indigenous–Crown relations did not resolve many issues of basic justice and fairness between the parties. In an attempt to remedy this failure, Aboriginal and treaty rights were entrenched in Canada's newly patriated Constitution Act in 1982, as part II of that instrument, outside its Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Section 35(1) protects these rights by stating that "the existing aboriginal and treaty rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada are hereby recognized and affirmed." The problem with this language was that no one was quite sure what Aboriginal and treaty rights existed as of that date, and therefore what, if anything, was being protected. After the failure to define these rights through four high-profile first ministers' conferences mandated by s 37 of the Constitution Act, 1982 and a nationally negotiated Charlottetown Accord, the task of defining Aboriginal rights passed to the country's highest court.

The following cases analyze the nature and scope of Aboriginal rights recognized and affirmed by s 35(1).

[\[1990\] 1 SCR 1075, 1990 CanLII 104](#)

DICKSON CJ and La FOREST J (Lamer, Wilson, L'Heureux-Dubé, and Sopinka JJ concurring):

This appeal requires this Court to explore for the first time the scope of s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, and to indicate its strength as a promise to the aboriginal peoples of Canada. Section 35(1) is found in Part II of that Act, entitled "Rights of the Aboriginal Peoples of Canada," and provides as follows:

35.(1) The existing aboriginal and treaty rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada are hereby recognized and affirmed.

The context of this appeal is the alleged violation of the terms of the Musqueam food fishing licence which are dictated by the Fisheries Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. F-14, and the regulations under that Act. The issue is whether Parliament's power to regulate fishing is now limited by s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, and, more specifically, whether the net length restriction in the licence is inconsistent with that provision.

Facts

The appellant, a member of the Musqueam Indian Band, was charged under s. 61(1) of the Fisheries Act of the offence of fishing with a drift net longer than that permitted by the terms of the Band's Indian food fishing licence He has throughout admitted the facts alleged to constitute the offence, but has defended the charge on the basis that he was exercising an existing aboriginal right to fish

... On November 24, 1987, the following constitutional question was stated:

Is the net length restriction contained in the Musqueam Indian Band Indian Food Fishing Licence dated March 30, 1984, issued pursuant to the British Columbia Fishery (General) Regulations and the Fisheries Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. F-14, inconsistent with s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982?

[An account of the arguments of the parties and the regulatory regime is omitted.]

Analysis

We will address first the meaning of "existing" aboriginal rights and the content and scope of the Musqueam right to fish. We will then turn to the meaning of "recognized and affirmed," and the impact of s. 35(1) on the regulatory power of Parliament.

"Existing"

The word "existing" makes it clear that the rights to which s. 35(1) applies are those that were in existence when the Constitution Act, 1982 came into effect. This means that extinguished rights are not revived by the Constitution Act, 1982

Further, an existing aboriginal right cannot be read so as to incorporate the specific manner in which it was regulated before 1982. The notion of freezing existing rights would incorporate into the Constitution a crazy patchwork of regulations

... [A]cademic commentary lends support to the conclusion that "existing" means "unextinguished" rather than exercisable at a certain time in history. Professor Slatery, "Understanding Aboriginal Rights" (1987), 66 Can. Bar Rev. 727, at pp. 781-82, has observed the following about reading regulations into the rights:

This approach reads into the Constitution the myriad of regulations affecting the exercise of aboriginal rights, regulations that differed considerably from place to place across the country. It does not permit differentiation between regulations of long-term significance and those enacted to deal with temporary conditions, or between reasonable and unreasonable restrictions. Moreover, it might require that a constitutional amendment be enacted to implement regulations more stringent than those in existence on 17 April 1982. This solution seems unsatisfactory.

The unsuitability of the approach can also be seen from another perspective. Ninety-one other tribes of Indians, comprising over 20,000 people (compared with 540 Musqueam on the reserve and 100 others off the reserve) obtain their food fish from the Fraser River. Some or all of these bands may have an aboriginal right to fish there. A constitutional patchwork quilt would be created if the constitutional right of these bands were to be determined by the specific regime available to each of those bands in 1982.

... [T]he phrase "existing aboriginal rights" must be interpreted flexibly so as to permit their evolution over time. ... [A]n approach to the constitutional guarantee embodied in s. 35(1) which would incorporate "frozen rights" must be rejected.

The Aboriginal Right

We turn now to the aboriginal right at stake in this appeal. The Musqueam Indian Reserve is located on the north shore of the Fraser River close to the mouth of that river and within the limits of the City of Vancouver. There has been a Musqueam village there for hundreds of years. This appeal does not directly concern the reserve or the adjacent waters, but arises out of the Band's right to fish in another area of the Fraser River estuary ... some 16 kilometres (about 10 miles) from the reserve. ...

The evidence reveals that the Musqueam have lived in the area as an organized society long before the coming of European settlers, and that the taking of salmon was an integral part of their lives and remains so to this day. Much of the evidence of an aboriginal right to fish was given by Dr. Suttles, an anthropologist, supported by that of Mr. Grant, the Band administrator. The Court of Appeal thus summarized Dr. Suttles' evidence, at pp. 307-8:

Dr. Suttles ... thought that the Musqueam had lived in their historic territory, which includes the Fraser River estuary, for at least 1,500 years. That historic territory extended from the north shore of Burrard Inlet to the south shore of the main channel of the Fraser River, including the waters of the three channels by which that river reaches the ocean. As part of the Salish people, the Musqueam were part of a regional social network covering a much larger area but, as a tribe, were themselves an organized social group with their own name, territory and resources. Between the tribes there was a flow of people, wealth and food. No tribe was wholly self-sufficient or occupied its territory to the complete exclusion of others.

Dr. Suttles described the special position occupied by the salmon fishery in that society. The salmon was not only an important source of food but played an important part in the system of beliefs of the Salish people, and in their ceremonies. The salmon were held to be a race of beings that had, in "myth times," established a bond with human beings requiring the salmon to come each year to give their bodies to the humans who, in turn, treated them with respect shown by performance of the proper ritual. Toward the salmon, as toward other creatures, there was an attitude of caution and respect which resulted in effective conservation of the various species.

While the trial for a violation of a penal prohibition may not be the most appropriate setting in which to determine the existence of an aboriginal right, and the evidence was not extensive, the correctness of the finding of fact of the trial judge "that Mr. Sparrow was fishing in ancient tribal territory where his ancestors had fished from time immemorial in that part of the mouth of the Fraser River for salmon" is supported by the evidence and was not contested. The existence of the right, the Court of Appeal tells us, was "not the subject of serious dispute." It is not surprising, then, that, taken with other circumstances, that court should find, at p. 320, that "the judgment appealed from was wrong in ... failing to hold that Sparrow at the relevant time was exercising an existing aboriginal right."

In this Court, however, the respondent contested the Court of Appeal's finding, contending that the evidence was insufficient to discharge the appellant's burden of proof upon the issue. It is true that for the period from 1867 to 1961 the evidence is scanty. But the evidence was not disputed or contradicted in the courts below and there is evidence of sufficient continuity of the right to support the Court of Appeal's finding, and we would not disturb it.

What the Crown really insisted on, both in this Court and the courts below, was that the Musqueam Band's aboriginal right to fish had been extinguished by regulations under the Fisheries Act.

The history of the regulation of fisheries in British Columbia is set out in Jack v. The Queen, [1980] 1 SCR 294, especially at pp. 308 et seq., and we need only summarize it here.

[An account of this history is omitted.]

It is this progressive restriction and detailed regulation of the fisheries which, respondent's counsel maintained, have had the effect of extinguishing any aboriginal right to fish. The extinguishment need not be express, he argued, but may take place where the sovereign authority is exercised in a manner "necessarily inconsistent" with the continued enjoyment of aboriginal rights The consent to its extinguishment before the Constitution Act, 1982 was not required; the intent of the Sovereign could be effected not only by statute but by valid regulations. Here, in his view, the regulations had entirely displaced any aboriginal right. There is, he submitted, a fundamental inconsistency between the communal right to fish embodied in the aboriginal right, and fishing under a special licence or permit issued to individual Indians (as was the case until 1977) in the discretion of the Minister and subject to terms and conditions which, if breached, may result in cancellation of the licence. The Fisheries Act and its regulations were, he argued, intended to constitute a complete code inconsistent with the continued existence of an aboriginal right.

At bottom, the respondent's argument confuses regulation with extinguishment. That the right is controlled in great detail by the regulations does not mean that the right is thereby extinguished.

[A discussion of authority is omitted.]

... The test of extinguishment to be adopted, in our opinion, is that the Sovereign's intention must be clear and plain if it is to extinguish an aboriginal right.

There is nothing in the Fisheries Act or its detailed regulations that demonstrates a clear and plain intention to extinguish the Indian aboriginal right to fish. The fact that express provision permitting the Indians to fish for food may have applied to all Indians and that for an extended period permits were discretionary and issued on an individual rather than a communal basis in no way shows a clear intention to extinguish. These permits were simply a manner of controlling the fisheries, not defining underlying rights.

We would conclude then that the Crown has failed to discharge its burden of proving extinguishment. In our opinion, the Court of Appeal made no mistake in holding that the Indians have an existing aboriginal right to fish in the area where Mr. Sparrow was fishing at the time of the charge. This approach is consistent with ensuring that an aboriginal right should not be defined by incorporating the ways in which it has been regulated in the past.

The scope of the existing Musqueam right to fish must now be delineated. The anthropological evidence relied on to establish the existence of the right suggests that, for the Musqueam, the salmon fishery has always constituted an integral part of their distinctive culture. Its significant role involved not only consumption for subsistence purposes, but also consumption of salmon on ceremonial and social occasions. The Musqueam have always fished for reasons connected to their cultural and physical survival. As we stated earlier, the right to do so may be exercised in a contemporary manner.

The British Columbia Court of Appeal in this case held that the aboriginal right was to fish for food purposes, but that purpose was not to be confined to mere subsistence. Rather, the right was found to extend to fish consumed for social and ceremonial activities. . . .

... While no commercial fishery existed prior to the arrival of European settlers, it is contended [before this Court] that the Musqueam practice of bartering in early society may be revived as a modern right to fish for commercial purposes. The presence of numerous interveners representing commercial fishing interests, and the suggestion on the facts that the net length restriction is at least in part related to the probable commercial use of fish caught under the Musqueam food fishing licence, indicate the possibility of conflict between aboriginal fishing and the competitive commercial fishery with respect to economically valuable fish such as salmon. We recognize the existence of this conflict and the probability of its intensification as fish availability drops, demand rises and tensions increase.

In the courts below, the case at bar was not presented on the footing of an aboriginal right to fish for commercial or livelihood purposes. Rather, the focus was and continues to be on the validity of a net length restriction affecting the appellant's food fishing licence. We therefore adopt the Court of Appeal's characterization of the right for the purpose of this appeal, and confine our reasons to the meaning of the constitutional recognition and affirmation of the existing aboriginal right to fish for food and social and ceremonial purposes.

"Recognized and Affirmed"

We now turn to the impact of s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 on the regulatory power of Parliament and on the outcome of this appeal specifically.

Counsel for the appellant argued that the effect of s. 35(1) is to deny Parliament's power to restrictively regulate aboriginal fishing rights under s. 91(24) ("Indians and Lands Reserved for the Indians"), and s. 91(12) ("Sea Coast and Inland Fisheries"). ... Section 35(1) is not subject to s. 1 of the Charter nor to legislative override under s. 33. The appellant submitted that, if the regulatory power continued, the limits on its extent are set by the word "inconsistent" in s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 and the protective and remedial purposes of s. 35(1). This means that aboriginal title entails a right to fish by any non-dangerous method chosen by the aborigines engaged in fishing. Any continuing governmental power of regulation would have to be exceptional and strictly limited to regulation that is clearly not inconsistent with the protective and remedial purposes of s. 35(1). Thus, counsel for the appellant speculated, "in certain circumstances, necessary and reasonable conservation measures might qualify" (emphasis added)—where for example such measures were necessary to prevent serious impairment of the aboriginal rights of present and future generations, where conservation could only be achieved by restricting the right and not by restricting fishing by other users, and where the aboriginal group concerned was unwilling to implement necessary conservation measures. The onus of proving a justification for restrictive regulations would lie with the government by analogy with s. 1 of the Charter.

In response to these submissions and in finding the appropriate interpretive framework for s. 35(1), we start by looking at the background of s. 35(1).

It is worth recalling that while British policy towards the native population was based on respect for their right to occupy their traditional lands, a proposition to which the Royal Proclamation of 1763 bears witness, there was from the outset never any doubt that sovereignty and legislative power, and indeed the underlying title, to such lands vested in the Crown . . . And there can be no doubt that over the years the rights of the Indians were often honoured in the breach. . . As MacDonald J. stated in Pasco v. Canadian National Railway Co., [1986] 1 C.N.L.R. 35 (B.C.S.C.), at p. 37: "We cannot recount with much pride the treatment accorded to the native people of this country."

For many years, the rights of the Indians to their aboriginal lands—certainly as legal rights—were virtually ignored. The leading cases defining Indian rights in the early part of the century were directed at claims supported by the Royal Proclamation or other legal instruments, and even these cases were essentially concerned with settling legislative jurisdiction or the rights of commercial enterprises. For fifty years after the publication of Clement's The Law of the Canadian Constitution (3rd ed. 1916), there was a virtual absence of discussion of any kind of Indian rights to land even in academic literature. By the late 1960s, aboriginal claims were not even recognized by the federal government as having any legal status. Thus the Statement of the Government of Canada on Indian Policy (1969), although well meaning, contained the assertion (at p. 11) that "aboriginal claims to land . . . are so general and undefined that it is not realistic to think of them as specific claims capable of remedy except through a policy and program that will end injustice to the Indians as members of the Canadian community." In the same general period, the James Bay development by Quebec Hydro was originally initiated without regard to the rights of the Indians who lived there, even though these were expressly protected by a constitutional instrument; see The Quebec Boundaries Extension Act, 1912, S.C. 1912, c. 45. It took a number of judicial decisions and notably [Calder v British Columbia (AG), [1973] SCR 313, 1973 CanLII 4] in this Court to prompt a reassessment of the position being taken by government.

In the light of its reassessment of Indian claims following Calder, the federal Government on August 8, 1973 issued "a statement of policy" regarding Indian lands. By it, it sought to "signify the Government's recognition and acceptance of its continuing responsibility under the British North America Act for Indians and lands reserved for Indians," which it regarded "as an historic evolution dating back to the Royal Proclamation of 1763, which, whatever differences there may be about its judicial interpretation, stands as a basic declaration of the Indian people's interests in land in this country." (Emphasis added.) See Statement made by the Honourable Jean Chrétien, Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development on Claims of Indian and Inuit People, August 8, 1973. The remarks about these lands were intended "as an expression of acknowledged responsibility." But the statement went on to express, for the first time, the government's willingness to negotiate regarding claims of aboriginal title, specifically in British Columbia, Northern Quebec, and the Territories, and this without regard to formal supporting documents. "The Government," it stated, "is now ready to negotiate with authorized representatives of these native peoples on the basis that where their traditional interest in the lands concerned can be established, an agreed form of compensation or benefit will be provided to native peoples in return for their interest."

It is clear, then, that s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, represents the culmination of a long and difficult struggle in both the political forum and the courts for the constitutional recognition of aboriginal rights. The strong representations of native associations and other groups concerned with the welfare of Canada's aboriginal peoples made the adoption of s. 35(1) possible and it is important to note that the provision applies to the Indians, the Inuit and the Métis. Section 35(1), at the least, provides a solid constitutional base upon which subsequent negotiations can take place. It also affords aboriginal peoples constitutional protection against provincial legislative power. ...

In our opinion, the significance of s. 35(1) extends beyond these fundamental effects. Professor Lyon in "An Essay on Constitutional Interpretation" (1988), 26 Osgoode Hall L.J. 95, says the following about s. 35(1), at p. 100:

... the context of 1982 is surely enough to tell us that this is not just a codification of the case law on aboriginal rights that had accumulated by 1982. Section 35 calls for a just settlement for aboriginal peoples. It renounces the old rules of the game under which the Crown established courts of law and denied those courts the authority to question sovereign claims made by the Crown.

The approach to be taken with respect to interpreting the meaning of s. 35(1) is derived from general principles of constitutional interpretation, principles relating to aboriginal rights, and the purposes behind the constitutional provision itself. Here, we will sketch the framework for an interpretation of "recognized and affirmed" that, in our opinion, gives appropriate weight to the constitutional nature of these words.

The nature of s. 35(1) itself suggests that it be construed in a purposive way. When the purposes of the affirmation of aboriginal rights are considered, it is clear that a generous, liberal interpretation of the words in the constitutional provision is demanded. ...

In Nowegijick v. The Queen, [1983] 1 S.C.R. 29, at p. 36, the following principle that should govern the interpretation of Indian treaties and statutes was set out:

... [T]reaties and statutes relating to Indians should be liberally construed and doubtful expressions resolved in favour of the Indians.

In R. v. Agawa, supra, Blair J.A. stated that the above principle should apply to the interpretation of s. 35(1). He added the following principle to be equally applied, at pp. 215-16:

The second principle was enunciated by the late Associate Chief Justice MacKinnon in R. v. Taylor and Williams (1981), 34 O.R. (2d) 360. He emphasized the importance of Indian history and traditions as well as the perceived effect of a treaty at the time of its execution. He also cautioned against determining Indian rights "in a vacuum." The honour of the Crown is involved in the interpretation of Indian treaties and, as a consequence, fairness to the Indians is a governing consideration. ...

... In our opinion, Guerin, together with R. v. Taylor and Williams (1981), 34 O.R. (2d) 360 (Ont. CA), ground a general guiding principle for s. 35(1). That is, the Government has the responsibility to act in a fiduciary capacity with respect to aboriginal peoples. The relationship between the Government and aborigines is trust-like, rather than adversarial, and contemporary recognition and affirmation of aboriginal rights must be defined in light of this historic relationship.

... [I]t is true that s. 35(1) is not subject to s. 1 of the Charter. In our opinion, this does not mean that any law or regulation affecting aboriginal rights will automatically be of no force or effect by the operation of s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982. Legislation that affects the exercise of aboriginal rights will nonetheless be valid, if it meets the test for justifying an interference with a right recognized and affirmed under s. 35(1).

There is no explicit language in the provision that authorizes this Court or any court to assess the legitimacy of any government legislation that restricts aboriginal rights. Yet, we find that the words "recognition and affirmation" incorporate the fiduciary relationship referred to earlier and so import some restraint on the exercise of sovereign power. Rights that are recognized and affirmed are not absolute. Federal legislative powers continue, including, of course, the right to legislate with respect to Indians pursuant to s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867. These powers must, however, now be read together with s. 35(1). In other words, federal power must be reconciled with federal duty and the best way to achieve that reconciliation is to demand the justification of any government regulation that infringes upon or denies aboriginal rights. Such scrutiny is in keeping with the liberal interpretive principle enunciated in Nowegijick, supra, and the concept of holding the Crown to a high standard of honourable dealing with respect to the aboriginal peoples of Canada as suggested by Guerin v. The Queen, supra.

Professor Slattery's "Understanding Aboriginal Rights," supra, ... at p. 782, points out that a justificatory process is required as a compromise between a "patchwork" characterization of aboriginal rights whereby past regulations would be read into a definition of the rights, and a characterization that would guarantee aboriginal rights in their original form unrestricted by subsequent regulation. We agree with him that these two extreme positions must be rejected in favour of a justificatory scheme.

Section 35(1) suggests that while regulation affecting aboriginal rights is not precluded, such regulation must be enacted according to a valid objective. Our history has shown ... that Canada's aboriginal peoples are justified in worrying about government objectives that may be superficially neutral but which constitute de facto threats to the existence of aboriginal rights and interests. By giving aboriginal rights constitutional status and priority, Parliament and the provinces have sanctioned challenges to social and economic policy objectives embodied in legislation to the extent that aboriginal rights are affected. Implicit in this constitutional scheme is the obligation of the legislature to satisfy the test of justification. The way in which a legislative objective is to be attained must uphold the honour of the Crown and must be in keeping with the unique contemporary relationship, grounded in history and policy, between the Crown and Canada's aboriginal peoples. The extent of legislative or regulatory impact on an existing aboriginal right may be scrutinized so as to ensure recognition and affirmation.

The constitutional recognition afforded by the provision therefore gives a measure of control over government conduct and a strong check on legislative power. ...

In these reasons, we will outline the appropriate analysis under s. 35(1) in the context of a regulation made pursuant to the Fisheries Act. We wish to emphasize the importance of context and a case-by-case approach to s. 35(1). Given the generality of the text of the constitutional provision, and especially in light of the complexities of aboriginal history, society and rights, the contours of a justificatory standard must be defined in the specific factual context of each case.

Section 35(1) and the Regulation of the Fisheries

Taking the above framework as guidance, we propose to set out the test for prima facie interference with an existing aboriginal right and for the justification of such an interference. ...

The first question to be asked is whether the legislation in question has the effect of interfering with an existing aboriginal right. If it does have such an effect, it represents a prima facie infringement of s. 35(1). Parliament is not expected to act in a manner contrary to the rights and interests of aborigines, and, indeed, may be barred from doing so by the second stage of s. 35(1) analysis. The inquiry with respect to interference begins with a reference to the characteristics or incidents of the right at stake. Our earlier observations regarding the scope of the aboriginal right to fish are relevant here. Fishing rights are not traditional property rights. They are rights held by a collective and are in keeping with the culture and existence of that group. Courts must be careful, then, to avoid the application of traditional common law concepts of property as they develop their understanding of what the reasons for judgment in Guerin, supra, at p. 382, referred to as the "sui generis" nature of aboriginal rights. ...

While it is impossible to give an easy definition of fishing rights, it is possible, and, indeed, crucial, to be sensitive to the aboriginal perspective itself on the meaning of the rights at stake. For example, it would be artificial to try to create a hard distinction between the right to fish and the particular manner in which that right is exercised.

To determine whether the fishing rights have been interfered with such as to constitute a prima facie infringement of s. 35(1), certain questions must be asked. First, is the limitation unreasonable? Second, does the regulation impose undue hardship? Third, does the regulation deny to the holders of the right their preferred means of exercising that right? The onus of proving a prima facie infringement lies on the individual or group challenging the legislation. In relation to the facts of this appeal, the regulation would be found to be a prima facie interference if it were found to be an adverse restriction on the Musqueam exercise of their right to fish for food. We wish to note here that the issue does not merely require looking at whether the fish catch has been reduced below that needed for the reasonable food and ceremonial needs of the Musqueam Indians. Rather the test involves asking whether either the purpose or the effect of the restriction on net length unnecessarily infringes the interests protected by the fishing right. If, for example, the Musqueam were forced to spend undue time and money per fish caught or if the net length reduction resulted in a hardship to the Musqueam in catching fish, then the first branch of the s. 35(1) analysis would be met.

If a prima facie interference is found, the analysis moves to the issue of justification. ... The justification analysis would proceed as follows. First, is there a valid legislative objective? Here the court would inquire into whether the objective of Parliament in authorizing the department to enact regulations regarding fisheries is valid. The objective of the department in setting out the particular regulations would also be scrutinized. An objective aimed at preserving s. 35(1) rights by conserving and managing a natural resource, for example, would be valid. Also valid would be objectives purporting to prevent the exercise of s. 35(1) rights that would cause harm to the general populace or to aboriginal peoples themselves, or other objectives found to be compelling and substantial.

The Court of Appeal below held, at p. 331, that regulations could be valid if reasonably justified as "necessary for the proper management and conservation of the resource or in the public interest." (Emphasis added.) We find the "public interest" justification to be so vague as to provide no meaningful guidance and so broad as to be unworkable as a test for the justification of a limitation on constitutional rights.

The justification of conservation and resource management, on the other hand, is surely uncontroversial

... Further, the conservation and management of our resources is consistent with aboriginal beliefs and practices, and, indeed, with the enhancement of aboriginal rights.

If a valid legislative objective is found, the analysis proceeds to the second part of the justification issue. Here, ... the guiding interpretive principle [is that] ... the honour of the Crown is at stake in dealings with aboriginal peoples. The special trust relationship and the responsibility of the government vis-à-vis aborigines must be the first consideration in determining whether the legislation or action in question can be justified.

The problem that arises in assessing the legislation in light of its objective and the responsibility of the Crown is that the pursuit of conservation in a heavily used modern fishery inevitably blurs with the efficient allocation and management of this scarce and valued resource. The nature of the constitutional protection afforded by s. 35(1) in this context demands that there be a link between the question of justification and the allocation of priorities in the fishery. The constitutional recognition and affirmation of aboriginal rights may give rise to conflict with the interests of others given the limited nature of the resource. There is a clear need for guidelines that will resolve the allocational problems that arise regarding the fisheries. We refer to the reasons of Dickson J. ... in Jack v. The Queen, [[1980], 1 SCR 294, 1979 CanLII 175 at 313], for such guidelines.

... We therefore repeat the following passage from Jack, at p. 313:

Conservation is a valid legislative concern. The appellants concede as much. Their concern is in the allocation of the resource after reasonable and necessary conservation measures have been recognized and given effect to. They do not claim the right to pursue the last living salmon until it is caught. Their position, as I understand it, is one which would give effect to an order of priorities of this nature: (i) conservation; (ii) Indian fishing; (iii) non-Indian commercial fishing; or (iv) non-Indian sports fishing; the burden of conservation measures should not fall primarily upon the Indian fishery.

I agree with the general tenor of this argument. ... With respect to whatever salmon are to be caught, then priority ought to be given to the Indian fishermen, subject to the practical difficulties occasioned by international waters and the movement of the fish themselves. But any limitation upon Indian fishing that is established for a valid conservation purpose overrides the protection afforded the Indian fishery by art. 13, just as such conservation measures override other taking of fish.

The constitutional nature of the Musqueam food fishing rights means that any allocation of priorities after valid conservation measures have been implemented must give top priority to Indian food fishing. If the objective pertained to conservation, the conservation plan would be scrutinized to assess priorities. ... [T]he Indians' food requirements must be met first The significance of giving the aboriginal right to fish for food top priority can be described as follows. If, in a given year, conservation needs required a reduction in the number of fish to be caught such that the number equalled the number required for food by the Indians, then all the fish available after conservation would go to the Indians according to the constitutional nature of their fishing right. If, more realistically, there were still fish after the Indian food requirements were met, then the brunt of conservation measures would be borne by the practices of sport fishing and commercial fishing.

To afford user groups such as sports fishermen (anglers) a priority to fish over the legitimate food needs of the appellants and their families is simply not appropriate action on the part of the Federal government. ... The appellants have, to employ the words of their counsel, a "right to share in the available resource." This constitutional entitlement is second only to conservation measures that may be undertaken by federal legislation.

We acknowledge the fact that the justificatory standard to be met may place a heavy burden on the Crown. However, government policy with respect to the British Columbia fishery, regardless of s. 35(1), already dictates that, in allocating the right to take fish, Indian food fishing is to be given priority over the interests of other user groups. The constitutional entitlement embodied in s. 35(1) requires the Crown to ensure that its regulations are in keeping with that allocation of priority. The objective of this requirement is not to undermine Parliament's ability and responsibility with respect to creating and administering overall conservation and management plans regarding the salmon fishery. The objective is rather to guarantee that those plans treat aboriginal peoples in a way ensuring that their rights are taken seriously.

Within the analysis of justification, there are further questions to be addressed, depending on the circumstances of the inquiry. These include the questions of whether there has been as little infringement as possible in order to effect the desired result; whether, in a situation of expropriation, fair compensation is available; and, whether the aboriginal group in question has been consulted with respect to the conservation measures being implemented. The aboriginal peoples, with their history of conservation-consciousness and interdependence with natural resources, would surely be expected, at the least, to be informed regarding the determination of an appropriate scheme for the regulation of the fisheries.

We would not wish to set out an exhaustive list of the factors to be considered in the assessment of justification. Suffice it to say that recognition and affirmation requires sensitivity to and respect for the rights of aboriginal peoples on behalf of the government, courts and indeed all Canadians.

Application to This Case: Is the Net Length Restriction Valid?

The Court of Appeal below found that there was not sufficient evidence in this case to proceed with an analysis of s. 35(1) with respect to the right to fish for food. In reviewing the competing expert evidence, and recognizing that fish stock management is an uncertain science, it decided that the issues at stake in this appeal were not well adapted to being resolved at the appellate court level.

According to the Court of Appeal, the findings of fact were insufficient to lead to an acquittal. There was no more evidence before this Court. We also would order a re-trial which would allow findings of fact according to the tests set out in these reasons.

The appellant would bear the burden of showing that the net length restriction constituted a prima facie infringement of the collective aboriginal right to fish for food. If an infringement were found, the onus would shift to the Crown which would have to demonstrate that the regulation is justifiable. To that end, the Crown would have to show that there is no underlying unconstitutional objective such as shifting more of the resource to a user group that ranks below the Musqueam. Further, it would have to show that the regulation sought to be imposed is required to accomplish the needed limitation. In trying to show that the restriction is necessary in the circumstances of the Fraser River fishery, the Crown could use facts pertaining to fishing by other Fraser River Indians.

In conclusion, we would dismiss the appeal and the cross-appeal and affirm the Court of Appeal's setting aside of the conviction. We would accordingly affirm the order for a new trial on the questions of infringement and whether any infringement is nonetheless consistent with s. 35(1), in accordance with the interpretation set out here.

Appeal and cross-appeal dismissed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The Court in Sparrow did not provide detailed reasons why fishing was an Aboriginal right. Nor did it address the difficult issue of the scope of protection accorded by s 35(1) to Indigenous commercial fishing practices, stating that "[i]n the courts below, the case at bar was not presented on the footing of an aboriginal right to fish for commercial or livelihood purposes" (at 1101). What are the implications of Sparrow for an Indigenous community that seeks to rely on Aboriginal rights as a justification for commercial fishing contrary to federal or provincial law? What if the community in question could point to a historical Indigenous practice of bartering fish for other commodities?

2. In Sparrow, the Court acknowledged that there was no explicit language in s 35 to authorize an assessment of the legitimacy of any governmental action that might restrict Aboriginal rights. Nevertheless, the Court developed a test that allowed the government to justify the infringement of Aboriginal rights. How did the Court arrive at this proposition, and is its formulation persuasive?

[\[1996\] 2 SCR 507, 1996 CanLII 216](#)

LAMER CJ (La Forest, Sopinka, Gonthier, Cory, Iacobucci, and Major JJ concurring):

II. Statement of Facts

[5] The appellant Dorothy Van der Peet was charged under s. 61(1) of the Fisheries Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. F-14, with the offence of selling fish caught under the authority of an Indian food fish licence, contrary to s. 27(5) of the British Columbia Fishery (General) Regulations, SOR/84-248. At the time at which the appellant was charged s. 27(5) read:

27(5) No person shall sell, barter or offer to sell or barter any fish caught under the authority of an Indian food fish licence.

[6] The charges arose out of the sale by the appellant of 10 salmon on September 11, 1987. ... The appellant, a member of the Stó:lō, has not contested these facts at any time, instead defending the charges against her on the basis that in selling the fish she was exercising an existing aboriginal right to sell fish. The appellant [takes] the position that the restrictions imposed by s. 27(5) of the Regulations infringe her existing aboriginal right to sell fish and are therefore invalid on the basis that they violate s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982.

V. Analysis

Introduction

[15] I now turn to the question which ... lies at the heart of this appeal: How should the aboriginal rights recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 be defined?

[16] In her factum the appellant argued that the majority of the Court of Appeal erred because it defined the rights in s. 35(1) in a fashion which "converted a Right into a Relic"; such an approach, the appellant argued, is inconsistent with the fact that the aboriginal rights recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1) are rights and not simply aboriginal practices. The appellant acknowledged that aboriginal rights are based in aboriginal societies and cultures, but argued that the majority of the Court of Appeal erred because it defined aboriginal rights through the identification of pre-contact activities instead of as pre-existing legal rights.

[17] While the appellant is correct to suggest that the mere existence of an activity in a particular aboriginal community prior to contact with Europeans is not, in itself, sufficient foundation for the definition of aboriginal rights, the position she would have this Court adopt takes s. 35(1) too far from that which the provision is intended to protect. Section 35(1), it is true, recognizes and affirms existing aboriginal rights, but it must not be forgotten that the rights it recognizes and affirms are aboriginal.

[18] In the liberal enlightenment view, ... [r]ights are general and universal; they are the way in which the "inherent dignity" of each individual in society is respected

[19] Aboriginal rights cannot, however, be defined on the basis of the philosophical precepts of the liberal enlightenment. Although equal in importance and significance to the rights enshrined in the Charter, aboriginal rights must be viewed differently from Charter rights because they are rights held only by aboriginal members of Canadian society. They arise from the fact that aboriginal people are aboriginal. As academic commentators have noted, aboriginal rights "inhere in the very meaning of aboriginality." ...

[20] The task of this Court is to define aboriginal rights in a manner which recognizes that aboriginal rights are rights but which does so without losing sight of the fact that they are rights held by aboriginal people because they are aboriginal. The Court must neither lose sight of the generalized constitutional status of what s. 35(1) protects, nor can it ignore the necessary specificity which comes from granting special constitutional protection to one part of Canadian society. The Court must define the scope of s. 35(1) in a way which captures both the aboriginal and the rights in aboriginal rights.

[21] The way to accomplish this task is, as was noted at the outset, through a purposive approach to s. 35(1). It is through identifying the interests that s. 35(1) was intended to protect that the dual nature of aboriginal rights will be comprehended. ... A purposive approach to s. 35(1), because ensuring that the provision is not viewed as static and only relevant to current circumstances, will ensure that the recognition and affirmation it offers are consistent with the fact that what it is recognizing and affirming are "rights." Further, because it requires the court to analyze a given constitutional provision "in the light of the interests it was meant to protect" (Big M Drug Mart Ltd., supra, at p. 344), a purposive approach to s. 35(1) will ensure that that which is found to fall within the provision is related to the provision's intended focus: aboriginal people and their rights in relation to Canadian society as a whole.

General Principles Applicable to Legal Disputes Between Aboriginal Peoples and the Crown

[23] Before turning to a purposive analysis of s. 35(1), however, it should be noted that such analysis must take place in light of the general principles which apply to the legal relationship between the Crown and aboriginal peoples. In [R v Sparrow, [1990] 1 SCR 1075, 1990 CanLII 104], this Court held at p. 1106 that s. 35(1) should be given a generous and liberal interpretation in favour of aboriginal peoples. ...

[24] This interpretive principle, articulated first in the context of treaty rights, ... arises from the nature of the relationship between the Crown and aboriginal peoples. The Crown has a fiduciary obligation to aboriginal peoples with the result that in dealings between the government and aborigines the honour of the Crown is at stake. Because of this fiduciary relationship, and its implication of the honour of the Crown, treaties, s. 35(1), and other statutory and constitutional provisions protecting the interests of aboriginal peoples, must be given a generous and liberal interpretation This general principle must inform the Court's analysis of the purposes underlying s. 35(1), and of that provision's definition and scope.

[25] The fiduciary relationship of the Crown and aboriginal peoples also means that where there is any doubt or ambiguity with regards to what falls within the scope and definition of s. 35(1), such doubt or ambiguity must be resolved in favour of aboriginal peoples. ...

[27] When the court identifies a constitutional provision's purposes, or the interests the provision is intended to protect, what it is doing in essence is explaining the rationale of the provision With regards to s. 35(1), then, what the court must do is explain the rationale and foundation of the recognition and affirmation of the special rights of aboriginal peoples; it must identify the basis for the special status that aboriginal peoples have within Canadian society as a whole.

[28] In identifying the basis for the recognition and affirmation of aboriginal rights it must be remembered that s. 35(1) did not create the legal doctrine of aboriginal rights; aboriginal rights existed and were recognized under the common law. ...

[29] ... The pre-existence of aboriginal rights is relevant to the analysis of s. 35(1) because it indicates that aboriginal rights have a stature and existence prior to the constitutionalization of those rights and sheds light on the reasons for protecting those rights

[30] In my view, the doctrine of aboriginal rights exists, and is recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1), because of one simple fact: when Europeans arrived in North America, aboriginal peoples were already here, living in communities on the land, and participating in distinctive cultures, as they had done for centuries. It is this fact, and this fact above all others, which separates aboriginal peoples from all other minority groups in Canadian society and which mandates their special legal, and now constitutional, status.

[31] More specifically, what s. 35(1) does is provide the constitutional framework through which the fact that aborigines lived on the land in distinctive societies, with their own practices, traditions and cultures, is acknowledged and reconciled with the sovereignty of the Crown. The substantive rights which fall within the provision must be defined in light of this purpose; the aboriginal rights recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1) must be directed towards the reconciliation of the pre-existence of aboriginal societies with the sovereignty of the Crown.

[35] The view of aboriginal rights as based in the prior occupation of North America by distinctive aboriginal societies, finds support in the early American decisions of Marshall C.J. Although the constitutional structure of the United States is different from that of Canada, and its aboriginal law has developed in unique directions, I agree with Professor Slattery [Brian Slattery, "Understanding Aboriginal Rights" (1987) 66 Can Bar Rev 727 at 739] both when he describes the Marshall decisions as providing "structure and coherence to an untidy and diffuse body of customary law based on official practice" and when he asserts that these decisions are "as relevant to Canada as they are to the United States." ...

[38] The High Court of Australia has also considered the question of the basis and nature of aboriginal rights. Like that of the United States, Australia's aboriginal law differs in significant respects from that of Canada. ... Despite these relevant differences, the analysis of the basis of aboriginal title in the landmark decision of the High Court in Mabo v. Queensland [No. 2] (1992), 175 C.L.R. 1, is persuasive in the Canadian context.

[39] The Mabo judgment resolved the dispute between the Merriam people and the Crown regarding who had title to the Murray Islands. The islands had been annexed to Queensland in 1879 but were reserved for the native inhabitants (the Merriam) in 1882. The Crown argued that this annexation was sufficient to vest absolute ownership of the lands in the Crown. The High Court disagreed, holding that while the annexation did vest radical title in the Crown, it was insufficient to eliminate a claim for native title

[40] ... Brennan J., writing for a majority of the Court ... consider[ed] the nature and basis of aboriginal title:

Native title has its origin in and is given its content by the traditional laws acknowledged by and the traditional customs observed by the indigenous inhabitants of a territory. The nature and incidents of native title must be ascertained as a matter of fact by reference to those laws and customs. ... [Emphasis added.]

This position is the same as that being adopted here. "Traditional laws" and "traditional customs" are those things passed down, and arising, from the pre-existing culture and customs of aboriginal peoples. ... To base aboriginal title in traditional laws and customs, as was done in Mabo, is, therefore, to base that title in the pre-existing societies of aboriginal peoples. This is the same basis as that asserted here for aboriginal rights.

[41] Academic commentators have also been consistent in identifying the basis and foundation of the s. 35(1) claims of aboriginal peoples in aboriginal occupation of North America prior to the arrival of Europeans. ...

[42] ... In his comment on Delgamuukw v. British Columbia ("British Imperial Constitutional Law and Aboriginal Rights: A Comment on Delgamuukw v. British Columbia" (1992), 17 Queen's L.J. 350), Mark Walters suggests at pp. 412-13 that the essence of aboriginal rights is their bridging of aboriginal and non-aboriginal cultures:

The challenge of defining aboriginal rights stems from the fact that they are rights peculiar to the meeting of two vastly dissimilar legal cultures; consequently there will always be a question about which legal culture is to provide the vantage point from which rights are to be defined. ... [A] morally and politically defensible conception of aboriginal rights will incorporate both legal perspectives. [Emphasis added.]

Similarly, Professor Slattery has suggested that the law of aboriginal rights is "neither English nor aboriginal in origin: it is a form of intersocietal law that evolved from long-standing practices linking the various communities" (Brian Slattery, "The Legal Basis of Aboriginal Title," in Frank Cassidy, ed., Aboriginal Title in British Columbia: Delgamuukw v. The Queen ([Lantzville, BC: Oolichan Books, 1992]), at pp. 120-21)

[44] In order to fulfil the purpose underlying s. 35(1)—i.e., the protection and reconciliation of the interests which arise from the fact that prior to the arrival of Europeans in North America aboriginal peoples lived on the land in distinctive societies, with their own practices, customs and traditions—the test for identifying [aboriginal rights ...] must be directed at identifying the crucial elements of those pre-existing distinctive societies. It must, in other words, aim at identifying the practices, traditions and customs central to the aboriginal societies that existed in North America prior to contact with the Europeans.

[45] In Sparrow, supra, this Court did not have to address the scope of the aboriginal rights protected by s. 35(1); however, in their judgment at p. 1099 Dickson C.J. and La Forest J. identified the Musqueam right to fish for food in the fact that ... participation in the salmon fishery is an aboriginal right because it is an "integral part" of the "distinctive culture" of the Musqueam. This suggestion is consistent with the position just adopted; identifying those practices, customs and traditions that are integral to distinctive aboriginal cultures will serve to identify the crucial elements of the distinctive aboriginal societies that occupied North America prior to the arrival of Europeans.

[46] In light of the suggestion of Sparrow, supra, and the purposes underlying s. 35(1), the following test should be used to identify whether an applicant has established an aboriginal right protected by s. 35(1): in order to be an aboriginal right an activity must be an element of a practice, custom or tradition integral to the distinctive culture of the aboriginal group claiming the right.

Factors to Be Considered in Application of the Integral to a Distinctive Culture Test

Courts Must Take into Account the Perspective of Aboriginal Peoples Themselves

[49] In assessing a claim for the existence of an aboriginal right, a court must take into account the perspective of the aboriginal people claiming the right. In Sparrow, supra, Dickson C.J. and La Forest J. held, at p. 1112, that it is "crucial to be sensitive to the aboriginal perspective itself on the meaning of the rights at stake." It must also be recognized, however, that that perspective must be framed in terms cognizable to the Canadian legal and constitutional structure. As has already been noted, one of the fundamental purposes of s. 35(1) is the reconciliation of the pre-existence of distinctive aboriginal societies with the assertion of Crown sovereignty. Courts adjudicating aboriginal rights claims must, therefore, be sensitive to the aboriginal perspective, but they must also be aware that aboriginal rights exist within the general legal system of Canada. To quote again Walters, at p. 413: "a morally and politically defensible conception of aboriginal rights will incorporate both [aboriginal and non-aboriginal] legal perspectives." The definition of an aboriginal right must, if it is truly to reconcile the prior occupation of Canadian territory by aboriginal peoples with the assertion of Crown sovereignty over that territory, take into account the aboriginal perspective, yet do so in terms which are cognizable to the non-aboriginal legal system.

[50] ... [T]he only fair and just reconciliation is, as Walters suggests, one which takes into account the aboriginal perspective while at the same time taking into account the perspective of the common law. True reconciliation will, equally, place weight on each.

Courts Must Identify Precisely the Nature of the Claim Being Made in Determining Whether an Aboriginal Claimant Has Demonstrated the Existence of an Aboriginal Right

[51] ... [I]n order to determine whether a claim meets the test of being integral to the distinctive culture of the aboriginal group claiming the right, the court must first correctly determine what it is that is being claimed. ...

[52] ... The nature of an applicant's claim must be delineated in terms of the particular practice, custom or tradition under which it is claimed; the significance of the practice, custom or tradition to the aboriginal community is a factor to be considered in determining whether the practice, custom or tradition is integral to the distinctive culture, but the significance of a practice, custom or tradition cannot, itself, constitute an aboriginal right.

[53] To characterize an applicant's claim correctly, a court should consider such factors as the nature of the action which the applicant is claiming was done pursuant to an aboriginal right, the nature of the governmental regulation, statute or action being impugned, and the practice, custom or tradition being relied upon to establish the right. In this case, therefore, the Court will consider the actions which led to the appellant's being charged, the fishery regulation under which she was charged and the practices, customs and traditions she invokes in support of her claim.

[54] ... [A] characterization of the nature of the appellant's claim from the actions which led to her being charged must be undertaken with some caution. ... [T]he activities must be considered at a general rather than at a specific level. Moreover, the court must bear in mind that the activities may be the exercise in a modern form of a practice, custom or tradition that existed prior to contact, and should vary its characterization of the claim accordingly.

In Order to Be Integral a Practice, Custom or Tradition Must Be of Central Significance to the Aboriginal Society in Question

[55] To satisfy the integral to a distinctive culture test the aboriginal claimant must do more than demonstrate that a practice, custom or tradition was an aspect of, or took place in, the aboriginal society of which he or she is a part. The claimant must demonstrate that the practice, custom or tradition was a central and significant part of the society's distinctive culture. He or she must demonstrate, in other words, that the practice, custom or tradition was one of the things which made the culture of the society distinctive—that it was one of the things that truly made the society what it was.

[56] This aspect of the integral to a distinctive culture test arises from fact that aboriginal rights have their basis in the prior occupation of Canada by distinctive aboriginal societies. To recognize and affirm the prior occupation of Canada by distinctive aboriginal societies it is to what makes those societies distinctive that the court must look in identifying aboriginal rights. The court cannot look at those aspects of the aboriginal society that are true of every human society (e.g., eating to survive), nor can it look at those aspects of the aboriginal society that are only incidental or occasional to that society; the court must look instead to the defining and central attributes of the aboriginal society in question. ...

[57] Moreover, ... [t]o reconcile aboriginal societies with Crown sovereignty it is necessary to identify the distinctive features of those societies; it is precisely those distinctive features which need to be acknowledged and reconciled with the sovereignty of the Crown.

[58] ... The significance of the practice, custom or tradition does not serve to identify the nature of a claim of acting pursuant to an aboriginal right; however, it is a key aspect of the court's inquiry into whether a practice, custom or tradition has been shown to be an integral part of the distinctive culture of an aboriginal community. The significance of the practice, custom or tradition will inform a court as to whether or not that practice, custom or tradition can be said to be truly integral to the distinctive culture in question.

[59] A practical way of thinking about this problem is to ask whether, without this practice, custom or tradition, the culture in question would be fundamentally altered or other than what it is. One must ask, to put the question affirmatively, whether or not a practice, custom or tradition is a defining feature of the culture in question.

The Practices, Customs and Traditions Which Constitute Aboriginal Rights Are Those Which Have Continuity with the Practices, Customs and Traditions That Existed Prior to Contact

[60] The time period that a court should consider ... is the period prior to contact between aboriginal and European societies. Because it is the fact that distinctive aboriginal societies lived on the land prior to the arrival of Europeans that underlies the aboriginal rights protected by s. 35(1), it is to that pre-contact period that the courts must look in identifying aboriginal rights.

[61] The fact that the doctrine of aboriginal rights functions to reconcile the existence of pre-existing aboriginal societies with the sovereignty of the Crown does not alter this position. Although it is the sovereignty of the Crown that the pre-existing aboriginal societies are being reconciled with, it is to those pre-existing societies that the court must look in defining aboriginal rights. It is not the fact that aboriginal societies existed prior to Crown sovereignty that is relevant; it is the fact that they existed prior to the arrival of Europeans in North America. As such, the relevant time period is the period prior to the arrival of Europeans, not the period prior to the assertion of sovereignty by the Crown.

[62] That this is the relevant time should not suggest, however, that the aboriginal group claiming the right must accomplish the next to impossible task of producing conclusive evidence from pre-contact times about the practices, customs and traditions of their community. It would be entirely contrary to the spirit and intent of s. 35(1) to define aboriginal rights in such a fashion so as to preclude in practice any successful claim for the existence of such a right. The evidence relied upon by the applicant and the courts may relate to aboriginal practices, customs and traditions post-contact; it simply needs to be directed at demonstrating which aspects of the aboriginal community and society have their origins pre-contact. It is those practices, customs and traditions that can be rooted in the pre-contact societies of the aboriginal community in question that will constitute aboriginal rights.

[63] ... Where an aboriginal community can demonstrate that a particular practice, custom or tradition is integral to its distinctive culture today, and that this practice, custom or tradition has continuity with the practices, customs and traditions of pre-contact times, that community will have demonstrated that the practice, custom or tradition is an aboriginal right for the purposes of s. 35(1).

[64] The concept of continuity is also the primary means through which the definition and identification of aboriginal rights will be consistent with the admonition in Sparrow, supra, at p. 1093, that "the phrase 'existing aboriginal rights' must be interpreted flexibly so as to permit their evolution over time." The concept of continuity is, in other words, the means by which a "frozen rights" approach to s. 35(1) will be avoided. Because the practices, customs and traditions protected by s. 35(1) are ones that exist today, subject only to the requirement that they be demonstrated to have continuity with the practices, customs and traditions which existed pre-contact, the definition of aboriginal rights will be one that, on its own terms, prevents those rights from being frozen in pre-contact times. The evolution of practices, customs and traditions into modern forms will not, provided that continuity with pre-contact practices, customs and traditions is demonstrated, prevent their protection as aboriginal rights.

[65] I would note that the concept of continuity does not require aboriginal groups to provide evidence of an unbroken chain of continuity between their current practices, customs and traditions, and those which existed prior to contact. It may be that for a period of time an aboriginal group, for some reason, ceased to engage in a practice, custom or tradition which existed prior to contact, but then resumed the practice, custom or tradition at a later date. Such an interruption will not preclude the establishment of an aboriginal right. Trial judges should adopt the same flexibility regarding the establishment of continuity that, as is discussed, infra, they are to adopt with regards to the evidence presented to establish the prior-to-contact practices, customs and traditions of the aboriginal group making the claim to an aboriginal right.

Courts Must Approach the Rules of Evidence in Light of the Evidentiary Difficulties Inherent in Adjudicating Aboriginal Claims [68] In determining whether an aboriginal claimant has produced evidence sufficient to demonstrate that her activity is an aspect of a practice, custom or tradition integral to a distinctive aboriginal culture, a court should approach the rules of evidence, and interpret the evidence that exists, with a consciousness of the special nature of aboriginal claims, and of the evidentiary difficulties in proving a right which originates in times where there were no written records of the practices, customs and traditions engaged in. The courts must not undervalue the evidence presented by aboriginal claimants simply because that evidence does not conform precisely with the evidentiary standards that would be applied in, for example, a private law torts case.

Claims to Aboriginal Rights Must Be Adjudicated on a Specific Rather Than General Basis

[69] Courts considering a claim to the existence of an aboriginal right must focus specifically on the practices, customs and traditions of the particular aboriginal group claiming the right. In the case of Kruger [v The Queen, [1978] 1 SCR 104, 1977 CanLII 3]

this Court rejected the notion that claims to aboriginal rights could be determined on a general basis. ... [T]he existence of an aboriginal right will depend entirely on the practices, customs and traditions of the particular aboriginal community claiming the right. ... The fact that one group of aboriginal people has an aboriginal right to do a particular thing will not be, without something more, sufficient to demonstrate that another aboriginal community has the same aboriginal right. The existence of the right will be specific to each aboriginal community.

For a Practice, Custom, or Tradition to Constitute an Aboriginal Right It Must Be of Independent Significance to the Aboriginal Culture in Which It Exists [70] In identifying those practices, customs and traditions that constitute the aboriginal rights recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1), a court must ensure that the practice, custom or tradition relied upon in a particular case is independently significant to the aboriginal community claiming the right. The practice, custom or tradition cannot exist simply as an incident to another practice, custom or tradition but must rather be itself of integral significance to the aboriginal society. Where two customs exist, but one is merely incidental to the other, the custom which is integral to the aboriginal community in question will qualify as an aboriginal right, but the custom that is merely incidental will not. Incidental practices, customs and traditions cannot qualify as aboriginal rights through a process of piggybacking on integral practices, customs and traditions.

The Integral to a Distinctive Culture Test Requires That a Practice, Custom, or Tradition Be Distinctive; It Does Not Require That That Practice, Custom, or Tradition Be Distinct [71] The standard which a practice, custom or tradition must meet in order to be recognized as an aboriginal right is not that it be distinct to the aboriginal culture in question; the aboriginal claimants must simply demonstrate that the practice, custom or tradition is distinctive. A tradition or custom that is distinct is one that is unique—"different in kind or quality; unlike" (Concise Oxford Dictionary of Current English, 9th ed by Della Thompson (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1995)). A culture with a distinct tradition must claim that in having such a tradition it is different from other cultures; a claim of distinctness is, by its very nature, a claim relative to other cultures or traditions. By contrast, a culture that claims that a practice, custom or tradition is distinctive—"distinguishing, characteristic"—makes a claim that is not relative; the claim is rather one about the culture's own practices, customs or traditions considered apart from the practices, customs or traditions of any other culture. It is a claim that this tradition or custom makes the culture what it is, not that the practice, custom or tradition is different from the practices, customs or traditions of another culture. The person or community claiming the existence of an aboriginal right protected by s. 35(1) need only show that the particular practice, custom or tradition which it is claiming to be an aboriginal right is distinctive, not that it is distinct.

The Influence of European Culture Will Only Be Relevant to the Inquiry if It Is Demonstrated That the Practice, Custom, or Tradition Is Only Integral Because of That Influence

[73] The fact that Europeans in North America engaged in the same practices, customs or traditions as those under which an aboriginal right is claimed will only be relevant to the aboriginal claim if the practice, custom or tradition in question can only be said to exist because of the influence of European culture. If the practice, custom or tradition was an integral part of the aboriginal community's culture prior to contact with Europeans, the fact that that practice, custom or tradition continued after the arrival of Europeans, and adapted in response to their arrival, is not relevant to determination of the claim . . . On the other hand, where the practice, custom or tradition arose solely as a response to European influences then that practice, custom or tradition will not meet the standard for recognition of an aboriginal right.

Courts Must Take into Account Both the Relationship of Aboriginal Peoples to the Land and the Distinctive Societies and Cultures of Aboriginal Peoples [74] As was noted in the discussion of the purposes of s. 35(1), aboriginal rights and aboriginal title are related concepts; aboriginal title is a sub-category of aboriginal rights which deals solely with claims of rights to land. The relationship between aboriginal title and aboriginal rights must not, however, confuse the analysis of what constitutes an aboriginal right. Aboriginal rights arise from the prior occupation of land, but they also arise from the prior social organization and distinctive cultures of aboriginal peoples on that land. In considering whether a claim to an aboriginal right has been made out, courts must look at both the relationship of an aboriginal claimant to the land and at the practices, customs and traditions arising from the claimant's distinctive culture and society. Courts must not focus so entirely on the relationship of aboriginal peoples with the land that they lose sight of the other factors relevant to the identification and definition of aboriginal rights.

Application of the Integral to a Distinctive Culture Test to the Appellant's Claim

[76] The first step in the application of the integral to a distinctive culture test requires the court to identify the precise nature of the appellant's claim to have been exercising an aboriginal right. In this case the most accurate characterization of the appellant's position is that she is claiming an aboriginal right to exchange fish for money or for other goods. She is claiming, in other words, that the practices, customs and traditions of the Stó:lō include as an integral part the exchange of fish for money or other goods.

[77] That this is the nature of the appellant's claim can be seen through both the specific acts which led to her being charged and through the regulation under which she was charged. Mrs. Van der Peet sold ten salmon for $50. Such a sale, especially given the absence of evidence that the appellant had sold salmon on other occasions or on a regular basis, cannot be said to constitute a sale on a "commercial" or market basis. These actions are instead best characterized in the simple terms of an exchange of fish for money. It follows from this that the aboriginal right pursuant to which the appellant is arguing that her actions were taken is, like the actions themselves, best characterized as an aboriginal right to exchange fish for money or other goods.

[Chief Justice Lamer then held that the trial judge made no error in justifying an appellate court's substituting its finding of fact. These findings included: (1) prior to contact, exchanges of fish were only "incidental" to fishing for food purposes (at para 86); (2) there was no "regularized trading system" among the Stó:lō prior to contact (at para 88); (3) the trade engaged in between the Stó:lō and the Hudson's Bay Company, while certainly of significance to the Stó:lō society of the time, was found by the trial judge to be qualitatively different from that which was typical of the Stó:lō culture prior to contact; and (4) the Stó:lō exploitation of the fishery was not specialized and that suggested that the exchange of fish was not a central part of Stó:lō culture. As a result, Lamer CJ held that the appellant failed to demonstrate that the exchange of fish for money or other goods was an integral part of the distinctive Stó:lō culture that existed prior to contact, and he dismissed the appeal.]

NOTES

1. Justices L'Heureux-Dubé and McLachlin issued dissenting judgments in Van der Peet. Justice L'Heureux-Dubé outlined and critiqued the majority's approach to characterizing the nature and extent of Aboriginal rights under s 35(1). She advocated describing Aboriginal rights at a fairly high level of abstraction, rather than focusing on the particular Indigenous practice, custom, or tradition. Justice L'Heureux-Dubé rejected the majority's approach as overly majoritarian, unduly restrictive, and as misconstruing Sparrow's use of the words "distinctive culture" (Sparrow at 1099):

[157] [Section] 35(1) should be viewed as protecting, not a catalogue of individualized practices, traditions or customs, as the Chief Justice does, but the "distinctive culture" of which aboriginal activities are manifestations. Simply put, the emphasis would be on the significance of these activities to natives rather than on the activities themselves.

[162] ... The criterion of "distinctive aboriginal culture" should not be limited to those activities that only aboriginal people have undertaken or that non-aboriginal people have not. Rather, all practices, traditions and customs which are connected enough to the self-identity and self-preservation of organized aboriginal societies should be viewed as deserving the protection of s. 35(1). Further, a generous, large and liberal construction should be given to these activities in order to give full effect to the constitutional recognition of the distinctiveness of aboriginal culture. Finally, it is almost trite to say that what constitutes a practice, tradition or custom distinctive to native culture and society must be examined through the eyes of aboriginal people, not through those of the non-native majority or the distorting lens of existing regulations.

Regarding the period of time necessary for an activity to be recognized as an Aboriginal right, L'Heureux-Dubé J adopted what she termed a flexible "dynamic-right" (at para 171) approach in preference to a "frozen-right" approach (at para 171), which, in her view, overstates the impact of European influence, crystallizes Indigenous practices as of an arbitrary date, imposes a heavy burden on those claiming an Aboriginal right, and embodies inappropriate and unprovable assumptions about Indigenous culture and society. To qualify as an Aboriginal right, in her view, an Indigenous activity must have formed an integral part of the distinctive Indigenous culture for a substantially continuous period of time. In the instant case, L'Heureux-Dubé J distinguished the activity in question from commercial fishing, characterizing it instead as the right to sell, trade, and barter fish for livelihood, support, and sustenance. Fishing for this limited purpose, in her view, formed part of the Stó:lō's distinctive Indigenous culture and was protected under s 35(1). Justice L'Heureux-Dubé would have remitted to trial the questions of extinguishment, prima facie infringement, and justification because she found that there was insufficient evidence before the Court to decide these issues.

Justice McLachlin's dissent differed in both reasoning and result. She emphasized the distinction between an Aboriginal right, which is to be broadly conceived and constant over time, and the exercise of that right, which may vary over time and take modern forms. Unlike L'Heureux-Dubé J, she considered the activity in these cases to be undeniably commercial. Nevertheless, she identified the crucial issue to be whether the sale could be defended as the exercise of a basic Aboriginal right to continue a historic use of the resource. Justice McLachlin considered and rejected the "integral part," "dynamic rights," and "integral–incidental" tests, favouring instead an empirical, historical approach to defining Aboriginal rights. She wrote at para 230:

[Section] 35(1) ... recognizes not only prior aboriginal occupation, but also a prior legal regime giving rise to aboriginal rights which persist, absent extinguishment. And it seeks not only to reconcile these claims with European settlement and sovereignty but also to reconcile them in a way that provides the basis for a just and lasting settlement of aboriginal claims consistent with the high standard which the law imposes on the Crown in its dealings with aboriginal peoples.

Applying this view, she found the Stó:lō to have an Aboriginal right to continue to use the resource, though this use would not extend beyond providing for the traditional sustenance needs in their modern form. McLachlin J also articulated and applied a limited view of justification, by which the Crown may prohibit exploitation of a resource only for conservation and the prevention of harm to others. Subject to these limitations, Indigenous people would have a priority to fish for food, ceremony, and supplementary sustenance. Finally, in both cases, she found that the Crown failed to justify the regulations at issue.

2. Requiring Aboriginal rights to manifest continuity with practices, customs, and traditions that existed prior to contact raises conceptual problems with respect to Métis rights recognized by s 35(1), given that Métis peoples are post-contact communities: see R v Powley, 2003 SCC 43, excerpted below in Section VIII, to learn how the Court has addressed this problem.

3. There were two companion cases to Van der Peet. In the first, R v NTC Smokehouse, [\[1996\] 2 SCR 672, 1996 CanLII 159](#), the issue was whether the Sheshaht and Opetchesaht peoples possessed an existing Aboriginal right to exchange fish for money. Chief Justice Lamer (La Forest, Sopinka, Gonthier, Cory, Iacobucci, and Major JJ concurring) affirmed the findings of fact of the trial judge, which did not support the claim that prior to contact the exchange of fish for money was an integral part of the distinctive cultures of the Sheshaht and Opetchesaht peoples. The exchange of fish incidental to social and ceremonial occasions was not a sufficiently central, significant, or defining feature of these societies to be recognized as an Aboriginal right under s 35(1). Justice L'Heureux-Dubé dissented on the basis that the evidence showed that the sale, trade, and barter of fish for livelihood purposes was sufficiently significant and fundamental to the culture and social organization of the groups in question to constitute an Aboriginal right and that the right had not been extinguished prior to 1982. Justice McLachlin also dissented on the basis that there existed an unextinguished right to sell fish, limited to equivalence with what the Sheshaht and Opetchesaht historically took from the fishery in accordance with Indigenous law and custom.

In the second companion case, R v Gladstone, [\[1996\] 2 SCR 723, 1996 CanLII 160](#), the Supreme Court of Canada also addressed the application of the justification test outlined in Sparrow to laws that unduly interfered with the exercise of Aboriginal commercial fishing rights. Gladstone was a member of the Heiltsuk Band, charged with attempting to sell herring spawn on kelp without a proper licence. His defence to the charge was that he was exercising a pre-existing right to fish for commercial purposes. After his conviction was upheld by both the Supreme Court of British Columbia and the Court of Appeal, the accused appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada. A majority of the Court (La Forest J dissenting) found that there was an Aboriginal right that had not been extinguished, and that there was a prima facie infringement. Chief Justice Lamer held the commercial sale or barter of herring spawn on kelp to be an Aboriginal right because it was found to constitute a central, significant, and defining feature of the culture of the Heiltsuk prior to contact. The majority also found that there was no clean and plain intention to extinguish the right, and therefore the regulation of the right was prima facie an infringement. Chief Justice Lamer then turned to the issue of justification.

LAMER CJ (Sopinka, Gonthier, Iacobucci, and Major JJ concurring):

Justification

[54] In [R v Sparrow, [1990] 1 SCR 1075, 1990 CanLII 104], Dickson CJ and La Forest J articulated a two-part test for determining whether government actions infringing aboriginal rights can be justified. ...

[56] ... In this case, where, particularly at the stage of justification, the context varies significantly from that in Sparrow, it will be necessary to revisit the Sparrow test and to adapt the justification test it lays out in order to apply that test to the circumstances of this appeal.

[57] Two points of variation are of particular significance. First, the right recognized and affirmed in this case—to sell herring spawn on kelp commercially—differs significantly from the right recognized and affirmed in Sparrow—the right to fish for food, social and ceremonial purposes. That difference lies in the fact that the right at issue in Sparrow has an inherent limitation which the right recognized and affirmed in this appeal lacks. The food, social and ceremonial needs for fish of any given band of aboriginal people are internally limited—at a certain point the band will have sufficient fish to meet these needs. The commercial sale of the herring spawn on kelp, on the other hand, has no such internal limitation; the only limits on the Heiltsuk's need for herring spawn on kelp for commercial sale are the external constraints of the demand of the market and the availability of the resource. This is particularly so in this case where the evidence supports a right to exchange fish on a genuinely commercial basis; the evidence in this case does not justify limiting the right to harvest herring spawn on kelp on a commercial basis to, for example, the sale of herring spawn on kelp for the purposes of obtaining a "moderate livelihood." ...

[58] The significance of this difference for the Sparrow test relates to the position taken in that case that, subject to the limits of conservation, aboriginal rights holders must be given priority in the fishery. In a situation where the aboriginal right is internally limited, so that it is clear when that right has been satisfied and other users can be allowed to participate in the fishery, the notion of priority, as articulated in Sparrow, makes sense. In that situation it is understandable that in an exceptional year, when conservation concerns are severe, it will be possible for aboriginal rights holders to be alone allowed to participate in the fishery, while in more ordinary years other users will be allowed to participate in the fishery after the aboriginal rights to fish for food, social and ceremonial purposes have been met.

[59] Where the aboriginal right has no internal limitation, however, what is described in Sparrow as an exceptional situation becomes the ordinary: in the circumstance where the aboriginal right has no internal limitation, the notion of priority, as articulated in Sparrow, would mean that where an aboriginal right is recognized and affirmed that right would become an exclusive one. Because the right to sell herring spawn on kelp to the commercial market can never be said to be satisfied while the resource is still available and the market is not sated, to give priority to that right in the manner suggested in Sparrow would be to give the right-holder exclusivity over any person not having an aboriginal right to participate in the herring spawn on kelp fishery.

[61] The basic insight of Sparrow—that aboriginal rights holders have priority in the fishery—is a valid and important one; however, the articulation in that case of what priority means, and its suggestion that it can mean exclusivity under certain limited circumstances, must be refined to take into account the varying circumstances which arise when the aboriginal right in question has no internal limitations.

[62] Where the aboriginal right is one that has no internal limitation then the doctrine of priority does not require that, after conservation goals have been met, the government allocate the fishery so that those holding an aboriginal right to exploit that fishery on a commercial basis are given an exclusive right to do so. Instead, the doctrine of priority requires that the government demonstrate that, in allocating the resource, it has taken account of the existence of aboriginal rights and allocated the resource in a manner respectful of the fact that those rights have priority over the exploitation of the fishery by other users. This right is at once both procedural and substantive; at the stage of justification the government must demonstrate both that the process by which it allocated the resource and the actual allocation of the resource which results from that process reflect the prior interest of aboriginal rights holders in the fishery.

[64] That no blanket requirement is imposed under the priority doctrine should not suggest, however, that no guidance is possible in this area, or that the government's actions will not be subject to scrutiny. Questions relevant to the determination of whether the government has granted priority to aboriginal rights holders are those enumerated in Sparrow relating to consultation and compensation, as well as questions such as whether the government has accommodated the exercise of the aboriginal right to participate in the fishery (through reduced licence fees, for example), whether the government's objectives ... take into account the priority of aboriginal rights holders, the extent of the [aboriginal] participation in the fishery of aboriginal rights holders relative to their percentage of the population, how the government has accommodated different aboriginal rights in a particular fishery (food versus commercial rights, for example), how important the fishery is to the economic and material well-being of the band in question, and the criteria taken into account by the government in, for example, allocating commercial licences amongst different users. These questions ... do not represent an exhaustive list[;] ... they give some indication, however, of what such an inquiry should look like.

[69] I now turn to the second significant difference between this case and Sparrow. In Sparrow, while the Court recognized at p. 1113 that, beyond conservation, there could be other “compelling and substantial” objectives pursuant to which the government could act in accordance with the first branch of the justification test, the Court was not required to delineate what those objectives might be. Further, in delineating the priority requirement, and the relationship between aboriginal rights-holders and other users of the fishery, the only objective considered by the Court was conservation. ...

[70] ... [I]n this case ... almost no evidence has been provided to this Court about the objectives the government was pursuing in allocating the herring resource as it did. Absent some concrete objectives to assess, it is difficult to identify the objectives other than conservation that will meet the "compelling and substantial" standard laid out in Sparrow. That being said, however, it is possible to make some general observations

[73] Aboriginal rights are recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1) in order to reconcile the existence of distinctive aboriginal societies prior to the arrival of Europeans in North America with the assertion of Crown sovereignty over that territory; they are the means by which the critical and integral aspects of those societies are maintained. Because, however, distinctive aboriginal societies exist within, and are a part of, a broader social, political and economic community, over which the Crown is sovereign, there are circumstances in which, in order to pursue objectives of compelling and substantial importance to that community as a whole (taking into account the fact that aboriginal societies are a part of that community), some limitation of those rights will be justifiable. Aboriginal rights are a necessary part of the reconciliation of aboriginal societies with the broader political community of which they are part; limits placed on those rights are, where the objectives furthered by those limits are of sufficient importance to the broader community as a whole, equally a necessary part of that reconciliation.

[74] ... Given the integral role the fishery has played in the distinctive cultures of many aboriginal peoples, conservation can be said to be something the pursuit of which can be linked to the recognition of the existence of such distinctive cultures. Moreover, because conservation is of such overwhelming importance to Canadian society as a whole, including aboriginal members of that society, it is a goal the pursuit of which is consistent with the reconciliation of aboriginal societies with the larger Canadian society of which they are a part. In this way, conservation can be said to be a compelling and substantial objective

[75] Although by no means making a definitive statement on this issue, I would suggest that ... after conservation goals have been met, objectives such as the pursuit of economic and regional fairness, and the recognition of the historical reliance upon, and participation in, the fishery by non-aboriginal groups, are the type of objectives which can (at least in the right circumstances) satisfy this standard. In the right circumstances, such objectives are in the interest of all Canadians and, more importantly, the reconciliation of aboriginal societies with the rest of Canadian society may well depend on their successful attainment.

[77] Other than with regards to the first aspect of the government's regulatory scheme, the evidence and testimony presented in this case is insufficient for this Court to make a determination as to whether the government's regulatory scheme is justified. [The Court outlined what it viewed as the evidentiary deficiencies.] It is not that the Crown has failed to discharge its burden of demonstrating that the scheme for allocating the 20% of the herring stock was justified; it is simply that the question of whether or not that scheme of allocation was justified was not addressed at trial, at least in the sense necessary for this Court to decide the question of whether, under the Sparrow test, it was justified.

[83] A new trial on the question of justification will remedy this deficiency A new trial is not, however, necessary with regards to the first aspect of the government's scheme; the evidentiary record clearly demonstrates that this aspect of the government's scheme was justified. Witnesses testified as to the conservation objectives of setting the stock at 20 per cent and as to the difficulties encountered by the herring fishery when the catch was set at much higher levels, as was the case in the 1960s. Moreover, the defence witness Dr. Gary Vigers testified that "fisheries management is full of uncertainty"; in the context of such uncertainty this Court must grant a certain level of deference to the government's approach to fisheries management.

[85] In the result, the appeal is allowed and a new trial directed on the issue of guilt or innocence and, with regards to the constitutionality of s. 20(3), on the issue of the justifiability of the government's allocation of herring.

[Justice L'Heureux-Dubé, in separate reasons, concurred with Lamer CJ. Justice McLachlin, in separate reasons, would have allowed the appeal to the extent of confirming the existence of an Aboriginal right of the Heiltsuk to sell herring spawn on kelp for sustenance purposes and would have ordered a new trial to decide whether that right had been infringed and, if so, whether such an infringement had been justified.]

NOTES

1. The justification test for the infringement of Aboriginal rights as modified by Gladstone has not been without controversy. Justice McLachlin warned of this in Van der Peet when she observed:

[306] ... The extension of the concept of compelling objectives to matters like economic development and regional fairness and the interests of aboriginal fishers ... would negate the very Aboriginal right to fish itself, on the ground that this is required for the reconciliation of Aboriginal rights, and other interests and the consequent good of the community as a whole. This is not limitation required for the responsible exercise of the right, but rather limitation based on the economic demands of non-aboriginal individuals. It is a limitation of a different order than the conservation, harm prevention type of limitation sanctioned in Sparrow.

2. Aboriginal rights in Quebec are not treated any differently from the way they are in the rest of the country, despite the historic presence of French sovereignty in the region. In R v Côté, [1996] 3 SCR 139, 1996 CanLII 170, Lamer CJ (Sopinka, Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin, Iacobucci, and Major JJ concurring) wrote:

[51] I do not believe that the intervention of French sovereignty negated the potential existence of aboriginal rights within the former boundaries of New France under s. 35(1). The entrenchment of aboriginal ancestral and treaty rights in s. 35(1) has changed the landscape of aboriginal rights in Canada. As explained in the Van der Peet trilogy, the purpose of s. 35(1) was to extend constitutional protection to the practices, customs and traditions central to the distinctive culture of aboriginal societies prior to contact with Europeans. If such practices, customs and traditions continued following contact in the absence of specific extinguishment, such practices, customs and traditions are entitled to constitutional recognition subject to the infringement and justification tests outlined in Sparrow, supra, and Gladstone, supra.

[52] As such, the fact that a particular practice, custom or tradition continued, in an unextinguished manner, following the arrival of Europeans but in the absence of the formal gloss of legal recognition from French colonial law should not undermine the constitutional protection accorded to aboriginal peoples. Section 35(1) would fail to achieve its noble purpose of preserving the integral and defining features of distinctive aboriginal societies if it only protected those defining features which were fortunate enough to have received the legal recognition and approval of European colonizers. I should stress that the French Regime's failure to recognize legally a specific aboriginal practice, custom or tradition (and indeed the French Regime's tacit toleration of a specific practice, custom or tradition) clearly cannot be equated with a "clear and plain" intention to extinguish such practices under the extinguishment test of s. 35(1). See Sparrow, supra, at p. 1099; Gladstone, supra, at para. 34.

[53] The respondent's view, if adopted, would create an awkward patchwork of constitutional protection for aboriginal rights across the nation, depending upon the historical idiosyncrasies of colonization over particular regions of the country. In my respectful view, such a static and retrospective interpretation of s. 35(1) cannot be reconciled with the noble and prospective purpose of the constitutional entrenchment of aboriginal and treaty rights in the Constitution Act, 1982. Indeed, the respondent's proposed interpretation risks undermining the very purpose of s. 35(1) by perpetuating the historical injustice suffered by aboriginal peoples at the hands of colonizers who failed to respect the distinctive cultures of pre-existing aboriginal societies. To quote the words of Brennan J. in Mabo v. Queensland [No. 2] (1992), 175 C.L.R. 1 (H.C.), at p. 42:

Whatever the justification advanced in earlier days for refusing to recognize the rights and interests in land of the indigenous inhabitants of settled colonies, an unjust and discriminatory doctrine of that kind can no longer be accepted.

3. Two unsuccessful claims for recognition of Aboriginal rights under the Van der Peet test are found in Section X, "Indigenous Rights of Self-Government": R v Pamajewon, [1996] 2 SCR 821, 1996 CanLII 161 (no right to conduct high stakes gambling on a reserve) and Mitchell v MNR, 2001 SCC 33 (no right to cross the border into Canada from the United States without paying customs and excise tax).

NOTE: R V SAPPIER; R V GRAY

In R v Sappier; R v Gray, 2006 SCC 54, at issue was whether the Maliseet and Mi'kmaq peoples in New Brunswick possessed an Aboriginal right to harvest timber on Crown lands for personal use. In holding for the Maliseet and Mi'kmaq, Bastarache J, for a majority of the Court, held that "an aboriginal right cannot be characterized as a right to a particular resource because to do so would be to treat it as akin to a common law property right" (at para 21). Instead, attention must be paid to the significance of the resource to the community in question:

[22] ... [I]n order to grasp the importance of a resource to a particular aboriginal people, the Court seeks to understand how that resource was harvested, extracted and utilized. These practices are the necessary "aboriginal" component in aboriginal rights. ... The goal for courts is, therefore, to determine how the claimed right relates to the pre-contact culture or way of life of an aboriginal society. This has been achieved by requiring aboriginal rights claimants to found their claim on a pre-contact practice which was integral to the distinctive culture of the particular aboriginal community. It is critically important that the Court be able to identify a practice that helps to define the distinctive way of life of the community as an aboriginal community. The importance of leading evidence about the pre-contact practice upon which the claimed right is based should not be understated. In the absence of such evidence, courts will find it difficult to relate the claimed right to the pre-contact way of life of the specific aboriginal people, so as to trigger s. 35 protection.

[24] In the present cases, the relevant practice for the purposes of the Van der Peet test is harvesting wood. It is this practice upon which the respondents opted to found their claims. However, the respondents do not claim a right to harvest wood for any and all purposes—such a right would not provide sufficient specificity to apply the reasoning I have just described. The respondents instead claim the right to harvest timber for personal uses; I find this characterization to be too general as well. As previously explained, it is critical that the Court identify a practice that helps to define the way of life or distinctiveness of the particular aboriginal community. The claimed right should then be delineated in accordance with that practice: see Van der Peet, at para. 52. The way of life of the Maliseet and of the Mi'kmaq during the pre-contact period is that of a migratory people who lived from fishing and hunting and who used the rivers and lakes of Eastern Canada for transportation. Thus, the practice should be characterized as the harvesting of wood for certain uses that are directly associated with that particular way of life. The record shows that wood was used to fulfill the communities' domestic needs for such things as shelter, transportation, tools and fuel. I would therefore characterize the respondents' claim as a right to harvest wood for domestic uses as a member of the aboriginal community.

Justice Bastarache went on to discuss the meaning of "distinctive culture":

[42] ... [T]his Court in Van der Peet set out to interpret s. 35 of the Constitution in a way which captures both the aboriginal and the rights in aboriginal rights. Lamer CJ spoke of the "necessary specificity which comes from granting special constitutional protection to one part of Canadian society" (para. 20). It is that aboriginal specificity which the notion of a "distinctive culture" seeks to capture. However, it is clear that "Aboriginality means more than interesting cultural practices and anthropological curiosities worthy only of a museum" (C.C. Cheng, "Touring the Museum: A Comment on R. v. Van der Peet" (1997), 55 U.T. Fac. L. Rev. 419, at p. 434). R. L. Barsh and J. Y. Henderson argue that as a result of the Van der Peet decision, "'culture' has implicitly been taken to mean a fixed inventory of traits or characteristics" ("The Supreme Court's Van der Peet Trilogy: Naïve Imperialism and Ropes of Sand" (1997), 42 McGill L.J. 993, at p. 1002).

[43] Many of these concerns echo those expressed by McLachlin J (as she then was) and by L'Heureux-Dubé J in dissenting opinions in Van der Peet. L'Heureux-Dubé J was of the view that "the approach based on aboriginal practices, traditions and customs considers only discrete parts of aboriginal culture, separating them from the general culture in which they are rooted" (para. 150). McLachlin J opined that "different people may entertain different ideas of what is distinctive," thereby creating problems of indeterminacy in the Van der Peet test (para. 257).

[44] Culture, let alone "distinctive culture," has proven to be a difficult concept to grasp for Canadian courts. Moreover, the term "culture" as it is used in the English language may not find a perfect parallel in certain aboriginal languages. Barsh and Henderson note that "[w]e can find no precise equivalent of European concepts of 'culture' in Mi'kmaq, for example. How we maintain contact with our traditions is tan'telo'tlieki-p. How we perpetuate our consciousness is described as tlinuo'lti'k. How we maintain our language is tlinuita'sim. Each of these terms connotes a process rather than a thing" (p. 1002, note 30). Ultimately, the concept of culture is itself inherently cultural.

[45] The aboriginal rights doctrine, which has been constitutionalized by s. 35, arises from the simple fact of prior occupation of the lands now forming Canada. The "integral to a distinctive culture" test must necessarily be understood in this context. As L'Heureux-Dubé J explained in dissent in Van der Peet, "[t]he 'distinctive aboriginal culture' must be taken to refer to the reality that, despite British sovereignty, aboriginal people were the original organized society occupying and using Canadian lands: Calder v. [British Columbia (AG), [1973] SCR 313, 1973 CanLII 4], at p. 328, per Judson J., and Guerin v The Queen, [1984] 2 SCR 335, 1984 CanLII 25, at p. 379, per Dickson J. (as he then was)" (para. 159). The focus of the Court should therefore be on the nature of this prior occupation. What is meant by "culture" is really an inquiry into the pre-contact way of life of a particular aboriginal community, including their means of survival, their socialization methods, their legal systems, and, potentially, their trading habits. The use of the word "distinctive" as a qualifier is meant to incorporate an element of aboriginal specificity. However, "distinctive" does not mean "distinct," and the notion of aboriginality must not be reduced to "racialized stereotypes of Aboriginal peoples" (J. Borrow and L. I. Rotman, "The Sui Generis Nature of Aboriginal Rights: Does it Make a Difference?" (1997), 36 Alta. L. Rev. 9, at p. 36).

[46] In post-hearing submissions to the Court of Appeal in the Sappier and Polchies case, the Crown admitted that gathering birch bark for the construction of canoes or hemlock for basket-making were practices likely integral to the distinctive Maliseet culture (para. 94). But it would be a mistake to reduce the entire pre-contact distinctive Maliseet culture to canoe-building and basket-making. To hold otherwise would be to fall in the trap of reducing an entire people's culture to specific anthropological curiosities and, potentially, racialized aboriginal stereotypes. Instead, the Court must first inquire into the way of life of the Maliseet and Mi'kmaq, pre-contact. As previously explained, these were migratory communities using the rivers and lakes of Eastern Canada for transportation and living essentially from hunting and fishing. The Court must therefore seek to understand how the particular pre-contact practice relied upon relates to that way of life. In the present cases, the practice of harvesting wood for domestic uses including shelter, transportation, fuel and tools is directly related to the way of life I have just described. I have already explained that we must discard the idea that the practice must go to the core of a people's culture. The fact that harvesting wood for domestic uses was undertaken for survival purposes is sufficient, given the evidence adduced at trial, to meet the integral to a distinctive culture threshold.

NOTE: SCOPING ABORIGINAL RIGHTS, "DISTINCTIVE CULTURE IS NOT WAYS OF LIFE": LAX KW'ALAAMS INDIAN BAND V CANADA (AG) AND AHOUSAHT INDIAN BAND AND NATION V CANADA (AG)

In Lax Kw'alaams Indian Band v Canada (AG), 2011 SCC 56, the Supreme Court, in a unanimous judgment authored by Binnie J., placed further limits on the interpretation of rights that could be claimed to flow from the period just before European contact. At issue was whether the Lax Kw'alaams had an Aboriginal right to commercial harvesting and sale of "all species of fish" within their traditional waters. The First Nation argued (at para 53) that sporadic trade in ... fish products was ... part of their ancestral "way of life" and, on that account, they should be allowed to continue to engage in trade in fish generally under the protection of s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982.

In rejecting this argument, the Court found the Lax Kw'alaams framed their argument too broadly. The Court held that rights to a contemporary commercial fishery could not be founded on a limited ancestral trade in eulachon grease. While the Court recognized that Aboriginal rights can evolve, both in terms of the subject matter and the method of its exercise, in this case the Court wrote that a commercial fishery would create a right qualitatively and quantitatively different from the pre-contact trade in eulachon grease. The Court arrived at this conclusion by finding that "the reference in Sappier to a pre-contact 'way of life' should not be read as departing from the 'distinctive culture' test set out in Van der Peet" (at para 54). In support of its conclusion, the Supreme Court wrote:

[40] The heart of the Lax Kw'alaams' argument on this point is that "before a court can characterize a claimed aboriginal right, it must first inquire and make findings about the pre-contact practices and way of life of the claimant group" ... (emphasis in original). I would characterize this approach as a "commission of inquiry" model in which a commissioner embarks on a voyage of discovery armed only with very general terms of reference. Quite apart from being inconsistent with the jurisprudence that calls for "characterization of the claim" as a first step, the "commission of inquiry" approach is not suitable in civil litigation, even in civil litigation conducted under rules generously interpreted in Aboriginal cases to facilitate the resolution in the public interest of the underlying controversies.

[41] ... The trial of an action should not resemble a voyage on the Flying Dutchman with a crew condemned to roam the seas interminably with no set destination and no end in sight.

[46] ... [A] court dealing with a s. 35(1) claim would appropriately proceed as follows:

1. First, at the characterization stage, identify the precise nature of the First Nation's claim to an Aboriginal right based on the pleadings. If necessary, in light of the evidence, refine the characterization of the right claimed on terms that are fair to all parties.
2. Second, determine whether the First Nation has proved, based on the evidence adduced at trial:
 - (a) the existence of the pre-contact practice, tradition or custom advanced in the pleadings as supporting the claimed right; and
 - (b) that this practice was integral to the distinctive pre-contact Aboriginal society.
3. Third, determine whether the claimed modern right has a reasonable degree of continuity with the "integral" pre-contact practice. In other words, is the claimed modern right demonstrably connected to, and reasonably regarded as a continuation of, the pre-contact practice? At this step, the court should take a generous though realistic approach to matching pre-contact practices to the claimed modern right. ...

[55] Counsel for the Lax Kw'alaams argues that, even if pre-contact trade had been limited to eulachon grease (which they deny), the modern right should not be "frozen" but should be generalized and "evolved" to include all other fish species and fish products.

[56] However, such an "evolution" would run counter to the trial judge's clear finding that the ancestors of the Lax Kw'alaams fished all species but did not trade in any significant way in species of fish or fish products other than eulachon. Extension of a modern right to all species would directly contradict her view that only the "species-specific" trade in eulachon grease was integral to the distinctive culture of the pre-contact society. A general commercial fishery would represent an outcome qualitatively different from the pre-contact activity on which it would ostensibly be based, and out of all proportion to its original importance to the pre-contact Tsimshian economy.

[57] The "species-specific" debate will generally turn on the facts of a particular case.

In contrast to the result in Lax Kw'alaams, in Ahousaht Indian Band and Nation v Canada (AG), [\[2011 BCCA 237\]](#), leave to appeal to SCC refused, [2011] SCCA No 353 (QL), the Nuu-chah-nulth (NCN) people were found to possess a broad right to "fish and sell fish" based on evidence that "at the time of contact, groups comprising ancestors of the NCN fished extensively and used the resources harvested both for food and for trade, regularly exchanging substantial quantities of fisheries resources with other groups for economic purposes" (at para 16). The trial judge had recognized a harvesting right within the NCN's traditional territory (to a limit of nine miles from shore). She had declined to delineate limitations on individual species, which could be harvested and sold on the basis that the evidence had demonstrated the ancestors of the NCN harvested and traded in numerous species of fish within their territories. The BC Court of Appeal affirmed the decision of the trial judge except with respect to one species of clam, the geoduck, which required special technology to harvest:

[69] ... [B]ecause the commercial geoduck fishery is ... a high tech fishery of very recent origin, there can be no viable suggestion that the ancestors of the respondents could have participated in the commercial harvesting and trading of this particular marine resource at some time before contact with explorers and traders late in the 18th century. There is simply no adequate basis in the evidence to support an ancestral practice that would translate into any modern right to participate in harvesting and selling this marine food resource.

2. Scoping Aboriginal rights through geographic considerations: In R v Desautel, 2021 SCC 17, the Supreme Court of Canada found that Indigenous peoples now residing in the United States could be recognized as holding constitutionally protected Aboriginal rights in Canada. Desautel was charged under British Columbia's Wildlife Act, RSBC 1996, c 488 for hunting without a licence and not being a resident of the province. Desautel is a member of the Lakes Tribe of the Colville Confederated Tribes in Washington State, which is a successor group of the Sinixt people who lived in British Columbia prior to 1930. Since Desautel shot the animal in his ancestral territory, he argued that he had an Aboriginal right to hunt that was a full defence to the charge under the Wildlife Act. The Court agreed.

The Court first had to consider whether an Indigenous group who now resided in the United States could be an Indigenous people of Canada. In affirming that they could, after reviewing their earlier case law, the Court wrote:

[31] ... s. 35(1) serves to recognize the prior occupation of Canada by Aboriginal societies and to reconcile their contemporary existence with Crown sovereignty. These purposes are expressed in the doctrinal structure of Aboriginal law, which gives effect to rights and relationships that arise from the prior occupation of Canada by Aboriginal societies. Implicit in this doctrinal structure, and the purposes that underlie it, is the answer to our question. The Aboriginal peoples of Canada under s. 35(1) are the modern successors of those Aboriginal societies that occupied Canadian territory at the time of European contact. This may include Aboriginal groups that are now outside Canada.

[33] I would add that an interpretation of "aboriginal peoples of Canada" in s. 35(1) that includes Aboriginal peoples who were here when the Europeans arrived and later moved or were forced to move elsewhere, or on whom international boundaries were imposed, reflects the purpose of reconciliation. The displacement of Aboriginal peoples as a result of colonization is well acknowledged:

Aboriginal peoples were displaced physically—they were denied access to their traditional territories and in many cases actually forced to move to new locations selected for them by colonial authorities. They were also displaced socially and culturally, subject to intensive missionary activity and the establishment of schools—which undermined their ability to pass on traditional values to their children, imposed male-oriented Victorian values, and attacked traditional activities such as significant dances and other ceremonies. In North America they were also displaced politically, forced by colonial laws to abandon or at least disguise traditional governing structures and processes in favour of colonial-style municipal institutions. (Report of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, vol. 1, Looking Forward, Looking Back (1996), at pp. 139–40)

By contrast, an interpretation that excludes Aboriginal peoples who were forced to move out of Canada would risk "perpetuating the historical injustice suffered by aboriginal peoples at the hands of colonizers" (R. v. Côté, [1996] 3 S.C.R. 139, at para. 53).

[34] Moreover, it bears emphasis that s. 35(1) did not create Aboriginal rights. As Calder and indeed the Royal Proclamation, 1763 (G.B.), 3 Geo. 3 (reproduced in R.S.C. 1985, App. II, No. 1), show, Aboriginal rights long predicated 1982 What s. 35(1) did was to give Aboriginal and treaty rights—which it explicitly recognizes as already "existing"—constitutional protection (Van der Peet, at paras. 28–29). Even though some s. 35(1) Aboriginal rights would not have been recognized under pre-1982 Canadian law (Côté, at para. 52), the practices, customs and traditions that underlie these rights existed before 1982. An interpretation of s. 35(1) that limits its scope to those Aboriginal peoples who were located in Canada in 1982 would fail to give effect to this point by treating s. 35(1) as the source of Aboriginal rights.

[48] In the present case, the trial judge found as a fact that the Sinixt had occupied territory in what is now British Columbia at the time of European contact. She also found that the Lakes Tribe were a modern successor of the Sinixt

After determining that the Sinixt were Indigenous peoples of Canada, the Supreme Court determined that they had Aboriginal rights to hunt by applying the Van der Peet case. The Court wrote:

[62] In the present case, the Aboriginal right claimed is a right to hunt for food, social and ceremonial purposes within the traditional territory of the Sinixt in British Columbia. The trial judge found, based on the evidence before her, that at the time of contact this practice was integral to the distinctive culture of the Sinixt. She also found that the modern-day practice of hunting in this territory, as Mr. Desautel did, is a continuation of this pre-contact practice. Indeed, setting aside the periods in which no hunting took place, there was no significant dissimilarity between the pre-contact practice and the modern one As a result, she found that Mr. Desautel was exercising an Aboriginal right.

[63] The Crown and the intervener Attorney General of Alberta submit that this was an error, because continuity requires an ongoing presence in the lands over which an Aboriginal right is asserted. As my discussion of continuity should make clear, this has never been part of the test for an Aboriginal right. Nor is there any basis for adding it to the test, even where the claimant is outside Canada. As Lamer C.J. explained in Van der Peet, at para. 65, "an unbroken chain of continuity" is not required. Indeed, as McLachlin J. (dissenting, but not on this point) noted in Van der Peet, at para. 249, "it is not unusual for the exercise of a right to lapse for a period of time."

After writing that it was unnecessary to rule on whether recognizing an Aboriginal right for an Indigenous group who now resides in the United States was incompatible with Crown sovereignty, the Court found the Crown had a duty to consult such groups. However, the Supreme Court said the content of this duty depends on the context.

[76] Once the Crown is put on notice, ... [about potential Aboriginal rights for Indigenous groups outside Canada], it has to determine whether a duty to consult arises and, if so, what the scope of the duty is. As I mentioned earlier, consultation is part of a "process of fair dealing and reconciliation" which "arises ... from the Crown's assertion of sovereignty" (Haida, at para. 32). Because groups outside Canada are not implicated in this process to the same degree, the scope of the Crown's duty to consult with them, and the manner in which it is given effect, may differ. Integrating groups outside Canada into consultations by the Crown with groups inside Canada may involve discussions within Aboriginal communities and with the Crown. While the consultation process may be more challenging when it involves groups outside Canada, as this Court said in Powley, at para. 49, "the difficulty of identifying members of the [Aboriginal] community must not be exaggerated as a basis for defeating their rights under the Constitution of Canada."

At the end of the Desautel decision the Supreme Court recognized the place for Indigenous law in determining their identity:

[86] In my view, the authoritative interpretation of s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, is for the courts. It is for Aboriginal peoples, however, to define themselves and to choose by what means to make their decisions, according to their own laws, customs and practices.

Does the Court's recognition of Indigenous law as having contemporary relevance have any significant constitutional implications?

V. CONSTITUTIONAL RECOGNITION OF ABORIGINAL TITLE

The relationship between Aboriginal title and the Aboriginal rights recognized and affirmed by s 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 was first addressed by the Supreme Court of Canada in R v Adams, [1996] 3 SCR 101, 1996 CanLII 169. In Adams, in the course of dealing with a claim for recognition of Aboriginal fishing rights, a majority of the Court held that under s 35(1), Aboriginal title was a specific subset of Aboriginal rights that could be distinguished from other Aboriginal rights recognized under the Van der Peet test, such as site-specific hunting and fishing rights. These “lesser” rights could exist even if a claim for Aboriginal title was not made out. Further elaboration of Aboriginal title under s 35 continued one year later in Delgamuukw v British Columbia, [1997] 3 SCR 1010, 1997 CanLII 302. Building on Delgamuukw, in 2014, the Supreme Court of Canada granted its first declaration of Aboriginal title in Tsilhqot'in Nation v British Columbia, 2014 SCC 44.

As outlined earlier, historically, one of the primary methods to deal with Aboriginal title has been the signing of treaties following the principles outlined and agreed to in the Royal Proclamation of 1763. However, there were places in Canada where these principles were not followed, and land was not the subject of treaty promises. These areas include the Maritimes, parts of the North, southern Quebec, and British Columbia. The existence of Aboriginal title is a contemporary issue in these areas. The issue of Aboriginal title has proven to be a particularly charged and high-profile issue in British Columbia, bringing into question the issue of property and resource use rights in many parts of the province.

When British Columbia entered Confederation in 1871, Indigenous people outnumbered non-Indigenous people by a ratio of 2:1. However, among the first acts of the newly created provincial legislature was the disenfranchisement of Indigenous people from voting and the removal of Indigenous peoples to small reserves. There was also an explicit denial of Aboriginal title, and a disallowance of any attempt by Indigenous peoples to take up land through pre-emption, as was permitted for newly arriving non-Indigenous settlers. These actions all took place against the strong objections of numerous First Nations throughout the province, and numerous commissions were set up to deal with their complaints. Unfortunately, these bodies repeatedly failed to address the underlying conflict concerning Indigenous peoples’ pre-existing interest in land and the provincial government’s non-recognition of Aboriginal title. The federal government also failed to bring any resolution to this issue under its authority for “Indians and Lands reserved for the Indians” in s 91(24) of the British North America Act, 1867. When, in 1927, it looked as though the Allied Tribes of British Columbia might finally succeed in pressing a case to the Privy Council, the Indian Act was amended to make it illegal to raise funds for or hire a lawyer for land claims purposes. As a result, the issue of Aboriginal title in British Columbia did not appear before the courts until the early 1970s in the Calder case and did not receive any treatment under s 35(1) until the groundbreaking case of Delgamuukw v British Columbia, immediately below.

LAMER CJ (Cory, Major, and McLachlin JJ concurring):

[7] This action was commenced by the appellants, who are all Gitksan or Wet’suwet’en hereditary chiefs, who, both individually and on behalf of their “Houses” claimed separate portions of 58,000 square kilometres in British Columbia. For the purpose of the claim, this area was divided into 133 individual territories, claimed by the 71 Houses. This represents all of the Wet'suwet'en people, and all but 12 of the Gitksan Houses. Their claim was originally for "ownership" of the territory and "jurisdiction" over it. (At this Court, this was transformed into, primarily, a claim for aboriginal title over the land in question.) The province of British Columbia counterclaimed for a declaration that the appellants have no right or interest in and to the territory or alternatively, that the appellants' cause of action ought to be for compensation from the Government of Canada.

[At the time of trial, the Gitksan consisted of approximately 4,000 to 5,000 persons in the watersheds of the north and central Skeena, Nass, and Babine Rivers. The Wet'suwet'en consisted of approximately 1,500 to 2,000 persons, mainly in the watersheds of the Bulkley and parts of the Fraser-Nechako River systems. There were also approximately 30,000 non-Aborigines living in the territory at the time of the trial. There was archeological evidence, which was accepted at trial, that there was some form of human habitation in the territory and its surrounding areas from 3,500 to 6,000 years ago. The trial judge held that the time of direct contact in the claimed territory was approximately 1820.]

B. What Is the Ability of This Court to Interfere with the Factual Findings Made by the Trial Judge?

(1) General Principles

[82] ... [A]lthough the doctrine of aboriginal rights is a common law doctrine, aboriginal rights are truly sui generis, and demand a unique approach to the treatment of evidence which accords due weight to the perspective of aboriginal peoples. However, that accommodation must be done in a manner which does not strain "the Canadian legal and constitutional structure" [R v Van der Peet, [1996] 2 SCR 507, 1996 CanLII 216] (at para. 49). ...

[84] ... In practical terms, this requires the courts to come to terms with the oral histories of aboriginal societies, which, for many aboriginal nations, are the only record of their past. ...

[86] Many features of oral histories would count against both their admissibility and their weight as evidence of prior events in a court that took a traditional approach to the rules of evidence. The most fundamental of these is their broad social role not only "as a repository of historical knowledge for a culture" but also as an expression of "the values and mores of [that] culture." ... Dickson J. (as he then was) recognized as much when he stated in Kruger v. The Queen, [1978] 1 S.C.R. 104, at p. 109, that "[c]laims to aboriginal title are woven with history, legend, politics and moral obligations." The difficulty with these features of oral histories is that they are tangential to the ultimate purpose of the fact-finding process at trial—the determination of the historical truth. Another feature of oral histories which creates difficulty is that they largely consist of out-of-court statements, passed on through an unbroken chain across the generations of a particular aboriginal nation to the present-day. These out-of-court statements are admitted for their truth and therefore conflict with the general rule against the admissibility of hearsay.

[87] Notwithstanding the challenges created by the use of oral histories as proof of historical facts, the laws of evidence must be adapted in order that this type of evidence can be accommodated and placed on an equal footing with the types of historical evidence that courts are familiar with. ...

[107] The trial judge's treatment of the various kinds of oral histories did not satisfy the principles I laid down in Van der Peet. These errors are particularly worrisome because oral histories were of critical importance to the appellants' case. They used those histories in an attempt to establish their occupation and use of the disputed territory, an essential requirement for aboriginal title. The trial judge, after refusing to admit, or giving no independent weight to these oral histories, reached the conclusion that the appellants had not demonstrated the requisite degree of occupation for "ownership." Had the trial judge assessed the oral histories correctly, his conclusions on these issues of fact might have been very different.

[108] In the circumstances, the factual findings cannot stand. However, given the enormous complexity of the factual issues at hand, it would be impossible for the Court to do justice to the parties by sifting through the record itself and making new factual findings. A new trial is warranted, at which the evidence may be considered in light of the principles laid down in Van der Peet and elaborated upon here. In applying these principles, the new trial judge might well share some or all of the findings of fact of McEachern C.J.

C. What Is the Content of Aboriginal Title, How Is it Protected by Section 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, and What Is Required for its Proof?

(1) Introduction

[109] The parties ... have ... a ... fundamental disagreement over the content of aboriginal title itself, and its reception into the Constitution by s. 35(1). In order to give guidance to the judge at the new trial, it is to this issue that I will now turn.

[110] ... I believe that all of the parties have characterized the content of aboriginal title incorrectly. ...

[111] The content of aboriginal title ... is a right in land and, as such, is more than the right to engage in specific activities which may be themselves aboriginal rights. ... [I]t confers the right to use land for a variety of activities, not all of which need be aspects of practices, customs and traditions which are integral to the distinctive cultures of aboriginal societies. Those activities do not constitute the right per se; rather, they are parasitic on the underlying title. However, that range of uses is subject to the limitation that they must not be irreconcilable with the nature of the attachment to the land which forms the basis of the particular group's aboriginal title. This inherent limit ... flows from the definition of aboriginal title as a sui generis interest in land, and is one way in which aboriginal title is distinct from a fee simple.

(2) Aboriginal Title at Common Law

(a) General Features

[112] ... Aboriginal title has been described as sui generis in order to distinguish it from "normal" proprietary interests, such as fee simple. However, as I will now develop, it is also sui generis in the sense that its characteristics cannot be completely explained by reference either to the common law rules of real property or to the rules of property found in aboriginal legal systems. As with other aboriginal rights, it must be understood by reference to both common law and aboriginal perspectives.

[113] The idea that aboriginal title is sui generis is the unifying principle underlying the various dimensions of that title. One dimension is its inalienability. Lands held pursuant to aboriginal title cannot be transferred, sold or surrendered to anyone other than the Crown and, as a result, is inalienable to third parties. This Court has taken pains to clarify that aboriginal title is only "personal" in this sense, and does not mean that aboriginal title is a non-proprietary interest which amounts to no more than a licence to use and occupy the land and cannot compete on an equal footing with other proprietary interests: see Canadian Pacific Ltd. v. Paul, [1988] 2 S.C.R. 654, at p. 677.

[114] Another dimension of aboriginal title is its source. It had originally been thought that the source of aboriginal title in Canada was the Royal Proclamation, 1763 However, it is now clear that although aboriginal title was recognized by the Proclamation, it arises from the prior occupation of Canada by aboriginal peoples. That prior occupation, however, is relevant in two different ways, both of which illustrate the sui generis nature of aboriginal title. The first is the physical fact of occupation, which derives from the common law principle that occupation is proof of possession in law. ... Thus, in [Guerin v The Queen, [1984] 2 SCR 335, 1984 CanLII 25] Dickson J. described aboriginal title, at p. 376, as a "legal right derived from the Indians' historic occupation and possession of their tribal lands." What makes aboriginal title sui generis is that it arises from possession before the assertion of British sovereignty, whereas normal estates, like fee simple, arise afterward This idea has been further developed in Roberts v. Canada, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 322, where this Court unanimously held at p. 340 that "aboriginal title pre-dated colonization by the British and survived British claims of sovereignty." ... What this suggests is a second source for aboriginal title—the relationship between common law and pre-existing systems of aboriginal law.

[115] A further dimension of aboriginal title is the fact that it is held communally. Aboriginal title cannot be held by individual aboriginal persons; it is a collective right to land held by all members of an aboriginal nation. Decisions with respect to that land are also made by that community. This is another feature of aboriginal title which is sui generis and distinguishes it from normal property interests.

(b) The Content of Aboriginal Title

[117] Although the courts have been less than forthcoming, I have arrived at the conclusion that the content of aboriginal title can be summarized by two propositions: first, that aboriginal title encompasses the right to exclusive use and occupation of the land held pursuant to that title for a variety of purposes, which need not be aspects of those aboriginal practices, customs and traditions which are integral to distinctive aboriginal cultures; and second, that those protected uses must not be irreconcilable with the nature of the group's attachment to that land. ...

[124] ... [T]he content of aboriginal title is not restricted to those uses which are elements of a practice, custom or tradition integral to the distinctive culture of the aboriginal group claiming the right. However, nor does aboriginal title amount to a form of inalienable fee simple, as I will now explain.

(c) Inherent Limit: Lands Held Pursuant to Aboriginal Title Cannot Be Used in a Manner That Is Irreconcilable with the Nature of the Attachment to the Land That Forms the Basis of the Group's Claim to Aboriginal Title

[125] The content of aboriginal title contains an inherent limit that lands held pursuant to title cannot be used in a manner that is irreconcilable with the nature of the claimants' attachment to those lands. This limit on the content of aboriginal title is a manifestation of the principle that underlies the various dimensions of that special interest in land—it is a sui generis interest that is distinct from "normal" proprietary interests, most notably fee simple.

[126] I arrive at this conclusion by reference to the other dimensions of aboriginal title which are sui generis as well. I first consider the source of aboriginal title. As I discussed earlier, aboriginal title arises from the prior occupation of Canada by aboriginal peoples. That prior occupation is relevant in two different ways: first, because of the physical fact of occupation, and second, because aboriginal title originates in part from pre-existing systems of aboriginal law. However, the law of aboriginal title does not only seek to determine the historic rights of aboriginal peoples to land; it also seeks to afford legal protection to prior occupation in the present-day. Implicit in the protection of historic patterns of occupation is a recognition of the importance of the continuity of the relationship of an aboriginal community to its land over time.

[127] ... The relevance of the continuity of the relationship of an aboriginal community with its land here is that it applies not only to the past, but to the future as well. That relationship should not be prevented from continuing into the future. As a result, uses of the lands that would threaten that future relationship are, by their very nature, excluded from the content of aboriginal title.

[128] ... For example, if occupation is established with reference to the use of the land as a hunting ground, then the group that successfully claims aboriginal title to that land may not use it in such a fashion as to destroy its value for such a use (e.g., by strip mining it). Similarly, if a group claims a special bond with the land because of its ceremonial or cultural significance, it may not use the land in such a way as to destroy that relationship (e.g., by developing it in such a way that the bond is destroyed, perhaps by turning it into a parking lot).

[129] It is for this reason also that lands held by virtue of aboriginal title may not be alienated. Alienation would bring to an end the entitlement of the aboriginal people to occupy the land and would terminate their relationship with it. ...

[131] [T]he continuity of the relationship between an aboriginal community and its land, and the non-economic or inherent value of that land, should not be taken to detract from the possibility of surrender to the Crown in exchange for valuable consideration. ... If aboriginal peoples wish to use their lands in a way that aboriginal title does not permit, then they must surrender those lands and convert them into non-title lands to do so.

[132] ... This is not, I must emphasize, a limitation that restricts the use of the land to those activities that have traditionally been carried out on it. That would amount to a legal straitjacket on aboriginal peoples who have a legitimate legal claim to the land. The approach I have outlined above allows for a full range of uses of the land, subject only to an overarching limit, defined by the special nature of the aboriginal title in that land. ...

[A discussion of Aboriginal title under s 35(1) is omitted here, as it will be discussed in greater detail in the Tsilhqot'in case, reproduced below.]

(e) Proof of Aboriginal Title

(i) Introduction

[140] ... To date, the Court has defined aboriginal rights in terms of activities. As I said in [R v Van der Peet, [1996] 2 SCR 507, 1996 CanLII 216] (at para. 46):

[I]n order to be an aboriginal right an activity must be an element of a practice, custom or tradition integral to the distinctive culture of the aboriginal group claiming the right. [Emphasis added.]

Aboriginal title, however, is a right to the land itself. ...

(ii) The Test for the Proof of Aboriginal Title

[143] In order to make out a claim for aboriginal title, the aboriginal group asserting title must satisfy the following criteria: (i) the land must have been occupied prior to sovereignty, (ii) if present occupation is relied on as proof of occupation pre-sovereignty, there must be a continuity between present and pre-sovereignty occupation, and (iii) at sovereignty, that occupation must have been exclusive.

[A discussion of the three criteria Indigenous peoples must satisfy for asserting title is omitted, as it is discussed and applied in Tsilhqot'in, reproduced below].

(f) Infringements of Aboriginal Title: The Test of Justification

(i) Introduction

[160] The aboriginal rights recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1), including aboriginal title, are not absolute. Those rights may be infringed, both by the federal ... and provincial ... governments. ...

[165] The general principles governing justification laid down in [R v Sparrow, [1990] 1 SCR 1075, 1990 CanLII 104], and embellished by [R v Gladstone, [1996] 2 SCR 723, 1996 CanLII 160], operate with respect to infringements of aboriginal title. In the wake of Gladstone, the range of legislative objectives ... is fairly broad. Most of these objectives can be traced to the reconciliation of the prior occupation of North America by aboriginal peoples with the assertion of Crown sovereignty, which entails the recognition that "distinctive aboriginal societies exist within, and are a part of, a broader social, political and economic community" (at para. 73). In my opinion, the development of agriculture, forestry, mining, and hydroelectric power, the general economic development of the interior of British Columbia, protection of the environment or endangered species, the building of infrastructure and the settlement of foreign populations to support those aims, are the kinds of objectives that are consistent with this purpose and, in principle, can justify the infringement of aboriginal title. ...

[166] The manner in which the fiduciary duty operates with respect to the second stage of the justification test—both with respect to the standard of scrutiny and the particular form that the fiduciary duty will take—will be a function of the nature of aboriginal title. Three aspects of aboriginal title are relevant here. First, aboriginal title encompasses the right to exclusive use and occupation of land; second, aboriginal title encompasses the right to choose to what uses land can be put, subject to the ultimate limit that those uses cannot destroy the ability of the land to sustain future generations of aboriginal peoples; and third, that lands held pursuant to aboriginal title have an inescapable economic component.

[The portion of the decision dealing with the issue of extinguishment, and specifically the issue of whether provinces are able to extinguish Aboriginal title, is omitted here but can be found below in Section IX, "Distribution of Legislative Authority." In summary, Lamer CJ concluded, for two reasons, that there had been no extinguishment of Aboriginal title by the province prior to 1982: first, provincial laws of general application could not meet the standard of "clear and plain" intent; and, second, the extinguishment of Aboriginal title would be an impermissible intrusion on the core of the federal power over "Indians and Lands reserved for the Indians" under s 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867.]

[184] For the reasons I have given above, I would allow the appeal in part, and dismiss the cross-appeal. Reluctantly, I would also order a new trial.

[186] Finally, this litigation has been both long and expensive, not only in economic but in human terms as well. By ordering a new trial, I do not necessarily encourage the parties to ... settle their dispute through the courts. As was said in Sparrow, at p. 1105, s. 35(1) "provides a solid constitutional base upon which subsequent negotiations can take place." Those negotiations should also include other aboriginal nations which have a stake in the territory claimed. Moreover, the Crown is under a moral, if not a legal, duty to enter into and conduct those negotiations in good faith. Ultimately, it is through negotiated settlements, with good faith and give and take on all sides, reinforced by the judgments of this Court, that we will achieve ... a basic purpose of s. 35(1)—"the reconciliation of the pre-existence of aboriginal societies with the sovereignty of the Crown." Let us face it, we are all here to stay.

[Justice La Forest (L'Heureux-Dubé J concurring) wrote separate reasons agreeing with Lamer CJ's conclusion but disagreeing with the methodology used to determine the existence of Aboriginal title.]

Appeal allowed (in part) and cross-appeal dismissed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In Delgamuukw, the Court held (at para 128) that lands subject to aboriginal title cannot be put to such uses as may be irreconcilable with the nature of the occupation of that land and the relationship that the particular group has had with the land which together have given rise to aboriginal title in the first place.

The Court also observed (at para 132) that the inherent limit on Aboriginal title does not amount to a limitation that restricts the use of the land to those activities that have traditionally been carried out on it. That would amount to a legal straitjacket on Aboriginal peoples who have a legitimate legal claim to the land.

How are these two propositions reconciled, especially when it seems as if the determination of what constitutes an inherent limit on the use of Aboriginal title lands will have reference to traditional Indigenous uses of land? You will see in Tsilhqot'in Nation v British Columbia, 2014 SCC 44, below, that the Supreme Court of Canada has subsequently "softened" the inherent limit. Chief Justice McLachlin, writing for the Court, framed the restrictions on Aboriginal title in the following terms:

[74] Aboriginal title, however, comes with an important restriction—it is collective title held not only for the present generation but for all succeeding generations. This means it cannot be alienated except to the Crown or encumbered in ways that would prevent future generations of the group from using and enjoying it. Nor can the land be developed or misused in a way that would substantially deprive future generations of the benefit of the land.

2. Delgamuukw set out a test for the proof of Aboriginal title that revolves around the date of the assertion of British sovereignty. While not reproduced in the excerpt above, the Court wrote: "Because it does not make sense to speak of a burden on the underlying title before that title existed, aboriginal title crystallized at the time sovereignty was asserted" (at para 145). How does Crown sovereignty "crystallize" Aboriginal title? Why should sovereignty be the relevant date for proof of title, and contact be the crucial date for the proof of other Aboriginal rights (as held in Van der Peet)? Could other dates be just as appropriately cited for the proof of title or rights—for example, Confederation; the date of a province's union with Canada; or even 1982, when s 35 was enacted? Furthermore, what is the justification for Crown sovereignty as the measure of Aboriginal rights, and why should Indigenous peoples have the burden of proof in showing their title or rights when they were here first?

3. In Delgamuukw, Lamer CJ provided an extensive list of activities that could constitute the infringement of Aboriginal title. He wrote (at para 165) that [i]n my opinion, the development of agriculture, forestry, mining, and hydroelectric power, the general economic development of the interior of British Columbia, protection of the environment or endangered species, the building of infrastructure and the settlement of foreign populations to support those aims, are the kinds of objectives that are consistent with this purpose and, in principle, can justify the infringement of aboriginal title.

Do these actions merely infringe Aboriginal title, or could some of these activities be tantamount to an extinguishment of Aboriginal title? You will see in Tsilhqot'in Nation, below, that the Supreme Court of Canada, drawing on the principle of the Crown's fiduciary obligations, has added another limit to what can constitute a justifiable infringement of Aboriginal title, stating that "incursions on Aboriginal title cannot be justified if they would substantially deprive future generations of the benefit of the land" (at para 86).

NOTE: R V MARSHALL; R V BERNARD

In R v Marshall; R v Bernard, 2005 SCC 43, the Supreme Court of Canada upheld the convictions of two members of the Mi'kmaq Nation who harvested timber on Crown lands (in Nova Scotia in Marshall's case, and in New Brunswick in Bernard's case) without authorization. In each case, the trial judge rejected the defence that the accused had a right to harvest logs on Crown lands for commercial purposes on the basis of both treaty rights and Aboriginal title. With respect to treaty rights, commercial logging was found not to be the logical evolution of the right to engage in traditional trading activities granted by the Peace and Friendship Treaties of 1760–61. With respect to the claim of Aboriginal title, the evidence was found not to establish sufficiently regular and exclusive pre-sovereignty occupation of the cutting sites; at most, it indicated occasional hunting and fishing trips into the area. In both cases, the trial level decisions were overturned by the respective provincial Courts of Appeal. On further appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, the Court allowed the appeals and upheld the trial level decisions on both treaty rights and Aboriginal title.

In her reasons on the issue of Aboriginal title, McLachlin CJ, writing for a majority of the Court, acknowledged the importance of taking Indigenous perspectives into account, but also emphasized the need to translate Indigenous practices into a common law right. The task for the Court in title cases was described as determining whether Indigenous practices "indicate possession similar to that associated with title at common law" (at para 54) and whether they correspond to "the core notions of common law title to land" (at para 61). In elaborating on Lamer CJ's holding in Delgamuukw that one must prove "exclusive" pre-sovereignty "occupation" of the land in order to establish a valid claim of Aboriginal title, McLachlin CJ dealt with the issue of the application of the tests for title to "nomadic" and "semi-nomadic" peoples:

[66] ... [C]an nomadic and semi-nomadic peoples ... ever claim title to aboriginal land, as distinguished from rights to use the land in traditional ways. The answer is that it depends on the evidence. ... possession at common law is a contextual, nuanced concept. Whether a nomadic people enjoyed sufficient "physical possession" to give them title to the land, is a question of fact, depending on all the circumstances, in particular the nature of the land and the manner in which it is commonly used. Not every nomadic passage or use will ground title to land; thus this Court in Adams asserts that one of the reasons that aboriginal rights cannot be dependent on aboriginal title is that this would deny any aboriginal rights to nomadic peoples (at para. 27). On the other hand, Delgamuukw contemplates that "physical occupation" sufficient to ground title to land may be established by "regular use of definite tracts of land for hunting, fishing or otherwise exploiting its resources" (para. 149). In each case, the question is whether a degree of physical occupation or use equivalent to common law title has been made out.

The Supreme Court of Canada returned to the issue of the application of the Delgamuukw test to nomadic and semi-nomadic peoples in its 2014 decision in Tsilhqot'in Nation, below.

In Marshall; Bernard, McLachlin CJ also further elaborated on the use of oral evidence, drawing on her earlier decision in Mitchell, excerpted below in Section X:

[68] Underlying all [the issues raised in cases of Aboriginal title] is the need for a sensitive and generous approach to the evidence tendered to establish aboriginal rights, be they the right to title or lesser rights to fish, hunt or gather. Aboriginal peoples did not write down events in their pre-sovereignty histories. Therefore, orally transmitted history must be accepted, provided the conditions of usefulness and reasonable reliability set out in Mitchell v. MNR, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 911, 2001 SCC 33, are respected. Usefulness asks whether the oral history provides evidence that would not otherwise be available or evidence of the aboriginal perspective on the right claimed. Reasonable reliability ensures that the witness represents a credible source of the particular people's history. In determining the usefulness and reliability of oral histories, judges must resist facile assumptions based on Eurocentric traditions of gathering and passing on historical facts.

The most recent case dealing with the issue of Aboriginal title, Tsilhqot'in Nation v British Columbia, dealt with the question of whether so-called semi-nomadic Indigenous peoples could prove that their occupation of land was sufficient to meet the Delgamuukw case. John Borrows provides some background to the case:

[The case involved the] Tsilhqot'in people [who] are an Athapaskan speaking group who live in the central region of British Columbia ... [with] 3,000 citizens [who] are organized in 6 bands. For the purposes of this case they claimed approximately 438,000 ha (4,380 km²) of land which was recognised and affirmed as Aboriginal title under section 35(1) of Canada's Constitution.

The roots of the Tsilhqot'in case were planted when "[o]n June 4, 1792 Captain George Vancouver stepped ashore and claimed all of the land of what was later to become British Columbia on behalf of the British Crown" ... European traders and explorers had very little contact with the Tsilhqot'in over the next fifty years. Eventually a party of British settlers attempted to unilaterally survey and settle a portion of their territory. The Tsilhqot'in blocked the construction of this road. In the process, in 1864, they killed nineteen settlers and expelled every so-called White person from their territory. While the Tsilhqot'in paid for these acts through the hanging of four of their chiefs under questionable legal proceedings, for the next one hundred years they continued to live on their territory with minimal external demands on their lands. This was the case until 1983 when the Province of British Columbia granted Carrier Lumber Ltd. a forest licence to cut trees in part of their territory.

Over the next 15 years the Tsilhqot'in objected to the province's action through blockades, negotiations and legal action. In 1998 they eventually filed an Aboriginal title claim in the courts. The case began in 2002 and resulted in a 339 day trial which led to a judgment in their favour in 2007 (Tsilhqot'in Nation v. British Columbia, 2007 BCSC 1700). Justice Vickers of the British Columbia Supreme Court, who presided over the case, held that the Tsilhqot'in people were entitled to a [broad] declaration of Aboriginal title though he refused to make the declaration for procedural reasons. Nevertheless, the 1,382 paragraph decision was favourable to the Tsilhqot'in people. It contained detailed findings concerning use, occupation and ownership of land in accordance with Tsilhqot'in legal traditions.

The trial decision was appealed to the British Columbia Court of Appeal where the Tsilhqot'in lost. In 2012 the Court of Appeal overturned the trial judge's decision (William v. British Columbia, 2012 BCCA 285). The Court of Appeal applied a narrower test for Aboriginal title—site-specific occupation as opposed to regular and exclusive use of wider territorial lands. It held "that the Tsilhqot'in claim to title had not been established, but left open the possibility that in the future, the Tsilhqot'in might be able to prove title to specific sites within the area claimed."

The Court of Appeal's characterization of Aboriginal title was colloquially labelled "The Postage Stamp" theory of Aboriginal title: see John Borrows, "Aboriginal Title in Tsilhqot'in v. British Columbia, 2014 SCC 44" (August 2014) Māori L Rev.

The Supreme Court of Canada's reasons for overturning the conclusion of the British Columbia Court of Appeal are excerpted below.

Tsilhqot'in Nation v British Columbia

McLACHLIN CJ (LeBel, Abella, Rothstein, Cromwell, Moldaver, Karakatsanis, and Wagner JJ concurring):

[18] The jurisprudence just reviewed [tracing the evolution of aboriginal land law from Calder to Haida Nation] establishes a number of propositions that touch on the issues that arise in this case, including:

- Radical or underlying Crown title is subject to Aboriginal land interests where they are established.
- Aboriginal title gives the Aboriginal group the right to use and control the land and enjoy its benefits.
- Governments can infringe Aboriginal rights conferred by Aboriginal title but only where they can justify the infringements on the basis of a compelling and substantial purpose and establish that they are consistent with the Crown's fiduciary duty to the group.
- Resource development on claimed land to which title has not been established requires the government to consult with the claimant Aboriginal group.
- Governments are under a legal duty to negotiate in good faith to resolve claims to ancestral lands.

Against this background, I turn to the issues raised in this appeal.

V. Is Aboriginal Title Established?

A. The Test for Aboriginal Title

[24] How should the courts determine whether a semi-nomadic indigenous group has title to lands? This Court has never directly answered this question. The courts below disagreed on the correct approach. We must now clarify the test.

[25] As we have seen, the [Delgamuukw v British Columbia, [1997] 3 SCR 1010, 1997 CanLII 302] test for Aboriginal title to land is based on "occupation" prior to assertion of European sovereignty. To ground Aboriginal title this occupation must possess three characteristics. It must be sufficient; it must be continuous (where present occupation is relied on); and it must be exclusive.

[26] The test was set out in Delgamuukw, per Lamer C.J., at para. 143:

In order to make out a claim for [A]boriginal title, the [A]boriginal group asserting title must satisfy the following criteria: (i) the land must have been occupied prior to sovereignty, (ii) if present occupation is relied on as proof of occupation pre-sovereignty, there must be a continuity between present and pre-sovereignty occupation, and (iii) at sovereignty, that occupation must have been exclusive.

[27] The trial judge in this case held that "occupation" was established for the purpose of proving title by showing regular and exclusive use of sites or territory. On this basis, he concluded that the Tsilhqot'in had established title not only to village sites and areas maintained for the harvesting of roots and berries, but to larger territories which their ancestors used regularly and exclusively for hunting, fishing and other activities.

[28] The Court of Appeal disagreed and applied a narrower test for Aboriginal title: site-specific occupation. It held that ... an Aboriginal group must prove that its ancestors intensively used a definite tract of land with reasonably defined boundaries at the time of European sovereignty.

[29] For semi-nomadic Aboriginal groups like the Tsilhqot'in, the Court of Appeal's approach results in small islands of title surrounded by larger territories where the group possesses only Aboriginal rights to engage in activities like hunting and trapping. By contrast, on the trial judge's approach, the group would enjoy title to all the territory that their ancestors regularly and exclusively used at the time of assertion of European sovereignty.

[30] Against this backdrop, I return to the requirements for Aboriginal title: sufficient pre-sovereignty occupation; continuous occupation (where present occupation is relied on); and exclusive historic occupation.

[32] In my view, the concepts of sufficiency, continuity and exclusivity provide useful lenses through which to view the question of Aboriginal title. This said, the court must be careful not to lose or distort the Aboriginal perspective by forcing ancestral practices into the square boxes of common law concepts, thus frustrating the goal of faithfully translating pre-sovereignty Aboriginal interests into equivalent modern legal rights. Sufficiency, continuity and exclusivity are not ends in themselves, but inquiries that shed light on whether Aboriginal title is established.

1. Sufficiency of Occupation

[33] The first requirement—and the one that lies at the heart of this appeal—is that the occupation be sufficient to ground Aboriginal title. It is clear from Delgamuukw that not every passing traverse or use grounds title. What then constitutes sufficient occupation to ground title?

[34] The question of sufficient occupation must be approached from both the common law perspective and the Aboriginal perspective (Delgamuukw, at para. 147); see also R. v. Van der Peet, [1996] 2 S.C.R. 507.

[35] The Aboriginal perspective focuses on laws, practices, customs and traditions of the group (Delgamuukw, at para. 148). In considering this perspective for the purpose of Aboriginal title, "one must take into account the group's size, manner of life, material resources, and technological abilities, and the character of the lands claimed": B. Slattery, "Understanding Aboriginal Rights" (1987), 66 Can. Bar Rev. 727, at p. 758, quoted with approval in Delgamuukw, at para. 149.

[36] The common law perspective imports the idea of possession and control of the lands. At common law, possession extends beyond sites that are physically occupied, like a house, to surrounding lands that are used and over which effective control is exercised.

[37] Sufficiency of occupation is a context-specific inquiry. “[O]ccupation may be established in a variety of ways, ranging from the construction of dwellings through cultivation and enclosure of fields to regular use of definite tracts of land for hunting, fishing or otherwise exploiting its resources” (Delgamuukw, at para. 149). The intensity and frequency of the use may vary with the characteristics of the Aboriginal group asserting title and the character of the land over which title is asserted. Here, for example, the land, while extensive, was harsh and was capable of supporting only 100 to 1,000 people. The fact that the Aboriginal group was only about 400 people must be considered in the context of the carrying capacity of the land in determining whether regular use of definite tracts of land is made out.

[38] To sufficiently occupy the land for purposes of title, the Aboriginal group in question must show that it has historically acted in a way that would communicate to third parties that it held the land for its own purposes. This standard does not demand notorious or visible use akin to proving a claim for adverse possession, but neither can the occupation be purely subjective or internal. There must be evidence of a strong presence on or over the land claimed, manifesting itself in acts of occupation that could reasonably be interpreted as demonstrating that the land in question belonged to, was controlled by, or was under the exclusive stewardship of the claimant group. As just discussed, the kinds of acts necessary to indicate a permanent presence and intention to hold and use the land for the group’s purposes are dependent on the manner of life of the people and the nature of the land. Cultivated fields, constructed dwelling houses, invested labour, and a consistent presence on parts of the land may be sufficient, but are not essential to establish occupation. The notion of occupation must also reflect the way of life of the Aboriginal people, including those who were nomadic or semi-nomadic.

[41] In summary, what is required is a culturally sensitive approach to sufficiency of occupation based on the dual perspectives of the Aboriginal group in question—its laws, practices, size, technological ability and the character of the land claimed—and the common law notion of possession as a basis for title. It is not possible to list every indicia of occupation that might apply in a particular case. . . .

[42] There is no suggestion in the jurisprudence or scholarship that Aboriginal title is confined to specific village sites or farms, as the Court of Appeal held. Rather, a culturally sensitive approach suggests that regular use of territories for hunting, fishing, trapping and foraging is “sufficient” use to ground Aboriginal title, provided that such use . . . evinces an intention . . . to hold or possess the land in a manner comparable to what would be required to establish title at common law.

[43] The Province argues that this Court in R. v. Marshall; R. v. Bernard, 2005 SCC 43, [2005] 2 S.C.R. 220, rejected a territorial approach to title [citing Professor K. McNeil]. In fact, this Court in Marshall; Bernard did not reject a territorial approach, but held only (at para. 72) that there must be “proof of sufficiently regular and exclusive use” of the land in question, a requirement established in Delgamuukw.

[44] The Court in Marshall; Bernard confirmed that nomadic and semi-nomadic groups could establish title to land, provided they establish sufficient physical possession, which is a question of fact. While “[n]ot every nomadic passage or use will ground title to land,” the Court confirmed that Delgamuukw contemplates that “regular use of definite tracts of land for hunting, fishing or otherwise exploiting its resources” could suffice (para. 66). While the issue was framed in terms of whether the common law test for possession was met, the Court did not resile from the need to consider the perspective of the Aboriginal group in question; sufficient occupation is a "question of fact, depending on all the circumstances, in particular the nature of the land and the manner in which it is commonly used" (ibid.).

2. Continuity of Occupation

[45] Where present occupation is relied on as proof of occupation pre-sovereignty, a second requirement arises: continuity between present and pre-sovereignty occupation.

[46] The concept of continuity does not require Aboriginal groups to provide evidence of an unbroken chain of continuity between their current practices, customs and traditions, and those which existed prior to contact (Van der Peet, at para. 65). The same applies to Aboriginal title. Continuity simply means that ... the present occupation must be rooted in pre-sovereignty times. This is a question for the trier of fact in each case.

3. Exclusivity of Occupation

[47] The third requirement is exclusive occupation of the land at the time of sovereignty. The Aboriginal group must have had "the intention and capacity to retain exclusive control" over the lands (Delgamukw, at para. 156, quoting McNeil, Common Law Aboriginal Title, at p. 204 (emphasis added)). Regular use without exclusivity may give rise to usufructory Aboriginal rights; for Aboriginal title, the use must have been exclusive.

[48] Exclusivity should be understood in the sense of intention and capacity to control the land. The fact that other groups or individuals were on the land does not necessarily negate exclusivity of occupation. Whether a claimant group had the intention and capacity to control the land ... is a question of fact for the trial judge and depends on various factors such as the characteristics of the claimant group, the nature of other groups in the area, and the characteristics of the land in question. Exclusivity can be established by proof that others were excluded from the land, or by proof that others were only allowed access [with permission]. ... [Permission or treaties] may show intention and capacity to control the land. Even the lack of challenges to occupancy may support ... intention and capacity to control.

[49] ... [T]he exclusivity requirement must be approached from both the common law and Aboriginal perspectives, and must take into account the context and characteristics of the Aboriginal society. ...

4. Summary

[50] The claimant group bears the onus of establishing Aboriginal title. The task is to identify how pre-sovereignty rights and interests can properly find expression in modern common law terms. In asking whether Aboriginal title is established, the general requirements are: (1) "sufficient occupation" of the land claimed to establish title at the time of assertion of European sovereignty; (2) continuity of occupation where present occupation is relied on; and (3) exclusive historic occupation. In determining what constitutes sufficient occupation, one looks to the Aboriginal culture and practices, and compares them in a culturally sensitive way with what was required at common law to establish title on the basis of occupation. Occupation sufficient to ground Aboriginal title is not confined to specific sites of settlement but extends to tracts of land that were regularly used for hunting, fishing or otherwise exploiting resources and over which the group exercised effective control at the time of assertion of European sovereignty.

B. Was Aboriginal Title Established in This Case?

[51] The trial judge applied a test of regular and exclusive use of the land. This is consistent with the correct legal test. This leaves the question of whether he applied it appropriately

[52] ... The question therefore is whether the Province has shown that the trial judge made a palpable and overriding error in his factual conclusions.

[60] Most of the Province's criticisms ... are rooted in its erroneous thesis that only specific, intensively occupied areas can support Aboriginal title. [That] makes sense only if one assumes a narrow test of intensive occupation and if one ignores the character of the land in question which was mountainous and could not have sustained a much larger population. The alleged failure to identify particular areas with precision likewise only makes sense if one assumes a narrow test of intensive occupation. The other criticisms amount to pointing out conflicting evidence. ... The presence of conflicting evidence does not demonstrate palpable and overriding error.

[61] ... The trial judge was faced with the herculean task of drawing conclusions from a huge body of evidence produced over 339 trial days spanning a five-year period. Much of the evidence was historic evidence and therefore by its nature sometimes imprecise. The trial judge spent long periods in the claim area with witnesses, hearing evidence about how particular parts of the area were used. Absent demonstrated error, his findings should not be disturbed.

VI. What Rights Does Aboriginal Title Confer?

[67] As we have seen, Delgamuukw establishes that Aboriginal title "encompasses the right to exclusive use and occupation of the land held pursuant to that title for a variety of purposes" (at para. 117), including non-traditional purposes, provided these uses can be reconciled with the communal and ongoing nature of the group's attachment to the land. Subject to this inherent limit, the title-holding group has the right to choose the uses to which the land is put and to enjoy its economic fruits (para. 166).

[68] I will first discuss the legal characterization of the Aboriginal title. I will then offer observations on what Aboriginal title provides to its holders and what limits it is subject to.

A. The Legal Characterization of Aboriginal Title

[69] The starting point in characterizing the legal nature of Aboriginal title is Justice Dickson's concurring judgment in [Guerin v The Queen, [1984] 2 SCR 335, 1984 CanLII 25]. At the time of assertion of European sovereignty, the Crown acquired radical or underlying title to all the land in the province. This Crown title, however, was burdened by the pre-existing legal rights of Aboriginal people who occupied and used the land prior to European arrival. The doctrine of terra nullius (that no one owned the land prior to European assertion of sovereignty) never applied in Canada, as confirmed by the Royal Proclamation 1763. The Aboriginal interest in land that burdens the Crown's underlying title is an independent legal interest, which gives rise to a fiduciary duty on the part of the Crown.

[70] The content of the Crown's underlying title is what is left when Aboriginal title is subtracted from it As we have seen, Delgamuukw establishes that Aboriginal title gives "the right to exclusive use and occupation of the land ... for a variety of purposes," not confined to traditional or "distinctive" uses (para. 117). In other words, Aboriginal title is a beneficial interest in the land: Guerin, at p. 382. In simple terms, the title holders have the right to the benefits associated with the land: to use it, enjoy it and profit from its economic development. As such, the Crown does not retain a beneficial interest in Aboriginal title land.

[71] What remains, then, of the Crown's radical or underlying title to lands held under Aboriginal title? The authorities suggest two related elements: a fiduciary duty owed by the Crown to Aboriginal people when dealing with Aboriginal lands, and the right to encroach on Aboriginal title if the government can justify this in the broader public interest under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. The Court in Delgamuukw referred to this as a process of reconciling Aboriginal interests with the broader public interests under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

[72] The characteristics of Aboriginal title flow from the special relationship between the Crown and the Aboriginal group in question. It is this relationship that makes Aboriginal title sui generis or unique. Aboriginal title is what it is: the unique product of the historic relationship between the Crown and the Aboriginal group in question. Analogies to other forms of property ownership—for example, fee simple—may help us to understand aspects of Aboriginal title. But they cannot dictate precisely what it is or is not. As La Forest J. put it in Delgamuukw, at para. 190, Aboriginal title "is not equated with fee simple ownership; nor can it be described with reference to traditional property law concepts."

B. The Incidents of Aboriginal Title

[73] Aboriginal title confers ownership rights similar to those associated with fee simple, including: the right to decide how the land will be used; the right of enjoyment and occupancy of the land; the right to possess the land; the right to the economic benefits of the land; and the right to pro-actively use and manage the land.

[74] Aboriginal title, however, comes with an important restriction: it is collective title held not only for the present generation but for all succeeding generations. This means it cannot be alienated except to the Crown or encumbered in ways that would prevent future generations of the group from using and enjoying it. Nor can the land be developed or misused in a way that would substantially deprive future generations of the benefit of the land. Some changes—even permanent changes—to the land may be possible. Whether a particular use is irreconcilable with the ability of succeeding generations to benefit from the land will be a matter to be determined when the issue arises.

[75] The rights and restrictions on Aboriginal title flow from the legal interest Aboriginal title confers, which in turn flows from the fact of Aboriginal occupancy at the time of European sovereignty which attached as a burden on the underlying title asserted by the Crown at sovereignty. Aboriginal title post-sovereignty reflects the fact of Aboriginal occupancy pre-sovereignty, with all the pre-sovereignty incidents of use and enjoyment that were part of the collective title enjoyed by the ancestors of the claimant group: most notably the right to control how the land is used. However, these uses are not confined to the uses and customs of pre-sovereignty times; like other landowners, Aboriginal title holders of modern times can use their land in modern ways, if that is their choice.

[76] The right to control the land conferred by Aboriginal title means that governments and others seeking to use the land must obtain the consent of the Aboriginal title holders. If the Aboriginal group does not consent to the use, the government's only recourse is to establish that the proposed incursion on the land is justified under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

C. Justification of Infringement

[77] To justify overriding the Aboriginal title-holding group's wishes on the basis of the broader public good, the government must show: (1) that it discharged its procedural duty to consult and accommodate, (2) that its actions were backed by a compelling and substantial objective; and (3) that the governmental action is consistent with the Crown's fiduciary obligation to the group: [R v Sparrow, [1990] 1 SCR 1075, 1990 CanLII 104].

[78] The duty to consult is a procedural duty that arises from the honour of the Crown prior to confirmation of title. Where the Crown has real or constructive knowledge of the potential or actual existence of Aboriginal title, and contemplates conduct that might adversely affect it, the Crown is obliged to consult with the group asserting Aboriginal title and, if appropriate, accommodate the Aboriginal right. The duty to consult must be discharged prior to carrying out the action that could adversely affect the right.

[79] The degree of consultation and accommodation required lies on a spectrum as discussed in [Haida Nation v British Columbia (Minister of Forests), 2004 SCC 73, excerpted in the Section VII, "The Duty to Consult"]. In general, the level of consultation and accommodation required is proportionate to the strength of the claim and to the seriousness of the adverse impact [of] contemplated governmental action would have on the claimed right. "A dubious or peripheral claim may attract a mere duty of notice, while a stronger claim may attract more stringent duties" (para. 37). The required level of consultation and accommodation is greatest where title has been established. Where consultation or accommodation is found to be inadequate, the government decision can be suspended or quashed.

[80] Where Aboriginal title is unproven, the Crown owes a procedural duty imposed by the honour of the Crown to consult and, if appropriate, accommodate the unproven Aboriginal interest. By contrast, where title has been established, the Crown must not only comply with its procedural duties, but must also ensure that the proposed government action is substantively consistent with the requirements of s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. This requires both a compelling and substantial governmental objective and that the government action is consistent with the fiduciary duty owed by the Crown to the Aboriginal group.

[81] I agree with the Court of Appeal that the compelling and substantial objective of the government must be considered from the Aboriginal perspective as well as from the perspective of the broader public. As stated in [R v Gladstone, [1996] 2 SCR 723, 1996 CanLII 160], at para. 72:

... [T]he objectives which can be said to be compelling and substantial will be those directed at either the recognition of the prior occupation of North America by [A]boriginal peoples or—and at the level of justification it is this purpose which may well be most relevant—at the reconciliation of [A]boriginal prior occupation with the assertion of the sovereignty of the Crown. [Emphasis added.]

[82] As Delgamuukw explains, the process of reconciling Aboriginal interests with the broader interests of society as a whole is the raison d'être of the principle of justification. Aboriginals and non-Aboriginals are "all here to stay" and must of necessity move forward in a process of reconciliation (para. 186). To constitute a compelling and substantial objective, the broader public goal asserted by the government must further the goal of reconciliation, having regard to both the Aboriginal interest and the broader public objective.

[83] What interests are potentially capable of justifying an incursion on Aboriginal title? In Delgamuukw, this Court, per Lamer C.J., offered this:

In the wake of Gladstone, the range of legislative objectives that can justify the infringement of [A]boriginal title is fairly broad. Most of these objectives can be traced to the reconciliation of the prior occupation ... by [A]boriginal peoples with the assertion of Crown sovereignty, which entails the recognition that "distinctive [A]boriginal societies exist within, and are a part of, a broader social, political and economic community" (at para. 73). In my opinion, the development of agriculture, forestry, mining, and hydroelectric power, the general economic development of the interior of British Columbia, protection of the environment or endangered species, the building of infrastructure and the settlement of foreign populations to support those aims, are the kinds of objectives that are consistent with this purpose and, in principle, can justify the infringement of [A]boriginal title. Whether a particular measure or government act can be explained by reference to one of those objectives, however, is ultimately a question of fact that will have to be examined on a case-by-case basis. [Emphasis added; emphasis in original deleted; para. 165.]

[84] If a compelling and substantial public purpose is established, the government must go on to show that the proposed incursion on the Aboriginal right is consistent with the Crown's fiduciary duty towards Aboriginal people.

[85] The Crown's fiduciary duty in the context of justification merits further discussion. The Crown's underlying title in the land is held for the benefit of the Aboriginal group and constrained by the Crown's fiduciary or trust obligation to the group. This impacts the justification process in two ways.

[86] First, the Crown's fiduciary duty means that the government must act in a way that respects the fact that Aboriginal title is a group interest that inheres in present and future generations. The beneficial interest in the land held by the Aboriginal group vests communally in the title-holding group. This means that incursions on Aboriginal title cannot be justified if they would substantially deprive future generations of the benefit of the land.

[87] Second, the Crown's fiduciary duty infuses an obligation of proportionality into the justification process. Implicit in the Crown's fiduciary duty to the Aboriginal group is the requirement that the incursion is necessary to achieve the government's goal (rational connection); that the government go no further than necessary to achieve it (minimal impairment); and that the benefits that may be expected to flow from that goal are not outweighed by adverse effects on the Aboriginal interest (proportionality of impact). The requirement of proportionality is inherent in the Delgamuukw process of reconciliation and was echoed in Haida's insistence that the Crown's duty to consult and accommodate at the claims stage "is proportionate to a preliminary assessment of the strength of the case supporting the existence of the right or title, and to the seriousness of the potentially adverse effect upon the right or title claimed" (para. 39).

[88] In summary, Aboriginal title confers on the group that holds it the exclusive right to decide how the land is used and the right to benefit from those uses, subject to one carve-out: that the uses must be consistent with the group nature of the interest and the enjoyment of the land by future generations. Government incursions not consented to by the title-holding group must be undertaken in accordance with the Crown's procedural duty to consult and must also be justified on the basis of a compelling and substantial public interest, and must be consistent with the Crown's fiduciary duty to the Aboriginal group.

D. Remedies and Transition

[89] Prior to establishment of title by court declaration or agreement, the Crown is required to consult in good faith with any Aboriginal groups asserting title to the land about proposed uses of the land and, if appropriate, accommodate the interests of such claimant groups. The level of consultation and accommodation required varies with the strength of the Aboriginal group's claim to the land and the seriousness of the potentially adverse effect upon the interest claimed. If the Crown fails to discharge its duty to consult, various remedies are available including injunctive relief, damages, or an order that consultation or accommodation be carried out: Rio Tinto Alcan Inc. v. Carrier Sekani Tribal Council, 2010 SCC 43, [2010] 2 S.C.R. 650, at para. 37.

[90] After Aboriginal title to land has been established by court declaration or agreement, the Crown must seek the consent of the title-holding Aboriginal group to developments on the land. Absent consent, development of title land cannot proceed unless the Crown has discharged its duty to consult and can justify the intrusion on title under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. The usual remedies that lie for breach of interests in land are available, adapted as may be necessary to reflect the special nature of Aboriginal title and the fiduciary obligation owed by the Crown to the holders of Aboriginal title.

[91] The practical result may be a spectrum of duties applicable over time in a particular case. [Prior] to establishment of Aboriginal title, the Crown owes a good faith duty to consult with the group concerned and, if appropriate, accommodate its interests. As the claim strength increases, the required level of consultation and accommodation correspondingly increases. Where a claim is particularly strong—for example, shortly before a court declaration of title—appropriate care must be taken to preserve the Aboriginal interest pending final resolution . . . Finally, once title is established, the Crown cannot proceed with development . . . unless it has discharged its duty to consult and the development is justified pursuant to s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

[92] Once title is established, it may be necessary for the Crown to reassess prior conduct in light of the new reality in order to faithfully discharge its fiduciary duty to the title-holding group going forward. For example, if the Crown begins a project without consent prior to Aboriginal title being established, it may be required to cancel the project upon establishment of the title if continuation of the project would be unjustifiably infringing. Similarly, if legislation was validly enacted before title was established, such legislation may be rendered inapplicable going forward to the extent that it unjustifiably infringes Aboriginal title.

E. What Duties Were Owed by the Crown at the Time of the Government Action?

[93] Prior to the declaration of Aboriginal title, the Province had a duty to consult and accommodate the claimed Tsilhqot'in interest in the land. As the Tsilhqot'in had a strong prima facie claim . . . and the intrusion was significant, the duty to consult owed by the Crown fell at the high end of the spectrum . . .

[94] With the declaration of title, the Tsilhqot'in have now established Aboriginal title to the portion of the lands designated by the trial judge with the exception as set out in para. 9 of these reasons. This gives them the right to determine, subject to the inherent limits of group title held for future generations, the uses to which the land is put and to enjoy its economic fruits. As we have seen, this is not merely a right of first refusal with respect to Crown land management or usage plans. Rather, it is the right to proactively use and manage the land.

VII. Breach of the Duty to Consult

[95] The alleged breach in this case arises from the issuance by the Province of licences permitting third parties to conduct forestry activity and construct related infrastructure on the land in 1983 and onwards, before title was declared. During this time, the Tsilhqot'in held an interest in the land that was not yet legally recognized. The honour of the Crown required that the Province consult them on uses of the lands and accommodate their interests. The Province did neither and breached its duty owed to the Tsilhqot'in.

[96] The Crown's duty to consult was breached when Crown officials engaged in the planning process for the removal of timber. The inclusion of timber on Aboriginal title land in a timber supply area, the approval of cut blocks on Aboriginal title land in a forest development plan, and the allocation of cutting permits all occurred without any meaningful consultation with the Tsilhqot'in.

[97] I add this. Governments and individuals proposing to use or exploit land, whether before or after a declaration of Aboriginal title, can avoid a charge of infringement or failure to adequately consult by obtaining the consent of the interested Aboriginal group.

[The portions of the decision dealing with the application of provincial laws to lands held under Aboriginal title can be found in Section IX.]

XI. Conclusion

[153] I would allow the appeal and grant a declaration of Aboriginal title over the area at issue, as requested by the Tsilhqot'in. I further declare that British Columbia breached its duty to consult owed to the Tsilhqot'in through its land use planning and forestry authorizations.

Appeal allowed; declaration of Aboriginal title granted over area at issue.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. There is a great deal of discussion in Tsilhqot'in Nation about the duty to consult, drawing on a significant evolution in the law since Delgamuukw as a result of the Supreme Court of Canada's 2004 decision in Haida Nation v British Columbia (Minister of Forests), 2004 SCC 73. These developments are traced in Section VI.

2. In Tsilhqot'in, the Court wrote that "[t]he doctrine of terra nullius (that no one owned the land prior to European assertion of sovereignty) never applied in Canada" (at para 69). Yet, in the same paragraph, the Court wrote that "[a]t the time of assertion of European sovereignty, the Crown acquired radical or underlying title to all the land in the province." John Borrows asks:

If land was owned by Indigenous peoples prior to the assertion of European sovereignty, one wonders how the Crown acquired title in that same land by merely asserting sovereignty, without a version of terra nullius being deployed. The Crown's claim to underlying title on this basis "does not make sense." Some kind of legal vacuum must be imagined to create the Crown's radical title. The emptiness at the heart of the Court's decision is disturbing.

See John Borrows, "The Durability of Terra Nullius: Tsilhqot'in Nation v. British Columbia" (2015) 48 UBC L Rev 701 at 703 ["The Durability of Terra Nullius"].

As a result of the decision's perpetuation of the idea that the Crown acquired underlying title of Aboriginal lands upon the assertion of sovereignty, Professor Borrows has expressed mixed views about the Tsilhqot'in Nation:

Canadian law took an important step towards repairing its relationships with Indigenous peoples in the Tsilhqot'in Nation decision. It is an exceedingly strong decision. It demonstrates the intelligence, wisdom, honesty, humility and humanity of an extraordinary group of jurists. ... The case is very significant; it contains ground-shifting implications. ...

At the same time, it must be emphasized that Tsilhqot'in Nation is only a step in the right direction. Reconciliation between Indigenous peoples and the Crown still remains a long distance down the road. ... The Crown (and the courts) must shed further baggage to ensure the decision's trajectory continues. The Crown's unilateral claims to land in British Columbia must be further attenuated. ... [F]urther attention is needed to erase [the] concept [of the doctrine of discovery] from Canadian law.

See Borrows, "The Durability of Terra Nullius," above at 704-5.

3. The Truth and Reconciliation Commission wrote about the Doctrine of Discovery as follows:

One of the aspects of the Doctrine of Discovery that continues to assert itself to this day is the fact that court cases involving Aboriginal territorial claims have placed a heavy onus on Aboriginal claimants to prove that they were in occupation of land since first contact and that the rights claimed over the territory continued from then to the present. The Commission believes that there is good reason to question this requirement, particularly in view of the fact that much of the record upon which courts rely is documentary proof or oral testimony from acknowledged Elder experts. History shows that for many years after Confederation, Aboriginal claimants were precluded from accessing legal advice or the courts in order to assert their claims, and that many of their best Elder experts have passed on without having had an opportunity to record their evidence.

The Commission believes that it is manifestly unfair for Aboriginal claimants to be held to the requisite standard of proof throughout legal proceedings. However, it is reasonable to require that an Aboriginal claimant establish occupation of specified territory at the requisite period of time. That could be at the time of contact or at the time of Crown assertion of sovereignty. It is our view that once occupation has been proven, then the onus should shift to the other party to show that the claim no longer exists, either through extinguishment, surrender, or some other valid legal means. Therefore, we conclude that Aboriginal claims of title and rights should be accepted on assertion, with the burden of proof placed on those who object to such claims.

4. What impact will Tsilhqot'in have on the negotiation of land claims settlements in British Columbia? So far, the impact has been slight. A treaty process put in place in the province in 1993, which reversed the province's long-standing refusal to negotiate treaties, has so far resulted in only seven completed treaties (as of June 2021). Sixty-five First Nations are or have been involved in the BC treaty negotiations process, less than half of the First Nations in the province. Consider Professor Borrows' comment on the impact of the Tsilhqot'in decision:

Throughout the opinion the Court makes the distinction between established or confirmed title on the one hand, and unproven title on the other. If Indigenous peoples do not have established or confirmed title, the governments' obligations towards such groups are further diminished until such time as a non-Indigenous body accredits their interests (through treaty, legislation or court declaration).

The fact that Aboriginal title requires some official recognition process illustrates one of the greatest challenges for Indigenous groups flowing from the Tsilhqot'in decision. The question is how Aboriginal title can be effectively established, confirmed or proven when the state is arrayed against them. The Crown and Courts have the upper hand in the recognition process. Court cases cost millions of dollars each, and First Nations do not have this kind of money available to them. The Tsilhqot'in case was partially a publicly funded test case which allegedly cost tens of millions of dollars to bring to a successful conclusion. The next case will not fall into such a category and thus public funding would not be available to bankroll it. The cost of litigation will place a court-ordered declaration of Aboriginal title beyond the reach of most groups.

Furthermore, the twenty-year-old treaty process in British Columbia has been a dismal failure to this point. First Nations are deeply indebted to Canadian governments from decades-long negotiations with very little to show for their efforts. Very few agreements have been signed. While the Crown may be compelled to change its narrow negotiation mandates in response to the Tsilhqot'in decision, the incentives to abide by the Court decision are few. Other than Court pressure (which in addition to finances may take decades to fully mount and implement) one might ask why the province would willingly create a process which significantly divests themselves of decision-making power and land to accommodate broad recognition of Aboriginal title throughout British Columbia. It is not in their narrower economic or political interest. Of course, the provincial or federal government could pass legislation which recognizes wide assertions of Aboriginal title.

See Borrow, "The Durability of Terra Nullius," above at 729-32.

5. Although the Court in Tsilhqot'in draws analogies between Aboriginal title and fee simple, there are significant differences. One of these is that Aboriginal title has a jurisdictional component. As Brian Slattery writes:

Aboriginal title has a jurisdictional dimension. The fact that it is vested in a community means that there must be some body or bodies endowed with authority to determine which individuals have the right to use the land and to regulate the ways the land may be used.

See Brian Slattery, "The Constitutional Dimensions of Aboriginal Title" (2015) 71 SCLR (2d) 45 at 46.

This jurisdictional aspect of Aboriginal title, which entails recognition of Indigenous laws and law-making capacity, is explored further below in Section X. The material found there includes a discussion of the ways in which Tsilhqot'in law deals with issues of consultation and consent when decisions are being made about land use.

6. What does it mean to label Aboriginal title "sui generis"? At para 72 of the Tsilhqot'in decision the Supreme Court of Canada once again noted that Aboriginal title is sui generis. Does this label expand or diminish Aboriginal title relative to other land rights. Consider the answer to this question as you consider excerpts about the sui generis nature of Aboriginal title in the case of Newfoundland and Labrador (AG) v Uashaunnuat (Innu of Uashat and of Mani-Utenam), 2020 SCC 4.

[25] ... [T]his Court has continually stressed the sui generis nature of s. 35 rights, namely the fact that a sui generis right is a unique one [translation] "which it is impossible to fit into any recognized category" The unique nature of s. 35 rights flows from both their historical and cultural origins as well as their status as constitutional rights.

[26] In Van der Peet—one of the first cases to consider the nature of s. 35 rights in depth—Chief Justice Lamer went to great lengths to stress the unique nature of s. 35 rights:

Aboriginal rights cannot, however, be defined on the basis of the philosophical precepts of the liberal enlightenment. Although equal in importance and significance to the rights enshrined in the Charter, aboriginal rights must be viewed differently from Charter rights because they are rights held only by aboriginal members of Canadian society. They arise from the fact that aboriginal people are aboriginal. As academic commentators have noted, aboriginal rights "inhere in the very meaning of aboriginality"

The task of this Court is to define aboriginal rights in a manner which recognizes that aboriginal rights are rights but which does so without losing sight of the fact that they are rights held by aboriginal people because they are aboriginal. The Court must neither lose sight of the generalized constitutional status of what s. 35(1) protects, nor can it ignore the necessary specificity which comes from granting special constitutional protection to one part of Canadian society. The Court must define the scope of s. 35(1) in a way which captures both the aboriginal and the rights in aboriginal rights. [Emphasis in original; paras. 19-20]

[27] The rights protected by s. 35 range from title to tobacco use and touch all aspects of life from the adoption of children to honouring burial sites of community ancestors: K. Wilkins, Essentials of Canadian Aboriginal Law (2018), at p. 195. While many of these rights concern the connection between Aboriginal peoples and the land, this Court has cautioned against “focus[ing] so entirely on the relationship of aboriginal peoples with the land that they lose sight of the other factors relevant to the identification and definition of aboriginal rights”: Van der Peet, at para. 74. Instead, it has encouraged viewing s. 35 rights as existing along a spectrum with more or less intimate connections to the land. When both historic occupation and distinctive cultures are acknowledged as sources of Aboriginal rights, courts better accommodate the diverse histories and realities of Aboriginal societies. ... Aboriginal title is thus a sub-category of Aboriginal rights: Van der Peet, at para. 74.

[29] Aboriginal title pre-dates all other interests in land in Canada, arising from the historic occupation of territory by distinct cultures: Calder v. Attorney-General of British Columbia, [1973] S.C.R. 313, at p. 328; Guerin v. The Queen, [1984] 2 S.C.R. 335, at pp. 376-78; Roberts v. Canada, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 322, at p. 340; Delgamuukw v. British Columbia, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 1010, at para. 114. Like Aboriginal rights more generally, Aboriginal title is sui generis. Even before Tsilhqot'in Nation v. British Columbia, 2014 SCC 44, [2014] 2 S.C.R. 257, at para. 72, this Court frequently warned against conflating Aboriginal title with traditional civil or common law property concepts, or even describing title using the classical language of property law: St. Catherine's Milling and Lumber Company v. The Queen (1888), 14 App. Cas. 46 (P.C.), at p. 54; Guerin, at p. 382; Canadian Pacific Ltd. v. Paul, [1988] 2 S.C.R. 654, at pp. 677-78; Blueberry River Indian Band v. Canada (Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 344, at paras. 6-7; Van der Peet, at para. 115 (dissenting reasons of L'Heureux-Dubé J.); St. Mary's Indian Band v. Cranbrook (City), [1997] 2 S.C.R. 657, at paras. 14 et seq.; Delgamuukw, at paras. 111 et seq.; R. v. Marshall, 2005 SCC 43, [2005] 2 S.C.R. 220, at para. 129 (concurring reasons of LeBel J.); R. v. Sappier, 2006 SCC 54, [2006] 2 S.C.R. 686, at para. 21.

[30] Owing to its origins in the special relationship between Indigenous peoples and the Crown, Aboriginal title has unique characteristics that distinguish it from civil law and common law conceptions of property. Aboriginal title is inherently collective and exists not only for the benefit of the present generation, but also for that of all future generations: Tsilhqot'in Nation, at para. 74; see also B. Slattery, “The Constitutional Dimensions of Aboriginal Title” (2015), 71 S.C.L.R. (2d) 45, at pp. 45-47. With its aim of benefiting both present and future generations, Aboriginal title restricts both the alienability of land and the uses to which land can be put: Tsilhqot'in Nation, at para. 74. These features are incompatible with property as it is understood in the civil law and common law: see K. Anker, “Translating Sui Generis Aboriginal Rights in the Civilian Imagination,” in A. Popovici, L. Smith and R. Tremblay, eds., Les intraduisibles en droit civil (2014), 1, at pp. 23-28.

[31] Moreover, Aboriginal perspectives shape the very concept of Aboriginal title, the content of which may vary from one group to another. As such, disputes involving title should not be resolved “by strict reference to intractable real property rules” but rather must also be understood with reference to Aboriginal perspectives: St. Mary's Indian Band, at para. 15; see also Delgamuukw, at para. 112; Marshall, at paras. 129-30 (concurring reasons of LeBel J.).

[32] In Tsilhqot'in Nation, this Court said that

[t]he characteristics of Aboriginal title flow from the special relationship between the Crown and the Aboriginal group in question. It is this relationship that makes Aboriginal title sui generis or unique. Aboriginal title is what it is—the unique product of the historic relationship between the Crown and the Aboriginal group in question. Analogies to other forms of property ownership—for example, fee simple—may help us to understand aspects of Aboriginal title. But they cannot dictate precisely what it is or is not. As La Forest J. put it in Delgamuukw, at para. 190, Aboriginal title “is not equated with fee simple ownership; nor can it be described with reference to traditional property law concepts.” [para 72]

[33] At the same time, the Court recognized that

Aboriginal title confers ownership rights similar to those associated with fee simple, including: the right to decide how the land will be used; the right of enjoyment and occupancy of the land; the right to possess the land; the right to the economic benefits of the land; and the right to proactively use and manage the land. [para. 73]

[34] From the civilian perspective, as it is a sui generis right, Aboriginal title is properly characterized as neither a personal right nor a real right nor a combination of the two even though it may appear to have characteristics of both real and personal rights. The Quebec Research Centre of Private & Comparative Law defines personal and real rights as follows:

PERSONAL RIGHT

Right of a patrimonial nature that permits its holder, the creditor, to claim the performance of a prestation from another person, the debtor.

Right of a patrimonial nature that is exercised directly upon property. [Emphasis in original; citations omitted; pp. 230 and 254.]

[35] There is no doubt that Aboriginal title is fundamentally concerned with land. And it is tempting to conclude that Aboriginal title is a purely real right, as its name suggests. But to do so would ignore the fact that Aboriginal title is also firmly grounded in the relationships formed by the confluence of prior occupation and the assertion of sovereignty by the Crown: Tsilhqot'in Nation, at para. 72. Sovereignty assured the Crown underlying title to all land in the provinces, but the content of that title has always been burdened by the pre-existing rights of Aboriginal peoples which preceded those of the provinces: paras. 69-70; Constitution Act, 1867, s. 109. The nature of the fiduciary relationship arising from the interplay of these rights, steeped as it is in the history of settlement, is what gives rise to the other obligations flowing from the honour of the Crown that are part and parcel of Aboriginal title. Those obligations are clearly more akin to personal rights.

[36] However, no matter the facial similarities, s. 35 rights are not simply an amalgam of real rights and personal rights connected to Aboriginal peoples. As the term sui generis makes clear, s. 35 rights are legally distinct and, indeed, [translation] “impossible to fit into any recognized category”: Reid, at p. 607. They are neither real rights nor personal rights as defined in the civil law, but sui generis rights. Given the foregoing, s. 35 rights should not be pigeonholed into a category of civil law rights, especially not for the purposes of private international law alone. Rights cannot be characterized differently for different areas of law in civil law. A piecemeal approach, which would, for instance, suggest that a different characterization of s. 35 rights could be used in Book Four (Property) of the C.C.Q., would be, in our view, inappropriate.

VI. TREATY RIGHTS

Section 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 protects two broad classes of rights: (1) Aboriginal rights, and (2) treaty rights. By and large, treaty-making in Canada can be divided into three eras: (1) pre-Confederation, (2) post-Confederation, and (3) modern treaties. Prior to the British conquest, the French Crown concluded treaties with Indigenous nations, the most famous one being the Great Peace of 1701, a treaty that fostered peaceful relationships between France, its Indigenous allies, and the Haudenosaunee federation. From 1764 until 1867, there were approximately 375 treaties between the British Crown and First Nations. From 1867 until 1923, there were approximately another 150 treaties between the Crown and Indigenous peoples north of the 49th parallel. Finally, as of 2021, there have been another 26 so-called modern treaties between Indigenous peoples and Canada, now covering 40 percent of Canada's land mass, starting with the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement in 1973. Each of these historical eras had its own social, economic, and political distinctiveness, which must be considered to approach a satisfactory understanding of the treaties signed within these eras. For example, Indigenous peoples had relatively greater bargaining power prior to Confederation, although this slowly began to wane between 1814 and 1867. In the period after Confederation, particularly with the numbered treaties on the prairies, the Crown took a more dominant role in the negotiations, although they never fully succeeded in overwhelming the agency of Indigenous peoples in this period. Last, in the modern era, Indigenous peoples have seen their power somewhat expand relative to the era immediately prior, and thus they have been able to realize a growing influence in the negotiation of treaties.

Patrick Macklem, "First Nations Self-Government and the Borders of the Canadian Legal Imagination"

With respect to the legal status of treaties, treaty rights [prior to 1982 were] imagined in law in such a way as to render them either unenforceable or enforceable only against state inaction. More specifically, judicial attitudes toward the legal status of treaties entered into by native peoples and the Crown historically has involved a shift from an approach that imagines native people as different than, and inferior to, non-native people, toward an approach that imagines native people as the same as non-native people and therefore not worthy of special consideration. The earlier approach viewed agreements between the Crown and native peoples as essentially political agreements not enforceable in a court of law. Traditional international law principles provide that an agreement between two "independent powers" constitutes a treaty binding on the parties to the agreement. Courts viewed native people as "uncivilized" and as belonging to an inferior race and thus agreements between native peoples and the Crown were not binding on the Crown in law. Contemporary jurisprudence has rejected the view that native people are different than, and inferior to, non-native people, with the result being that treaties are elevated from the level of nonbinding political agreement to that of contractual right. Native people are imagined under this approach as possessing legal personality similar to that possessed by non-native people in Canada and therefore capable of entering into binding agreements with the Crown. Because such agreements are not viewed as anything more than contractual agreements with the Crown, despite exhortations by the courts that treaties are "unique," they are seen as subject to legislative authority. Prior to 1982, this had the effect of permitting Parliament to regulate or extinguish existing treaty rights.

With respect to judicial interpretation of the content of treaty guarantees, there has been a shift in the opposite direction, namely, toward the embrace of native difference. More specifically, early judicial pronouncements on the content of treaty guarantees were blind to native cultural difference. Treaty rights historically were rendered concrete and given determinate meaning by reference to Anglo-Canadian public and private law norms and values. The "plain meaning" of a treaty guarantee was determined by a process that accepted without question the legitimacy of basic categories of Anglo-Canadian legal consciousness. This resulted in expansive definitions of the meaning of land surrenders and narrow interpretations of treaty benefits flowing to native people. Recent jurisprudence is more sensitive to native expectations about treaty negotiation and thus is more accommodating of native difference. This shift has resulted in more expansive definitions of treaty benefits to native people, though the meaning of land surrenders effected by treaty continues to be steeped in Anglo-Canadian notions concerning title and transfer.

At issue in R v Sioui, [1990] 1 SCR 1025, 1990 CanLII 103 was the constitutionality of actions of members of the Huron nation on the Lorette Indian reserve in Quebec. They were convicted of cutting down trees, camping, and making fires in a provincial park, contrary to provincial legislation. They alleged that they were engaged in ancestral customs and religious rites protected by a treaty entered into by the Huron and the Crown in 1760. In his analysis of the scope of the treaty right, Lamer J provided a broad interpretation of the treaty's provision for "the free Exercise of [the Huron] religion [and] their Customs" (at 1031, 1066-70). Because the text of the treaty made no mention of the territory over which treaty rights may be exercised, Quebec argued that the treaty right did not extend to activities performed in park territory. Justice Lamer held that this issue had to be resolved "by determining the intention of the parties ... at the time it was concluded" (at 1068). He acknowledged the possibility of different interpretations of the parties' common intention and, adding another principle to the interpretive framework articulated in Simon v The Queen, [1985] 2 SCR 387, 1985 CanLII 11, stated that the Court must choose "from among the various possible interpretations of the common intention the one which best reconciles the Hurons' interests and those of the conquerer" (at 1069). Justice Lamer was of the opinion (at 1027-28) that the rights guaranteed by the treaty could be exercised over the entire territory frequented by the Hurons at the time, so long as the carrying on of the customs and rites is not incompatible with the particular use made by the Crown of this territory.

In R v Badger, [1996] 1 SCR 771, 1996 CanLII 236, Cory J for the Supreme Court identified several canons of treaty interpretation that inform contemporary jurisprudence on the subject:

[41] ... First, it must be remembered that a treaty represents an exchange of solemn promises between the Crown and the various Indian nations. It is an agreement whose nature is sacred. See R. v. Sioui, [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1025, at p. 1063; Simon v. The Queen, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 387, at p. 401. Second, the honour of the Crown is always at stake in its dealing with Indian people. Interpretations of treaties and statutory provisions which have an impact upon treaty or aboriginal rights must be approached in a manner which maintains the integrity of the Crown. It is always assumed that the Crown intends to fulfil its promises. No appearance of "sharp dealing" will be sanctioned. See Sparrow, supra, at pp. 1107-08 and 1114; R. v. Taylor (1981), 34 O.R. (2d) 360 (Ont. C.A.), at p. 367. Third, any ambiguities or doubtful expressions in the wording of the treaty or document must be resolved in favour of the Indians. A corollary to this principle is that any limitations which restrict the rights of Indians under treaties must be narrowly construed. See Nowegijick v. The Queen, [1983]

1 S.C.R. 29, at p. 36; Simon, supra, at p. 402; Sioui, supra, at p. 1035; and Mitchell v. Peguis Indian Band, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 85, at pp. 142-43. Fourth, the onus of proving that a treaty or aboriginal right has been extinguished lies upon the Crown. There must be "strict proof of the fact of extinguishment" and evidence of a clear and plain intention on the part of the government to extinguish treaty rights. See Simon, supra, at pp. 405-06; Sioui, supra, at p. 1061; Calder v. Attorney-General of British Columbia, [1973] S.C.R. 313, at p. 404.

To what extent are these canons consistent with the interpretive approach adopted by Lamer J in Sioui? To what extent are they consistent with the approach adopted in the following case?

[Donald Marshall Jr, a Mi'kmaq citizen, was charged with selling 463 pounds of eels for $787.10 without a licence, contrary to federal regulations made pursuant to the Fisheries Act, RSC 1985, c F-14. Marshall's defence was that he was entitled to sell the eels by virtue of a treaty right agreed to by the British Crown in 1760. The only issue at trial was whether Marshall had an existing treaty right exempting him from compliance with the federal legislation, thus mandating his acquittal. In 1760-61, Indigenous leaders in the Maritimes asked for truckhouses—that is, trading posts—"furnishing them with necessaries, in Exchange for their Peltry" (at para 29) during negotiations leading up to the treaties. However, the written document recording the treaty contained only the promise by the Mi'kmaq not to "traffick, barter or Exchange any Commodities in any manner but with such persons, or the manager of such Truck houses as shall be appointed or Established by His Majesty's Governor" (at para 5). As such, the dispute in this case was over whether this "trade clause," framed in negative terms as a restraint on trade, reflected the grant of the positive right to Mi'kmaq people (like Marshall) to bring the products of their hunting, fishing, and gathering to a truckhouse to trade. The trial judge held that there was no positive right to trade embodied in the trade clause and thus rejected Marshall's defence that he had a treaty right to catch and sell fish. Marshall appealed, and the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal dismissed his appeal. Marshall then appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada.]

BINNIE J (Lamer CJ and L'Heureux-Dubé, Cory, and Iacobucci JJ concurring):

[5] The starting point for the analysis of the alleged treaty right must be an examination of the specific words used in any written memorandum of its terms. In this case, the task is complicated by the fact the British signed a series of agreements with individual Mi'kmaq communities in 1760 and 1761 intending to have them consolidated into a comprehensive Mi'kmaq treaty that was never in fact brought into existence. The trial judge, Embree Prov. Ct. J., found that by the end of 1761 all of the Mi'kmaq villages in Nova Scotia had entered into separate but similar treaties. Some of these documents are missing. Despite some variations among some of the documents, Embree Prov. Ct. J. was satisfied that the written terms applicable to this dispute were contained in a Treaty of Peace and Friendship entered into by Governor Charles Lawrence on March 10, 1760, which ... provides as follows:

Treaty of Peace and Friendship concluded by [His Excellency Charles Lawrence] Esq. Govr and Comr. in Chief in and over his Majesty's Province of Nova Scotia or Accadia with Paul Laurent chief of the LaHave tribe of Indians at Halifax in the Province of [Nova Scotia] or Acadia.

And I do further promise for myself and my tribe that we will not either directly nor indirectly assist any of the enemies of His most sacred Majesty King George the Second, his heirs or Successors, nor hold any manner of Commerce traffick nor intercourse with them, but on the contrary will as much as may be in our power discover and make known to His Majesty's Governor, any ill designs which may be formed or contrived against His Majesty's subjects. And I do further engage that we will not traffick, barter or Exchange any Commodities in any manner but with such persons or the managers of such Truck houses as shall be appointed or Established by His Majesty's Governor at Lunenbourg or Elsewhere in Nova Scotia or Accadia.

[6] The [emphasized] portion of the document, the so-called "trade clause," is framed in negative terms as a restraint on the ability of the Mi'kmaq to trade with non-government individuals. A "truckhouse" was a type of trading post. The evidence showed that the promised government truckhouses disappeared from Nova Scotia within a few years and by 1780 a replacement regime of government licensed traders had also fallen into disuse while the British Crown was attending to the American Revolution. ...

[7] The appellant's position is that the truckhouse provision not only incorporated the alleged right to trade, but also the right to pursue traditional hunting, fishing and gathering activities in support of that trade. It seems clear that the words of the March 10, 1760 document, standing in isolation, do not support the appellant's argument. The question is whether the underlying negotiations produced a broader agreement between the British and the Mi'kmaq, memorialized only in part by the Treaty of Peace and Friendship, that would protect the appellant's activities that are the subject of the prosecution. ...

Evidentiary Sources

[9] The Court of Appeal took a strict approach to the use of extrinsic evidence when interpreting the Treaties of 1760-61. Roscoe and Bateman J.J.A. stated at p. 194: "While treaties must be interpreted in their historical context, extrinsic evidence cannot be used as an aid to interpretation, in the absence of ambiguity." I think this approach should be rejected

[14] [Recent] cases have distanced themselves from a "strict" rule of treaty interpretation, as more recently discussed by Cory J., in Badger [R v Badger, [1996] 1 SCR 771, 1996 CanLII 236], at para. 52:

... [W]hen considering a treaty, a court must take into account the context in which the treaties were negotiated, concluded and committed to writing. The treaties, as written documents, recorded an agreement that had already been reached orally and they did not always record the full extent of the oral agreement. ... The treaties were drafted in English by representatives of the Canadian government who, it should be assumed, were familiar with common law doctrines. Yet, the treaties were not translated in written form into the languages (here Cree and Dene) of the various Indian nations who were signatories. Even if they had been, it is unlikely that the Indians, who had a history of communicating only orally, would have understood them any differently. As a result, it is well settled that the words in the treaty must not be interpreted in their strict technical sense nor subjected to rigid modern rules of construction. [Emphasis added.]

"Generous" rules of interpretation should not be confused with a vague sense of after-the-fact largesse. The special rules are dictated by the special difficulties of ascertaining what in fact was agreed to. ... The bottom line is the Court's obligation is to "choose from among the various possible interpretations of the common intention [at the time the treaty was made] the one which best reconciles" the Mi'kmaq interests and those of the British Crown ([R v Sioui, [1990] 1 SCR 1025, 1990 CanLII 103], per Lamer J., at p. 1069 (emphasis added)). ...

The 1760 Negotiations

[22] I propose to review briefly the documentary record to emphasize and amplify certain aspects of the trial judge's findings. He accepted in general the evidence of the Crown's only expert witness, Dr. Stephen Patterson, a Professor of History at the University of New Brunswick, who testified at length about what the trial judge referred to (at para. 116) as British encouragement of the Mi'kmaq "hunting, fishing and gathering lifestyle." That evidence puts the trade clause in context, and answers the question whether there was something more to the treaty entitlement than merely the right to bring fish and wildlife to truckhouses.

[23] I take the following points from the matters particularly emphasized by the trial judge at para. 90 following his thorough review of the historical background:

1. The 1760-61 treaties were the culmination of more than a decade of intermittent hostilities between the British and the Mi'kmaq. Hostilities with the French were also prevalent in Nova Scotia throughout the 1750's, and the Mi'kmaq were constantly allied with the French against the British.
6. The British wanted peace and a safe environment for their current and future settlers. Despite their recent victories, they did not feel completely secure in Nova Scotia.

[26] The trial judge concluded that in 1760 the British Crown entered into a series of negotiations with communities of first nations spread across what is now Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. These treaties were essentially "adhesions" by different Mi'kmaq communities to identical terms because, as stated, it was contemplated that they would be consolidated in a more comprehensive and all-inclusive document at a later date, which never happened. The trial judge considered that the key negotiations took place not with the Mi'kmaq people directly, but with the St. John River Indians, part of the Maliseet First Nation, and the Passamaquody First Nation, who lived in present-day New Brunswick.

[27] The trial judge found as a fact, at para. 108, that the relevant Mi'kmaq treaty did "make peace upon the same conditions" (emphasis added) as the Maliseet and Passamaquody. Meetings took place between the Crown and the Maliseet and the Passamaquody on February 11, 1760, twelve days before these bands signed their treaty with the British and eighteen days prior to the meeting between the Governor and the Mi'kmaq representatives, Paul Laurent of LaHave and Michel Augustine of the Richibucto region, where the terms of the Maliseet and Passamaquody treaties were "communicated" and accepted.

[28] The trial judge found (at para. 101) that on February 29, 1760, at a meeting between the Governor in Council and the Mi'kmaq chiefs, the following exchange occurred:

His Excellency then Ordered the Several Articles of the Treaty made with the Indians of St. John's River and Passamaquody to be Communicated to the said Paul Laurent and Michel Augustine who expressed their satisfaction therewith, and declar'd that all the Tribe of Mickmacks would be glad to make peace upon the same Conditions. [Emphasis added.]

Governor Lawrence afterwards confirmed, in his May 11, 1760 report to the Board of Trade, that he had treated with the Mi'kmaq Indians on "the same terms."

[29] The genesis of the Mi'kmaq trade clause is therefore found in the Governor's earlier negotiations with the Maliseet and Passamaquody First Nations. In that regard, the appellant places great reliance on a meeting between the Governor and their chiefs on February 11, 1760 for the purpose of reviewing various aspects of the proposed treaty. The following exchange is recorded in contemporaneous minutes of the meeting prepared by the British Governor's Secretary:

His Excellency then demanded of them, Whether they were directed by their Tribes, to propose any other particulars to be Treated upon at this time. To which they replied that their Tribes had not directed them to propose any thing further than that there might be a Truckhouse established, for the furnishing them with necessaries, in Exchange for their Peltry, and that it might, at present, be at Fort Frederick.

Upon which His Excellency acquainted them that in case of their now executing a Treaty in the manner proposed, and its being ratified at the next General Meeting of their Tribes the next Spring, a Truckhouse should be established at Fort Frederick, agreeable to their desire, and likewise at other Places if it should be found necessary, for furnishing them with such Commodities as shall be necessary for them, in Exchange for their Peltry & and that great care should be taken, that the Commerce at the said Truckhouses should be managed by Persons on whose Justice and good Treatment, they might always depend; and that it would be expected that the said Tribes should not Trafic or Barter and Exchange any Commodities at any other Place, nor with any other Persons. Of all which the Chiefs expressed their entire Approbation. [Emphasis added.]

[30] It is true ... that the British made it clear from the outset that the Mi'kmaq were not to have any commerce with "any of His Majesty's Enemies." A Treaty of Peace and Friendship could not be otherwise. ...

[31] At a meeting of the Governor's Council on February 16, 1760 (less than a week later), the Council and the representatives of the Indians proceeded to settle the prices of various articles of merchandise. ...

[32] In furtherance of this trade arrangement, the British established six truck-houses following the signing of the treaties in 1760 and 1761. ... The existence of advantageous terms at the truckhouses was part of an imperial peace strategy. ... The British were concerned that matters might again become "troublesome" if the Mi'kmaq were subjected to the "pernicious practices" of "unscrupulous traders." The cost to the public purse of Nova Scotia of supporting Mi'kmaq trade was an investment in peace and the promotion of ongoing colonial settlement. The strategy would be effective only if the Mi'kmaq had access both to trade and to the fish and wildlife resources necessary to provide them with something to trade.

[35] In my view, all of this evidence, reflected in the trial judgment, demonstrates the inadequacy and incompleteness of the written memorial of the treaty terms by selectively isolating the restrictive trade covenant. Indeed, the truckhouse system offered such advantageous terms that it hardly seems likely that Mi'kmaq traders had to be compelled to buy at lower prices and sell at higher prices. At a later date, they objected when truckhouses were abandoned. The trade clause would not have advanced British objectives (peaceful relations with a self-sufficient Mi'kmaq people) or Mi'kmaq objectives (access to the European "necessaries" on which they had come to rely) unless the Mi'kmaq were assured at the same time of continuing access, implicitly or explicitly, to wildlife to trade.

[40] In my view, the Nova Scotia judgments erred in concluding that the only enforceable treaty obligations were those set out in the written document of March 10, 1760, whether construed flexibly (as did the trial judge) or narrowly (as did the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal). The findings of fact made by the trial judge taken as a whole demonstrate that the concept of a disappearing treaty right does justice neither to the honour of the Crown nor to the reasonable expectations of the Mi'kmaq people. It is their common intention in 1760—not just the terms of the March 10, 1760 document—to which effect must be given.

Ascertaining the Terms of the Treaty

[41] Having concluded that the written text is incomplete, it is necessary to ascertain the treaty terms not only by reference to the fragmentary historical record ... , but also in light of the stated objectives of the British and Mi'kmaq in 1760 and the political and economic context in which those objectives were reconciled.

[42] ... The appellant asserts the right of Mi'kmaq people to catch fish and wildlife in support of trade as an alternative or supplementary method of obtaining necessities. The right to fish is not mentioned in the March 10, 1760 document, nor is it expressly noted elsewhere in the records of the negotiation put in evidence. This is not surprising. As Dickson J. mentioned with reference to the west coast in [Jack v The Queen, [1980] 1 SCR 294, 1979 CanLII 175], at p. 311, in colonial times the perception of the fishery resource was one of "limitless proportions."

[43] The law has long recognized that parties make assumptions when they enter into agreements about certain things that give their arrangements efficacy. Courts will imply a contractual term on the basis of presumed intentions of the parties where it is necessary to assure the efficacy of the contract, e.g., where it meets the "officious bystander test": ... Here, if the ubiquitous officious bystander had said, "This talk about truckhouses is all very well, but if the Mi'kmaq are to make these promises, will they have the right to hunt and fish to catch something to trade at the truckhouses?", the answer would have to be, having regard to the honour of the Crown, "of course." If the law is prepared to supply the deficiencies of written contracts prepared by sophisticated parties and their legal advisors in order to produce a sensible result that accords with the intent of both parties, though unexpressed, the law cannot ask less of the honour and dignity of the Crown in its dealings with First Nations. The honour of the Crown was, in fact, specifically invoked by courts in the early 17th century to ensure that a Crown grant was effective to accomplish its intended purpose. ...

[44] An example of the Court's recognition of the necessity of supplying the deficiencies of aboriginal treaties is [R v Sioui, [1990] 1 SCR 1025, 1990 CanLII 103], where Lamer J. considered a treaty document that stated simply (at p. 1031) that the Huron tribe "are received upon the same terms with the Canadians, being allowed the free Exercise of their Religion, their Customs, and Liberty of trading with the English." Lamer J. found that, in order to give real value and meaning to these words, it was necessary that a territorial component be supplied, as follows, at p. 1067:

The treaty gives the Hurons the freedom to carry on their customs and their religion. No mention is made in the treaty itself of the territory over which these rights may be exercised. There is also no indication that the territory of what is now Jacques-Cartier park was contemplated. However, for a freedom to have real value and meaning, it must be possible to exercise it somewhere. [Emphasis added.]

Similarly, in [R v Sundown, [1999] 1 SCR 393, 1999 CanLII 673], the Court found that the express right to hunt included the implied right to build shelters required to carry out the hunt. See also [R v Simon, [1985] 2 SCR 387, 1985 CanLII 11], where the Court recognized an implied right to carry a gun and ammunition on the way to exercise the right to hunt. These cases employed the concept of implied rights to support the meaningful exercise of express rights ... where no such implication might necessarily have been made absent the sui generis nature of the Crown's relationship to aboriginal people. While I do not believe that in ordinary commercial situations a right to trade implies any right of access to things to trade, I think the honour of the Crown requires nothing less in attempting to make sense of the result of these 1760 negotiations.

Rights of the Other Inhabitants

[45] ... [I]t is ... true that a general right enjoyed by all citizens can nevertheless be made the subject of an enforceable treaty promise. ...

[47] ... The settlers and the military undoubtedly hunted and fished for sport or necessities as well, and traded goods with each other. The issue here is not so much the content of the rights or liberties as the level of legal protection thrown around them. A treaty could, to take a fanciful example, provide for a right of the Mi'kmaq to promenade down Barrington Street, Halifax, on each anniversary of the treaty. Barrington Street is a common thoroughfare enjoyed by all. There would be nothing "special" about the Mi'kmaq use of a common right of way. The point is that the treaty rights-holder not only has the right or liberty "enjoyed by other British subjects" but may enjoy special treaty protection against interference with its exercise. So it is with the trading arrangement. On June 25, 1761, following the signing of the Treaties of 1760-61 by the last group of Mi'kmaq villages, a ceremony was held at the farm of Lieutenant Governor Jonathan Belcher, the first Chief Justice of Nova Scotia, who was acting in the place of Governor Charles Lawrence, who had recently been drowned on his way to Boston. In reference to the treaties, including the trade clause, Lieutenant Governor Belcher proclaimed:

The Laws will be like a great Hedge about your Rights and properties, if any break this Hedge to hurt and injure you, the heavy weight of the Laws will fall upon them and punish their Disobedience.

[48] Until enactment of the Constitution Act, 1982, the treaty rights of aboriginal peoples could be overridden by competent legislation. ... The hedge offered no special protection, as the aboriginal people learned in earlier hunting cases such as Sikyea v. The Queen, [1964] S.C.R. 642, and R. v. George, [1966] S.C.R. 267. On April 17, 1982, however, this particular type of "hedge" was converted by s. 35(1) into sterner stuff that could only be broken down when justified according to the test laid down in R. v. Sparrow, [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1075, at pp. 1112 et seq., as adapted to apply to treaties in Badger, supra, per Cory J., at paras. 75 et seq. The fact the content of Mi'kmaq rights under the treaty to hunt and fish and trade was no greater than those enjoyed by other inhabitants does not, unless those rights were extinguished prior to April 17, 1982, detract from the higher protection they presently offer to the Mi'kmaq people.

The Honour of the Crown

[50] This principle that the Crown's honour is at stake when the Crown enters into treaties with first nations dates back at least to this Court's decision in 1895, Province of Ontario v. Dominion of Canada and Province of Quebec; In re Indian Claims (1895), 25 S.C.R. 434. In that decision, Gwynne J. (dissenting) stated, at pp. 511-12:

... [W]hat is contended for and must not be lost sight of, is that the British sovereigns, ever since the acquisition of Canada, have been pleased to adopt the rule or practice of entering into agreements with the Indian nations or tribes in their province of Canada, for the cession or surrender by them of what such sovereigns have been pleased to designate the Indian title, by instruments similar to these now under consideration to which they have been pleased to give the designation of "treaties" with the Indians in possession of and claiming title to the lands expressed to be surrendered by the instruments, and further that the terms and conditions expressed in those instruments as to be performed by or on behalf of the Crown, have always been regarded as involving a trust graciously assumed by the Crown to the fulfilment of which with the Indians the faith and honour of the Crown is pledged, and which trust has always been most faithfully fulfilled as a treaty obligation of the Crown. [Emphasis added.]

[52] I do not think an interpretation of events that turns a positive Mi'kmaq trade demand into a negative Mi'kmaq covenant is consistent with the honour and integrity of the Crown. Nor is it consistent to conclude that the Lieutenant Governor, seeking in good faith to address the trade demands of the Mi'kmaq, accepted the Mi'kmaq suggestion of a trading facility while denying any treaty protection to Mi'kmaq access to the things that were to be traded, even though these things were identified and priced in the treaty negotiations. This was not a commercial contract. The trade arrangement must be interpreted in a manner which gives meaning and substance to the promises made by the Crown. In my view, with respect, the interpretation adopted by the courts below left the Mi'kmaq with an empty shell of a treaty promise.

The Limited Scope of the Treaty Right

[57] The Crown expresses the concern that recognition of the existence of a constitutionally entrenched right with, as here, a trading aspect, would open the floodgates to uncontrollable and excessive exploitation of the natural resources. Whereas hunting and fishing for food naturally restricts quantities to the needs and appetites of those entitled to share in the harvest, it is argued that there is no comparable, built-in restriction associated with a trading right, short of the paramount need to conserve the resource. ... The ultimate fear is that the appellant, who in this case fished for eels from a small boat using a fyke net, could lever the treaty right into a factory trawler in Pomquet Harbour gathering the available harvest in preference to all non-aboriginal commercial or recreational fishermen. (This is indeed the position advanced by the intervener [of] the Union of New Brunswick Indians.) This fear (or hope) is based on a misunderstanding of the narrow ambit and extent of the treaty right.

[58] The recorded note of February 11, 1760 was that "there might be a Truckhouse established, for the furnishing them with necessaries" (emphasis added). What is contemplated therefore is not a right to trade generally for economic gain, but rather a right to trade for necessities. The treaty right is a regulated right and can be contained by regulation within its proper limits.

[59] The concept of "necessaries" is today equivalent to the concept of what Lambert J.A., in R. v. Van der Peet (1993), 80 B.C.L.R. (2d) 75, at p. 126, described as a "moderate livelihood." Bare subsistence has thankfully receded over the last couple of centuries as an appropriate standard of life for aboriginals and non-aboriginals alike. A moderate livelihood includes such basics as "food, clothing and housing, supplemented by a few amenities," but not the accumulation of wealth (Gladstone [R v Gladstone, [1996] 2 SCR 672, 1996 CanLII 160], at para. 165). It addresses day-to-day needs. This was the common intention in 1760. It is fair that it be given this interpretation today.

[61] Catch limits that could reasonably be expected to produce a moderate livelihood for individual Mi'kmaq families at present-day standards can be established by regulation and enforced without violating the treaty right. In that case, the regulations would accommodate the treaty right. Such regulations would not constitute an infringement that would have to be justified under the Badger standard.

Application to the Facts of This Case

[62] The appellant is charged with three offences: the selling of eels without a licence, fishing without a licence and fishing during the close season with illegal nets. ... For Marshall to have satisfied the regulations, he was required to secure a licence under either the Fishery (General) Regulations, SOR/93-53, the Maritime Provinces Fishery Regulations, SOR/93-55, or the Aboriginal Communal Fishing Licences Regulations, SOR/93-332.

[63] All of these regulations place the issuance of licences within the absolute discretion of the Minister. ...

[64] Furthermore, there is nothing in these regulations which gives direction to the Minister to explain how she or he should exercise this discretionary authority in a manner which would respect the appellant's treaty rights. [The Court cited the test for infringement set out in Sparrow.] Lamer C.J. in [R v Adams, [1996] 3 SCR 101, 1996 CanLII 169] applied this test to licensing schemes and stated as follows at para. 54:

In light of the Crown's unique fiduciary obligations towards aboriginal peoples, Parliament may not simply adopt an unstructured discretionary administrative regime which risks infringing aboriginal rights in a substantial number of applications in the absence of some explicit guidance. If a statute confers an administrative discretion which may carry significant consequences for the exercise of an aboriginal right, the statute or its delegate regulations must outline specific criteria for the granting or refusal of that discretion which seek to accommodate the existence of aboriginal rights. In the absence of such specific guidance, the statute will fail to provide representatives of the Crown with sufficient directives to fulfil their fiduciary duties, and the statute will be found to represent an infringement of aboriginal rights under the Sparrow test. [Emphasis added.]

Cory J. in Badger, supra, at para. 79, found that the test for infringement under s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 was the same for both aboriginal and treaty rights There was nothing at that time which provided the Crown officials with the "sufficient directives" necessary to ensure that the appellant's treaty rights would be respected. ... [U]nder the applicable regulatory regime, the appellant's exercise of his treaty right to fish and trade for sustenance was exercisable only at the absolute discretion of the Minister. Mi'kmaq treaty rights were not accommodated in the Regulations because, presumably, the Crown's position was, and continues to be, that no such treaty rights existed. In the circumstances, the purported regulatory prohibitions against fishing without a licence (Maritime Provinces Fishery Regulations, s. 4(1)(a)) and of selling eels without a licence (Fishery (General) Regulations, s. 35(2)) do prima facie infringe the appellant's treaty rights under the Treaties of 1760-61 and are inoperative against the appellant unless justified under the Badger test.

[65] Further, the appellant was charged with fishing during the close season with improper nets, contrary to s. 20 of the Maritime Provinces Fishery Regulations. Such a regulation is also a prima facie infringement, as noted by Cory J. in Badger, supra, at para. 90: "This Court has held on numerous occasions that there can be no limitation on the method, timing and extent of Indian hunting under a Treaty," apart, I would add, from a treaty limitation to that effect.

[66] The appellant caught and sold the eels to support himself and his wife. Accordingly, the close season and the imposition of a discretionary licensing system would, if enforced, interfere with the appellant's treaty right to fish for trading purposes, and the ban on sales would, if enforced, infringe his right to trade for sustenance. In the absence of any justification of the regulatory prohibitions, the appellant is entitled to an acquittal.

Disposition

[67] The constitutional question stated by the Chief Justice on February 9, 1998, as follows:

Are the prohibitions on catching and retaining fish without a licence, on fishing during the close time, and on the unlicensed sale of fish, contained in ss. 4(1)(a) and 20 of the Maritime Provinces Fishery Regulations and s. 35(2) of the Fishery (General) Regulations, inconsistent with the treaty rights of the appellant contained in the Mi'kmaq Treaties of 1760-61 and therefore of no force or effect or application to him, by virtue of ss. 35(1) and 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982?

Should be answered in the affirmative. I would therefore allow the appeal and order an acquittal on all charges.

[Justices McLachlin and Gonthier dissented.]

Appealed allowed.

NOTES

1. Following the release of the judgment in R v Marshall, there were numerous clashes between Indigenous and non-Indigenous fishers in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. The commercial fishers widely condemned the ruling for its potential to disrupt their livelihoods, while Indigenous fishers strongly praised it as a means to enhance their access to economic opportunity. In this climate of unrest and instability, the West Nova Fishermen's Coalition applied for a rehearing of the case. They wanted "to have the Court address the regulatory authority of the Government of Canada over the east coast fisheries" (at para 1) and requested an order that the Court's earlier judgment be stayed to allow the Crown to justify restrictions on the exercise of Marshall's treaty right. In R v Marshall, [1999] 3 SCR 533, 1999 CanLII 666 (Marshall No 2), the Court dismissed West Nova's application, but, in an unprecedented move, it reframed its judgment of only a month earlier. Some commentators observed that the Court's "clarification" arguably had the effect of emphasizing certain aspects of the original judgment at the expense of other elements of the original decision. Some criticized the Court for bowing to public pressure and compromising its independence, while others applauded it for bringing order to an unstable situation.

2. In 2014, the Supreme Court of Canada did not apply the liberal principles of treaty interpretation deployed in Marshall No 1. In Grassy Narrows First Nation v Ontario (Natural Resources), the Court did not once refer to these canons of construction. Instead, the Court chose to prioritize other constitutional norms, as evident in the following excerpt.

Grassy Narrows First Nation v Ontario (Natural Resources)

[This case involved the Keewatin area of Northwestern Ontario, a portion of land that was included in Treaty 3 of 1873 between the Ojibway First Nation and the Dominion of Canada. By virtue of Treaty 3, the Ojibway yielded ownership of their territory (except for certain reserve lands), receiving in return the right to harvest the non-reserve lands surrendered by them until such time as that land was "taken up," for example, for settlement, mining, and lumbering by the Dominion of Canada. The Keewatin area was annexed to Ontario in 1912.

The appellants before the Supreme Court were the descendants of the Ojibway signatories to Treaty 3. They challenged a forestry licence issued by the province of Ontario that authorized forestry operations in the Keewatin area. The trial judge found that the province of Ontario could not take up lands within the Keewatin area so as to limit the harvesting rights of First Nations without the approval of the federal government. Accordingly, she interpreted the taking-up clause of Treaty 3 as imposing a two-step process (involving provincial authorization and then federal approval) before any lands covered by the treaty could be taken up.

The Ontario Court of Appeal reversed the ruling of the trial judge, and held that several provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867 gave Ontario beneficial ownership of, and the right of management over, the lands in question.]

McLACHLIN CJ (LeBel, Abella, Rothstein, Cromwell, Moldaver, and Wagner JJ concurring):

[3] ... The legal issue in this case is whether Ontario can "take up" lands in the Keewatin area under Treaty 3 so as to limit the harvesting rights under the treaty, or whether it needs federal authorization to do so.

[4] I conclude that Ontario has the authority to take up lands in the Keewatin area so as to limit the harvesting rights set out in Treaty 3. By virtue of ss. 109, 92A, and 92(5) of the Constitution Act, 1867, Ontario alone has the ability to take up Treaty 3 land and regulate it in accordance with the treaty and its obligations under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. A two-step process involving federal approval for provincial taking up was not contemplated by Treaty 3.

[31] Once the Keewatin lands came within Ontario's borders in 1912, s. 109 of the Constitution Act, 1867 became applicable. Section 109 provides:

109. All Lands, Mines, Minerals, and Royalties belonging to the several Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick at the Union, and all Sums then due or payable for such Lands, Mines, Minerals, or Royalties, shall belong to the several Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick in which the same are situate or arise, subject to any Trusts existing in respect thereof, and to any Interest other than that of the Province in the same.

Section 109 establishes conclusively that Ontario holds the beneficial interest in the Keewatin lands and the resources on or under those lands. In addition, s. 92(5) of the Constitution Act, 1867 gives the Province exclusive power over the "Management and Sale of the Public Lands belonging to the Province and of the Timber and Wood thereon" and s. 92A gives the Province exclusive power to make laws in relation to non-renewable natural resources, forestry resources, and electrical energy. Together, these provisions give Ontario the power to take up lands in the Keewatin area under Treaty 3 for provincially regulated purposes, such as forestry.

[32] The view that only Canada can take up, or authorize the taking up of, lands under Treaty 3 rests on a misconception of the legal role of the Crown in the treaty context. It is true that Treaty 3 was negotiated with the Crown in right of Canada. But that does not mean that the Crown in right of Ontario is not bound by and empowered to act with respect to the treaty.

[33] The theory of the trial judge, supported by the appellants, was that since the treaty was made with the federal Crown, only the federal Crown has obligations and powers over matters covered by the treaty. But this reasoning does not apply in the treaty context. For example, this Court has held that Crown obligations to First Nations such as the duty to consult are owed by both levels of government (Haida Nation v. British Columbia (Minister of Forests), 2004 SCC 73, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 511) and that a change in the level of government responsible for regulating hunting rights did not constitute a modification of a treaty (R. v. Horseman, [1990] 1 S.C.R. 901). Furthermore, in St. Catherine's Milling and Lumber Co. v. The Queen (1888), 14 App. Cas. 46 (P.C.), Lord Watson concluded that Treaty 3 purported to be "from beginning to end a transaction between the Indians and the Crown," not an agreement between the government of Canada and the Ojibway people (p. 60). In the same vein, it is abundantly clear that the Commissioners who represented Her Majesty, whilst they had full authority to accept a surrender to the Crown, had neither authority nor power to take away from Ontario the interest which had been assigned to that province by the Imperial Statute of 1867.

[35] The promises made in Treaty 3 were promises of the Crown, not those of Canada. Both levels of government are responsible for fulfilling these promises when acting within the division of powers under the Constitution Act, 1867. Thus, when the lands covered by the treaty were determined to belong to the Province of Ontario, the Province became responsible for their governance with respect to matters falling under its jurisdiction by virtue of ss. 109, 92(5) and 92A of the Constitution Act, 1867, subject to the terms of the treaty. It follows that the Province is entitled to take up lands under the treaty for forestry purposes.

[36] The appellants further argue that s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867 grants Canada a residual and continuing role in respect of the taking up of Treaty 3 lands. Section 91(24) provides that Canada has jurisdiction over "Indians, and Lands reserved for the Indians." Thus, the appellants submit that the trial judge's two-step process is merely a restatement of the double aspect doctrine: to the extent that any taking up displaces or limits the federally promised treaty rights, both aspects of the land or resource must be addressed: the provincial aspect of the land qua proprietary rights and the federal aspect of the land as subject to a treaty right (Grassy Narrows' factum, at para. 66).

[37] Section 91(24) does not give Canada the authority to take up provincial land for exclusively provincial purposes, such as forestry, mining, or settlement. Thus, s. 91(24) does not require Ontario to obtain federal approval before it can take up land under Treaty 3. While s. 91(24) allows the federal government to enact legislation dealing with Indians and lands reserved for Indians that may have incidental effects on provincial land, the applicability of provincial legislation that affects treaty rights through the taking up of land is determined by Mikisew Cree First Nation v. Canada (Minister of Canadian Heritage), 2005 SCC 69, [2005] 3 S.C.R. 388, and by s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

[50] I conclude that as a result of ss. 109, 92(5) and 92A of the Constitution Act, 1867, Ontario and only Ontario has the power to take up lands under Treaty 3. This is confirmed by the text of Treaty 3 and legislation dealing with Treaty 3 lands. However, this power is not unconditional. In exercising its jurisdiction over Treaty 3 lands, the Province of Ontario is bound by the duties attendant on the Crown. It must exercise its powers in conformity with the honour of the Crown, and is subject to the fiduciary duties that lie on the Crown in dealing with Aboriginal interests. These duties bind the Crown. When a government—be it the federal or a provincial government—exercises Crown power, the exercise of that power is burdened by the Crown obligations toward the Aboriginal people in question.

[51] These duties mean that for land to be taken up under Treaty 3, the harvesting rights of the Ojibway over the land must be respected. Any taking up of the land for forestry or other purposes must meet the conditions set out by this Court in Mikisew. As explained by the Ontario Court of Appeal (at paras. 206-12), the Crown's right to take up lands under Treaty 3 is subject to its duty to consult and, if appropriate, accommodate First Nations' interests beforehand (Mikisew, at para. 56). This duty is grounded in the honour of the Crown and binds the Province of Ontario in the exercise of the Crown's powers.

[52] Where a province intends to take up lands for the purposes of a project within its jurisdiction, the Crown must inform itself of the impact the project will have on the exercise by the Ojibway of their rights to hunt, fish and trap, and communicate its findings to them. It must then deal with the Ojibway in good faith, and with the intention of substantially addressing their concerns (Mikisew, at para. 55; Delgamuukw v. British Columbia, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 1010, at para. 168). The adverse impact of the Crown's project (and the extent of the duty to consult and accommodate) is a matter of degree, but consultation cannot exclude accommodation at the outset. Not every taking up will constitute an infringement of the harvesting rights set out in Treaty 3. This said, if the taking up leaves the Ojibway with no meaningful right ... , a potential action for treaty infringement will arise (Mikisew, at para. 48).

[53] I have concluded that Ontario has the power to take up lands in the Keewatin area under Treaty 3, without federal approval or supervision. Provided it ... respects the requirements set out in Mikisew, doing this does not breach Treaty 3 harvesting rights. If Ontario's taking up of Keewatin lands amounts to an infringement of the treaty, the Sparrow/Badger analysis under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 will determine whether the infringement is justified (R. v. Sparrow, [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1075; R. v. Badger, [1996] 1 S.C.R. 771). The doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity does not preclude the Province from justifiably infringing treaty rights (Tsilhqot'in Nation v. British Columbia, 2014 SCC 44). While it is unnecessary to consider this issue, this Court's decision in Tsilhqot'in Nation is a full answer.

Appeal dismissed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

- Evaluate the following critique by John Borrows:

The Grassy Narrows case permits the province to take up lands under Treaty 3 without being subject to federalism's constraints. The Supreme Court held that the province is fully vested with the beneficial interest of the so-called surrendered Treaty 3 lands. The Court found that the province was unrestrained by federal authority in taking up Treaty 3 lands for settlement because it held the beneficial interest in these lands under section 109 of the Constitution Act, 1867. The Supreme Court strengthened the province's hand despite the specific wording of the Treaty, which placed the power to "take up" treaty lands in the hands of the federal government. Furthermore, the province was vindicated as the Supreme Court of Canada overturned the Trial Judge's findings of fact which had been based on First Nations perspectives. First Nations perspectives were subordinated to provincial views.

The Supreme Court wrote that Treaty 3 was with the Crown, not Canada. In taking this approach it did not resolve ambiguities in the treaty in favour of the Indians. Chief Justice McLachlin did not apply a large, liberal and generous perspective of the agreement which interprets the treaty in this light. Section 109 prevailed over a longer 250-year narrative which would shield First Nations from the very approach taken by the Court. The Supreme Court of Canada has acted to enhance provincial development and control of First Nations lands. The shielding of First Nations from local governments has been abandoned. It strikes against the heart of First Nations political rhetoric which claims a nation-to-nation relationship with the Crown, not a nation-to-province relationship. Many First Nations call this colonialism—allowing the local colonies (now called provinces) to set the framework for Indigenous lives. In reinforcing the provincial narrative, First Nations treaty rights have been placed in the very hands of the party which has the most to gain from undermining the treaties. As the United States Supreme Court once observed, "the people of the States where they are found are often their [the Indians] deadliest enemies" because [of] their adverse interests (United States v. Kagama, (1888) 118 US 375 at 383). The federal government may have been an exceedingly poor fiduciary but at least that level of government did not stand to receive the direct benefits of First Nations dispossession in the same way. The Supreme Court of Canada has diminished a centuries-old Indigenous-centric constitutional narrative. It has replaced this older constitutional framework with a balancing test under section 35(1) of the Constitution which allows the provinces to justifiably infringe Aboriginal and treaty rights.

See John Borrows, "Canada's Colonial Constitution" in John Borrows & Michael Coyle, eds, The Right(s) Relationship: Reimagining the Implementation of Historic Treaties (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2016) 17 at 17, 31-32.

As this critique reveals, Grassy Narrows raises issues about the distribution of legislative powers over Indigenous peoples. These issues are dealt with in more detail below in Section X.

2. The "taking up" of land under a treaty may involve the duty to consult: see Mikisew Cree First Nation v Canada (Minister of Canadian Heritage), 2005 SCC 69, discussed in Note 2 following Haida Nation in Section VII, and Beckman v Little Salmon/Carmacks First Nation, 2010 SCC 53, noted in Section VII.

3. Modern treaties have been negotiated and passed into law in the past 35 years, starting with the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement in 1975. These modern land claims agreements are constitutionally protected by virtue of s 35(3) of the Constitution Act, 1982, which reads, "For greater certainty, in subsection (1) 'treaty rights' includes rights that now exist by way of land claims agreements or may be so acquired." Should the courts take the same approach to modern treaties as they do with historic treaties? See R v Howard, [\[1994\] 2 SCR 299, 1994 CanLII 86](#) and Beckman v Little Salmon/Carmacks First Nation, 2010 SCC 53, where a majority of the Court, in a decision authored by Binnie J had this to say:

[12] The increased detail and sophistication of modern treaties represents a quantum leap beyond the pre-Confederation historical treaties such as the 1760–61 Treaty at issue in R. v. Marshall, [1999] 3 S.C.R. 456, and post-Confederation treaties such as Treaty No. 8 (1899) at issue in R. v. Badger, [1996] 1 S.C.R. 771, and Mikisew Cree First Nation v. Canada (Minister of Canadian Heritage), 2005 SCC 69, [2005] 3 S.C.R. 388. The historical treaties were typically expressed in lofty terms of high generality and were often ambiguous. The courts were obliged to resort to general principles (such as the honour of the Crown) to fill the gaps and achieve a fair outcome. Modern comprehensive land claim agreements, on the other hand, starting perhaps with the James Bay and Northern Québec Agreement (1975), while still to be interpreted and applied in a manner that upholds the honour of the Crown, were nevertheless intended to create some precision around property and governance rights and obligations. Instead of ad hoc remedies to smooth the way to reconciliation, the modern treaties are designed to place Aboriginal and non-Aboriginal relations in the mainstream legal system with its advantages of continuity, transparency, and predictability.

A note related to Beckman, further elaborating on the principles to be applied in administering modern treaty relationships, can be found below in Section VII.

4. Many modern treaties are not only comprehensive land claims agreements but also provide for a measure of self-government. Of the 24 modern treaties that have been brought into effect since 1973, 18 have self-government provisions. For an example, see the Nisga'a Final Agreement (2000), discussed below in Section X.

5. In some cases, agreements between Indigenous peoples and the Crown have been converted into constitutional provisions. Should the principles of treaty interpretation be applied, or those of constitutional interpretation? See Manitoba Metis Federation Inc v Canada (AG), 2013 SCC 14, excerpted below in Section VIII.

VII. THE DUTY TO CONSULT

You will recall this chapter began with a discussion of Anishinaabe constitutionalism. Throughout this chapter, you have been introduced to varied ways by which Indigenous legal traditions challenge the foundation of Canadian constitutional law through different ways of conceiving and creating law. Constitutional law is changing because Indigenous actors are asserting their right to be recognized as this nation's founders and first polities.

The resurgence of Indigenous law is perhaps most visible to the public in the natural resource sector. Disputes about pipelines, oil and gas exploration, forestry, mining, and other developments bring Indigenous peoples into conflict with resource companies and others. In the face of these challenges, Indigenous peoples are insisting that they have the right to free, prior, and informed consent when development impacts their lives. The United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples (UNDRIP) contains clauses that recognize this right. Article 32.2 states:

States shall consult and cooperate in good faith with the indigenous peoples concerned through their own representative institutions in order to obtain their free and informed consent prior to the approval of any project affecting their lands or territories and other resources, particularly in connection with the development, utilization or exploitation of mineral, water or other resources.

See United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, UN GA res 61/295.

In conjunction with UNDRIP's recognition, Indigenous nations are creating laws related to free, prior, and informed consent to guide their deliberations with governments, corporations, and entrepreneurs. Likewise, Canada and British Columbia have passed legislation that obliges their governments to affirm UNDRIP as applying to their laws. This legislation also mandates pathways to implement UNDRIP, including obtaining free, prior, and informed consent from Indigenous peoples in connection with development.

The challenge in finding the intersection between Indigenous constitutionalism and s 35(1) of the Constitution Act 1982 is revealed in a case called Coastal GasLink Pipeline Ltd v Huson, 2019 BCSC 2264. The case involved an injunction application to remove Indigenous peoples from a blockade because they were preventing the construction of a pipeline. In the hearing, the judge had to consider the argument that Wet'suwet'en authorization was also required in order for the pipeline to be built on Wet'suwet'en territories and such authorization has not been obtained.

You will remember that the Wet'suwet'en people were plaintiffs who sought a declaration of Aboriginal title in the Delgamuukw case. The Supreme Court of Canada sent the parties back to trial to test Wet'suwet'en claims against the new principles identified in the case. The Court also urged the parties to negotiate. In the end, negotiations failed to recognize Wet'suwet'en ownership. Furthermore, the case was not re-litigated, likely due to cost and Wet'suwet'en views regarding the injustice they continue to face from the courts and others.

Therefore, bolstering their earlier claims to being the territory's owners, in relation to the strong principles set out in the Delgamuukw case, the Wet'suwet'en argued that they have a legal right to block access to what they regard as their Aboriginal title territories. They argued this authority flowed from Wet'suwet'en law.

The judge found she could not give effect to Wet'suwet'en law. In commenting on the challenge of recognizing Wet'suwet'en law in an injunction action, Church J of the British Columbia Supreme Court wrote:

[127] As a general rule, Indigenous customary laws do not become an effectual part of Canadian common law or Canadian domestic law until there is some means or process by which the Indigenous customary law is recognized as being part of Canadian domestic law, either through incorporation into treaties, court declarations

[128] There has been no process by which Wet'suwet'en customary laws have been recognized in this manner. The Aboriginal title claims of the Wet'suwet'en people have yet to be resolved either by negotiation or litigation. While Wet'suwet'en customary laws clearly exist on their own independent footing, they are not recognized as being an effectual part of Canadian law.

This quote illustrates the reluctance courts may have in giving effect to Indigenous laws without executive, legislative, or judicial recognition.

In critiquing Church J's reasoning, Joshua Nichols and Sarah Morales argue the following in "Finding Reconciliation in Dark Territory: Coastal Gaslink, Coldwater, and the Possible Futures of DRIPA" (2021) 53:4 UBC Law Rev 1185 at 1199-1206:

Even at first glance, this "general rule" should give us pause. After all, the common law tradition is no stranger to customary law and unwritten principles. ... What would the Persons Case or the Secession Reference say if this were indeed the "general rule"? ... It seems that this "general rule" would only apply to Indigenous customary law. ...

It would appear that Aboriginal customary law which has not been extinguished is given legal effect in Canadian domestic law through Court declarations, including Aboriginal title or rights jurisprudence, or by statutory provisions. We would also suggest Aboriginal customary law may also be given legal effect by incorporation into Indian treaties. It may be that there are other means by which Aboriginal customary law could be recognized but that is not a question for me to address here.

... The simple fact is that there is no "general rule" that Indigenous laws can be set aside as not legally effective in the way that Church J suggests. Nor is there any amount of interpretive acrobatics that can support the reading of both the standing of the defendants and the status of the laws they cite in Coastal GasLink 2. ... But this leaves us stranded on the horns of a very troubling dilemma indeed. Who decides which laws are legally effective and how they are to be applied in these kinds of situations? ... If we buy her version of the "general rule" regarding Indigenous law, then the Crown has the ability to pick and choose which Indigenous laws have legal effect by enacting enabling legislation, creating agreements and so forth. In this case we would have difficulty explaining much of our own jurisprudence from pre-confederation cases like Connolly v Woolrich, through to Calder, Delgamuukw, and beyond. As Hall J put it in Calder, Aboriginal rights owe their origin to the fact that "when the settlers came, the Indians were there, organized in societies and occupying the land as their forefathers had done for centuries." If Indigenous law were not "an effectual part of Canadian common law" until it is positively incorporated in legislation or treaty, or proven at law, then it would not have legal effects and thus the entire Haida framework (which is designed to deal with asserted but unproven rights) would not exist [the case of Haida Nation v. BC is examined in the next excerpt].

... We believe that this dilemma is only necessary if we insist that the question of the status of Indigenous law in Canada should be settled unilaterally. If we follow those aspects of our constitutional tradition that draw from mutual recognition and treaty making, there are many points of light that could help us pull back from the dead end that we find in the Coastal GasLink cases. ... [As] Grammond J states in Pastion v Dene Tha' First Nation, 2018 FC 648 at para. 8: ... "Indigenous legal traditions are among Canada's legal traditions. They form part of the law of the land."

Professors Nichols and Morales' critique of the Coastal Gaslink case raises questions that lie at the heart of this chapter. How can Indigenous law be implemented when the executive, legislative, or judicial branches of government have not themselves recognized its force? Twenty-two years before the Coastal Gaslink case, the Supreme Court of Canada wrote that the government had a duty to consult with Indigenous peoples when developments affected their rights.

Recall that in Delgamuukw v British Columbia, [1997] 3 SCR 1010, 1997 CanLII 302, extracted above in Section V, "Constitutional Recognition of Aboriginal Title," the Court stated:

[168] ... There is always a duty of consultation. Whether the aboriginal group has been consulted is relevant to determining whether the infringement of aboriginal title is justified The nature and scope of the duty of consultation will vary with the circumstances. In occasional cases, when the breach is less serious or relatively minor, it will be no more than a duty to discuss important decisions that will be taken with respect to lands held pursuant to aboriginal title. Of course, even in these rare cases when the minimum acceptable standard is consultation, this consultation must be in good faith, and with the intention of substantially addressing the concerns of the aboriginal peoples whose lands are at issue. In most cases, it will be significantly deeper than mere consultation. Some cases may even require the full consent of an aboriginal nation, particularly when provinces enact hunting and fishing regulations in relation to aboriginal lands.

In an extraordinary series of cases, beginning with Haida Nation, immediately below, the Supreme Court of Canada has elaborated on and strengthened this "duty to consult," grounding it in the principle that the honour of the Crown is at stake in all its dealings with Indigenous peoples. The Court has established that the government has a duty to consult with Indigenous groups whenever government decision-making could adversely affect an Aboriginal right or Aboriginal title, and that the duty extends to cases where claims of Aboriginal rights or title have been asserted but not yet proven. The "duty to consult" has also become a principle that informs the interpretation and implementation of treaties. This principle has given rise to much recent litigation because of uncertainty about the specific content of the duty in different contexts.

[The Haida Nation challenged the BC government's unilateral replacements and transfer of tree-farming licences (TFLs) over lands to which the Haida claimed Aboriginal title. The replacements and transfer were made over the objections of the Haida. The Court, in a unanimous decision authored by McLachlin CJ, held that the provincial government had a duty to consult with and accommodate the Haida with respect to harvesting timber in the block of land in issue. The Court grounded the duty to consult in the principle of the honour of the Crown.]

McLACHLIN CJ (Major, Bastarache, Binnie, LeBel, Deschamps, and Fish JJ concurring):

[16] The government's duty to consult with Aboriginal peoples and accommodate their interests is grounded in the honour of the Crown. The honour of the Crown is always at stake in its dealings with Aboriginal peoples

[17] The historical roots of the principle of the honour of the Crown suggest that it must be understood generously in order to reflect the underlying realities from which it stems. In all its dealings with Aboriginal peoples, from the assertion of sovereignty to the resolution of claims and the implementation of treaties, the Crown must act honourably. Nothing less is required if we are to achieve "the reconciliation of the pre-existence of aboriginal societies with the sovereignty of the Crown."

[Recognizing that the honour of the Crown gives rise to different duties in different contexts, the Court went on to discuss the implications of the principle in the context of negotiating claims to Aboriginal rights and title.]

[25] Put simply, Canada's Aboriginal peoples were here when Europeans came, and were never conquered. Many bands reconciled their claims with the sovereignty of the Crown through negotiated treaties. Others, notably in British Columbia, have yet to do so. The potential rights embedded in these claims are protected by s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. The honour of the Crown requires that these rights be determined, recognized and respected. This, in turn, requires the Crown, acting honourably, to participate in processes of negotiation. While this process continues, the honour of the Crown may require it to consult and, where indicated, accommodate Aboriginal interests.

[26] Honourable negotiation implies a duty to consult with Aboriginal claimants and conclude an honourable agreement reflecting the claimants' inherent rights. But proving rights may take time, sometimes a very long time. In the meantime, how are the interests under discussion to be treated? Underlying this question is the need to reconcile prior Aboriginal occupation of the land with the reality of Crown sovereignty. Is the Crown, under the aegis of its asserted sovereignty, entitled to use the resources at issue as it chooses, pending proof and resolution of the Aboriginal claim? Or must it adjust its conduct to reflect the as yet unresolved rights claimed by the Aboriginal claimants?

[27] The answer, once again, lies in the honour of the Crown. The Crown, acting honourably, cannot cavalierly run roughshod over Aboriginal interests where claims affecting these interests are being seriously pursued in the process of treaty negotiation and proof. It must respect these potential, but yet unproven, interests. The Crown is not rendered impotent. It may continue to manage the resource in question pending claims resolution. But, depending on the circumstances, discussed more fully below, the honour of the Crown may require it to consult with and reasonably accommodate Aboriginal interests pending resolution of the claim. To unilaterally exploit a claimed resource during the process of proving and resolving the Aboriginal claim to that resource, may be to deprive the Aboriginal claimants of some or all of the benefit of the resource. That is not honourable.

[The Court dismissed the provincial government's argument that any duty to consult and accommodate Aboriginal interests arose only after there had been a final determination of the scope and content of any Aboriginal right.]

[32] The jurisprudence of this Court supports the view that the duty to consult and accommodate is part of a process of fair dealing and reconciliation that begins with the assertion of sovereignty and continues beyond formal claims resolution. Reconciliation is not a final legal remedy in the usual sense. Rather, it is a process flowing from rights guaranteed by s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. This process of reconciliation flows from the Crown's duty of honourable dealing toward Aboriginal peoples, which arises in turn from the Crown's assertion of sovereignty over an Aboriginal people and de facto control of land and resources that were formerly in the control of that people. ...

[33] To limit reconciliation to the post-proof sphere risks treating reconciliation as a distant legalistic goal, devoid of the "meaningful content" mandated by the "solemn commitment" made by the Crown in recognizing and affirming Aboriginal rights and title: [R v Sparrow, [1990] 1 SCR 1075, 1990 CanLII 104], at p. 1108. It also risks unfortunate consequences. When the distant goal of proof is finally reached, the Aboriginal peoples may find their land and resources changed and denuded. This is not reconciliation. Nor is it honourable.

[The Court found that the duty to consult arises when the Crown has knowledge, real or constructive, of the potential existence of the Aboriginal right or title and contemplates conduct that might adversely affect it. As for the exact content of the duty to consult, the Court left much to be determined by developing case law.]

[39] The content of the duty to consult and accommodate varies with the circumstances. Precisely what duties arise in different situations will be defined as the case law in this emerging area develops. In general terms, however, it may be asserted that the scope of the duty is proportionate to a preliminary assessment of the strength of the case supporting the existence of the right or title, and to the seriousness of the potentially adverse effect upon the right or title claimed.

[40] In [Delgamuukw v British Columbia, [1997] 3 SCR 1010, 1997 CanLII 302], at para. 168, the Court considered the duty to consult and accommodate in the context of established claims. Lamer C.J. wrote:

The nature and scope of the duty of consultation will vary with the circumstances. ... [W]hen the breach is less serious or relatively minor, it will be no more than a duty to discuss important decisions that will be taken with respect to lands held pursuant to aboriginal title. Of course, even in these rare cases when the minimum acceptable standard is consultation, this consultation must be in good faith In most cases, it will be significantly deeper than mere consultation. Some cases may even require the full consent of an aboriginal nation, particularly when provinces enact hunting and fishing regulations in relation to aboriginal lands.

[42] At all stages, good faith on both sides is required. The common thread on the Crown's part must be "the intention of substantially addressing [Indigenous] concerns" as they are raised (Delgamuukw [abovel], at para. 168), through a meaningful process of consultation. Sharp dealing is not permitted. However, there is no duty to agree; rather, the commitment is to a meaningful process of consultation. As for Aboriginal claimants, they must not frustrate the Crown's reasonable good faith attempts, nor should they take unreasonable positions to thwart government from making decisions or acting in cases where, despite meaningful consultation, agreement is not reached

[47] When the consultation process suggests amendment of Crown policy, we arrive at the stage of accommodation. Thus the effect of good faith consultation may be to reveal a duty to accommodate. Where a strong prima facie case exists for the claim, and the consequences of the government's proposed decision may adversely affect it in a significant way, addressing the Aboriginal concerns may require taking steps to avoid irreparable harm or to minimize the effects of infringement, pending final resolution of the underlying claim. Accommodation is achieved through consultation, as this Court recognized in R. v. Marshall, [1999] 3 S.C.R. 533, at para. 22: "... the process of accommodation of the treaty right may best be resolved by consultation and negotiation."

[On the facts of the case, the Court found that the Crown's obligation to consult the Haida was engaged. The Haida's claims to title and an Aboriginal right to harvest red cedar were supported by a good prima facie case, and the province knew that the potential Aboriginal rights and title applied to the block of land in question and could be affected by the decision to replace the TFLs. TFL decisions were found to reflect strategic planning for use of the resource and, potentially, to have a serious impact on Aboriginal rights and title. In the Court's view, for consultation to be meaningful, it must take place at the stage of granting or renewing TFLs. The Court went on to state that the strength of the case for both the Haida's title and their right to harvest red cedar, coupled with the serious impact of incremental strategic decisions on those interests, suggested that the honour of the Crown might also require significant accommodation to preserve the Haida's interest pending resolution of their claims.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Taku River Tlingit First Nation v British Columbia (Project Assessment Director), 2004 SCC 74 was decided at the same time as Haida Nation. In this case, which arose in the context of ongoing treaty negotiations, the Court determined that the provincial government's duty to consult with the Taku River Tlingit First Nation (TRTFN) was engaged because the proposed action—the construction of a 160 km long road through the group's traditional territory to reopen an old mine—could significantly and negatively affect the TRTFN. However, the Court went on to hold that the provincial government had consulted and fulfilled its duty to accommodate before approving the reopening of the mine.

The province met the duty to consult through the environmental assessment that was conducted, which included consultation with interested Indigenous groups, including the TRTFN. Not all the broad concerns of the TRTFN were addressed when the final construction plan was approved. However, the Court was satisfied that the assessment committee had given sufficient attention to the specific issues raised by the TRTFN both in the initial assessment process and when the group brought forward additional concerns after the assessment's report was written. The Court stated explicitly that "[t]he Province was not under a duty to reach agreement with the TRTFN, and its failure to do so did not breach the obligations of good faith that it owed the TRTFN" (at para 22). Furthermore:

[40] ... The Province was not required to develop special consultation measures to address TRTFN's concerns, outside of the process provided for by the Environmental Assessment Act, which specifically set out a scheme that required consultation with affected Aboriginal peoples.

[42] As discussed in Haida, the process of consultation may lead to a duty to accommodate Aboriginal concerns by adapting decisions or policies in response. The purpose of s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 is to facilitate the ultimate reconciliation of prior Aboriginal occupation with de facto Crown sovereignty. Pending settlement, the Crown is bound by its honour to balance societal and Aboriginal interests in making decisions that may affect Aboriginal claims. The Crown may be required to make decisions in the face of disagreement as to the adequacy of its response to Aboriginal concerns. Balance and compromise will then be necessary.

2. The duty to consult and historic treaties: Mikisew Cree First Nation v Canada (Minister of Canadian Heritage), 2005 SCC 69 involved the Crown taking up lands surrendered under a treaty to build a winter road to meet regional transportation needs. The proposed road would have the effect of reducing the territory over which the Mikisew Cree First Nation would be entitled to exercise its treaty rights to hunt, fish, and trap. The Court found that the Crown had a duty to consult, which it had breached.

The Court found that although the Crown had the authority under the treaty to "take up" surrendered lands, it was nevertheless under the obligation to inform itself about the impact its project would have on the Mikisew's exercise of their treaty hunting, fishing, and trapping rights and to communicate its findings to the Mikisew. The Crown was then required to attempt to deal with the Mikisew in good faith and with the intention of substantially addressing their concerns. On the facts, the Court found that the impacts of the proposed road were clear, established, and demonstrably adverse to the continued exercise of the Mikisew's hunting and trapping rights over the lands in question and that the duty to consult was thereby triggered.

However, given that the Crown was proposing to build a fairly minor winter road on surrendered lands where the Mikisew treaty rights were expressly subject to the taking-up limitation, the content of the Crown's duty of consultation, in this case, was found to lie at the lower end of the spectrum. The Crown was required to provide notice to the Mikisew and to engage directly with them. This engagement was to include providing information about the project and addressing what the Crown knew to be the Mikisew's interests and what the Crown anticipated might be the potential adverse impact on those interests. The Crown was also required to solicit and listen carefully to the Mikisew's concerns and attempt to minimize adverse impacts on its treaty rights.

The Crown was found not to have discharged its obligations when it unilaterally declared that the road realignment would be shifted from the reserve itself to a track along its boundary. It had failed to demonstrate an intention of substantially addressing Indigenous concerns through a meaningful process of consultation.

3. The duty to consult in modern treaties: In Beckman v Little Salmon/Carmacks First Nation, 2010 SCC 53, the Supreme Court of Canada for the first time addressed the Crown's duty to consult Indigenous peoples in the context of modern treaties. The case is also important because of the discussion of the duty's nature, specifically when dealing with third-party interests. It raises issues similar to those related to historic treaties discussed in Mikisew Cree (see Note 2, immediately above) and Grassy Narrows (excerpted above in Section VI, "Treaty Rights"). The question in the case concerned the Crown's obligations to a First Nation when Crown land was transferred for individual, non-native use. The Yukon government took the position that the Treaty was a complete code and that no consultation was required when Crown land was transferred from public to private status, unless a duty to consult was specifically included in the terms of the Treaty.

A majority of the Court, in a decision written by Binnie J, found that the Crown had a duty to consult the First Nation about this change of land use. This duty existed outside the treaty, as part of the Crown's ongoing constitutional duty to First Nations. Justice Binnie wrote:

[10] The reconciliation of Aboriginal and non-Aboriginal Canadians in a mutually respectful long-term relationship is the grand purpose of s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. The modern treaties, including those at issue here, attempt to further the objective of reconciliation not only by addressing grievances over the land claims but by creating the legal basis to foster a positive long-term relationship between Aboriginal and non-Aboriginal communities. Thoughtful administration of the treaty will help manage, even if it fails to eliminate, some of the misunderstandings and grievances that have characterized the past. Still, as the facts of this case show, the treaty will not accomplish its purpose if it is interpreted by territorial officials in an ungenerous manner or as if it were an everyday commercial contract. The treaty is as much about building relationships as it is about the settlement of ancient grievances. The future is more important than the past. A canoeist who hopes to make progress faces forwards, not backwards.

[11] Equally, however, the LSCFN is bound to recognize that the $34 million and other treaty benefits it received in exchange for the surrender has earned the territorial government a measure of flexibility in taking up surrendered lands for other purposes.

[12] The increased detail and sophistication of modern treaties represents a quantum leap beyond the pre-Confederation historical treaties . . . Modern comprehensive land claim agreements, . . . while still to be interpreted and applied in a manner that upholds the honour of the Crown, were nevertheless intended to create some precision around property and governance rights and obligations. . . .

On the facts of the case, given that the duty to consult was at the "lower end of the spectrum" (at para 6), the consultation was adequate. The LSCFN had been given notice and an opportunity to state its concerns. The Yukon government was entitled to conclude that the impact of the land transfer on the LSCFN was not significant, and there was no duty to accommodate. Justice Deschamps, with LeBel J concurring, wrote separate reasons concurring in the result but expressing the view that, where there was a treaty, the duty to consult would apply only if the parties had failed to address the issue of consultation.

4. The duty to consult in the legislative process: In Mikisew Cree First Nation v Canada (Governor General in Council), 2018 SCC 40 [Mikisew (2018)], the Supreme Court of Canada considered whether the Crown had a duty to consult Indigenous peoples when passing environmental legislation that could affect treaty and/or Aboriginal rights. This case allowed the Court to address the relationship between s 35(1) rights and the broader constitutional separation of powers and parliamentary sovereignty. In four separate opinions, the Court ultimately found that the development, passage, and enactment of legislation does not trigger the duty to consult. The judges disagreed, however, about the extent to which courts could ever review or restrict Parliament's power to pass legislation (which is different from reviewing the content of legislation after it has been passed). Generally, Mikisew (2018) holds that the duty to consult does not bind Parliament.

Recent legislative action has potentially modified the practical effect of the Mikisew (2018) ruling, as the government of Canada has seemingly committed itself to consulting and cooperating with Indigenous peoples before adopting legislative measures that may affect them.

In 2021, Parliament passed legislation to implement the UNDRIP called An Act Respecting the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, SC 2021, c 14 (see Section X below). Section 5 of the Act states: "The Government of Canada must, in consultation and cooperation with Indigenous peoples, take all measures necessary to ensure that the laws of Canada are consistent with the Declaration." Article 19 of UNDRIP states:

States shall consult and cooperate in good faith with the indigenous peoples concerned through their own representative institutions in order to obtain their free, prior and informed consent before adopting and implementing legislative or administrative measures that may affect them.

How might s 5 of An Act Respecting the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, 2021 change the practical result of the Mikisew (2018) case?

In discussing the duty to consult in the legislative process in the Mikisew case, Karakat-sanis J (joined by Wagner CJ and Gascon J) wrote:

[32] ... I conclude that the law-making process—that is, the development, passage, and enactment of legislation—does not trigger the duty to consult. The separation of powers and parliamentary sovereignty dictate that courts should forebear from intervening in the law-making process. Therefore, the duty to consult doctrine is ill-suited for legislative action.

[33] The Mikisew ask us to recognize that the duty to consult applies to ministers in the development of legislation. There is no doubt overlap between executive and legislative functions in Canada; Cabinet, for instance, is "a combining committee—a hyphen which joins, a buckle which fastens, the legislative part of the state to the executive part of the state" (Reference re Canada Assistance Plan (B.C.), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 525, at p. 559 I do not accept, however, the Mikisew's submission that ministers act in an executive capacity when they develop legislation. The legislative development at issue was not conducted pursuant to any statutory authority; rather, it was an exercise of legislative powers derived from Part IV of the Constitution Act, 1867

[34] The development of legislation by ministers is part of the law-making process, and this process is generally protected from judicial oversight. ...

[35] Longstanding constitutional principles underlie this reluctance to supervise the law-making process. The separation of powers is "an essential feature of our constitution" Recognizing that a duty to consult applies during the law-making process may require courts to improperly trespass onto the legislature's domain.

[36] Parliamentary sovereignty mandates that the legislature can make or unmake any law it wishes, within the confines of its constitutional authority. While the adoption of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms transformed the Canadian system of government "to a significant extent from a system of Parliamentary supremacy to one of constitutional supremacy" (Reference re Secession of Quebec, [1998] 2 S.C.R. 217, at para. 72), democracy remains one of the unwritten principles of the Constitution (Secession Reference, at paras. 61–69). Recognizing that the elected legislature has specific consultation obligations may constrain it in pursuing its mandate and therefore undermine its ability to act as the voice of the electorate.

[38] Applying the duty to consult doctrine during the law-making process would lead to significant judicial incursion into the workings of the legislature, even if such a duty were only enforced post-enactment. ...

[42] That said, parliamentary sovereignty and the separation of powers are not the only constitutional principles relevant to this appeal. The duty to consult was recognized to help protect the constitutional rights enshrined in s. 35 and uphold the honour of the Crown—itself a constitutional principle (Little Salmon, at para. 42).

[45] ... [I]t is worth noting that the duty to consult is not the only means to give effect to the honour of the Crown when Aboriginal or treaty rights may be adversely affected by legislation. Other doctrines may be developed to ensure the consistent protection of s. 35 rights and to give full effect to the honour of the Crown through review of enacted legislation.

[46] For example, it may not be consistent with s. 35 to legislate in a way that effectively removes future Crown conduct which would otherwise trigger the duty to consult. I note that, in Ross River Dena Council v. Yukon, 2012 YKCA 14, 358 D.L.R. (4th) 100, the Yukon Court of Appeal held that “[s]tatutory regimes that do not allow for consultation and fail to provide any other equally effective means to acknowledge and accommodate Aboriginal claims are defective and cannot be allowed to subsist” (para. 37; see also Constitution Act, 1982, s. 52(1)).

[47] Other forms of recourse may also be available. For example, declaratory relief may be appropriate in a case where legislation is enacted that is not consistent with the Crown’s duty of honourable dealing toward Aboriginal peoples (see Manitoba Metis, at paras. 69 and 143). A declaration is available without a cause of action (ibid, at para. 143). ...

[48] To be clear, legislation cannot be challenged on the basis that the legislature failed to fulfill the duty to consult. The duty to consult doctrine does not apply to the legislature. However, if other forms of recourse are available, the extent of any consultation may well be a relevant consideration, as it was in Sparrow, when assessing whether the enactment is consistent with constitutional principles. In Sparrow, this Court held that, when there has been a prima facie infringement of a s. 35 right, the “first consideration” in determining whether the legislation or action can be justified is the honour of the Crown (p. 1114). And an important part of that inquiry is whether the Aboriginal group in question was consulted on the impugned measure (Sparrow, at p. 1119; see also Badger, at para. 97; Tsilhqot’in Nation v. British Columbia, 2014 SCC 44, [2014] 2 S.C.R. 257, at paras. 77, 80 and 125; Delgamuukw v. British Columbia, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 1010, at para. 168).

Writing for herself and Martin J, Abella J would have allowed a duty to consult in the legislative process:

[55] The honour of the Crown governs the relationship between the government of Canada and Indigenous peoples. This obligation of honour gives rise to a duty to consult and accommodate that applies to all contemplated government conduct with the potential to adversely impact asserted or established Aboriginal and treaty rights, including, in my view, legislative action. The duty to consult arises based on the effect, not the source, of the government action. The Crown’s overarching responsibility to act honourably in all its dealings with Indigenous peoples does not depend on the formal label applied to the type of action that the government takes with respect to Aboriginal rights and interests protected by s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. As a constitutional imperative, the honour of the Crown cannot be undermined, let alone extinguished, by the legislature’s assertion of parliamentary sovereignty.

[62] I see this duty as being more than a “means” to uphold the honour of the Crown. The obligation arises because it would not be honourable to make important decisions that have an adverse impact on Aboriginal and treaty rights without efforts to consult and, if appropriate, accommodate those interests. ... The question is not whether the duty to consult is appropriate in the circumstances, but whether the decision is one to which the duty to consult applies.

[63] Because the honour of the Crown infuses the entirety of the government’s relationship with Indigenous peoples, the duty to consult must apply to all exercises of authority which are subject to scrutiny under s. 35. This includes, in my view, the enactment of legislation. Like the infringement analysis under Sparrow, the duty to consult does not discriminate based on the type of government action, but rather is triggered based on the potential for adverse effects.

[78] Because the rationale for the duty to consult applies equally as in the executive context, it would make little sense to adopt a different analytical approach where legislative action is impugned. Ongoing consultation is preferable to the backward-looking approach of subsequent challenges, since it protects s. 35 rights from irreversible harm and enhances reconciliation. Most importantly, this approach recognizes that the legislative sphere is not excluded from the honour of the Crown, which attaches to all exercises of sovereignty. Both grounded in the honour of the Crown, the Haida Nation and Sparrow frameworks cover all arenas of decision-making equally, providing for consultation where the potential for adverse effects arises, and the obligation to provide justification where infringements result. To revive a pre-Haida Nation state of affairs in this context would essentially extinguish the honour of the Crown in the legislative process by conflating the government's duty to consult with its distinct obligation to justify infringements.

[79] Endorsing such a void in the honour of the Crown would also leave a corresponding gap in the s. 35 framework. Haida Nation provides consultation remedies on a reduced threshold, based on the potential for adverse effects on a claimed or asserted right. If legislative decisions were only subject to the Sparrow framework, Indigenous groups with established rights would be required to meet the more onerous infringement threshold in order to access consultation rights, and those with unproven claims would be excluded entirely. Adverse effects which do not rise to the level of a prima facie infringement would be without remedy, leaving Aboriginal rights-holders vulnerable to the same government objectives carried out through legislative, rather than executive, action.

[80] This result would be contrary to the spirit of the Court's decision in Haida Nation and would sit uncomfortably with the approach adopted in Mikisew Cree. Where the government takes up land under Treaty No. 8, it is not appropriate to move directly to a Sparrow analysis; the court must first consider whether the process was compatible with the honour of the Crown (Mikisew Cree, at paras. 57 and 59). Action which would adversely affect the Mikisew's guaranteed rights to hunt, fish, and trap, triggers a duty to consult, whether or not an infringement results (para. 34). The underlying premise of the decision in Mikisew Cree would be frustrated if the same action could be carried out through legislation without consultation. Notably, while Mikisew Cree dealt with the "taking up" clause, Treaty No. 8 similarly subjects the Mikisew's treaty rights to "such regulations as may from time to time be made by the Government of the country, acting under the authority of Her Majesty." This process, too, must be carried out with honour.

[87] The fact that these rights are political in implication does not detract from their enforceability in law, but highlights their essential role in reconciling Aboriginal and Crown sovereignty. Our Constitution places a responsibility on the executive and legislative branches, along with Indigenous leaders, to collaborate and reconcile competing claims and historical grievances (Dickson, at p. 146). This has been described as a generative constitutional order, which "mandates the Crown to negotiate with Aboriginal peoples for the recognition of their rights in a contemporary form that balances their needs with the interests of the broader society" (Brian Slattery, "Aboriginal Rights and the Honour of the Crown" (2005), 29 S.C.L.R. (2d) 433, at p. 436; Carrier Sekani, at para. 38). This process is supported by the judiciary's role in enforcing the honour of the Crown, and holding the Crown accountable where that standard is not met. Unilateral action is the very antithesis of honour and reconciliation, concepts which underlie both the duty to consult and the very premise of modern Aboriginal law (Mitchell, at para. 11).

[88] Cases which advocate against intrusion into the parliamentary process must therefore be read in the context of a duty that is not only a constitutional imperative, but a recognition of the limits of Crown sovereignty itself. The unique nature of s. 35 means that its limits can be distinguished from cases which considered the impact of other rights and obligations on parliamentary sovereignty. . . .

[91] While the judiciary must respect the separate roles of each institution in our constitutional order, its own role is to maintain the rule of law and protect the rights guaranteed by the Constitution (Criminal Lawyers' Association, at paras. 28-29; New Brunswick Broadcasting Co., at p. 389). It would be a mistake, in my respectful view, to interpret parliamentary sovereignty in a way that eradicates the obligations under the honour of the Crown that arose at its assertion. Like all constitutional principles, parliamentary sovereignty must be balanced against other aspects of our constitutional order, including the duty to consult.

5. The duty to consult, administrative tribunals, and Indigenous law: In July 2017, the Supreme Court of Canada held that the National Energy Board (NEB) could act on behalf of the Crown when considering treaty rights in Chippewas of the Thames First Nation v Enbridge Pipelines Inc, 2017 SCC 41 and Clyde River (Hamlet) v Petroleum Geo-Services Inc, 2017 SCC 40. This means the NEB has the power to judge whether Aboriginal and treaty rights exist or are justifiably infringed by government action. In other words, an administrative agency created by Parliament is now unequivocally empowered to decide when, where, and how Aboriginal and treaty rights can be reasonably limited or sustained in Canada.

In the Chippewas of the Thames case, the Court found that the Chippewa of the Thames had been adequately consulted and accommodated through participation in an independent decision-making process (the NEB) which accounted for and mitigated impacts on their Aboriginal and treaty rights. The Court found that the NEB provided the Chippewa with notice, a hearing, funded their participation, and provided written reasons related to potential impacts on their rights.

On the other hand, in the Clyde River case, the Court found that the Clyde River Inuit did not receive adequate consultation and accommodation in relation to their rights. Despite the need for "deep consultation," the NEB did not provide oral hearings, participant funding, translation of documents, or written reasons for their decision. The Court held that "[n]o mutual understanding on the core issues—the potential impact on treaty rights, and possible accommodations—could possibly have emerged from what occurred here" (para 49).

The Chippewa of the Thames and Clyde River cases stand within a broader context. In the shadow of pipeline protests, oil and gas development is increasingly being scrutinized for its local and international effects. Disputes like those related to Keystone XL, Trans Mountain, Northern Gateway, and Energy East have raised significant concerns. While these developments also have their supporters, Indigenous peoples are often their most visible critics. There is widespread recognition that there is a crisis of confidence related to the NEB's operations, which is particularly pronounced in matters related to Indigenous peoples.

Research related to the NEB's operation has led scholars to conclude that "the NEB has adopted an approach that is fundamentally at odds with a culture of legality promoted by the Courts in the last thirty years of jurisprudence" (Sari Graben & Abbey Sinclair, "Tribunal Administration and the Duty to Consult: A Study of the National Energy Board" (2015) 65 UTLJ 382 at 415). For example, after an exhaustive review of NEB decisions, Sari Graben and Abbey Sinclair concluded (at 415):

The NEB has approved nearly 100 per cent of the applications in which consultation remains an issue but it relies on three types of justifications for still recommending approval: (i) that it lacks the jurisdiction to consider the consultation at issue; (ii) that outstanding consultation can be addressed through ongoing consultation; and/or (iii) that there are no impacts on rights.

Thus, when the Supreme Court held that the NEB has authority to evaluate Aboriginal and treaty rights, it did so against a background of deep Indigenous concern and opposition.

Since administrative tribunals can fulfill the Crown's constitutional obligations, this raised questions about how these bodies will deal with Indigenous law and governance. The Chippewa of the Thames leadership signed a series of treaties with the British Crown between 1818 and 1822, known as the Longwoods Treaty. They also signed treaties alongside other Anishinaabe groups from 1764 to 1827. Many of these treaties problematically read like real estate transactions. They do not generally contain Anishinaabe perspectives. The Anishinaabe do not see themselves as having surrendered sovereignty and other powers of governance throughout their traditional territories. They believe they have continuing responsibilities to manage and govern their territory in an environmentally sustainable manner. As the Chippewa of the Thames announce on their website:

Our leaders past and present continue to act as a sovereign people. This determination and commitment to action comes from who we are [as a] people. We are Anishinaabek people rich in culture, language, traditional knowledge, governance systems, and our own Indigenous laws.

See "Duty to Consult" (last visited 10 October 2021), online: Chippewas of the Thames First Nation <www.cottfn.com/consultation> [perma.cc/MV5C-JALG].

The Chiefs of Ontario Intervener's Factum in the Chippewas of the Thames case before the Supreme Court of Canada also expresses this broader point when it outlines the historical basis underlying the Chippewas' arguments. It asserts that historic treaties affirmed Anishinaabe sovereignty, but the Crown has failed to live in accordance with these agreements by acting in a unilateral fashion. The Factum says:

First Nations in Ontario have a centuries-long relationship with the Crown that can be traced to the beginnings of contact with European nations, and was formalized in the Niagara Treaty of 1764. The Niagara Treaty, following quickly on the heels of the Royal Proclamation of 1763, held out the promise of a nation-to-nation relationship between the Crown and First Nations, based on mutual autonomy and respect. This understanding extended to use and management of Upper Canada's abundant, but not infinite, land and natural resources. Over time, that promise has given way to the very opposite: unilateral decision-making by the Crown in regard to natural resources, fed by an attitude of paternalism and the policies of assimilation.

Today's First Nations in Ontario are the successor nation beneficiaries of the signatories to the Niagara Treaty. The instant cases represent the latest in a line of decisions that help shape the progression of the Crown-Indigenous relationship—and in particular whether it will be animated by a return to the spirit and intent of the Niagara Treaty: cooperation, consultation, mutual respect and reconciliation, based on an underlying nation-to-nation relationship.

The decisions below on both appeals, if left to stand, would help beat a path for the Crown to continue its historical pattern of unilateralism, and of evading its duty of consultation. Such a result would be antithetical to the nation-to-nation relationship that was the initial organizing principle of the Crown-First Nation founding compacts, and that must form the basis for that relationship in the 21st century. Chippewa of the Thames (Factum of the Intervener, The Chiefs of Ontario at paras 2-4), online (pdf): <www.scc-csc.ca/WebDocuments/DocumentsWeb/36776/FM090_Intervener_Chiefs-of-Ontario.pdf> [perma.cc/T3ZX-G6JT].

The Court did not reference this argument. The Court did not discuss Chippewa treaties' significance for Indigenous governance. In fact, the Court failed to acknowledge the nation-to-nation relationship as found in the Royal Proclamation and Treaty of Niagara. Instead, the Supreme Court focused on the Chippewa's material circumstances before European's arrived, and not their political activities. The Court wrote of the Chippewas of the Thames case:

[6] The Chippewas of the Thames are the descendants of a part of the Anishinaabe Nation that lived along the shore of the Thames River in southwestern Ontario prior to the arrival of European settlers in the area at the beginning of the 18th century. Their ancestors' lifestyle involved hunting, fishing, trapping, gathering, growing corn and squash, performing ceremonies at sacred sites, and collecting animals, plants, minerals, maple sugar and oil in their traditional territory.

Since neither the Supreme Court of Canada nor the NEB considered Anishinaabe law, the decisions leave unanswered questions regarding the role of Indigenous law in Canada's constitution. This is unfortunate because, logically speaking, Indigenous law must be necessary to the consultation process. If an Indigenous community does not use its decision-making systems to apply some normative standards, it cannot give its free, prior, and informed consent when consulted about development that might impact Aboriginal and treaty rights.

The failure of the Supreme Court or NEB to consider the role of Indigenous law within Canada's constitution means this will be a future issue. Indigenous peoples are increasingly putting their laws in written form to direct their own and others' expectations when being consulted and accommodated.

An example of the nature of Chippewa of the Thames law and governance is found in a document released after the Chippewa of the Thames case was decided. In November of 2016, the Deshkan Ziibiing/Chippewas of the Thames First Nation passed Wiindmaagewin, a Consultation Protocol for the protection of their lands. See Deshkan Ziibiing/Chippewas of the Thames First Nation, "Wiindmaagewin Consultation Protocol, Final" (26 November 2016), online (pdf): www.cottfn.com/wp-content/uploads/2016/02/Wiindmaagewin-CONSULTATION-PROTOCOL-Final-Nov-2016-2.pdf [perma.cc/MLM4-3NNF]. The document begins by stating the law's purpose, which is to ensure the protection of their watersheds, relationships, and rights. To accomplish this purpose, the Chippewa of the Thames declared rights to land and governance in their territories recognized in their treaties with the Crown from the 1760's forward. Building on this treaty relationship, the Protocol outlines "principles of inter-societal governance and communication" (at 7-10). The First Nation asserts that it shares responsibility for maintaining healthy environments under headings related to government, communication, co-existence, and economy.

Principles of environmental governance in the document are as follows: Gdinawendim, Mno-bmaadiziwin, Naaknigewin, and Anishinaabe dbendizawin. Principles of environmental communication are outlined as Zgaswediwin, Ginoondiwin, Gii-nenmaasiinaawaan, and Chidibaakinigewin. Finally, principles of environmental co-existence and economy are identified as Gdoonaaganinaan, Maatookiwin, Gnawenjigewin, and Niigaan-inabiwin. After a detailed discussion of these principles, the Consultation Protocol identifies consultation processes, requirements, and dispute resolution principles. The Protocol law is 21 pages long, with an additional 11 pages of maps and appendices. These principles reveal the contours of a legal tradition that uses land and relationships with that land as resources for regulatory and dispute resolution structures. While It is true these principles were released to the public after the Chippewa of the Thames case was decided, they are not new principles. Anishinaabe sovereignty as a vehicle for environmental sustainability has motivated this community throughout its history. A brief excerpt (at 8) from the document reveals the depth of these convictions:

(1) Gdinawendimi: "We are all related." A basic truth of our creation story is that we are related to everything that shares the world with us. Our original Anishinaabe doodem ancestors: Ajijaak "Crane," Waabizhesh "Marten," Bneshiinh "Bird," Wawashkesh "Deer," Maang "Loon," Giigoonh "Fish," Mko "Bear;" all demonstrate that we humans are related to, that is, are family with, beings who are other than human. That our ancestors shaped our treaties with Britain by inscribing many of those same doodemag on treaty texts indicates that they extended the web of kinship relations to include settlers. We expect that all consultation and discussion with governments and third parties will focus on how the proposed project will foster this relatedness.

(2) Mn̄o-bmaadiwiin: "The good life." We understand that the Creator placed us within our world's web of spiritual and bio-physical relationships in order for life to flourish, for all to enjoy the world. Life flourishes when we base our relationships on the gifts of the Seven Grandfathers: Nbwaakaawin "wisdom," Zaagidiwin "love," chi "respect," Aakde'ewin—or Zoongide'ewin "bravery," Gwakwaadiziwin "honesty," Dbaadendiziwin "humility," Debewin "truth." We expect that all proposals from and discussions with governments and third parties will demonstrate how the proposed project enhances the good life for all our relations.

(3) Naaknigewin: "Law." This measure for our decisions and determinations is the gift of the Creator. We expect that all consultation and discussion with governments and third parties will aim to respect and embody law as the measure for our decisions provided by the Creator.

(4) Anishinaabe dbendizawin: "Anishinaabe independence," or "self-determination." Some of our elders overcame their repressive years spent within the local residential school, and were able to play crucial roles in entrenching the recognition of our rights into sec. 35(1) of Canada's Constitution Act, 1982. Their personal struggles have taught us that we were created to live as an independent people, and are therefore able to ally with, but not to become subject to, other independent peoples. Many British treaty negotiators failed to understand this. Canada's unilateral imposition of regulations on our people, and its presumptuous administration of our lands, stems from its own consistent failure to understand this. Nevertheless, we have seen in some settler leaders, such as Sir William Johnson and his work at Niagara in 1764, the enduring possibility that our peoples might finally create a relationship of equality. William Johnson's Two Row Wampum embodies this alliance of equals, each party free to follow its own way without interference, but each also attentive to the wellbeing of the other. We expect that all proposals from governments will respect this most basic tenet of the Two Row Wampum.

One sees in these principles that Anishinaabe people see their laws as underlying and creating their constitutional relationships with Canadian governments. They contain the idea that treaties are an invitation for the Crown to abide by Anishinaabe laws.

Since the Supreme Court of Canada was unable or unwilling to consider these views, Chippewa sovereignty and governance is submerged. In the Chippewas of the Thames case, the Court devoted their reasons to examining which emanation of the federal government could fulfill the Crown's duties for the purposes of consultation and accommodation of Aboriginal and treaty rights. The Court did not step back and question the implications they drew, which unfortunately conceals Indigenous law and governance in this decision.

VIII. MÉTIS RIGHTS

Recall that in R v Van der Peet, [1996] 2 SCR 507, 1996 CanLII 216, the Supreme Court of Canada stated that "the history of the Métis, and the reasons underlying their inclusion in the protection given by s. 35, are quite distinct from those of other aboriginal peoples in Canada" (at para 67).

The existence of the Métis in the west prior to Confederation was centrally significant to the economic development and expansion of the east. Without their presence, the fur trade would have foundered, and political and economic development on the St Lawrence River and eastern Great Lakes would have been severely delayed or restricted. The Métis Nation was also an integral part of the process ushering western and northern Canada into Confederation and increasing the wealth of the country by opening up the prairies to agriculture and settlement. These developments could not have occurred without their intercession: see

George FG Stanley, The Birth of Western Canada: A History of the Riel Rebellion (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1960). The Dominion Parliament's unilateral attempt to survey the old North-Western Territory around the Red River in 1869 was strongly resisted by the local Métis settlements. The Métis resisted becoming a part of the Dominion without their participation and consent. Therefore, after blocking the surveyors from their work, and thereby preventing Canada's expansion into this region, the Métis compelled the government of Sir John A Macdonald to recognize their interests.

In particular, the Red River Métis formed a provisional government that was given authority to negotiate the terms of union with Ottawa and bring the area into Confederation. Representatives of this government travelled to Ottawa, as delegates of the Métis people, to negotiate conditions for western Canada's entry. They brought with them a locally developed bill of rights that expressed their demands. The negotiations were challenging, but an agreement was reached and its terms were embodied in the Manitoba Act of 1870 (UK), 32 & 33 Vict, c 3. The democratic legitimacy of this process was sealed through the Métis provisional government's acceptance of the agreement before the Dominion and Imperial Parliament's statutory endorsement that made it part of the constitutional law of Canada.

The people of the Métis Nation regard the Manitoba Act as embodying a treaty that recognizes and affirms their nation-to-nation relationship with Canada, even though its provisions concerning land and resources were not fulfilled. The Supreme Court of Canada addressed these issues in Manitoba Metis Federation Inc v Canada (AG), 2013 SCC 14, excerpted below. However, we begin this section not with that case but with R v Powley, the Supreme Court of Canada's 2003 decision in which it addressed for the first time the treatment of Métis rights under s 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

[Steve Powley and his son Roddy were charged with unlawfully hunting moose and knowingly possessing game hunted in contravention of the Game and Fish Act, RSO 1990, c G.1. They both entered pleas of not guilty. They admitted to having killed the moose without a hunting licence; however, they claimed that, as Métis, they had an Aboriginal right to hunt for food in the Sault Ste Marie area and that this right could not be infringed by the government of Ontario without justification. The trial Court, Superior Court, and Ontario Court of Appeal agreed with the Powleys.]

THE COURT (McLachlin CJ and Gonthier, Iacobucci, Major, Bastarache, Binnie, Arbour, LeBel, and Deschamps JJ):

A. The Van der Peet Test

[15] The core question in [R v Van der Peet, [1996] 2 SCR 507, 1996 CanLII 216] was: "How should the aboriginal rights recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 be defined?" (para. 15, per Lamer C.J.). Lamer C.J. wrote for the majority, at para. 31:

[W]hat s. 35(1) does is provide the constitutional framework through which the fact that aborigines lived on the land in distinctive societies, with their own practices, traditions and cultures, is acknowledged and reconciled with the sovereignty of the Crown. The substantive rights which fall within the provision must be defined in light of this purpose

[16] ... [I]n Van der Peet ... , the majority recognized that the pre-contact test might prove inadequate to capture the range of Métis customs, practices or traditions that are entitled to protection, since Métis cultures by definition post-date European contact. For this reason, Lamer C.J. explicitly reserved the question of how to define Métis aboriginal rights for another day. He wrote at para. 67:

[T]he history of the Métis, and the reasons underlying their inclusion in the protection given by s. 35, are quite distinct from those of other aboriginal peoples in Canada. As such, the manner in which the aboriginal rights of other aboriginal peoples are defined is not necessarily determinative of the manner in which the aboriginal rights of the Métis are defined. At the time when this Court is presented with a Métis claim under s. 35 it will then, with the benefit of the arguments of counsel, a factual context and a specific Métis claim, be able to explore the question of the purposes underlying s. 35's protection of the aboriginal rights of Métis people, The fact that, for other aboriginal peoples, the protection granted by s. 35 goes to the practices, customs and traditions of aboriginal peoples prior to contact, is not necessarily relevant to the answer which will be given to that question.

[17] As indicated above, the inclusion of the Métis in s. 35 is not traceable to their pre-contact occupation of Canadian territory. The purpose of s. 35 as it relates to the Métis is therefore different from that which relates to the Indians or the Inuit. The constitutionally significant feature of the Métis is their special status as peoples that emerged between first contact and the effective imposition of European control. The inclusion of the Métis in s. 35 represents Canada's commitment to recognize and value the distinctive Métis cultures, which grew up in areas not yet open to colonization, and which the framers of the Constitution Act, 1982 recognized can only survive if the Métis are protected along with other aboriginal communities.

[18] ... We accept Van der Peet as the template for this discussion. However, we modify the pre-contact focus of the Van der Peet test when the claimants are Métis to account for the important differences between Indian and Métis claims. Section 35 requires that we recognize and protect those customs and traditions that were historically important features of Métis communities prior to the time of effective European control, and that persist in the present day. This modification is required to account for the unique post-contact emergence of Métis communities, and the post-contact foundation of their aboriginal rights.

(1) Characterization of the Right

[19] The first step is to characterize the right being claimed: Van der Peet, supra, at para. 76. Aboriginal hunting rights, including Métis rights, are contextual and site-specific. The respondents shot a bull moose near Old Goulais Bay Road, in the environs of Sault Ste. Marie, within the traditional hunting grounds of that Métis community. They made a point of documenting that the moose was intended to provide meat for the winter. The trial judge determined that they were hunting for food, and there is no reason to overturn this finding. The right being claimed can therefore be characterized as the right to hunt for food in the environs of Sault Ste. Marie.

[20] We agree with the trial judge that the periodic scarcity of moose does not in itself undermine the respondents' claim. The relevant right is not to hunt moose but to hunt for food in the designated territory.

(2) Identification of the Historic Rights-Bearing Community

[21] The trial judge found that a distinctive Métis community emerged in the Upper Great Lakes region in the mid-17th century, and peaked around 1850. We find no reviewable error in the trial judge's findings on this matter, which were confirmed by the Court of Appeal. The record indicates the following: In the mid-17th century, the Jesuits established a mission at Sainte-Marie-du-Sault In 1750, the French established a fixed trading post on the south bank of the Saint Mary's River. The Sault Ste. Marie post attracted settlement by Métis—the children of unions between European traders and Indian women, and their descendants (A.J. Ray, "An Economic History of the Robinson Treaty Areas Before 1860" (1998) ("Ray Report"), at p. 17). According to Dr. Ray, by the early nineteenth century, "[t]he settlement at Sault Ste. Marie was one of the oldest and most important [Métis settlements] in the upper lakes area" (Ray Report, at p. 47). The Hudson Bay Company operated the St. Mary's post primarily as a depot from 1821 onwards (Ray Report, at p. 51)

(3) Identification of the Contemporary Rights-Bearing Community

[24] Aboriginal rights are communal rights: They must be grounded in the existence of a historic and present community, and they may only be exercised by virtue of an individual's ancestrally based membership in the present community. The trial judge found that a Métis community has persisted in and around Sault Ste. Marie despite its decrease in visibility after the signing of the Robinson-Huron Treaty in 1850. While we take note of the trial judge's determination that the Sault Ste. Marie Métis community was to a large extent an "invisible entity" ([1999] 1 C.N.L.R. 153, at para. 80) from the mid-19th century to the 1970s, we do not take this to mean that the community ceased to exist or disappeared entirely.

[25] Dr. Lytwyn [states]:

[T]he Métis continued to live in the Sault Ste. Marie region. Some drifted into the Indian Reserves which had been set apart by the 1850 Treaty. Others lived in areas outside of the town, or in back concessions. The Métis continued to live in much the same manner as they had in the past—fishing, hunting, trapping and harvesting other resources for their livelihood. (Lytwyn Report, at p. 31 (emphasis added); see also J. Morrison, "The Robinson Treaties of 1850: A Case Study," at p. 201.)

[26] The advent of European control over this area thus interfered with, but did not eliminate, the Sault Ste. Marie Métis community and its traditional practices, as evidenced by census data from the 1860s through the 1890s. Dr. Lytwyn concluded from this census data that "[a]lthough the Métis lost much of their traditional land base at Sault Ste. Marie, they continued to live in the region and gain their livelihood from the resources of the land and waters" (Lytwyn Report, at p. 32). He also noted a tendency for underreporting and lack of information about the Métis during this period because of their "removal to the peripheries of the town," and "their own disinclination to be identified as Métis" in the wake of the Riel rebellions and the turning of Ontario public opinion against Métis rights through government actions and the media (Lytwyn Report, at p. 33).

[27] We conclude that the evidence supports the trial judge's finding that the community's lack of visibility was explained and does not negate the existence of the contemporary community. There was never a lapse; the Métis community went underground, so to speak, but it continued. Moreover, as indicated below, the "continuity" requirement puts the focus on the continuing practices of members of the community, rather than more generally on the community itself, as indicated below.

[28] The trial judge's finding of a contemporary Métis community in and around Sault Ste. Marie is supported by the evidence and must be upheld.

(4) Verification of the Claimant's Membership in the Relevant Contemporary Community

[29] While determining membership in the Métis community might not be as simple as verifying membership in, for example, an Indian band, this does not detract from the status of Métis people as full-fledged rights-bearers. As Métis communities continue to organize themselves more formally and to assert their constitutional rights, it is imperative that membership requirements become more standardized so that legitimate rights-holders can be identified. In the meantime, courts faced with Métis claims will have to ascertain Métis identity on a case-by-case basis. The inquiry must take into account both the value of community self-definition, and the need for the process of identification to be objectively verifiable. In addition, the criteria for Métis identity under s. 35 must reflect [its] purpose ... to recognize and affirm the rights of the Métis held by virtue of their direct relationship to this country's original inhabitants and by virtue of the continuity between their customs and traditions and those of their Métis predecessors. ...

[30] We emphasize that we have not been asked, and we do not purport, to set down a comprehensive definition of who is Métis for the purpose of asserting a claim under s. 35. We therefore limit ourselves to indicating the important components of a future definition As a general matter, we would endorse the guidelines proposed by Vaillancourt Prov. J. and O'Neill J. in the courts below. In particular, we would look to three broad factors[:] ... self-identification, ancestral connection, and community acceptance.

[31] First, the claimant must self-identify as a member of a Métis community. This self-identification should not be of recent vintage: While an individual's self-identification need not be static or monolithic, claims that are made belatedly in order to benefit from a s. 35 right will not satisfy the self-identification requirement.

[32] Second, the claimant must present evidence of an ancestral connection to a historic Métis community. This objective requirement ensures that beneficiaries ... have a real link to the historic community whose practices ground the right being claimed. We would not require a minimum "blood quantum," but we would require some proof that the claimant's ancestors belonged to the historic Métis community by birth, adoption, or other means. Like the trial judge, we would abstain from further defining this requirement In this case, the Powleys' Métis ancestry is not disputed.

[33] Third, the claimant must demonstrate that he or she is accepted by the modern community whose continuity with the historic community provides the legal foundation for the right being claimed. Membership in a Métis political organization may be relevant ... , but it is not sufficient in the absence of a contextual understanding of the membership requirements of the organization and its role in the Métis community. The core of community acceptance is past and ongoing participation in a shared culture, in the customs and traditions that constitute a Métis community's identity and distinguish it from other groups. This is what the community membership criterion is all about. Other indicia of community acceptance might include evidence of participation in community activities and testimony from other members The range of acceptable forms of evidence does not attenuate the need for an objective demonstration of a solid bond of past and present mutual identification and recognition of common belonging between the claimant and other members of the rights-bearing community.

(5) Identification of the Relevant Time Frame

[36] As indicated above, the pre-contact aspect of the Van der Peet test requires adjustment in order to take account of the post-contact ethnogenesis of the Métis and the purpose of s. 35 in protecting the historically important customs and traditions of these distinctive peoples. While the fact of prior occupation grounds aboriginal rights claims for the Inuit and the Indians, the recognition of Métis rights in s. 35 is not reducible to the Métis' Indian ancestry. The unique status of the Métis as an Aboriginal people with post-contact origins requires an adaptation of the pre-contact approach to meet the distinctive historical circumstances surrounding the evolution of Métis communities.

[37] The pre-contact test in Van der Peet is based on the constitutional affirmation that aboriginal communities are entitled to continue those practices, customs and traditions that are integral to their distinctive existence or relationship to the land. By analogy, the test for Métis practices should focus on identifying those practices, customs and traditions that are integral to the Métis community's distinctive existence and relationship to the land. This unique history can most appropriately be accommodated by a post-contact but pre-control test that identifies the time when Europeans effectively established political and legal control in a particular area. The focus should be on the period after a particular Métis community arose and before it came under the effective control of European laws and customs. This pre-control test enables us to identify those practices, customs and traditions that predate the imposition of European laws and customs on the Métis.

[38] We reject the appellant's argument that Métis rights must find their origin in the pre-contact practices of the Métis' aboriginal ancestors. This theory in effect would deny to Métis their full status as distinctive rights-bearing peoples whose own integral practices are entitled to constitutional protection under s. 35(1). ... [A]s long as the practice grounding the right is distinctive and integral to the pre-control Métis community, it will satisfy this prong of the test. This result flows from the constitutional imperative that we recognize and affirm the aboriginal rights of the Métis, who appeared after the time of first contact.

[40] The historical record indicates that the Sault Ste. Marie Métis community thrived largely unaffected by European laws and customs until colonial policy shifted from one of discouraging settlement to one of negotiating treaties and encouraging settlement in the mid-19th century. The trial judge found, and the parties agreed ... , that "effective control [of the Upper Great Lakes area] passed from the Aboriginal peoples of the area (Ojibway and Métis) to European control" in the period between 1815 and 1850 (para. 90). The record fully supports the finding that the period just prior to 1850 is the appropriate date for finding effective control in this geographic area, which the Crown agreed was the critical date in its pleadings below.

(6) Determination of Whether the Practice Is Integral to the Claimants' Distinctive Culture

[41] The practice of subsistence hunting and fishing was a constant in the Métis community, even though the availability of particular species might have waxed and waned. The evidence indicates that subsistence hunting was an important aspect of Métis life and a defining feature of their special relationship to the land (J Peterson, "Many Roads to Red River: Métis Genesis in the Great Lakes Region, 1680-1815," in The New Peoples: Being and Becoming Métis in North America (Winnipeg: University of Manitoba Press, 1985)], at p. 41; Lytwyn Report, supra, at p. 6). A major part of subsistence was the practice at issue here, hunting for food.

[43] Dr. Ray emphasized in his report that a key feature of Métis communities was that "their members earned a substantial part of their livelihood off of the land" (Ray Report, supra, at p. 56). Dr. Lytwyn concurred: "The Métis of Sault Ste. Marie lived off the resources of the land. They obtained their livelihood from hunting, fishing, gathering and cultivating" (Lytwyn Report, at p. 2). ... He elaborated at p. 6:

In the mid-19th century, the Métis way of life incorporated many resource harvesting activities. These activities, especially hunting and trapping, were done within traditional territories located within the hinterland of Sault Ste. Marie. The Métis engaged in these activities for generations and, on the eve of the 1850 treaties, hunting, fishing, trapping and gathering were integral activities to the Métis community at Sault Ste. Marie.

[44] This evidence supports the trial judge's finding that hunting for food was integral to the Métis way of life at Sault Ste. Marie in the period just prior to 1850.

(7) Establishment of Continuity Between the Historic Practice and the Contemporary Right Asserted

[45] Although s. 35 protects "existing" rights, it is more than a mere codification of the common law. Section 35 reflects a new promise: a constitutional commitment to protecting practices that were historically important features of particular aboriginal communities. A certain margin of flexibility might be required to ensure that aboriginal practices can evolve and develop over time, but it is not necessary ... in this case. Hunting for food was an important feature of the Sault Ste. Marie Métis community, and the practice has been continuous to the present. Steve and Roddy Powley claim a Métis aboriginal right to hunt for food. The right claimed by the Powleys falls squarely within the bounds of the historical practice grounding the right.

(8) Determination of Whether or Not the Right Was Extinguished

[46] ... There is no evidence of extinguishment here, as determined by the trial judge. The Crown's argument for extinguishment is based largely on the Robinson-Huron Treaty of 1850, from which the Métis as a group were explicitly excluded.

(9) If There Is a Right, Determination of Whether There Is an Infringement

[47] Ontario currently does not recognize any Métis right to hunt for food, or any "special access rights to natural resources" for the Métis whatsoever (appellant's record, at p. 1029). This lack of recognition, and the consequent application of the challenged provisions to the Powleys, infringe their aboriginal right to hunt for food as a continuation of the protected historical practices of the Sault Ste. Marie Métis community.

(10) Determination of Whether the Infringement Is Justified

[48] The main justification advanced by the appellant is that of conservation. Although conservation is clearly a very important concern, we agree with the trial judge that the record here does not support this justification. If the moose population in this part of Ontario were under threat, and there was no evidence that it is, the Métis would still be entitled to a priority allocation to satisfy their subsistence needs in accordance with the criteria set out in R. v. Sparrow, [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1075. While preventative measures might be required for conservation purposes in the future, we have not been presented with evidence to support such measures here. ... Ontario's blanket denial of any Métis right to hunt for food cannot be justified.

Appeal and cross-appeal dismissed.

NOTE

R v Blais, 2003 SCC 44, released on the same day as Powley, considered the question of whether "Métis" people could be considered to be "Indians" under the hunting rights provisions of the Manitoba Natural Resources Transfer Agreement (NRTA), incorporated as Schedule (1) to the Constitution Act, 1930. (The NRTAs were agreements between the government of Canada and the three prairie provinces intended to put these provinces on an equal footing with the other provinces by giving them jurisdiction over and ownership of their natural resources.) In concluding that "Métis" were not "Indians," the Court reviewed historical evidence related to Métis/Indian distinctions at the time the NRTA was enacted. The Court's treatment of this issue revolved around a discussion of the proper interpretive approach to the NRTA. In a unanimous judgment the Court wrote:

[16] ... [W]e turn to the issue before us: whether "Indians" in para. 13 of the NRTA include the Métis. The starting point in this endeavour is that a statute—and this includes statutes of constitutional force—must be interpreted in accordance with the meaning of its words, considered in context and with a view to the purpose they were intended to serve

[17] The NRTA is a constitutional document. It must therefore be read generously within these contextual and historical confines. A court interpreting a constitutionally guaranteed right must apply an interpretation that will fulfill the broad purpose of the guarantee and thus secure "for individuals the full benefit of the [constitutional] protection": R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295, at p. 344. "At the same time it is important not to overshoot the actual purpose of the right or freedom in question, but to recall that the [constitutional provision] was not enacted in a vacuum, and must therefore ... be placed in its proper linguistic, philosophic and historical contexts": Big M Drug Mart, supra, at p. 344. This is essentially the approach the Court used in 1939 when the Court examined the historical record to determine whether the term "Indians" in s. 91(24) of the British North America Act, 1867 includes the Inuit (Reference as to whether "Indians" in s. 91(24) of the B.N.A. Act includes Eskimo inhabitants of the Province of Quebec, [1939] S.C.R. 104).

[18] Applied to this case, this means that we must fulfill—but not "overshoot"—the purpose of para. 13 of the NRTA. We must approach the task of determining whether Métis are included in "Indians" under para. 13 by looking at the historical context, the ordinary meaning of the language used, and the philosophy or objectives lying behind it.

By applying this approach, the Court determined that when the NRTA was enacted the term "Indians" did not include "Métis." This was affirmed by reference to history, the language of the NRTA, and the NRTA's objectives. In rejecting a "living tree" approach to constitutional interpretation, the Court wrote:

[39] We decline the appellant's invitation to expand the historical purpose of para. 13 on the basis of the "living tree" doctrine enunciated by Lord Sankey L.C. with reference to the 1867 British North America Act: Edwards v. Attorney-General for Canada, [1930] A.C. 124 (P.C.), at p. 136. The appellant, emphasizing the constitutional nature of para. 13, argues that this provision must be read broadly as providing solutions to future problems. He argues that, regardless of para. 13's original meaning, contemporary values, including the recognition of the Crown's fiduciary duty towards Aboriginal peoples and general principles of restorative justice, require us to interpret the word "Indians" as including the Métis.

[40] This Court has consistently endorsed the living tree principle as a fundamental tenet of constitutional interpretation. ... But at the same time, this Court is not free to invent new obligations foreign to the original purpose of the provision at issue. The analysis must be anchored in the historical context of the provision. As emphasized above, we must heed Dickson J.'s admonition "not to overshoot the actual purpose of the right or freedom in question, but to recall that the Charter was not enacted in a vacuum, and must therefore ... be placed in its proper linguistic, philosophic and historical contexts": Big M Drug Mart, supra, at p. 344 Dickson J. was speaking of the Charter, but his words apply equally to the task of interpreting the NRTA. Similarly, Binns J. emphasized the need for attentiveness to context when he noted in R. v. Marshall, [1999] 3 S.C.R. 456, at para. 14, that "[g]enerous' rules of interpretation should not be confused with a vague sense of after-the-fact largesse." Again the statement, made with respect to the interpretation of a treaty, applies here.

[41] We conclude that the term "Indians" in para. 13 of the NRTA does not include the Métis, and we find no basis for modifying this intended meaning. This in no way precludes a more liberal interpretation of other constitutional provisions, depending on their particular linguistic, philosophical and historical contexts.

John Borrows has criticized the Court's rejection of the living tree interpretative approach in Blais, arguing that it reflects larger patterns in the Court's approach to interpreting Aboriginal and treaty rights that overemphasize the past and risk perpetuating the discrimination against Indigenous peoples that saturates Canada's legal history: see John Borrows, "(Ab)Originalism and Canada's Constitution" (2012) 58 SCLR (2d) 352. When you read the Supreme Court of Canada's recent decision in Daniels v Canada (Indian Affairs and Northern Development), 2016 SCC 12, excerpted in Section IX, think about whether the Court has addressed the concerns raised by Professor Borrows.

NOTE: MANITOBA METIS FEDERATION INC V CANADA (AG)

Manitoba Metis Federation Inc v Canada (AG), 2013 SCC 14 considered the contemporary constitutional effect of promises made to the Métis by the Canadian government in the period immediately following Confederation as Canada embarked on a policy to bring the Western territories within its boundaries and open them up for settlement. In 1870, the Métis comprised 85 percent of the population of the territory that subsequently became Manitoba. When settlers began pouring into the region, resistance and conflict produced negotiations between the Canadian government and a Métis-led provisional government. The product of these negotiations was the Manitoba Act, 1870, SC 1870, c 3, a constitutional document that made Manitoba a province of Canada. As described by McLachlin CJ and Karakatsanis J, writing for the majority:

[5] ... These promises represent the terms under which the Métis people agreed to surrender their claims to govern themselves and their territory, and become part of the new nation of Canada. These promises were directed at enabling the Métis people and their descendants to obtain a lasting place in the new province. Sadly, the expectations of the Métis were not fulfilled, and they scattered in the face of the settlement that marked the ensuing decades.

As a result, over a century later, the Manitoba Métis Federation (MMF) went to court seeking a declaration that Canada breached its obligation to implement the promises it made to the Métis people in the Manitoba Act. In particular, the MMF (at para 7) sought a declaration that (1) in implementing the Manitoba Act, the federal Crown breached fiduciary obligations owed to the Métis; (2) the federal Crown failed to implement the Manitoba Act in a manner consistent with the honour of the Crown; and (3) certain legislation passed by Manitoba affecting the implementation of the Manitoba Act was ultra vires.

In finding that the federal Crown had failed to implement the Manitoba Act in a manner consistent with the honour of the Crown, a majority of the Court concluded:

[9] ... [Section] 31 of the Manitoba Act constitutes a constitutional obligation to the Métis people of Manitoba, an Aboriginal people, to provide the Métis children with allotments of land. The immediate purpose of the obligation was to give the Métis children a head start over the expected influx of settlers from the east. Its broader purpose was to reconcile the Métis' Aboriginal interests in the Manitoba territory with the assertion of Crown sovereignty over the area that was to become the province of Manitoba. The obligation enshrined in s. 31 of the Manitoba Act did not impose a fiduciary or trust duty on the government. However, as a solemn constitutional obligation to the Métis people of Manitoba aimed at reconciling their Aboriginal interests with sovereignty, it engaged the honour of the Crown. This required the government to act with diligence in pursuit of the fulfillment of the promise. On the findings of the trial judge, the Crown failed to do so and the obligation to the Métis children remained largely unfulfilled. The Métis claim based on the honour of the Crown is not barred by the law of limitations or the equitable doctrine of laches. We therefore conclude that the Métis are entitled to a declaration that Canada failed to implement s. 31 as required by the honour of the Crown.

The basis for the Court's ruling that the Crown did not act with honour when implementing s 31 of the Manitoba Act, 1870 was outlined as follows:

[91] As outlined above, the honour of the Crown is engaged by constitutional obligations to Aboriginal groups. Section 31 of the Manitoba Act is just such a constitutional obligation. Section 31 conferred land rights on yet-to-be-identified individuals—the Métis children. Yet the record leaves no doubt that it was a promise made to the Métis people collectively, in recognition of their distinct community. The honour of the Crown is thus engaged here.

[92] To understand the nature of s. 31 as a solemn obligation, it may be helpful to consider its treaty-like history and character. Section 31 sets out solemn promises—promises which are no less fundamental than treaty promises. ... It was intended to create legal obligations of the highest order: no greater solemnity than inclusion in the Constitution of Canada can be conceived. Section 31 was conceived in the context of negotiations to create the new province of Manitoba. And all this was done to the end of reconciling the Métis Aboriginal interest with the Crown's claim to sovereignty. ...

[94] Section 31 is a constitutional obligation to an Aboriginal group. In accordance with the principles outlined above, the honour of the Crown is engaged by s. 31 and gives rise to a duty of diligent, purposive fulfillment.

[96] The trial judge indicated that, although they did not act in bad faith, the government servants may have been negligent in administering the s. 31 grant. He held that the implementation of the obligation was within the Crown's discretion and that it had a discretion to act negligently: "Mistakes, even negligence, on the part of those responsible for implementation of the grant are not sufficient to successfully attack Canada's exercise of discretion in its implementation of the grant" (para. 943 (emphasis added)). The Court of Appeal took a similar view

[97] Based on the arguments before them and the applicable precedents, the trial judge and the Court of Appeal did not focus on what we take as the central issue in the case: whether the government's implementation of s. 31 comported with the duty of the Crown to diligently pursue implementation of the provision in a way that would achieve its objectives. The question is whether the Crown's conduct, viewed as a whole and in context, met this standard. We conclude that it did not.

[98] The broad purpose of s. 31 of the Manitoba Act was to reconcile the Métis community with the sovereignty of the Crown and to permit the creation of the province of Manitoba. This reconciliation was to be accomplished by a more concrete measure—the prompt and equitable transfer of the allotted public lands to the Métis children.

[99] The prompt and equitable implementation of s. 31 was fundamental to the project of reconciliation and the entry of Manitoba into Canada. As the trial judge found, s. 31 was designed to give the Métis a head start in the race for land and a place in the new province. This required that the grants be made while a head start was still possible. Everyone concerned understood that a wave of settlement from Europe and Canada to the east would soon sweep over the province. ...

[100] The Métis allege Canada failed to fulfill its duties to the Métis people in relation to the children's grant in four ways: (1) inexcusably delaying distribution of the s. 31 lands; (2) distributing lands via random selection rather than ensuring family members received contiguous parcels; (3) failing to ensure s. 31 grant recipients were not taken advantage of by land speculators; and (4) giving some eligible Métis children $240 worth of scrip redeemable at the Land Titles Office instead of a direct grant of land.

At this point in the judgment, the Court reviewed the evidence and found that the Crown's honour was breached through the delay of distribution of s 31 lands, along with the disadvantages suffered through speculators and scrip caused by such delay. Thus the Court concluded:

[128] The s. 31 obligation made to the Métis is part of our Constitution and engages the honour of the Crown. The honour of the Crown required the Crown to interpret s. 31 in a purposive manner and to diligently pursue fulfillment of the purposes of the obligation. This was not done. The Métis were promised implementation of the s. 31 land grants in "the most effectual and equitable manner." Instead, the implementation was ineffectual and inequitable. This was not a matter of occasional negligence, but of repeated mistakes and inaction that persisted for more than a decade. A government sincerely intent on fulfilling the duty that its honour demanded could and should have done better.

Further discussion of the history of Métis peoples and their place in our constitutional framework can be found in two other decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada.

The first is Alberta (Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development) v Cunningham, 2011 SCC 37, in which the Supreme Court of Canada considered a challenge to provisions in the Metis Settlements Act, RSA 2000, c M-14 [MSA] that precluded status Indians from becoming formal members of any Métis settlement. Status Indians who were also Métis applied for a declaration that this denial of membership violated the equality guarantee in s 15 of the Charter. The Supreme Court concluded that the MSA was an ameliorative program under s 15(2) and thus did not violate s 15. The Court found that the purpose of the MSA was to benefit Métis, as distinct from Indians, by setting up a land base that would strengthen an independent Métis identity, culture, and desire for self-governance and that the exclusion of status Indians from membership in the new Métis land base served and advanced this purpose.

The second is the Court's recent decision in Daniels v Canada (Indian Affairs and Northern Development), 2016 SCC 12. Daniels, which addresses the issue of whether Métis and non-status Indians are "Indians" for the purposes of s 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867, is excerpted Section IX.

IX. DISTRIBUTION OF LEGISLATIVE AUTHORITY

A remaining gap in our review of the Court's treatment of Aboriginal rights is the distribution of governmental powers relative to Indigenous peoples in Canada's federal system. Before 1982, Parliament and the provincial legislatures were viewed as free to pass laws that interfered with the exercise of common law Aboriginal rights as long as each level of government acted within its sphere of legislative authority. Federal legislative competence in this regard was seen to stem from s 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867, which confers on Parliament the authority to pass laws in relation to "Indians, and Lands reserved for the Indians." For example, the federal Indian Act, RSC 1985, c I-5, which provides for the establishment of elected band councils and the management and protection of Indian reserve land, owes its constitutional validity to s 91(24). Provincial legislative competence was, as we explain below, more complicated. Section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 now imposes constraints on the exercise of legislative authority by the federal and provincial governments, as do various mechanisms that recognize Indigenous self-government (discussed in Section X). However, the division of powers found in ss 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1982 continues to play a significant role in structuring the legal relationship between the Crown and Indigenous peoples.

The materials that follow deal with two issues: first, the scope of the federal power found in s 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867; and, second, the scope of provincial legislative competence to pass laws affecting Indigenous peoples.

A. THE SCOPE OF SECTION 91(24)

On the first issue, the scope of federal legislative competence, the major issue that has arisen is the meaning of the term "Indians." In 1939, the Supreme Court decided that Inuit people were "Indians" for the purposes of s 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867: see Reference as to whether "Indians" includes in s 91(24) of the BNA Act includes Eskimo in habitants of the Province of Quebec, [\[1939\] SCR 104, 1939 CanLII 22](#). In 2016, the Supreme Court of Canada addressed the same issue with respect to Métis and non-status Indians. In the case of Daniels v Canada (Indian Affairs and Northern Development), 2016 SCC 12, the Court found that Métis and non-status Indians were "Indians" within s 91(24). In coming to this conclusion, the Supreme Court heard that both federal and provincial governments denied responsibility with regard to Métis. In outlining the problems with this approach, Abella J wrote for the Court:

[14] This results in these Indigenous communities being in a jurisdictional wasteland with significant and obvious disadvantaging consequences, as was recognized by Phelan J.:

One of the results of the positions taken by the federal and provincial governments and the "political football—buck passing" practices is that financially [Métis and non-status Indians] have been deprived of significant funding for their affairs. ...

... the political/policy wrangling between the federal and provincial governments has produced a large population of collaterally damaged [Métis and non-status Indians]. They are deprived of programs, services and intangible benefits recognized by all governments as needed. [paras. 107-8] ...

[15] With federal and provincial governments refusing to acknowledge jurisdiction over them, Métis and non-status Indians have no one to hold accountable for an inadequate status quo. ... A declaration would guarantee both certainty and accountability, thereby easily reaching the required jurisprudential threshold of offering the tangible practical utility of the resolution of a longstanding jurisdictional dispute.

Daniels v Canada (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)

2016 SCC 12 (footnotes omitted)

ABELLA J (McLachlin CJ and Cromwell, Moldaver, Karakatsanis, Wagner, Gascon, Côté, and Brown JJ concurring):

[23] ... "Indians" has long been used as a general term referring to all Indigenous peoples, including mixed-ancestry communities like the Métis. The term was created by European settlers and applied to Canada's Aboriginal peoples without making any distinction between them. As author Thomas King explains in The Inconvenient Indian [(2013)]:

No one really believed that there was only one Indian. No one ever said there was only one Indian. But as North America began to experiment with its "Indian programs," it did so with a "one size fits all" mindset. Rather than see tribes as an arrangement of separate nation states in the style of the Old World, North America imagined that Indians were basically the same. [p. 83]

[24] Before and after Confederation, the government frequently classified Aboriginal peoples with mixed European and Aboriginal heritage as Indians. Métis were considered "Indians" for pre-Confederation treaties such as the Robinson Treaties of 1850. Many post-Confederation statutes considered Métis to be "Indians," including the 1868 statute entitled An Act providing for the organisation of the Department of the Secretary of State of Canada, and for the management of Indian and Ordnance Lands, c. 42.

[25] Historically, the purpose of s. 91(24) in relation to the broader goals of Confederation also indicates that since 1867, "Indians" meant all Aboriginal peoples, including Métis. The trial judge found that expanding British North America across Rupert's Land and the North-West Territories was a major goal of Confederation and that building a national railway was a key component of this plan. At the time, that land was occupied by a large and diverse Aboriginal population, including many Métis. A good relationship with all Aboriginal groups was required to realize the goal of building "the railway and other measures which the federal government would have to take." With jurisdiction over Aboriginal peoples, the new federal government could "protect the railway from attack" and ensure that they did not resist settlement or interfere with construction of the railway. Only by having authority over all Aboriginal peoples could the westward expansion of the Dominion be facilitated.

[26] The work of Prof. John Borrows supports this theory:

The Métis Nation was ... crucial in ushering western and northern Canada into Confederation and in increasing the wealth of the Canadian nation by opening up the prairies to agriculture and settlement. These developments could not have occurred without Métis intercession and legal presence.

(Canada's Indigenous Constitution (2010), at pp. 87-88).

In his view, it would have been impossible for Canada to accomplish its expansionist agenda if "Indians" under s. 91(24) did not include Métis. The threat they posed to Canada's expansion was real. On many occasions Métis "blocked surveyors from doing their work" and "prevented Canada's expansion into the region" when they were unhappy with the Canadian government: Borrows, at p. 88.

[27] In fact, contrary to its position in this case, the federal government has at times assumed that it could legislate over Métis as "Indians." The 1876 Indian Act banned the sale of intoxicating liquor to "Indians." In 1893 the North-West Mounted Police wrote to the federal government, expressing their difficulty in distinguishing between "Half-breeds and Indians in prosecutions for giving liquor to the latter." To clarify this issue, the federal government amended the Indian Act in 1894 to broaden the ban on the sale of intoxicating liquor to Indians or any person "who follows the Indian mode of life," which included Métis.

[28] In October 1899, Indian Affairs Minister Clifford Sifton wrote a memorandum that would become the basis of the federal government's policy regarding Métis and Indian Residential Schools for decades. He wrote that "I am decidedly of the opinion that all children, even those of mixed blood ... should be eligible for admission to the schools": The Final Report of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission of Canada, vol. 3, The Métis Experience (2015), at p. 16. This policy was applied haphazardly. Provincial public school systems were reluctant to admit Métis students, as the provinces saw them as a federal responsibility: p. 26. Many Métis attended Residential Schools because they were the only educational option open to them.

[29] In some cases, the federal government directly financed these projects. In the 1890s, the federal government provided funding for a reserve and industrial school at Saint-Paul-des-Métis in Alberta, run by Oblate missionaries: The Final Report of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission of Canada, vol. 3, at p. 16. The reserve consisted of two townships, owned by the Crown, and included a school for teaching trades to the Métis. As long as the project lasted, it functioned equivalently to similar reserves for Indian peoples.

[30] Many Métis were also sent to Indian Residential Schools, another exercise of federal authority over "Indians," as The Final Report of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission of Canada documents. According to the Report, "[t]he central goal of the Canadian Residential School system was to 'Christianize' and 'civilize' Aboriginal people . . . In the government's vision, there was no place for the Métis Nation": vol. 3, at p. 3. The Report notes that

[t]he existing records make it impossible to say how many Métis children attended residential school. But they did attend almost every residential school discussed in this report at some point. They would have undergone the same experiences—the high death rates, limited diets, crowded and unsanitary housing, harsh discipline, heavy workloads, neglect, and abuse . . . [p. 4]

The federal government has since acknowledged and apologized for wrongs such as Indian Residential Schools.

[31] Moreover, throughout the early twentieth century, many Métis whose ancestors had taken scrip continued to live on Indian reserves and to participate in Indian treaties. In 1944 a Commission of Inquiry in Alberta was launched to investigate this issue, headed by Justice William Macdonald. He concluded that the federal government had the constitutional authority to allow these Métis to participate in treaties and recommended that the federal government take steps to clarify the status of these Métis with respect to treaties and reserves: Report of Mr. Justice W.A. Macdonald Following an Enquiry Directed Under Section 18 of the Indian Act, August 7, 1944 . . .

[32] Justice Macdonald noted that the federal government had been willing to recognize Métis as Indians whenever it was convenient to do so:

It would appear that whenever it became necessary or expedient to extinguish Indian rights in any specific territory, the fact that Halfbreeds also had rights by virtue of their Indian blood was invariably recognized. . . .

... [M]ixed blood did not necessarily establish white status, nor did it bar an individual from admission into treaty. The welfare of the individual and his own desires in the matter were given due weight, no cast-iron rule was adopted. [pp. 557-58]

In 1958, the federal government amended the Indian Act, enacting Justice Macdonald's recommendation that Métis who had been allotted scrip but were already registered as Indians (and their descendants), remain registered under the Indian Act, thereby clarifying their status with respect to treaties and reserves. In so legislating, the federal government appeared to assume that it had authority over Métis under s. 91(24).

[33] Not only has the federal government legislated over Métis as "Indians," but it appears to have done so in the belief it was acting within its constitutional authority. In 1980, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development wrote a document for Cabinet entitled Natives and the Constitution. This document clearly expressed the federal government's confidence that it had constitutional authority to legislate over Métis under s. 91(24):

Métis people ... are presently in the same legal position as other Indians who signed land cession treaties. Those Métis who have received scrip or lands are excluded from the provisions of the Indian Act, but are still "Indians" within the meaning of the BNA Act. . . .

Should a person possess "sufficient" racial and social characteristics to be considered a "native person," that individual will be regarded as an "Indian" . . . within the legislative jurisdiction of the federal government, regardless of the fact that he or she may be excluded from the coverage of the Indian Act. [p. 43]

[34] Moreover, while it does not define the scope of s. 91(24), it is worth noting that s. 35[2] of the Constitution Act, 1982 states that Indian, Inuit, and Métis peoples are Aboriginal peoples for the purposes of the Constitution. This Court recently explained that the "grand purpose" of s. 35 is "[t]he reconciliation of Aboriginal and non-Aboriginal Canadians in a mutually respectful long-term relationship": Beckman v. Little Salmon/Carmacks First Nation, [2010] 3 S.C.R. 103, at para. 10. And in R. v. Sparrow, [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1075, this Court noted that ss. 35 and 91(24) should be read together: para. 62, cited in Manitoba Metis Federation Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), [2013] 1 S.C.R. 623, at para. 69.

[35] The term "Indian" or "Indians" in the constitutional context, therefore, has two meanings: a broad meaning, as used in s. 91(24), that includes both Métis and Inuit and can be equated with the term "aboriginal peoples of Canada" used in s. 35, and a narrower meaning that distinguishes Indian bands from other Aboriginal peoples. As will be noted later in these reasons, this Court in Reference as to whether "Indians" in s. 91(24) of the B.N.A. Act includes Eskimo inhabitants of the Province of Quebec, [1939] S.C.R. 104 ("Re Eskimo"), held that s. 91(24) includes the Inuit. Since the federal government concedes that s. 91(24) includes non-status Indians, it would be constitutionally anomalous, as the Crown also conceded, for the Métis to be the only Aboriginal people to be recognized and included in s. 35 yet excluded from the constitutional scope of s. 91(24).

[36] The Report of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, released in 1996, stressed the importance of rebuilding the Crown's relationship with Aboriginal peoples in Canada, including the Métis: see vol. 3, Gathering Strength. The Report called on the federal government to "recognize that Métis people ... are included in the federal responsibilities set out in section 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867": vol. 2, Restructuring the Relationship, at p. 61. The importance of this reconstruction was also recognized in the final report of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission of Canada: Honouring the Truth, Reconciling for the Future: Summary of the Final Report of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission of Canada (2015), at p. 183

[37] The constitutional changes, the apologies for historic wrongs, a growing appreciation that Aboriginal and non-Aboriginal people are partners in Confederation, the Report of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, and the Final Report of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission of Canada, all indicate that reconciliation with all of Canada's Aboriginal peoples is Parliament's goal.

[38] The jurisprudence also supports the conclusion that Métis are "Indians" under s. 91(24). There is no case directly on point, but by identifying which groups have already been recognized as "Indians" ... by establishing principles governing who can be considered "Indians," the existing cases provide guidance.

[39] In Re Eskimo, this Court had to determine whether the Inuit were "Indians" under s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867. ... [T]he Court drew heavily from the 1858 Report from the Select Committee on the Hudson's Bay Company. Acting on behalf of the federal government, the Hudson's Bay Company had conducted a survey of Rupert's Land and the North-Western territories in which the Inuit were classified as Indians. The Court found that while the Inuit had their own language, culture, and identities separate from that of the "Indian tribes" in other parts of the country, they were "Indians" under s. 91(24) on the basis of this survey. It follows from this case that a unique culture and history, and self-identification as a distinct group, are not bars to being included as "Indians" under s. 91(24).

[40] In Attorney General of Canada v. Canard, [1976] 1 S.C.R. 170, this Court traced the outer limits of the "Indian" power under s. 91(24). An Indian couple lived on a reserve most of the year except for a few weeks each summer during which they lived off the reserve and the husband worked on a farm. The husband died during one of the weeks he was away from the reserve. This resulted in the superintendent in charge of the Indian district (which included their reserve) being appointed as administrator of his estate, pursuant to s. 43 of the Indian Act. His wife challenged s. 43 on the grounds that it violated the Canadian Bill of Rights, S.C. 1960, c. 44. While the Court held that s. 43 of the Indian Act did not violate the Bill of Rights, Beetz J. concluded that in determining who are "Indians" under s. 91(24), "it would not appear unreasonable to count marriage and filiation and, unavoidably, intermarriages": p. 207.

[42] There is no doubt that the Métis are a distinct people. Their distinctiveness was recognized in two recent cases from this Court—Alberta (Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development) v. Cunningham, [2011] 2 S.C.R. 670 and Manitoba Metis Federation. ... In commenting on the unique history of the Métis, the Court [in Cunningham] noted that they are "widely recognized as a culturally distinct Aboriginal people living in culturally distinct communities": para. 7.

[43] And in Manitoba Metis Federation, this Court granted declaratory relief to the descendants of Manitoba's Red River Métis Settlement. ... In so deciding, the Court stated that the Métis of the Red River Settlement are a "distinct community": para. 91.

[44] The Crown, however, submits that including Métis as "Indians" under s. 91(24) is contrary to this Court's decision in R. v. Blais, [2003] 2 S.C.R. 236. With respect, I think Blais can be easily distinguished. The issue in Blais was whether a provision of Manitoba's Natural Resources Transfer Agreement, which allowed "Indians" to hunt out of season, included Métis. It is true that the Court concluded that "Indians" in the Natural Resources Transfer Agreement did not include Métis, but what was at issue was a constitutional agreement, not the Constitution. This, as this Court noted in Reference re Same-Sex Marriage, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 698, is a completely different interpretive exercise:

... [I]t is submitted that the intention of the framers should be determinative in interpreting the scope of the heads of power enumerated in ss. 91 and 92 given the decision in R. v. Blais That case considered the interpretive question in relation to a particular constitutional agreement, as opposed to a head of power which must continually adapt to cover new realities. It is therefore distinguishable and does not apply here. [para. 30]

[45] ... [T]his Court itself expressly stated in Blais that it was not deciding whether s. 91(24) included the Métis. ... [T]he Court emphasized that it left "open for another day the question of whether the term 'Indians' in s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867 includes the Métis—an issue not before us in this appeal": para. 36.

[46] A broad understanding of "Indians" under s. 91(24) as meaning "Aboriginal peoples," resolves the definitional concerns raised by the parties in this case. Since s. 91(24) includes all Aboriginal peoples, including Métis and non-status Indians, there is no need to delineate which mixed-ancestry communities are Métis and which are non-status Indians. They are all "Indians" under s. 91(24) by virtue of the fact that they are all Aboriginal peoples.

[47] Determining whether particular individuals or communities are non-status Indians or Métis and therefore "Indians" under s. 91(24), is a fact-driven question to be decided on a case-by-case basis in the future.

Appeal allowed in part.

B. PROVINCIAL LEGISLATIVE COMPETENCE

Federal legislative competence to pass laws affecting Indigenous peoples is clearly established in s 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867. Provincial authority to pass laws affecting Indigenous peoples is a more complicated issue. Although a province, generally speaking, is not entitled to "single out" Indigenous people (see The Queen v Sutherland, [1980] 2 SCR 451 at 455, 1980 CanLII 18), it may in some circumstances regulate Indigenous peoples by "laws of general application" (at 455). The applicability of provincial laws of general application is governed by the federalism doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity, discussed in Chapter 8, Interpreting the Division of Powers, which operates to preclude the application of provincial laws that intrude on the "core" of the federal power. The contours of that core, which in the past has been referred to as the "core of Indianness" (Dick v The Queen, [1985] 2 SCR 309 at 326, 1985 CanLII 80), remain, however, somewhat uncertain.

The following excerpt from Delgamuukw deals specifically with the issue of whether provinces have the power to extinguish Aboriginal rights, including Aboriginal title, with the Court ruling that they do not. In the course of dealing with this issue, Lamer CJ reviews the past law on the scope of provincial legislative competence over Indigenous peoples and suggests that the core of Indianness immune from provincial regulation includes all Aboriginal rights recognized by s 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. However, in its 2014 decision in Tsilhqot'in Nation, excerpted below, you will see that the Supreme Court of Canada has subsequently narrowed the operation of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity in this area, leaving fewer matters within the core of the federal power and thus beyond the scope of provincial regulation.

Delgamuukw v British Columbia[1997] 3 SCR 1010, 1997 CanLII 302

LAMER CJ (Cory, Major, and McLachlin JJ concurring):

[The main part of this decision, laying out the legal framework for Aboriginal title under s 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982, can be found above in Section V. This extract deals with the specific issue of whether the province of British Columbia had the power to extinguish Aboriginal title before 1982. The province had argued that, even if Aboriginal title had existed, it was extinguished by provincial grants of fee simple.]

(2) Primary Jurisdiction

[173] Since 1871, the exclusive power to legislate in relation to "Indians, and Lands reserved for the Indians" has been vested with the federal government by virtue of s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867. That head of jurisdiction, in my opinion, encompasses within it the exclusive power to extinguish aboriginal rights, including aboriginal title.

[The discussion of the second part of s 91(24)—the federal power over "Lands reserved for the Indians"—has been omitted. Chief Justice Lamer rejected the argument that this power covers only reserve lands and holds that it includes jurisdiction over lands subject to Aboriginal title, including the power to legislate with respect to the surrender or extinguishment of title. Chief Justice Lamer then turned to the first part of s 91(24)—the power over "Indians."]

[177] The extent of federal jurisdiction over Indians has not been definitively addressed by this Court. ... The cases which have come before the Court under s. 91(24) have implicated the question of jurisdiction over Indians from the other direction—whether provincial laws which on their face apply to Indians intrude on federal jurisdiction and are inapplicable to Indians to the extent of that intrusion. As I explain below, the Court has held that s. 91(24) protects a "core" of Indianness from provincial intrusion, through the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity.

[178] It follows, at the very least, that this core falls within the scope of federal jurisdiction over Indians ..., [land] encompasses aboriginal rights, including the rights that are recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1). Laws which purport to extinguish those rights therefore touch the core of Indianness which lies at the heart of s. 91(24), and are beyond the legislative competence of the provinces to enact. The core of Indianness encompasses the whole range of aboriginal rights that are protected by s. 35(1). Those rights include rights in relation to land; that part of the core derives from s. 91(24)'s reference to "Lands reserved for the Indians." But those rights also encompass practices, customs and traditions which are not tied to land as well; that part of the core can be traced to federal jurisdiction over "Indians." Provincial governments are prevented from legislating in relation to both types of aboriginal rights.

(3) Provincial Laws of General Application

[179] The vesting of exclusive jurisdiction with the federal government over Indians and Indian lands under s. 91(24), operates to preclude provincial laws in relation to those matters. Thus, provincial laws which single out Indians for special treatment are ultra vires, because they are in relation to Indians and therefore invade federal jurisdiction. ... However, it is a well-established principle that (Four B Manufacturing Ltd. [v United Garment Workers of America, [1980] 1 SCR 1031, 1979 CanLII 11]):

The conferring upon Parliament of exclusive legislative competence to make laws relating to certain classes of persons does not mean that the totality of these persons' rights and duties comes under primary federal competence to the exclusion of provincial laws of general application.

In other words, notwithstanding s. 91(24), provincial laws of general application apply proprio vigore to Indians and Indian lands. ...

[180] What must be answered, however, is whether the same principle allows provincial laws of general application to extinguish aboriginal rights. I have come to the conclusion that a provincial law of general application could not have this effect ... First, a law of general application cannot, by definition, meet the standard ... for the extinguishment of aboriginal rights without being ultra vires the province. That standard was laid down in [R v Sparrow, [1990] 1 SCR 1075] ... as one of "clear and plain" intent. In that decision, the Court drew a distinction between laws which extinguished aboriginal rights, and those which merely regulated them. Although the latter types of laws may have been "necessarily inconsistent" with the continued exercise of aboriginal rights, they could not extinguish those rights. While the requirement of clear and plain intent does not, perhaps, require that the Crown "use language which refers expressly to its extinguishment of aboriginal rights" (Gladstone [[1996] 2 SCR 723, 1996 CanLII 160]), the standard is still quite high. My concern is that the only laws with the sufficiently clear and plain intention to extinguish aboriginal rights would be laws in relation to Indians and Indian lands. As a result, a provincial law could never, proprio vigore, extinguish aboriginal rights, because the intention to do so would take the law outside provincial jurisdiction.

[181] Second, as I mentioned earlier, s. 91(24) protects a core of federal jurisdiction even from provincial laws of general application, through the operation of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity. That core has been described as matters touching on "Indianness" or the "core of Indianness" ... [Dick v The Queen, [1985] 2 SCR 309, 1985 CanLII 80]. The core of Indianness at the heart of s. 91(24) has been defined in both negative and positive terms. Negatively, it has been held to not include labour relations (Four B [above]) and the driving of motor vehicles [R v Francis, [1988] 1 SCR 1025, 1988 CanLII 31]. The only positive formulation of Indianness was offered in Dick. Speaking for the Court, Beetz J. assumed, but did not decide, that a provincial hunting law did not apply proprio vigore to the members of an Indian band to hunt and because those activities were "at the centre of what they do and what they are" (at p. 320). But in [R v Van der Peet, [1996] 2 SCR 507, 1996 CanLII 216], I described and defined the aboriginal rights that are recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1) in a similar fashion, as protecting the occupation of land and the activities which are integral to the distinctive aboriginal culture of the group claiming the right. It follows that aboriginal rights are part of the core of Indianness at the heart of s. 91(24). Prior to 1982, as a result, they could not be extinguished by provincial laws of general application.

Tsilhqot'in Nation v British Columbia2014 SCC 44

McLACHLIN CJ (LeBel, Abella, Rothstein, Cromwell, Moldaver, Karakatsanis, and Wagner JJ concurring):

[The portion of this case related to proof of Aboriginal title can be found above in Section V. Although not necessary for resolution of the case, the Court went on to deal with the issue of the application of provincial laws, such as the Forest Act, to Aboriginal title land. The Court stated that, as a starting point, provincial laws of general application apply to land held under Aboriginal title, subject to the constitutional limitations imposed by s 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 and by the division of powers, specifically the federal power over "Indians, and Lands reserved for the Indians" under s 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867.

With respect to s 35, the Court found that some provincial laws of general application might not constitute an infringement of Aboriginal rights, and for those that did, absent consent, the infringement would have to be justified.]

VIII. Provincial Laws and Aboriginal Title

[98] As discussed, I have concluded that the Province breached its duty to consult and accommodate the Tsilhqot'in interest in the land. This is sufficient to dispose of the appeal.

[99] However, the parties made extensive submissions on the application of the Forest Act to Aboriginal title land. This issue was dealt with by the courts below and is of pressing importance to the Tsilhqot'in people and other Aboriginal groups in British Columbia and elsewhere. It is therefore appropriate that we deal with it.

[100] The following questions arise: (1) Do provincial laws of general application apply to land held under Aboriginal title and, if so, how? (2) Does the British Columbia Forest Act on its face apply to land held under Aboriginal title? and (3) If the Forest Act on its face applies, is its application ousted by the operation of the Constitution of Canada? I will discuss each of these questions in turn.

A. Do Provincial Laws of General Application Apply to Land Held Under Aboriginal Title?

[101] Broadly put, provincial laws of general application apply to lands held under Aboriginal title. However, as we shall see, there are important constitutional limits on this proposition.

[102] As a general proposition, provincial governments have the power to regulate land use within the province. This applies to all lands, whether held by the Crown, by private owners, or by the holders of Aboriginal title. The foundation for this power lies in s 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867, which gives the provinces the power to legislate with respect to property and civil rights in the province.

[103] Provincial power to regulate land held under Aboriginal title is constitutionally limited in two ways. First, it is limited by s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. Section 35 requires any abridgment of the rights flowing from Aboriginal title to be backed by a compelling and substantial governmental objective and to be consistent with the Crown's fiduciary relationship with title holders. Second, a province's power to regulate lands under Aboriginal title may in some situations also be limited by the federal power over "Indians, and Lands reserved for the Indians" under s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867.

[104] This Court suggested in [R v Sparrow, [1990] 1 SCR 1075, 1990 CanLII 104] that the following factors will be relevant in determining whether a law of general application results in a meaningful diminution of an Aboriginal right, giving rise to breach: (1) whether the limitation imposed by the legislation is unreasonable; (2) whether the legislation imposes undue hardship; and (3) whether the legislation denies the holders of the right their preferred means of exercising the right (p. 1112). All three factors must be considered; for example, even if laws of general application are found to be reasonable or not to cause undue hardship, this does not mean that there can be no infringement of Aboriginal title. ...

[105] It may be predicted that laws and regulations of general application aimed at protecting the environment or assuring the continued health of the forests of British Columbia will usually be reasonable, not impose an undue hardship either directly or indirectly, and not interfere with the Aboriginal group's preferred method of exercising their right. And it is to be hoped that Aboriginal groups and the provincial government will work cooperatively to sustain the natural environment so important to them both. This said, when conflicts arise, the foregoing template serves to resolve them.

[106] Subject to these constitutional constraints, provincial laws of general application apply to land held under Aboriginal title.

[120] Where legislation affects an Aboriginal right protected by s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982, two inquiries are required. First, does the legislation interfere with or infringe the Aboriginal right (this was referred to as prima facie infringement in Sparrow)? Second, if so, can the infringement be justified?

[121] A court must first examine the characteristics or incidents of the right at stake. In the case of Aboriginal title, three relevant incidents are: (1) the right to exclusive use and occupation of the land; (2) the right to determine the uses to which the land is put, subject to the ultimate limit that those uses cannot destroy the ability of the land to sustain future generations of Aboriginal peoples; and (3) the right to enjoy the economic fruits of the land (Delgamuukw, para. 166).

[122] Next, in order to determine whether the right is infringed by legislation, a court must ask whether the legislation results in a meaningful diminution of the right: [R v Gladstone, [1996] 2 SCR 723, 1996 CanLII 160]. As discussed, in Sparrow, the Court suggested that the following three factors will aid in determining whether such an infringement has occurred: (1) whether the limitation imposed by the legislation is unreasonable; (2) whether the legislation imposes undue hardship; and (3) whether the legislation denies the holders of the right their preferred means of exercising the right (p. 1112).

[123] General regulatory legislation, such as legislation aimed at managing the forests in a way that deals with pest invasions or prevents forest fires, will often pass the Sparrow test as it will be reasonable, not impose undue hardship, and not deny the holders of the right their preferred means of exercising it. In such cases, no infringement will result.

[124] General regulatory legislation, which may affect the manner in which the Aboriginal right can be exercised, differs from legislation that assigns Aboriginal property rights to third parties. The issuance of timber licences on Aboriginal title land for example—a direct transfer of Aboriginal property rights to a third party—will plainly be a meaningful diminution in the Aboriginal group's ownership right and will amount to an infringement that must be justified in cases where it is done without Aboriginal consent.

[125] As discussed earlier, to justify an infringement, the Crown must demonstrate that: (1) it complied with its procedural duty to consult with the right holders and accommodate the right to an appropriate extent at the stage when infringement was contemplated; (2) the infringement is backed by a compelling and substantial legislative objective in the public interest; and (3) the benefit to the public is proportionate to any adverse effect on the Aboriginal interest. This framework permits a principled reconciliation of Aboriginal rights with the interests of all Canadians.

[126] ... I agree with the courts below that no compelling and substantial objective existed in this case. The trial judge found the two objectives put forward by the Province—the economic benefits that would be realized as a result of logging in the claim area and the need to prevent the spread of a mountain pine beetle infestation—were not supported by the evidence. After considering the expert evidence before him, he concluded that the proposed cutting sites were not economically viable and that they were not directed at preventing the spread of the mountain pine beetle.

[127] Before the Court of Appeal, the Province no longer argued that the forestry activities were undertaken to combat the mountain pine beetle, but maintained the position that the trial judge's findings on economic viability were unreasonable, because unless logging was economically viable, it would not have taken place. The Court of Appeal rejected this argument on two grounds: (1) levels of logging must sometimes be maintained for a tenure holder to keep logging rights, even if logging is not economically viable; and (2) the focus is the economic value of logging compared to the detrimental effects it would have on Tsilhqot'in Aboriginal rights, not the economic viability of logging from the sole perspective of the tenure holder. In short, the Court of Appeal found no error in the trial judge's reasoning on this point. I would agree. Granting rights to third parties to harvest timber on Tsilhqot'in land is a serious infringement that will not lightly be justified. Should the government wish to grant such harvesting rights in the future, it will be required to establish that a compelling and substantial objective is furthered by such harvesting, something that was not present in this case.

2. The Division of Powers

[With respect to the division of powers, in a bold move, the Court ruled that the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity should not be used to limit provincial power to legislate with respect to Aboriginal rights, but instead that s 35 should be the primary constitutional constraint on both federal and provincial legislative power to infringe Aboriginal rights. The doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity precludes the application of laws of one level of government that impair the protected core of jurisdiction possessed by the other level of government. In the past, as shown in the extract from Delgamuukw, above, the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity has been applied to prevent provincial laws of general application from dealing with the "core of Indianness" (Dick v The Queen, [1985] 2 SCR 309, 1985 CanLII 80 at para 12). However, the issue of what falls within the core of federal jurisdiction, and specifically whether all rights protected by s 35 fall within that protected core, had not been fully resolved. In Delgamuukw, Lamer CJ had suggested that the core included all Aboriginal rights protected by s 35, and this was the view followed by the trial judge. The Court's restriction of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity in the context of Aboriginal rights is consistent with the approach it has taken to the doctrine more generally in its federalism jurisprudence: see Canadian Western Bank v Alberta, 2007 SCC 22, excerpted in Chapter 8.]

[138] ... [T]he jurisprudence does not directly address the relationship between interjurisdictional immunity and s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. The ambiguous state of the jurisprudence has created unpredictability. It is clear that where valid federal law interferes with an Aboriginal or treaty right, the s. 35 Sparrow framework governs the law's applicability. It is less clear, however, that it is so where valid provincial law interferes with an Aboriginal or treaty right. The jurisprudence leaves the following questions unanswered: does interjurisdictional immunity prevent provincial governments from ever limiting Aboriginal rights even if a particular infringement would be justified under the Sparrow framework? ...

[139] As discussed, s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 imposes limits on how both the federal and provincial governments can deal with land under Aboriginal title. Neither level of government is permitted to legislate in a way that results in a meaningful diminution of an Aboriginal or treaty right, unless such an infringement is justified in the broader public interest and is consistent with the Crown's fiduciary duty owed to the Aboriginal group. The result is to protect Aboriginal and treaty rights while also allowing the reconciliation of Aboriginal interests with those of the broader society.

[140] What role then is left for the application of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity and the idea that Aboriginal rights are at the core of the federal power over "Indians" under s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867? The answer is none.

[141] The doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity is directed to ensuring that the two levels of government are able to operate without interference in their core areas of exclusive jurisdiction. This goal is not implicated in cases such as this. Aboriginal rights are a limit on both federal and provincial jurisdiction.

[144] The doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity is designed to deal with conflicts between provincial powers and federal powers; it does so by carving out areas of exclusive jurisdiction for each level of government. But the problem in cases such as this is not competing provincial and federal powers, but rather tension between the right of the Aboriginal title holders to use their land as they choose and the province which seeks to regulate it, like all other land in the province.

[146] First, application of interjurisdictional immunity would result in two different tests for assessing the constitutionality of provincial legislation affecting Aboriginal rights. Pursuant to Sparrow, provincial regulation is unconstitutional if it results in a meaningful diminution of an Aboriginal right that cannot be justified pursuant to s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. Pursuant to interjurisdictional immunity, provincial regulation would be unconstitutional if it impaired an Aboriginal right, whether or not such limitation was reasonable or justifiable. The result would be dueling tests directed at answering the same question: how far can provincial governments go in regulating the exercise of s. 35 Aboriginal rights?

[147] Second, in this case, applying the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity to exclude provincial regulation of forests on Aboriginal title lands would produce uneven, undesirable results and may lead to legislative vacuums. The result would be patchwork regulation of forests: some areas of the province regulated under provincial legislation, and other areas under federal legislation or no legislation at all. This might make it difficult, if not impossible, to deal effectively with problems such as pests and fires, a situation desired by neither level of government.

[148] Interjurisdictional immunity—premised on a notion that regulatory environments can be divided into watertight jurisdictional compartments—is often at odds with modern reality. Increasingly, as our society becomes more complex, effective regulation requires cooperation between interlocking federal and provincial schemes. The two levels of government possess differing tools, capacities, and expertise, and the more flexible double aspect and paramountcy doctrines are alive to this reality: under these doctrines, jurisdictional cooperation is encouraged up until the point when actual conflict arises and must be resolved. Interjurisdictional immunity, by contrast, may thwart such productive cooperation. In the case of forests on Aboriginal title land, courts would have to scrutinize provincial forestry legislation to ensure that it did not impair the core of federal jurisdiction over "Indians" and would also have to scrutinize any federal legislation to ensure that it did not impair the core of the province's power to manage the forests. It would be no answer that, as in this case, both levels of government agree that the laws at issue should remain in force.

[149] This Court has recently stressed the limits of interjurisdictional immunity. "[C]onstitutional doctrine must facilitate, not undermine what this Court has called 'co-operative federalism'" and as such "a court should favour, where possible, the ordinary operation of statutes enacted by both levels of government" (Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 3, at paras. 24 and 37 (emphasis deleted)). Because of this, interjurisdictional immunity is of "limited application" and should be applied "with restraint" (paras. 67 and 77). ...

[150] ... I find that, consistent with the statements in Sparrow and Delgamuukw, provincial regulation of general application will apply to exercises of Aboriginal rights, including Aboriginal title land, subject to the s. 35 infringement and justification framework. This carefully calibrated test attempts to reconcile general legislation with Aboriginal rights in a sensitive way as required by s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 and is fairer and more practical from a policy perspective than the blanket inapplicability imposed by the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity.

[151] For these reasons, I conclude that the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity should not be applied in cases where lands are held under Aboriginal title. Rather, the s. 35 Sparrow approach should govern. Provincial laws of general application, including the Forest Act, should apply unless they are unreasonable, impose a hardship or deny the title holders their preferred means of exercising their rights, and such restrictions cannot be justified pursuant to the justification framework outlined above. The result is a balance that preserves the Aboriginal right while permitting effective regulation of forests by the province, as required by s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

[152] The s. 35 framework applies to exercises of both provincial and federal power: Sparrow; Delgamuukw. As such, it provides a complete and rational way of confining provincial legislation affecting Aboriginal title land within appropriate constitutional bounds. The issue in cases such as this is not at base one of conflict between the federal and provincial levels of government—an issue appropriately dealt with by the doctrines of paramountcy and interjurisdictional immunity where precedent supports this—but rather how far the provincial government can go in regulating land that is subject to Aboriginal title or claims for Aboriginal title. The appropriate constitutional lens through which to view the matter is s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982, which directly addresses the requirement that these interests must be respected by the government, unless the government can justify incursion on them for a compelling purpose and in conformity with its fiduciary duty to affected Aboriginal groups.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. What are the implications of the Court's ruling on interjurisdictional immunity in Tsilhqot'in? The Court is clear that the mere fact that a provincial law affects an Aboriginal right protected by s 35 doctrine does not trigger the application of interjurisdictional immunity and thus that the doctrine does not prevent the application of provincial laws that regulate Aboriginal title lands. But has the Court completely eliminated the application of the doctrine to matters falling within the federal power over "Indians and Lands reserved for the Indians" or has it simply returned the law to its state prior to Delgamuukw, such that the federal power has a narrower core?

2. John Borrows is critical of the Court's "rewriting" of the law of interjurisdictional immunity and Aboriginal rights so as to allow provincial laws to apply to Aboriginal title lands. He argues that this violates a long-standing constitutional principle:

[T]he Supreme Court has eroded "The Aboriginal Constitution." The Aboriginal Constitution prevented local colonial governments from molesting or disturbing First Nations in their use and occupation of land. Governments (like provinces) who are the closest to First Nations have the greatest incentive to benefit from Indigenous lands. ... Therefore, the law in North America developed to ensure that local governments had substantial obstacles placed in their path in dealing with First Nations. The Royal Proclamation and 250 years of Canadian law, as affirmed in section 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867, interposed a more distant imperial or federal power between First Nations and colonial/state/local/provincial governments. The exclusion of the provinces for dealing with First Nations was one of the few checks and balances Indigenous peoples enjoyed under Canadian law throughout history.

See John Borrows, "The Durability of Terra Nullius," above at 735–36. Do you agree with this criticism? Note that similar issues were raised in Grassy Narrows First Nation v Ontario (Natural Resources), 2014 SCC 48, excerpted above in Section VI.

X. INDIGENOUS RIGHTS OF SELF-GOVERNMENT

Indigenous peoples organized their affairs and exercised governing authority for millennia prior to the arrival of Europeans and others in North America. These powers of governance varied according to clan and nation and were suited to the varieties of languages, economies, and cultures represented on the continent. There were alliances, confederacies, powerful families, democracies, and empires. Traditions of governance were often closely connected to the land, and many emphasized the connection of the spiritual, familial, economic, and political spheres. The nature, scope, and existence of these ancient powers are the subject of debate in contemporary Canada. Through negotiation and litigation, many Indigenous nations are attempting to articulate their rights of self-government.

Self-government might receive protection through s 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 in at least five ways:

1. as a cultural practice (Van der Peet and Pamajewon, below);
2. as an incident of collective title to land, given that it entails the need to make decisions or laws about access to and use of land and resources (Delgamuukw and Tsilqhot'in);
3. as a treaty right (modern and historic treaties);
4. as a free-standing right (United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples; Mitchell, below; and the US approach); and
5. as a delegated right.

Under any scenario, Indigenous peoples' own legal norms and practices form an important part of self-government. The remainder of this chapter explores these issues in turn.

A. SECTION 35(1) FRAMEWORK FOR SELF-GOVERNMENT AS A CULTURAL PRACTICE

As you recall, Van der Peet created a framework for recognizing Aboriginal rights. If a practice, custom, or tradition was integral to the distinctive culture of an Indigenous group prior to the arrival of Europeans, and it had not been clearly and plainly extinguished prior to 1982, an Indigenous group can claim such practices as contemporary rights under s 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. The first Supreme Court case to test this framework for the recognition of self-government was R v Pamajewon.

[Pamajewon and his co-accused, each a member of either the Shawanaga First Nation or Eagle Lake Band, were convicted of keeping a common gaming house contrary to s 201 of the Criminal Code. The gaming activities were conducted on reserves, though many of the participants were non-natives. On appeal, the band members argued, inter alia, that the activities in question were protected as an Aboriginal right under s 35(1) or as an incident of the inherent right of self-government claimed by the two First Nations. The Ontario Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court of Canada dismissed the appeals.]

LAMER CJ (La Forest, Sopinka, Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin, Iacobucci, and Major JJ concurring):

[1] This appeal raises the question of whether the conduct of high stakes gambling by the Shawanaga and Eagle Lake First Nations falls within the scope of the aboriginal rights recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982.

[2] The appellants appealed on the basis that the Court of Appeal erred in restricting aboriginal title to rights that are activity and site specific and in concluding that self-government only extends to those matters which were governed by ancient laws or customs. The appellant argued further that the Court of Appeal erred in concluding that the Code extinguished self-government regarding gaming and in not addressing whether the Code's gaming provisions unjustifiably interfered with the rights recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982.

[23] The resolution of the appellants' claim in this case rests on the application of the test, laid out by this Court in R. v. Van der Peet, [1996] 2 S.C.R. 507, for determining the aboriginal rights recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. The appellants in this case are claiming that the gambling activities in which they took part, and their respective bands' regulation of those gambling activities, fell within the scope of the aboriginal rights recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1). Van der Peet, supra, lays out the test for determining the practices, customs and traditions which fall within s. 35(1) and, as such, provides the legal standard against which the appellants' claim must be measured.

[24] The appellants' claim involves the assertion that s. 35(1) encompasses the right of self-government, and that this right includes the right to regulate gambling activities on the reservation. Assuming without deciding that s. 35(1) includes self-government claims, the applicable legal standard is nonetheless that laid out in Van der Peet, supra. Assuming s. 35(1) encompasses claims to aboriginal self-government, such claims must be considered in light of the purposes underlying that provision and must, therefore, be considered against the test derived from consideration of those purposes. This is the test laid out in Van der Peet, supra. In so far as they can be made under s. 35(1), claims to self-government are no different from other claims to the enjoyment of aboriginal rights and must, as such, be measured against the same standard.

[25] In Van der Peet, supra, the test for identifying aboriginal rights was said to be as follows, at para. 46:

... [I]n order to be an aboriginal right an activity must be an element of a practice, custom or tradition integral to the distinctive culture of the aboriginal group claiming the right.

In applying this test the Court must first identify the exact nature of the activity claimed to be a right and must then go on to determine whether, on the evidence presented to the trial judge, and on the facts as found by the trial judge, that activity could be said to be (Van der Peet, at para. 59) "a defining feature of the culture in question" prior to contact with Europeans.

[26] I now turn to the first part of the Van der Peet test, the characterization of the appellants' claim. In Van der Peet, supra, the Court held at para. 53 that:

To characterize an applicant's claim correctly, a court should consider such factors as the nature of the action which the applicant is claiming was done pursuant to an aboriginal right, the nature of the governmental regulation, statute or action being impugned, and the practice, custom or tradition being relied upon to establish the right.

When these factors are considered in this case it can be seen that the correct characterization of the appellants' claim is that they are claiming the right to participate in, and to regulate, high stakes gambling activities on the reservation. ... The statute which they argue violates those rights prohibits gambling subject only to a few very limited exceptions (laid out in s. 207 of the Code). Finally, the applicants rely in support of their claim on the fact that the "Ojibwa people ... had a long tradition of public games and sporting events, which pre-dated the arrival of Europeans." ... As such, the most accurate characterization of the appellants' claim is that they are asserting that s. 35(1) recognizes and affirms the rights of the Shawanaga and Eagle Lake First Nations to participate in, and to regulate, gambling activities on their respective reserve lands.

[27] The appellants themselves would have this Court characterize their claim as to "a broad right to manage the use of their reserve lands." To so characterize the appellants' claim would be to cast the Court's inquiry at a level of excessive generality. Aboriginal rights, including any asserted right to self-government, must be looked at in light of the specific circumstances of each case and, in particular, in light of the specific history and culture of the aboriginal group claiming the right. The factors laid out in Van der Peet, and applied, supra, allow the Court to consider the appellants' claim at the appropriate level of specificity; the characterization put forward by the appellants would not allow the Court to do so.

[28] I now turn to the second branch of the Van der Peet test, the consideration of whether the participation in, and regulation of, gambling on the reserve lands was an integral part of the distinctive cultures of the Shawanaga or Eagle Lake First Nations. The evidence presented at both the Pamajewon and Gardner trials does not demonstrate that gambling, or that the regulation of gambling, was an integral part of the distinctive cultures of the Shawanaga or Eagle Lake First Nations. In fact, the only evidence ... dealing with ... the importance of gambling was that of James Morrison, who testified at the Pamajewon trial with regards to the importance and prevalence of gaming in Ojibwa culture. While Mr. Morrison's evidence does demonstrate that the Ojibwa gambled, it does not demonstrate that gambling was of central significance to the Ojibwa people. Moreover, his evidence in no way addresses the extent to which this gambling was the subject of regulation by the Ojibwa community. His account is of informal gambling activities taking place on a small-scale; he does not describe large-scale activities, subject to community regulation, of the sort at issue in this appeal.

[29] I would note that neither of the trial judges in these cases relied upon findings of fact regarding the importance of gambling to the Ojibwa; however, upon review of the evidence I find myself in agreement with the conclusion arrived at by Osborne J.A. when he said first, at p. 400, that there "is no evidence to support a conclusion that gambling generally or high stakes gambling of the sort in issue here, were part of the First Nations' historic cultures and traditions, or an aspect of their use of their land" and, second, at p. 400, that "there is no evidence that gambling on the reserve lands generally was ever the subject matter of aboriginal regulation." I also agree with the observation made by Flaherty Prov. Ct. J. in the Gardner trial when he said that commercial lotteries such as bingo are a twentieth century phenomena and nothing of the kind existed amongst aboriginal peoples and was never part of the means by which those societies were traditionally sustained or socialized.

[30] Given this evidentiary record, it is clear that the appellants have failed to demonstrate that the gambling activities in which they were engaged, and their respective bands' regulation of those activities, took place pursuant to an aboriginal right recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982.

[Justice L'Heureux-Dubé concurred in separate reasons.]

Appeal dismissed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In Casimel v Insurance Corporation of British Columbia, 1993 CanLII 1258, 106 DLR \(4th\) 720 \(BCCA\), the Court held that a customary Indigenous adoption should be treated as a legal adoption. The plaintiffs, Louise Casimel and Francis Casimel, raised their grandson, Ernest Casimel, in a parent-child relationship following a customary adoption acknowledged by the Stellaquo Band of the Carrier People. When Ernest was killed in a motor vehicle accident, his adoptive parents sued his insurance company to claim the benefit owed to dependent parents. (It was determined early on that they were, in fact, dependent on him.) The insurance company claimed that the plaintiffs were not Ernest's parents because the adoption had not followed the procedures set out in provincial adoption legislation and were therefore not eligible to claim the benefit. The Court rejected the insurance company's claim. The Court first determined that there was in fact a custom of adoption among the Stellaquo Band and that this custom had been fulfilled by the Casimel family. Second, it held that nothing in statutory or common law had extinguished or limited the Band's right to establish family connections, including those created by adoption, according to custom; this right remained protected by s 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. Louise and Francis Casimel, as dependents to and parents by adoption of Ernest, were therefore successful in their claim against the insurance company. Does Casimel reinscribe Connolly v Woolrich (1867), 17 RJRQ 75, 1 CNLC 70 (SC) as described by the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples in the excerpt at the outset of this chapter, in constitutional terms? Is Casimel consistent with Pamajewon?

2. In Pamajewon, the Court rejected the appellants' characterization of their claim as "a broad right to manage the use of their reserve lands" (at para 27). Might such a claim have more success now as a result of the recognition in Delgamuukw and Tsilhqot'in that Aboriginal title entails a broad right to use the land for all purposes? This basis for self-government is discussed in the readings that follow.

B. INDIGENOUS GOVERNANCE AS AN INCIDENT OF ABORIGINAL TITLE

In Tsilhqot'in Nation v British Columbia, excerpted above, the Court stated: "The right to control the land conferred by Aboriginal title means that governments and others seeking to use the land must obtain the consent of the Aboriginal title holders" (at para 76). There are many questions about what this statement means in relation to the recognition of Indigenous governance.

In Tsilhqot'in, elders testified about the continuity of their ways of life in their own language, using their legal traditions. Indigenous law was key to establishing a sufficiency of Indigenous social organization, which was necessary to prove title. Tsilhqot'in rules of conduct were central to proving that the Tsilhqot'in historically and currently occupied land in the contested region. It is possible to argue that, in accepting this evidence as proof of title, the Supreme Court implicitly affirmed that Indigenous legal traditions give rise to enforceable obligations within Canadian law. As a result, it may be argued that Indigenous social organization is treated as a synonym for self-government. When a nation organizes itself socially on a territorial basis and through its own laws controls land, makes decisions about its use, and excludes others, it could be concluded that such a nation governs itself. Indigenous governance may be an important dimension of Aboriginal title because such a right cannot be disproven or exercised without this broader dimension being present. The following excerpt discusses the nature of the link between Aboriginal title and Indigenous governance.

Val Napoleon, "Making the Round: Aboriginal Title in the Common Law from a Tsilhqot'in Legal Perspective"

[What follows takes the form of a judgment of the International Indigenous Trickster Court, sitting on an appeal from the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in Tsilhqot'in. The Court applies Tsilhqot'in law.]

In considering Tsilhqot'in legal traditions, one must recall that the historic Tsilhqot'in political, legal, and economic orders were non-state and decentralized. In other words, the responsibility and authority for the maintenance and application of the larger societal orders inhered in the people and operated through the kinship relationships. It is for this reason that Tsilhqot'in law emphasizes and protects individual and collective agency, and relationships within Tsilhqot'in society and with those outside their society. ...

[In the Tsilhqot'in case] the SCC granted a declaration of Aboriginal title over a portion of Tsilhqot'in lands and a declaration that with its land use plan and forestry authorizations under the Forest Act, the Province of British Columbia breached the duty to consult with the Tsilhqot'in Nation. According to the SCC, governments and other users must seek the consent of Aboriginal title holders when they want to use Aboriginal title lands. The legal question before us is the following: What are the standards of consultation and consent in Tsilhqot'in law, and how do they apply to the actions of the Province of British Columbia? ...

Tsilhqot'in society has five authoritative decision-making groups: individuals, family members, chiefs/leaders, elders/medicine people, and community. The type of legal issue or problem determines which group is responsible for decision making. In the case of issues or harms that could potentially affect or harm the broader community, the decision-making group is the community. There is provision for certain members to be selected from the community, and they may also collaboratively decide on such an issue or problem. In addition, chiefs and leaders are recognized decision makers for issues or legal questions that could affect the broader community. ... [A]s with other law, Tsilhqot'in law and legal institutions change over time to respond to new issues and circumstances.

The Tsilhqot'in make collective decisions through the chiefs and councils of the communities and through the Tsilhqot'in National Government. Continued collective approval of these decisions is signalled by ongoing acceptance and adherence by the Tsilhqot'in people. Given this, the groups that must be consulted and that must give consent to major decisions that will have broad community impact are the wider community, selected members of the community, chiefs and councils, and the Tsilhqot'in National Government.

Tsilhqot'in legal traditions set out a number of procedures to be employed in determining appropriate legal responses or actions. ... The nature of these procedures is about ensuring that there is clarity as to what the harms are and who committed them. ... While these procedures are intended to guide responses to harms, we believe they also set out the terms for consultation when there is a serious issue that may impact all the Tsilhqot'in people. Given this, the standards for consultation under Tsilhqot'in law are to obtain all information and evidence regarding potential harms (such as logging and mining activity on Tsilhqot'in lands), to consult with the collective Tsilhqot'in people and with their experts, to consider the consequences of potential harms (e.g., logging, mining), to determine the appropriate responses to or consequences of the perceived harm, to obtain assistance in carrying out actions that result from any decisions, and to determine whether a ceremony is a necessary part of resolving specific harms.

In Tsilhqot'in legal traditions, there are a number of principles that guide legal responses and resolutions to harm, ranging from deterrence, to temporary or permanent separation, to reintegration, and in the case of the most extreme and ongoing harms, to incapacitation. For our purposes today, the principles that most directly relate to the questions of consultation and consent are the following:

- (i) Protecting both individual and community safety. This is a paramount consideration when responding to harms.
- (ii) Proportionality. The response to a harm should be proportional to the harm experienced.
- (iii) Acknowledging and taking responsibility. This is an essential part of reintegrating those who have committed harms, and often requires some type of restitution or compensation.

[There followed a review of the Tsilhqot'in responses to the BC government's unilateral decision to grant forestry licences over their traditional lands. These included initial talks, direct political action—that is, a blockade of a bridge—and litigation.]

[These] were ... legal responses to the unauthorized encroachment onto Tsilhqot'in lands, an issue that can be characterized as a matter of community safety. These legal responses were led by leaders organized in the various leadership forms of today, including an overall political alliance known as the Tsilhqot'in National Government. The acceptance and continued observance of the decisions made by the Tsilhqot'in leadership indicates broad community agreement and the legitimacy of those actions.

The Tsilhqot'in people engaged in direct political action and they employed Canadian law—all of which can be understood as being proportional to the potential harms to their land as well as proportional to the failure of the BC government to properly consult with the Tsilhqot'in in a way that reflected their legal perspectives in accordance with Tsilhqot'in law.

We consider consent to be another potential legal response to harms, but it is obvious that the terms of consent to actions with the potential to have broad community impact must be determined by the standards of Tsilhqot'in law. Basically, these standards are contained, at least in part, in the procedures necessary for determining an action or response to issues with broad community impact. Such standards are also implicit in determining who the authoritative decision makers are and their attendant responsibilities; and again, this depends on a comprehensive assessment of the harm and its reach as required by Tsilhqot'in law.

The principle of acknowledging harms committed and taking responsibility for them is an important principle in the determination of appropriate legal responses or actions. In this case, there was a denial of potential harms when the Province authorized the logging permits as well as a denial of Tsilhqot'in people's authority to govern their territories and protect their lands. One elder said that when a person disrespected another person, he or she would have to give that person "something they owned, such as a saddle, some land, or a horse."

Historically, "even people with little had to make amends through restitution, even giving up their own clothes if that was all they had." Since the Province was found to be in breach of their duty to consult according to Canadian law and, as we will show, according to Tsilhqot'in law, it might be the case that before any further discussions with the Province, acknowledgement of its wrongdoing and even payment of compensation may be in order. This of course would depend on the Tsilhqot'in Nation's goals and strategies, and the possible danger of such compensation being misinterpreted or attributed as acquiescence to the provincial agenda without proper regard to the operation of Tsilhqot'in law. ...

There are four key legal obligations that bind Tsilhqot'in people and that have direct bearing on consultation and consent. There are obligations to protect and help one's family and community; to share resources and knowledge; to learn, respect, and communicate laws; and to show respect for generosity or teachings. We will discuss three of these legal obligations.

First, there is the obligation to learn, respect, and communicate laws wherein Tsilhqot'in people are responsible for learning about and respecting the laws of others, and for communicating their laws to outsiders. One Tsilhqot'in elder said that people were expected to heed Tsilhqot'in laws when entering the territory, as they "were greeted and ... told about the laws, right off at the entrance [of Tsilhqot'in lands]." She said "they were told the laws so they knew how to behave while they were visiting."

Another elder said that "upon entering another's territory, she would probably go talk to a [band] councillor, spokesperson elder, or the chief to explain where she was from and why she was there." She also described how "runners" used to be used to communicate with people from outside the territory." Two other elders explained that "runners were important for communication between communities and outside the nation" and that the first thing to do "when wanting to enter another person's territory was to 'send your runners in.'" Tsilhqot'in people engaged fully with Canadian law—from the initial talks with the Province and through three levels of court that concluded with the SCC's Tsilhqotin decision. This demonstrates an acknowledgement and a respect for Canadian law, even when that law so severely challenged Tsilhqot'in people's authority over their lands. We take this engagement with Canadian law as representing the fulfillment of the Tsilhqot'in legal obligation to learn the law of outsiders who come to their lands.

It is time for the Province of British Columbia and Canada to learn Tsilhqot'in law

There is another legal obligation in Tsilhqot'in law that is important for us to consider here: the obligation to share resources and knowledge when asked for or needed." The interviewees described how this obligation was one of the ways of ensuring the survival of the community. They gave examples illustrating the importance of sharing food and other resources, and of the severe consequences of refusing to live up to this obligation, as in the case of theft." These elders specifically explained how this obligation was an important inclusive element in building internal community cohesion and bringing outsiders in because "you're living together, there's no outsider."

Given the importance of these legal obligations, what becomes clear is that Tsilhqot'in people have practices of inclusivity that form part of their legal traditions. At the trial level, the Tsilhqot'in witnesses described their early history with the first European visitors, and it is evident that they were consciously fulfilling their legal obligations to teach their laws and to share knowledge and resources. And as reasonable and reasoning people, they also expected to have these same legal obligations reciprocated by the European outsiders—and perhaps they were, if only initially and only instrumentally for the purposes of facilitating trade and settlement. The thing is, in our view, ... British Columbia and Canada still have these legal obligations to Tsilhqot'in people on Tsilhqot'in lands according to Tsilhqot'in laws.

The third legal obligation is to show respect for generosity or teachings. The early record demonstrates great patience and generosity extended to the Europeans, as well as teachings about Tsilhqot'in law. What is absent is any continuing or meaningful respect for the generosity and teachings on the part of the Europeans in the interactions with Tsilhqot'in peoples on Tsilhqot'in lands.

It is our opinion that ... [t]oday's legal conceptions of consultation and consent must be founded on and informed by these essential Tsilhqot'in legal obligations, and until they are, British Columbia is in breach of Tsilhqot'in law. Furthermore, there is a correlating legal obligation to show respect to the Tsilhqot'in people for their generosity and teachings, which, from contact through to the trilogy of Canadian court cases, the Tsilhqot'in people have now extended to British Columbia and Canada. ...

... Tsilhqot'in legal traditions provide a rich and comprehensive source of legal principles that guide overall legal processes and decisions. The key propositions in these legal principles are that individual agency is important, that relationships are valued and protected, that teaching and learning are important, that one must not waste resources or knowledge, and that there is and always has been law in Tsilhqot'in society. These legal principles underpin Tsilhqot'in governance and actions from first European contact to the present day, and they must inform the building of any relationship with British Columbia and Canada.

C. SELF-GOVERNMENT AND TREATIES

On August 4, 1998, representatives of the federal and provincial governments and the Nisga'a Tribal Council initialled the Nisga'a Final Agreement in a ceremony in the Nass Valley. The agreement, a comprehensive modern treaty, which came into effect in 2000, not only settled the Nisga'a land claim but also provided for powers of self-government. In terms of its legislative and administrative powers, the Nisga'a government has jurisdiction over a wide range of areas, including culture, language, employment, public works, land use, and marriage. The Nisga'a government also provides health care, child welfare, and education services. Perhaps more important, however, is that the Nisga'a Final Agreement makes provisions for which laws will prevail when a conflict arises between Nisga'a laws and federal and provincial laws.

The preamble to the Nisga'a Final Agreement reads as follows:

WHEREAS the Nisga'a Nation has lived in the Nass Area since time immemorial;

WHEREAS the Nisga'a Nation is an aboriginal people of Canada;

WHEREAS section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 recognizes and affirms the existing aboriginal and treaty rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada, which the Courts have stated include aboriginal title;

WHEREAS the Nisga'a Nation has never entered into a treaty with Canada or British Columbia;

WHEREAS the Nisga'a Nation has sought a just and equitable settlement of the land question since the arrival of the British Crown, including the preparation of the Nisga'a Petition to His Majesty's Privy Council, dated 21 May, 1913, and the conduct of the litigation that led to the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Calder v. the Attorney-General of British Columbia in 1973, and this Agreement is intended to be the just and equitable settlement of the land question;

WHEREAS Canadian courts have stated that the reconciliation between the prior presence of aboriginal peoples and the assertion of sovereignty by the Crown is best achieved through negotiation and agreement, rather than through litigation or conflict;

WHEREAS the Parties intend that this Agreement will result in this reconciliation and establish a new relationship among them;

WHEREAS this Agreement sets out Nisga'a section 35 rights inside and outside of the area that is identified in this Agreement as Nisga'a Lands;

WHEREAS the Parties acknowledge the ongoing importance to the Nisga'a Nation of the Simigat and Sigidimhaanak (hereditary chiefs and matriarchs) continuing to tell their Adawak (oral histories) relating to their Ango'oskw (family hunting, fishing, and gathering territories) in accordance with the Ayuuk (Nisga'a traditional laws and practices);

WHEREAS the Parties intend their relationship to be based on a new approach to mutual recognition and sharing, and to achieve this mutual recognition and sharing by agreeing on rights, rather than by the extinguishment of rights; and

WHEREAS the Parties intend that this Agreement will provide certainty with respect to Nisga'a ownership and use of lands and resources, and the relationship of federal, provincial and Nisga'a laws, within the Nass Area.

Chapter 2 of the Agreement, outlining the general provisions, begins:

This Agreement is a treaty and a land claims agreement within the meaning of sections 25 and 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

Campbell v AG BC/AG Cda & Nisga'a Nation, 2000 BCSC 1123, which dealt with a challenge to the constitutionality of the Nisga'a Final Agreement and is excerpted below, summarizes the Nisga'a governmental powers under the Final Agreement:

[45] The Nisga'a Government has power to make laws in a number of different areas which can be divided generally into two groupings. In the first category, when Nisga'a law conflicts with federal or provincial law, the Nisga'a law will prevail, although in many cases only if it is consistent with comparable standards established by Parliament, the Legislative Assembly, or relevant administrative tribunals.

[46] Generally speaking, the subjects in this category are matters which concern the identity of the Nisga'a people, their education, the preservation of their culture, the use of their land and resources, and the means by which they will make decisions in these areas. As noted, however, some of these areas remain subject to comparable provincial standards. For example, adoption laws must provide for the best interests of the child, just as does the Adoption Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 5. The provision for Nisga'a control of education is subject to various comparable provincial educational standards.

[47] Other jurisdictions of the Nisga'a government in this category have specific matters carved out and reserved to the Crown, or to laws generally applicable in the subject area. For example, the right to regulate the use and development of Nisga'a Lands rests with the Nisga'a, but rights of way held or required by the Crown are subject to special provisions. The right to regulate businesses, professions and trades on Nisga'a lands rests with the Nisga'a, but it is subject to provincial laws concerning accreditation, certification and regulation of the conduct of professions and trades.

[48] In the second classification of jurisdiction, when a Nisga'a law conflicts with federal or provincial law, the federal or provincial law will prevail.

[49] The Treaty permits the Nisga'a to establish police services and a police board. Any regimes established pursuant to these provisions require the approval of the provincial cabinet. If the Attorney General of the province is of the opinion that "effective policing in accordance with standards prevailing elsewhere in British Columbia" is not in place, she or he may provide or reorganize policing on the Nisga'a lands, appointing constables or using the provincial police (the R.C.M.P.) as a police force.

[50] The Treaty also provides that the Nisga'a Lisims Government may decide to establish a Nisga'a Court. But again, if that course is followed, its structure and procedures, and the method of selecting judges, must be approved by the provincial cabinet. Further, an appeal from a final decision of the Nisga'a Court lies to the Supreme Court of British Columbia. The Court section of the Treaty includes a number of references to the requirement that any Nisga'a court system must operate in accordance with generally accepted principles. For example, a Nisga'a Court and its judges must comply with "generally recognized principles in respect of judicial fairness, independence and impartiality."

[51] The Nisga'a Government has no authority to make criminal law (that power remains with Parliament). Importantly, a person accused of any offence for which he or she may be imprisoned under Nisga'a law has the right to elect to be tried in the Provincial Court of British Columbia rather than a Nisga'a Court. Any provincial court proceedings would be subject to rights of appeal to the Supreme Court of British Columbia or the Court of Appeal.

[52] Labour relations law, or what in the Agreement is called industrial relations, is governed by federal and provincial laws. However, the Nisga'a Lisims Government has a right in some instances to make representations concerning the effect of a particular aspect of labour relations law upon Nisga'a culture.

[53] While the Treaty defines the right of the Nisga'a to harvest fish and aquatic plants in Nisga'a fisheries areas, all the fisheries rights of the Nisga'a are expressly subject to measures that are necessary for conservation and to legislation enacted for the purposes of public health or safety. Nisga'a peoples' harvest of fish is subject to limits set by the federal Minister of Fisheries. Any laws made by the Nisga'a government concerning fish or aquatic plants harvested by the Nisga'a are subject to relevant federal or provincial laws.

[54] The Nisga'a government may make laws concerning assets the Nisga'a Nation, a Nisga'a village or Nisga'a corporation may hold off Nisga'a lands, but in the event of a conflict between such laws and federal or provincial laws of general application, the latter prevail.

[55] Similarly, while the Nisga'a may make laws concerning the sale and consumption of alcohol (intoxicants) on Nisga'a lands, they are subject to federal and provincial laws in the area in the event of conflict.

[56] British Columbia retains the right to licence or approve gambling or gaming facilities on Nisga'a lands, but the Agreement provides that the province will not do so except in accordance with terms established by the Nisga'a government. Such terms, however, must not be inconsistent with federal and provincial laws.

Campbell involved a constitutional challenge to the Nisga'a Final Agreement on the basis that it was inconsistent with the division of powers granted to Parliament and the legislative assemblies of the provinces by ss 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867. The position taken by the challengers was that the Agreement was of no force or effect to the extent that it purported to provide the Nisga'a government with legislative jurisdiction or provided that the Nisga'a government could make laws that would prevail over federal and provincial laws. Justice Williamson of the BC Supreme Court ruled against the challenge, finding that the Agreement recognized a right to self-government constitutionally protected under s 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. His summary reasons for the decision at the end of the judgment are excerpted below:

[179] ... I have concluded that after the assertion of sovereignty by the British Crown, and continuing to and after the time of Confederation, although the right of aboriginal people to govern themselves was diminished, it was not extinguished. Any aboriginal right to self-government could be extinguished after Confederation and before 1982 by federal legislation which plainly expressed that intention, or it could be replaced or modified by the negotiation of a treaty. Post-1982, such rights cannot be extinguished, but they may be defined (given content) in a treaty. The Nisga'a Final Agreement does the latter expressly.

[180] I have also concluded that the Constitution Act, 1867 did not distribute all legislative power to the Parliament and the legislatures. Those bodies have exclusive powers in the areas listed in Sections 91 and 92 (subject until 1931 to the Imperial Parliament). But the Constitution Act, 1867 did not purport to, and does not end, what remains of the royal prerogative or aboriginal and treaty rights, including the diminished but not extinguished power of self-government which remained with the Nisga'a people in 1982.

[181] Section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982, then, constitutionally guarantees, among other things, the limited form of self-government which remained with the Nisga'a after the assertion of sovereignty. The Nisga'a Final Agreement and the settlement legislation give that limited right definition and content. Any decision or action which results from the exercise of this now-entrenched treaty right is subject to being infringed upon by Parliament and the legislative assembly. This is because the Supreme Court of Canada has determined that both aboriginal and treaty rights guaranteed by s. 35 may be impaired if such interference can be justified and is consistent with the honour of the Crown.

[182] The Nisga'a Final Agreement, negotiated in full knowledge of the limited effect (a fact accepted by the Nisga'a Nation in these proceedings) of the constitutional promise of s. 35, itself limits the new Nisga'a governments' rights to legislate. In addition, it specifies that in a number of areas, should there be any conflict between Nisga'a laws and federal or provincial laws, federal or provincial laws will prevail.

[183] Thus, the Nisga'a government, subject as it is to both the limitations set out in the treaty itself and to the limited guarantee of s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982, does not have absolute or sovereign powers.

[185] In the result, I find the Nisga'a Final Agreement, and the settlement legislation passed by Parliament and the Legislative Assembly of the Province of British Columbia, establish a treaty as contemplated by Section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. The legislation and the Treaty are constitutionally valid. The application for a declaration that the settlement legislation and the Treaty are in part void and of no effect is dismissed.

In another unsuccessful challenge to the Nisga'a Final Agreement, the BC Court of Appeal upheld a different standard for the existence of Indigenous governance in treaties: see Sga'nisim Sim'augit (Chief Mountain) v Canada (AG), 2013 BCCA 49. It ruled that Canada and the provinces can delegate elements of their constitutional powers to a First Nation through treaty as long as the governments oversee how these powers are used. At the same time, the Court was quick to hold that “[i]t is unnecessary to decide whether some or all of the self-government powers derive from an inherent Aboriginal right” (at para 8). Thus the Sga'nisim case does not address the central question of whether treaties incorporate inherent rights to self-government. For critical commentary, see Joshua Nichols, “Claims of Sovereignty—Burdens of Occupation: William and the Future of Reconciliation” (2015) 48:1 UBC L Rev 221.

As of April 2020, the Government of Canada has entered into 25 self-government agreements across Canada involving 43 Indigenous communities. There are also two education agreements involving 35 Indigenous communities. D. SELF-GOVERNMENT AS A DIRECTLY ENFORCEABLE RIGHT

2001 SCC 33

[In this case, Grand Chief Mitchell, a Mohawk of Akwesasne, claimed an Aboriginal right to cross the border into Canada from the United States without paying customs and excise taxes. His claim was not successful, with the majority concluding that there was insufficient evidence of an ancestral Mohawk practice of trading north of the St Lawrence river to establish the right. The case is included here for two reasons. The first is the explicit recognition by McLachlin CJ that Indigenous customary laws were not extinguished by the assertion of British sovereignty. The second is the discussion, in Binnie J’s minority concurring judgment, of the sovereignty claims entailed by the Aboriginal right, claimed in this case, and his contentious incorporation of the doctrine of “sovereign incompatibility” into s 35.]

McLACHLIN CJ (Gonthier, Iacobucci, Arbour, and LeBel JJ concurring):

A. What Is the Nature of Aboriginal Rights?

[9] Long before Europeans explored and settled North America, aboriginal peoples were occupying and using most of this vast expanse of land in organized, distinctive societies with their own social and political structures. The part of North America we now call Canada was first settled by the French and the British who, from the first days of exploration, claimed sovereignty over the land on behalf of their nations. English law, which ultimately came to govern aboriginal rights, accepted that the aboriginal peoples possessed pre-existing laws and interests, and recognized their continuance in the absence of extinguishment, by cession, conquest, or legislation: see, e.g., the Royal Proclamation of 1763, R.S.C. 1985, App. II, No. 1, and R. v. Sparrow, [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1075, at p. 1103. At the same time, however, the Crown asserted that sovereignty over the land, and ownership of its underlying title, vested in the Crown:

Sparrow, supra. With this assertion arose an obligation to treat aboriginal peoples fairly and honourably, and to protect them from exploitation, a duty characterized as "fiduciary" in Guerin v. The Queen, [1984] 2 S.C.R. 335.

[10] Accordingly, ... aboriginal interests and customary laws were presumed to survive the assertion of [Crown] sovereignty, and were absorbed into the common law as rights, unless (1) they were incompatible with the Crown's assertion of sovereignty, (2) they were surrendered voluntarily via the treaty process, or (3) the government extinguished them: see B. Slattery, "Understanding Aboriginal Rights" (1987), 66 Can. Bar Rev. 727. Barring one of these exceptions, the practices, customs and traditions that defined the various aboriginal societies as distinctive cultures continued as part of the law of Canada

D. Is the Claimed Right Barred from Recognition as Inconsistent with Crown Sovereignty?

[61] The conclusion that the right claimed is not established on the evidence suffices to dispose of this appeal. I add a note, however, on the government's contention that s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 extends constitutional protection only to those aboriginal practices, customs and traditions that are compatible with the historical and modern exercise of Crown sovereignty. Pursuant to this argument, any Mohawk practice of cross-border trade, even if established on the evidence, would be barred from recognition under s. 35(1) as incompatible with the Crown's sovereign interest in regulating its borders.

[62] This argument finds its source in the doctrine of continuity, which governed the absorption of aboriginal laws and customs into the new legal regime upon the assertion of Crown sovereignty over the region. As discussed above, this incorporation of local laws and customs into the common law was subject to an exception for those interests that were inconsistent with the sovereignty of the new regime

[63] This Court has not expressly invoked the doctrine of "sovereign incompatibility" in defining the rights protected under s. 35(1). In the Van der Peet trilogy [R v Van der Peet, [1996] 2 SCR 507, 1996 CanLII 216; R v NTC Smokehouse Ltd., [1996] 2 SCR 672, 1996 CanLII 159; R v Gladstone, [1996] 2 SCR 723, 1996 CanLII 160], this Court identified the aboriginal rights protected under s. 35(1) as those practices, customs and traditions integral to the distinctive cultures of aboriginal societies Subsequent cases affirmed this approach to identifying aboriginal rights falling within the aegis of s. 35(1) ... and have affirmed the doctrines of extinguishment, infringement and justification as the appropriate framework for resolving conflicts between aboriginal rights and competing claims, including claims based on Crown sovereignty.

[64] The Crown now contends that "sovereign incompatibility" is an implicit element of the Van der Peet test ... , or at least a necessary addition. In view of my conclusion that Chief Mitchell ... has not proven his claim to an aboriginal right, I need not consider the merits of this submission. Rather, I would prefer to refrain from comment on the extent, if any, to which colonial laws of sovereign succession are relevant to the definition of aboriginal rights under s. 35(1) until such time as it is necessary for the Court to resolve this issue.

BINNIE J (Major J concurring):

[66] I have read the reasons of the Chief Justice and I concur in the result and with her conclusion that even if Mohawks did occasionally trade goods across the St. Lawrence River with First Nations to the north, this practice was not on the evidence a "defining feature of the Mohawk culture" ... or "vital to the Mohawk's collective identity" ... in pre-contact times. There are, however, some additional considerations that have led me to conclude that the appeal must be allowed.

[67] It has been almost 30 years since this Court emphatically rejected the argument that the mere assertion of sovereignty by the European powers in North America was necessarily incompatible with the survival and continuation of aboriginal rights: Calder v. Attorney-General of British Columbia, [1973] S.C.R. 313. Because not all customs and traditions of aboriginal First Nations are incompatible with Canadian sovereignty, however, does not mean that none of them can be in such conflict. The Chief Justice refrains from addressing the sovereignty issue ... but she holds, correctly in my view, that "any finding of a trading right would also confirm a mobility right" (emphasis added). ...

[70] Counsel for the respondent does not challenge the reality of Canadian sovereignty, but he seeks for the Mohawk people of the Iroquois Confederacy the maximum degree of legal autonomy to which he believes they are entitled because of their long history at Akwesasne and elsewhere in eastern North America. This asserted autonomy, to be sure, does not presently flow from the ancient Iroquois legal order that is said to have created it, but from the Constitution Act, 1982. ... If the respondent's claimed aboriginal right is to prevail, it does so not because of its own inherent strength, but because the Constitution Act, 1982 brings about that result.

[73] In terms of traditional aboriginal law, the issue, as I see it, is whether trading/mobility activities asserted by the respondent not as a Canadian citizen but as an heir of the Mohawk regime that existed prior to the arrival of the Europeans, created a legal right to cross international boundaries under succeeding sovereigns. This aspect of the debate, to be clear, is not at the level of fact about the effectiveness of border controls in the 18th century. (Nor is it about the compatibility of internal aboriginal self-government with Canadian sovereignty.) The issue is at the level of law about the alleged incompatibility between European (now Canadian) sovereignty and mobility rights across non-aboriginal borders said by the trial judge to have been acquired by the Mohawks of Akwesasne by reason of their conduct prior to 1609.

[74] In terms of post-1982 aboriginal law, consideration should be given to whether the international trading/mobility right asserted by the respondent would advance the objective of reconciliation of aboriginal peoples with Canadian sovereignty which, as established by the Van der Peet trilogy, is the purpose that lies at the heart of s. 35(1).

[125] ... [T]he respondent's claim ... is not just about physical movement of people or goods in and about Akwesasne. It is about pushing the envelope of Mohawk autonomy within the Canadian Constitution. It is about the Mohawks' aspiration to live as if the international boundary did not exist. Whatever financial benefit accrues from the ability to move goods across the border without payment of duty is clearly incidental to this larger vision.

[126] It is true that in R. v. Pamajewon, [1996] 2 S.C.R. 821, the Court warned ... against casting the Court's aboriginal rights inquiry "at a level of excessive generality."

Yet when the claim, as here, can only properly be construed as an international trading and mobility right, it has to be addressed at that level.

[127] In the constitutional framework envisaged by the respondent, the claimed aboriginal right is simply a manifestation of the more fundamental relationship between the aboriginal and non-aboriginal people. In the Mohawk tradition this relationship is memorialized by the "two-row" wampum, referred to by the respondent in Exhibit D-13, at pp. 109-110, and in his trial evidence (trans., vol. 2, at pp. 191-92), and described in the Haudenosaunee presentation to the Parliamentary Special Committee on Indian Self-Government in 1983 as follows:

When the Haudenosaunee first came into contact with the European nations, treaties of peace and friendship were made. Each was symbolized by the Gus-Wen-Tah or Two Row Wampum. There is a bed of white wampum which symbolizes the purity of the agreement. There are two rows of purple, and those two rows have the spirit of your ancestors and mine. There are three beads of wampum separating the two rows and they symbolize peace, friendship and respect.

These two rows will symbolize two paths or two vessels, travelling down the same river together. One, a birch bark canoe, will be for the Indian people, their laws, their customs and their ways. The other, a ship, will be for the white people and their laws, their customs and their ways. We shall each travel the river together, side by side, but in our own boat. Neither of us will try to steer the other's vessel.

[128] Thus, in the "two-row" wampum there are two parallel paths. In one path travels the aboriginal canoe. In the other path travels the European ship. The two vessels co-exist but they never touch. Each is the sovereign of its own destiny.

[129] The modern embodiment of the "two-row" wampum concept, modified to reflect some of the realities of a modern state, is the idea of a "merged" or "shared" sovereignty. "Merged sovereignty" asserts that First Nations were not wholly subordinated to non-aboriginal sovereignty but over time became merger partners. The final Report of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, vol. 2 (Restructuring the Relationship (1996)), at p. 214, says that "Aboriginal governments give the constitution [of Canada] its deepest and most resilient roots in the Canadian soil." This updated concept of Crown sovereignty is of importance. Whereas historically the Crown may have been portrayed as an entity across the seas with which aboriginal people could scarcely be expected to identify, this was no longer the case in 1982 when the s. 35(1) reconciliation process was established. The Constitution was patriated and all aspects of our sovereignty became firmly located within our borders. If the principle of "merged sovereignty" articulated by the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples is to have any true meaning, it must include at least the idea that aboriginal and non-aboriginal Canadians together form a sovereign entity with a measure of common purpose and united effort. It is this new entity, as inheritor of the historical attributes of sovereignty, with which existing aboriginal and treaty rights must be reconciled.

[130] The final Report of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, vol. 2, goes on to describe "shared" sovereignty at pp. 240-41 as follows:

Shared sovereignty, in our view, is a hallmark of the Canadian federation and a central feature of the three-cornered relations that link Aboriginal governments, provincial governments and the federal government. These governments are sovereign within their respective spheres and hold their powers by virtue of their constitutional status rather than by delegation. Nevertheless, many of their powers are shared in practice and may be exercised by more than one order of government.

On this view, to return to the nautical metaphor of the "two-row" wampum, "merged" sovereignty is envisaged as a single vessel (or ship of state) composed of the historic elements of wood, iron and canvas. The vessel's components pull together as a harmonious whole, but the wood remains wood, the iron remains iron and the canvas remains canvas. Non-aboriginal leaders, including Sir Wilfrid Laurier, have used similar metaphors. It represents, in a phrase, partnership without assimilation.

[133] In the earlier years of the century the federal government occasionally argued that Parliament's jurisdiction under s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867 ("Indians, and Lands reserved for the Indians") was plenary. Indians were said to be federal people whose lives were wholly subject to federal "regulation." This was rejected by the courts, which ruled that while an aboriginal person could be characterized as an Indian for some purposes including language, culture and the exercise of traditional rights, he or she does not cease thereby to be a resident of a province or territory. For other purposes he or she must be recognized and treated as an ordinary member of Canadian society. ... The constitutional objective is reconciliation not mutual isolation.

[134] The Royal Commission does not explain precisely how "shared sovereignty" is expected to work in practice, although it recognized as a critical issue how "60 to 80 historically based nations in Canada at present, comprising a thousand or so local Aboriginal communities" would "interact with the jurisdictions of the federal and provincial governments" in cases of operational conflict (final report, vol. 2, supra, at pp. 166 and 216). It also recognized the challenge aboriginal self-government poses to the orthodox view that constitutional powers in Canada are wholly and exhaustively distributed between the federal and provincial governments . . . There are significant economic and funding issues. Some aboriginal people who live off reserves, particularly in urban areas, have serious concerns about how self-government would affect them . . . With these difficulties in mind perhaps, the Royal Commission considered it to be "essential that any steps toward self-government be initiated by the aboriginal group in question and "respond to needs identified by its members" (Partners in Confederation: Aboriginal Peoples, Self-Government and the Constitution (1993), at p. 41). It rejected the "one size fits all" approach to First Nations' self-governing institutions in favour of a negotiated treaty model. The objective, succinctly put, is to create sufficient "constitutional space for aboriginal peoples to be aboriginal" . . . The Royal Commission Final Report, vol. 2, states at p. 214 that:

Section 35 does not warrant a claim to unlimited governmental powers or to complete sovereignty . . . As with the federal and provincial governments, Aboriginal governments operate within a sphere of sovereignty defined by the constitution. In short, the Aboriginal right of self-government in section 35(1) involves circumscribed rather than unlimited powers.

[135] It is unnecessary, for present purposes, to come to any conclusion about these assertions. What is significant is that the Royal Commission itself sees aboriginal peoples as full participants with non-aboriginal peoples in a shared Canadian sovereignty. Aboriginal peoples do not stand in opposition to, nor are they subjugated by, Canadian sovereignty. They are part of it.

[136] With this background I return to the point that the respondent does not base his mobility rights in this test case as a Canadian citizen. . .

[137] The respondent . . . asserts a trading and mobility right across the international boundary and he attaches this right to his current citizenship not of Canada but of the Haudenosaunee Confederacy with its capital in Onondaga, New York State.

8. The Legal Basis of the Respondent's Claim

[138] The respondent initially asserted both a treaty right and an aboriginal right but the conceptual distinction between these two sources of entitlement is important. A treaty right is an affirmative promise by the Crown which will be interpreted generously and enforced in a way that upholds the honour of the Crown

[139] The trial court acknowledged that if duty-free provisions had been incorporated into a treaty with the Mohawks, the promise would be enforceable as a s. 35 treaty right. A treaty right is itself an expression of Crown sovereignty.

[140] In the case of aboriginal rights, there is no historical event comparable to the treaty-making process in which the Crown negotiated the right or obligation sought to be enforced. The respondent's claim is rooted in practices which he says long preceded the Mohawks' first contact with Europeans in 1609.

[141] I return to the comment of McLachlin J, dissenting in the result, in Van der Peet, supra, at para. 227 that "[t]he issue of what constitutes an aboriginal right must, in my view, be answered by looking at what the law has historically accepted as fundamental aboriginal rights." There was a presumption under British colonial law that the Crown intended to respect the pre-existing customs of the inhabitants that were not deemed to be unconscionable

[143] Since Calder, supra, the courts have extended recognition beyond pre-existing "rights" to practices, customs or traditions integral to the aboriginal community's distinctive culture (Van der Peet, supra, at para. 53). The aboriginal rights question, as McLachlin J put it, dissenting in the result, in Van der Peet, at para. 248, is traditionally "what laws and customs held sway before superimposition of European laws and customs[?]"

[144] ... [O]ne of several sources of the concept of aboriginal rights ... is traditional British colonial law. Many of the cases decided by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council were concerned with rights of property created under a former regime. In Amudu Tijani v. Southern Nigeria (Secretary), [1921] 2 A.C. 399, at p. 407, it was confirmed that "A mere change in sovereignty is not to be presumed as meant to disturb rights of private owners" (emphasis added). More recently, Lord Denning, speaking for the Privy Council in Oyekan v. Adele, [1957] 2 All E.R. 785, at p. 788, said: "In inquiring ... what rights are recognised, there is one guiding principle. It is this: The courts will assume that the British Crown intends that the rights of property of the inhabitants are to be fully respected" (emphasis added). As with the modern law of aboriginal rights, the law of sovereign succession was intended to reconcile the interests of the local inhabitants across the empire to a change in sovereignty.

[148] I am far from suggesting that the key to s. 35(1) reconciliation is to be found in the legal archives of the British Empire. The root of the respondent's argument nevertheless is that the Mohawks of Akwesasne acquired under the legal regimes of 18th century North America, a positive legal right as a group to continue to come and go across any subsequent international border ... with whatever goods they wished, just as they had in pre-contact times. In other words, Mohawk autonomy in this respect was continued but not as a mere custom or practice. It emerged in the new European-based constitutional order as a legal trading and mobility right. By s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, it became a constitutionally protected right. That is the respondent's argument.

9. The Limitation of "Sovereign Incompatibility"

[149] Care must be taken not to carry forward doctrines of British colonial law into the interpretation of s. 35(1) without careful reflection. ...

[150] Yet the language of s. 35(1) cannot be construed as a wholesale repudiation of the common law. The subject matter of the constitutional provision is "existing" aboriginal and treaty rights and they are said to be "recognized and affirmed" not wholly cut loose from either their legal or historical origins. One of the defining characteristics of sovereign succession ... was the notion of incompatibility with the new sovereignty. Such incompatibility seems to have been accepted, for example, as a limitation on the powers of aboriginal self-government in the 1993 working report of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, Partners in Confederation: Aboriginal Peoples, Self-Government and the Constitution, supra, at p. 23:

... Aboriginal nations did not lose their inherent rights when they entered into a confederal relationship with the Crown. Rather, they retained their ancient constitutions so far as these were not inconsistent with the new relationship. [Emphasis added.]

[151] Prior to Calder, supra, "sovereign incompatibility" was given excessive scope. The assertion of sovereign authority was confused with doctrines of feudal title to deny aboriginal peoples any interest at all in their traditional lands or even in activities related to the use of those lands. To acknowledge that the doctrine of sovereign incompatibility was sometimes given excessive scope in the past is not to deny that it has any scope at all, but it is a doctrine that must be applied with caution.

[152] I take an illustration from the evidence in this case. The trial judge showed that pre-contact the Mohawks, as a military force, moved under their own command through what is now parts of southern Ontario and southern Quebec. The evidence, taken as a whole, suggests that military values were "a defining feature of the Mohawk [or Iroquois] culture"

[153] However, important as they may have been to the Mohawk identity as a people, it could not be said, in my view, that pre-contact warrior activities gave rise under successor regimes to a legal right under s. 35(1) to engage in military adventures on Canadian territory. Canadian sovereign authority has, as one of its inherent characteristics, a monopoly on the lawful use of military force within its territory. I do not accept that the Mohawks could acquire under s. 35(1) a legal right to deploy a military force , even if the warrior tradition was to be considered a defining feature of pre-contact Mohawk society. Section 35(1) should not be interpreted to throw on the Crown the burden of demonstrating subsequent extinguishment by "clear and plain" measures (Gladstone, supra, at para. 31) of a "right" to organize a private army, or a requirement to justify such a limitation after 1982 under the Sparrow standard. This example, remote as it is from the particular claim advanced in this case, usefully illustrates the principled limitation flowing from sovereign incompatibility in the s. 35(1) analysis.

[154] In my opinion, sovereign incompatibility continues to be an element in the s. 35(1) analysis, albeit a limitation that will be sparingly applied. For the most part, the protection of practices, traditions and customs that are distinctive to aboriginal cultures in Canada does not raise legitimate sovereignty issues at the definitional stage.

10. The Alleged Incompatibility Between the Aboriginal Right Disclosed by the Evidence and Canadian Sovereignty

[158] The question is whether the asserted legal right to the autonomous exercise of international trade and mobility was compatible with the new European (now Canadian) sovereignty and the reciprocal loss (or impairment) of Mohawk sovereignty.

[159] ... [A]s stated, we are addressing legal incompatibility as opposed to factual incompatibility. The latter emerged more slowly as assertions of sovereignty gave way to colonisation and progressive occupation of land. ...

[160] Control over the mobility of persons and goods into one country is, and always has been, a fundamental attribute of sovereignty. ... In other words, not only does authority over the border exist as an incident of sovereignty, the state is expected to exercise it in the public interest. The duty cannot be abdicated to the vagaries of an earlier regime whose sovereignty has been eclipsed.

[161] The legal situation is further complicated by the fact ... that the respondent attributes his international trading and mobility right not to his status as a Canadian citizen but as a citizen of the Haudenosaunee (Iroquois Confederacy) based at Onondaga, New York. Border conditions in the modern era are vastly different from those in the 18th century. Nevertheless, as stated, borders existed among nations, including First Nations. They were expressions of sovereign autonomy and then, as now, compelled observance.

[163] ... In my view, therefore, the international trading/mobility right claimed by the respondent as a citizen of the Haudenosaunee (Iroquois) Confederacy is incompatible with the historical attributes of Canadian sovereignty.

[164] The question that then arises is whether this conclusion is at odds with the purpose of s. 35(1), i.e. the reconciliation of the interests of aboriginal peoples with Crown sovereignty? In addressing this question it must be remembered that aboriginal people are themselves part of Canadian sovereignty as discussed above. I agree with Borrows [J Borrows, "Uncertain Citizens: Aboriginal Peoples and the Supreme Court" (2001) 80:1/2 Can Bar Rev 15], at p. 40, that accommodation of aboriginal rights should not be seen as "a zero-sum relationship between minority rights and citizenship; as if every gain in the direction of accommodating diversity comes at the expense of promoting citizenship" (quoting W. Kymlicka and W. Norman, eds., Citizenship in Diverse Societies (2000), at p. 39). On the other hand, the reverse is also true. Affirmation of the sovereign interest of Canadians as a whole, including aboriginal peoples, should not necessarily be seen as a loss of sufficient "constitutional space for aboriginal peoples to be aboriginal" ([Donna Greschner, "Aboriginal Women, the Constitution and Criminal Justice" (1992) 26 UBC L Rev (Special ed on Aboriginal Justice) 338], at p. 342). A finding of distinctiveness is a judgment that to fulfill the purpose of s. 35, a measure of constitutional space is required to accommodate particular activities (traditions, customs or practices) rooted in the aboriginal peoples' prior occupation of the land. In this case, a finding against "distinctiveness" is a conclusion that the respondent's claim does not relate to a "defining feature" that makes Mohawk "culture what it is" (Van der Peet, at paras. 59 and 71 (emphasis in original deleted)); it is a conclusion that to extend constitutional protection to the respondent's claim finds no support in the pre-1982 jurisprudence and would overshoot the purpose of s. 35(1). In terms of sovereign incompatibility, it is a conclusion that the respondent's claim relates to national interests that all of us have in common rather than to distinctive interests that for some purposes differentiate an aboriginal community. In my view, reconciliation of these interests in this particular case favours an affirmation of our collective sovereignty.

11. Implications for Internal Aboriginal Self-Government

[165] In reaching that conclusion, however, I do not wish to be taken as either foreclosing or endorsing any position on the compatibility or incompatibility of internal self-governing institutions of First Nations with Crown sovereignty, either past or present. I point out in this connection that the sovereign incompatibility principle has not prevented the United States (albeit with its very different constitutional framework) from continuing to recognize forms of internal aboriginal self-government which it considers to be expressions of residual aboriginal sovereignty. The concept of a "domestic dependent nation" was introduced by Marshall C.J. in Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, 30 U.S. (5 Pet.) 1 (1831), at p. 17, as follows:

... it may well be doubted whether those tribes which reside within the acknowledged boundaries of the United States can, with strict accuracy, be denominated foreign nations. They may, more correctly, perhaps, be denominated domestic dependent nations.

[166] More recently, in United States v. Wheeler, 435 U.S. 313 (1978), the United States Supreme Court, per Stewart J., described the applicable U.S. doctrine at pp. 322, 323 and 326:

The powers of Indian tribes are, in general, "inherent powers of a limited sovereignty which has never been extinguished" ...

Indian tribes are, of course, no longer "possessed of the full attributes of sovereignty." United States v. Kagama, supra, at 381. Their incorporation within the territory of the United States, and their acceptance of its protection, necessarily divested them of some aspects of the sovereignty which they had previously exercised. By specific treaty provision they yielded up other sovereign powers; by statute, in the exercise of its plenary control, Congress has removed still others.

In sum, Indian tribes still possess those aspects of sovereignty not withdrawn by treaty or statute, or by implication as a necessary result of their dependent status.

The areas in which such implicit divestiture of sovereignty has been held to have occurred are those involving the relations between an Indian tribe and nonmembers of the tribe. Thus, Indian tribes can no longer freely alienate to non-Indians the land they occupy. ... They cannot enter into direct commercial or governmental relations with foreign nations. ... And, as we have recently held, they cannot try nonmembers in tribal courts. ...

These limitations rest on the fact that the dependent status of Indian tribes within our territorial jurisdiction is necessarily inconsistent with their freedom independently to determine their external relations. [Emphasis added.]

[167] The U.S. doctrine of domestic dependent nation differs in material respects from the proposals of our Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples. The concepts of merged sovereignty and shared sovereignty ... are not reflected in the American jurisprudence. Under US law the powers of a tribal government (whatever its theoretical sovereignty) can be overridden by an ordinary law of Congress. Further, there is nothing that I am aware of in the U.S. doctrine that extends the concept of self-government to claims to an independent self-sustaining economic base, as contemplated by the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples (final report, vol. 2, supra, at p. 2). In any event, whatever be the differences and similarities, an international trading and mobility right, which necessarily involves "external relations," would appear not to be included in the attributes of a US-style "domestic dependent nation."

[169] I refer to the U.S. law only to alleviate any concern that addressing aspects of the sovereignty issue in the context of a claim to an international trading and mobility right would prejudice one way or the other a resolution of the much larger and more complex claim of First Nations in Canada to internal self-governing institutions. The United States has lived with internal tribal self-government ... without doctrinal difficulties since Johnson v. M'Intosh, 21 U.S. (8 Wheat.) 543 (1823), was decided almost 170 years ago.

[171] The question under consideration here is ... not about post-1982 extinguishment. It is about the prior question of whether the claimed international trading and mobility right could, as a matter of law, have arisen in the first place.

[172] It was, of course, an expression of sovereignty in 1982 to recognize existing aboriginal rights under s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. However, if the claimed aboriginal right did not survive the transition to non-Mohawk sovereignty, there was nothing in existence in 1982 to which s. 35(1) protection of existing aboriginal rights could attach. It would have been, of course, quite within the sovereign's power to confer specific border privileges by treaty, but the respondent's claim to a treaty right was dismissed.

[173] In my respectful view the claimed aboriginal right never came into existence and it is unnecessary to consider the Crown's argument that whatever aboriginal rights in this respect may have existed were extinguished by border controls enforced by Canada prior to April 17, 1982.

Appeal allowed.

In addition to the doctrine of continuity outlined in Mitchell, the UNDRIP, excerpted below, also contains significant potential to facilitate the direct recognition of Indigenous self-determination.

United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples

Resolution adopted by the General Assembly, GA res 61/295
(2 October 2007)

Article 3

Indigenous peoples have the right to self-determination. By virtue of that right they freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development.

Article 4

Indigenous peoples, in exercising their right to self-determination, have the right to autonomy or self-government in matters relating to their internal and local affairs, as well as ways and means for financing their autonomous functions.

Article 5

Indigenous peoples have the right to maintain and strengthen their distinct political, legal, economic, social and cultural institutions, while retaining their right to participate fully, if they so choose, in the political, economic, social and cultural life of the State.

States shall consult and cooperate in good faith with the indigenous peoples concerned through their own representative institutions in order to obtain their free, prior and informed consent before adopting and implementing legislative or administrative measures that may affect them.

Article 28

1. Indigenous peoples have the right to redress, by means that can include restitution or, when this is not possible, just, fair and equitable compensation, for the lands, territories and resources which they have traditionally owned or otherwise occupied or used, and which have been confiscated, taken, occupied, used or damaged without their free, prior and informed consent.

Truth and Reconciliation Commission, Honouring the Truth, Reconciling for the Future: Summary of the Final Report of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission of Canada

The United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples as a Framework for Reconciliation

Aboriginal peoples in Canada were not alone in the world when it came to being treated harshly by colonial authorities and settler governments. Historical abuses of Aboriginal peoples and the taking of Indigenous lands and resources throughout the world have been the subject of United Nations' attention for many years. On September 13, 2007, after almost twenty-five years of debate and study, the United Nations adopted the Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples. As a declaration, it calls upon member states to adopt and maintain its provisions as a set of "minimum standards for the survival, dignity and well-being of the indigenous peoples of the world."

The Commission concurs with the view of S. James Anaya, UN Special Rapporteur on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, who observed,

It is perhaps best to understand the Declaration and the right of self-determination it affirms as instruments of reconciliation. Properly understood, self-determination is an animating force for efforts toward reconciliation—or, perhaps, more accurately, conciliation—with peoples that have suffered oppression at the hands of others. Self-determination requires confronting and reversing the legacies of empire, discrimination, and cultural suppression and relocation. It does not do so to condone vengefulness or spite for past evils, or to foster divisiveness but rather to build a social and political order based on relations of mutual understanding and respect. That is what the right of self-determination of indigenous peoples, and all other peoples, is about.

Canada, as a member of the United Nations, initially refused to adopt the Declaration. It joined the United States, Australia, and New Zealand in doing so. It is not coincidence that all these nations have a common history as part of the British Empire. The historical treatment of Aboriginal peoples in these other countries has strong parallels to what happened to Aboriginal peoples in Canada. Specifically, Canada objected to the Declaration's provisions dealing with lands, territories and resources; free, prior and informed consent when used as a veto; self-government without recognition of the importance of negotiations; intellectual property; military issues; and the need to achieve an appropriate balance between the rights and obligations of Indigenous peoples, member States and third parties.

Although these four countries eventually endorsed the Declaration, they have all done so conditionally. In 2010, Canada endorsed the Declaration as a "non-legally binding aspirational document" ...

... On September 22, 2014, at the World Conference on Indigenous Peoples (WCIP) in New York, the United Nations General Assembly adopted an action-oriented "Outcome Document" to guide the implementation of the Declaration. Member states from around the world committed, among other things, to the following:

Taking, in consultation and cooperation with indigenous peoples, appropriate measures at the national level, including legislative, policy, and administrative measures, to achieve the ends of the Declaration, and to promote awareness of it among all sectors of society, including members of legislatures, the judiciary and the civil service. ... [para. 7] We commit ourselves to cooperating with indigenous peoples, through their own representative institutions, to develop and implement national action plans, strategies or other measures, where relevant, to achieve the ends of the Declaration [para. 8] ... [and also] encourage the private sector, civil society and academic institutions to take an active role in promoting and protecting the rights of indigenous peoples. [para. 30]

The "Outcome Document" represented an important step forward with regard to implementing the Declaration in practical terms. The development of national action plans, strategies, and other concrete measures will provide the necessary structural and institutional frameworks for ensuring that Indigenous peoples' right to self-determination is realized across the globe.

The TRC considers "reconciliation" to be an ongoing process of establishing and maintaining respectful relationships at all levels of Canadian society. The Commission therefore believes that the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples is the appropriate framework for reconciliation in twenty-first-century Canada. ...

Aboriginal peoples' right to self-determination must be integrated into Canada's constitutional and legal framework and civic institutions, in a manner consistent with the principles, norms, and standards of the Declaration. Aboriginal peoples in Canada have Aboriginal and Treaty rights. They have the right to access and revitalize their own laws and governance systems within their own communities and in their dealings with governments. They have a right to protect and revitalize their cultures, languages, and ways of life. They have the right to reparations for historical harms.

... [I]n our view, it is essential that all levels of government endorse and implement the Declaration. The Commission urges the federal government to ... fully endorse the "Outcome Document." ...

In 2019, the province of British Columbia adopted the Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples Act, SBC 2019, c 44 [hereinafter DRIPA]. DRIPA is a short bill and has ten sections. Section 2 outlines DRIPA's purposes, which are:

- (a) to affirm the application of the Declaration to the laws of British Columbia;
- (b) to contribute to the implementation of the Declaration;
- (c) to support the affirmation of, and develop relationships with, Indigenous governing bodies.

Section 3 states:

In consultation and cooperation with the Indigenous peoples in British Columbia, the government must take all measures necessary to ensure the laws of British Columbia are consistent with the Declaration.

The government is committed to preparing and implementing an Action Plan to implement the Declaration's objectives, along with an Annual Report. Section 6 provides that the "Executive Council, on behalf of the government, may enter into an agreement with an Indigenous governing body." Section 7 allows the government to make agreements with Indigenous governing bodies for the exercise of a statutory power of decision-making jointly by the Indigenous governing body, and the government or another decision-maker, or to acquire the consent of an Indigenous governing body before the exercise of a statutory power of decision.

In 2021, the Canadian Parliament also passed the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples Act, 2021, c 14. The legislation differs from British Columbia's legislation as it does not make provision for agreements nor does it provide for Indigenous governing bodies exercising statutory powers of decision-making. The federal Act also has no provisions for creating "consent regimes" with Indigenous governing bodies which could be activated by the exercise of statutory decision-making powers. While the legislation does require an action plan and annual report regarding the Declaration's implementation, its main clause in s 5 states the "Government of Canada must, in consultation and cooperation with Indigenous peoples, take all measures necessary to ensure that the laws of Canada are consistent with the Declaration."

Professor John Borrows has suggested that this legislation that implements UNDRIP needs to go hand-in-hand with the resurgence of Indigenous law and governance. He writes about these developments in John Borrows, "Foreword" (2021) Special Issue UBC L Rev (forthcoming), as follows:

My view is that the Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples Act is a necessary step in facilitating the recognition of Indigenous law, implementing constitutional rights related to Indigenous peoples, and applying international law principles relative to Indigenous peoples. Such laws are necessary because Canada largely places legislative power, sometimes called positivism, at the heart of political action. The Supreme Court of Canada made this clear when it wrote that "Parliamentary sovereignty mandates that the legislature can make or unmake any law it wishes, within the confines of its constitutional authority" [Mikisew Cree First Nation v Canada (Governor General in Council), 2018 SCC 40 at para 36]. Parliamentary sovereignty is exercised legislatively to set standards which allows courts to hold governments accountable for the principles and processes they have adopted.

At the same time, DRIPA is not necessarily not sufficient because law does not equal legislation when it comes to Indigenous peoples. Indigenous peoples have their own laws. Indigenous sovereignty has legal implications for how the Crown exercises its powers, even if no legislation is present. Constitutionally, if Aboriginal or treaty rights are affected, laws must recognize and affirm their existence. Furthermore, law is something that is interpreted and practiced by citizens as they operationalize, internalize and resist constitutional, legislative and customary law's obligations. Law must be lived, not just legislated, and its effectiveness can only be measured by its effects on people and places it purports to address.

In other spaces I have argued that Indigenous peoples must also take steps to implement UNDRIP in accordance with their own Indigenous legal traditions. In addition to necessary state action, rights embedded within the Declaration will not be realized if Indigenous governments disregard or reject its provisions. Indigenous governments could facilitate the application and enhancement of protections found in the Declaration or they could frustrate them. Law will fail to be meaningful for Indigenous communities and individuals if they cannot exercise the Declaration's following rights and freedoms within their communities, as well as in relation to the state: religion, spiritual beliefs and practices, speech and expression, association, life, liberty and security, property, family togetherness, a right not to be discriminated against by their governments, the privileges and immunities of citizenship, language, education, labour fairness, administrative law (notice, fairness, hearing), health care, gender equality, in accordance with limitations imposed by law and in accordance with international law.

If nation states began to more seriously protect the rights of indigenous individuals, if Indigenous governments did not, this could lead to charges of hypocrisy. We remember that while the Declaration was drafted with the intent of affirming rights as against nation states, it can also be construed as recognizing the human rights of Indigenous individuals in their relations with their own governments. The Preamble reads: "Recognizing and reaffirming that indigenous individuals are entitled without discrimination to all human rights recognized in international law . . ." Article 1 of the Declaration also affirms that Indigenous individuals possess human rights. It proclaims, "Indigenous peoples have the right to the full enjoyment, as a collective or as individuals, of all human rights and fundamental freedoms as recognized in the Charter of the United Nations, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and international human rights law." Thus, the Declaration must be read in ways that affirm Indigenous government's obligations in relation to individuals within their jurisdiction.

In this light UNDRIP's implementation by Canadian governments does not complete its implementation. Agreements with the province or nation state to implement the Declaration, accompanied by action plans and annual reviews (as contemplated in DRIPRA) do not cover a broad enough field. First Nations, Metis and Inuit legal communities must use their own values, norms, ethics and laws to translate UNDRIP into their own self-determining decisions. The Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples (UNDRIP) proclaims that "Indigenous peoples have the right to self-determination. By virtue of that right they freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development." My strongest hope is that UNDRIP gains its greatest meaning through how Indigenous law guide self-determination—not just with provinces or the federal government—but within each legal tradition.

The country and world would be a richer place if rights to: religion, spirituality, speech and expression, association, life, liberty and security, property, family togetherness, the privileges and immunities of citizenship, language, education, labour fairness, administrative law (notice, fairness, hearing), health care, gender equality, and others (in accordance with limitations imposed by law and in accordance with international law) were made more meaningful as they were transformed into laws which were Salish, Haida, Nisga'a, Tsimshian, Secwepmec, Sylix, Cree, Gitksan, Wet'suwet'en, Taltan, Tlingit, Ktunaxa, Nuu-chah-nulth, Kwakwaka'wakw, Nlaka'pamux, Tsilhqot'in, etc.

As Indigenous peoples interpret and apply International law, Indigenous law holds the potential to enrich international law. International law is currently state centric. Its translation and transformation through Indigenous normative commitments could help reshape the field. The jurisgenerative potential of Indigenous International law could also assist in decolonizing state law by giving us new ways of reconceiving rights, relationships and lifeways.

Revitalizing Indigenous Law: Truth, Reconciliation, and Access to Justice

... Many Indigenous people have a deep and abiding distrust of Canada's political and legal systems because of the damage they have caused. They often see Canada's legal system as being an arm of a Canadian governing structure that has been diametrically opposed to their interests. Not only has Canadian law generally not protected Indigenous land rights, resources, and governmental authority, despite court judgments, but it has also allowed, and continues to allow, the removal of Indigenous children through a child-welfare system that cuts them off from their culture. As a result, law has been, and continues to be, a significant obstacle to reconciliation. This is the case despite the recognition that courts have begun to show that justice has historically been denied and that such denial should not continue. Given these circumstances, it should come as no surprise that formal Canadian law and Canada's legal institutions are still viewed with suspicion within many Indigenous communities.

Yet, that is changing. Court decisions since the repatriation of Canada's Constitution in 1982 have given hope to Indigenous people that the recognition and affirmation of their existing Treaty and Aboriginal rights in Section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 may be an important vehicle for change. However, the view of many Indigenous people is that the utilization of the Government of Canada's court is fraught with danger. Indigenous leaders and communities turn to Canada's courts literally because there is no other legal mechanism. When they do so, it is with the knowledge that the courts still are reluctant to recognize their own traditional means of dispute resolution and law.

Reconciliation will be difficult to achieve until Indigenous peoples' own traditions for uncovering truth and enhancing reconciliation are embraced as an essential part of the ongoing process of truth determination, dispute resolution, and reconciliation. ...

As noted, the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples and the UN "Outcome Document" provide a framework and a mechanism to support and improve access to justice for Indigenous peoples in Canada. Under Article 40 of the Declaration, Indigenous peoples have the right to access to and prompt decision through just and fair procedures for the resolution of conflicts and disputes with States or other parties, as well as to effective remedies for all infringements of their individual and collective rights. Such a decision shall give due consideration to the customs, traditions, rules and legal systems of the indigenous peoples concerned and international human rights.

In 2013, the UN Expert Mechanism on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples issued a study, "Access to Justice in the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Indigenous Peoples." It made several key findings that are relevant to Canada. The international study noted that states and Indigenous peoples themselves have a critical role to play in implementing Indigenous peoples' access to justice. Substantive changes are required within the criminal legal system and in relation to Indigenous peoples' rights to their lands, territories, and natural resources; political self-determination; and community well-being. The study made several key findings and recommendations, including the following:

- The right to self-determination is a central right for indigenous peoples from which all other rights flow. In relation to access to justice, self-determination affirms their right to maintain and strengthen indigenous legal institutions, and to apply their own customs and laws.
 - The cultural rights of indigenous peoples include recognition and practice of their justice systems ... as well as recognition of their traditional customs, values and languages by courts and legal procedures.
 - Consistent with indigenous peoples' right to self-determination and self-government, States should recognize and provide support for indigenous peoples' own justice systems and should consult with indigenous peoples on the best means for dialogue and cooperation between indigenous and State systems.
 - States should recognize indigenous peoples' rights to their lands, territories and resources in laws and should harmonize laws in accordance with indigenous peoples' customs on possession and use of lands. Where indigenous peoples have won land rights and other cases in courts, States must implement these decisions. The private sector and government must not collude to deprive indigenous peoples of access to justice.
 - Indigenous peoples should strengthen advocacy for the recognition of their justice systems.
 - Indigenous peoples' justice systems should ensure that indigenous women and children are free from all forms of discrimination and should ensure accessibility to indigenous persons with disabilities.
 - Indigenous peoples should explore the organization and running of their own truth-seeking processes.

In Canada, law must cease to be a tool for the dispossession and dismantling of Aboriginal societies. It must dramatically change if it is going to have any legitimacy within First Nations, Inuit, and Métis communities. Until Canadian law becomes an instrument supporting Aboriginal peoples' empowerment, many Aboriginal people will continue to regard it as a morally and politically malignant force. A commitment to truth and reconciliation demands that Canada's legal system be transformed. It must ensure that Aboriginal peoples have greater ownership of, participation in, and access to its central driving forces. ...

At the same time, First Nations, Inuit, and Métis peoples need greater control of their own regulatory laws and dispute-resolution mechanisms. Aboriginal peoples must be recognized as possessing the responsibility, authority, and capability to address their disagreements by making laws within their communities. This is necessary to facilitating truth and reconciliation within Aboriginal societies.

Law is necessary to protect communities and individuals from the harmful actions of others. When such harm occurs within Aboriginal communities, Indigenous law is needed to censure and correct citizens when they depart from what the community defines as being acceptable. Any failure to recognize First Nations, Inuit, and Métis law would be a failure to affirm that Aboriginal peoples, like all other peoples, need the power of law to effectively deal with the challenges they face.

The Commission believes that the revitalization and application of Indigenous law will benefit First Nations, Inuit, and Métis communities, Aboriginal–Crown relations, and the nation as a whole. For this to happen, Aboriginal peoples must be able to recover, learn, and practise their own, distinct, legal traditions. That is not to say that the development of self-government institutions and laws must occur at the band or village level. In its report, the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples spoke about the development of self-government by Aboriginal nations:

We have concluded that the right of self-government cannot reasonably be exercised by small, separate communities, whether First Nations, Inuit or Métis. It should be exercised by groups of a certain size—groups with a claim to the term “nation.”

The problem is that the historical Aboriginal nations were undermined by disease, relocations and the full array of assimilationist government policies. They were fragmented into bands, reserves and small settlements. Only some operate as collectivities now. They will have to reconstruct themselves as nations.

We endorse the approach recommended by the Royal Commission.

Indigenous law, like so many other aspects of Aboriginal peoples' lives, has been impacted by colonization. At the TRC's Knowledge Keepers Forum in 2014, Mi'kmaq Elder Stephen Augustine spoke about the Mi'kmaq concept for "making things right." He shared a metaphor about an overturned canoe in the river. He said, "We'll make the canoe right and ... keep it in water so it does not bump on rocks or hit the shore. ... [When we tip a canoe] we may lose some of our possessions. ... Eventually we will regain our possessions [but] they will not be the same as the old ones."

When we consider this concept in relation to residential schools, we have repeatedly heard that they caused great and obvious loss. The Mi'kmaq idea for "making things right" implies that sometimes, in certain contexts, things can be made right—but the remedy might not allow us to recapture what was lost. Making things right might involve creating something new as we journey forward. Just as the Canadian legal system has evolved over time, Indigenous law is not frozen in time. Indigenous legal orders adapt with changing circumstances. The development and application of Indigenous law should be regarded as one element of a broader holistic strategy to deal with the residential schools' negative effects.

There are diverse sources of Indigenous law that hold great insight for pursuing reconciliation. In 2012, the TRC partnered with the University of Victoria Faculty of Law's Indigenous Law Clinic, and the Indigenous Bar Association, to develop a national research initiative, the "Accessing Justice and Reconciliation (AJR) Project." Working with seven community partners, the AJR project examined six different legal traditions across the country

The AJR report concluded that many more Aboriginal communities across the country would benefit from recovering and revitalizing their laws. Doing so would enable First Nations, Inuit, and Métis communities to remedy community harms and resolve internal conflicts as well as external conflicts with governments more effectively.

NOTE

The Government of Canada now recognizes the inherent right to self-government and is prepared to negotiate self-government agreements on the basis of its understanding of what the right entails, as described below:

The Government of Canada recognizes the inherent right of self-government as an existing Aboriginal right under s 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. It recognizes, as well, that the inherent right may find expression in treaties, and in the context of the Crown's relationship with treaty First Nations. Recognition of the inherent right is based on the view that the Indigenous peoples of Canada have the right to govern themselves in relation to matters that are internal to their communities and integral to their unique cultures, identities, traditions, languages, and institutions, and with respect to their special relationship to their land and their resources.

The government acknowledges that the inherent right of self-government may be enforceable through the courts and that there are different views about the nature, scope, and content of the inherent right. However, litigation over the inherent right would be lengthy and costly, and it would tend to foster conflict. In any case, the courts are likely to provide general guidance to the parties involved, leaving it to them to work out detailed arrangements.

For these reasons, the government is convinced that litigation should be a last resort. Negotiations among governments and Indigenous peoples are clearly preferable as the most practical and effective way to implement the inherent right of self-government. I. INTRODUCTION

While the discussion of rights in this book is focused on the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (Charter), rights did not suddenly appear in Canada on April 17, 1982. In fact, rights were protected in a range of ways prior to the enactment of the Charter, including by statutes, the common law, and through the operation of federalism. This chapter is designed to introduce you to each of these important antecedents of the Charter, beginning with the idea of the “common law constitution.”

II. THE COMMON LAW CONSTITUTION

The common law has long served as a basis for protecting individual rights. These rights are usually divided into two categories: political rights, which include rights of participation, representation, and voting, and civil rights, which include freedoms of the person, speech, religion, and property.

The rule of law has also emerged as a source of protection of individual rights. The rule of law has different meanings, but at its core are three tenets: that there must be a positive order of laws, that individuals and the state are bound equally by the law, and that civil and political rights are protected by common law courts rather than by a written constitution. It was expressed in its classic form by Albert V Dicey in 1885 in his text Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution.

Albert V Dicey, Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution

(London: Macmillan, 1885) at 167

Two features have at all times since the Norman Conquest characterised the political institutions of England.

The first of these features is the omnipotence or undisputed supremacy throughout the whole country of the central government. This authority of the state or the nation was during the earlier periods of our history represented by the power of the Crown. ... This royal supremacy has now passed into [the] sovereignty of Parliament. ...

The second of these features, which is closely connected with the first, is the rule or supremacy of law. ...

When we say that the supremacy or the rule of law is a characteristic of the English constitution, we generally include under one expression at least three distinct though kindred conceptions.

We mean, in the first place, that no man is punishable or can be lawfully made to suffer in body or goods except for a distinct breach of law established in the ordinary legal manner before the ordinary Courts of the land. In this sense the rule of law is contrasted with every system of government based on the exercise by persons in authority of wide, arbitrary, or discretionary powers of constraint. ...

We mean in the second place, when we speak of the "rule of law" as a characteristic of our country, not only that with us no man is above the law, but (what is a different thing) that here every man, whatever be his rank or condition, is subject to the ordinary law of the realm and amenable to the jurisdiction of the ordinary tribunals.

In England the idea of legal equality, or of the universal subjection of all classes to one law administered by the ordinary Courts, has been pushed to its utmost limit. With us every official, from the Prime Minister down to a constable or a collector of taxes, is under the same responsibility for every act done without legal justification as any other citizen. ...

There remains yet a third and a different sense in which the "rule of law" or the predominance of the legal spirit may be described as a special attribute of English institutions. We may say that the constitution is pervaded by the rule of law on the ground that the general principles of the constitution (as for example the right to personal liberty, or the right of public meeting) are with us the result of judicial decisions determining the rights of private persons in particular cases brought before the Courts; whereas under many foreign constitutions the security (such as it is) given to the rights of individuals results, or appears to result, from the general principles of the constitution.

For Dicey and late 19th-century lawyers generally, individual rights were essentially common law rights—that is, rights that had emerged through decisions in individual cases. Moreover, according to Dicey's third prong of the rule of law, the courts were the means of enforcement of those common law rights.

This common law constitution continues to be a part of our constitutional beliefs, but as a modern lawyer or law student reads Dicey, they may well wonder how common law rights and parliamentary sovereignty can be reconciled. How can rights be protected when they can be taken away by a simple statute?

There are at least two possible answers to this question. First, rights can be understood as a set of ideals that Parliament is constitutionally obligated to respect, even if parliamentary sovereignty precludes enforcement of these rights by courts. Here, the security of rights depends greatly on good faith and effective representation. The question is how effective this form of rights protection is.

A second way of thinking about common law rights is as a set of interpretative presumptions. Sometimes the words of a statute do not have one clear meaning; instead, they may have a range of possible meanings, some of which may intrude on an individual rights and some of which do not. In these situations, the courts will choose the latter, benign interpretation, while acknowledging that rights can be abrogated where the statutory intent to do so is clear. This approach is often expressed by way of presumptions—for example, presumptions about respecting established property interests. In Roncarelli v Duplessis, the case that appears shortly, interpretation is the central issue—did the Alcoholic Liquor Act, RSQ 1941, c.255 give the head of the Quebec Liquor Commission authority to revoke Roncarelli's licence at the behest of Attorney General and Premier Maurice Duplessis for reasons unconnected to the Act's purpose? In reaching the conclusion that it did not give him the authority, Rand J invoked both the rule of law and common law rights.

In reading Roncarelli v Duplessis, it is important to understand the limits, even deficiencies, of common law rights. The right to liberty has often been deployed to benefit those who are most advantaged: to shield established interests from regulation and redistribution, to permit exploitation of individuals by private power, and to protect the prestige and power of courts against encroachment by administrative agencies.

Roncarelli v Duplessis

[1959] SCR 121, 1959 CanLII 50

[Roncarelli brought an action for damages against Duplessis, the Premier of Quebec, for wrongful revocation of a licence to sell liquor. He succeeded at trial; the Quebec Court of Appeal reversed, and Roncarelli's appeal to the Supreme Court was allowed by a majority of six to three.]

RAND J (Judson J concurring):

The material facts from which my conclusion is drawn are these. The appellant was the proprietor of a restaurant in a busy section of Montreal which in 1946 through its transmission to him from his father had been continuously licensed for the sale of liquor for approximately 34 years; he is of good education and repute and the restaurant was of a superior class. On December 4 of that year, while his application for annual renewal was before the Liquor Commission, the existing licence was cancelled and his application for renewal rejected, to which was added a declaration by the respondent that no future licence would ever issue to him. These primary facts took place in the following circumstances.

For some years the appellant had been an adherent of a rather militant Christian religious sect known as the Witnesses of Jehovah. Their ideology condemns the established church institutions and stresses the absolute and exclusive personal relation of the individual to the Deity without human intermediation or intervention.

The first impact of their proselytizing zeal upon the Roman Catholic church and community in Quebec, as might be expected, produced a violent reaction. Meetings were forcibly broken up, property damaged, individuals ordered out of communities, in one case out of the province, and generally, within the cities and towns, bitter controversy aroused. The work of the Witnesses was carried on both by word of mouth and by the distribution of printed matter, the latter including two periodicals known as "The Watch Tower" and "Awake" sold at a small price.

In 1945 the provincial authorities began to take steps to bring an end to what was considered insulting and offensive to ... the Roman Catholic population. Large scale arrests were made of young men and women, by whom the publications mentioned were being held out for sale, under local by-laws requiring a licence for peddling any kind of wares. Altogether almost one thousand of such charges were laid. The penalty involved in Montreal, where most of the arrests took place, was a fine of $40, and as the Witnesses disputed liability, bail was in all cases resorted to.

The appellant, being a person of some means, was accepted by the Recorder's Court as bail without question, and up to November 12, 1946, he had [provided] security in about 380 cases, some of the accused being involved in repeated offences. Up to this time there had been no suggestion of impropriety; the security of the appellant was taken as so satisfactory that at times, to avoid delay when he was absent from the city, recognizances were signed by him in blank and kept ready for completion by the Court officials. The reason for the accumulation of charges was the doubt that they could be sustained in law. Apparently the legal officers of Montreal, acting in concert with those of the Province, had come to an agreement with the attorney for the Witnesses to have a test case proceeded with. Pending that, however, there was no stoppage of the sale of the tracts and this became the annoying circumstance that produced the volume of proceedings.

On or about November 12 it was decided to require bail in cash for Witnesses so arrested and the sum set ranged from $100 to $300. No such bail was furnished by the appellant; his connection with giving security ended with this change of practice; and in the result, all of the charges in relation to which he had become surety were dismissed.

At no time did he take any part in the distribution of the tracts: he was an adherent of the group but nothing more. It was shown that he had leased to another member premises in Sherbrooke which were used as a hall for carrying on religious meetings: but it is unnecessary to do more than mention that fact to reject it as having no bearing on the issues raised. Beyond the giving of bail and being an adherent, the appellant is free from any relation that could be tortured into a badge of character pertinent to his fitness or unfitness to hold a liquor licence.

The mounting resistance that stopped the surety bail sought other means of crushing the propagandist invasion and among the circumstances looked into was the situation of the appellant. Admittedly an adherent, he was enabling these protagonists to be at large to carry on their campaign of publishing what they believed to be the Christian truth as revealed by the Bible; he was also the holder of a liquor licence, a "privilege" granted by the Province, the profits from which, as it was seen by the authorities, he was using to promote the disturbance of settled beliefs and arouse community disaffection generally. Following discussions between the then Mr. Archambault, as the [head] of the Liquor Commission, and the chief [prosecutor] in Montreal, the former, on or about November 21, telephoned to the respondent, advised him of those facts, and queried what should be done. Mr. Duplessis answered that the matter was serious and that the identity of the person furnishing bail and the liquor licensee should be put beyond doubt. A few days later, that identity being established through a private investigator, Mr. Archambault again communicated with the respondent and, as a result of what passed between them, the licence, as of December 4, 1946, was revoked.

In the meantime, about November 25, 1946, a blasting answer had come from the Witnesses. In an issue of one of the periodicals, under the heading "Quebec's Burning Hate," was a searing denunciation of what was alleged to be the savage persecution of Christian believers. Immediately instructions were sent out from the department of the Attorney-General ordering the confiscation of the issue and proceedings were taken against one Boucher charging him with publication of a seditious libel.

It is then wholly as a private citizen, an adherent of a religious group, holding a liquor licence and furnishing bail to arrested persons for no other purpose than to enable them to be released from detention pending the determination of the charges against them, and with no other relevant considerations to be taken into account, that he is involved in the issues of this controversy.

The complementary state of things is equally free from doubt. From the evidence of Mr. Duplessis and Mr. Archambault alone, it appears that the action taken by the latter as the general manager and sole member of the Commission was dictated by Mr. Duplessis as Attorney-General and Prime Minister of the province; that that step was taken as a means of bringing to a halt the activities of the Witnesses, to punish the appellant for the part he had played not only by revoking the existing licence but in declaring him barred from one "forever," and to warn others that they similarly would be stripped of provincial "privileges" if they persisted in any activity directly or indirectly related to the Witnesses and to the objectionable campaign. The respondent felt that action to be his duty, something which his conscience demanded of him; and as representing the provincial government his decision became automatically that of Mr. Archambault and the Commission. ...

In these circumstances, when the de facto power of the Executive over its appointees at will to such a statutory public function is exercised deliberately and intentionally to destroy the vital business interests of a citizen, is there legal redress by him against the person so acting? ...

[An account of the legislation about liquor follows. Briefly, it created a commission, which had power to grant licences and to revoke them "at its discretion."]

The provisions of the statute, which may be supplemented by detailed regulations, furnish a code for the complete administration of the sale and distribution of alcoholic liquors directed by the Commission as a public service, for all legitimate purposes of the populace. It recognizes the association of wines and liquors as embellishments of food and its ritual and as an interest of the public. As put in Macbeth, the "sauce to meat is ceremony," and so we have restaurants, cafés, hotels and other places of serving food, specifically provided for in that association.

At the same time the issue of permits has a complementary interest in those so catering to the public. The continuance of the permit over the years, as in this case, not only recognizes its virtual necessity to a superior class restaurant but also its identification with the business carried on. The provisions for assignment of the permit ... were exemplified in the continuity of the business here. As its exercise continues, the economic life of the holder becomes progressively more deeply implicated with the privilege while at the same time his vocation becomes correspondingly dependent on it.

The field of licensed occupations and businesses of this nature is steadily becoming of greater concern to citizens generally. It is a matter of vital importance that a public administration that can refuse to allow a person to enter or continue a calling which, in the absence of regulation, would be free and legitimate, should be conducted with complete impartiality and integrity; and that the grounds for refusing or cancelling a permit should unquestionably be such and such only as are incompatible with the purposes envisaged by the statute: the duty of a commission is to serve those purposes and those only. A decision to deny or cancel such a privilege lies within the "discretion" of the Commission; but that means that decision is to be based upon a weighing of considerations pertinent to the object of the administration.

In public regulation of this sort there is no such thing as absolute and untrammeled "discretion," that is that action can be taken on any ground or for any reason that can be suggested to the mind of the administrator; no legislative Act can, without express language, be taken to contemplate an unlimited arbitrary power exercisable for any purpose, however capricious or irrelevant, regardless of the nature or purpose of the statute. Fraud and corruption in the Commission may not be mentioned in such statutes but they are always implied as exceptions. "Discretion" necessarily implies good faith in discharging public duty; there is always a perspective within which a statute is intended to operate; and any clear departure from its lines or objects is just as objectionable as fraud or corruption. Could an applicant be refused a permit because he had been born in another province, or because of the colour of his hair? The ordinary language of the legislature cannot be so distorted.

To deny or revoke a permit because a citizen exercises an unchallengeable right totally irrelevant to the sale of liquor in a restaurant is equally beyond the scope of the discretion conferred. There was here not only revocation of the existing permit but a declaration of a future, definitive disqualification of the appellant to obtain one: it was to be "forever." This purports to divest his citizenship status of its incident of membership in the class of those of the public to whom such a privilege could be extended. Under the statutory language here, that is not competent to the Commission and a fortiori to the government or the respondent There is here an administrative tribunal which, in certain respects, is to act in a judicial manner; ... what could be more malicious than to punish this licensee for having done what he had an absolute right to do in a matter utterly irrelevant to the Liquor Act? Malice in the proper sense is simply acting for a reason and purpose knowingly foreign to the administration, to which was added here the element of intentional punishment by what was virtually vocation outlawry.

It may be difficult if not impossible in cases generally to demonstrate a breach of this public duty in the illegal purpose served; there may be no means, even if proceedings against the Commission were permitted by the Attorney-General, as here they were refused, of compelling the Commission to justify a refusal or revocation or to give reasons for its action; on these questions I make no observation; but in the case before us that difficulty is not present: the reasons are openly avowed.

The act of the respondent through the instrumentality of the Commission brought about a breach of an implied public statutory duty toward the appellant; it was a gross abuse of legal power expressly intended to punish him for an act wholly irrelevant to the statute, a punishment which inflicted on him, as it was intended to do, the destruction of his economic life as a restaurant keeper within the province. Whatever may be the immunity of the Commission or its member from an action for damages, there is none in the respondent. He was under no duty in relation to the appellant and his act was an intrusion upon the functions of a statutory body. The injury done by him was a fault engaging liability within the principles of the underlying public law of Quebec. That, in the presence of expanding administrative regulation of economic activities, such a step and its consequences are to be suffered by the victim without recourse or remedy, that an administration according to law is to be superseded by action dictated by and according to the arbitrary likes, dislikes and irrelevant purposes of public officers acting beyond their duty, would signalize the beginning of disintegration of the rule of law as a fundamental postulate of our constitutional structure.

The damages suffered involved the vocation of the appellant within the province. Any attempt at a precise computation or estimate must assume probabilities in an area of uncertainty and risk. The situation is one which the Court should approach as a jury would, in a view of its broad features; and in the best consideration I can give to them, the damages should be fixed at the sum of $25,000 plus that allowed by the trial court.

I would therefore allow the appeals, set aside the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench and restore the judgment at trial modified by increasing the damages to the sum of $33,123.53.

[Justice Martland, with whom Kerwin CJ and Locke J concurred, and Abbot J gave judgments allowing the appeal for reasons similar to those of Rand J. Both Taschereau J and Fauteux J dissented, on the ground that the notice required by the Code of the Civil Procedure, CQLR c C 25 was not given. Justice Cartwright, dissenting, held that because of the extensive discretion given to the Commission, the courts could not inquire into the reasons for revocation.]

Appeal allowed.

Writing on the 50th anniversary of Roncarelli v Duplessis, Mark Walters explained that [Justice Rand's] reasons in Roncarelli were an integral part of a larger contribution to a common law discourse on constitutionalism that had been unfolding in Canada during the previous decade. Roncarelli was seen at the time as part of a package of cases that, as Bora Laskin observed, affirmed a "judicial Bill of Rights" or the potential for a "basically common law ... protection of civil liberties." In fact, Roncarelli was the last case in this chapter of Rand's narrative: Rand would soon retire from the bench, and within just a few years it would become apparent that a distinct moment in Canadian constitutional history had passed. By the mid-1970s, there was already a sense of "[n]ostalgia" and even "reverence" for the cases from Roncarelli's time.

See Mark D Walters, "Legality as Reason: Dicey, Rand, and the Rule of Law" (2010) 55:3 McGill LJ 563 at 575-76 (footnotes omitted).

We explore another case from this period, Switzman v Elbling, [1957] SCR 285, 1957 CanLII 2 in Section III.B, "The Implied Bill of Rights," below.

III. RIGHTS AND FEDERALISM

Another antecedent of the Charter lies in the distinctively Canadian tangle of rights and federalism, and in the ways that rights are protected (or not protected) in both the structure of federalism itself and in division of powers cases.

Structurally, federalism provides one way of protecting rights by separating groups that might otherwise clash if combined in the same state. A group that shares a culture or tradition may also share understandings of rights and the kinds of limitations on rights that are appropriate, and therefore resolve differences about rights through public discourse.

Recall from the readings in Chapter 3, From Contact to Confederation, that one of the purposes of Confederation was to avoid conflict between the English-speaking Protestants in Ontario and the French-speaking Roman Catholics in Quebec. Under the Constitution Act, 1867, each was given substantial power to govern its affairs in its own province, especially by virtue of ss 92(13) and 92(16), and in s 93, which gave the power to each province "exclusively" to legislate "in relation to education." Yet in each province, a discrete minority feared oppression on the basis of language and religion. At Confederation and later, much of the fear centred on schools. Section 93 included two limitations designed to protect denominational, dissentient and separate schools. These limitations are complex and overlapping, but their general nature can be suggested in these two propositions: (1) provincial legislation could not prejudicially affect religious schools established before Confederation, and (2) an appeal could be made to the federal Cabinet against legislation prejudicially affecting schools established after Confederation. Similar, but not identical, limitations were imposed when other provinces joined Canada. Some of the issues relating to s 93 and minority schools are discussed in Chapter 4, The Late Nineteenth Century: The Courts Set an Initial Course, and Chapter 19, Freedom of Religion.

In the next two sections, we consider how rights and federalism intersect in division of powers cases. As you read these, consider the Supreme Court of Canada's statement in the Reference re Secession of Quebec, [1998] 2 SCR 217, 1998 CanLII 793 at para 81 that "[a]lthough Canada's record of upholding the rights of minorities is not a spotless one, that goal is one towards which Canadians have been striving since Confederation, and the process has not been without successes." Do you agree with this statement?

A. FEDERALISM AND RACE

This section includes notes and cases from the long history of racial discrimination against Chinese and Japanese people in Canada. The Chinese began to come to Canada in the 1850s, usually arriving from the Western United States as part of a northward shift in the search for gold. During the next decade, immigration from China itself began, and the Japanese began to arrive in the 1880s. From the 1870s onward, the numbers of both groups were significant, although during the 19th century and well into the 20th, they settled almost exclusively in the West, and mainly in British Columbia. At first, most were males who worked in construction (especially of the transcontinental railway), mines, fishing, agriculture, and in domestic establishments.

From the 1870s until well into the 20th century, Chinese and Japanese immigrants were targets of discriminatory legislation, most of it enacted by the Western provinces, especially British Columbia. The legislation used a wide range of techniques: restricting immigration—for example, by prohibitions, taxes, and language tests; imposing taxes—for example, head taxes; denying the franchise and restricting eligibility for public offices; and limiting economic competition by imposing discriminatory licence requirements on businesses and prohibitions against employment.

The nature of this discrimination is described in the following passage about the 1890s from Patricia E Roy, A White Man's Province (Vancouver: University of British Columbia Press, 1989) at 65–66 (footnotes omitted):

During much of the decade Asian immigration was not a major issue; the restriction of Asian labour already in the province, however, remained a lively subject. The Chinese head tax and sometimes unfavourable economic conditions contributed to a decline in the Chinese population; Japanese immigrants were not yet conspicuous except along the lower Fraser River. Occasionally, dramatic outbursts of opposition occurred. When Chinese were hired to clear land in Vancouver, a riot ensued; when Japanese fishermen helped break a strike, white fishermen pressed for laws to keep the Japanese out of the fisheries; when explosions killed 216 white and Chinese coal miners, the white miners claimed Chinese were a danger and pressed for their removal from the mines.

Most agitation against Asian competition took place in the political arena. The question of restricting Asian competition was complicated by a fundamental division within British Columbia between capital and labour, that is, in this context, between those who believed "cheap" labour was essential for the development of the province and those who regarded "cheap" labour as a threat to their livelihoods. The presence of high-profile representatives of both camps in the legislature exacerbated the conflict. The dichotomy was especially clear in coal-mining and salmon-canning, industries in which Chinese and Japanese were extensively employed. The contest was also evident in the perennial discussion of whether or not jobs created by new industries, especially railways and mines, should be reserved for men of "our own race" . . . Nevertheless, the lines . . . were not always firmly drawn. On occasion, even sinophobes would set aside principles if they wanted a cheap labour supply quickly for a particular project. References to preserving British Columbia for "our own race" seem not so much to have reflected racist ideas as they did an attempt to broaden support for particular economic interests. Political expediency also influenced legislation. The legislature was more likely to pass anti-Asian measures just before an election than at any other time.

Union Colliery Co v Bryden

[1889] UKPC 58, [1899] AC 580 (PC)

[The tensions described by Roy in the preceding passage became intense in the early 1880s. Proposals were made in the BC legislature to exclude Chinese workers from mines, on the pretext that being unable to speak English was dangerous, especially below ground. In 1890, s 4 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act was amended in response to this pressure. The prohibition proved to be difficult to enforce; its constitutionality was questioned; and proposals were made throughout the 1890s to repeal it. Late in the decade, a shareholder of Union Colliery brought an action for a declaration that the mine was violating the prohibition, probably hoping that the prohibition would be declared ultra vires. The company appealed to the Privy Council from the BC Court of Appeal.]

LORD WATSON:

[T]he question raised directly concerns the legislative authority of the legislature of British Columbia, which depends upon the construction of ss. 91 and 92 of the British North America Act, 1867. ... In assigning legislative power to the one or the other of these parliaments, it is not made a statutory condition that the exercise of such power shall be, in the opinion of a court of law, discreet. In so far as they possess legislative jurisdiction, the discretion committed to the parliaments, whether of the Dominion or of the provinces, is unfettered. It is the proper function of a court of law to determine what are the limits of the jurisdiction committed to them; but, when that point has been settled, courts of law have no right whatever to inquire whether their jurisdiction has been exercised wisely or not.

There can be no doubt that, if s. 92 of the Act of 1867 had stood alone ..., the provincial legislature of British Columbia would have had ample jurisdiction to enact s. 4 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act. The subject-matter of that enactment would clearly have been included in s. 92(10), which extends to provincial undertakings such as the coal mines of the appellant company. It would also have been included in s. 92(13), which embraces "Property and Civil Rights in the Province."

But s. 91(25) extends the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada to "naturalization and aliens." Section 91 concludes with a proviso to the effect that "any matter coming within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in this section shall not be deemed to come within the class of matters of a local or private nature comprised in the enumeration of the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces."

Section 4 of the Provincial Act prohibits Chinamen who are of full age from employment in underground coal workings. Every alien when naturalized in Canada becomes, ipso facto, a Canadian subject of the Queen; and his children are not aliens, requiring to be naturalized, but are natural-born Canadians. It can hardly have been intended to give the Dominion Parliament the exclusive right to legislate for the latter class of persons resident in Canada; but s. 91(25) might possibly be construed as conferring that power in the case of naturalized aliens after naturalization. The subject of "naturalization" seems prima facie to include the power of enacting what shall be the consequences of naturalization, or, in other words, what shall be the rights and privileges pertaining to residents in Canada after they have been naturalized. It does not appear to their Lordships to be necessary, in the present case, to consider the precise meaning which the term "naturalization" was intended to bear, as it occurs in s. 91(25). But it seems clear that the expression "aliens" occurring in that clause refers to, and, at least includes, all aliens who have not yet been naturalized; and the words "no Chinaman," as they are used in s. 4 of the Provincial Act, were probably meant to denote, and they certainly include, every adult Chinaman who has not been naturalized. . . .

The provisions [which have been] affirmed by the Courts below are capable of being viewed in two different aspects They may be regarded as merely establishing a regulation applicable to the working of underground coal mines; and, if [so], it would be difficult to dispute that they were within the competency of the provincial legislature But the leading feature of the enactments consists in this—that they have, and can have, no application except to Chinamen who are aliens or naturalized subjects, and that they establish . . . that these aliens or naturalized subjects shall not work . . . in underground coal mines

Their Lordships see no reason to doubt that, by virtue of s. 91(25), the legislature of the Dominion is invested with exclusive authority in all matters which directly concern . . . the class of Chinamen who are resident in the provinces of Canada. They are also of opinion that the whole pith and substance of . . . s. 4 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act . . . consists in establishing a statutory prohibition which affects aliens or naturalized subjects, and therefore trench upon the exclusive authority of the Parliament of Canada. . . .

Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise Her Majesty to reverse the judgment appealed from; to find and declare that the provisions of s. 4 of the British Columbia Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1890, which are now embodied in chapter 138 of the Revised Statutes of British Columbia, 1897, were, in so far as they relate to Chinamen, ultra vires of the provincial legislature, and therefore illegal.

Appeal allowed.

Cunningham v Tomey Homma

[1902] UKPC 60, [1903] AC 151 (PC)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (LORD HALSBURY):

In this case a naturalized Japanese claims to be placed upon the register of voters for the electoral district of Vancouver City, and the objection which is made to his claim is that by the electoral law of the province it is enacted that no Japanese, whether naturalized or not, shall have his name placed on the register of voters or shall be entitled to vote. Application was made to the proper officer to enter the applicant's name on the register, but he refused to do so upon the ground that the enactment in question prohibited its being done. This refusal was overruled by the Chief Justice sitting in the county court, and the appeal from his decision to the Supreme Court of British Columbia was disallowed. The present appeal is from the decision of the Supreme Court.

There is no doubt that, if it is within the capacity of the province to enact the electoral law, the claimant is [dis]qualified . . . ; but it is contended that ss. 91 and 92 of the British North America Act have deprived the province of the power of making any such provision It is maintained that s. 91(25), enacts that the whole subject of naturalization is reserved to the exclusive jurisdiction of the Dominion, while the Naturalization Act of Canada enacts that a naturalized alien shall within Canada be entitled to all political and other rights, powers, and privileges to which a natural-born British subject is entitled in Canada. To this it is replied that, by s. 92(1), the constitution of the province and any amendment of it are placed under the exclusive control of the provincial legislature. The question which their Lordships have to determine is which of these two views is the right one . . . [T]he policy or impolicy of such an enactment . . . is not a topic which their Lordships are entitled to consider.

The first observation which arises is that the enactment, supposed to be ultra vires . . . upon the ground of its dealing with alienage and naturalization, has not necessarily anything to do with either. A child of Japanese parentage born in Vancouver City is a natural-born subject of the King, and would be equally excluded from the possession of the franchise. . . .

In the history of this country the right to the franchise has been granted and withheld on a great number of grounds, conspicuously upon grounds of religious faith, yet no one has ever suggested that a person excluded from the franchise was not under allegiance to the Sovereign.

Could it be suggested that the province of British Columbia could not exclude an alien from the franchise in that province? Yet, if the mere mention of alienage in the enactment could make the law ultra vires, such a construction of s. 91(25) would involve that absurdity. The truth is that the language of that section does not purport to deal with the consequences of either alienage or naturalization. It undoubtedly reserves these subjects for the exclusive jurisdiction of the Dominion—that is to say, it is for the Dominion to determine what shall constitute either the one or the other, but the question as to what consequences shall follow from either is not touched. The right of protection and the obligations of allegiance are necessarily involved in the nationality conferred by naturalization; but the privileges attached to it, where these depend upon residence, are quite independent of nationality.

This, indeed, seems to have been the opinion of the learned judges below; but they were under the impression that they were precluded from acting on their own judgment by the decision of this Board in the case of Union Colliery Co. v. Bryden, [1899] AC 580 (PC). That case depended upon totally different grounds. This Board, dealing with the particular facts of that case, came to the conclusion that the regulations there impeached were not really aimed at the regulation of coal mines at all, but were in truth devised to deprive the Chinese, naturalized or not, of the ordinary rights of the inhabitants of British Columbia and, in effect, to prohibit their earning their living in that province. It is obvious that such a decision can have no relation to the question whether any naturalized person has an inherent right to the suffrage within the province in which he resides.

For these reasons their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that the order of the Chief Justice in the country court and the order of the Supreme Court ought to be reversed.

Appeal allowed.

Bruce Ryder, "Racism and the Constitution: British Columbia Anti-Asian Legislation, 1872-1923"

(1990) [unpublished] (footnotes omitted)

Beginning with the Privy Council's decision in Cunningham v. Tomey Homma, a revisionist understanding of the Bryden case emerged that removed any constitutional challenge to the racial status quo. The Privy Council in Tomey Homma abandoned the view expressed by Lord Watson in Bryden that s. 91(25) gave the Dominion government jurisdiction over all of the consequences of either alien or naturalized status. Rather, the Privy Council in Tomey Homma stated that s. 91(25) gave the Dominion jurisdiction only over the "ordinary rights" of the inhabitants of a province to reside and earn a living in the province. Post-Bryden, s. 91(25) was interpreted as prohibiting the provinces from passing laws that were intended to deprive a racial group of the right to reside and take up employment in wage labour in the province. Otherwise, provincial legislation imposing racial disabilities did not interfere with exclusive federal jurisdiction over aliens and naturalization. In this way the courts were able to follow Lord Watson's fusion of race with the s. 91(25) categories of federal jurisdiction while removing any potential that the Bryden principle had to disrupt the racial status quo.

This peculiar refashioning of judicial interpretation of s. 91(25) can be understood only in light of the network of racist assumptions and beliefs that sustained and justified a social order premised on racial hierarchy. Provincial laws imposing racial disabilities were held to be valid when they were believed to rest on accurate assumptions about racial difference. When it came to the right to reside and work in a province, provincial legislative disabilities were ultra vires because Chinese and Japanese workers were no different than European workers. Drake J, in dismissing a charge against a mine for employing Chinese underground, stated that a provincial legislature does not have the power "to exclude a large number of persons from earning a living in the manner they were brought up to do." (R v. Priest, (1904) 10 BCR 436, 437.) However, when it came to other rights, for example, rights as voters or employers rather than as labourers, racial differences provided a bona fide provincial legislative purpose that justified the imposition of disabilities on Chinese and Japanese by the provincial legislature. The acceptance of a racial difference grounded provincial laws in a provincial head of power, and removed the objection that the provincial law was in pith and substance imposing a disability on a racial group. ...

In this way, the post-Bryden jurisprudential accommodation used racial similarity and difference to ratify a social order premised on racial hierarchy.

In the 1870s and 1880s, before the Privy Council imposed its authority in Bryden and Cunningham, judges in British Columbia struck down some of the discriminatory legislation, openly protesting against the attitudes it expressed. These cases are discussed in John PS McLaren, "The Early British Columbia Supreme Court and the 'Chinese Question': Echoes of the Rule of Law" (1991) 20 Man LJ 107. For a more in-depth discussion of this historical period, see Bruce Ryder, "Racism and the Constitution: The Constitutional Fate of British Columbia Anti-Asian Immigration Legislation, 1884-1909" (1991) 29 Osgoode Hall LJ 619.

R v Quong Wing

[In 1912, Saskatchewan enacted the Female Employment Act, which, in its entirety, read:

1. No person shall employ in any capacity any white woman or girl or permit any white woman or girl to reside or lodge in or to work in or, save as a bona fide customer in a public apartment thereof only, to frequent any restaurant, laundry or other place of business or amusement owned, kept or managed by any Japanese, Chinaman or other Oriental person.
2. Any employer guilty of any contravention or violation of this Act shall upon summary conviction be liable to a penalty not exceeding $100 and in default of payment to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two months.

The term "Chinaman" was not defined. The Dominion's Naturalization Act, RSC 1906, c 77, s 24, which was crucial to Idington J's dissent, provided:

An alien to whom a certificate of naturalization is granted shall, within Canada, be entitled to all political and other rights, powers and privileges, and be subject to all obligations, to which a natural-born British subject is entitled or subject within Canada.

Quong Wing owned a restaurant and employed two white women as servers. When he was charged under the Act, he argued that the prohibition was ultra vires. He was convicted and appealed to the Supreme Court.]

DAVIES J:

The question on this appeal is not one as to the policy or justice of the Act in question, but solely as to the power of the provincial legislature to pass it. There is no doubt that, as enacted, it seriously affects the civil rights of the Chinamen in Saskatchewan . . . If the language of Lord Watson, in ... Union Colliery Company of British Columbia v. Bryden, [1899] A.C. 580, was to be accepted as [correct] . . . , I would feel some difficulty in upholding the legislation now under review. . . .

If the "exclusive authority on all matters which directly concern the rights, privileges and disabilities of the class of Chinamen who are resident in the provinces of Canada" is vested in the Dominion Parliament . . . , it would, to my mind, afford a strong argument that the legislation now in question should be held ultra vires.

But in the later case of Cunningham v. Tomey Homma, [1903] A.C. 151, the Judicial Committee modified the views of the construction of s. 91(25) stated in the Union Colliery decision. . . .

Reading the Union Colliery case, therefore, . . . and accepting their Lordships' interpretation of s. 91(25) that "its language does not purport to deal with the consequences of either alienage or naturalization," and that, while it exclusively reserves these subjects to the jurisdiction of the Dominion in so far as to determine what shall constitute either alienage or naturalization, . . . it does not touch the question of what consequences shall follow from either, I am relieved from the difficulty I would otherwise feel.

The legislation under review does not, in this view, trespass upon the exclusive power of the Dominion legislature. It does deal with the subject-matter of "property and civil rights" within the province, exclusively assigned to the provincial legislatures, and so dealing cannot be held ultra vires, however harshly it may bear upon Chinamen There is no inherent right in any class of the community to employ women and children which the legislature may not modify or take away altogether. There is nothing in the British North America Act which says that such legislation may not be class legislation. Once it is decided that the subject-matter of the employment of white women is within the exclusive powers of the provincial legislature and does not infringe upon any of the enumerated subject-matters assigned to the Dominion, then such provincial powers are plenary.

What objects or motives may have controlled or induced the passage of the legislation in question I do not know. Once I find its subject-matter is not within the powers of the Dominion Parliament and is within that of the provincial legislature, I cannot inquire into its policy or justice or into the motives which prompted its passage.

But, in the present case, I have no reason to conclude that the legislation is not such as may be defended upon the highest grounds.

The regulations impeached in the Union Colliery case . . . were, as stated by the Judicial Committee, in the later case of Tomey Homma [at p. 157], not really aimed at the regulation of coal mines at all, but were in truth devised to deprive the Chinese, naturalized or not, of the ordinary rights of the inhabitants of British Columbia and, in effect, to prohibit their continued residence in that province, since it prohibited their earning their living in that province.

I think the pith and substance of the legislation now before us is entirely different. Its object and purpose is the protection of white women and girls; and the prohibition of their employment or residence, or lodging, or working, etc., in any place of business or amusement owned, kept or managed by any Chinaman is for the purpose of ensuring that protection. Such legislation does not, in my judgment, come within the class of legislation or regulation which the Judicial Committee held ultra vires ... [in] The Union Collieries v. Bryden

The right to employ white women in any capacity ... is clearly within the powers of the provincial legislatures. The right to guarantee and ensure their protection from a moral standpoint is, in my opinion, within such provincial powers and, if the legislation is bona fide for that purpose, it will be upheld even though it may operate prejudicially to one class or race of people.

There is no doubt in my mind that the prohibition is a racial one It extends and was intended to extend to all Chinamen as such, naturalized or aliens. Questions which might arise in cases of mixed blood do not arise here.

The Chinaman prosecuted in this was found to have been born in China and of Chinese parents and, although, at the date of the offence charged, he had become a naturalized British subject, and had changed his political allegiance, he had not ceased to be a "Chinaman" within the meaning of that word as used in the statute. This would accord with the interpretation of the word "Chinaman" adopted by the judicial committee in the case of The Union Colliery Company v. Bryden

The prohibition against the employment of white women was not aimed at alien Chinamen simply or at Chinamen having any political affiliation. It was against "any Chinaman" whether owing allegiance to the rulers of the Chinese Empire, or the United States Republic, or the British Crown. In other words, it was not aimed at any class of Chinamen, or at the political status of Chinamen, but at Chinamen as men of a particular race or blood, and whether aliens or naturalized.

For these reasons I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

IDINGTON J (dissenting):

It may well be argued that the highly prized gifts of equal freedom and equal opportunity before the law, are so characteristic of the tendency of all British modes of thinking and acting in relation thereto, that they are not to be impaired by the whims of a legislature; and that equality taken away unless and until forfeited for causes which civilized men recognize as valid.

For example, is it competent for a legislature to create a system of slavery and, above all, such a system as applied to naturalized British subjects? This legislation is but a piece of the product of the mode of thought that begot and maintained slavery; not so long ago fiercely claimed to be a laudable system of governing those incapable of governing themselves.

Again, it may also be well argued that, within the exclusive powers given to the Dominion Parliament over the subject of naturalization and aliens, there is implied the power to guarantee to all naturalized subjects that equality of freedom and opportunity to which I have adverted. And I ask, has it not done so by the foregoing provision of the Naturalization Act?

Canada, for example, is deeply interested ... in the colonization of its waste lands by aliens expecting to become British subjects and surely the power over naturalization must involve ... many considerations relative to the future status of such people as invited to go there and accept the guarantees and inducements offered them. To define and forever determine beyond the power of any legislature to alter the status of such people and measure out their rights by that enjoyed by the native-born seems to me a power implied in the power over "naturalization and aliens." ...

The appellant having, under the Naturalization Act (as I think fair to infer), become a British subject, he has presumably been certified to as a man of good character and enjoying the assurance ... of equal treatment with other British subjects, I shall not willingly impute an intention to the legislature to violate that assurance by this legislation specially aimed at his fellow-countrymen in origin. Indeed, in a piece of legislation alleged to have been promoted in the interests of morality, it would seem a strange thing to find it founded upon a breach of good faith which lies at the root of nearly all morality worth bothering one's head about.

Looked at from this point of view I am constrained to think that this Act must be construed as applicable only to those Chinamen who have not become naturalized British subjects, and is not applicable to the appellant who has become such.

Whether it is ultra vires or intra vires the alien Chinamen is a question with which, in this view, I have nothing to do.

DUFF J:

The authority of the legislature of Saskatchewan to enact this statute now before us is disputed upon the ground that the Act is really and truly legislation in relation to ... "aliens and naturalization," and to which, therefore, the jurisdiction of the province does not extend. This is said to be shewn by the decision of the Privy Council in The Union Colliery Co. v. Bryden

I think that, on the proper construction of this Act (and this appears to me to be the decisive point), it applies to persons of the races mentioned without regard to nationality. ... The terms Chinaman and Chinese, as generally used in Canadian legislation, point to a classification based upon origin, upon racial or personal characteristics and habits, rather than upon nationality or allegiance. ... Indeed, the presence of the phrase "other Oriental persons" seems to make it clear, even if there could otherwise have been any doubt upon the point, that the legislature is not dealing with these classes of persons according to nationality, but as persons of a certain origin or persons having certain common characteristics and habits sufficiently indicated by the language used.

Prima facie, therefore, the Act is not an Act dealing with aliens or with naturalized subjects as such. It seems also impossible to say that the Act is, in its practical operation, limited to aliens and naturalized subjects. ...

There is nothing in the Act itself to indicate that the legislature is doing anything more than attempting to deal according to its lights (as it is its duty to do) with a strictly local situation. In the sparsely inhabited Western provinces of this country the presence of Orientals in comparatively considerable numbers not infrequently raises questions for public discussion and treatment, and, sometimes in an acute degree, which in more thickly populated countries would excite little or no general interest. One can without difficulty figure to one's self the considerations which may have influenced the Saskatchewan Legislature in dealing with the practice of white girls taking employment in such circumstances ... ; considerations, for example, touching the interests of immigrant European women, and considerations touching the effect of such a practice upon the local relations between Europeans and Orientals; to say nothing of considerations affecting the administration of the law. . . .

[Chief Justice Fitzpatrick gave a judgment essentially similar to the judgments of Davies and Duff JJ.]

Appeal dismissed.

Shortly after the outbreak of hostilities in the Pacific during the Second World War, the government began to impose controls on Japanese persons living in Canada, especially those living in British Columbia. At first, curfews were imposed and fishing boats were impounded. In 1942, a comprehensive program of evacuation began. Japanese persons living in specified areas were moved to camps, most of which were in the interior of British Columbia, and the remainder on the prairies and in Ontario. Here, they worked on highway construction and sugar beet farms, often separated from their families, and much of their property was impounded.

These controls were imposed under the War Measures Act, 5 George V Chap 2, which gave the federal government power to do whatever it considered "necessary or advisable for the security, defense, peace, order and welfare of Canada." This power was limited to the existence of "real or apprehended war, invasion, insurrection," and a proclamation by the government was to be conclusive evidence that these conditions existed. This general grant of power was followed by some particulars, which included, "arrest, detention, exclusion, and deportation." In 1945, the Dominion enacted the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945, 9-10 George VI Chap 25, which was designed to provide for the difficult transition following the war. It gave the government powers, like the War Measures Act, to do whatever it considered necessary during the continuing emergency. It included a power to continue orders made under the War Measures Act, and an order continuing the internment of Japanese Canadians was made a few weeks later.

At the same time, the government made plans to deport specified groups of Japanese people who were British subjects either through birth or naturalization. This power was challenged, unsuccessfully, in Co-Operative Committee on Japanese Canadians v AG Canada, 1946 CanLII 361, [1947] AC 87 (UKJCPC). The first part of the challenge was to the War Measures Act itself, and it prompted Lord Wright, who wrote the judgment of the Privy Council, to make a general comment about emergencies at 101-2:

Under the British North America Act property and civil rights in the several Provinces are committed to the Provincial legislatures, but the Parliament of the Dominion in a sufficiently great emergency, such as that arising out of war, has power to deal adequately with that emergency for the safety of the Dominion as a whole. The interests of the Dominion are to be protected and it rests with the Parliament of the Dominion to protect them. What those interests are the Parliament of the Dominion must be left with considerable freedom to judge.

Again, if it be clear that an emergency has not arisen, or no longer exists, there can be no justification for the exercise or continued exercise of the exceptional powers. The rule of law as to the distribution of powers between the Parliaments of the Dominion and the Parliaments of the Provinces comes into play. But very clear evidence that an emergency has not arisen, or that the emergency no longer exists, is required to justify the judiciary, even though the question is one of ultra vires, in overruling the decision of the Parliament of the Dominion that exceptional measures were required or were still required.

Several other arguments against deportation were made, and rejected, including one that the term "deportation" was limited to aliens. Lord Wright said at 104-5:

Upon this argument it may be conceded that commonly it is only aliens who are made liable to deportation, and that in consequence, where reference is made to deportation, there is often imported the suggestion that aliens are under immediate consideration.

The dictionaries, as might be expected, do not altogether agree as to the meaning of deportation, but the Oxford English Dictionary gives as its definition "The action of carrying away: 'forcible removal, especially into exile: transportation.'

As a matter of language, their Lordships take the view that "deportation" is not a word which is misused when applied to persons not aliens. Whether or not the word "deportation" is in its application to be confined to aliens or not remains therefore open as a matter of construction of the particular statute in which it is found.

In the present case the Act is directed to dealing with emergencies; throughout it is in sweeping terms, and the word is found in the combination "arrest, detention, 'exclusion and deportation.'" As regards the first three of these words, nationality is obviously not a relevant consideration. The general nature of the Act and the collocation in which the word is found, establish, in their Lordships' view, that in this statute the word "deportation" is used in a general sense ... applicable to all persons irrespective of nationality. This being in their Lordships' judgment the true construction of the Act, it must apply to all persons who are at the time subject to the laws of Canada. They may be so subject by the mere fact of being in Canada, whether they are aliens or British subjects or Canadian nationals. Nationality per se is not a relevant consideration. An order relating to deportation would not be unauthorized by reason that it related to Canadian nationals or British subjects.

When the Charter was being debated by the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution in 1980 and 1981, one of the groups it heard from was the National Association of Japanese Canadians. Eric Adams describes the submissions of Gordon Kadota, the Association's President:

We requested this appearance," Kadota began, "because the Japanese Canadians have had a unique experience in Canada, an experience which more than ever must be told to contribute to the making of our future nation." "Our history in Canada is a legacy of racism made legitimate by our political institutions," he continued, "and we must somehow ensure that no group of Canadians will be subjected to the whims of political process as we were." "We feel that this can only be done," he argued, "by entrenching a Charter of Rights in our constitution, unconditionally entrenching, beyond the reach of Parliament and beyond the reach of provincial legislatures.

See Eric Adams & The Landscapes of Injustice Research Collective, "Constitutional Stories: Japanese Canadians and the Constitution of Canada" (2019) 35 Australasian Canadian Studies at 22-23 (footnotes omitted).

In what ways do the cases discussed above demonstrate the limits of relying on the division of powers to indirectly protect rights?

B. THE IMPLIED BILL OF RIGHTS

In the following cases, provincial laws that interfered with fundamental freedoms were held to be ultra vires. Known as the "implied bill of rights" cases, these decisions suggest that the Constitution itself, perhaps as a result of the preamble to the British North America Act, 1867, implies that there is a zone of liberty into which the state must not unjustifiably enter. This is the function that the Charter performs today, which is why the "implied bill of rights" is one of the Charter's antecedents.

As you read the cases, ask yourself whether they suggest that only Parliament, and not the provincial legislature in question, is authorized to enact a law that interferes with a fundamental freedom, such as freedom of expression or religion, or whether the Constitution prevents both levels of government from enacting laws that interfere with the exercise of such freedoms.

Reference re Alberta Statutes—The Bank Taxation Act; The Credit of Alberta Regulation Act; and the Accurate News and Information Act

[One of the most dramatic political events of the 1930s was the election of the Social Credit government in Alberta in 1937. Its monetary policies, which horrified the eastern establishment, especially its bankers, were vague and muddled, but the essential belief was that the total of the payments to individuals from all economic transactions was less than the total value of goods produced, and this shortfall was the cause of unemployment and depression. The solution was to impose public control over the banks, and provide each individual a "social credit," which they must spend to maintain the balance between payments and production. The newspaper accounts of the election victory and this economic policy were extensive and almost all hostile, and the hostility continued as the government began to implement its policies in 1936 and 1937. The government's response to this hostility was the Publication of Accurate News and Information Bill, which gave power to the Social Credit Board (which had been created by statute to implement the general program) to require newspapers to publish statements that it considered necessary to correct public misapprehension. The Bill also gave power to require disclosure of sources and names of authors.

The lieutenant governor refused assent to this Bill and two others about economic policy. A reference was made to determine the extent of the powers of disallowance and reservation, which is of no interest here, and the powers of Alberta to enact the three reserved bills. The Supreme Court unanimously held that all three were ultra vires—and the statutes that had been enacted earlier were ultra vires as well.]

CANNON J:

The policy referred to in the preamble of the Press bill regarding which the people of the province are to be informed from the government standpoint, is undoubtedly the Social Credit policy of the government. The administration of the bill is in the hands of the Chairman of the Social Credit Board who is given complete and discretionary power by the bill. "Social Credit," according to sec. 2(b) of ... The Alberta Social Credit Amendment Act is the power resulting from the belief inherent within society that its individual members in association can gain the objectives they desire; and the objectives in which the people of Alberta must have a firm and unshaken belief are the monetization of credit and the creation of a provincial medium of exchange instead of money to be used for the purposes of distributing to Albertans loans without interest, per capita dividends and discount rates to purchase goods from retailers. This free distribution would be based on the unused capacity of the industries and people of the province of Alberta to produce goods and services, which capacity remains unused on account of the lack or absence of purchasing power in the consumers in the province. The purchasing power would equal or absorb this hitherto unused capacity to produce goods and services by the issue of Treasury Credit certificates against a Credit Fund or Provincial credit account established by the Commission each year representing the monetary value of this "unused capacity"—which is also called "Alberta credit."

It seems obvious that this kind of credit cannot succeed unless every one should be induced to believe in it and help it along. The word "credit" comes from the Latin: credere, to believe. It is, therefore, essential to control the sources of information of the people of Alberta, in order to keep them immune from any vacillation in their absolute faith in the plan of the government. The Social Credit doctrine must become, for the people of Alberta, a sort of religious dogma of which a free and uncontrolled discussion is not permissible. The bill aims to control any statement relating to any policy or activity of the government of the province and declares this object to be a matter of public interest. The bill does not regulate the relations of the newspapers' owners with private individual members of the public, but deals exclusively with expressions of opinion by the newspapers concerning government policies and activities. The pith and substance of the bill is to regulate the press of Alberta from the viewpoint of public policy by preventing the public from being misled or deceived as to any policy or activity of the Social Credit Government and by reducing any opposition to silence or bring upon it ridicule and public contempt.

I agree with the submission of the Attorney-General for Canada that this bill deals with the regulation of the press of Alberta, not from the viewpoint of private wrongs or civil injuries ... , but from the viewpoint of public wrongs or crimes, i.e., involving a violation of the public rights and duties to the whole community, considered as a community, in its social aggregate capacity.

Do the provisions of this bill, as alleged by the Attorney-General for Canada, invade the domain of criminal law and trench upon the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of the Dominion in this regard?

The object of an amendment of the criminal law, as a rule, is to deprive the citizen of the right to do that, apart from the amendment, he could lawfully do. Sections 130 to 136 of the Criminal Code deal with seditious words and seditious publications; and sect. 133(a) reads as follows:

No one shall be deemed to have a seditious intention only because he intends in good faith

- (a) to show that His Majesty has been misled or mistaken in his measures; or
- (b) to point out errors or defects in the government or constitution of the United Kingdom, or of any part of it, or of Canada or any province thereof ... ; or to excite His Majesty's subjects to attempt to procure, by lawful means, the alteration of any matter of state; or
- (c) to point out, in order to their removal, matters which are producing or have a tendency to produce feelings of hatred and ill-will between different classes of His Majesty's subjects.

It appears that in England, at first, criticism of any government policy was regarded as a crime involving severe penalties and punishable as such; but since the passing of Fox's Libel Act in 1792, the considerations now found in the above article of our criminal code that it is not criminal to point out errors in the Government of the country and to urge their removal by lawful means have been admitted as a valid defence in a trial for libel.

Now, it seems to me that the Alberta legislature by this retrograde Bill is attempting to revive the old theory of the crime of seditious libel by enacting penalties, confiscation of space in newspapers and prohibitions for actions which, after due consideration by the Dominion Parliament, have been declared innocuous It is an attempt by the legislature to amend the Criminal Code in this respect and to deny the advantage of sect. 133(a) to the Alberta newspaper publishers.

Under the British system, which is ours, no political party can erect a prohibitory barrier to prevent the electors from getting information concerning the policy of the government. Freedom of discussion is essential to enlighten public opinion in a democratic State; it cannot be curtailed without affecting the right of the people to be informed through sources independent of the government concerning matters of public interest. There must be an untrammeled publication of the news and political opinions of the political parties contending for ascendancy. As stated in the preamble of the British North America Act, our constitution is and will remain, unless radically changed, "similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom." At the time of Confederation, the United Kingdom was a democracy. Democracy cannot be maintained without its foundation: free public opinion and free discussion throughout the nation of all matters affecting the State within the limits set by the criminal code and the common law. Every inhabitant in Alberta is also a citizen of the Dominion. The province may deal with his property and civil rights of a local and private nature within the province; but the province cannot interfere with his status as a Canadian citizen and his fundamental right to express freely his untrammeled opinion about government policies and discuss matters of public concern. The mandatory and prohibitory provisions of the Press Bill are, in my opinion, ultra vires of the provincial legislature. They interfere with the free working of the political organization of the Dominion. They have a tendency to nullify the political rights of the inhabitants of Alberta, as citizens of Canada, and cannot be considered as dealing with matters purely private and local in that province. The federal parliament is the sole authority to curtail, if deemed expedient and in the public interest, the freedom of the press in discussing public affairs and the equal rights in that respect of all citizens throughout the Dominion. These subjects were matters of criminal law before Confederation, have been recognized by Parliament as criminal matters and have been expressly dealt with by the Criminal Code. No province has the power to reduce in that province the political rights of its citizens as compared with those enjoyed by the citizens of other provinces of Canada. Moreover, citizens outside the province of Alberta have a vital interest in having full information and comment, favourable and unfavourable, regarding the policy of the Alberta government and concerning events in that province which would, in the ordinary course, be the subject of Alberta newspapers' news items and articles.

DUFF CJ:

[The first part of this judgment is omitted. It concluded that the Bill was ultra vires because it depended on the other bills, which were held to be invalid.]

This is sufficient for disposing of the question referred to us but, we think, there are some further observations upon the Bill which may properly be made.

Under the constitution established by the British North America Act, legislative power for Canada is vested in one Parliament consisting of the sovereign, an upper house styled the Senate, and the House of Commons. Without entering in detail upon an examination of the enactments of the Act relating to the House of Commons, it can be said that these provisions manifestly contemplate a House of Commons which is to be, as the name itself implies, a representative body; constituted, that is to say, by members elected by [persons qualified to vote]. The preamble of the statute, moreover, shows plainly enough that the constitution of the Dominion is to be similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom. The statute contemplates a parliament working under the influence of public opinion and public discussion. There can be no controversy that such institutions derive their efficacy from the free public discussion of affairs, from criticism and answer and counter-criticism, from attack upon policy and administration and defence and counter-attack; from the freest and fullest analysis and examination from every point of view of political proposals. This is signally true in respect of the discharge by Ministers of the Crown of their responsibility to Parliament, by members of Parliament of their duty to the electors, and by the electors themselves of their responsibilities in the election of their representatives.

The right of public discussion is, of course, subject to legal restrictions; those based upon considerations of decency and public order, and others conceived for the protection of various private and public interests with which, for example, the laws of defamation and sedition are concerned. In a word, freedom of discussion means, to quote the words of Lord Wright in James v. Commonwealth, "freedom governed by law."

Even within its legal limits, it is liable to abuse and grave abuse, and such abuse is constantly exemplified before our eyes; but it is axiomatic that the practice of this right of free public discussion of public affairs, notwithstanding its incidental mischiefs, is the breath of life for parliamentary institutions.

We do not doubt that (in addition to the power of disallowance vested in the Governor General) the Parliament of Canada possesses authority to legislate for the protection of this right. That authority rests upon the principle that the powers requisite for the protection of the constitution itself arise by necessary implication from the British North America Act as a whole (Fort Frances Pulp & Power Co. Ltd. v. Manitoba Free Press Co. Ltd.); and since the subject-matter in relation to which the power is exercised is not exclusively a provincial matter, it is necessarily vested in Parliament.

But this by no means exhausts the matter. Any attempt to abrogate this right of public debate or to suppress the traditional forms of the exercise of the right (in public meeting and through the press) would, in our opinion, be incompetent to the legislatures of the provinces, ... as repugnant to the provisions of the British North America Act, by which the Parliament of Canada is established as the legislative organ of the people of Canada under the Crown, and Dominion legislation enacted pursuant to the legislative authority given by those provisions. The subject matter of such legislation could not be described as a provincial matter[.] ...

... Some degree of regulation of newspapers everybody would concede to the provinces. ... [B]ut the limit, in our opinion, is reached when the legislation effects such a curtailment of the exercise of the right of public discussion as substantially to interfere with the working of the parliamentary institutions of Canada as contemplated by the provisions of the British North America Act and the statutes of the Dominion of Canada.

[Davis J concurred with Duff CJ, Kerwin, Crocket, and Hudson JJ held that the Bill was invalid because it was dependent on the other bills and statutes, and expressly declined to discuss its validity on the grounds that Duff CJ and Cannon J adopted. An appeal was brought to the Privy Council about all three bills, but that body did not hear argument about this Bill, because the earlier statutes upon which it depended were repealed early in 1938: AG Alberta v AG Canada, [1938] AC 294 (PC).]

Switzman v Elbling

[This action was essentially a challenge to the Act to Protect the Province Against Communistic Propaganda RSQ 1941, c 52 [Padlock Act], enacted in 1937 by the Quebec legislature to control communism. Section 3, which was crucial, provided:

It shall be illegal for any person, who possesses or occupies a house within the Province, to use it or allow any person to make use of it to propagate communism or bolshevism by any means whatsoever.

Switzman's landlord brought an action to evict him because he had used the leased premises for purposes prohibited by this section. His defence was that the section was ultra vires the provincial government, and it succeeded in the Supreme Court by a majority of eight to one.]

RAND J.:

The first ground on which the validity of s. 3 is supported is s. 92(13) of the British North America Act. "Property in the Province," and Mr. Beaulieu's contention goes in this manner: by that head the Province is vested with unlimited legislative power over property; it may, for instance, take land without compensation and generally may act as amply as if it were a sovereign state, untrammelled by constitutional limitation. The power being absolute can be used as an instrument or means to effect any purpose or object. Since the objective accomplishment under the statute here is an Act on property, its validity is self-evident and the question is concluded.

I am unable to agree that [such absolute power] resides in either legislature. The detailed distribution made by ss. 91 and 92 places limits to direct and immediate purposes of provincial action. Under s. 92(13) the purpose would, in general, be a "property" purpose either primary or subsidiary to another head of the same section. If such a purpose is foreign to powers vested in the Province by the Act, it will invade the field of the Dominion. For example, land could not be declared forfeited or descent destroyed by attainder on conviction of a crime, nor could the convicted person's right of access to provincial Courts be destroyed. These would trench upon both criminal law and citizenship status. The settled principle that calls for a determination of the "real character," the "pith and substance," of what purports to be enacted and whether it is "colourable" or is intended to effect its ostensible object, means that the true nature of the legislative act, its substance in purpose, must lie within s. 92 or some other endowment of provincial power. That a power ostensibly as here under a specific head cannot be exercised as a means directly and immediately to accomplish a purpose not within that endowment is demonstrated by the following decisions of the Judicial Committee: ...

[Discussion of several cases, including Union Colliery v Bryden [1899] AC 580, is omitted.]

That the scene of study, discussion or dissemination of views or opinions on any matter has ever been brought under legal sanction in terms of nuisance is not suggested. For the past century and a half in both the United Kingdom and Canada, there has been a steady removal of restraints on this freedom Apart from sedition, obscene writings and criminal libels, the public law leaves the literary, discursive and polemic use of language, in the broadest sense, free.

The object of the legislation here, as expressed by the title, is admittedly to prevent the propagation of communism and bolshevism, but it could just as properly have been the suppression of any other political, economic or social doctrine ... ; and the issue is whether that object is a matter "in relation to which" under s. 92 the Province may exclusively make laws. Two heads of the section are claimed to authorize it: s. 92(13), as a matter of "Civil Rights," and s. 92(16), "Local and Private Matters."

Mr. Tremblay in a lucid argument treated such a limitation of free discussion and the spread of ideas generally as in the same category as the ordinary civil restrictions of libel and slander. These obviously affect the matter and scope of discussion to the extent that it trenches upon the rights of individuals to reputation and standing in the community; and the line at which the restraint is drawn is that at which public concern for the discharge of legal or moral duties and government through rational persuasion, and that for private security, are found to be in rough balance.

But the analogy is not a true one. The ban is directed against the freedom or civil liberty of the actor; no civil right of anyone is affected nor is any civil remedy created. The aim of the statute is, by means of penalties, to prevent what is considered a poisoning of men's minds, to shield the individual from exposure to dangerous ideas, to protect him, in short, from his own thinking propensities. There is nothing of civil rights in this; it is to curtail or proscribe those freedoms which the majority so far consider to be the condition of social cohesion and its ultimate stabilizing force.

It is then said that the ban is a local matter under s. 92(16); that the social situation in Quebec is such that safeguarding its intellectual and spiritual life against subversive doctrines becomes a special need in contrast with that for a general regulation by Parliament. ...

Indicated by the opening words of the preamble in the Act of 1867, ... the political theory which the Act embodies is that of parliamentary government, with all its social implications, and the provisions of the statute elaborate that principle in the institutional apparatus which they create or contemplate, whatever the deficiencies in its workings. Canadian government is in substance the will of the majority expressed directly or indirectly through popular assemblies. This means ultimately government by the free public opinion of an open society, the effectiveness of which, as events have not infrequently demonstrated, is undoubted.

But public opinion, in order to meet such a responsibility, demands the condition of a virtually unobstructed access to and diffusion of ideas. Parliamentary government postulates a capacity in men, acting freely and under self-restraints, to govern themselves; and that advance is best served in the degree achieved of individual liberation from subjective as well as objective shackles. Under that government, the freedom of discussion in Canada, as a subject-matter of legislation, has a unity of interest and significance extending equally to every part of the Dominion. With such dimensions it is ipso facto excluded from s. 92(16) as a local matter.

This constitutional fact is the political expression of the primary condition of social life, thought and its communication by language. Liberty in this is little less vital to man's mind and spirit than breathing is to his physical existence. As such an inheritance in the individual it is embodied in his status of citizenship. ...

Prohibition of any part of this activity as an evil would be within the scope of criminal law Bearing in mind that the endowment of parliamentary institutions is one and entire for the Dominion, ... and that the body of discussion is [generally] indivisible, ... the degree and nature of its regulation must await future consideration; for the purposes here it is sufficient to say that it is not a matter within the regulation of a Province.

I would, therefore, allow the appeal, set aside the judgments below, dismiss the action and direct a declaration on the intervention that the statute in its entirety is ultra vires of the Province.

ABBOTT J:

The right of free expression of opinion and of criticism, upon matters of public policy and public administration, and the right to discuss and debate such matters, whether they be social, economic or political, are essential to the working of a parliamentary democracy such as ours

This right cannot be abrogated by a Provincial Legislature, and the power of such Legislature to limit it is restricted to what may be necessary to protect purely private rights, such as for example provincial laws of defamation. It is obvious that the impugned statute does not fall within that category. It does not, in substance, deal with matters of property and civil rights or with a local or private matter within the Province and in my opinion is clearly ultra vires. Although it is not necessary, of course, to determine this question for the purposes of the present appeal, the Canadian constitution being declared to be similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom, I am also of opinion that as our constitutional Act now stands, Parliament itself could not abrogate this right of discussion and debate. The power of Parliament to limit it is, in my view, restricted to such powers as may be exercisable under its exclusive legislative jurisdiction with respect to criminal law and to make laws for the peace, order and good government of the nation.

TASCHEREAU J (dissenting) [TRANSLATION]:

The appellant contends that this legislation is exclusive within the domain of the criminal law, and that consequently it is without the legislative competency of the provincial authority. I would willingly agree with him, if the Legislature had enacted that Communism was a crime punishable by law But such is not the case that we have before us If the provincial Legislature has no power to create criminal offences, it has the right to legislate to prevent ... crimes under the Criminal Code, and to prevent conditions calculated to favour the development of crime. ... [I]t may validly legislate as to the possession and use of property, as this is exclusively within the domain of civil law, and is by virtue of s. 92(13) of the BNA Act within the provincial competency.

I am clearly of opinion that if a Province may validly legislate on all civil matters in relation to criminal law, that it may enact laws calculated to suppress conditions favouring the development of crime, and control properties in order to protect society against any illegal uses that may be made of them ... I cannot see why it could not also have the power to enact that all those who extol doctrines, calculated to incite to treason, to the violation of official secrets, to sedition, etc., should be deprived of the enjoyment of [those] properties from where are spread these theories, the object of which is to undermine and overthrow the established order.

... Canadians, less than 10 years ago, in violation of their oath of allegiance, did not hesitate for the sake of Communism, to reveal official secrets and thus imperil the security of the state. The suppression of the spreading of these subversive doctrines by civil sanctions is, to my mind, as important as the suppression of disorderly houses. I remain convinced that the domain of criminal law, exclusively of federal competency, has not been encroached upon by the impugned legislation, and that the latter merely establishes civil sanctions for the prevention of crime and the security of the country.

It has also been contended that this legislation constituted an obstacle to the liberty of the press and the liberty of speech. I believe in those fundamental liberties; ... but these liberties would cease to be a right and become a privilege if it were permitted to certain individuals to misuse them in order to propagate dangerous doctrines that are necessarily conducive to violations of the established order. These liberties which citizens and the press enjoy of expressing their beliefs, their thoughts and their doctrines without previous authorization or censure, do not constitute absolute rights. They are necessarily limited and must be exercised within the bounds of legality. When these limits are overstepped, these liberties become abusive, and the law must then necessarily intervene to exercise a repressive control in order to protect the citizens and society.

The same reasoning must serve to meet the objection raised by the appellant, to the effect ... that the impugned law is an obstacle to the free expression of all individuals, candidates in an election. Destructive ideas of social order and of established authority by dictatorial methods do not have more rights in electoral periods than in any other times. In the minds of many, this law may appear rigid (it is not within my province to judge of its wisdom), but the severity of a law adopted by a competent power does not brand it with unconstitutionality.

For all these reasons, I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed. ...

[Chief Justice Kerwin and Cartwright, Fauteux, Locke, and Nolan JJ all held the Act ultra vires because it dealt, in substance, with criminal law. Kellock J concurred with Rand J.] [Emphasis in original.]

Appeal allowed.

Dupond v City of Montreal

[1978] 2 SCR 770, 1978 CanLII 201

[This case, also discussed in Chapter 11, Criminal Law and Procedure, involved a challenge to a municipal by-law imposing a 30-day prohibition on any public gatherings or assemblies. The by-law was challenged on two grounds: (1) as an invasion of the federal criminal law power; and (2) as an infringement of the fundamental freedoms of speech, assembly and association, the press, and religion. A majority of the Court, in a decision written by Beetz J, rejected both grounds of challenge and upheld the by-law. Only the portions of the judgment dealing with the implied bill of rights argument are reproduced here.]

BEETZ J (Martland, Judson, Ritchie, and Pigeon JJ concurring) [TRANSLATION]:

IV

The second submission against the constitutionality of s. 5 and of the ordinance was that they are in relation to and in conflict with the fundamental freedoms of speech, of assembly and association, of the press and of religion which were inherited from the United Kingdom and made part of the Constitution by the preamble of the British North America Act, 1867, or which come under federal jurisdiction and are protected by the Canadian Bill of Rights. ...

I find it exceedingly difficult to deal with a submission couched in such general terms. What is it that distinguishes a right from a freedom and a fundamental freedom from a freedom which is not fundamental? Is there a correlation between freedom of speech and freedom of assembly on the one hand and, on the other, the right, if any, to hold a public meeting on a highway or in a park as opposed to a meeting open to the public on private land? How like or unlike each other are an assembly, a parade, a gathering, a demonstration, a procession? Modern parlance has fostered loose language upon lawyers. As was said by Sir Ivor Jennings, the English at least have no written constitution and so they may divide their law logically. . . .

I am afraid I cannot avoid answering in kind the appellants' submission. I believe I can state my position in a relatively small number of propositions . . . :

1. None of the freedoms referred to is so enshrined in the Constitution as to be above the reach of competent legislation.
2. None of those freedoms is a single matter coming within exclusive federal or provincial competence. Each of them is an aggregate of several matters which, depending on the aspect, come within federal or provincial competence. (This proposition is postulated in s. 5(3) of "An Act for the Recognition and Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms," 1960 (Can.), c. 44, of which the Canadian Bill of Rights constitutes Part I.)
3. Freedoms of speech, of assembly and association, of the press and of religion are distinct and independent of the faculty of holding assemblies, parades, gatherings, demonstrations or processions on the public domain of a city. This is particularly so with respect to freedom of speech and freedom of the press as considered in the Alberta Press Act case Demonstrations are not a form of speech but of collective action. They are of the nature of a display of force rather than of that of an appeal to reason; their inarticulateness prevents them from becoming part of language and from reaching the level of discourse.
4. The right to hold public meetings on a highway or in a park is unknown to English law. Far from being the object of a right, the holding of a public meeting on a street or in a park may constitute a trespass . . . even though no one is obstructed and no injury is done; it may also amount to a nuisance

Being unknown to English law, the right to hold public meetings on the public domain of a city did not become part of the Canadian Constitution under the preamble of the British North America Act, 1867.

5. The holding of assemblies, parades or gatherings on the public domain is a matter which, depending on the aspect, comes under federal or provincial competence and falls to be governed by federal and provincial legislation
6. The Canadian Bill of Rights, assuming it has anything to do with the holding of assemblies, parades or gatherings on the public domain, does not apply to provincial and municipal legislation.

Appellants' second submission must also fail.

I would therefore dismiss both appeals.

Appeal dismissed.

Almost ten years later, Beetz J returned to this topic in Ontario (AG) v OPSEU, [1987] 2 SCR 2, 1987 CanLII 71, discussed in Chapter 8, Interpreting the Division of Powers. The Ontario Public Service Employees' Union (OPSEU) challenged the Ontario Public Service Act, RSO 1970, c 386, particularly its provisions that prohibited employees in the public service from participating in specified political activities—for example, being a candidate in a provincial or federal election or soliciting funds for a provincial or federal party or candidate. The discussion in Chapter 8 was about interjurisdictional immunity. In addition to the federalism challenge, OPSEU also made an argument based on the implied bill of rights cases. Beetz J said:

[151] There is no doubt in my mind that the basic structure of our Constitution ... contemplates the existence of certain political institutions, including freely elected legislative bodies at the federal and provincial levels. In the words of Duff CJC in Reference re Alberta Statutes, at p. 133, "such institutions derive their efficacy from the free public discussions of affairs ..." and, in those of Abbott J in Switzman v. Elbling, at p. 328, neither a provincial legislature nor Parliament itself can "abrogate this right of discussion and debate." Speaking more generally, I hold that neither Parliament nor the provincial legislatures may enact legislation the effect of which would be to substantially interfere with the operation of this basic constitutional structure. On the whole, though, I am inclined to the view that the impugned legislation is in essence concerned with the constitution of the province and with regulating the provincial public service and affects federal and provincial elections only in an incidental way.

[152] I should perhaps add that [these] issues ... will in the future ordinarily arise ... under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which, of course, gives broader protection to these rights and freedoms than is called for by the structural demands of the Constitution. However, it remains true that, quite apart from Charter considerations, the legislative bodies in this country must conform to these basic structural imperatives and can in no way override them. The present legislation does not go so far as to infringe upon the essential structure of free parliamentary institutions.

Chief Justice Dickson and Lamer J, who also authored opinions, did not consider this argument.

IV. THE CANADIAN BILL OF RIGHTS

In 1960, Parliament enacted the Canadian Bill of Rights. The initiative came from Prime Minister John Diefenbaker, who had campaigned for constitutional protection for rights since becoming a member of Parliament in 1945 and had made it a principal platform promise during the 1958 election. Two external influences seem clear in the Bill's development. The first was international rights instruments, especially the Universal Declaration of Human Rights adopted by the United Nations in 1948. The second was the American Bill of Rights and the liberal interpretations of rights by the Supreme Court from the mid-1950s onward, especially in Brown v Board of Education, 347 US 483, 74 S Ct 686 (1954), a landmark decision about school desegregation. The influence of the American constitutional experience was probably heightened by the Cold War and the sense that, at its heart, it was a struggle for individual rights.

Within Canada, an important factor was probably the fears about regulation by legislatures and administrative agencies, which had expanded greatly during the war. For lawyers, this regulation threatened both legal values, especially the common law constitution, and political values, for most lawyers were hardly sympathetic to the politics of the regulatory state. Specific incidents also contributed. Both lawyers and the general public were troubled by denials of civil liberties in the treatment of the Japanese Canadians during the war, and by the conduct of an inquiry into espionage in 1946, which was widely criticized for curtailing the civil rights of individuals who were being investigated.

The Canadian Bill of Rights

RSC 1985, Appendix III

The Parliament of Canada, affirming that the Canadian Nation is founded upon principles that acknowledge the supremacy of God, the dignity and worth of the human person and the position of the family in a society of free men and free institutions;

Affirming also that men and institutions remain free only when freedom is founded upon respect for moral and spiritual values and the rule of law;

And being desirous of enshrining these principles and the human rights and fundamental freedoms derived from them, in a Bill of Rights which shall reflect the respect of Parliament for its constitutional authority and which shall ensure the protection of these rights and freedoms in Canada:

THEREFORE Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

Part I: Bill of Rights

1. It is hereby recognized and declared that in Canada there have existed and shall continue to exist without discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex, the following human rights and fundamental freedoms, namely,

- (a) the right of the individual to life, liberty, security of the person and enjoyment of property, and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law;
- (b) the right of the individual to equality before the law and the protection of the law;
- (c) freedom of religion;
- (d) freedom of speech;
- (e) freedom of assembly and association; and
- (f) freedom of the press.

2. Every law of Canada shall, unless it is expressly declared by an Act of the Parliament of Canada that it shall operate notwithstanding the Canadian Bill of Rights, be so construed and applied as not to abrogate, abridge or infringe or to authorize the abrogation, abridgment or infringement of any of the rights or freedoms herein recognized and declared, and in particular, no law of Canada shall be construed or applied so as to

- (a) authorize or effect the arbitrary detention, imprisonment or exile of any person;
- (b) impose or authorize the imposition of cruel and unusual treatment or punishment;
- (c) deprive a person who has been arrested or detained
 - (i) of the right to be informed promptly of the reason for his arrest or detention,
 - (ii) of the right to retain and instruct counsel without delay, or
 - (iii) of the remedy by way of habeas corpus for the determination of the validity of his detention and for his release if the detention is not lawful;
- (d) authorize a court, tribunal, commission, board or other authority to compel a person to give evidence if he is denied counsel, protection against self incrimination or other constitutional safeguards;
- (e) deprive a person of the right to a fair hearing in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice for the determination of his rights and obligations;

(f) deprive a person charged with a criminal offence of the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law in a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal, or of the right to reasonable bail without just cause; or

(g) deprive a person of the right to the assistance of an interpreter in any proceedings in which he is involved or in which he is a party or a witness, before a court, commission, board or other tribunal, if he does not understand or speak the language in which such proceedings are conducted.

The Bill of Rights, while simply a statute of Parliament, is considered to be quasi-constitutional in nature: see Vanessa MacDonnell, "A Theory of Quasi-Constitutional Legislation" (2016) 53:2 Osgoode Hall LJ 508.

However, the impact of the Bill of Rights is limited in two important ways. First, it governs only matters within the federal government's power. During the 1950s, the possibility of including the provinces was discussed, but they were determined to protect their autonomy. Second, it can be amended like any other statute.

In retrospect, the Bill presented two major problems for the courts. The first of these problems was its effect on other statutes. According to its own terms (s 2), the Bill had no effect on a statute that contained a declaration that it was to be effective regardless of the Bill, but what about other statutes—ones that violated rights, but did not contain an express declaration? Consider a statute made before the Bill was enacted. Did the Bill prevail, and make a violation of rights in the earlier statute ineffective? Alternatively, was it no more than a guide to interpretation? If it was no more than a guide to interpretation, then any violation of rights in the earlier statute would continue to be effective, as long as it was express or otherwise clear.

Now consider a statute made after the Bill, containing a provision that clearly denied some protected right. Because the Bill was simply a statute, did the later statute prevail, as a consequence of the general doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty? (A later statute is a repeal, express or implicit, of an earlier inconsistent one.) The second problem was more general—how should courts approach the Bill? Should its grants of rights be interpreted expansively or restrictively?

The decisions of the Supreme Court were generally disappointing to observers who had hoped that it would approach the Bill sympathetically and interpret it liberally. Here is a short and selective account of its decisions, which deals first with the decisions about the effect of the Bill, and second with the Court's approach.

The discussion of effect begins with The Queen v Drybones, [1970] SCR 282, 1969 CanLII 1. Section 94(b) of the Indian Act, RSC 1952, c 149, provided that an "Indian" who was "intoxicated ... off a reserve" was guilty of an offence, and liable to a fine of a minimum of 10 dollars (and a maximum of 50 dollars), or imprisonment for not more than three months. In contrast, the Liquor Ordinance of the Northwest Territories, which regulated liquor generally, provided in s 94(6) that it was an offence for anyone to be "intoxicated ... in a public place," and specified a penalty of a fine, without any minimum amount, or imprisonment for no more than 30 days. (The crucial contrasts between these two statutes were first, the differences in the punishments, and second, the specifications of the location of the accused when they were intoxicated. The Indian Act specified anywhere off a reserve, and the Liquor Ordinance specified a public place.) Drybones, an "Indian" according to the definition in the Indian Act, was charged under the Act with being intoxicated off a reserve. He challenged the section on the basis that it violated his right to equality before the law under s 1(b) of the Bill. The Supreme Court dismissed an appeal by the Crown from an acquittal in the lower courts by a majority of six to three.

Ritchie J, writing the principal majority judgment, rejected the argument that the Bill of Rights should be understood as simply a guide to interpretation, saying “[it] appears to me to strike at the very foundations of the Bill of Rights, and convert it from its apparent character as a statutory declaration of the fundamental rights and freedoms which it recognizes, into little more than a rule for the construction of federal statutes” (at 293). He rejected this approach, relying primarily on the opening words of s 2.

The Liquor Ordinance challenged in Drybones was enacted prior to the Bill of Rights. The outcome could therefore be understood as a simple consequence of the general doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty. At the same time, the Court’s statements about the fundamental nature of the rights contained in the Bill of Rights also suggested that “The fundamentality of the rights recognized [in the Bill of Rights] seemed to do some work of its own”: see MacDonnell, above at 513.

The problem of the effect of the Bill on statutes enacted after the Bill remained. For decades, scholars had debated whether an earlier legislature could bind a later one. The most pressing question in this debate was whether a requirement of a particular procedure for making legislation (a “manner and form” requirement) specified in a statute would obligate later legislatures. If it did, the requirement in the Bill of a declaration that a statute “shall operate notwithstanding” would be an effective requirement, and any future statute that did not include such a declaration would be ineffective to the extent that it violated the protected rights. During the 1970s and 1980s, several members of the Supreme Court announced that the Bill of Rights, or provincial bills of rights like it, prevailed over later statutes, although their reasoning was not extensive.

The Supreme Court’s decisions about the effect of the Bill therefore seem sympathetic, if not fully reasoned. It was the Court’s approach to the interpretation of the rights that was disappointing. One pervasive question was the significance of the words “there have existed and shall continue to exist,” in s 1, and the words “herein recognized and declared,” in s 2. Did these words limit the courts to the nature of the specified rights as they stood in 1960? In R v Burnshire, [1975] 1 SCR 693, 1974 CanLII 150, Martland J said that the Bill “declared and continued existing rights and freedoms. It was those existing rights and freedoms which were not to be infringed by any federal statute. Section 2 did not create new rights. Its purpose was to prevent infringement of existing rights” (at 694). This approach, named the “frozen rights” approach, was the dominant approach, and it seems to have been a manifestation of a general denial of expansive interpretation. Two examples are the interpretations of the provisions about equality and about procedure.

In Drybones, the Crown argued that the prohibition against being intoxicated off a reserve treated all Indians equally. Ritchie J, writing the principal majority judgment, rejected the argument, saying (at 297) that it would permit the most glaring discriminatory legislation against a racial group ... so long as all the other members are being discriminated against in the same way.

... [N]o individual or group of individuals is to be treated more harshly than another under the law, and ... an individual is denied equality before the law if it is made an offence ... for him to do something which his fellow Canadians are free to do without having committed any offence.

This formulation seemed generous (perhaps unreasonably so—did it really prohibit all distinctions between individuals and groups, including zoning by-laws and progressive taxes?), but the generosity seemed to be diminished three years later. In AG of Canada v Lavell, [1974] SCR 1349, 1973 CanLII 175, another part of the Indian Act was challenged under the equality provision of the Bill of Rights. Section 12(1)(b) provided that an Indian woman who married a non-Indian man lost her registration under the Act. There was no corresponding provision for an Indian man. By a majority of five to four, the Supreme Court rejected the challenge. Ritchie J declared that “the meaning to be given to the language employed in the Bill of Rights is the meaning which it bore in Canada at the time when the Bill was enacted" (at 1365). For him, the phrase "equality before the law" did not express the "egalitarian" understandings espoused by the Supreme Court of the United States. Instead, it was illuminated by the "rule of law," which was affirmed in the preamble to the Bill. This reference took him to Dicey's classic statement in Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution: equality means "equality before the law or the equal subjection of all classes to the ordinary law of the land" (see above at 1367). Ignoring the purpose and late 19th-century context of Dicey's text, and the possibility that the 20th century may have brought changes in understandings about equality that might have illuminated its meaning in 1960, Ritchie J asserted that the impugned section could be enforced without denying equality of treatment in the administration of the law.

Writing in dissent, Laskin J concluded that it was "impossible to distinguish Drybones from the two cases in appeal" (at 1375) and that the impugned provision violated the equality guarantee of the Bill of Rights.

Ritchie J considered equality again in Bliss v AG of Canada, [1979] 1 SCR 183, 1978 CanLII 25. The Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, 1970-71-72 (Can), c. 48, established a program of benefits for women whose employment was interrupted because of pregnancy, but imposed a longer qualifying period for women claiming these benefits than it did for individuals claiming the regular benefits. As well, it excluded interruption of employment because of pregnancy from the categories of entitlement for the regular benefits. Bliss, whose employment was interrupted by pregnancy, claimed benefits, but she had not been employed for long enough to satisfy the qualifying period for the benefits specifically provided for women whose employment had been interrupted because of pregnancy. Writing for a unanimous court, Ritchie J held that the Act did not discriminate against her on the specified ground of sex, saying (at 184) that the sections creating the program of benefits were a complete code dealing exclusively with the entitlement of women to unemployment insurance benefits during the specified part of the period of pregnancy and childbirth; these provisions form an integral part of a legislative scheme enacted for valid federal objectives and they are concerned with conditions from which men are excluded. Any inequality between the sexes in this area is not created by legislation, but by nature.

He also held (at 191-93) that the discrimination could not be grounded in the more general term "equality before the law":

There is a wide difference between legislation which treats one section of the population more harshly than all others by reason of race as in the case of Regina v. Drybones ... and legislation providing additional benefits to one class of women, specifying the conditions which entitle a claimant to such benefits and defining a period during which no benefits are available. The one case involves the imposition of a penalty on a racial group to which other citizens are not subjected; the other involves a definition of the qualifications required for entitlement to benefits

... [T]here can ... be no doubt that [the longer qualifying period] is a relevant one for consideration in determining the conditions entitling pregnant women to benefits under a scheme of unemployment insurance enacted to achieve the valid federal objective imposed on Parliament by s. 91(2A) of the British North America Act.

Section 91(2A) gives the federal government power to legislate about "unemployment insurance." It was added in the late 1930s, in response to the Reference re legislative jurisdiction of Parliament of Canada to enact the Employment and Social Insurance Act, [1936] SCR 427, 1936 CanLII 30 [Unemployment Insurance Reference], one of the New Deal cases considered in Chapter 6, The 1930s: The Depression and the New Deal. Ritchie J did not, though, explain the references in these passages to the valid objective. True, the Act as a whole had a valid purpose—to provide unemployment insurance—but this purpose could hardly justify denying Bliss any benefits at all. This case, more than any other, was a focus of protests by women during the debates about the Charter during the late 1970s and early 1980s.

The judgments about procedure and the phrases “due process” and “a fair hearing” were less dramatic, but just as narrow. The Supreme Court read these phrases as doing little more than incorporating the common law rules of procedural fairness. For further analysis of the Bill of Rights equality decisions, see Carissima Mathen, “Equality Before the Charter: Reflections on Fraser v Canada” (2021) SCLR (2d) (forthcoming).

The Bill of Rights is still in force. Some of its terms are occasionally discussed, especially two sections that are wider than the corresponding sections of the Charter—s 1(a), which specifically includes “property,” and s 2(e), which requires a “fair hearing” for determination of rights and obligations: see Singh v Minister of Employment and Immigration, [1985] 1 SCR 177, 1985 CanLII 65; Authorson v Canada (AG), 2003 SCC 39. Even though it has occasionally been used as a ground for decision, the Bill of Rights has been almost totally eclipsed by the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

To some extent, the entrenchment of the Charter has rendered the ambiguities of common law constitutionalism less important. In what circumstances might the common law constitution continue to be relevant today?

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

THE ADVENT OF THE CHARTER

I. Introduction	16-1
II. The Adoption of the Charter	16-1
III. The Merits of Entrenchment and the Legitimacy of Judicial Review	16-17

I. INTRODUCTION

In the introduction to this book, we briefly described the constitutional renovation that Canada undertook in 1982. The 1982 amendments stand as the first major reconstruction of Canada's written constitution since 1867. One of the most important of these changes was the adoption of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (the Charter), which we begin to study in this chapter and which occupies the rest of the book. This chapter is composed of two topics. The first is an introduction to the history of the Charter's adoption. This material situates the Charter in its historical and political context, both domestic and international. It also introduces the division of opinion over the substance of the Charter and the process of its adoption. The point of view of Quebec, the sole province not to have agreed to patriation, and the struggles of Indigenous peoples to have their voices heard, will also be examined. The second topic gives an overview of the ongoing debate about the legitimacy of judicial enforcement of constitutionally guaranteed rights and freedoms.

II. THE ADOPTION OF THE CHARTER

The Charter project formally began at a federal–provincial first ministers' conference in January of 1968. Then Justice Minister Pierre Trudeau, at the beginning of his political career, tabled a document entitled "A Canadian Charter of Human Rights," an excerpt from which follows. Among other things, it traced the historical origins and evolution of modern conceptions of human rights.

The Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau, Minister of Justice, A Canadian Charter of Human Rights, January 1968

in Anne Bayefsky, Canada's Constitution Act 1982 and Amendments: A Documentary History (Toronto: McGraw-Hill Ryerson, 1989) at 51-53
(footnotes omitted)

Interest in human rights is as old as civilization itself. Once his primary requirements of security, shelter and nourishment have been satisfied, man has distinguished himself from other animals by directing his attention to those matters which affect his individual dignity.

In ancient times, and for centuries thereafter, these rights were known as "natural" rights; rights to which all men were entitled because they are endowed with a moral and rational nature. The denial of such rights was regarded as an affront to "natural" law—those elementary principles of justice which apply to all human beings by virtue of their common possession of the capacity to reason. These natural rights were the origins of the western world's more modern concepts of individual freedom and equality.

Cicero said of natural law that it was "unchanging and everlasting," that it was "one eternal and unchangeable law ... valid for all nations and for all times."

In the Middle Ages, St. Thomas Aquinas emphasized that natural law was a law superior to man-made laws and that as a result all rulers were themselves subject to it.

The Reformation brought sharply to the fore the need for protection of freedom of religious belief.

As the concept of the social contract theory of government developed in the 18th century, still greater emphasis came to be given to the rights of the individual. Should a government fail to respect natural rights, wrote Locke and Rousseau, then disobedience and rebellion were justified. Thus was borne the modern notion of human rights. So responsive were men to this notion that the greatest social revolutions in the history of the western world took place—one in America and the other in France—in order to preserve for individuals the rights which they claimed belonged to them.

This deep-seated desire for recognition of human dignity is reflected in the memorable words of the American Declaration of Independence:

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights Governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, that whenever any form of Government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it and institute new Government

The Bill of Rights in the United States, enacted as an amendment to the Constitution, serves to safeguard the individual from governmental intolerance of the "unalienable rights."

In France, the 1789 Declaration of the Rights of Man and the Citizen sought to achieve similar results. "Men are born and remain free and equal in respect of rights" it said. "The purpose of all civil associations is the preservation of the natural and imprescriptible rights of man. These rights are liberty, property and resistance to oppression."

In both the United States and France, there was embodied the idea that men shall not be deprived of liberty or property except in accordance with the law. This is a manifestation of the belief that men should be ruled by laws, not men; that a government has no more power than the people have agreed to delegate to it.

Monarchies, as well as republics, are influenced by these principles; the authority of kings, as well as presidents, is limited. Many of the Commonwealth countries which inherited a tradition of parliamentary sovereignty have introduced constitutional restrictions, denying to the parliament as well as to the monarch the power to interfere with certain of the subjects' liberties. Constitutional checks on the exercise of governmental authority are a natural development in a democratic society.

The events of the Second World War were disturbing proof of the need to safeguard the rights of individuals. It is not by accident that an overwhelming number of newly independent states have included within their constitutions comprehensive bills of rights. Since 1945 considerable discussion has taken place in Canada as well concerning similar constitutional measures. The topic has been considered by the Canadian Bar Association, by parliamentary committees, and by numerous commentators. While no constitutional step has been taken, some legislative enactments designed to protect human rights have been passed into law. Parliament in 1960 enacted the Canadian Bill of Rights—a step of considerable significance and one which prepares the way for a constitutional enactment. Several provinces have introduced human rights legislation, and a committee engaged in revision of the Quebec Civil Code has recently proposed that a declaration of civil rights be included in the revised code.

These measures are all evidence of the interest of the Canadian people in some form of safeguard of individual liberty. To date, however, there does not exist in Canada any form of guarantee (beyond those few contained in the British North America Act) which a provincial legislature or Parliament, as the case may be, cannot repeal as freely as any other statute it has enacted. In this sense, no Canadian has the benefit of a constitutional protection as exists in dozens of other countries.

An entrenched bill of rights would offer this constitutional protection, although at the price of some restriction on the theory of legislative supremacy. It is suggested that this is not too high a price to pay. In fact the theory of legislative supremacy is seldom pressed to its full extent. Indeed, even in England, the birthplace of parliamentary government, fundamental liberties have been protected not only through the common law but also by means of such historic documents as Magna Carta (1215), the Petition of Right (1628), and the Bill of Rights (1689). The purpose of an entrenched bill of rights is simple and straightforward. It has been described as serving "to withdraw certain subjects from the vicissitudes of political controversy, to place them beyond the reach of majorities and officials and to establish them as legal principles to be applied by the courts. One's right to life, liberty, and property, to free speech and a free press, freedom of worship and assembly, and other fundamental rights may not be submitted to vote; they depend on the outcome of no elections."

A constitutional bill of rights in Canada would guarantee the fundamental freedoms of the individual from interference, whether federal or provincial. It would as well establish that all Canadians, in every part of Canada, have equal rights. This would constitute a major first step towards basic constitutional reform.

Canada could not choose a more appropriate year than this one for the consideration of a constitutional bill of rights for Canadians. 1968 has been declared International Human Rights Year by the General Assembly of the United Nations. The General Assembly has done so as an acknowledgement that the centuries-old interest in human rights is now, in the mid-twentieth century, of universal scope. The preamble of the United Nations Charter declares that the peoples of the United Nations are determined "to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women." As a reflection of this determination, the United Nations in 1948 adopted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Since that date some 15 separate conventions or treaties have been sponsored by the UN dealing with particular rights of a more specialized character. Only last year, however, were those rights which are generally regarded as "fundamental" formulated into two Covenants, (The International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights; The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights) open for signature and ratification by all states.

It is the hopeful expectation of the General Assembly that in 1968 an aroused awareness by all peoples will result in government action everywhere. Canada has the opportunity to take a lead in this respect.

Interpretations of our recent constitutional discontents have focused overwhelmingly on domestic factors. Demands and responses, inputs and outputs, have been conceived in an insular fashion, almost as if Canadians inhabited a separate planet under their total control, and so minimal attention has been paid to our location in an international network of states and peoples. ...

In contrast, the pervasive international dimension to our struggles has received little concentrated attention.

The Erosion of Britishness

For the Fathers of Confederation, parliamentary responsible government was a positive heritage that differentiated Canada from the United States and gratifyingly confirmed the evolutionary nature of Canadian constitutional development. ... In the post-1945 period, the status of parliamentary government in Canada was weakened by the relative decline of the country of its origin—as a world power, as a centre of empire, and as an economic leader. ...

British parliamentary supremacy no longer seemed so central to Canadian identity as the prestige and status associated with connection to the United Kingdom eroded. Although as late as the 1950s, opposition to a growing support for a Canadian Bill of Rights could still be justified in terms of defending our British heritage, and by tarring a Bill of Rights with the stigma of Americanism, by the 1970s such arguments appeared strained. By the time of the 1980-1 Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada, dealing with the proposed constitutional resolution to be transmitted to Westminster, the remaining defenders of parliamentary supremacy were clearly in retreat. The dominant thrust of the interveners was to strengthen the Charter. ...

Growing support for a Charter in Canada was facilitated by removal of specific impediments. In this connection, the abolition of appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in 1949 made a little-noticed indirect contribution to the lessening of support for parliamentary supremacy and to the provision of a positive environment in which Charter support could more easily grow. ...

More generally, national support for a Bill of Rights in the 1950s was part of the historic colony-to-nation movement that had propelled successive steps in Canadian independence from Great Britain. In contrast to the overtly political purpose of constraining centrifugal pressures that drove the federal government's support for a Charter in the late 1960s and the 1970s, the earlier support had "less to do with leashing the provinces and more to do with the evolution of the symbolic basis of the Canadian Constitution from the authority of the British Parliament to that of the people of Canada." ...

The capacity of parliamentary government to sustain a sense of Canadian distinctiveness in North America was conditioned by time and circumstance. It appears in retrospect that the traditional, positive evaluation of parliamentary government, unconstrained by entrenched rights, was intimately linked to the status of the United Kingdom as a great power and to the related tendency for many English Canadians to define themselves as British as long as significant domestic prestige continued to flow from the British connection. As that connection lost its instrumental value, Canadian support for the constitutional theory of parliamentary supremacy was weakened, along with a cluster of values, intellectual orientations, and practices that had previously given the Canadian constitution, and commentary on it, a distinctly British cast. ...

The weakened appreciation for this formerly potent symbol of Canadian constitutional identity created a gap in the constitutional symbolism of an almost completely autonomous nation. The Charter that emerged to fill that gap brought entrenched rights, judicial supremacy, and a greatly enhanced role for the written portion of the constitution—all of which further distanced Canadians from their British constitutional origins.

From the 1950s to the 1980s, the declining allegiance to the British parliamentary side of Canadian political life coincided with selective interest in and positive appraisal of American constitutional theory and practice.

The International Rights Dimension

In 1968, Maxwell Cohen attributed the novel and dramatic Canadian interest in "human rights" to transformed international and domestic beliefs which had "altered totally beyond anything that could have been imagined two decades before." "Human rights," he continued, "became ... within the past twenty years, an important piece of 'debating' language ... part of the political dialogue, part of the debating experience of peoples in all parts of the world, even those in affluent societies."

The most influential catalyst of that transformed climate of Canadian and international opinion was the United Nations, one of whose purposes has been to foster respect for fundamental freedoms and human rights. Its 1945 Charter, followed by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adopted as a unanimous resolution of the General Assembly in 1948, and subsequent international covenants on Civil and Political Rights and on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights have been influential in channelling and stimulating a "rights" debate in Canada. ...

Initial Canadian responses to the inclusion of rights in the UN Charter, and to the subsequent Universal Declaration, were distinctly lukewarm. Canadian officials asserted the superior protection of rights under the British tradition, which they rather smugly contrasted with American experience, and also stressed the constitutional limitations of federalism in which some rights pertained to matters under provincial jurisdiction. Although the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (1947-8) and the Special Committee of the Senate on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (1950) were explicit responses to the requirement for an analysis of Canadian practice in the light of the Charter and the Universal Declaration, they did not result in a Canadian version of the Charter. Nevertheless, it was standard practice for advocates of a Canadian Bill of Rights from the late 1940s on to cite the UN Charter and the Universal Declaration in support of their position Thirty years later, nearly all the civil liberties and human rights organizations that appeared before the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada (1980-1) stressed Canadian obligations under UN international covenants. Human Rights Commissioner Gordon Fairweather, after citing various UN instruments, by means of which Canada has "increased her accountability to the world community" asserted that such obligations could not be met without an entrenched Charter binding on both orders of government.

Thus the direct and indirect proselytizing on behalf of rights by the United Nations challenged regimes practising federalism and employing parliamentary supremacy to modify their constitutional arrangements, as a Bill of Rights became an almost essential attribute of contemporary statehood. Accordingly, it is not surprising that a Bill of Rights has become virtually an automatic component of new constitutions, or that Bills of Rights have become increasingly comprehensive, or that an established state such as Canada, that had long existed without an entrenched Charter, has recently introduced one.

Peter Russell, "The Political Purposes of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms"

(1983) 61:1 Can Bar Rev 30 at 30-36 (footnotes omitted)

[This article explores two purposes of the Charter: (1) to contribute to national unity, and (2) to protect rights. The excerpt that follows is limited to the first purpose; it is included to give some understanding of the national political context of the making of the Charter.]

To understand the national unity rationale of the Charter, it is necessary to recall the context in which the federal government made a charter its number one priority for constitutional reform.

In the mid-1960's right up to the Confederation of Tomorrow Conference organized by the Premier of Ontario, John Robarts, in the fall of 1967, the Liberal Government in Ottawa was not interested in constitutional reform of any kind. Patriation with an amending formula [in what was known as the "Fulton-Favereau formula"] had been very nearly achieved in 1964. Since then only Quebec had been pushing for constitutional change. But Quebec had drastically raised the stakes. [Quebec politicians] insisted that the price of Quebec's support for patriation of the Canadian Constitution would be agreement on substantive constitutional reform giving Quebec more recognition and power as the French Canadian homeland. This demand of Quebec provincial leaders for major constitutional change reflected a wholly new phase in Quebec nationalism. Historically the constitutional position of Quebec leaders had been profoundly conservative. Their prime concern had been to preserve the rights they believed had been acquired for Quebec and French Canada in the constitution of 1867. But now, under the impetus of Quebec's "quiet revolution," the province's leading politicians had become constitutional radicals. So long as these Quebec demands for radical change were the central preoccupation of constitutional debate, it was not in the federal government's interest to encourage the process of constitutional reform. The proposals likely to dominate such a debate, if they went far enough to placate Quebec nationalism, would either go too far in weakening the involvement of the federal government in the life of Quebec or else give Quebec representatives in federal institutions such a privileged place as to alienate opinion in the rest of the country. So the Pearson government at first tried to respond to Quebec through pragmatic adjustments in fiscal and administrative arrangements and took a dim view of Premier Robarts' constitutional initiative.

However, the very success of the Confederation of Tomorrow Conference ... seemed to convince the Prime Minister and his Justice Minister, Pierre Trudeau, who was soon to succeed him, that a different strategy was needed. The constitutional issue could no longer be kept on the back burner. But if constitutional reform was to be seriously pursued, it was essential that Quebec's demands be countered by proposals designed to have a unifying effect on Canada. It was at this point that the federal government urged that a charter of rights be at the top of the constitutional reform agenda.

After the Confederation of Tomorrow Conference, Prime Minister Pearson suggested to the provincial governments "that first priority should be given to that part of the Constitution which should deal with the rights of the individual—both his rights as a citizen of a democratic federal state and his rights as a member of the linguistic community in which he has chosen to live." This was the position his government took at the Constitutional Conference in February 1968. Prime Minister Trudeau took exactly the same position. His government's paper prepared for the February 1969 Constitutional Conference repeated the commitment to a charter of rights as the first priority in constitutional change. "To reach agreement on common values," Trudeau argued, was "an essential first step" in any process of constitutional renewal. From this point until the final enactment of the Constitution Act, 1982, giving constitutional expression to fundamental rights including language rights was the Trudeau government's first constitutional priority. And throughout, the fundamental basic rationale for this constitutional strategy was the perceived value of such a measure as a popular and unifying counter to decentralizing provincial demands in the Canadian constitutional debate.

The Charter's attractiveness to the leaders of the federal Liberal Party as the centrepiece of their constitutional strategy was decisive in improving the political fortunes of the project of entrenching rights and freedoms in the Canadian constitution. Since World War II there had been a great deal of discussion of the Bill of Rights idea both within and outside Parliament. The prime stimulus of this discussion was international—the concern for human rights arising from the war against fascism and Canada's obligations under the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights. Domestic events also stimulated interest in a Bill of Rights. At the federal level, there was regret concerning the treatment of Japanese Canadians during the war and the denial of traditional legal rights in the investigation of a spy ring following the Gouzenko disclosures in 1946. At the provincial level the persecution of Jehovah's Witnesses by the Duplessis administration in Quebec, the treatment of Doukhobors and other religious minorities in the west and the repression of trade unionism in Newfoundland were major causes célèbres. There was also a touch of the national unity theme in the submissions made on a number of occasions to parliamentary committees on the implications of post-war immigration. The addition of such large numbers of new Canadians with no education or experience in liberal democratic values, it was argued, meant that Canada could no longer rely on the British method of protecting civil liberties. For such a heterogeneous population a written code was needed. Liberal leaders were not moved by these arguments for a Canadian Bill of Rights. The CCF was the only national party to commit itself to establishing a Bill of Rights. And it was under a Progressive Conservative government led by John Diefenbaker that a statutory Bill of Rights affecting only the federal level of government was enacted in 1960.

Pierre Trudeau, before he entered politics and joined the Liberal Party, expressed interest in a constitutional Bill of Rights. In 1965, as a legal academic writing a background paper on how to deal with the Quebec agitation for constitutional change, he placed a Bill of Rights in first place on his list of constitutional reform proposals. But the main thrust of his paper was to dissuade Quebecers from relying on constitutional reform to solve their problems of political and social modernization. His constitutional reform proposals were for "some day" in the future. Whenever a Bill of Rights was added to the constitution, he saw the abolition of the federal power of reservation and disallowance over provincial legislation as a logical quid pro quo. This emphasis on the connection between a constitutional Bill of Rights and the federal powers of reservation and disallowance underlines a constitutional charter's capacity for imposing national standards on the provinces. This link appeared again in the Trudeau government's 1978 constitutional initiative but was not part of the constitutional package which contained the new Charter. To have made a change in powers a quid pro quo for a charter of rights would not have fitted in very well with a political campaign in which the charter was being sold as part of a "people's package" and provincial premiers were being chastised for trying to swap rights for powers. In any event, by 1967 that distant day when constitutional reforms should be undertaken had suddenly arrived. Speaking to the Canadian Bar Association as Justice Minister in 1967 Trudeau announced his government's conclusion that a constitutional Bill of Rights proposal was "the best basis on which to begin a dialogue on constitution reform between the federal government and provincial governments," and he emphasized that in taking this approach: "Essentially we will be testing—and, hopefully, establishing—the unity of Canada."

After 1967 there were factors other than constitutional strategy which provided additional reasons for adopting a constitutional charter of rights. The application of the European Convention on Human Rights to the United Kingdom, Canada's accession to the International Covenant of Civil and Political Rights in 1976 and the enactment of human rights legislation by most of the Canadian provinces increased Canadian interest in a constitutional codification of basic rights. The invocation of the War Measures Act in 1970 and the excesses of the RCMP's Security Service stimulated civil libertarian interest in a constitutional Bill of Rights, as did the Supreme Court's generally narrow interpretation of the "Diefenbaker" Bill. But I doubt that any of these developments had much to do with the Trudeau government's commitment to the Charter—except insofar as they indicated greater public support for such a measure.

Aside from the political and strategic advantages of the Charter, it may also have had some purely intellectual or even aesthetic attractions for Mr. Trudeau and some of his colleagues. Federal government position papers put forward the view that the rational approach to the constitution was to begin with a statement of the fundamental values of the Canadian political community. This notion of constitutional rationality, of the constitution as a logical construct built on an explicit formulation of first principles, may be a manifestation of French rationalism and the civil law tradition with its penchant for deduction from codified principles in contrast with English empiricism and the inductive nature of common law. Even if there is some validity in this kind of ethnic stereotyping, it surely cannot account for the strength of the Trudeau government's political commitment to the Charter.

That commitment proved to be very strong indeed. A version of a constitutional Bill of Rights took pride of place in the Victoria Charter which Mr. Trudeau came so close to negotiating successfully with the provincial Premiers in 1971. Again in 1978 when, in response to the electoral victory of the separatists in Quebec, the federal government embarked on another serious programme of constitutional reform, a constitutional charter, albeit one which at first would not bind the provinces, was given a prominent position. But it was the inclusion of a constitutional Charter of Rights binding on the provinces in the package of constitutional change which Mr. Trudeau threatened to achieve, if necessary, unilaterally without provincial support that demonstrates how deeply he and his government believed in its benefits. At this point, when federal-provincial negotiations on the constitution were at an impasse, it would have been ever so much easier, from a political point of view, for the federal government to have proceeded simply with patriation and an amending formula. The insistence on coupling a constitutional charter with patriation shows how strongly the Trudeau government believed in the nation-building potential of a constitutional charter. They would risk dividing the country in order that it might become more united. This nation-building aspect of the Charter was the central thesis of Mr. Trudeau's final parliamentary speech on the Charter.

Lorraine Weinrib, "Of Diligence and Dice: Reconstituting Canada's Constitution"

(1992) 42:2 UTLJ 207 (footnotes omitted)

The story [of the Charter] began in earnest in the early 1960s, when the project was simply patriation with an amending formula in order to remove the last remaining legal vestige of colonial status—the exclusive power of the British Parliament at Westminster to amend the British North America Act. ...

The Report of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism in 1967 broadened the agenda beyond patriation with an amending formula to include language rights in the political process, in government services at every level, and in minority language education. ... [T]his report ... precipitat[ed] the genesis of our current Charter in the form of a discussion paper, prepared under the name of then Minister of Justice Pierre Trudeau, for a federal–provincial meeting held in February 1968, proposing A Canadian Charter of Human Rights. ...

This stage of discussions culminated in a text prepared for the June 1971 First Ministers' Conference, in Victoria, British Columbia: the Canadian Constitutional Charter, 1971, known as the Victoria Charter. ...

A study of the Victoria Charter illuminates some of the distinctive features of the Charter as we know it. The range of rights in the Victoria Charter was more limited than Mr. Trudeau's initial proposal or the Charter's eventual formulation. The proposed text did not guarantee legal rights, economic rights, mobility rights or egalitarian rights. It extended protection to "political freedoms" only, including the fundamental freedoms of thought, conscience and religion; of opinion and expression; and peaceful assembly and association. The effect was to negate the exercise of government power rather than to require it. The text also affirmed universal suffrage and eligibility for elected office, free democratic elections, as well as other features of the parliamentary system. In addition, English and French were to become the official languages of Canada, with "status and protection" formulated in language rights in the political process, in the judicial system and in communication with government. There was, however, no provision for rights to minority language education.

[There was also] an express provision for limitation of rights. This express limitation clause marked the text as one in the family of post second world war rights protecting instruments, which—unlike, for example, the United States Bill of Rights—set out express grounds for judicial limits upon otherwise protected interests.

As the excerpt above indicates, the drive to patriate the Constitution was initially motivated by a desire to reach agreement on a domestic amending formula or formulas that would not require the participation of Westminster. Two agreements on an amending formula nearly achieved success—the 1964 Fulton-Favreau formula and the formula proposed in the 1971 Victoria Charter. Both gave a veto to Quebec, but in the end, Quebec signed neither. The persistent failure to agree on a domestic amending formula was one of several factors that contributed to an emerging spectre of the possible secession of Quebec from the federation.

Jean Leclair, "Constitutional Principles in the Secession Reference"

in Nathalie Des Rosiers, Patrick Macklem & Peter Oliver, eds, The Oxford Handbook of the Canadian Constitution (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2017) 1009 (footnotes omitted)

Tensions reached a climax when the Parti Québécois (PQ), a political party intent on seeking independence, took power in 1976 and held a referendum on a sovereignty-association proposal on May 20 1980. As the referendum question illustrates, the PQ did not seek straightforward secession, neither did it want to sever all economic ties with Canada:

The Government of Quebec has made public its proposal to negotiate a new agreement with the rest of Canada, based on the equality of nations; this agreement would enable Quebec to acquire the exclusive power to make its laws, levy its taxes and establish relations abroad—in other words, sovereignty—and at the same time to maintain with Canada an economic association including a common currency; any change in political status resulting from these negotiations will only be implemented with popular approval through another referendum; on these terms, do you give the Government of Quebec the mandate to negotiate the proposed agreement between Quebec and Canada?

The "No" side won the day with a little less than 60% of the votes cast. Six nights before the fateful day, the federal Prime Minister Pierre Elliot Trudeau, a Quebecer himself, addressed a huge crowd in Montreal (Quebec's metropolis), and pledged that, if the "No" side won, this would be "interpreted [by the central government and the other provinces] as a mandate to change the Constitution, to renew federalism." Referring to his cabinet, he stated: "I can make a most solemn commitment that following a NO vote, we will immediately take action to renew the constitution and we will not stop until we have done that." This pledge would soon come back to haunt him (and the rest of the country).

In the days that followed the referendum, the federal government immediately took action, trying to reach agreement with the provinces on a new constitutional package. These attempts having all met with failure, on October 2 1980, Ottawa announced its decision to proceed unilaterally. The United Kingdom Parliament would be asked to amend the Canadian constitution, even in the face of provincial opposition. The "patriation" proposal would include, among other things, an amending formula similar to the one introduced in the 1971 Victoria Charter, to which would be added the possibility of resorting to a referendum to bypass the need for provincial assent, and a Charter of rights and freedoms whose language rights guarantees clashed with the most controversial provisions of the Charter of the French Language adopted by the PQ in 1977 to make French the common public language of the province.

Eight of the ten provinces (including Quebec) objected to the proposal and three of them referred the question of the legality of Ottawa's unilateral action to their appeal courts. The latter's divided opinions paved the way for an appeal to the Supreme Court. In Re: Resolution to amend the Constitution, [1981] 1 SCR 753, at 808 (Patriation Reference), a majority of the Court recognized "the untrammeled authority at law" of Parliament to adopt a resolution unilaterally requesting amendments to the constitution. However, a differently constituted majority concluded that it would be "unconstitutional in the conventional sense" to do so without "at least [obtaining] a substantial measure of provincial consent" (at 808, 805). A year later, in Re: Objection by Quebec to a Resolution to amend the Constitution, [1982] 2 SCR

793, the Court would unanimously conclude that Quebec had no conventional power of veto over constitutional amendments affecting its legislative competence. ...

The Court's decision forced an unwilling Prime Minister back to the table. However, the fragility of the alliance between the eight opposing provinces would soon be demonstrated. Prior to the Court's decision, in April 1981, the "Gang of Eight" had agreed upon a counter-proposal containing an amending formula according to which no provinces had a veto. Nevertheless, it provided that a province wishing to do so could opt out of any amendment transferring jurisdiction from the provinces to the federal parliament. Quebec's Premier, René Lévesque, leader of the now enfeebled PQ government, had agreed to abandon Quebec's veto only on condition that full financial compensation would be guaranteed to provinces opting out. In spite of this agreement, at the end of the hectic three days conference held in Ottawa in the first week of November 1981, in what would become in Quebec's myth-ideology "the night of the long knives," nine provincial premiers finally struck a deal with the federal government that left Quebec on the sidelines. They succeeded in brokering this agreement only by acquiescing to jettison the right to opt out with full compensation. Although René Lévesque and his government bear part of the responsibility for the constitutional isolation of Quebec during this episode, and although it is hard to imagine how a man who had dedicated his entire political life to seeking the independence of Quebec could have agreed to a new federal deal, it remains that the other provinces and the federal government took the (mis)calculated risk of amending the Canadian Constitution, and thus the Canadian State fabric, without the consent of Quebec's political elites.

On the night of the May 14, 1980, the federal prime minister had not specified how and in which direction he intended to steer the promised constitutional changes. Undoubtedly, however, a great number of Quebecers had not expected him to proceed without Quebec's approval. What some experienced as disappointment was felt by others as treason.

This is most unfortunate since most Quebecers did not object so much to the content of the constitutional reform, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms always having been enthusiastically embraced by Quebecers, as with the manner of its adoption. They objected to the fact that the province of Quebec was treated as just any other province. They were also concerned that Canada would from thence on, from a federal society, morph into one essentially made up of equal rights-bearing citizens gradually focussing their primary allegiance on the institutions of the Federal government rather than on their province's local institutions.

Marc E Gold, "The Mask of Objectivity: Politics and Rhetoric in the Supreme Court of Canada"

(1985) 7 SCLR (2d) 462 at 463-66 (footnotes omitted)

No one has explained adequately why the Quebec delegation was excluded from the meeting, although it seems clear why the other provinces were prepared to strike some deal with the federal government. Public opinion was shifting away from the provinces. Canadians supported the idea of patriation and favoured an entrenched Charter of Rights. The provincial governments were afraid to pay the political cost of appearing to act as obstructionists to a plan supported by a majority of their constituents. In any event, the Quebec delegation was kept in the dark about this crucial meeting and, to this day, no provincial official has explained the exclusion of Quebec to the government of Quebec itself. The inference is irresistible: the provinces were willing to abandon Quebec in the interest of securing a deal, but were embarrassed to confront the government of Quebec with this decision until after it had been reached.

The political consequences to the government of Quebec were considerable. The government had failed to safeguard Quebec's interests in negotiations and was condemned by the opposition Liberals in the National Assembly. Nonetheless, the event could be turned to some political advantage with the Quebec electorate. In its most innocent light, the result might convince the people of Quebec that they could not trust the other provinces (read English Canada) to respect the position of Quebec: only the government of Quebec could be relied upon to defend the interests of the province. More cynically perhaps, the exclusion of Quebec provided the Parti Québécois government with a powerful new weapon in its drive to secure the independence of Quebec. Having been roundly assailed for having joined the common front and abandoning the claim for a constitutional veto, the Parti Québécois was given a new lease on life. Whether fueled by a genuine sense of betrayal at the hands of the other provinces, motivated by partisan political considerations or most likely by both, the government of Quebec was not about to let events unravel passively.

The Charter was intended to foster a new sense of Canadian patriotism, as the earlier extract from Peter Russell lays out. But did it achieve this purpose? Scholars, including Russell, doubt it. In the following excerpt, Sujit Choudhry examines the claim that the Charter was only partially successful in building this sense of Canadian patriotism. Among other developments, Choudhry ties the debate over the recognition of Quebec as a nation (or a distinct society) to the inability of the Charter to instigate a sense of national identity.

Sujit Choudhry, "Bills of Rights as Instruments of Nation-Building in Multinational States: The Canadian Charter and Quebec Nationalism" in J Kelly & C Manfredi, eds, Contested Constitutionalism: Reflections on the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (Vancouver: UBC Press, 2009) 233 at 235, 241-47 (footnotes omitted)

[W]hile the Charter has been an effective tool for anglophone nation building, it has been unsuccessful in combating Quebec (read francophone) nationalism. Indeed, not only did the Charter not offset Quebec's nationalism, it may also have made things worse. This is a cautionary tale to plurinational polities faced with the same challenge as Canada—of building a common political identity against the backdrop of competing nationalisms and attempting to do so through a bill of rights.

... [T]he Charter was also intended to function constitutively as the germ of pan-Canadian constitutional patriotism. As Federalism for the Future states, "a constitution is more than a legal document; it is an expression of how the people within a state may achieve their social, economic and cultural aspirations through the exercise and control of political authority."

In a federal state such as Canada, since citizens share these rights irrespective of language or province of residence, a bill of rights serves as a transcendent form of political identification—the spine of common citizenship that unites members of a linguistically diverse and geographically dispersed polity across the country as a whole. Cairns puts this point well: "[T]he Charter fosters a conception of citizenship that defines Canadians as equal bearers of rights independent of provincial location. This legitimizes a citizen [sic] concern for the treatment of fellow Canadians by other than one's own provincial government."

Russell's skepticism of the constitutive effects of a bill of rights—which is shared by Dion—stems from an underlying skepticism regarding the efficacy of symbolic constitutionalism. For both individuals, a constitution can only become a source of political identification and the basis of a national identity because of its concrete effects on public policy. Subsequent experience has proven that Russell was right and wrong. Outside of Quebec, the Charter has generated a new pan-Canadian patriotism, likely much more quickly than even the most optimistic predictions suggested. However, within Quebec, the Charter has decidedly not had this effect. The Charter has not served to bind francophone Quebecers to the Canadian constitutional order. Indeed, the sharply differentiated effect of the Charter on Canadian constitutional culture suggests that it may now be harder, because of the Charter, to build a unifying account of the Canadian constitutional order that transcends linguistic and regional divides.

The conflicting reactions to the Meech Lake Accord within and outside Quebec powerfully illustrate these points. Outside of Quebec, the public reaction to Meech Lake was very hostile . . . There were two points of criticism. The first was the process whereby the accord was reached. The proposed constitutional amendments were arrived at as the result of closed-door negotiations between the premiers and the prime minister. The complete package was then presented to the Canadian public as a fait accompli, a seamless whole that could not be altered for fear that the whole deal would unravel. As a legal matter, this approach grew out of the relevant procedures for constitutional amendment themselves, which required the consent of the two chambers of federal Parliament and the provincial legislatures.

During the Meech Lake process, citizens outside Quebec rejected this process for constitutional change by rejecting its underlying theory. They asserted themselves, not the governments, as the constituent actors in the constitutional process. . . The Charter had transformed Canadians outside Quebec into constitutional actors and the basic agents of constitutional change. As the Charlottetown process made clear, Canadian constitutional culture would not permit constitutional amendments without widespread public consultation.

The transformative effect of the Charter on constitutional culture also explains the hostile reaction to perhaps the central provision in the Meech Lake Accord—the distinct society clause. The clause would have mandated that the Constitution be interpreted to recognize "that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society" and would have affirmed "[t]he role of the legislature and Government of Quebec to preserve and promote the distinct identity of Quebec." . . . [T]he precise legal effect of the clause was the subject of widespread contestation. Outside Quebec, the fear was that the clause would provide for the unequal application of the Charter[.] . . .

Now the question is why the unequal effect of the Charter mattered at all. Canadian public policy has long been differentiated on a provincial or regional basis because of vast differences in demography and the structure of the economy. The answer was that for Canadians outside Quebec . . . the potential for its unequal application across Canada was an assault on a basic, non-negotiable term of the Canadian social contract and the very identity of the country. . . .

However, within Quebec, the view on the distinct society clause was exactly the opposite, rooted in a particular account of the history and origins of Canada. For Quebec, the adoption of federalism and the creation of Quebec was a direct response to the failure of the United Province of Canada, a British colony that resulted from the merger of the previous colonies of Lower Canada (later Quebec) and Upper Canada (later Ontario), which existed between 1840 and 1867. The history here is complex. In brief, citizens of both Lower and Upper Canada elected equal numbers of representatives to a legislative assembly, although the largely francophone citizens of the former outnumbered the largely anglophone citizens of the latter. The language of government was meant to be English. The goal behind the merger and departure from representation by population was to facilitate the assimilation of francophones . . . As time went on, Upper Canada became more populous and demanded greater representation in the joint legislature, which was resisted by francophones who feared they would be outvoted on matters important to their identity. The result was political paralysis. Federalism was the solution—providing for representation by population at the federal level but also creating a Quebec with jurisdiction over those matters crucial to the survival of a francophone society in that province, such as education through institutions that operated in French.

So, to Quebec, Canada is unintelligible except against the backdrop of the idea that the institutions of federalism are designed to protect Quebec's linguistic distinctiveness. This idea is at the heart of the "two nations" or "dualist" theory of Canada. Yet, the odd thing about the Canadian Constitution is that it lacks express recognition of this fact and treats Quebec on a basis of juridical equality to the other provinces. On the symbolic front, the Constitution is absolutely silent on who Canadians were, or were not, to be. This silence may be nothing more than a function of the peculiar legal character and political function of the British North America Act, 1867 (BNA Act) as a statute of the British Parliament that granted Canada extensive powers of internal self-government but not independence. It may also reflect a lack of agreement on such a shared account at the time Canada came into being. Yet . . . whatever the reasons for this silence, the lack of such a statement did not come without its costs.

It was accompanied by a political culture outside of Quebec that refused to acknowledge the French-Canadian understanding of Confederation. . . . The distinct society clause therefore mattered a great deal because it was the first time the Constitution would explicitly acknowledge a view of what Canada was for. . . . Indeed, by the end of the Meech Lake process, the clause mattered much less for what it did than for what it said. And so the repudiation of the clause on the basis of a theory of Canada that was grounded in the Charter set up the Charter as an obstacle to, rather than as a central component of, how many Quebecers understood the nature of their relationship with Canada.

Now this is not the only reason that the Charter has failed to take in Quebec as the seed of pan-Canadian nationalism. Another strike against the Charter was the process whereby it was adopted, over Quebec's insistence that there was a constitutional convention granting it a veto over constitutional change. Patriation in the face of the asserted veto damaged the legitimacy of the 1982 Constitution in the eyes of many Quebecers. The claim of a veto for Quebec again derived from a constitutive account of the Canadian constitutional order, in which Canada was understood as a plurinational federation in which Quebec was a constituent actor. So any constitutional amendments that affected Quebec's ability to safeguard its linguistic identity (including its role in central institutions) would require its consent. . . .

The second reason is language. The stated aim of the Charter project was to serve as a common basis of citizenship that transcended the linguistic divide. The principal mechanism for doing so was minority language education rights provisions. These provisions . . . communicated a conception about the place of language in Canada, with two components. First, they were designed to inculcate a self-understanding in francophones that Canada as a whole was their home, not simply Quebec, and a corresponding set of understandings for anglophones in Quebec. Second, by detaching linguistic identity from a province of residence, by opting for personality over territoriality as the basis of language of education, and by granting a right for linguistic minorities to choose their linguistic identity, the Charter adopted a stance of neutrality on matters of linguistic choice.

This position challenged the very legitimacy of linguistic nation building by Quebec. Moreover, this constitutional choice was likely to be non-neutral in its effect on Quebec's ability to protect and promote the French language. Although the minority language rights provisions apply symmetrically to francophone minorities outside Quebec and the anglophone minority in Quebec, they are rather unequal in their impact ... [because] the economic pressures for francophones to assimilate are great. What this means is that for Quebec to continue as a French-speaking community in the modern world, it must adopt linguistic policies that in other provinces are unnecessary. The symmetrical character of the minority language education rights provisions conceals a lack of symmetry in fact. This lack of symmetry is symbolically important because it marks a repudiation of Quebec's understanding of what Canada is for.

Conclusion: Bills of Rights as Nation-Building Instruments in Plurinational Places

Had the Charter been effective at combating Quebec nationalism and serving as the glue of a pan-Canadian national identity, the last twenty-five years of constitutional politics would not have happened. There would have been no Meech Lake Accord, no Charlottetown Accord, and no referendum in 1995 in which the country came close to break-up because of the threat of a unilateral declaration of independence in the event of a yes vote. ...

It is very difficult for bills of rights on their own to serve a constituting role in defining a new political identity. Contrary to those who argue for the possibility of a pure "constitutional patriotism" based on the commitment to universalistic principles of political morality, ... [t]he Canadian experience tells us that in plurinational places, ... [t]he task is not simply to situate a bill of rights in a contingent historical and political context. The task is to do so in a context in which the existence of competing nationalisms makes the dominant question of constitutional politics the conflict between competing national narratives. If ... [a bill of rights is meant to stand apart from and transcend] these competing narratives, a plurinational context is a particularly difficult environment in which to do so. Indeed, there is the danger that rather than transcending those national narratives, a bill of rights will be drawn back into it. This is what has happened in Canada.

In 1981, then Prime Minister Trudeau convened the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution. During the hearings, which were televised for the first time, many provisions were debated. The following extract from Lorraine Weinrib explains how these hearings had an impact on the drafting of the institutional provisions of the Charter, including ss 1 and 33.

Lorraine E Weinrib, "Canada's Charter of Rights: Paradigm Lost?"

 (footnotes omitted)

With the adoption of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, 1982, Canada joined the family of nations operating under a postwar regime of rights-protection. This step marked the culmination of decades of discussion about the nature of rights and, as the debate matured, the institutional structure necessary to protect rights effectively in Canada. The challenge was to transform Canada's federal, parliamentary democracy into a modern, rights-protecting polity. Unlike other states making this transition, Canada did not create a special constitutional court or reconstruct its political institutions. It vested the new judicial review function in the existing courts, and, in addition, marked out an innovative constitutional role for the established legislatures.

Proposals to add a system of rights protection, to stand supreme over the routine exercise of public authority, precipitated discussions as to the comparative competence of courts and legislatures to serve the desired end with extensive reference to the experience of other countries as well as to Canada's international obligations.

In the final stages of the debate, the draft text delineating these functions attracted a remarkable degree of attention precipitating what was, in effect, an intensive national seminar on the substantive content and institutional structure of the modern constitutional state. Politicians wary of any reduction in their powers found themselves pitted against individuals and groups intent on securing precisely such restrictions. The question of institutional legitimacy figured so prominently that the final text of the Charter includes a complex array of institutional directives. These directives mark one of the distinctive features of the Charter. They set it apart from older texts such as the United States Bill of Rights, which does not refer to judicial review, as well as from modern rights-protecting instruments, which do formally establish judicial review but set down less institutional detail. Other countries, deliberating later on the same questions in their own national contexts, have considered the Canadian Charter as a distinctive model. ...

The decades-long debate produced a fascinating series of proposals as to institutional role, some expansive and others restrictive. These rejected alternatives shed light on the final design. They demonstrate that in following a postwar trend, the Charter project did not ignore or dismiss concerns raised as to the legitimacy of judicial review of legislation in a democracy. On the contrary, those involved in the Charter's genesis took that controversy very seriously and responded to it. ...

The most important elements of the Charter's institutional structure are to be found in two companion clauses: section 1, the guarantee and limitation clause, and section 33, the notwithstanding or override clause. ...

The historical material illuminates the ideas and models that informed the Charter's distinctive institutional features. First, the limitation formula, following the postwar model of rights-protecting instruments, requires the state to formulate, as law, any exercise of power that limits guaranteed rights. The second is that the remedial aspirations for Canada's Charter adopt the postwar model of rights-protection, in which the normativity of the guaranteed rights offers only one level of constitutional guarantee. The other level is provided by the strict terms of the limitation formula, which carry the normative content of the guarantees into the strictures for permissible limitation. [The limitation formula will be examined in Chapter 17, The Framework of the Charter.] The third is that the legislative override or notwithstanding clause, which applies only to certain rights, ... gives courts the last word [for a maximum period of five years] unless the constitutional context is transformed or the extraordinary consensus necessary for constitutional amendment is satisfied. [The notwithstanding clause will also be addressed in Chapter 17.]

NOTE: THE CONSTITUTION EXPRESS

The Special Joint Committee also heard from several groups, including Indigenous peoples. As Louise Mandell and Leslie Hall Pinder recall:

Before Christmas 1980, hundreds of Indigenous peoples scraped together funds and boarded a train in Vancouver, which they called the Constitution Express. The Express rolled across the country, picking up supporters and support along the way, making headlines day after day. When the train pulled into the Ottawa station, Trudeau announced that the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, which had previously excluded Indigenous participation, would extend its timetable to February 1981 to hear from Indigenous representatives.

See Louise Mandell & Leslie Hall Pinder, "Tracking Justice: The Constitution Express to s 35 and Beyond" in L Harder & S Patten, eds, Patriation and Its Consequences (Vancouver: UBC Press, 2015) 180 at 189.

In her work, Kiera Ladner shows that Indigenous leaders "found creative ways to force the players to acknowledge their existence, address their issues, and offer them a seat at future constitutional tables": see "An Indigenous Constitutional Paradox: Both Monumental Achievement and Monumental Defeat" in L Harder & S Patten, eds, Patriation and Its Consequences (Vancouver: UBC Press, 2015) 267 at 268. Ladner argues that the "attainment of constitutional change by Indigenous peoples was a monumental achievement given the assimilationist (even racist) context or paradigm within which such change was achieved" (at 268). But it was also viewed as "a monumental defeat." As Ladner writes, "Despite all of the efforts to place their issues on the constitutional table and protect Indigenous rights (ultimately through the inclusion of sections 25 and 35 of the Constitution Act 1982), most Aboriginal organizations viewed the amended constitution as a major defeat" (at 270).

For an overview of the debates held during the Joint Committee, see also Adam Dodek, The Charter Debates: The Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, 1980-81, and the Making of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2018).

III. THE MERITS OF ENTRENCHMENT AND THE LEGITIMACY OF JUDICIAL REVIEW

As Lorraine Weinrib wrote in "Canada's Charter of Rights: Paradigm Lost?" (above at 120):

[T]he Charter effected a revolutionary transformation of the Canadian polity from legislative supremacy to constitutional supremacy. The transformation changed the role of every public institution. The Supreme Court became the major agent of this transformation, mandated to bring the entire legal system into conformity with a complex new structure of rights-protection.

This transformation has not been without controversy. The following readings introduce you to the intense and prolific debate on the legitimacy of rights-based judicial review within Canada's democratic system of government. Some commentators reject the Charter altogether because it transforms the democratic structure of Canadian politics. Others praise it for the same reason.

These readings build on the introduction to judicial review and its legitimacy found in Chapter 2, Judicial Review and Constitutional Interpretation. Note the ways in which debates about the wisdom of entrenchment have turned into debates about the appropriate methodology for judicial interpretation of the Charter. Note as well the very different political orientations of the Charter critics—both the right and the left have mounted strong critiques of the Charter.

William A Bogart, Courts and Country: The Limits of Litigation and the Social and Political Life of Canada

(Toronto: Oxford University Press, 1994) at 256-70 (footnotes omitted)

In bluntest terms, two very different models of democracy are at stake. The first recognizes the power of the ballot that is curbed by independent and tenured judges who ensure that rationality and principle are never ejected by impetuous legislatures, rigid bureaucracies, and a dulled citizenry. In this model, courts will shelter the disadvantaged, who will harness that rationality and principle. The second model places its confidence in those who can claim the power of the ballot. Realistic about democracy's foibles, it is even more reserved about using judicial intervention to solve them. In this model, judges' independence and tenure make them unaccountable, élitist, and, at present in any event, unrepresentative. The apprehension is that far from invigorating democracy, judicial review will sap it with regressive decisions, progressive decisions that nonetheless blunt popular responses to societal problems, and barriers to access because of the costs of litigation. In this second model, those who seek social reform may have the most to lose in the courts. ...

The Case for the Charter

A fundamental argument favouring an entrenched bill of rights is that such a document allows individuals, particularly those with minority interests, to seek vindication in an open, public, and responsive process as opposed to legislators who may be unresponsive and, in any event, are more attentive to majority concerns Coupled with this argument is a claim that the coming of the Charter signals the full maturity of the Canadian legal system. This development, the end goal of which is an entrenched Charter, explains the Canadian courts' spotty record with the Bill of Rights. ...

Other more cautious bases for accepting the Charter stipulate certain conditions for its implementation. One condition rests on it being construed only to protect democracy's functioning and not to review substantive decisions made by elected officials. Fundamental to this view is the assertion that the Charter does not oblige a court "to test the substantive outcomes of the political process against some theory of the right or the good, but, instead, its focus is to assure the integrity of politics by buttressing the opportunities for public debate and collective deliberation." ...

Another condition to the acceptance and therefore justification of judicial review under the Charter is the existence and use of s. 33, which allows judicial decisions under most of the provisions of the Charter to be overridden by the competent legislative body. ...

The Case Against the Charter

In contrast, those who are opposed or at least indifferent to the Charter point out that the Charter and its accompanying judicial role did not come about because of the documentation of widespread abuse, nor did it arise from popular outcry. It was born as a device to shore up the centralizing tendencies that Pierre Trudeau believed were vital to enhance Quebec's stake in the nation and to check the forces of separatism led by his rival, René Lévesque. ...

Those who are opposed are hardly conspiratorial since many of them can agree about little else except their antagonism towards the document. The politics of many of them are left. For some of those so inclined, the vehemence against the judges arises because their role subverts any possibility of true democracy, which "means the greatest possible engagement by people in the greatest possible range of communal tasks and public action." In this conception, the Charter is a "reflection of the inherent contradiction of liberal ideology."

What is the basis for this leeriness, which ranges from scepticism to unbridled antagonism? Though presented in different forms, the arguments can be summarized in three points. The first concerns substantive outcomes and claims that the elected members of government and their agencies have been the more effective vehicle for improving the lives of most Canadians in many circumstances. The second relates to process and asserts that the best chance for a vigorous, responsive, and respected democracy comes from elected representatives. The third is about the costs of access to the courts which privilege the powerful and organized and thus allow them disproportionate use of judicial review, either to dismantle legislation and programs or to shield themselves from attack by government or other groups. These three points are comparative. This is not to deny that courts have sometimes acted in admirable ways or that there have been some progressive—even visionary—judges: on the Supreme Court alone names such as Rand, Laskin, Dickson, and Wilson easily come to mind. Nor is it to claim that legislatures and their agents have always reached just outcomes by adequate processes. What is contended is that relatively, the chance for greatest justice will come from legislatures. ...

The first argument claims that assistance of the disadvantaged and the poor, as well as ordinary citizens, has more often happened because of legislative action. Whether in health, occupational safety, workers' rights, housing, peace and order in the streets, or other aspects of life, the advancement has come because of the popular support of political will. In this view, government, while open to searing criticisms about waste and inefficiency, has also been the agent of civilizing and progressive change. It has mediated between those who wish laissez-faire and the enrichment of the few (regardless of the consequences) and those who insist upon a basic claim to entitlement for all. Conversely, this argument contends that the historical record reveals that courts, rather than achieving conditions to nurture and protect ordinary people in their everyday lives, have instead been uncaring or actively hostile. The explanation for this lies in an embrace of liberal ideology and an active suspicion of the political process as intrusion upon the purity of the judge-made common law that did not develop to meet these ends. State regulation and programs, designed to be responsive to the concerns of such people, have often been cut back under the guise of interpretation of statutes when in reality it was to allow the ideas of the judiciary to hold sway. ...

The second argument urges that for democracy not to be sapped but invigorated, basic decisions affecting the people must be made by elected representatives. This point does not suggest that such a process has not led to mistakes, sometimes horrible ones, such as our failure to save as many Jews as we could have in the Second World War. The tragedies that beset our [Indigenous peoples] is surely another. Nor does it suggest that there are not major impediments to popular participation. What it argues is that concerted efforts should be exerted to eliminate them and that we should not rely upon a small unelected corps. Unlike the first argument, the concern here is not so much that judges will impose their views on a democratic majority. Rather, the worry is that critical, social, and political questions will be translated into legal issues that will be left to judges and lawyers instead of the citizenry working out acceptable and supportable solutions.

In this view, even a cycle of progressive and enlightened decisions entails costs, although the results may be desirable. There may be benefits, but they come from a small group of judges and lawyers who are bound together by a limited set of ideas and attitudes and who impose conclusions rather than persuade and build consensus among the electorate. The danger is that the basis for having citizens make their own decisions and face future issues will be eroded, and that the resentment felt by having solutions handed down will make future progress even more difficult and may even contribute to regressive backlash. ...

The third point focuses upon the costs of any court response. The contention is that whatever meaning is possible in interpreting the Charter, it will inevitably come to be slanted towards the rich and the organized. Obviously, access to the political and bureaucratic processes is imperfect, but it is not as expensive and complicated and is available without necessarily being mediated through the language of the law, a discourse largely available only to lawyers.

Andrew Petter, "Immaculate Deception: The Charter's Hidden Agenda"

(1987) 45 Advocate 857 at 857-63 (footnotes omitted)

My purpose in this short essay is to put forward an argument that does not enjoy a great deal of currency on the "Charter circuit" these days. It is an argument that most lawyers do not wish to hear. And some may regard as downright impolite.

The argument is that, while sold to the public as part of a "people's package," the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms is a regressive instrument more likely to undermine than to advance the interests of socially and economically disadvantaged Canadians. The reasons for this lie partly in the nature of the rights themselves and partly in the nature of the judicial system which is charged with their interpretation and enforcement.

I. The Nature of Charter Rights

The first thing that must be recognized about the Charter is that it is, at root, a 19th century liberal document set loose on a 20th century welfare state. The rights in the Charter are founded upon the belief that the main enemies of freedom are not disparities in wealth nor concentrations of private power, but the state. Thus one finds in the Charter little reference to positive economic or social entitlements, such as rights to employment, shelter or social services. Charter rights are predominantly negative in nature, aimed at protecting individuals from state interference or control with respect to this matter or that.

The negative nature of the rights embodied within the Charter reflects what John Hart Ely refers to as a "systematic bias" in favour of the interests of the "upper middle-class, professional class from which most lawyers and judges, and for that matter most moral philosophers, are drawn." These people see their social and economic status most threatened by the regulatory and redistributive powers of the modern state. It is not surprising therefore that they regard as "fundamental" those values that afford them protection from such state powers. But, as Ely observes, "watch most fundamental-rights theorists start edging toward the door when someone mentions jobs, food or housing: those are important sure, but they aren't fundamental."

This "systematic bias" is reinforced by a highly selective view of what constitutes the state. The presumption underlying the Charter is that existing distributions of wealth and power are products of private initiative as opposed to state action. Never mind that these distributions depend for their existence and legitimacy upon a panoply of state sponsored laws and institutions. They are nevertheless viewed as outside politics and beyond the scope of Charter scrutiny. Thus far from being subject to Charter challenge, such distributions comprise the "natural" foundation upon which Charter rights are conferred and against which the constitutionality of "state action" is to be judged.

The negative nature of Charter rights combined with this selective view of state action remove from Charter scrutiny the major source of inequality in our society—the unequal distribution of property entitlements among private parties. At the same time, they direct the restraining force of the Charter against the arm of the state best equipped to redress fundamental economic inequalities—the democratic arm, consisting of the legislature and the executive.

The irony of this will not be lost on those with a sense of history. The victories that have been won in this century on behalf of workers, the unemployed, women and other socially and economically disadvantaged Canadians are victories that have been achieved, for the most part, in the democratic arena. They are victories that have been won by harnessing the powers of the modern state to redistribute wealth and to place limits on the exercise of "private" economic power.

Thus workers have been granted the collective bargaining rights they now enjoy by virtue of legislation overriding common law rules that protected employers' liberty and privity of contract and that treated trade unions as illegal conspiracies. The economic benefits guaranteed to the unemployed flow from redistributive policies of modern government. The lot of women has been advanced, to the degree that it has, by means of legislative intervention in the form of labour standards legislation, minimum wage laws and human rights codes.

This is not to imply that these responses have been comprehensive or adequate. In my view they have not. The point is simply that where there has been progress, with few exceptions it has come in the democratic rather than the judicial arena. Such progress has been achieved through political action aimed at displacing the common law vision of unbridled individual autonomy with a countervision of collective social responsibility. Put simply, the negative conception of liberty imposed by the courts to protect the interests of the "haves" in society has been partially supplanted by a positive conception of liberty imposed by legislatures to further the interests of the "have-nots."

Yet the Charter now threatens to slow, or even reverse, this process. The rights and freedoms in the Charter are predicated on the same hostility to legislative action, and the same reverence for individual autonomy, that animated the common law. I am not suggesting that the present legislative regime of social and economic regulation will suddenly be eliminated under the Charter. The political costs of doing so are, thankfully, too great for the courts to contemplate. What the Charter is more likely to do is to enable the courts to chisel away at certain aspects of the regime, and to erect barriers to future innovation.

This does not mean that there will be no "progressive" Charter decisions. Undoubtedly there will be some, although the bulk of such decisions will involve the courts in upholding legislation—in other words doing nothing. Additionally, there will be a few decisions in which the Charter is used to enhance legislative protections, for example by striking down an obsolete or inappropriate exemption in a regulatory regime. Such cases, however, will be the exception rather than the rule. Indeed, the very notion of looking to the courts to improve legislation is somewhat perverse. Most legislation, after all, was enacted to counteract the laissez-faire individualism of court-made, common law. Courts, even today, remain suspicious of, and at worst hostile to, the "eccentric principles of socialist philanthropy" upon which the welfare state is founded. Thus to look at the courts to repair flaws in the existing regulatory regime is a bit like taking one's car to be fixed by an auto wrecker.

In addition to eroding existing and stymieing future social and economic regulation, the Charter will serve to weaken the impetus for further legislative reform by diverting resources from the political to the judicial arena. Women's groups, for example, are raising millions of dollars to engage in Charter litigation, a considerable portion of which is being used to defend from Charter challenge legislation that is beneficial to women. The money, time and energy devoted by such groups to the Charter are money, time and energy that will be taken away from lobbying and other forms of political action.

II. The Nature of the Judicial System

The regressive impact of the Charter is exacerbated by the nature of the judicial system that is charged with its interpretation and enforcement. There are two features of this system that make it a particularly inappropriate forum for advancing the interests of the disadvantaged. The first is the cost of gaining access to the system; the second is the composition of the judiciary itself.

[T]he process of vindicating one's rights under the Charter is an extremely expensive one. ...

[Such costs] represent a major obstacle to disadvantaged Canadians who wish to pursue their Charter rights in court. ... [B]eyond the confines of criminal law, the effect of having chosen the courts as the adjudicative forum for resolving Charter claims is to favour those who command substantial economic resources.

The institutional barrier created by money not only denies the disadvantaged access to the courts; in doing so, it serves to shape the rights themselves. ...

If the issues raised in non-criminal Charter cases tend to represent the interests of those with economic resources in society, the interpretation of rights will necessarily respond to and, over time, will reflect those interests. ...

Consider ... the Charter right to freedom of expression. The opportunity to raise a claim concerning this right will be restricted to those who can command sufficient resources to bring an action in court and who consider it economically or politically worthwhile to do so. Litigation concerning this right is thus more likely to be brought by economically powerful interests in society, such as business interests, for whom the costs of litigation are small in relation to the potential economic gains. But if litigation relating to freedom of expression disproportionately represents the interests of business, the jurisprudence surrounding freedom of expression will come to reflect business concerns.

There might be less cause for concern on this score if the judiciary had an equal understanding of, and empathy for, the problems of all segments of Canadian society. Unfortunately, there is no reason to suppose that this is the case. There are few public institutions in this country whose composition more poorly reflects, and whose members have less direct exposure to, the interests of the economically and socially disadvantaged. Canadian judges are "exclusively recruited from the small class of successful, middle-aged lawyers" and, if not of wealthy origin, most became wealthy or at least achieved a degree of affluence before accepting their judicial appointments. The majority made their name in private practice where they held themselves out as business people and shared business concerns. Furthermore, unless they practiced criminal or family law, much of their professional time was spent catering to the needs of the business community. In short, there is nothing about the Canadian judiciary to suggest that they possess the experience, the training or the disposition to comprehend the social impact of claims made to them under the Charter, let alone to resolve those claims in ways that promote, or even protect, the interests of lower income Canadians.

At a more fundamental level, the attitudes of lawyers and of judges tend to reflect the values of the legal system in which they were schooled and to which they owe their livelihood.

From this perspective, one can see that property rights—the body of "natural" rules governing the ownership and exchange of property—is the core political value underlying the common law.

This does not imply that the desire to protect property is the sole force driving Canadian judiciary. What it does imply, however, is that deep in the judicial ethos there exists a special concern and reverence for property rights—a concern and reverence that over the course of time will guide and constrain judicial decision-making in Charter cases.

The assumption of lawyers that property rights flow from a "natural" system of private ordering is also significant. This assumption reinforces the dichotomy between private and state action that underlies the Charter, thus making it more difficult for individuals to mobilize the Charter against underlying social disparities. Judges conceive their role under the Charter not as interest balancing, which they view as the preserve of politics, but rather as one of policing the boundary between the "natural" zone of individual autonomy (represented by the market) and the "unnatural" activities of the state (represented by the regulatory and redistributive instruments of modern governments). Thus the bias that judges bring to their task augments the bias of the Charter itself: "liberty" is represented by those things that expand the zone of individual autonomy by limiting the ability of the state to "interfere" in the lives of individual Canadians. The task of the judge is to interpret the Charter generously so as to "secur[e] for individuals the full benefit of the Charter's protection." Hence narrow Charter interpretations are "bad" while expansive interpretations are "good."

What is conveniently forgotten in all of this is that the liberty of many Canadians is better protected by the regulatory and redistributive policies of the state than by the market (assuming "liberty" includes the liberty to be clothed, housed and fed, and the liberty not to be preyed upon by those who command social and economic power). [Emphasis in original.]

As you read the Supreme Court of Canada's Charter decisions in subsequent chapters, consider whether the left's critique of the Charter as articulated by Petter is justified. To what extent has the Court attempted to respond to this critique?

Further readings providing a critique from the left include Michael Mandel, The Charter of Rights and the Legalization of Politics in Canada, rev ed (Toronto: Thompson, 1994); Allan C Hutchinson, Waiting for Coraf: A Critique of Law and Rights (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1995); Joel Bakan, Just Words: Constitutional Rights and Social Wrongs (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1997).

In the early years of the Charter, the main criticisms of entrenchment and judicial review came from the political left (as reflected in the piece by Petter, above), raising concerns that the Supreme Court of Canada would use the Charter to restrain socially desirable regulation and economic redistribution. Criticism about illegitimate "judicial activism" has also come from the political right, however, with contentions that the Court is acting undemocratically by forcing unwilling majorities to accept the rights of unpopular minorities: see Ted Morton & Rainer Knopff, The Charter Revolution and the Court Party (Peterborough, Ont: Broadview Press, 2000), discussed further below, for an example of this wave of criticism of judicial activism. In 1997, Peter Hogg and Allison Bushell, responding to these increasing charges of "judicial activism," added a new strand to the debates about the legitimacy of judicial review—the idea of judicial review under the Charter as a form of "dialogue" between courts and legislatures.

A. The Concept of Dialogue

The uninitiated might be excused for believing that, given the deluge of writing on the topic, everything useful that could possibly be said about the legitimacy of judicial review has now been said. However, one intriguing idea that has been raised in the literature seems to have been left largely unexplored. That is the notion that judicial review is part of a "dialogue" between judges and legislatures.

At first blush the word "dialogue" may not seem particularly apt to describe the relationship between the Supreme Court of Canada and the legislative bodies. After all, when the Court says what the Constitution requires, legislative bodies have to obey. Is it possible to have a dialogue between two institutions when one is so clearly subordinate to the other? Does dialogue not require a relationship between equals?

The answer, we suggest, is this. Where a judicial decision is open to legislative reversal, modification, or avoidance, then it is meaningful to regard the relationship between the Court and the competent legislative body as a dialogue. In that case, the judicial decision causes a public debate in which Charter values play a more prominent role than they would if there had been no judicial decision. The legislative body is in a position to devise a response that is properly respectful of the Charter values that have been identified by the Court, but which accomplishes the social or economic objectives that the judicial decision has impeded. Examples of this will be given later in this article.

B. How Dialogue Works

Where a judicial decision striking down a law on Charter grounds can be reversed, modified, or avoided by a new law, any concern about the legitimacy of judicial review is greatly diminished. To be sure, the Court may have forced a topic onto the legislative agenda that the legislative body would have preferred not to have to deal with. And, of course, the precise terms of any new law would have been powerfully influenced by the Court's decision. The legislative body would have been forced to give greater weight to the Charter values identified by the Court in devising the means of carrying out the objectives, or the legislative body might have been forced to modify its objectives to some extent to accommodate the Court's concerns. These are constraints on the democratic process, no doubt, but the final decision is the democratic one.

The dialogue that culminates in a democratic decision can only take place if the judicial decision to strike down a law can be reversed, modified, or avoided by the ordinary legislative process. Later in this article we will show that this is the normal situation. There is usually an alternative law that is available to the legislative body and that enables the legislative purpose to be substantially carried out, albeit by somewhat different means. Moreover, when the Court strikes down a law, it frequently offers a suggestion as to how the law could be modified to solve the constitutional problems. The legislative body often follows that suggestion, or devises a different law that also skirts the constitutional barriers. Indeed, our research, which surveyed sixty-five cases where legislation was invalidated for a breach of the Charter, found that in forty-four cases (two-thirds), the competent legislative body amended the impugned law. In most cases, relatively minor amendments were all that was required in order to respect the Charter, without compromising the objective of the original legislation.

Sometimes an invalid law is more restrictive of individual liberty than it needs to be to accomplish its purpose, and what is required is a narrower law. Sometimes a broader law is needed, because an invalid law confers a benefit, but excludes people who have a constitutional equality right to be included. Sometimes what is needed is a fairer procedure. But it is rare indeed that the constitutional defect cannot be remedied. Hence, as the subtitle of this article suggests, "perhaps the Charter of Rights isn't such a bad thing after all." The Charter can act as a catalyst for a two-way exchange between judiciary and legislature on the topic of human rights and freedoms, but it rarely raises an absolute barrier to the wishes of the democratic institutions.

A. The Four Features [of the Charter] That Facilitate Dialogue

Why is it usually possible for a legislature to overcome a judicial decision striking down a law for breach of the Charter? The answer lies in four features of the Charter: (1) section 33, which is the power of legislative override; (2) section 1, which allows for "reasonable limits" on guaranteed Charter rights; (3) the "qualified rights," in sections 7, 8, 9 and 12, which allow for action that satisfies standards of fairness and reasonableness; and (4) the guarantee of equality rights under section 15(1), which can be satisfied through a variety of remedial measures. Each of these features usually offers the competent legislative body room to advance its objectives, while at the same time respecting the requirements of the Charter as articulated by the courts.

Section 33 of the Charter is commonly referred to as the power of legislative override. Under section 33, Parliament or a legislature need only insert an express notwithstanding clause into a statute and this will liberate the statute from the provisions of section 2 and sections 7–15 of the Charter. The legislative override is the most obvious and direct way of overcoming a judicial decision striking down a law for an infringement of Charter rights. Section 33 allows the competent legislative body to re-enact the original law without interference from the courts.

When a law that impairs a Charter right fails to satisfy the least restrictive means standard of section 1 justification, the law is, of course, struck down. But the reviewing court will explain why the section 1 standard was not met, which will involve explaining the less restrictive alternative law that would have satisfied the section 1 standard. That alternative law is available to the enacting body and will generally be upheld. Even if the court has a weak grasp of the practicalities of the particular field of regulation, so that the court's alternative is not really workable, it will usually be possible for the policymakers to devise a less restrictive alternative that is practicable. With appropriate recitals in the legislation, and with appropriate evidence available if necessary to support the legislative choice, one can usually be confident that a carefully drafted "second attempt" will be upheld against any future Charter challenges.

Dialogue seems an apt description of the relationship between courts and legislative bodies [in these cases]. Certainly, it is hard to claim that an unelected court is thwarting the wishes of the people. In each case, the democratic process has been influenced by the reviewing court, but it has not been stultified.

[Hogg and Bushell do recognize that there are certain circumstances in which there are "barriers" to dialogue and in which courts will have the last word. These include situations where, because the issue is so controversial, political forces make it impossible for the legislature to fashion a response to the Court's Charter decision. An example they provide of the latter is the situation that arose after the Supreme Court of Canada's decision in R v Morgentaler, [1988] 1 SCR 30, 1988 CanLII 90, excerpted in Chapter 22, The Right to Life, Liberty, and Security of the Person, which struck down the restrictions on abortion in the Criminal Code. Although the Court's decision left open the possibility that a less restrictive abortion law could be upheld, the divisiveness of the abortion issue precluded the formation of any democratic consensus, and no new legislation was enacted.

Hogg and Bushell then go on to discuss, in greater detail, their research in which they looked at the sequels to all cases (65 in number) in which laws had been struck down by the Supreme Court of Canada for violations of the Charter. They found that legislative action followed in the vast majority of cases, and that the typical outcome was new legislation that accomplished the same legislative objective, but which was more protective of rights. In two cases, the Court's ruling was effectively reversed by the legislature: once by invoking s 1, and once by invoking s 33.]

D. Dialogue May Occur Even When Laws Are Upheld

This article focussed primarily on the legislative changes that have followed decisions striking down laws for a breach of the Charter. However, it should be noted that judicial decisions can occasionally have an impact on legislation even when the Court does not actually strike down any law.

... [I]t is a mistake to view the Charter as giving non-elected judges a veto over the democratic will of competent legislative bodies. Canada's legislators are not indifferent to the equality and civil liberties concerns which are raised in Charter cases, and do not always wait for a court to "force" them to amend their laws before they are willing to consider fairer, less restrictive, or more inclusive laws. The influence of the Charter extends much further than the boundaries of what judges define as compulsory. Charter dialogue may continue outside the courts even when the courts hold that there is no Charter issue to talk about.

VI. Conclusion

Our conclusion is that the critique of the Charter based on democratic legitimacy cannot be sustained. To be sure, the Supreme Court of Canada is a non-elected, unaccountable body of middle-aged lawyers. To be sure, it does from time to time strike down statutes enacted by the elected, accountable, representative legislative bodies. But, the decisions of the Court almost always leave room for a legislative response, and they usually get a legislative response. In the end, if the democratic will is there, the legislative objective will still be able to be accomplished, albeit with some new safeguards to protect individual rights and liberty. Judicial review is not "a veto over the politics of the nation," but rather the beginning of a dialogue as to how best to reconcile the individualistic values of the Charter with the accomplishment of social and economic policies for the benefit of the community as a whole.

In 2007, Hogg, Thornton (née Bushell), and Wade K Wright wrote a follow-up to the 1997 study above. The authors noted that since the original 1997 study, 14 of 23 cases in which courts had invalidated legislation for being constitutionally impermissible elicited some response from the competent legislative body. While the numbers were not as overwhelming as those reported in 1997, they provided evidence that Charter dialogue still factored prominently in the development of Canadian legislation: see Peter W Hogg, Allison AB Thornton & Wade K Wright, "Charter Dialogue Revisited: Or 'Much Ado About Metaphors'" (2007) 45 Osgoode Hall LJ 1, together in that same issue of the journal (devoted to the theme of "Charter Dialogue: Ten Years Later") with commentaries by other scholars and a reply; see also Rosalind Dixon, "The Supreme Court of Canada, Charter Dialogue and Deference" (2007) 47 Osgoode Hall LJ 235.

The concept of judicial review under the Charter as part of a democratic dialogue between courts and legislatures is further explored in Kent Roach, The Supreme Court on Trial: Judicial Activism or Democratic Dialogue, rev ed (Toronto: Irwin Law, 2016). Roach argues that the American debate about judicial activism has been inappropriately imported into Canada, without a recognition of the fundamental structural differences between the Charter (and other modern bills of rights) and the American Bill of Rights. In Canada, he argues, because of the presence of ss 1 and 33, which explicitly allow governments to limit and even override rights, judges do not have the last word on controversial issues of social policy. In Roach's view, the Charter has created "a fertile and democratic middle ground between the extremes of legislative and judicial supremacy." He writes (at 332):

A constructive and democratic dialogue between courts and legislatures under a modern bill of rights such as the Charter can improve the performance of both institutions. The independent judiciary can be robust and fearless in its protection of rights and freedoms, knowing that it need not have the last word. The legislature will be encouraged to consider whether it can pursue its objectives in a manner more respectful of rights and to establish rules in legislation to authorize and justify the conduct of the police and other state officials. ... The democratic dialogue between courts and legislatures under a modern bill of rights such as the Charter can avoid the monologues and unchecked power that may be produced by either unfettered legislative supremacy or unfettered judicial supremacy. It is especially necessary to diffuse power in countries where the parliamentary system of government, combined with tight party discipline, gives governments more or less absolute power between elections. Strong courts are needed to balance the power of strong legislatures.

He worries, however, about the negative impact that allegations of excessive "judicial activism" may have on the important role courts must play in this "dialogue" (at 332-33):

The greatest danger in the dialogue between courts and legislatures is not excessive judicial activism, because legislatures can and will correct judicial overreaching on behalf of minorities and the unpopular. The result will be a self-critical and democratic dialogue, even if judicial decisions do not prevail. If, however, the Court is too weak in protecting the rights of minorities and the unpopular, it is less likely that elected governments will do more. The result can be a complacent and majoritarian monologue that is less truly democratic. Excessive judicial deference will allow legislatures and officials to act without being questioned by the Court about the effects of their actions on the most unpopular among us. The sense that courts will not challenge questionable laws may inhibit their reform, especially if those adversely affected by the law have little political power. The greatest danger of the judicial activism debate is that it may produce excessive judicial deference. If this happens—and there are signs that it may be happening in Canada, and that misperceptions about the Canadian experience have dampened enthusiasm for judicial review in other places—then the democratic and dialogue potential of the Charter will be squandered by the unnecessary importation of an American-style judicial activism debate based on the false dichotomy of judicial supremacy or legislative supremacy. This failure would be a tragedy not only for Canada but for other countries as well. It might mean that we will all continue to spin our wheels in the two-century American debate about judicial activism, one that ignores the potential under modern bills of rights with parliamentary forms of government to have the benefits and the responsibility of both judicial activism and legislative activism.

The answer to unacceptable judicial activism under a modern bill of rights is legislative activism and the assertion of democratic responsibility for limiting or overriding the Court's decisions. Citizens can enjoy the benefits of judicial activism without the costs of judicial supremacy.

In the Vriend decision, excerpted immediately below, the Supreme Court of Canada directly addressed the appropriate relationship between courts and legislatures.

Vriend v Alberta

[\[1998\] 1 SCR 493, 1998 CanLII 816](#)

IACOBUCCI and CORY JJ (Lamer CJ and Gonthier, McLachlin, and Bastarache JJ concurring):

[129] Having found the exclusion of sexual orientation from the IRPA to be an unjustifiable violation of the appellants' equality rights, I now turn to the question of remedy under s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982. Before discussing the jurisprudence on remedies, I believe it might be helpful to pause to reflect more broadly on the general issue of the relationship between legislatures and the courts in the age of the Charter.

[130] Much was made in argument before us about the inadvisability of the Court interfering with or otherwise meddling in what is regarded as the proper role of the legislature, which in this case was to decide whether or not sexual orientation would be added to Alberta's human rights legislation. Indeed, it seems that hardly a day goes by without some comment or criticism to the effect that under the Charter courts are wrongfully usurping the role of the legislatures. I believe this allegation misunderstands what took place and what was intended when our country adopted the Charter in 1981-82.

[131] When the Charter was introduced, Canada went, in the words of former Chief Justice Brian Dickson, from a system of Parliamentary supremacy to constitutional supremacy ("Keynote Address," in The Cambridge Lectures 1985 (1985), at pp. 3-4). Simply put, each Canadian was given individual rights and freedoms which no government or legislature could take away. However, as rights and freedoms are not absolute, governments and legislatures could justify the qualification or infringement of these constitutional rights under s. 1 as I previously discussed. Inevitably, disputes over the meaning of the rights and their justification would have to be settled and here the role of the judiciary enters to resolve these disputes. ...

[132] We should recall that it was the deliberate choice of our provincial and federal legislatures in adopting the Charter to assign an interpretive role to the courts and to command them under s. 52 to declare unconstitutional legislation invalid.

[133] However, giving courts the power and commandment to invalidate legislation where necessary has not eliminated the debate over the "legitimacy" of courts taking such action. ... [J]udicial review, it is alleged, is illegitimate because it is anti-democratic in that unelected officials (judges) are overruling elected representatives (legislators)

[134] To respond, it should be emphasized again that our Charter's introduction and the consequential remedial role of the courts were choices of the Canadian people through their elected representatives as part of a redefinition of our democracy. Our constitutional design was refashioned to state that henceforth the legislatures and executive must perform their roles in conformity with the newly conferred constitutional rights and freedoms. That the courts were the trustees of these rights insofar as disputes arose concerning their interpretation was a necessary part of this new design.

[135] So courts in their trustee or arbiter role must performe scrutinize the work of the legislature and executive not in the name of the courts, but in the interests of the new social contract that was democratically chosen. All of this is implied in the power given to the courts under s. 24 of the Charter and s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

[136] Because the courts are independent from the executive and legislature, litigants and citizens generally can rely on the courts to make reasoned and principled decisions according to the dictates of the constitution even though specific decisions may not be universally acclaimed. In carrying out their duties, courts are not to second-guess legislatures and the executives; they are not to make value judgments on what they regard as the proper policy choice; this is for the other branches. Rather, the courts are to uphold the Constitution and have been expressly invited to perform that role by the Constitution itself. But respect by the courts for the legislature and executive role is as important as ensuring that the other branches respect each others' role and the role of the courts.

[137] This mutual respect is in some ways expressed in the provisions of our constitution as shown by the wording of certain of the constitutional rights themselves. For example, s. 7 of the Charter speaks of no denial of the rights therein except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice, which include the process of law and legislative action. Section 1 and the jurisprudence under it are also important to ensure respect for legislative action and the collective or societal interests represented by legislation. In addition, as will be discussed below, in fashioning a remedy with regard to a Charter violation, a court must be mindful of the role of the legislature. Moreover, s. 33, the notwithstanding clause, establishes that the final word in our constitutional structure is in fact left to the legislature and not the courts (see P. Hogg and A. Bushell, "The Charter Dialogue Between Courts and Legislatures" (1997), 35 Osgoode Hall L.J. 75).

[138] As I view the matter, the Charter has given rise to a more dynamic interaction among the branches of governance. This interaction has been aptly described as a "dialogue" by some (see Hogg and Bushell, supra). In reviewing legislative enactments and executive decisions to ensure constitutional validity, the courts speak to the legislative and executive branches. As has been pointed out, most of the legislation held not to pass constitutional muster has been followed by new legislation designed to accomplish similar objectives (see Hogg and Bushell, supra, at p. 82). By doing this, the legislature responds to the courts; hence the dialogue among the branches.

[139] To my mind, a great value of judicial review and this dialogue among the branches is that each of the branches is made somewhat accountable to the other. The work of the legislature is reviewed by the courts and the work of the court in its decisions can be reacted to by the legislature in the passing of new legislation (or even overarching laws under s. 33 of the Charter). This dialogue between and accountability of each of the branches has the effect of enhancing the democratic process, not denying it.

[140] There is also another aspect of judicial review that promotes democratic values. Although a court's invalidation of legislation usually involves negating the will of the majority, we must remember that the concept of democracy is broader than the notion of majority rule, fundamental as that may be. In this respect, we would do well to heed the words of Dickson C.J. in [R v Oakes, [1986] 1 SCR 103, 1986 CanLII 46], at p. 136:

The Court must be guided by the values and principles essential to a free and democratic society, which I believe to embody, to name but a few, respect for the inherent dignity of the human person, commitment to social justice and equality, accommodation of a wide variety of beliefs, respect for cultural and group identity, and faith in social and political institutions which enhance the participation of individuals and groups in society.

[141] So, for example, when a court interprets legislation alleged to be a reasonable limitation in a free and democratic society as stated in s. 1 of the Charter, the court must inevitably delineate some of the attributes of a free and democratic society. ... [In this respect] Dickson C.J.'s comments remain instructive

[142] Democratic values and principles under the Charter demand that legislators and the executive take these into account; and if they fail to do so, courts should stand ready to intervene to protect these democratic values as appropriate. As others have so forcefully stated, judges are not acting undemocratically by intervening when there are indications that a legislative or executive decision was not reached in accordance with the democratic principles mandated by the Charter

[Justice Iacobucci went on to deal with the remedial issue, and concluded that the appropriate remedy was to "read in" discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation. That portion of the judgment is found in Chapter 25, Enforcement of Rights.]

In Sauvé v Canada (Chief Electoral Officer), 2002 SCC 68, however, the Court seemed to frame its support for dialogue in narrower terms (at para 17):

[T]he fact that the challenged denial of the right to vote followed judicial rejection of an even more comprehensive denial, does not mean that the Court should defer to Parliament as part of a "dialogue." Parliament must ensure that whatever law it passes, at whatever stage of the process, conforms to the Constitution. The healthy and important promotion of a dialogue between the legislature and the courts should not be debased to a rule of "if at first you don't succeed, try, try again."

See Rosalind Dixon, "The Supreme Court of Canada, Charter Dialogue and Deference" (2009) 45:2 Osgoode Hall LJ 235 at 286. As Sigalet, Webber, and Dixon explain, "This quip prompted one scholar to describe the judgment as 'the day dialogue died'": see Geoffrey Sigalet, Grégoire Webber & Rosalind Dixon, "Introduction: The 'What' and 'Why' of Constitutional Dialogue" in Geoffrey Sigalet, Grégoire Webber & Rosalind Dixon, eds, Constitutional Dialogue (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2019) 1 at 6 (footnotes omitted).

Ted Morton and Rainer Knopff, strong critics of "judicial activism," have argued that the dialogue theory is flawed and does not remove their fundamental concerns about the undemocratic nature of judicial review. In their book The Charter Revolution and the Court Party, also discussed above, Morton and Knopff argue that Hogg's defence of judicial review as a form of dialogue between legislatures and courts is too simplistic because it fails to recognize the "staying power" of a new, judicially created policy status quo, "especially when the issue cuts across the normal lines of partisan cleavage and divides a government caucus" (at 162). One example they give is the political aftermath of the 1988 Morgentaler decision, in which the Supreme Court struck down the restrictions on abortion in the Criminal Code on the basis that they violated s 7 of the Charter. The government introduced new legislation recriminalizing abortion, but with less onerous requirements. The legislation was ultimately defeated in the Senate, however, because both the pro-choice and pro-life minorities voted against the compromise legislation.

For a direct response to Morton and Knopff's critique of the Charter revolution, see Peter Hogg, "The Charter Revolution: Is It Undemocratic?" (2001) 12:1 Const Forum 1. Here is Hogg's answer to their criticisms of the dialogue concept (at 5-7):

The compatibility of the Charter with democracy is reinforced by the notion of judicial review as a "dialogue" between the Supreme Court of Canada and the legislatures. ...

This idea of a dialogue between courts and legislatures is a serious challenge to the Morton-Knopff thesis. If Charter decisions are ultimately reviewable by elected legislative bodies, using the distinctively Canadian vehicles of sections 1 or 33, then it becomes much less significant whether the decisions have been achieved through the efforts of the Court Party or have been made in disregard of popular sentiment. In the last few pages of the book, the authors grapple with this problem. Professors Morton and Knopff acknowledge that the dialogue theory is "undoubtedly true in the abstract," but they say that it is "too simplistic." It is too simplistic because it "fails to recognize the staying power of a new, judicially created policy status quo." By this they mean that once the Court has spoken, governments may find it expedient to leave the issue alone, thus preserving the judicial decision.

One of the two examples Morton and Knopff provide of "the staying power of the new judicially-created policy status quo" is the aftermath to the Morgentaler decision, which struck down the therapeutic abortion provisions of the Criminal Code on the ground that they offended section 7 of the Charter. The Government of Canada introduced a new bill to recriminalize abortion, but with less onerous requirements for legal therapeutic abortions. The new bill was passed by the House of Commons and then defeated in the Senate on a tie vote. To be sure, the status quo created by the Supreme Court of Canada (no regulation of abortion) was preserved. But this example could as easily be treated as a case of dialogue since the Government did propose a substitute law for the one struck down and very nearly succeeded in enacting it.

The other example they provide is the aftermath of the Vriend decision, where the Supreme Court of Canada added sexual orientation to the grounds of discrimination for which a remedy was available under Alberta's Human Rights, Citizenship and Multicultural Act. The Government of Alberta mused publicly about restoring the old version of the statute by invoking section 33, but eventually decided not to do so, thus leaving the new ground of sexual orientation in the Act. The authors comment that the judicial ruling had "raised the political costs of saying no to the winning minority" and the Government concluded that "the safest thing was to do nothing." But what does this example show? Only that it is politically difficult to directly reverse a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada on an equality issue. Is that not as it should be? Reversal is possible in a case where there is a sufficiently strong popular revulsion of the Court's ruling, and this is an exceedingly important safeguard

... The decision of the Government of Alberta not to attempt to reverse the Vriend decision was probably based on a correct judgment that popular support was lacking for such a move. The fact that the move was legally possible and was seriously examined by the Government means that the sequel to Vriend could easily be regarded as an example of dialogue rather than as an example that contradicts the dialogue idea[.] ...

In the great majority of Charter cases, there is no political impulse to directly reverse the judicial decision. Usually, the attitude of the government whose law was struck down is not one of hostility to the Court's civil libertarian concern; rather, the issue for the government is (as it was after Morgentaler) the crafting of a new law that accommodates the Court's concerns while preserving the legislative objective

To return to the Morton-Knopff thesis, in the majority of Charter cases, the "staying power of a new judicially created policy status quo" is not very strong at all. In those rare cases where government simply cannot abide the Court's interpretation of the Charter, reversal is usually legally possible, and can be accomplished politically where public opinion is particularly strong, as Ford and Daviault demonstrate. Where public opinion is less strong or is divided, government may choose to leave the decision in place, as Vriend demonstrates.

The important point about the idea of dialogue is that judicial decisions striking down laws are not necessarily the last word on the issue, and are not usually the last word on the issue. The legislative process is influenced by but is not stopped in its tracks by a Charter decision. The ultimate outcome is normally up to the legislative body.

There has been a veritable avalanche of scholarship on dialogue theory since Hogg and Bushell first wrote their article in 1997. While their thesis has often been subject to criticism, dialogue theory continues to attract interest. As Sigalet, Webber, and Dixon explain in their introduction to Constitutional Dialogue, referenced above (at 4-5):

Although the Canadian debate over "dialogue" began with Hogg and Bushell's avowedly descriptive appeal to the idea of dialogue, the Canadian debate now involves the explicit development of "dialogue theory," which is rooted in a deeper set of normative concerns for the democratic legitimacy of judicial decisions striking down or altering political decisions made by elected legislatures.

In Re BC Motor Vehicle Act, [1985] 2 SCR 486, 1985 CanLII 81 (more fully excerpted in Chapter 22), Lamer J commented on the doubts surrounding the legitimacy of judicial review being unpersuasive because, in his view, the decision to entrench the Charter was taken by "the elected representatives of the people of Canada." As he further explained (at para 16):

[The] argument [that the judiciary is not representative] was heard countless times prior to the entrenchment of the Charter but ... has in truth, for better or for worse, been settled by the very coming into force of the Constitution Act, 1982. It ought not to be forgotten that the historic decision to entrench the Charter in our Constitution was taken not by the courts but by the elected representatives of the people of Canada. It was those representatives who extended the scope of constitutional adjudication and entrusted the courts with this new and onerous responsibility. Adjudication under the Charter must be approached free of any lingering doubts as to its legitimacy.

There is a close link between the courts' perception of the legitimacy of their role and their general approach to rights adjudication. Despite the protests of Lamer J, concerns about the legitimacy of Charter-based judicial review, and the competence of the courts to address complex social and political issues, have almost certainly affected their approach to the interpretation of particular rights and to the justification of limits under s 1.

I. INTRODUCTION

The Charter establishes a two-step process for the adjudication of rights claims where a law is being challenged. The first step is concerned with whether a Charter right has been limited. The court must define the scope of the right and determine whether it has been breached. At this stage, the burden of proof lies with the party claiming a breach of rights on a balance of probabilities. The court will proceed to the second step of the adjudicative process only if it finds that a Charter right has been breached. This second step is concerned with the justification of limits on Charter rights. Section 1 of the Charter states that the protected rights and freedoms may be limited provided the limits are “prescribed by law,” “reasonable,” and “demonstrably justified.” At this stage, the burden of proof lies with the party seeking to uphold the limitation.

This chapter examines, in general terms, the two-step structure of Charter adjudication—the interpretation of rights and the justification of limits. It also examines how courts review administrative decisions that engage Charter rights, a somewhat different process that has important parallels with the two-stage process just described. Finally, the chapter examines s 33, the “notwithstanding clause,” which enables the federal Parliament or provincial legislature to insulate a law from challenge on certain grounds. Other components of Charter analysis are examined in subsequent chapters. The question of who is bound to respect Charter rights is considered in Chapter 18, Application, and the question of what remedies are available to a court if it finds that a Charter right has been breached is considered in Chapter 25, Enforcement of Rights.

II. INTERPRETING RIGHTS

The remaining chapters in Part V, Rights, deal in detail with the interpretation of specific Charter rights. The material here is intended to provide a brief introduction to the courts' general approach to the interpretation of these rights.

A. THE PURPOSIVE APPROACH

The courts have adopted a "purposive" approach to the interpretation of Charter rights. In Hunter v Southam, which immediately follows, the Supreme Court of Canada stated (at 157) that a judgment about the scope or value of a particular right can be made only after the court has "specified] the purpose underlying" the right or "delineate[d] the nature of the interests it is meant to protect."

Hunter v Southam Inc

[1984] 2 SCR 145, 1984 CanLII 33

[This early Charter case involved the s 8 guarantee of freedom from unreasonable search and seizure. The Combines Investigation Branch carried out a search of newspaper offices. The statute that gave the Branch the power to search did not require prior judicial authorization. In the following excerpt, Dickson CJ, writing for the Court, discussed Charter interpretation.]

DICKSON CJ (Ritchie, Beetz, Estey, McIntyre, Chouinard, Lamer, and Wilson JJ concurring):

As is clear from the arguments of the parties as well as from the judgment of Prowse J.A., the crux of this case is the meaning to be given to the term "unreasonable" in the s. 8 guarantee of freedom from unreasonable search or seizure. The guarantee is vague and open. The American courts have had the advantage of a number of specific prerequisites articulated in the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution, as well as a history of colonial opposition to certain Crown investigatory practices from which to draw out the nature of the interests protected by that Amendment and the kinds of conduct it proscribes. There is none of this in s. 8. There is no specificity in the section beyond the bare guarantee of freedom from "unreasonable" search and seizure; nor is there any particular historical, political or philosophic context capable of providing an obvious gloss on the meaning of the guarantee.

It is clear that the meaning of "unreasonable" cannot be determined by recourse to a dictionary, nor for that matter, by reference to the rules of statutory construction. The task of expounding a Constitution is crucially different from that of construing a statute. A statute defines present rights and obligations. It is easily enacted and as easily repealed. A Constitution, by contrast, is drafted with an eye to the future. Its function is to provide a continuing framework for the legitimate exercise of governmental power and, when joined by a Bill or a Charter of Rights, for the unremitting protection of individual rights and liberties. Once enacted, its provisions cannot easily be repealed or amended. It must, therefore, be capable of growth and development over time to meet new social, political and historical realities often unimagined by its framers. The judiciary is the guardian of the Constitution and must, in interpreting its provisions, bear these considerations in mind. Professor Paul Freund expressed this idea aptly when he admonished the American courts "not to read the provisions of the Constitution like a last will and testament lest it become one."

The need for a broad perspective in approaching constitutional documents is a familiar theme in Canadian constitutional jurisprudence. It is contained in Viscount Sankey's classic formulation in Edwards v. Attorney-General for Canada ... [1930] A.C. 124 at p. 136, cited and applied in countless Canadian cases:

The British North America Act planted in Canada a living tree capable of growth and expansion within its natural limits. The object of the Act was to grant a Constitution to Canada Their Lordships do not conceive it to be the duty of this Board—it is certainly not their desire—to cut down the provisions of the Act by a narrow and technical construction, but rather to give it a large and liberal interpretation.

More recently, in Minister of Home Affairs v. Fisher [1980] A.C. 319, dealing with the Bermudian Constitution, Lord Wilberforce reiterated at p. 328 that a constitution is a document "sui generis, calling for principles of interpretation of its own, suitable to its character," and that as such, a constitution incorporating a Bill of Rights calls for:

... a generous interpretation avoiding what has been called 'the austerity of tabulated legalism' suitable to give to individuals the full measure of the fundamental rights and freedoms referred to.

Such a broad, purposive analysis, which interprets specific provisions of a constitutional document in the light of its larger objects, is also consonant with the classical principles of American constitutional construction enunciated by Chief Justice Marshall in M'Culloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316 (1819). It is, as well, the approach I intend to take in the present case.

I begin with the obvious. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms is a purposive document. Its purpose is to guarantee and to protect, within the limits of reason, the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms it enshrines. It is intended to constrain governmental action inconsistent with those rights and freedoms; it is not in itself an authorization for governmental action. In the present case this means, as Prowse J.A. pointed out, that in guaranteeing the right to be secure from unreasonable searches and seizures, s. 8 acts as a limitation on whatever powers of search and seizure the federal or provincial governments already and otherwise possess. It does not in itself confer any powers, even of "reasonable" search and seizure, on these governments. This leads, in my view, to the further conclusion that an assessment of the constitutionality of a search and seizure, or of a statute authorizing a search or seizure, must focus on its "reasonable" or "unreasonable" impact on the subject of the search or the seizure, and not simply on its rationality in furthering some valid government objective.

Since the proper approach to the interpretation of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms is a purposive one, before it is possible to assess the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the impact of a search or of a statute authorizing a search, it is first necessary to specify the purpose underlying s. 8: in other words, to delineate the nature of the interests it is meant to protect.

[Chief Justice Dickson's analysis of the purpose for granting protection against unreasonable search and seizure led him to conclude that s 8 protects an individual's reasonable expectation of privacy. Accordingly, he found ss 10(1) and (3) of the Combines Investigation Act, RSC 1970, c C-23 invalid. These provisions authorized the issuance of search warrants by officials whose functions were investigative, without any requirement for reasonable and probable grounds, based on sworn material, to believe that an offence had been committed and that the place of search would afford evidence of the commission of the offence.]

Appeal dismissed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Then Justice Brian Dickson recognized that the Supreme Court's decision in Hunter v Southam would be an important one for establishing the Court's approach to Charter interpretation, and in particular, for distinguishing it from how rights had been interpreted under the Bill of Rights. In their biography of the Chief Justice, Brian Dickson: A Judge's Journey (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2003), Robert Sharpe and Kent Roach state (at 309) that Dickson was painfully aware that the Court had been almost universally criticized for its restrictive interpretation of the statutory Canadian Bill of Rights. As a signatory to the Court's much criticized 1979 Bliss decision that the denial of a benefit on grounds of pregnancy did not amount to sex discrimination, Dickson himself had felt the critics' sting.

Strands of what would ultimately become the Court's interpretative approach appeared in several of Dickson's speeches in the early years of the Charter. As Sharpe and Roach further explain in their biography (at 310),

Dickson made no secret of his own determination to breathe life into its vague and general language. He saw the Charter in grand terms. It entrenched "the foundations of Canadian society: democracy, social justice, freedom and human dignity" and he urged judges, lawyers, and legal academics to meet head-on the challenge of "advancing the role of law in upholding these principles." Using language derived from Canadian and American constitutional scholars who pushed for a robust judicial interpretation of fundamental rights and freedoms and that would soon find its way into his own judgments, Dickson told a Calgary audience that "a constitution is a document designed to grow and develop over time to meet new social, political and historic realities unimagined by its framers." He warned that courts would "have to take a philosophic approach in our interpretive endeavours" and that Charter rights would have to be interpreted in light of "the purpose of protecting" the right at issue. Dickson told law students at Dalhousie Law School that the meaning of the terms of the Charter "are not to be found by consulting a dictionary" and Charter interpretation "requires a philosophic and possibly political theory as context." The courts, he said, "will have to go beyond abstract logic and disembodied precedent" and he urged Canada's judges to rise to the challenge: "When the occasion cries out for new law, let us dare to make it. Let us recognize that the law is a living organism, its purpose is to serve life, its vitality is dependent upon renewal."

After oral argument in Hunter v Southam, the Court conferred several times about the decision, an unusual practice for a court accustomed to meeting once to deliberate. As Sharpe and Roach continue (at 313-14):

Dickson and Lamer agreed to prepare memoranda that would provide the basis for a detailed discussion of the case in mid-December 1983, when the Court would finish its fall sittings. Lamer was inclined to write narrowly—"The least said generally about the Charter the better."—he worried that the Court might unduly limit powers needed by the police in more routine cases. Dickson disagreed. He thought that the Court could not decide the case without setting out some basic principles of Charter interpretation and he did not want the Court to lose the opportunity to make its mark. He told his colleagues: "This is the first clear-cut Charter case before this court, and therefore it is desirable, I think, to lay sufficient groundwork for an orderly and logical development of the jurisprudence under section 8 and under the Charter in general." ...

In the discussions that followed, it was agreed that Dickson should write the Court's judgment, and there was confidence that any differences between Dickson and Lamer could be reconciled. On one point, however, Dickson's views prevailed: the Court's unanimous judgment made some sweeping Charter pronouncements. The opening sentences of Dickson's judgment, although paraphrased from the Charter itself, read like a judicial declaration of what was to come in the years to follow: "The Constitution of Canada, which includes the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, is the supreme law of Canada. Any law inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect."

2. In R v Big M Drug Mart Ltd, [1985] 1 SCR 295, 1985 CanLII 69, another early Charter case, included in Chapter 19, Freedom of Religion, Dickson CJ (at paras 116-17) reiterated the Court's commitment to a purposive approach:

This Court has already, in some measure, set out the basic approach to be taken in interpreting the Charter. In Hunter v. Southam Inc., ... [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145, this Court expressed the view that the proper approach to the definition of the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Charter was a purposive one. The meaning of a right or freedom guaranteed by the Charter was to be ascertained by an analysis of the purpose of such a guarantee; it was to be understood, in other words, in the light of the interests it was meant to protect.

In my view this analysis is to be undertaken, and the purpose of the right or freedom in question is to be sought by reference to the character and the larger objects of the Charter itself, to the language chosen to articulate the specific right or freedom, to the historical origins of the concepts enshrined, and where applicable, to the meaning and purpose of the other specific rights and freedoms with which it is associated within the text of the Charter. The interpretation should be, as the judgment in Southam emphasizes, a generous rather than a legalistic one, aimed at fulfilling the purpose of the guarantee and securing for individuals the full benefit of the Charter's protection. At the same time it is important not to overshoot the actual purpose of the right or freedom in question, but to recall that the Charter was not enacted in a vacuum, and must therefore, as this Court's decision in Law Society of Upper Canada v. Skapinker, ... [1984] 1 S.C.R. 357, illustrates, be placed in its proper linguistic, philosophic and historical contexts.

More recently, in Quebec (AG) v 9147-0732 Québec inc, 2020 SCC 32, a case that examined whether s 12, prohibiting cruel and unusual treatment or punishment, applied to corporations, the majority of the Supreme Court of Canada reiterated that although the current approach to Charter interpretation starts with an inquiry into the purpose of a right, it also focuses on the text of the provision:

[7] To claim protection under the Charter, a corporation—indeed, any claimant—must establish that "it has an interest falling within the scope of the guarantee, and one which accords with the purpose of that provision": R. v. CIP Inc., ... [1992] 1 S.C.R. 843, at p. 852. In order to make that determination, the court must seek to discern the scope and purpose of the right by way of a purposive interpretation, that is, "by reference to the character and the larger objects of the Charter itself, to the language chosen to articulate the specific right or freedom, to the historical origins of the concepts enshrined, and where applicable, to the meaning and purpose of the other specific rights and freedoms with which it is associated within the text of the Charter": Big M Drug Mart, at p. 344; see also Poulin, [2019 SCC 47] at para. 32. The approach is "generous, purposive and contextual" and should be done in a "large and liberal manner": R. v. Grant, 2009 SCC 32, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 353, at para. 15; Caron v. Alberta, 2015 SCC 56, [2015] 3 S.C.R. 511, at para. 35.

A. Preliminary Observations on Purposive Interpretation

[8] This Court has consistently emphasized that, within the purposive approach, the analysis must begin by considering the text of the provision. As this Court made clear in British Columbia (Attorney General) v. Canada (Attorney General) ... [1994] 2 S.C.R. 41 ("Vancouver Island Railway"), "[a]lthough constitutional terms must be capable of growth, constitutional interpretation must nonetheless begin with the language of the constitutional law or provision in question": p. 88. This was reiterated in Grant, where the Court stated that "[a]s for any constitutional provision, the starting point must be the language of the section":

para. 15 (emphasis added). Recently, in Poulin, the Court yet again affirmed that the first step to interpreting a Charter right is to analyze the text of the provision: para. 64.

[9] This is so because constitutional interpretation, being the interpretation of the text of the Constitution, must first and foremost have reference to, and be constrained by, that text. Indeed, while constitutional norms are deliberately expressed in general terms, the words used remain “the most primal constraint on judicial review” and form “the outer bounds of a purposive inquiry”: B. J. Oliphant, “Taking purposes seriously: The purposive scope and textual bounds of interpretation under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms” (2015), 65 U.T.L.J. 239, at p. 243. The Constitution is not “an empty vessel to be filled with whatever meaning we might wish from time to time”: Reference re Public Service Employee Relations Act (Alta.), ... [1987] 1 S.C.R. 313 (“Re PSERA”), at p. 394; Caron, at para. 36. Significantly, in Caron, the Court reiterated this latter passage and reassured “the primacy of the written text of the Constitution”: para. 36; see also para. 37.

[10] Moreover, while Charter rights are to be given a purposive interpretation, such interpretation must not overshoot (or, for that matter, undershoot) the actual purpose of the right: Poulin, at paras. 53 and 55; R. v. Stillman, 2019 SCC 40, at paras. 21 and 126; R. v. Blais, ... [2003] 2 S.C.R. 236, at paras. 17–18 and 40; Big M Drug Mart, at p. 344. Giving primacy to the text—that is, respecting its established significance as the first factor to consider within the purposive approach—prevents such overshooting. [Emphasis in original]

3. In Hunter v Southam, the Court stated that the task of interpreting the Constitution is “crucially different” from that of interpreting an ordinary statute. Do the courts not interpret statutes in light of the interests they are intended to protect? Are statutes not also forward looking? The Charter uses language that is more general than that which ordinarily appears in statutes. It often entrenches abstract moral and political ideals, which are, in their elaboration or application, subject to significant disagreement. As you study specific rights in the chapters that follow, consider how much guidance the purposive approach gives the courts when defining the scope and limits of these rights. On the one hand, the court wants the attribution of a particular purpose to be relatively uncontroversial. (The attributed purpose sometimes sounds like a restatement of the right in equally abstract terms.) On the other hand, this attribution of purpose is meant to give real content to the right and to guide the court in the resolution of particular issues.

4. In R v Therens, [1985] 1 SCR 613, 1986 CanLII 29, the Supreme Court of Canada observed at para 49 that the inclusion of s 1 in the Charter is conducive to a broad and purposive approach to interpretation:

[U]nder the Charter the right [to counsel] is made expressly subject by s. 1 to such reasonable limits as are demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society. Thus the right is expressly qualified in a way that permits more flexible treatment of it.

Because competing interests can be recognized at the s 1 stage, it is not necessary for the courts to read “internal” limits into the definition of a particular right—to narrow their understanding of the interests protected by the right. Do some rights have inherent, or internal limits? For example, s 3 guarantees “every citizen” the right to vote. Presumably, ten-year-old citizens do not have the right to vote. Is age an inherent limit on the right to vote?

Note that the words “infringement” and “limit” are sometimes used interchangeably by the Court. In Frank v Canada (AG), 2019 SCC 1, the Supreme Court of Canada was divided over whether residence requirements were a justifiable limit on s 3 (the law at the time prohibited Canadian citizens who had not resided in Canada for five years from voting). The majority considered the residence provisions a justified infringement, whereas Côté and Brown JJ, writing in dissent, preferred the view that the restrictions were an unjustified limit on a Charter right:

[120] To be clear, then, a reasonable limit does not justify an infringement, but is inherent in the right itself, shaping the right’s outer boundaries (B. W. Miller, “Justification and Rights Limitations", in G. Huscroft, ed., Expounding the Constitution: Essays in Constitutional Theory (2008), 93, at p. 96). Our recent jurisprudence confirms this treatment of s. 1's provision for "reasonable limits" (see, e.g., R. v. K.R.J., 2016 SCC 31, [2016] 1 S.C.R. 906). In short, a right is infringed only where the right, as reasonably limited, is breached. The issue presented by this appeal, then, is not whether the limit to the right to vote effected by the restriction on long-term non-resident voting justifies an infringement of s. 3, but whether that limit is unreasonable, such that s. 3 is infringed. [Emphasis in original.]

The courts sometimes seem to use the expressions "purposive interpretation" and "generous interpretation" interchangeably. Is there a difference between them? Is it not possible that a purposive interpretation could result in limits being placed on the potential scope of a right? Tarunabh Khaitan suggests that these two types of interpretation "can sometimes pull in different directions": see Tarunabh Khaitan, "'Constitution' as a Statutory Term" (2013) 129 LQR 589 at 594.

5. The two-step structure of adjudication rests on the idea that there are two distinct issues to be addressed—the definition of the right and the justification of limits. The scope of the right is defined in terms of the interests it protects or advances. Any activity that advances the right's purpose falls within its scope. Other interests that compete or conflict with those that underlie the right may be taken into account under s 1 as possible grounds for limitation. When you read the cases in later chapters, consider whether the distinction between these different interests really is so straightforward—particularly if the purposive approach is unable to yield a bright line between activity that advances the purpose (and is protected) and activity that does not. How distinct are scope and limitations issues in the case of s 2(a) and s 2(b)? When you study rights such as s 15, the right to equality, and s 7, the right to fundamental justice, consider how much space the courts' interpretation of these rights leaves for the justification of limits under s 1.

6. In its early Charter judgments, the Supreme Court of Canada seemed comfortable reviewing legislative and other forms of state action to ensure that it conformed with constitutional rights and freedoms. A few decades down the road, the Court became more engaged in "fine tuning" than bold assessments, as Jamie Cameron points out in the following excerpt of "The McLachlin Court and the Charter in 2012" (2013) 63 SCLR 16 at 39:

In the post-1982 boom, the Supreme Court stepped up, addressing seemingly obvious and egregious Charter violations—often boldly—and setting standards for Charter compliance in a number of landmark decisions. Yet the Chief Justice and others take the view today that the transformational energy of those early years has been depleted, and there is not so much left for the courts to do. Being satisfied that Canada's primary shortcomings on rights compliance have been redressed makes complacency about the Charter a less troubling choice at this point. Under that view it follows, now the deep thinking on rights has been done and is in the past, that balancing rights and limits is a different exercise. The grand pronouncements give way to fine tuning and subtle interpretation. Deference to the legislatures is more standard when issues do not present conflicts in principle but sit, instead, in the margin of appreciation. Presenting differences of opinion that way may mean that reasonable limits will typically prevail over rights protection. Meanwhile, the legislatures have grown savvy over the years and gained confidence in their ability to Charter-proof statutes, legislating to the limits of Charter compliance without having to invoke section 33.

B. AIDS TO INTERPRETATION

Purposive interpretation of Charter rights poses an enormous challenge for courts. How does a judge go about determining the purpose of a particular Charter right? Dickson CJ offers some preliminary guidance in the passage from Big M found in note 2, above. What follows is a brief overview of some of the possible aids to Charter interpretation and the extent to which the courts have been willing to make use of them.

1. Interpretive Provisions in the Charter

The Charter includes several general provisions (ss 25 to 29) that do not entrench a particular right, but instead affirm or highlight certain values that are to be taken into account when interpreting the entrenched rights and assessing the justification of limits under s 1. These provisions include s 27, which provides that the Charter "shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians," and s 28, which provides that "[n]otwithstanding anything in this Charter, the rights and freedoms referred to in it are guaranteed equally to male and female persons."

According to Luc Tremblay, there are two ways to conceptualize these provisions. On one view, they establish an order of priority between Charter rights and certain rights or prerogatives arising from either treaties (s. 25), or the rights and privileges associated to denominational schools and acquired under s 93 Constitution Act, 1867 (s. 29). Accordingly, s. 27 would signify that no Charter rights could have priority over incompatible rights, benefits, powers, or privileges arising ... from distinct legal sources aimed at "promoting and maintaining the multicultural heritage of Canadians," including the 1971 multiculturalism policy and the Multiculturalism Act which entered into force in 1989. [at 334]

Even if there is reason to believe that this was the original intention of the framers of s 27, Tremblay observes that the Supreme Court of Canada has never endorsed it. Rather, it embraced Walter Tarnopolsky's view, according to which s 27 is a "declaratory provision" akin to a preamble establishing the moral objectives or fundamental principles underlying a constitutional text. As Tremblay writes (at 335):

These provisions, which usually are the opening provisions of a Constitution, may serve as interpretative aid to the substantial provisions which follow. According to Tarnopolsky, "[i]t is [...] the clear purpose of s. 27 that, where applicable, any right or freedom in the Charter shall be interpreted in light of this section.

See Luc Tremblay, "Pierre Elliott Trudeau et le multiculturalisme constitutionnel" [Pierre Elliott Trudeau and Constitutional Multiculturalism] in N Karazivan & J Leclair, eds, The Political and Constitutional Legacy of Pierre Elliott Trudeau (Toronto: LexisNexis, 2020) 333. (Editors' translation.)

The impact of these interpretive provisions in particular cases is, however, difficult to measure. In R v Keegstra, [1990] 3 SCR 697, 1990 CanLII 24 (more fully excerpted in Chapter 20, Freedom of Expression), a decision concerning the constitutionality of a criminal ban on hate promotion, Dickson CJ said about s 27:

This Court has where possible taken account of s. 27 and its recognition that Canada possesses a multicultural society in which the diversity and richness of various cultural groups is a value to be protected and enhanced. Section 27 has therefore been used in a number of judgments of this Court, both as an aid in interpreting the definition of Charter rights and freedoms ... and as an element of the s. 1 analysis.

2. Parliamentary and Committee Debates

In Re BC Motor Vehicle Act, [1985] 2 SCR 486, 1985 CanLII 81, referred to in Chapter 16, The Advent of the Charter, the Court considered the relevance of the committee and Parliamentary debates that preceded the enactment of the Charter to the interpretation of the entrenched rights:

LAMER J (Dickson CJ and Beetz, Chouinard, and Le Dain JJ concurring):

[50] If speeches and declarations by prominent figures are inherently unreliable ... and "speeches made in the Legislature at the time of enactment of the measure are inadmissible as having little evidential weight" ... the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Special Joint Committee, though admissible, and granted somewhat more weight than speeches should not be given too much weight. The inherent unreliability of such statements and speeches is not altered by the mere fact that they pertain to the Charter rather than a statute.

[51] Moreover, the simple fact remains that the Charter is not the product of a few individual public servants, however distinguished, but of a multiplicity of individuals who played major roles in the negotiating, drafting and adoption of the Charter. How can one say with any confidence that within this enormous multiplicity of actors, without forgetting the role of the provinces, the comments of a few federal civil servants can in any way be determinative?

[52] Were this Court to accord any significant weight to this testimony, it would in effect be assuming a fact which is nearly impossible of proof, i.e., the intention of the legislative bodies which adopted the Charter. In view of the indeterminate nature of the data, it would in my view be erroneous to give these materials anything but minimal weight.

[53] Another danger with casting the interpretation of s. 7 in terms of the comments made by those heard at the Special Joint Committee Proceedings is that, in so doing, the rights, freedoms and values embodied in the Charter in effect become frozen in time to the moment of adoption with little or no possibility of growth, development and adjustment to changing societal needs. Obviously, in the present case, given the proximity in time of the Charter debates, such a problem is relatively minor, even though it must be noted that even at this early stage in the life of the Charter, a host of issues and questions have been raised which were largely unforeseen at the time of such proceedings. If the newly planted "living tree" which is the Charter is to have the possibility of growth and adjustment over time, care must be taken to ensure that historical materials, such as the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Special Joint Committee, do not stunt its growth.

To sum up, though they are admissible, debates or legislative history have limited weight in Charter interpretation.

Mary Dawson, who was at the time a leading member of the legislative drafting section of the Department of Justice in Ottawa, recalls her experience in drafting the Charter. Her comments echo Lamer J's observation about the "multiplicity of actors" involved in Charter drafting:

A special joint committee was established to consider the proposed amendments, and it was through this process that the proposals truly became a people's package. Representations were heard from a wide variety of groups and resulted in many amendments to what was to become the Charter. Perhaps of most significance was the fact that the proceedings of the committee were ... televised for the first time ever. Many Canadians watched the proceedings, and this generated a sense of excitement around the changes being proposed, which gave the package additional legitimacy.

I prepared amendments to the package to incorporate the changes [accepted] from among the many proposals made by witnesses appearing before the parliamentary committee. At the same time, I had the chance to make a significant number of editorial improvements to the drafts. A comprehensive document including these changes was tabled by Jean Chrétien, then Minister of Justice, in February of 1981.

I cannot overstate the breadth and significance of the changes that were made over the course of the several months during which the proposals were being discussed and considered. Many of the fundamental rights and freedoms set out in the Charter were significantly strengthened. As well, a number of new provisions were added to the Charter. These additions included an enforcement section (section 24), a new paragraph in the language rights provisions to include children of parents who received their primary-school education in the province involved (section 23), and interpretive provisions to protect multicultural heritage and denominational schools (sections 27 and 29).

The changes tabled in February 1981 were by and large accepted by Parliament, and there were several more added before the package was finally approved. These later alterations included a change of the amending formula that would apply to part II (Aboriginal and treaty rights); the addition of section 28, intended to give supremacy to equality rights; and a preamble recognizing the supremacy of God and the rule of law.

See Mary Dawson, "From the Backroom to the Front Line: Making Constitutional History or Encounters with the Constitution: Patriation, Meech Lake, and Charlottetown" (2012) 57:4 McGill LJ 955 at 960-62 (footnotes omitted).

3. Canadian Pre-Charter Jurisprudence

In several early Charter judgments, the Supreme Court of Canada signalled that decisions under the Canadian Bill of Rights had only limited relevance in Charter cases, given the different constitutional status and structure of the Charter. In R v Therens, Le Dain J stated (at para 48) that:

In considering the relationship of a decision under the Canadian Bill of Rights to an issue arising under the Charter, a court cannot, in my respectful opinion, avoid bearing in mind an evident fact of Canadian judicial history ... : that on the whole, with some notable exceptions, the courts have felt some uncertainty or ambivalence in the application of the Canadian Bill of Rights because it did not reflect a clear constitutional mandate [to limit or qualify] the traditional sovereignty of Parliament. The significance of the new constitutional mandate for judicial review provided by the Charter was emphasized by this Court in ... Hunter v. Southam.

4. Comparative and International Sources

In seeking to give meaning to the Charter's rights and to determine whether the limits imposed on these rights by democratic institutions are reasonable and just, Canadian courts have drawn on international experience in rights protection. Even though much of the language of the Charter's text was new and "made in Canada," the drafters of the Charter had in many cases drawn on the text of other rights-protecting instruments. It made sense then that the Canadian courts would look to judgments in other jurisdictions interpreting these rights documents. The American Bill of Rights provided an obvious model for the Canadian courts. It is a centuries-old document that has generated a considerable body of case law.

While the early decisions of Canadian courts often referred to American cases and commentary in their Charter decisions, the Supreme Court of Canada has said that these sources should be used with caution. In R v Keegstra (which dealt with the restriction of hate promotion), Dickson CJ noted:

In the United States, a collection of fundamental rights has been constitutionally protected for over two hundred years. The resulting practical and theoretical experience is immense, and should not be overlooked by Canadian courts. On the other hand, we must examine American constitutional law with a critical eye, and in this respect La Forest J. has noted in R v. Rahey, ... [1987] 1 S.C.R. 588, at p. 639:

While it is natural and even desirable for Canadian courts to refer to American constitutional jurisprudence in seeking to elucidate the meaning of Charter guarantees that have counterparts in the United States Constitution, they should be wary of drawing too ready a parallel between constitutions born to different countries in different ages and in very different circumstances

Canada and the United States are not alike in every way, nor have the documents entrenching human rights in our two countries arisen in the same context. It is only common sense to recognize that, just as similarities will justify borrowing from the American experience, differences may require that Canada's constitutional vision depart from that endorsed in the United States.

Over time, the Supreme Court of Canada has broadened the range of jurisdictions whose jurisprudence it considers in its decisions: see Ran Hirschl, "Going Global? Canada as Importer and Exporter of Constitutional Thought" in Richard Albert & David R Cameron, eds, Canada in the World: Comparative Perspectives on the Canadian Constitution (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2018) 305 at 313-14, 315 (footnotes omitted):

A recent survey of the Supreme Court's foreign citation patterns in constitutional cases reports a total of 1,944 such citations from 1982 to 2013. Of this total, 1,183 (61 per cent) were American cases, 516 (27 per cent) were United Kingdom cases, and about 12 per cent were rulings from other jurisdictions such as Australia (87 citations), New Zealand (35 citations) and the European Court of Human Rights (69 citations). The majority of references to American court rulings were made in the first fifteen years of the Charter, while the late 1990s saw a considerable decline in citation of American sources, reflecting both the declining relevance of US jurisprudence as persuasive authority, and at the same time, the increasing confidence of the Supreme Court of Canada.

The Supreme Court of Canada has also looked to international sources when interpreting the scope of Charter rights and assessing the justification of limits—notably, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (adopted by the United Nations in 1966 and which came into force in 1976); the International Covenant on Social, Economic and Cultural Rights (adopted by the United Nations in 1966 and which came into force in 1976); and the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (a rights document binding European countries, which came into force in 1953 and under which cases of infringement are brought before the European Court of Human Rights). According to Dickson CJ in R v Keegstra, above, "the international human rights obligations taken on by Canada reflect the values and principles of a free and democratic society, and thus those values and principles that underlie the Charter itself."

That being said, courts have often distinguished among binding sources of international law, such as international treaties ratified by Canada and customary international law, and non-binding, more "persuasive" sources such as treaties signed but not ratified by Canada, and comparative and foreign law. In the case of Quebec (AG) v 9147-0732 Québec inc, referred to above, the Court divided over the proper use of international law in interpreting s 12 of the Charter. At issue was whether corporations could enjoy s 12 rights. While the entire Court concluded they cannot, it differed on the appropriate use of international legal sources. Below is an excerpt from the majority opinion of five judges presenting a "principled framework" for the rules governing the use of international and comparative law in Charter interpretation. The majority frequently refers to the opinion of Abella J, who wrote for three judges. Writing for himself, Kasirer J found it unnecessary to address the issue.

Quebec (AG) v 9147-0732 Québec inc 2020 SCC 32

B. The Proper Role of International and Comparative Law in Charter Interpretation

[19] We differ fundamentally from our colleague Abella J. on the prominence she gives to international and comparative law in the interpretive process. We see this as a significant and unwarranted departure from this Court's jurisprudence. Specifically, her claim that all international and comparative sources have been "indispensable" to Canadian constitutional interpretation (at para. 100) does not hold true when considering this Court's jurisprudence and the varying role and weight it has assigned to different kinds of instruments.

[20] As a constitutional document that was "made in Canada" (Prime Minister Pierre Elliot Trudeau, Federal–Provincial Conference of First Ministers on the Constitution (morning session of November 2, 1981), at p. 10), the Charter and its provisions are primarily interpreted with regards to Canadian law and history.

[21] This remains unchanged by the purposive approach developed in Big M Drug Mart. That judgment makes no reference to international and comparative law, except inasmuch as it relates to the historical origins of the concepts enshrined in the Charter.

[22] While this Court has generally accepted that international norms can be considered when interpreting domestic norms, they have typically played a limited role of providing support or confirmation for the result reached by way of purposive interpretation. This makes sense, as Canadian courts interpreting the Charter are not bound by the content of international norms. As Professor Beaulac and Dr. Bérard explain:

[TRANSLATION] In addition to distorting the relationship between the international and domestic legal orders, the suggestion that domestic courts are bound by international normativity is inconsistent with the constitutional mandate and the function of the judiciary, which is to exercise decision-making power under the applicable Canadian and Quebec law. Seeing international law as having persuasive authority is a more appropriate, consistent and effective approach. ...

[23] Furthermore, ... the weight and persuasiveness of each of these international norms in the analysis depends on the nature of the source and its relationship to our Constitution. The reason for this is the necessity of preserving the integrity of the Canadian constitutional structure, and Canadian sovereignty. ...

[24] Although this Court has been careful to attach the appropriate weight to international and comparative law in Charter interpretation, it has not always explained how or why different international sources are being discussed or relied on, while others are not. The result has been a want of clarity, even confusion, to which, we say with respect, our colleague Abella J. adds by indiscriminately drawing from binding instruments and non-binding instruments, instruments that pre-date the Charter and instruments that post-date it, and decisions of international tribunals and foreign domestic courts, before concluding that, combined, they represent an "international consensus [that] does not dictate the outcome [but] provides compelling and relevant interpretive support": para. 107.

[25] As we will discuss, ... various instruments and case law ... play different roles in the analysis and receive different weight. Treating them all alike ... actually risks undermining the importance of Canada's international obligations:

The temptation may be great to treat all international law, whether binding on Canada or not, as "optional information" and to disregard the particular interpretative onus that is placed upon courts by the presumption of conformity with Canada's international obligations. There is a significant difference between international law that is binding on Canada and other international norms. The former is not only potentially persuasive but also obligatory. This distinction matters—when we fail to uphold our obligations, we undermine the respect for law internationally. ...

(J. Brunnée and S. J. Toope, "A Hesitant Embrace: The Application of International Law by Canadian Courts" (2002), 40 Can. Y.B. Intl Law 3, at p. 41 (emphasis added); see also J. H. Currie, Public International Law (2nd ed. 2008), at p. 260.)

[26] We are not alone in expressing concern about the need for structure when citing international and foreign sources. Commentators have called for clarification in this regard [including, specifically]:

... the standards by which courts will determine whether treaties have been implemented; what role non-binding sources (such as treaties which Canada has signed but not ratified, treaties which Canada has neither signed nor ratified, or "soft law" instruments) should play in interpreting domestic law; and whether these various categories of non-binding sources should be treated differently from one another or Canada's binding international legal obligations.

[27] A principled framework is therefore necessary and desirable, both to properly recognize Canada's international obligations and to provide consistent and clear guidance to courts and litigants ... Given the issue raised in this case, our focus is on the use of international and comparative law in constitutional interpretation.

[28] This Court has recognized a role for international and comparative law in interpreting Charter rights. However, this role has properly been to support or confirm an interpretation arrived at through the Big M Drug Mart approach; the Court has never relied on such tools to define the scope of Charter rights. Respectfully, our colleague Abella J.'s approach represents a marked and worrisome departure from this prudent practice.

[29] This Court (generally, albeit not invariably) has been careful to specify the normative value and weight of different kinds of international sources. Our colleague Abella J.'s approach simply abandons this important practice.

[30] A useful starting point is Dickson C.J.'s guidance in Re PSERA. While it appeared in a dissenting opinion, his approach to international and comparative law has since shaped the way this Court treats these sources. His consideration of the scope of s. 2 (d) of the Charter looked first to Canadian and Privy Council jurisprudence and then to U.S. and international law: p. 335. On international sources specifically, he explained:

The various sources of international human rights law—declarations, covenants, conventions, judicial and quasi-judicial decisions of international tribunals, customary norms—must, in my opinion, be relevant and persuasive sources for interpretation of the Charter's provisions.

In particular, the similarity between the policies and provisions of the Charter and those of international human rights documents attaches considerable relevance to interpretations of those documents by adjudicative bodies, in much the same way that decisions of the United States courts under the Bill of Rights, or decisions of the courts of other jurisdictions are relevant and may be persuasive. The relevance of these documents in Charter interpretation extends beyond the standards developed by adjudicative bodies under the documents to the documents themselves. (Emphasis added; pp. 348-49.)

[31] Continuing, Dickson C.J. then clarified that not all of these sources carry identical weight in Charter interpretation, stating that "the Charter should generally be presumed to provide protection at least as great as that afforded by similar provisions in international human rights documents which Canada has ratified": p. 349 (emphasis added). This proposition has since become a firmly established interpretive principle in Charter interpretation, the presumption of conformity [case citations have been omitted].

[32] Importantly, Dickson C.J. referred to instruments that Canada had ratified. In other words, his focus in framing this presumption was on binding international instruments ... Similarly, Dickson C.J. explained that in becoming a party to international human rights conventions, "Canada has thus obliged itself internationally to ensure within its borders the protection of certain fundamental rights and freedoms which are also contained in the Charter" and that "[t]he content of Canada's international human rights obligations is ... an important indicia of the meaning of 'the full benefit of the Charter's protection": p. 349 (emphasis added).

[33] Subsequent case law has continued to tie the presumption of conformity to the language of Canada's international obligations or commitments: Ktunaxa, at para. 65; Badesha, at para. 38; Saskatchewan Federation of Labour, at paras. 62 and 64–65; Divito, at para. 22; Health Services, at para. 69.

[34] This Court has explained that the presumption of conformity "operates principally as an interpretive tool in assisting the courts in delineating the breadth and scope of Charter rights" ... But, being a presumption, it is also rebuttable and "does not overthrow clear legislative intent"

[35] Dickson C.J.'s approach to non-binding sources—treating them as relevant and persuasive, but not determinative, interpretive tools—also holds true: United States v. Burns, 2001 SCC 7, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 283, at para. 80. Non-binding sources notably include international instruments to which Canada is not a party. Such instruments do not give rise to the presumption of conformity. They therefore have only persuasive value in Charter interpretation.

[37] In addition to properly characterizing their use, courts must not allow consideration of such instruments to displace the methodology for Charter interpretation set out in Big M Drug Mart. This Court has been careful to proceed in this manner. For example, in Ktunaxa, the Court first reviewed Canadian case law on the scope of freedom of religion before confirming that scope with reference to binding international instruments: paras. 62–65. It then briefly looked to non-binding instruments that "also" supported the Canadian case law, being careful to specify that the instruments were "not binding on Canada and therefore do not attract the presumption of conformity" but were "important illustrations of how freedom of religion is conceived around the world": para. 66. Similarly, in Saskatchewan Federation of Labour, the Court began with Canadian case law on s. 2 (d) of the Charter and its history: paras. 28–55. It then explained that Canada's international human rights obligations "also" mandated protecting the right to strike, with particular emphasis on binding instruments and the presumption of conformity: paras. 62–70. Finally, it noted that its conclusion was "[a]dditionally" supported by foreign domestic law: paras. 71–74.

[38] It follows from all this, and, specifically, from the presumption of conformity, that binding instruments necessarily carry more weight in the analysis than non-binding instruments. While resort may be had to both, courts drawing from a non-binding instrument should be careful to explain why they are drawing on a particular source and how it is being used. ...

[39] In this case, the Convention against Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, Can. T.S. 1987 No. 36, and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Can. T.S. 1976 No. 47 ("ICCPR"), are both binding on Canada, thus triggering the presumption of conformity. However, ... neither extends protection from cruel and unusual punishment to corporations.

[40] [In her opinion, our colleague Abella J considers] the American Convention on Human Rights, 1144 U.N.T.S. 123, adopted by Mexico and nations in the Caribbean and central and South America, and the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, 213 U.N.T.S. 221. While we agree that neither instrument has been found to extend protection to corporations against cruel and unusual punishment, we are wary of ... [giving] these non-binding instruments similar weight to binding ones. We therefore highlight that these instruments are merely persuasive here, and that a court relying upon them should explain why it is doing so, and how they are being used (that is, what weight is being assigned to them).

[41] Another important distinction is between instruments that pre- and post-date the Charter. ... International instruments that pre-date the Charter can clearly form part of the historical context of a Charter right and illuminate the way it was framed. Here, whether Canada is or is not a party to such instruments is less important, as the "drafters of the Charter drew on international conventions because they were the best models of rights protection, not because Canada had ratified them": L. E. Weinrib, "A Primer on International Law and the Canadian Charter" (2006), 21 N.J.C.L. 313, at p. 324. In this case, then, the context of the English Bill of Rights, and the Eighth Amendment is highly relevant as each contained similar—but, importantly, not identical—protections as s. 12, as we have explained above. Similarly, it is entirely proper and relevant to consider the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, G.A. Res. 217 A (III), U.N. Doc. A/810, at 71 (1948), which Canada voted to adopt and which inspired the ICCPR, the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, Can. T.S. 1976 No. 46, and related protocols Canada has ratified: Weinrib, at p. 317.

[42] As for instruments that post-date the Charter, however, the question becomes once again whether or not they are binding on Canada[.] ...

[43] Finally, we turn to decisions of foreign and international courts. In Re PSERA, these decisions were included among those non-binding sources that "are relevant and may be persuasive": p. 348. Particular caution should, however, be exercised when referring to what other countries have done domestically, as the measures in effect in other countries say little (if anything at all) about the scope of the rights enshrined in the Canadian Charter, a point stated emphatically by this Court in Frank v. Canada (Attorney General), 2019 SCC 1, [2019] 1 S.C.R. 3, at para. 62. ...

[Here, the majority took issue with Abella J's use of foreign domestic jurisprudence, charging that she failed "to explain in what way they are instructive, how they are being used, or why the particular sources are being relied on" (at para 44). It noted, too, that a number of the Supreme Court cases cited by Abella J in this regard "largely focus[ed] on binding instruments" or were (correctly) oriented towards "whether an international consensus existed because of the nature of the questions asked," for example, regarding the death penalty (at para 45).]

[46] As this Court's jurisprudence amply shows, the normative value and weight of international and comparative sources has been tailored to reflect the nature of the source and its relationship to our Constitution. ...

[47] In all, courts must be careful not to indiscriminately agglomerate the traditional Big M Drug Mart factors with international and comparative law. The analysis must be dominated by the former and draw on the latter only as appropriate, accompanied by an explanation of why a non-binding source is being considered and how it is being used, including the persuasive weight being assigned to it. ...

III. LIMITATIONS UNDER SECTION 1

This section introduces the two main structural components of s 1: first, the requirement that all limits on rights be “prescribed by law,” and second, the requirement that limits be “reasonable” and “demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.”

A. PRESCRIBED BY LAW

Before the government may argue that competing interests justify the limitation of a Charter right, it must first show that the limit is “prescribed by law.” The requirement that a limit on a Charter right have the form of “law” serves a gatekeeper function, limiting the number of instances in which an infringement will be upheld under s 1.

The prescribed by law requirement has been interpreted as being concerned with two distinct facets of the rule of law: first, is the limit on the right authorized by a “law?” and, second, does the law have the required degree of precision? (Here we see a concern with undue vagueness in the drafting of the law.)

The Supreme Court of Canada’s most comprehensive discussion of the “prescribed by law” requirement is found in the case that follows.

Greater Vancouver Transportation Authority v Canadian Federation of Students—British Columbia Component

2009 SCC 31

[In GVTA, two transit authorities—BC Transit and TransLink—refused to carry the political advertisements of a student organization and a public-sector union on the sides of their buses. In doing so, they relied on their advertising policies, which permitted commercial but not political advertising on public transit vehicles. The Supreme Court addressed the question of whether those policies were “law” and hence capable of satisfying the “prescribed by law” requirement.

The student organization and union argued that the relevant sections of the transit authorities’ policies violated their right to freedom of expression guaranteed by s 2(b) of the Charter. The trial judge dismissed the action, finding that there had been no infringement of the right to freedom of expression. A majority of the Court of Appeal reversed the trial judgment, finding an infringement of freedom of expression that could not be justified under s 1. The Supreme Court of Canada dismissed the appeal. The portions of the judgment dealing with freedom of expression can be found in Chapter 20. The case also involved a preliminary issue of application, which is dealt with in Chapter 18 (both BC Transit and TransLink were found to be government entities, and hence subject to the Charter).]

DESCHAMPS J (McLachlin CJ and Binnie, LeBel, Abella, Charron, and Rothstein JJ concurring):

3.3.1 Case Law on the “Prescribed by Law” Requirement

[50] ... In assessing whether the impugned policies satisfy the “prescribed by law” requirement, it must first be determined whether the policies come within the meaning of the word “law” in s. 1 of the Charter. To do this, it must be asked whether the government entity was authorized to enact the impugned policies and whether the policies are binding rules of general application. If so, the policies can be “law” for the purposes of s. 1. At the second stage of the enquiry, to find that the limit is

"prescribed" by law, it must be determined whether the policies are sufficiently precise and accessible. Professor Peter W. Hogg describes the rationale behind the "prescribed by law" requirement in Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. 2007), vol. 2, at p. 122:

The requirement that any limit on rights be prescribed by law reflects two values that are basic to constitutionalism or the rule of law. First, in order to preclude arbitrary and discriminatory action by government officials, all official action in derogation of rights must be authorized by law. Secondly, citizens must have a reasonable opportunity to know what is prohibited so that they can act accordingly. Both these values are satisfied by a law that fulfils two requirements: (1) the law must be adequately accessible to the public, and (2) the law must be formulated with sufficient precision to enable people to regulate their conduct by it, and to provide guidance to those who apply the law.

[51] In R. v. Therens, ... [1985] 1 S.C.R. 613, the Court emphasized that the "prescribed by law" requirement safeguards the public against arbitrary state limits on Charter rights. Le Dain J. set out the Court's initial interpretation of the expression "prescribed by law" in s. 1 of the Charter (at p. 645):

The requirement that the limit be prescribed by law is chiefly concerned with the distinction between a limit imposed by law and one that is arbitrary. The limit will be prescribed by law within the meaning of s. 1 if it is expressly provided for by statute or regulation, or results by necessary implication from the terms of a statute or regulation or from its operating requirements.

[52] Thus, the Court does not require that the limit be prescribed by a "law" in the narrow sense of the term; it may be prescribed by a regulation or by the common law. Moreover, it is sufficient that the limit simply result by necessary implication from either the terms or the operating requirements of the "law." ...

[53] The Court has also implicitly recognized other forms of limits that were not originally identified in Therens as being prescribed by law, including limits contained in municipal by-laws ... , provisions of a collective agreement involving a government entity ... and rules of a regulatory body Such limits satisfy the "prescribed by law" requirement because, much like those resulting from regulations and other delegated legislation, their adoption is authorized by statute, they are binding rules of general application, and they are sufficiently accessible and precise to those to whom they apply. In these regards, they satisfy the concerns that underlie the "prescribed by law" requirement insofar as they preclude arbitrary state action and provide individuals and government entities with sufficient information on how they should conduct themselves.

[54] The Court has likewise taken a liberal approach to the precision requirement. . . .

[55] These cases show that the Court has chosen to take a flexible approach to the "prescribed by law" requirement as regards both the form (e.g., statute, regulation, municipal by-law, rule of a regulatory body or collective agreement provision) and articulation of a limit on a Charter right (i.e., a standard intelligible to the public and to those who apply the law). In the end, the Court has emphasized, as in Therens, the need to distinguish between limits which arise by law and limits which result from arbitrary state action; those resulting from arbitrary state action continue to fail the "prescribed by law" requirement.

[56] This inclusive approach is based on a recognition that a narrow interpretation would lead to excessive rigidity in a parliamentary and legislative system that relies heavily on framework legislation and delegations of broad discretionary powers.

McLachlin J. (as she then was) commented on this as follows in Committee for the Commonwealth of Canada (at p. 245):

From a practical point of view, it would be wrong to limit the application of s. 1 to enacted laws or regulations. That would require the Crown to pass detailed regulations to deal with every contingency as a pre-condition of justifying its conduct under s. 1. In my view, such a technical approach does not accord with the spirit of the Charter and would make it unduly difficult to justify limits on rights and freedoms which may be reasonable and, indeed, necessary.

See also Little Sisters Book and Art Emporium v. Canada (Minister of Justice), ... [2000] 2 S.C.R. 1120, at para. 137.

[57] Bearing in mind the broad interpretation given the "prescribed by law" requirement and the principles underlying the Court's approach, I must now consider whether limits resulting from policies of a government entity satisfy the "prescribed by law" requirement.

3.3.2 Government Policies and the "Prescribed by Law" Requirement

[58] Government policies come in many varieties. Oftentimes, even though they emanate from a government entity rather than from Parliament or a legislature, they are similar, in both form and substance, to statutes, regulations and other delegated legislation. Indeed, as a binding rule adopted pursuant to a government entity's statutory powers, a policy may have a legal effect similar to that of a municipal by-law or a law society's rules, both of which fall within the meaning of "law" for the purposes of s. 1. Other government policies are informal or strictly internal, and amount in substance merely to guidelines or interpretive aids as opposed to legal rules. The question that arises is this: Does a given policy or rule emanating from a government entity satisfy the "prescribed by law" requirement? It can be seen from the case law that a distinction must be drawn between rules that are legislative in nature and rules that are administrative in nature.

[63] What [the case law] demonstrate[s] is a concern about the administrative nature of the policies and guidelines of the government entities in question. Administrative rules relate to the implementation of laws contained in a statutory scheme and are created for the purpose of administrative efficiency. The key question is thus whether the policies are focussed on "indoor" management. In such a case, they are meant for internal use and are often informal in nature; express statutory authority is not required to make them. Such rules or policies act as interpretive aids in the application of a statute or regulation. They cannot in and of themselves be viewed as "law" that prescribes a limit on a Charter right. An interpretive guideline or policy is not intended to establish individuals' rights and obligations or to create entitlements. Moreover, such documents are usually accessible only within the government entity and are therefore unhelpful to members of the public who are entitled to know what limits there are on their Charter rights. No matter how broadly the word "law" is defined for the purposes of s. 1, a policy that is administrative in nature does not fall within the definition, because it is not intended to be a legal basis for government action.

[64] Where a policy is not administrative in nature, it may be "law" provided that it meets certain requirements. ... [T]he policy must establish a norm or standard of general application that has been enacted by a government entity pursuant to a rule-making authority. A rule-making authority will exist if Parliament or a provincial legislature has delegated power to the government entity for the specific purpose of enacting binding rules of general application which establish the rights and obligations of the individuals to whom they apply (D.C. Holland and J.P. McGowan, Delegated Legislation in Canada (1989), at p. 103). For the purposes of s. 1 of the Charter, these rules need not take the form of statutory instruments. So long as the enabling legislation allows the entity to adopt binding rules, and so long as the rules establish rights and obligations of general rather than specific application and are sufficiently accessible and precise, they will qualify as "law" which prescribes a limit on a Charter right.

[65] Thus, where a government policy is authorized by statute and sets out a general norm or standard that is meant to be binding and is sufficiently accessible and precise, the policy is legislative in nature and constitutes a limit that is "prescribed by law."

[66] The question which now remains is whether the transit authorities' advertising policies meet the "prescribed by law" requirement under s. 1 of the Charter.

3.3.3 Application of the Principles to the Transit Authorities' Policies

[67] A review of the enabling legislation suggests that the transit authorities' policies were adopted pursuant to statutory powers conferred on BC Transit and TransLink.

[70] The enabling statutes ... confer broad discretionary powers on each entity's board of directors to adopt rules regulating the conduct of its affairs, including the generation of revenue for the public transportation system through advertising sales. ...

[71] Where a legislature has empowered a government entity to make rules, it seems only logical, absent evidence to the contrary, that it also intended those rules to be binding. In this case, TransLink is empowered to "establish rules" and to "enter into contracts," "adopt bylaws" and "pass resolutions." Bylaws and contracts are intended to bind. In the context of the enabling provisions, it follows that resolutions have the same binding effect as the other enumerated instruments.

[72] The policies are not administrative in nature, as they are not meant for internal use as an interpretive aid for "rules" laid down in the legislative scheme. Rather, the policies are themselves rules that establish the rights of the individuals to whom they apply. Moreover, the policies can be said to be general in scope, since they establish standards which are applicable to all who want to take advantage of the advertising service rather than to a specific case. They therefore fall within the meaning of the word "law" for the purposes of s. 1 and will satisfy the "prescribed by law" requirement provided that they are sufficiently accessible and precise.

[73] In my view, the transit authorities' advertising policies are both accessible and precise. They are made available to members of the general public who wish to advertise on the transit authorities' buses, and they clearly outline the types of advertisements that will or will not be accepted. Thus, the limits on expression are accessible and are worded precisely enough to enable potential advertisers to understand what is prohibited. The limits resulting from the policies are therefore legislative in nature and are "limits prescribed by law" within the meaning of s. 1 of the Charter.

NOTE

One of the cases discussed in GVTA is Little Sisters Book and Art Emporium v Canada (Minister of Justice), 2000 SCC 69, discussed in more detail in Chapter 20. The case involved claims by a bookstore that customs officials, in administering a statutory prohibition on the importation of obscene material, had targeted gay and lesbian material and that this constituted a violation of s 15 of the Charter. A violation of s 15 was established and under s 1 of the Charter, the policy of targeting gay and lesbian material was found not to be "prescribed by law." The policy was based on an internal memorandum that set out guidelines for interpreting the legislation and was simply an "internal administrative aid" that did not constitute "law." The statute itself, which was the source of customs agents' authority to prohibit the importation of obscene material, did not authorize such discriminatory action.

In many cases, courts have preferred to deal with the claim that a restriction is too vague or too broad in its grant of discretion at the second stage of its s 1 analysis as part of a general (and contextual) balancing of competing interests. For example, in Canada (Human Rights Commission) v Taylor, [1990] 3 SCR 892, 1990 CanLII 26 (discussed in Chapter 20), McLachlin J, dissenting, but not on this point, said:

[T]he difficulty in ascribing a constant and universal meaning to the terms used [in the section being challenged] is a factor to be taken into account in assessing whether a law is "demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society." But I would be reluctant to circumvent the entire balancing analysis of the s. 1 test by finding that the words used were so vague as not to constitute a "limit prescribed by law," unless the provision could truly be described as failing to offer an intelligible standard.

The Court in Taylor unanimously held that a provision of the Canadian Human Rights Act, RSC 1985, c H-6, which provided that it was a discriminatory practice to use the telephone to communicate repeatedly any matter likely to expose persons to hatred or contempt on certain grounds was sufficiently precise to constitute a limit prescribed by law.

B. JUSTIFICATION

The following excerpt, written by a former president of the Supreme Court of Israel, introduces the complex topic of how rights infringements may be justified.

Aharon Barak, "Proportionality and Principled Balancing"

(2010) 4:1 Law and Ethics of Human Rights 1 at 3-5 (footnotes omitted)

Human rights are not the only considerations to be taken into account in a democracy and limitations on these rights are unavoidable and of two types: The first includes limitations that are necessary to allow others to exercise their own rights. Democracies can limit rights in order to protect "the rights of others," a concept that was expressed first in France as early as 1789 in the Declaration of the Rights of Man and the Citizen. The second type of limitation includes those limitations that are necessary for society to achieve its goals. Democracies may restrict an individual's rights in order to: ensure the continued existence of the state, preserve its democratic nature, maintain public health and order, and provide public education, along with other national or collective objectives. To achieve those goals, the state may limit human rights. The special nature of the democratic political system—which is based on cooperation between the society and the individual—is thereby realized. Democracy is based on a proper relationship between the interests of society and human rights. Both society's interests and human rights are part of a unified legal structure that determines the scope of human rights and allows for their limitation.

C. The Proper Relationship Between the Public's Needs and Human Rights

What is the proper relationship between human rights and society's interests, and when is the state justified in restricting human rights? There is no universally accepted answer to this question; rather, responses vary from society to society and from era to era. Thus, each democracy gives meaning to this relationship according to its own circumstances, reflecting that society's unique challenges, history, and self-perception. Accordingly, in the wake of the Nazi atrocities and the Holocaust, post-World War II Germany viewed human dignity as the central component of its democracy; not surprisingly, the primary values in the post-apartheid South African democracy are equality, human life, and dignity; nor is it surprising that Israel strives for the proper relationship between the public's needs and individual rights in realizing its values not only as a democratic state but also as a Jewish one.

Human rights are a central feature of all democracies, but the degree of their centrality varies from one democracy to another. As a result, democratic societies disagree on the proper relationship between human rights' and society's interests and here is where the concept of proportionality comes into play.

The Role of Proportionality

A. The Meaning of Proportionality

Proportionality creates a conceptual framework in which to define the appropriate relationship between human rights and considerations that may justify their limitation in a democracy. Proportionality is an analytical and methodological doctrine as well as a legal construction. In and of itself, it does not provide a substantive solution to the appropriate relationship between human rights and justifications for their limitation. It is neither libertarian nor communitarian, and it is influenced by external factors. However, with that said, it is not a "neutral" construction and aims to protect human rights in a manner compatible to democracy.

The point of departure for understanding proportionality is the basic distinction between the scope of the right and the limitations imposed on it by law that prevent its full realization. Determining the scope of a right requires its interpretation in a manner that realizes the underlying purpose of the right. I believe that the scope of the right does not change when it is in conflict with other constitutional values—such as society's interests (national security, public order) or other conflicting rights. The clash between conflicting interests or values should not be expressed in the scope of the right, but rather in the manner the right is exercised and realized, and it is in this domain that proportionality plays a central role.

Proportionality in the broad sense is based on two principle components. The first is legality, which requires that the limitation be "prescribed by law"; the second is legitimacy, which is fulfilled by compliance with the requirements of proportionality in the regular sense. Its concern is with the conditions that justify the limitation of a constitutional right by a law. There are two main justificatory conditions: an appropriate goal and proportionate means. An appropriate goal is a threshold requirement and in determining it no consideration is given to the means utilized by the law for attaining the goal. A goal is appropriate even if the means of attaining it are not. The proportionate means must comply with three secondary criteria: (a) a rational connection between the appropriate goal and the means utilized by the law to attain it; (b) the goal cannot be achieved by means that are less restrictive of the constitutional right; (c) there must be a proportionate balance between the social benefit of realizing the appropriate goal, and the harm caused to the right (proportionality stricto sensu or the proportionate effect).

Proportionality therefore fulfills a dual function: On the one hand, it allows the limitation of human rights by law, and on the other hand, it subjects these limitations to certain conditions; namely—those stemming from proportionality. Proportionality reflects the idea that the constitutional right and its limitations are flip sides of the same constitutional concept. It expresses the idea that human rights are not absolute, but at the same time it makes it clear that the limitations themselves have limits. [Emphasis in original.]

1. The Oakes Test

The Supreme Court of Canada's first comprehensive treatment of the meaning of s 1 came in R v Oakes, immediately below, which remains the primary referent for this second stage of Charter adjudication.

R v Oakes

[\[1986\] 1 SCR 103, 1986 CanLII 46](#)

[Section 8 of the Narcotic Control Act, RSC 1970, c N-1 created a "rebuttable presumption" that once the fact of possession of a narcotic had been proven, an intention to traffic would be inferred unless the accused established the absence of such an intention. In Oakes, the accused challenged this "reverse onus" provision, arguing that it violated s 11(d) of the Charter. After finding that s 8 did violate s 11(d), the Court went on to discuss whether the limit could nonetheless be upheld under s 1.]

DICKSON CJ (Chouinard, Lamert, Wilson, and Le Dain JJ concurring):

It is important to observe at the outset that s. 1 has two functions: first, it constitutionally guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in the provisions which follow; and, second, it states explicitly the exclusive justificatory criteria (outside of s. 33 of the Constitution Act, 1982) against which limitations on those rights and freedoms must be measured. Accordingly, any s. 1 inquiry must be premised on an understanding that the impugned limit violates constitutional rights and freedoms—rights and freedoms which are part of the supreme law of Canada. As Wilson J. stated in Singh v. Minister of Employment and Immigration [[1985] 1 SCR 177, 1985 CanLII 65], at 218: "... it is important to remember that the courts are conducting this inquiry in light of a commitment to uphold the rights and freedoms set out in the other sections of the Charter."

A second contextual element of interpretation of s. 1 is provided by the words "free and democratic society." Inclusion of these words as the final standard of justification for limits on rights and freedoms refers the Court to the very purpose for which the Charter was originally entrenched in the Constitution: Canadian society is to be free and democratic. The Court must be guided by the values and principles essential to a free and democratic society which I believe embody, to name but a few, respect for the inherent dignity of the human person, commitment to social justice and equality, accommodation of a wide variety of beliefs, respect for cultural and group identity, and faith in social and political institutions which enhance the participation of individuals and groups in society. The underlying values and principles of a free and democratic society are the genesis of the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Charter and the ultimate standard against which a limit on a right or freedom must be shown, despite its effect, to be reasonable and demonstrably justified.

The rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Charter are not, however, absolute. It may become necessary to limit rights and freedoms in circumstances where their exercise would be inimical to the realization of collective goals of fundamental importance. For this reason, s. 1 provides criteria of justification for limits on the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Charter. These criteria impose a stringent standard of justification, especially when understood in terms of the two contextual considerations discussed above, namely, the violation of a constitutionally guaranteed right or freedom and the fundamental principles of a free and democratic society.

The onus of proving that a limit on a right or freedom guaranteed by the Charter is reasonable and demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society rests upon the party seeking to uphold the limitation. It is clear from the text of s. 1 that limits on the rights and freedoms enumerated in the Charter are exceptions to their general guarantee. The presumption is that the rights and freedoms are guaranteed unless the party invoking s. 1 can bring itself within the exceptional criteria which justify their being limited. This is further substantiated by the use of the word "demonstrably" which clearly indicates that the onus of justification is on the party seeking to limit: Hunter v. Southam Inc. [[1984] 2 SCR 145, 1984 CanLII 33].

The standard of proof under s. 1 is the civil standard, namely, proof by a preponderance of probability. The alternative criminal standard, proof beyond a reasonable doubt, would, in my view, be unduly onerous on the party seeking to limit. Concepts such as "reasonableness," "justifiability" and "free and democratic society" are simply not amenable to such a standard. Nevertheless, the preponderance of probability test must be applied rigorously. Indeed, the phrase "demonstrably justified" in s. 1 of the Charter supports this conclusion. Within the broad category of the civil standard, there exist different degrees of probability depending on the nature of the case[.] ...

Having regard to the fact that s. 1 is being invoked for the purpose of justifying a violation of the constitutional rights and freedoms the Charter was designed to protect, a very high degree of probability will be, in the words of Lord Denning, "commensurate with the occasion." Where evidence is required in order to prove the constituent elements of a s. 1 inquiry, and this will generally be the case, it should be cogent and persuasive and make clear to the Court the consequences of imposing or not imposing the limit. ... A court will also need to know what alternative measures for implementing the objective were available to the legislators when they made their decisions. I should add, however, that there may be cases where certain elements of the s. 1 analysis are obvious or self-evident.

To establish that a limit is reasonable and demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society, two central criteria must be satisfied. First, the objective, which the measures responsible for a limit on a Charter right or freedom are designed to serve, must be "of sufficient importance to warrant overriding a constitutionally protected right or freedom": R v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [[1985] 1 SCR 295, 1985 CanLII 69] at p. 352. The standard must be high in order to ensure that objectives which are trivial or discordant with the principles integral to a free and democratic society do not gain s. 1 protection. It is necessary, at a minimum, that an objective relate to concerns which are pressing and substantial in a free and democratic society before it can be characterized as sufficiently important.

Second, once a sufficiently significant objective is recognized, then the party invoking s. 1 must show that the means chosen are reasonable and demonstrably justified. This involves "a form of proportionality test": R v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., supra, at p. 352. Although the nature of the proportionality test will vary depending on the circumstances, in each case courts will be required to balance the interests of society with those of individuals and groups. There are, in my view, three important components of a proportionality test. First, the measures adopted must be carefully designed to achieve the objective in question. They must not be arbitrary, unfair or based on irrational considerations. In short, they must be rationally connected to the objective. Second, the means, even if rationally connected to the objective in this first sense, should impair "as little as possible" the right or freedom in question; R v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., supra, at p. 352. Third, there must be a proportionality between the effects of the measures which are responsible for limiting the Charter right or freedom, and the objective which has been identified as of "sufficient importance."

With respect to the third component, it is clear that the general effect of any measure impugned under s. 1 will be the infringement of a right or freedom guaranteed by the Charter; this is the reason why resort to s. 1 is necessary. The inquiry into effects must, however, go further. A wide range of rights and freedoms are guaranteed by the Charter, and an almost infinite number of factual situations may arise in respect of these. Some limits on rights and freedoms protected by the Charter will be more serious than others in terms of the nature of the right or freedom violated, the extent of the violation, and the degree to which the measures which impose the limit trench upon the integral principles of a free and democratic society. Even if an objective is of sufficient importance, and the first two elements of the proportionality test are satisfied, it is still possible that, because of the severity of the deleterious effects of a measure on individuals or groups, the measure will not be justified by the purposes it is intended to serve. The more severe the deleterious effects of a measure, the more important the objective must be if the measure is to be reasonable and demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

[The Court went on to apply the above analysis to the reverse onus provision found in s 8 of the Narcotic Control Act. It concluded that the objective of protecting society from the ills associated with drug trafficking was of sufficient importance to warrant overriding a constitutionally protected right or freedom in certain cases and, moreover, that the seriousness of the problem was to a large extent self-evident. The federal government had submitted some evidence to establish the seriousness of the problem of drug trafficking. The evidence included several governmental reports on the problems of drug abuse and an International Protocol on the international trade in and use of opium that Canada had signed. However, the Court concluded that the means chosen to implement this objective—that is, the reverse onus—failed the first step of the proportionality test. The means were not rationally connected to the objective of curbing drug trafficking because there was no rational connection between possession of a small quantity of narcotics and an intent to traffic.]

Appeal dismissed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Pressing and Substantial Purpose. As you read the cases in subsequent chapters, you will see that courts rarely find that a restriction fails this first step of the Oakes test. R v Big M Drug Mart Ltd (excerpted in Chapter 19) is an exceptional case. In Big M, the Supreme Court of Canada found that the law's purpose, which was to compel a religious practice (observance of Sunday as the Sabbath), could not be considered "pressing and substantial." In the Court's view, such a purpose directly contradicted the constitutional commitment to religious freedom.

The courts seem prepared to regard almost any purpose (that is not a direct denial or contradiction of the right) as "pressing and substantial." They prefer to take account of the insubstantial character of a restriction's purpose at the proportionality stage of the Oakes test. Why do you think they have taken this approach?

In Big M, the Court also said that in defending a law under s 1, the government could not rely on a purpose different from that which animated the law at the time of its enactment. According to the Court: "Purpose is a function of the intent of those who drafted and enacted the legislation at the time, and not of any shifting variable" (at para 91). Any other view would mean that (at para 90)

[I]aws assumed valid on the basis of persuasive and powerful authority could be struck down as invalid. Not only would this create uncertainty in the law, but it would encourage re-litigation of the same issues and, it could be argued, provide the courts with a means by which to arrive at a result dictated by other than legal considerations.

Are the Court's concerns justified? In R v Butler, [1992] 1 SCR 452, 1992 CanLII 124 (excerpted in Chapter 20), the Court said that the rule against "shifting purpose" does not preclude a shift in the emphasis of the law's general purpose. When you read Butler, consider whether this distinction between "shifting purpose" and "permissible shift in emphasis" is workable.

2. Rational Connection and Minimal Impairment. While the first step of the Oakes test focuses on the purpose of the impugned law, the next two steps consider the means chosen to advance that purpose. The rational connection and minimal impairment tests are closely related. A law that does not rationally advance the pressing and substantial purpose for which it was enacted can be described as unnecessarily restricting the right or freedom. Similarly, a law that restricts the right or freedom more than is necessary to advance its pressing purpose (that does not minimally impair the freedom) can be described as partially ineffective or irrational.

As the Supreme Court of Canada noted in Charkaoui v Canada (Citizenship and Immigration), 2007 SCC 9 (at para 85), "Parliament is not required to use the perfect, or least restrictive, alternative to achieve its objective." In that case, despite deference being owed to Parliament, the Court found that the legislature could have done more to protect the individual's rights, considering that other countries had achieved similar objectives using less intrusive alternatives. In RJR-MacDonald Inc v Canada (AG), [1995] 3 SCR 199, 1995 CanLII 64, the Court found that when Parliament's preferred approach falls "within a range of reasonable alternatives," the minimal impairment test will be satisfied. But if the Court can identify "equally effective" and less intrusive means to achieve the objective, it will rule that the law does not minimally impair the rights or freedoms at stake (at para 160).

3. The Final Balance. In Dagenais v Canadian Broadcasting Corp, [1994] 3 SCR 835, 1994 CanLII 39, Lamer CJ, writing for five members of the Court, added a refinement or clarification to the third part of the Oakes proportionality test. This last component of the Oakes test, which is referred to as the "deleterious effects" test or the "disproportionate effects" test, requires a proportionality between the effects of the measures that are responsible for limiting the Charter right or freedom, and the objective that has been identified as of "sufficient importance." The Dagenais refinement requires that in applying this test, courts consider not only the objective of the impugned law but also its salutary effects. The rationale for refining the test in this way is set out in the following extract (at 887-89):

As Dickson C.J. stated in Oakes ... "[e]ven if an objective is of sufficient importance, and the first two elements of the proportionality test are satisfied, it is still possible that, because of the severity of the deleterious effects of a measure on individuals or groups, the measure will not be justified by the purposes it is intended to serve." In many instances, the imposition of a measure will result in the full, or nearly full, realization of the legislative objective. In these situations, the third step of the proportionality test calls for an examination of the balance that has been struck between the objective in question and the deleterious effects on constitutionally protected rights arising from the means that have been employed to achieve this objective. At other times, however, the measure at issue, while rationally connected to an important objective, will result in only the partial achievement of this object. In such cases, I believe that the third step of the second branch of the Oakes test requires both that the underlying objective of a measure and the salutary effects that actually result from its implementation be proportional to the deleterious effects the measure has on fundamental rights and freedoms. A legislative objective may be pressing and substantial, the means chosen may be rationally connected to that objective, and less rights-impairing alternatives may not be available. Nonetheless, even if the importance of the objective itself (when viewed in the abstract) outweighs the deleterious effects on protected rights, it is still possible that the actual salutary effects of the legislation will not be sufficient to justify these negative effects.

In my view, characterizing the third part of the second branch of the Oakes test as being concerned solely with the balance between the objective and the deleterious effects of a measure rests on too narrow a conception of proportionality. I believe that even if an objective is of sufficient importance, the first two elements of the proportionality test are satisfied, and the deleterious effects are proportional to the objectives, it is still possible that, because of a lack of proportionality between the deleterious effects and the salutary effects, a measure will not be reasonable and demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society. I would, therefore, rephrase the third part of the Oakes test as follows: there must be a proportionality between the deleterious effects of the measures which are responsible for limiting the rights or freedoms in question and the objective, and there must be a proportionality between the deleterious and the salutary effects of the measures. [Emphasis in original.]

The Dagenais requirement that the actual salutary effects of the law be considered may be relevant in cases where the challenged law may not be completely successful in achieving the objectives for which it was enacted. Such was the case in Dagenais itself, which involved a publication ban ordered for the purpose of guaranteeing a fair trial, but which, in operation, was found to have only limited effect given the difficulty of effectively enforcing such bans in light of technological advances.

With respect to the overall structure of s 1 analysis, the first step of the Oakes test involves a general judgment about the significance of the law's purpose. The next two steps involve a general assessment of the effectiveness of its means. At the final stage of the test, the Court is required to weigh the negative impact of the law on people's rights against the beneficial impact of the law in terms of achieving its goal for the greater public good. The impacts are judged both qualitatively and quantitatively. Unlike individual claimants, the Crown is well placed to call the social science and expert evidence required to justify the law's impact in terms of society as a whole.

See Canada (AG) v Bedford, 2013 SCC 72 at para 126.

In Alberta v Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony, 2009 SCC 37, McLachlin CJ, writing for the majority, emphasized the importance of the final step in the Oakes test and the need to distinguish it from the minimal impairment analysis:

[75] Despite the importance Dickson C.J. accorded to this stage of the justification analysis, it has not often been used. ...

[76] It may be questioned how a law which has passed the rigours of the first three stages of the proportionality analysis—pressing goal, rational connection, and minimum impairment—could fail at the final inquiry of proportionality of effects. The answer lies in the fact that the first three stages of Oakes are anchored in an assessment of the law's purpose. Only the fourth branch takes full account of the “severity of the deleterious effects of a measure on individuals or groups.” As President Barak explains:

Whereas the rational connection test and the least harmful measure test are essentially determined against the background of the proper objective, and are derived from the need to realize it, the test of proportionality (stricto sensu) examines whether the realization of this proper objective is commensurate with the deleterious effect upon the human right ... It requires placing colliding values and interests side by side and balancing them according to their weight. [p. 374]

In my view, the distinction drawn by Barak is a salutary one, though it has not always been strictly followed by Canadian courts. Because the minimal impairment and proportionality of effects analyses involve different kinds of balancing, analytical clarity and transparency are well served by distinguishing between them. Where no alternative means are reasonably capable of satisfying the government's objective, the real issue is whether the impact of the rights infringement is disproportionate to the likely benefits of the impugned law. Rather than reading down the government's objective within the minimal impairment analysis, the court should acknowledge that no less drastic means are available and proceed to the final stage of Oakes.

It is an open question whether this ruling has significantly changed dominant patterns of s 1 interpretation. It remains rare for courts to invalidate a provision on the basis of the final step of the Oakes test. In 2016, it was used in order to overturn a provision of the Criminal Code (see R v KRJ, 2016 SCC 31 at paras 77-79). Justice Karakatsanis, writing the majority opinion, found that the retrospective operation of a criminal law provision infringed s 11(d). Though the objective was deemed real and urgent, and the rational connection and minimum impairment requirements were met, the majority found the deleterious effects of the provision disproportionate to the (marginal and speculative) beneficial effects on society.

4. Standard of Proof. In Oakes, the Court stated that the justification of a limit on a Charter right or freedom must be proved on a balance of probabilities, the civil rather than criminal standard of proof. This reference to standard of proof suggests that the limitation issue is (principally) a factual one. Yet most contemporary defences of judicial review regard the court as a "forum of principle," a place where basic value issues are addressed. If the key issues to be resolved under s 1 are factual, should the courts not give significant space to the legislature's judgment? Or are the courts better equipped to make factual determinations?

In Oakes, Dickson CJ indicated that it might not always be necessary for the government to provide evidence—"that there may be cases where certain elements of the s 1 analysis are obvious or self-evident" (at para 68). Moreover, as discussed below, courts are often prepared to defer to the legislative reading of ambiguous social science evidence.

2. The Subsequent Development of the Oakes Test: Context and Deference

Two important and closely related developments in the Supreme Court of Canada's s 1 analysis have occurred since the introduction of the Oakes test. The first is the emergence of the contextual approach to the assessment of limits under s 1. This approach requires that courts assess the value or significance of the right and its restriction in their context rather than in the abstract. For example, when deciding whether a legislative restriction on hate speech is justified under s 1, courts should not simply balance the value of the restriction's general purpose—that is, preventing the spread of hatred—against the value of free expression. Instead, they should compare or balance the value of what the restriction achieves in practice—its likely impact on the spread of hatred—against its actual cost to freedom of expression values. Significantly, the Supreme Court of Canada has held that certain forms of expression such as hate promotion are less valuable—that is, less directly connected to the values underlying freedom of expression—than other forms of expression, and that this lesser value is a relevant contextual factor in the balancing of interests under s 1.

The second trend is the Court's willingness to defer in certain circumstances to the legislature's judgment about the need for, and effectiveness of, a particular limit on a Charter right.

Deference is often linked to context, for the Court has held that deference is more appropriate in some contexts than in others.

As you will see when you read the case extracts in this section, there is significant disagreement among the members of the Supreme Court of Canada about when, and to what degree, the courts should defer to legislative judgments. Not only is there disagreement about what contextual factors the courts should take into account when assessing limits under s 1, but also about whether these factors should affect the application of the rational connection and minimal impairment stages of the Oakes test, or only the final balancing stage.

The origins of the “contextual” approach to s 1 lie in Edmonton Journal v Alberta (AG), immediately below.

Edmonton Journal v Alberta (AG)

[\[1989\] 2 SCR 1326, 1989 CanLII 20](#)

[A newspaper challenged s 30(1) of the Alberta Judicature Act, RSA 1980, c.J-1, which limited the publication of information arising out of the court proceedings in matrimonial disputes, claiming that the provision was contrary to s 2(b) of the Charter, the guarantee of freedom of expression. The Alberta attorney general argued that the law protected individual privacy. Although all members of the Court found that s 30(1) violated freedom of expression, they were split on the justification issue. Four members of the Court ruled that the provision was not a reasonable limit under s 1. Justice Cory wrote one decision supporting this result, with which Dickson CJ and Lamer J concurred. Justice Wilson wrote a separate concurring judgment. Justice La Forest wrote a dissenting judgment, with which L’Heureux-Dubé and Sopinka JJ concurred, in which he found that the limit on freedom of expression could be justified as a reasonable limit under s 1. In her judgment, a portion of which has been extracted, Wilson J described a context-sensitive approach to s 1 that was later adopted by the entire court.]

WILSON J:

In my view, this case raises an important issue regarding the proper method of application of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms to individual cases and, because my reasons for finding s. 30(1) of the Alberta Judicature Act unconstitutional reflect one of two possible approaches to the Charter’s application, I thought it might be appropriate at the outset to say a word or two about the different approaches.

Of the two possible approaches to the Charter’s application one might be described as the abstract approach and the other the contextual approach. While the mechanics of application, i.e., the proper analytical steps to be taken, are the same under each, which one is adopted may tend to affect the result of the balancing process called for under s. 1.

Under each approach it is necessary to ascertain the underlying value which the right alleged to be violated was designed to protect. This is achieved through a purposive interpretation of Charter rights. It is also necessary under each approach to ascertain the legislative objective sought to be advanced by the impugned legislation. This is done by ascertaining the intention of the legislator in enacting the particular piece of legislation. When both the underlying value and the legislative objective have been identified, and it becomes clear that the legislative objective cannot be achieved without some infringement of the right, it must then be determined whether the impugned legislation constitutes a reasonable limit on the right which can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

It seems to me that under the abstract approach the underlying value sought to be protected by s. 2(b) of the Charter is determined at large as my colleague Cory J. has done. He finds freedom of expression to have been fundamental to the historical development of our political, social and educational institutions in Canada. He emphasizes the seriousness of restricting the free exchange of ideas and opinions in a democratic form of society and concludes that it is difficult to imagine a more important right in a democracy than freedom of expression.

I do not disagree with my colleague that freedom of expression plays that vital role in a political democracy. The problem is that the values in conflict in the context of this particular case are the right of litigants to the protection of their privacy in matrimonial disputes and the right of the public to an open court process. Both cannot be fully respected. One must yield to the exigencies of the other. I ask myself therefore whether a contextual approach in balancing the right to privacy against freedom of the press under s. 1 is not more appropriate than an approach which assesses the relative importance of the competing values in the abstract or at large.

It is of interest to note in this connection that La Forest J. completely agrees with Cory J. about the importance of freedom of expression in the abstract. He acknowledges that it is fundamental in a democratic society. He sees the issue in the case, however, as being whether an open court process should prevail over the litigant's right to privacy. In other words, while not disputing the values which are protected by s. 2(b) as identified by Cory J., he takes a contextual approach to the definition of the conflict in this particular case. Notwithstanding the enormous importance of freedom of expression in a political context, he finds that it must yield in the context of this case to the litigant's right to privacy. The impugned legislation is accordingly, in his view, a reasonable limit on freedom of the press. Cory J. reaches the converse conclusion and the concern raised is whether the difference in result may be conditioned by the methodology adopted in assessing the importance of the values in conflict.

One thing seems clear and that is that one should not balance one value at large and the conflicting value in its context. To do so could well be to pre-judge the issue by placing more weight on the value developed at large than is appropriate in the context of the case. Nor should one, it seems to me, balance a private interest, i.e., litigant X's interest in his privacy against a public one, the public's interest in an open court process. Both interests must be seen as public interests, in this case the public interest in protecting the privacy of litigants generally in matrimonial cases against the public interest in an open court process.

One virtue of the contextual approach, it seems to me, is that it recognizes that a particular right or freedom may have a different value depending on the context. It may be, for example, that freedom of expression has greater value in a political context than it does in the context of disclosure of details of a matrimonial dispute. The contextual approach attempts to bring into sharp relief the aspect of the right or freedom which is truly at stake in the case as well as the relevant aspects of any values in competition with it. It seems to be more sensitive to the reality of the dilemma posed by the particular facts and therefore more conducive to finding a fair and just compromise between the two competing values under s. 1.

It is my view that a right or freedom may have different meanings in different contexts. Security of the person, for example, might mean one thing when addressed to the issue of overcrowding in prisons and something quite different when addressed to the issue of noxious fumes from industrial smokestacks. It seems entirely probable that the value to be attached to it in different contexts for the purpose of the balancing under s. 1 might also be different. It is for this reason that I believe that the importance of the right or freedom must be assessed in context rather than in the abstract and that its purpose must be ascertained in context. This having been done, the right or freedom must then, in accordance with the dictates of this court, be given a generous interpretation aimed at fulfilling that purpose and securing for the individual the full benefit of the guarantee.

The Dagenais clarification of the Oakes test (discussed above in note 3 following Oakes) may be seen as a response to Wilson J's call, in Edmonton Journal, for a more contextual approach to limits under s 1. Under the final step of the Oakes test, courts are now required to compare the actual impact of the law on the affected right—for example, on the freedom of expression interests—with the actual contribution the law makes to its pressing and substantial purpose. However, the Court, or several of its members, seems also to have understood the call for a more contextual approach as requiring greater flexibility in the application of each of the steps of the Oakes test and greater deference to legislative judgment (in certain circumstances) when applying the test. The result has been a more deferential, reasonableness-based approach to the various strands in the s 1 analysis in certain contexts.

Irwin Toy v Quebec (AG), immediately below, may represent the high-water mark of judicial deference.

Irwin Toy Ltd v Quebec (AG)

[1989] 1 SCR 927, 1989 CanLII 87

[This case, which involved restrictions on advertising directed at children, is excerpted in Chapter 20. Reproduced below is the portion of the judgment of Dickson CJ and Lamer and Wilson JJ in which they set out some of the circumstances in which deference to legislative judgment is appropriate.]

DICKSON CJ and LAMER and WILSON JJ:

... Where the legislature mediates between the competing claims of different groups in the community, it will inevitably be called upon to draw a line marking where one set of claims legitimately begins and the other fades away without access to complete knowledge as to its precise location. If the legislature has made a reasonable assessment as to where the line is most properly drawn, especially if that assessment involves weighing conflicting scientific evidence and allocating scarce resources on this basis, it is not for the court to second guess. That would only be to substitute one estimate for another. In dealing with inherently heterogeneous groups defined in terms of age or a characteristic analogous to age, evidence showing that a clear majority of the group requires the protection which the government has identified can help to establish that the group was defined reasonably. . . .

Thus, in matching means to ends and asking whether rights or freedoms are impaired as little as possible, a legislature mediating between the claims of competing groups will be forced to strike a balance without the benefit of absolute certainty concerning how that balance is best struck. Vulnerable groups will claim the need for protection by the government whereas other groups and individuals will assert that the government should not intrude. In [R v Edwards Books and Art Ltd, [1986] 2 SCR 713, 1986 CanLII 12], Dickson C.J. expressed an important concern about the situation of vulnerable groups (at p. 779):

In interpreting and applying the Charter I believe that the courts must be cautious to ensure that it does not simply become an instrument of better situated individuals to roll back legislation which has as its object the improvement of the condition of less advantaged persons.

When striking a balance between the claims of competing groups, the choice of means, like the choice of ends, frequently will require an assessment of conflicting scientific evidence and differing justified demands on scarce resources. Democratic institutions are meant to let us all share in the responsibility for these difficult choices. Thus, as courts review the results of the legislature's deliberations, particularly with respect to the protection of vulnerable groups, they must be mindful of the legislature's representative function. For example, when "regulating industry or business it is open to the legislature to restrict its legislative reforms to sectors in which there appear to be particularly urgent concerns or to constituencies that seem especially needy" (Edwards Books and Art Ltd., supra, at p. 772).

In other cases, however, rather than mediating between different groups, the government is best characterized as the singular antagonist of the individual whose right has been infringed. For example, in justifying an infringement of legal rights enshrined in ss. 7 to 14 of the Charter, the state, on behalf of the whole community, typically will assert its responsibility for prosecuting crime whereas the individual will assert the paramountcy of principles of fundamental justice. There might not be any further competing claims among different groups. In such circumstances, and indeed whenever the government's purpose relates to maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judicial system, the courts can assess with some certainty whether the "least drastic means" for achieving the purpose have been chosen, especially given their accumulated experience in dealing with such questions The same degree of certainty may not be achievable in cases involving the reconciliation of claims of competing individuals or groups or the distribution of scarce government resources.

In the instant case, the Court is called upon to assess competing social science evidence respecting the appropriate means for addressing the problem of children's advertising. The question is whether the government had a reasonable basis, on the evidence tendered, for concluding that the ban on all advertising directed at children impaired freedom of expression as little as possible given the government's pressing and substantial objective.

In Irwin Toy, the Court held that greater deference to legislative choice is appropriate in a variety of circumstances: where the government has sought to balance competing rights, to protect a socially vulnerable group, to balance the interests of various social groups competing for scarce resources, or to address conflicting social science evidence as to the cause of a social problem. Many themes emerge in the Court's discussion of the need for deference under s 1. Social justice concerns that the Charter not be used as a tool to roll back legislative measures protecting socially vulnerable groups combine with more general institutional concerns about the inappropriateness of courts second-guessing legislative decisions on social policy on grounds of both legitimacy and competence.

Irwin Toy introduced a distinction between those cases in which the government is seeking to mediate the interests of competing groups (where a more deferential application of s 1 is appropriate) and those cases in which the government is the singular antagonist of the individual whose right has been infringed (where a more stringent application of s 1 is warranted). How workable is this distinction?

In a variety of subsequent judgments, different members of the courts have argued that the Oakes test should be applied in a flexible manner. You will read many of these decisions in subsequent chapters. As Richard Moon explains in "Justified Limits on Free Expression: The Collapse of the General Approach to Limits on Charter Rights" (2002) 40:3/4 Osgoode Hall

LJ 337, there are at least three different ways in which a court can “defer” to legislative judgment or lower the standard of justification. The courts, however, do not always distinguish these different forms of deference. The first involves judicial deference to relevant findings of fact by the legislature (or a lowering by the court of the standard of proof that the legislature must meet in establishing the factual basis for its justification argument). For example, in Irwin Toy, there was little dispute that protecting children from manipulation was an objective important enough to justify restricting free expression. The more difficult issue was whether the government had proved that the restriction on advertising advanced this important end effectively, and without unnecessarily impairing freedom of expression. In seeking to justify the restriction on advertising directed at children up to the age of 13, the legislature relied on social science evidence that children were unable to assess advertisements critically. However, this evidence was not clear-cut, particularly on the question of whether older children were subject to the manipulative impact of advertisements. The Court decided to defer to the government’s reading of the social science evidence, perhaps because it recognized that it had limited competence in such matters, or no greater competence than the legislature.

For a different outcome, see R v KJR, in which the majority closely scrutinized the social science evidence tendered by the government in its analysis of the final stage of the Oakes test. Justice Brown critiqued this approach in dissent, noting (at para 144) that given the complex social context in which Parliament often develops policy—of which the prevention of recidivism in cases of sexual offences against children is clearly an instance—it will sometimes be difficult, if not impossible, for the state to provide reliable and direct evidence of the benefit its measures will achieve.

The second form of deference by the courts is to the legislature’s accommodation of competing values or interests. If the legislature has made an apparently reasonable judgment that concerns about the manipulation of children (or some other interest) justify a limited restriction on expression, then the courts may be reluctant to substitute their own judgment for that of the legislature. The reason for this form of deference may be the courts’ lingering doubts about the legitimacy of second-guessing the value judgments of democratic institutions. A court’s reluctance may be greater when it recognizes that the legislature is making a reasonable attempt to protect the interests of a vulnerable group or to accommodate competing “private” interests. In practice, these first two forms of deference are difficult to separate.

The third form of deference is really a lowering of the standard of justification under s 1. The courts recognize that a broad and inclusive definition of the scope of a right such as freedom of expression means that there may be significant variation in the value of different instances of the protected activity. The courts have held that a less substantial or significant competing interest may support the restriction of a less valuable form of expression, such as commercial advertising or hate promotion. In Thomson Newspapers Co v Canada (AG), [1998] 1 SCR 877, 1998 CanLII 829 (discussed in Chapter 20), Bastarache J acknowledged that different forms of expression protected under s 2(b) of the Charter may have greater or lesser value under s 1. In theory, at least, a court could lower the standard of justification (based on the lesser weight of the protected activity) without also deferring to the legislature’s judgment that this standard has been satisfied (the standard of proof). In practice, however, this distinction may be impossible to draw. A judicial decision that the legislature may restrict a right or freedom on less than substantial or compelling grounds looks a lot like judicial deference to legislative judgment about the proper balance between competing interests, particularly if we are skeptical about the commensurability of competing values and the possibility of striking the perfect or correct balance between them.

In R v Lucas, [1998] 1 SCR 439, 1998 CanLII 815, a majority of the Court upheld the defamatory libel offence in the Criminal Code as a justified restriction on freedom of expression. McLachlin J argued that the lesser value of a particular form of expression should only play a role in the final stage of the proportionality analysis and should not affect the court's assessment of rational connection and minimal impairment. Her disagreement with judges such as Cory and La Forest JJ, who assumed that the lesser value of the expression should affect the application of each of the proportionality tests in Oakes, may rest on a different understanding of what these tests involve. If the rational connection and minimal impairment tests involve some degree of balancing of competing interests (as was suggested above) then they will also be affected by the judgment that a certain form of expression has greater or lesser value. If, on the other hand, as McLachlin J seems to believe, these tests are concerned exclusively with the effectiveness of the law in advancing its pressing and substantial purpose and are to be applied without any kind of balancing of competing interests, then the relative value of the restricted expression will be relevant only later at the third and final step of the Oakes proportionality analysis.

There may be another reason why the Oakes test remains vague and flexible. In Oakes, the Court sought to establish a generic approach to the assessment of limits under s 1 of the Charter. Such an approach to limits rests on the idea that the rights protected in the Charter have the same basic structure—each right represents a zone of privacy or independence that should not be interfered with by the state except in very special circumstances. Yet if the rights and freedoms in the Charter are more diverse in character, representing different aspects of human flourishing or human dignity, and do not all fit within a single liberty rights model, then the form or character of limits on these rights may differ in significant ways. The limits on different rights may not have a common structure. A limit on freedom of religion may be very different from a limit on the right to equality. While it may be possible to develop a reasonably clear or coherent set of standards or tests for the limitation of particular rights, the effort to develop standards applicable to all Charter rights may lead inevitably to ambiguity and inconsistency. It is worth noting that this understanding of limits provides a good reason for keeping this chapter of the book short. There may be little value in examining the limitations issue in a general and preliminary way outside the context of particular Charter rights.

Consider the following account of the role of deference in the application of the Oakes test.

Sujit Choudhry, "So What Is the Real Legacy of Oakes? Two Decades of Proportionality Analysis Under the Canadian Charter's Section 1"

(2006) 35:2d SCLR 501 at 503-4, 522-25, 527-30 (footnotes omitted)

There is a dominant narrative on what the true legacy of Oakes and the retreat from Oakes are. The argument is that Oakes set out a uniform approach for assessing justifiable limitations on Charter rights irrespective of differences in context, but that in the decade following Oakes, the Court searched for criteria of deference, to reliably and predictably categorize cases where deference was warranted and those where it was not. These categories were not applied consistently by the Court, and, indeed, produced disagreement within the Court over how they should be applied in specific cases. Underlying both trends were concerns regarding the cogency of the distinctions employed by the Court to delineate the boundaries of these categories. The broader lesson of Oakes is the need to tailor judicial review to the unique context of each case.

Although the dominant narrative captures much of Oakes' legacy, it misses much of what is at stake in many recent section 1 cases, and by implication, what the true legacy of Oakes and the retreat from Oakes are. In my view, Oakes created an enormous institutional dilemma for the Court, by setting up a conflict between the demand for definitive proof to support each stage of the section 1 analysis, and the reality of policy making under conditions of factual uncertainty. And so the legacy of Oakes is that the central question of section 1 is how the Court should allocate the risk of factual uncertainty when governments legislate under conditions of imperfect information. ... But not only has the Court failed to recognize this as a central question; it has failed to adopt a consistent approach in how it answers it. ...

[W]ith 20 years of hindsight, it is questionable whether the Court was wise to strike out as boldly as it did in Oakes. For in addition to setting up a stringent test of justification, Oakes also made empirics central to every stage of the Oakes test. As the Court said in a largely ignored passage:

Where evidence is required in order to prove the constituent elements of a s. 1 inquiry, and this will generally be the case, it should be cogent and persuasive and make clear to the Court the consequences of imposing or not imposing the limit.

This passage appears to have been largely overlooked in the academic literature. Moreover, it has been quoted infrequently by the Court—only in four Charter cases, whereas Oakes has been cited by the Court in 152 subsequent judgments. But it is becoming increasingly central to the Court’s jurisprudence. The justice most responsible for bringing the Court’s attention to this issue has been McLachlin CJ. As she explained in [RJR-MacDonald Inc v Canada (AG, in which the Court struck down a general ban on tobacco advertising (discussed in Chapter 20)], the Oakes test sets up a process of “reasoned demonstration,” as opposed to simply accepting the say-so of governments. By this, she meant that “[t]he s. 1 inquiry is by its very nature a fact-specific inquiry.” ... [R]ights can only be justifiably limited in response to concrete, precise and real problems or harms whose existence can be demonstrated to the satisfaction of a court through the normal trial process.

Needless to say, in Oakes itself, no such factual record was before the Court, because the parties had no notice that they were required to produce one. To understand why Oakes may have been unwise, imagine if the Crown had known the requirements of the Oakes test in advance and attempted to adduce evidence sufficient to justify the challenged provision. Would it have been possible to provide evidence meeting the civil standard of proof mandated by Oakes with respect to each constituent element of the test? In particular, would it have been possible to definitely prove that the means chosen minimally impaired the right to be presumed innocent—i.e., that other less intrusive means would not have been equally effective? Indeed, what kind of proof would have sufficed? The conundrum raised by this hypothetical is in fact a more general problem that has emerged as a central feature of Charter adjudication. Public policy is often based on approximations and extrapolations from the available evidence, inferences from comparative data, and, on occasion, even educated guesses. Absent a large-scale policy experiment, this is all the evidence that is likely to be available. Justice La Forest offered an observation in [McKinney v University of Guelph, [\[1990\] 3 SCR 229, 1990 CanLII 60](#)], which rings true: “[d]ecisions on such matters must inevitably be the product of a mix of conjecture, fragmentary knowledge, general experience and knowledge of the needs, aspirations and resources of society.”

In other words, Oakes’ approach to interpreting section 1 has unwittingly created a major institutional dilemma for the Court, given the practical reality that public policy is often made on the basis of incomplete knowledge. In many important cases, disputes over justifiable limits on Charter rights have been factual disputes about the nature of social problems, and the effectiveness of government policy instruments in combating them. Although it has never been framed in this way, the basic question in these cases is the same: who should bear the risk of empirical uncertainty with respect to government activity that infringes Charter rights? This has become one of the unarticulated yet central questions in Charter litigation. It has given rise to an extensive jurisprudence, and is one of the principal legacies of Oakes.

One answer would be that in a constitutional, rights-based regime, in which rights are the rule and of presumptive importance, limitations on rights are the exception, governments bear the onus of justification in upholding rights-infringing measures, and the state bears the risk of empirical uncertainty. But to set such a high bar for governments may be to ask too much of them. It may simply be impossible to prove with scientific certainty that the means chosen to combat the problem actually will do so, and that other, less intrusive means to tackle the problem are equally effective. As La Forest J wrote in his dissenting judgment in RJR-MacDonald to require governments to bear the risk of empirical uncertainty "could have the effect of virtually paralyzing the operation of government ... it will be impossible to govern ... it would not be possible to make difficult but sometimes necessary legislative choices. There would be conferred on the courts a supervisory role over a state itself essentially inactive." And so another answer would be for the courts to not require governments to adduce much in the way of a factual record at all. But this would seem to read out the requirement that reasonable limits be "demonstrably justified," set out in the text of section 1 itself, and to ask courts to accept the say-so of governments on the existence of public policy problems, and the relative efficacy of policy instruments in dealing with them.

The Court has struck a compromise between these two extremes. In cases in which there is conflicting or inconclusive social science evidence, the question is whether the government has a "reasonable basis" for concluding that an actual problem exists, that the means chosen would address it, and that the means chosen infringes the right as little as possible. This standard is understood as expecting something less of governments than definitive, scientific proof. But an absolute lack of evidence is unacceptable; there must be some factual basis for the public policy. [Emphasis in original.]

In Saskatchewan (Human Rights Commission) v Whatcott, 2013 SCC 11, a case dealing with the constitutional validity of the statutory provision against hate speech in the Saskatchewan Human Rights Code, SS 1979, c S-24.1, a unanimous Court replied to critics and defended its approach based on a "reasonable apprehension of harm" in the following terms:

[130] Critics argue that the deference to the legislature shown by this Court in Keegstra, Taylor, Butler and Sharpe is an abdication of its duty to require that limitations on Charter rights be "demonstrably justified" under the s. 1 analysis: Sumner, at pp. 83 and 202-3. The Court's "deferential approach under section 1 to state restrictions on expression," has been said to erode the constitutional protection for freedom of expression: Moon (2000), at p. 37. The basic nature of the criticism is that it is an unacceptable impairment of freedom of expression to allow its restriction to be justified by the mere likelihood or risk of harm, rather than a clear causal link between hate speech and harmful or discriminatory acts against the vulnerable group.

[131] Such an approach, however, ignores the particularly insidious nature of hate speech. The end goal of hate speech is to shift the environment from one where harm against vulnerable groups is not tolerated to one where hate speech has created a place where this is either accepted or a blind eye is turned.

[132] This Court has addressed such criticism in a number of situations involving the applicability of s. 1 and has adopted a "reasonable apprehension of harm" approach. This approach recognizes that a precise causal link for certain societal harms ought not to be required. A court is entitled to use common sense and experience in recognizing that certain activities, hate speech among them, inflict societal harms.

C. JUDICIAL REVIEW AND THE CHARTER: THE DORÉ FRAMEWORK

As the following case makes clear, in the context of determining the constitutionality of administrative decisions, s 1 of the Charter is not the only way of relying on proportionality principles in constitutional adjudication.

Doré v Barreau du Québec

ABELLA J (McLachlin CJ and Binnie, LeBel, Fish, Rothstein, and Cromwell JJ concurring):

[1] The focus of this appeal is on the decision of a disciplinary body to reprimand a lawyer for the content of a letter he wrote to a judge after a court proceeding.

[2] The lawyer does not challenge the constitutionality of the provision in the Code of ethics under which he was reprimanded. Nor, before us, does he challenge the length of the suspension he received. What he does challenge, is the constitutionality of the decision itself, claiming that it violates his freedom of expression under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

[3] This raises squarely the issue of how to protect Charter guarantees and the values they reflect in the context of adjudicated administrative decisions. Normally, if a discretionary administrative decision is made by an adjudicator within his or her mandate, that decision is judicially reviewed for its reasonableness. The question is whether the presence of a Charter issue calls for the replacement of this administrative law framework with the Oakes test, the test traditionally used to determine whether the state has justified a law's violation of the Charter as a "reasonable limit" under s. 1.

[4] It seems to me to be possible to reconcile the two regimes in a way that protects the integrity of each. The way to do that is to recognize that an adjudicated administrative decision is not like a law which can, theoretically, be objectively justified by the state, making the traditional s. 1 analysis an awkward fit. On whom does the onus lie, for example, to formulate and assert the pressing and substantial objective of an adjudicated decision, let alone justify it as rationally connected to, minimally impairing of, and proportional to that objective? On the other hand, the protection of Charter guarantees is a fundamental and pervasive obligation, no matter which adjudicative forum is applying it. How then do we ensure this rigorous Charter protection while at the same time recognizing that the assessment must necessarily be adjusted to fit the contours of what is being assessed and by whom?

[5] We do it by recognizing that while a formulaic application of the Oakes test may not be workable in the context of an adjudicated decision, distilling its essence works the same justificatory muscles: balance and proportionality. I see nothing in the administrative law approach which is inherently inconsistent with the strong Charter protection—meaning its guarantees and values—we expect from an Oakes analysis. The notion of deference in administrative law should no more be a barrier to effective Charter protection than the margin of appreciation is when we apply a full s. 1 analysis.

[6] In assessing whether a law violates the Charter, we are balancing the government's pressing and substantial objectives against the extent to which they interfere with the Charter right at issue. If the law interferes with the right no more than is reasonably necessary to achieve the objectives, it will be found to be proportionate, and, therefore, a reasonable limit under s. 1. In assessing whether an adjudicated decision violates the Charter, however, we are engaged in balancing somewhat different but related considerations, namely, has the decision-maker disproportionately, and therefore unreasonably, limited a Charter right. In both cases, we are looking for whether there is an appropriate balance between rights and objectives, and the purpose of both exercises is to ensure that the rights at issue are not unreasonably limited.

[7] As this Court has noted, ... the nature of the reasonableness analysis is always contingent on its context. In the Charter context, the reasonableness analysis is one that centres on proportionality, that is, on ensuring that the decision interferes with the relevant Charter guarantee no more than is necessary given the statutory objectives. If the decision is disproportionately impairing of the guarantee, it is unreasonable. If, on the other hand, it reflects a proper balance of the mandate with Charter protection, it is a reasonable one.

[35] ... Under this approach, it is unnecessary to retreat to a s. 1 Oakes analysis in order to protect Charter values. Rather, administrative decisions are always required to consider fundamental values. ... [A]dministrative bodies are empowered, and indeed required, to consider Charter values within their scope of expertise. Integrating Charter values into the administrative approach, and recognizing the expertise of these decision-makers, opens "an institutional dialogue about the appropriate use and control of discretion, rather than the older command-and-control relationship"

[36] As explained by Chief Justice McLachlin in Alberta v. Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony, 2009 SCC 37, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 567, the approach used when reviewing the constitutionality of a law should be distinguished from the approach used for reviewing an administrative decision that is said to violate the rights of a particular individual When Charter values are applied to an individual administrative decision, they are being applied in relation to a particular set of facts. Dunsmuir tells us this should attract deference (para. 53 ...) When a particular "law" is being assessed for Charter compliance, on the other hand, we are dealing with principles of general application.

[37] The more flexible administrative approach to balancing Charter values is also more consistent with the nature of discretionary decision-making. Some of the aspects of the Oakes test are, in any event, poorly suited to the review of discretionary decisions, whether of judges or administrative decision-makers. For instance, the requirement under s. 1 that a limit be "prescribed by law" has been held by this Court to apply to norms where "their adoption is authorized by statute, they are binding rules of general application, and they are sufficiently accessible and precise to those to whom they apply" (Greater Vancouver Transportation Authority v. Canadian Federation of Students—British Columbia Component, 2009 SCC 31, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 295, at para. 53).

[38] Moreover, when exercising discretion under a provision or statutory scheme whose constitutionality is not impugned, it is conceptually difficult to see what the "pressing and substantial" objective of a decision is, or who would have the burden of defining and defending it.

[39] This Court has already recognized the difficulty of applying the Oakes framework beyond the context of reviewing a law or other rule of general application. This has been the case in applying Charter values to the common law, "where there is no specific enactment that can be examined in terms of objective, rational connection, least drastic means and proportionate effect" (Peter W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. Supp.), vol. 2, at section 38.15). In R. v. Daviault, [1994] ... 3 S.C.R. 63, for example, in assessing the common law rule relating to establishing intent under extreme intoxication, the Court held that no Oakes analysis was required when reviewing a common law rule for compliance with Charter values [42] Though each of these cases engaged Charter values, the Court did not see the Oakes test as the vehicle for balancing whether those values were taken into sufficient account. The same is true, it seems to me, in the administrative law context, where decision-makers are called upon to exercise their statutory discretion in accordance with Charter protections.

[43] What is the impact of this approach on the standard of review that applies when assessing the compliance of an administrative decision with Charter values? There is no doubt that when a tribunal is determining the constitutionality of a law, the standard of review is correctness (Dunsmuir, at para. 58). It is not at all clear to me, however, based on this Court's jurisprudence, that correctness should be used to determine whether an administrative decision-maker has taken sufficient account of Charter values in making a discretionary decision.

[45] It seems to me that applying the Dunsmuir principles results in reasonableness remaining the applicable review standard for disciplinary panels. The issue then is whether this standard should be different when what is assessed is the disciplinary body's application of Charter protections in the exercise of its discretion. In my view, the fact that Charter interests are implicated does not argue for a different standard.

[55] How then does an administrative decision-maker apply Charter values in the exercise of statutory discretion? He or she balances the Charter values with the statutory objectives. In effecting this balancing, the decision-maker should first consider the statutory objectives. ...

[56] Then the decision-maker should ask how the Charter value at issue will best be protected in view of the statutory objectives. This is at the core of the proportionality exercise, and requires the decision-maker to balance the severity of the interference of the Charter protection with the statutory objectives. This is where the role of judicial review for reasonableness aligns with the one applied in the Oakes context. As this Court recognized in RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General) ... [1995] 3 S.C.R. 199, at para. 160, "courts must accord some leeway to the legislator" in the Charter balancing exercise, and the proportionality test will be satisfied if the measure "falls within a range of reasonable alternatives." The same is true in the context of a review of an administrative decision for reasonableness, where decision-makers are entitled to a measure of deference so long as the decision, in the words of Dunsmuir, "falls within a range of possible, acceptable outcomes" (para. 47).

[57] On judicial review, the question becomes whether, in assessing the impact of the relevant Charter protection and given the nature of the decision and the statutory and factual contexts, the decision reflects a proportionate balancing of the Charter protections at play. As LeBel J. noted in [Multani v Commission scolaire Marguerite-Bourgeoys, 2006 SCC 6], when a court is faced with reviewing an administrative decision that implicates Charter rights, "[t]he issue becomes one of proportionality" (para. 155), and calls for integrating the spirit of s. 1 into judicial review. Though this judicial review is conducted within the administrative framework, there is nonetheless conceptual harmony between a reasonableness review and the Oakes framework, since both contemplate giving a "margin of appreciation," or deference, to administrative and legislative bodies in balancing Charter values against broader objectives.

[58] If, in exercising its statutory discretion, the decision-maker has properly balanced the relevant Charter value with the statutory objectives, the decision will be found to be reasonable.

[In applying these principles to the case at bar, Abella J dismissed Doré's appeal with costs, finding that the disciplinary council's decision to reprimand him was reasonable.] [Emphasis in original.]

NOTES

1. In Loyola High School v Quebec (AG), 2015 SCC 12 (excerpted in Chapter 19), the first Charter values case to be heard by the Supreme Court post-Doré, the Court reviewed the decision to deny a Jesuit school in Quebec an exemption from the province's Ethics and Religious Culture curriculum. Exemptions are available for schools providing "equivalent" programs. Writing for a majority, Abella J offered a new, if substantially similar, framing of the Charter values analysis:

[4] Under Doré, where a discretionary administrative decision engages the protections enumerated in the Charter—both the Charter's guarantees and the foundational values they reflect—the discretionary decision-maker is required to proportionately balance the Charter protections to ensure that they are limited no more than is necessary given the applicable statutory objectives that she or he is obliged to pursue.

Later in the decision (at para 35), the majority reiterated that "Doré requires administrative decision-makers to proportionately balance the Charter protections—values and rights—at stake in their decisions with the relevant statutory mandate."

Two aspects of these statements are worth noting. The first is the shift in terminology between Doré and Loyola. The second is the explicit incorporation of a minimal impairment requirement into the Charter values analysis. Doré and Loyola are both discussed further in Chapter 18.

2. In Law Society of British Columbia v Trinity Western University, 2018 SCC 32, the disagreement among members of the Court on how administrative decisions that engage Charter rights should be judicially reviewed further intensified, resulting in four separate opinions, each offering a slightly different approach to the Charter values analysis, and with one registering "fundamental concerns" (at para 266) about the viability of the approach set out in Doré. Justice Abella wrote the reasons for the majority. The majority adopted a clear two-stage analysis. It explicitly described the Law Society's decision as imposing a "limitation on the Charter right" (at para 299) of freedom of religion. It framed the requirement of "proportionate balancing" contextually, and incorporated elements of minimal impairment and narrow proportionality.

After TWU, how similar or different are the Oakes test and the Charter values analysis?

3. In Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v Vavilov, 2019 SCC 65, the Supreme Court explicitly declined to reconsider Doré as part of its recalibration of the standard of review analysis in administrative law.

IV. THE OVERRIDE

Section 33 of the Charter, the "override," or "notwithstanding" clause, has always been a controversial part of the Charter. The Quebec commercial sign law case, Ford v Quebec (AG), [1988] 2 SCR 712, 1988 CanLII 19 (excerpted below), is the only case in which the Supreme Court of Canada has been asked to review the exercise of the override power.

The history of the Ford case begins with the exclusion of the Parti Québécois government of Quebec from the final discussions and agreement that led to the amendment and patriation of the Constitution, discussed in Chapter 16. In November 1981, the other ten governments agreed to a package of constitutional amendments that included the Charter.

As a way of protesting a significant constitutional amendment to which it had not agreed and which did not, in its view, take adequate account of its interests, the government of Quebec made use of s 33 to shield its laws, as much as possible, from the Charter's application. To do so, the Quebec government used what came to be called a "standard override clause," which made reference to all the rights subject to the override:

This Act shall operate notwithstanding the provisions of sections 2 and 7 to 15 of the Constitution Act, 1982 (Schedule B of the Canada Act, chapter 11 in the 1982 volume of the Act of Parliament of the United Kingdom).

By an omnibus amendment enactment, the National Assembly repealed and re-enacted, with the addition of this standard clause, all pre-Charter provincial legislation. This technique insulated all existing provincial legislation from those Charter rights and freedoms to which the override applies. Then, statute by statute, it inserted the standard clause into all new enactments, including amending instruments.

The omnibus enactment came into force on June 23, 1982, three months after the Charter came into effect. However, by its terms, the omnibus amendment was to be applied retroactively to April 17, 1982, the day the Charter came into force. While the Court concluded that it was acceptable to derogate from the Canadian Charter using an omnibus amendment, it held that the retroactive effect of s 33 was invalid. In the end, however, the provisions of the Quebec Charter of the French Language, CQLR c C-11 (as amended) that were challenged on freedom of expression grounds were invalidated partly because the Quebec legislature had omitted to derogate from the Quebec Charter of Rights and Freedoms, CQLR c C-12, ss 3 and 52, which it had adopted several years before the Canadian Charter came into force.

Ford v Quebec (AG)

[This case involved a challenge to provisions of the Quebec Charter of the French Language that required French only in public signs, posters, and commercial advertising. The appellants challenged these provisions successfully under both the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms. The extract here focuses on the question of whether Quebec's omnibus use of the override was valid. Another issue in the case, whether the French-only rule infringed freedom of expression, appears in Chapter 24, Language Rights.]

THE COURT (Dickson CJ and Beetz, Estey, McIntyre, Lamer, Wilson, and Le Dain JJ): ...

[The National Assembly of Quebec passed the following law in June 1982:]

Sections 1, 2, 5, 6 and 7 of An Act respecting the Constitution Act, 1982, SQ 1982, c. 21, which was assented to on June 23, 1982, provide:

1. Each of the Acts adopted before 17 April 1982 is replaced by the text of each of them as they existed at that date, after being amended by the addition, at the end and as a separate section, of the following:

This Act shall operate notwithstanding the provisions of sections 2 and 7 to 15 of the Constitution Act, 1982 (Schedule B of the Canada Act, chapter 11 in the 1982 volume of the Acts of the Parliament of the United Kingdom).

The text so amended of each of these Acts constitutes a separate Act.

No such Act is to be construed as new law except for the purposes of section 33 of the Constitution Act, 1982; for all other purposes, it has force of law as if it were a consolidation of the Act it replaces.

Every provision of such an Act shall have effect from the date the provision it replaces took effect or is to take effect.

Such an Act must be cited in the same manner as the Act it replaces.

2. Each of the Acts adopted between 17 April 1982 and 23 June 1982 is replaced by the text of each of them as they existed on 23 June 1982, after being amended by the addition, provision set out in the first paragraph of section 1.

The second, third, fourth and fifth paragraphs of section 1 apply, mutatis mutandis, to the Acts referred to in the first paragraph.

5. This Act shall operate notwithstanding the provision of sections 2 and 7 to 15 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

6. The sanction of this Act is valid for each of the Acts enacted under section 1 or 2.

7. This Act comes into force on the day of its sanction.

However, section 1 and the first paragraph of section 3 have effect from 17 April 1982; section 2 and the second paragraph of section 3 have effect from the date from which each of the Acts replaced under section 2 came into force.

The essential contention ... against the validity of the standard override provision, ... was that the provision did not sufficiently specify the guaranteed rights or freedoms which the legislation intended to override. In support of this contention reliance was placed not only on the wording of s. 33(1) and 33(2) of the Charter but on general considerations concerning the effectiveness of the democratic process. ...

It was contended that the words "a provision included in section 2 or sections 7 to 15 of this Charter" in s. 33(1) and the words "but for the provision of this Charter referred to in the declaration" in s. 33(2) indicate that in order to be valid, a declaration pursuant to s. 33 must specify the particular provision within a section of the Charter which Parliament or the legislature of a province intends to override. That is, the specific guaranteed right or freedom to be overridden must be referred to in the words of the Charter and not merely by the number of the section or paragraph in which it appears. The rationale underlying this contention is that the nature of the guaranteed right or freedom must be sufficiently drawn to the attention of the members of the legislature and of the public so that the relative seriousness of what is proposed may be perceived and reacted to through the democratic process. As the Attorney General for Ontario, who argued against the constitutionality of the standard override provision, put it, there must be a "political cost" for overriding a guaranteed right or freedom.

In the course of argument different views were expressed as to the constitutional perspective from which the meaning and application of s. 33 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms should be approached: the one suggesting that it reflects the continuing importance of legislative supremacy, the other suggesting the seriousness of a legislative decision to override guaranteed rights and freedoms and the importance that such a decision be taken only as a result of a fully informed democratic process. These two perspectives are not, however, particularly relevant or helpful in construing the requirements of s. 33. Section 33 lays down requirements of form only, and there is no warrant for importing into it grounds for substantive review of the legislative policy in exercising the override authority in a particular case. The requirement of an apparent link or relationship between the overriding Act and the guaranteed rights or freedoms to be overridden seems to be a substantive ground of review. It appears to require that the legislature identify the provisions of the Act in question which might otherwise infringe specified guaranteed rights or freedoms. That would seem to require a prima facie justification of the decision to exercise the override authority rather than merely a certain formal expression of it. There is, however, no warrant in the terms of s. 33 for such a requirement. A legislature may not be in a position to judge with any degree of certainty what provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms might be successfully invoked against various aspects of the Act in question. For this reason it must be permitted in a particular case to override ... all of the provisions which it is permitted to override by the terms of s. 33. The standard override provision in issue in this appeal is, therefore, a valid exercise of the authority conferred by s. 33 in so far as it purports to override all of the provisions in s. 2 and ss. 7 to 15 of the Charter. The essential requirement of form laid down by s. 33 is that the override declaration must be an express declaration that an Act or a provision of an Act shall operate notwithstanding a provision included in s. 2 or ss. 7 to 15 of the Charter. With great respect for the contrary view, this Court is of the opinion that a s. 33 declaration is sufficiently express if it refers to the number of the section, subsection or paragraph of the Charter which contains the provision or provisions to be overridden. Of course, if it is intended to override only a part of the provision or provisions contained in a section, subsection or paragraph then there would have to be a sufficient reference in words to the part to be overridden. In so far as requirements of the democratic process are relevant, this is the form of reference used in legislative drafting with respect to legislative provisions to be amended or repealed. There is no reason why more should be required under s. 33. A reference to the number of the section, subsection or paragraph containing the provisions or provisions to be overridden is a sufficient indication to those concerned of the relative seriousness of what is proposed. It cannot have been intended by the word "expressly" that a legislature should be required to encumber a s. 33 declaration by stating the provision or provisions to be overridden in the words of the Charter, which, in the case of the standard override provision in issue in the appeal, would be a very long recital indeed.

... [I]t remains to be considered whether the Court should exercise its discretion to rule on the other aspects of the validity of the standard override provision: ... the "omnibus" character of the enactment; and the retrospective effect given to the override provision. ... The Court has concluded that although both of these provisions have ceased to have effect it is better that all questions concerning their validity should be settled in these appeals because of their possible continuing importance in other cases. Given the provision in the form indicated above is a valid exercise of the authority conferred by s. 33 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, this Court is of the opinion that the validity of its enactment is not affected by the fact that it was introduced into all Quebec statutes enacted prior to a certain date by a single enactment. That was an effective exercise of legislative authority that did not prevent the override declaration so enacted in each statute from being an express declaration within the meaning of s. 33 of the Canadian Charter. Counsel referred to this form of enactment as reflecting an impermissibly "routine" exercise of the override authority or even a "perversion" of it. It was even suggested that it amounted to an attempted amendment of the Charter. These are once again essentially submissions concerning permissible legislative policy in the exercise of the override authority rather than what constitutes a sufficiently express declaration of override. As has been stated, there is no warrant in s. 33 for such considerations as a basis of judicial review of a particular exercise of the authority conferred by s. 33. The Court is of a different view, however, concerning the retrospective effect given to the standard override provision. ... In this regard, the wording of s. 33(1) of the Canadian Charter is not without ambiguity. For purposes of clarity, we set out the relevant provision in both languages:

33.(1) Parliament or the legislature of a province may expressly declare in an Act of Parliament or of the legislature, as the case may be, that the Act or a provision thereof shall operate notwithstanding a provision included in section 2 or sections 7 to 15 of this Charter.

33.(1) Le Parlement ou la législature d'une province peut adopter une loi ou il est expressément déclaré que celle-ci ou une de ses dispositions a effet indépendamment d'une disposition donnée de l'article 2 ou des articles 7-15 de la présente charte.

In English, the critical phrase is "shall operate notwithstanding." Generally, the word "shall" may have either a prospective or an imperative meaning or both. Similarly, the French "a effet indépendamment" is susceptible of a valid interpretation in more than one tense. ... Where, as here, an enabling provision is ambiguous as to whether it allows for retroactive legislation, the same rule of construction applies. In this case, s. 33(1) admits of two interpretations; one that allows Parliament or a legislature to enact retroactive override provisions, the other that permits prospective derogation only. We conclude that the latter and narrower interpretation is the proper one, and that s. 7 cannot give retrospective effect to the override provision. Section 7 of An Act respecting the Constitution Act, 1982, is to the extent of this inconsistency with s. 33 of the Canadian Charter, of no force or effect, with the result that the standard override provisions enacted by s. 1 of that Act came into force on June 23, 1982 in accordance with the first paragraph of s. 7.

Appeal dismissed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Those who see judicial review as an important and effective way to protect fundamental rights from the give and take of majoritarian politics tend to view s 33 as an undermining of the Charter's protection of individual rights. In their view, s 33 allows governments to "override" fundamental rights. On the other hand, those who are troubled by the undemocratic practice of appointed judges second-guessing the policy and value judgments of elected legislatures seem to be untroubled by s 33. In their view, s 33 gives the legislature the final say on the appropriate scope and limits of certain basic rights. Section 33 simply permits the legislature to override the judicial interpretation of those rights (and their appropriate limits).

Some supporters of judicial review, however, take a more positive view of s 33 as an important component of the Charter's complex institutional structure. Lorraine Weinrib, for example, argues that the notwithstanding clause may blunt the argument that judicial review under the Charter is anti-democratic and may give the courts greater confidence when reviewing legislation:

Even when dormant, the [notwithstanding] clause insulates the judicial function from illegitimate political entanglement. The fact that legislatures may abrogate most Charter rights, as long as they do so expressly, means that judges can carry out their responsibilities without constantly looking over their shoulders. Their task is to protect the normative values for which rights stand, e.g., liberty, dignity, equality, on a case-by-case basis. This task is suited to the expertise, experience and independence of the judiciary. Judges should concentrate on providing the strongest support for their position to assist the legislators in performing their function.

See Lorraine Weinrib, "The Notwithstanding Clause: The Loophole Cementing the Charter" (1998) XXVI Cité Libre 47 at 53.

2. Section 33 was not used often in the first three decades of the Charter. In recent years, however, provincial legislatures have been more willing to use it in order to shield their laws from potential declarations of invalidity. Ontario threatened to invoke s 33 to avoid the courts invalidating the legislature's move to slash the number of seats on Toronto City Council (in the end it was not necessary). The Ontario legislature did invoke it even more recently in 2021 in a law restricting third-party spending in elections. In 2019, Quebec, which has a history of recourse to the notwithstanding clause (see Guillaume Rousseau & François Côté, "A Distinctive Quebec Theory and Practice of the Notwithstanding Clause: When Collective Interests Outweigh Individual Rights" (2017) 47:2 Rev G Droit 343) famously invoked s 33 in its Laicity Act, SQ 2019, c 12, a bill prohibiting public servants from wearing religious signs, from Charter scrutiny. Noura Karazivan and Jean-François Gaudreault-DesBiens, in the following excerpt, consider the impacts of this use of the clause:

One narrative put forward was that the Laicity Act protected Quebec's identity and its right to make distinct policy choices which, allegedly, are not shared by the rest of Canadian provinces. Many commentators felt that the notwithstanding clause was a perfectly legitimate tool to be used by Quebec, especially given the perceived lack of legitimacy of the Canadian constitution in the province.

Substantively, [s 33] can be used to achieve several, legitimate purposes. Kahana, for instance, identifies six distinct models providing justifications for the use of that clause up until 2004 [Tsvi Kahana, "What Makes for a Good Use of the Notwithstanding Mechanism?" (2004) 23 SCLR 191]. First, there is the "compromise model," under which the clause would somehow allow legislatures to do as if the Charter did not exist. The "compromise" refers here to the political circumstances surrounding the incorporation of section 33 into the Charter. Second, the "legislative exception" model envisages section 33 as a tool to be used when a legislature knows that a statute risks being found unconstitutional under the Charter. Third, the "litigation avoidance" model posits that the clause can be used preventively even when the legislature believes that the statute could withstand a Charter-based constitutional challenge. Fourth, the "legislative disagreement" model envisages the notwithstanding clause as a way to impose a legislative interpretation of a right, or of the conciliation between competing rights, that goes against the judicial one, even when the legislature knows that the latter is arguably well-founded. Fifth, the notwithstanding clause may be used as a tool to correct "subjective judicial errors," which refer to court rulings that the legislature subjectively believes to be unfounded. Sixth, and last, the clause may also be used to correct "objective judicial errors," that is, judicial rulings which are reasonably and generally viewed as incorrect.

As Newman summarizes [Dwight Newman, "Canada's Notwithstanding Clause, Dialogue, and Constitutional Identities" in Geoffrey Sigalet, Grégoire Webber & Rosalind Dixon, eds, Constitutional Dialogue: Rights, Democracy, Institutions (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2019) 209] some uses are quasi-procedural; others aim at expressing views on the impracticality of a particular definition of rights, or seek to curb an errant court, as suggested by Peter Lougheed. Still other uses, to take Allan Blakeney's formulation, allow a legislature to give priority to moral rights that are not codified in the Charter. Blakeney saw parliamentarians as better equipped to juggle with the greater complexity of rights, including socio-economic rights, than what is strictly codified in the Charter. ...

Yet there is another, perhaps overlapping category, and that is the idea that section 33 allows for some value-pluralism, or the expression of distinct Canadian identities within the federation. This is the most difficult category to deal with, because it shifts to parliamentarians the responsibility to balance legitimate interests and rights which may detract from the principle of equality, especially when nationalist discourse is involved. As Andrei Marmor pointed out [Andrei Marmor, "Are Constitutions Legitimate?" (2007) 20 Can JL & Juris 69], section 33 may very well be what federal societies need in order to "mitigate pluralism's concerns." The question is just how much, and how to strike a right balance.

In a way, section 33 allows a legislature which believes the Court has not accommodated enough value-pluralism to have the last word on a particular matter, something Quebec has invoked in the Laicity Act, its own most recent use of section 33. ... Marmor recognizes that to determine "to what extent" a notwithstanding clause such as section 33 mitigates pluralism is a "very difficult question to answer." In the Canadian federal context, it is increasingly becoming the constitutional question of the century.

The last, and most important substantial justification [advanced by the government] for the Laicity Act is that it represents an affirmation of Quebec's collective choices and distinct character, hence the need to shield it from judicial challenges. Quebec being a nation, it may decide of its orientations in all respects, including, and particularly, when it comes to determining the relationship between the state and religions. The Laicity Act is thus an expression of the distinctive choices made with respect to that relationship by the distinct nation that Quebec constitutes. This nationalist narrative is all the more evident in Premier François Legault's words at the launch of the legislative debate on the use of parliamentary closure to hasten the adoption of the Laicity Act. Legault indeed accused the Liberal opposition, which denounced the bill as unduly infringing upon individual rights, of defending Canadian (read multicultural) values in Quebec, while the government was, for its part, affirming and defending Quebec values within Canada. It is as if Quebec values were ontologically incompatible with Canadian ones. [Emphasis in original.]

See N Karazivan & J-F Gaudreault-DesBiens, "Rights Trivialization, Constitutional Legitimacy Deficit, and Derogation Clauses: the Example of Quebec's Laicity Act" in N Karazivan & J Leclair, eds, The Political and Constitutional Legacy of Pierre Elliott Trudeau (Toronto: Lexis-Nexis, 2020) 487 at 488, 497-98, 500, 507.

3. Why do you think that s 33 applies to only some Charter rights? Does it make sense that s 33 applies to a right such as freedom of expression, which is generally regarded as one of the most fundamental in the Charter?

4. There have been several occasions when certain groups have vocally advocated use of s 33. For example, following the Supreme Court of Canada's judgment in Vriend v Alberta, [1998] 1 SCR 493, 1998 CanLII 816 (discussed in Chapter 16, Chapter 18, and Chapter 23, Equality Rights), in which the Court ruled that the Alberta Individual Rights Protection Act, RSA 1980, c I-2 violated s 15 of the Charter because it failed to extend protection against discrimination to gays and lesbians, conservative forces in the province pressed the government to use s 33. The Conservative government of Alberta declined to do so. What do you think might have motivated the government to refuse?

I. INTRODUCTION: THE DEBATE ABOUT APPLICATION TO PRIVATE ACTION

The Supreme Court of Canada in RWDSU v Dolphin Delivery Ltd, [1986] 2 SCR 573, 1986 CanLII 5 held that the Charter applies only to government action. In other words, only the state, or actors exercising state power, have obligations under the Charter. The Court concluded that the Charter does not apply directly to private actors, nor does it apply directly to litigation between private parties that involves the application of common law rules. (The application of the Charter to common law will be addressed later in this chapter.) Private action that interferes with an individual's rights, such as freedom of expression, may be prohibited by provincial or federal law, but it is not subject to review under the Charter.

The Court based this decision about the limited application of the Charter on s 32(1) of the Charter, which provides:

This Charter applies

- (a) to the Parliament and government of Canada in respect of all matters within the authority of Parliament including all matters relating to the Yukon Territory and Northwest Territories; and
- (b) to the legislature and government of each province in respect of all matters within the authority of the legislature of each province.

Was s 32 intended to limit the application of the Charter to the activities of governments and legislatures, leaving private actors free from an obligation to conform to Charter norms? Or was s 32 added to the Charter simply to make it clear that the particular governmental bodies it identifies were to be bound, without restricting the Charter's application solely to governmental action?

There are, of course, other arguments made in support of this limit on the Charter's application. It is sometimes argued that the Charter is appropriately focused on state action because the state represents the most significant threat to individual liberty. Another argument is that different standards apply to the exercise of state and private power; that more is expected for the state, and so the Charter should focus on state action. Do you think these arguments have merit? Finally, there is the more practical argument that if the Charter were to apply to private action, the courts would be overwhelmed with claims and would be required to develop parallel systems of norms in a variety of areas such as criminal law and anti-discrimination law.

While the rule that the Charter only applies to state action seems simple enough, it turns out that distinguishing between state and private action is often anything but simple. The distinction is difficult because private action is always surrounded by, or enmeshed in, state action that permits or empowers private actors to do what they do. State law is then always implicated in private action. For a discussion of this and the resulting tensions—particularly in the context of freedom of expression—see Richard Moon, The Constitutional Protection of Freedom of Expression (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2000).

There are two significant stress points in the government action doctrine, both of which stem from the fact that private actors can act as they do only because state law permits or enables them to do so. The first issue is: when is a state grant or delegation of power to a person or entity sufficient to make that person or entity a government actor or their action a government action? In other words, who is a government actor and/or what counts as government action? The Supreme Court of Canada has said that a university is not ordinarily a state actor, nor is a hospital. Yet the Court has also said that when an institution, such as a hospital, is implementing a specific government program, such as the delivery of health care, its actions related to that program constitute government action subject to the Charter.

When the state delegates power to an otherwise private actor, that actor may be viewed as exercising state power and as clothed with state authority. However, not just any delegation will be sufficient to make the actor a "state" agent. Otherwise, a private property owner excluding someone from their property, relying on property and trespass law, could be considered a state actor (an extension of the state) and their actions could be considered government action, subject to Charter review.

The question is: what kind or degree of power delegation is sufficient to turn a private actor into a reviewable state actor? One answer is that an otherwise "private" actor becomes a state actor when the state delegates to them the power to perform a public function. The category of state actors would then include entities that perform important functions traditionally associated with the state. As we will see, the Canadian courts have shied away from a public function test, perhaps because there is significant disagreement about the proper or ordinary functions of government.

The courts in the United States adopted an approach of this sort in Marsh v Alabama, 326 US 501, 90 L Ed 265 (1946), where it was held that the decision of a company-owned town to exclude communication from its streets was subject to constitutional review. The Court held that the company's decision to exclude communication from its property (and its use of the State of Alabama's trespass law) to enforce that decision was subject to review under the First Amendment because the town was "operated primarily to benefit the public" and its operation was "essentially a public function" (at 506). According to the Court, the streets and parks of the company town were the “functional equivalents” of state properties. The State of Alabama had permitted the company to “use its property as a town, operate a ‘business block’ in the town and a street and sidewalk on that block” (at 507). Yet in Marsh, the constitutional “wrong” was the application of the state trespass law, rather than the exclusion of expression—and so the judgment can also or instead be seen as a case in which the state is responsible for enabling a private wrong, which is the second point of stress in the doctrine.

In cases concerning the applicability of the Charter to hospitals and universities, the Supreme Court has said that the key question is not whether the institution performs a public function, but whether the institution is effectively under the direction of government (McKinney v University of Guelph, [1990] 3 SCR 229, 1990 CanLII 60). If an institution, such as a university, has significant autonomy in the governance of its affairs, it will not be subject to Charter review, even though it may perform an important public function. Yet the Court has also said that when a private entity is implementing a specific government policy or program, its implementation decisions will be subject to the Charter. Exactly when this will be the case is not entirely clear, although one factor is almost certainly the public nature of the policy.

The second issue concerns the state’s responsibility for wrongs committed by private actors. If private power depends on state authority, the state may be seen as bearing some responsibility for the wrongs committed by private actors. When is the state sufficiently implicated in a private wrong, so that it can be said that the state has also done wrong—has also breached a Charter right? For example, when the state enforces a privately negotiated restrictive covenant that prohibits the future sale of property to the members of a particular racial or religious group, can it be seen as participating in an act of discrimination? In Shelley v Kraemer, 334 US 1, 92 L Ed 1161 (1948), the US Supreme Court held that the state was implicated in this act of discrimination.

In Canada, the difficulty in fixing the boundary between state and private action was apparent in Vriend v Alberta, [1998] 1 SCR 493, 1998 CanLII 816. The Court held in that case that the omission of sexual orientation as a ground of discrimination in the Alberta Individual’s Rights Protection Act, RSA 1980, c I-2 amounted to an act of state discrimination by the government of Alberta contrary to s 15.

It is important to note here that the Charter includes a number of positive rights that require the state to take action to advance or secure particular interests, and not simply refrain from taking action that interferes with protected interests. The rights and freedoms set out in the Charter impose a mix of positive and negative obligations on governments. To the extent that the Charter imposes positive obligations on governments, it will sometimes apply to government inaction. For example, the right to minority language educational facilities in s 23, or the right to an interpreter in s 14, would be meaningless if the Charter did not apply to a state failure to take steps to implement these rights. For this reason, the text of s 32 does not refer to government action; rather, it says that the Charter applies to governments “in respect of all matters within [their] authority.”

The material that follows begins, in Section II, with an exploration of the different kinds of government action subject to the Charter, looking at the ways the courts have defined governmental actors and governmental acts. Section III discusses some circumstances in which the courts have applied the Charter to government inaction or have viewed the state as responsible for, or implicated in, an otherwise private wrong. Section IV turns to the special problems of applying the Charter to the courts, the common law, and administrative decision-makers. Section V considers territorial limits on the application of the Charter—in what circumstances will the Charter apply to decisions taken by the Canadian government abroad? Although the bulk of this chapter is concerned with determining who is required to comply with the obligations imposed by the Charter, the final section, Section VI, looks briefly at the application issue from the other side—who can claim the benefit of Charter rights and freedoms?

II. GOVERNMENTAL ACTION

In Greater Vancouver Transportation Authority v Canadian Federation of Students—British Columbia Component, [\[2009 SCC 31\]](#), Deschamps J, whose reasons on this issue were supported by all members of the Court, summarized the existing law on the application of the Charter:

[16] ... [T]here are two ways to determine whether the Charter applies to an entity's activities: by enquiring into the nature of the entity or by enquiring into the nature of the activities. If the entity is found to be "government" either because of its very nature or because the government exercises significant control over it, all of its activities will be subject to the Charter. If the entity is not itself a government entity but nevertheless performs governmental activities, only those activities which can be said to be governmental in nature will be subject to the Charter. [Emphasis added.]

The materials in this section are organized in light of these two inquiries. First, in Section II.A, "Governmental Actors," we examine the issue of what entities might be classified as being part of the government. The leading cases here are McKinney, cited above, and Stoffman v Vancouver General Hospital, [\[1990\] 3 SCR 483, 1990 CanLII 62](#). Second, in Section II.B, "Governmental Acts," we examine the application of the Charter to non-governmental entities to the extent they are engaged in governmental activities. The leading case here is Eldridge v British Columbia (AG), [\[1997\] 3 SCR 624, 1997 CanLII 327](#).

A. GOVERNMENTAL ACTORS

If an entity is part of government, then the Charter will ordinarily apply to all its actions and decisions. The references to Parliament and provincial legislatures in s 32 of the Charter mean that when laws are passed by those bodies, they must comply with the Charter. Federal, provincial, and territorial statutes and regulations made thereunder are subject to the Charter (as are other forms of delegated legislation, such as municipal by-laws and by-laws and regulations of other creatures of Parliament and the legislatures). Moreover, the Charter applies to actions taken by a legislative assembly so long as those actions are not shielded from Charter scrutiny by constitutionally protected parliamentary privileges: see New Brunswick Broadcasting Co v Nova Scotia (Speaker of the House of Assembly), [\[1993\] 1 SCR 319, 1993 CanLII 153](#).

In Dolphin Delivery, the Court held that the term "government" did not include the judiciary, although, as we will see in Section IV, below, subsequent developments have attenuated the impact of that holding. "Government" in s 32 clearly covers the executive branch of government, including Cabinet (see Operation Dismantle v The Queen, [\[1985\] 1 SCR 441, 1985 CanLII 74](#)), ministers, and public servants in government departments. But how far does "government" extend beyond this? What factors should courts emphasize in making a determination that an actor is governmental—the possession of statutory powers; public funding of the actor; or whether the objectives or functions of the entity are public or private in nature?

The evolving case law has established that there are two ways for an entity to be considered part of "government": because (1) the government exercises significant control over it, or (2) it is 'governmental' in nature—that is, it exercises governmental functions.

1. Entities Controlled by Government

McKinney v University of Guelph

[1990] 3 SCR 229, 1990 CanLII 60

[Eight faculty members and a librarian challenged the mandatory retirement policies of four Ontario universities on the basis of the protection, in s 15, against age discrimination. They raised as a preliminary issue whether the Charter applied to the actions of universities—that is, whether universities could be said to be government actors under s 32 of the Charter. In the alternative, the challengers argued that the provincial human rights code, which only protected persons between the ages of 18 and 65 from age discrimination, violated s 15 of the Charter by allowing discrimination against persons over 65. On the issue of the application of the Charter to universities, a majority of the Court concluded that the universities were not government actors, and, in the absence of government participation or compulsion, their adoption of mandatory retirement policies did not amount to government action. The main judgment on the application issue was written by La Forest J.]

LA FOREST J (Dickson CJ and Gonthier J concurring):

The exclusion of private activity from the Charter was not a result of happenstance. It was a deliberate choice which must be respected. We do not really know why this approach was taken, but several reasons suggest themselves. Historically, bills of rights, of which that of the United States is the great constitutional exemplar, have been directed at government. Government is the body that can enact and enforce rules and authoritatively impinge on individual freedom. Only government requires to be constitutionally shackled to preserve the rights of the individual. Others, it is true, may offend against the rights of individuals. This is especially true in a world in which economic life is largely left to the private sector where powerful private institutions are not directly affected by democratic forces. But government can either regulate these or create distinct bodies for the protection of human rights and the advancement of human dignity.

To open up all private and public action to judicial review could strangle the operation of society and, as put by counsel for the universities, "diminish the area of freedom within which individuals can act." ...

Opening up private activities to judicial review could impose an impossible burden on the courts. ...

The Court in Dolphin Delivery did not have to decide on the extent to which the Charter applies to the actions of subordinate bodies that are created and supported by Parliament or the legislatures, but it did leave open the possibility that such bodies could be governed by the Charter. ...

The appellants first argued that "universities constitute part of the legislature or government of the province within the meaning of s. 32 of the Charter, insofar as they are creatures of statute which exercise powers pursuant to statute and carry out a public function pursuant to statutory authority." Undoubtedly, as the Court of Appeal recognized, a statute providing for mandatory retirement in the universities would violate s. 15 of the Charter, and it is also true that the government could not do so in the exercise of a statutory power. That is because, as McIntyre J. pointed out, they—the legislative, executive and administrative branches of government—are the actors to whom the Charter applies under s. 32(1).

But the mere fact that an entity is a creature of statute and has been given the legal attributes of a natural person is in no way sufficient to make its actions subject to the Charter. Such an entity may be established to facilitate the performance of tasks that those seeking incorporation wish to undertake and to control, not to facilitate the performance of tasks assigned to government. It would significantly undermine the obvious purpose of s. 32 to confine the application of the Charter to legislative and government action to apply it to private corporations, and it would fly in the face of the justifications for so confining the Charter to which I have already referred. ...

The appellants strongly relied on a statement by Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada, (2nd ed. 1985), at p. 671 ... to the effect that Parliament and the legislatures cannot authorize action by others that would be in breach of the Charter. [Hogg included universities within the group of governmental institutions exercising statutory power bound by the Charter.] That statement would, no doubt, be true of a situation such as occurred in Slight Communications Inc. v. Davidson [[1989] 1 SCR 1038, 1989 CanLII 92], where a statute authorizes a person to exercise a discretion in the course of performing a governmental objective. But the Charter was not intended to cover activities by non-governmental entities created by government for legally facilitating private individuals to do things of their own choosing without engaging governmental responsibility. ...

The Charter apart, there is no question of the power of the universities to negotiate contracts and collective agreements with their employees and to include within them provisions for mandatory retirement. These actions are not taken under statutory compulsion, so a Charter attack cannot be sustained on that ground. There is nothing to indicate that in entering into these arrangements, the universities were in any way following the dictates of the government. They were acting purely on their own initiative. Unless, then, it can be established that they form part of government, the universities' action here cannot fall within the ambit of the Charter. That cannot be answered by the mere fact that they are incorporated and perform an important public service. Many institutions in our society perform functions that are undeniably of an important public nature, but are undoubtedly not part of the government. These can include railroads and airlines, as well as symphonies and institutions of learning. And this may be so even though they are subjected to extensive governmental regulations and even assistance from the public purse. ... A public purpose test is simply inadequate. It is fraught with difficulty and uncertainty. It is simply not the test mandated by s. 32. ...

... [I]f the Charter covers municipalities, it is because "municipalities perform a quintessentially governmental function." They enact coercive laws binding on the public generally, for which offenders may be punished The same can obviously not be said of universities. I hasten to add that ... the Charter is not limited to entities which discharge functions that are inherently governmental in nature. As to what other entities may be subject to the Charter by virtue of the functions they perform, I would think that more would have to be shown than that they engaged in activities or the provision of services that are subject to the legislative jurisdiction of either the federal or provincial governments. ...

The appellants also submit that the universities constitute part of the government under s. 32 of the Charter having regard to the nature of their relationship to the provincial government. The entire context must, they say, be looked at including the facts that they are established by statute which determines their powers, objects and governmental structures, that their historical development was as part of a public system of post-secondary education, that their survival depends on public funding, and that government structures largely coordinate and regulate their activities, through operating and capital grants, special funds, control over tuition fees and approval of new programs.

There is no question that the relationship of government to Canadian universities has always been significantly different from that existing in Europe when communities of scholars first banded together to pursue learning. From the early days of this country, several of the provinces acted to establish provincial universities . . . [The statutes establishing Ontario universities are then reviewed.] These statutes set out the universities' powers, functions, privileges and governing structure. While these vary from university to university, they are in general much the same. As well, the University Expropriation Powers Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 516, gives them expropriation powers, a matter not in issue here. The Degree Granting Act, 1983, S.O. 1983, c. 36, restricts the entities that can operate a university and grant university degrees.

There can be no doubt that the reshaping in the 1950s and 1960s of the universities of Ontario (a process that also occurred in other provinces) resulted from provincial policies aimed at promoting higher education. Nor did the Legislature confine itself to rationalizing the existing system. It heavily funds universities on an ongoing basis. The operating grants alone range . . . between a low for York of 68.8% of its operating funds to a high for Guelph of 78.9%. The Ontario Council on University Affairs makes annual global funding recommendations to the government, but the latter assumes responsibility for determining the amounts. It also effectively defines tuition fees within a formula that limits the universities' discretion within a narrow scope. The province also provides most of the funds for capital expenditures, and provides special funds earmarked to meet specific policies. It exercises considerable control over new programs by requiring that they be specifically approved to be eligible for public funds.

It is evident from what has been recounted that the universities' fate is largely in the hands of government and that the universities are subjected to important limitations on what they can do, either by regulation or because of their dependence on government funds. It by no means follows, however, that the universities are organs of government. There are many other entities that receive government funding to accomplish policy objectives governments seek to promote. The fact is that each of the universities has its own governing body. Only a minority of its members (or in the case of York, none) are appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, and their duty is not to act at the direction of the government but in the interests of the university . . . The remaining members are officers of the Faculty, the students, the administrative staff and the alumni.

The government thus has no legal power to control the universities even if it wished to do so. Though the universities, like other private organizations, are subject to government regulations and in large measure depend on government funds, they manage their own affairs and allocate these funds, as well as those from tuition, endowment funds and other sources. . . .

The legal autonomy of the universities is fully buttressed by their traditional position in society. Any attempt by government to influence university decisions, especially decisions regarding appointment, tenure and dismissal of academic staff, would be strenuously resisted by the universities on the basis that this could lead to breaches of academic freedom. In a word, these are not government decisions. Though the legislature may determine much of the environment in which universities operate, the reality is that they function as autonomous bodies within that environment. There may be situations in respect of specific activities where it can fairly be said that the decision is that of the government, or that the government sufficiently partakes in the decision as to make it an act of government, but there is nothing here to indicate any participation in the decision by the government and, as noted, there is no statutory requirement imposing mandatory retirement on the universities.

I, therefore, conclude that the respondent universities do not form part of the government apparatus, so their actions, as such, do not fall within the ambit of the Charter. Nor in establishing mandatory retirement for faculty and staff were they implementing a governmental policy.

[Both Sopinka and L'Heureux-Dubé JJ wrote short separate reasons concluding that universities were not part of government. Justice Wilson, writing in dissent (Cory J concurring), rejected the concept of the "minimal state" on which she saw La Forest J's decision resting, contrasting the Canadian attitude to government and its role with that of the United States. She instead opted for a broader view of government that is "sensitive ... to the wide variety of roles that government has come to play in our society and the need to ensure that in all of these roles it abides by the constitutional norms set out in the Charter." Justice Wilson then set out three tests to help identify the kinds of bodies that ought to be constrained by the Charter: (1) the "control" test, which asks whether the legislative, executive, or administrative branch of government exercises general control over the entity in question; (2) the "government function" test, which asks whether the entity performs a traditional government function or a function that in more modern times is recognized as the responsibility of government; and (3) the "statutory authority and public interest" test, which asks whether the entity is one that acts pursuant to statutory authority specifically granted to it to enable it to further an objective that government seeks to promote in the broader public interest. She went on to find that the universities satisfied all three tests.

Although the argument that the universities' mandatory retirement policies were subject to the Charter was rejected by a majority of the Court, the Court concluded that the provision in the Ontario Human Rights Code, 1981, SO 1981, c 53, allowing mandatory retirement after age 65 was subject to Charter challenge. That provision was found to violate s 15 of the Charter, but was upheld as a reasonable limit under s 1.]

Appeal dismissed.

NOTES

1. At the same time as McKinney, the Supreme Court of Canada decided three other mandatory retirement cases, all of which also involved issues concerning the application of the Charter. Harrison v University of British Columbia, [1990] 3 SCR 451, 1990 CanLII 61, like McKinney, involved a challenge to a university's mandatory retirement policy. A majority of the Court followed McKinney. While the facts suggested that UBC was subject to greater government control than the Ontario universities were in McKinney—for example, the government appointed a majority of UBC's Board of Governors and closely monitored its expenditures—this was insufficient to make it part of government. Justice La Forest, for the majority, wrote that the fact that the government had "ultimate or extraordinary control" over the university, such as the capacity to withdraw statutory powers or public funds, was not enough. To be part of government and therefore bound by the Charter, he held that the university had to be subject to "routine or regular control" by the government. Because UBC, like the Ontario universities, enjoyed a high degree of internal autonomy, the majority found that it was not part of government.

Stoffman involved a challenge by doctors at the Vancouver General Hospital to a hospital board policy of mandatory retirement at 65. Fourteen of the 16 members of the board were appointed by the government. Moreover, the governing statute required that all regulations be approved by the minister of Health Services and Hospital Insurance. Nonetheless, a majority of the Court concluded that the hospital was not part of government nor was the regulation in issue an act of the government. The majority emphasized that routine control of the hospital was in the hands of the hospital's board of trustees rather than in the hands of the provincial government. If routine or regular control of hospital policies was in the hands of government, or if the mandatory retirement policy had been dictated by government, the Charter would have applied. The majority also ruled that provision of a public service, even one as important as health care, did not qualify as a government function under s 32. Justice L'Heureux-Dubé, who had concluded in McKinney that universities were not part of government, joined Wilson and Cory JJ in dissent in Stoffman, concluding that the hospital was acting as government. She found a greater degree of government involvement in this case than in McKinney, where in her view governmental involvement was primarily in the form of funding.

In Douglas/kwantlen Faculty Assn v Douglas College, [1990] 3 SCR 570, 1990 CanLII 63, the Court reached a different result. This case involved a community college and a challenge to a mandatory retirement provision in a collective agreement. The affairs of the college were managed by a board appointed by the provincial government. The minister was allowed to establish and issue directions and approved all by-laws of the board. The Court was unanimous in concluding that the Charter applied to the actions of the college in the negotiation and administration of the collective agreement between itself and the association representing the teachers and librarians at the college. Justice La Forest distinguished the situation of the college from the universities in McKinney and Harrison:

Though the government may choose to permit the college board to exercise a measure of discretion, the simple fact is that the board is not only appointed and removable at pleasure by the government; the government may at all times by law direct its operation. Briefly stated, it is simply part of the apparatus of government both in form and in fact. In carrying out its functions, therefore, the college is performing acts of government, and I see no reason why this should not include its actions in dealing with persons it employs in performing these functions. Its status is wholly different from the universities in the companion cases of McKinney v. University of Guelph ... and Harrison v. University of British Columbia ... , which, though extensively regulated and funded by government, are essentially autonomous bodies.

Thus, because Ontario and BC universities enjoyed a significant measure of internal autonomy, while BC community colleges were subject to routine or regular government control, the colleges were part of government and therefore always subject to the Charter, while the universities were not. Does this distinction make sense?

2. Justice La Forest suggests in his opinion in McKinney that applying the Charter to universities could have negative consequences for academic freedom. Others have suggested that, to the contrary, allowing universities to operate as "Charter-free zones" could be detrimental to academic values. For example, in Pridgen v University of Calgary, 2012 ABCA 139, Paperny J wrote that "[a]cademic freedom and freedom of expression are inextricably linked" (at para 114) and that they "are handmaidens to the same goals; the meaningful exchange of ideas, the promotion of learning, and the pursuit of knowledge. There is no apparent reason they cannot comfortably co-exist" (at para 117). She found that the university had violated s 2(b) of the Charter by not considering students' freedom of expression when disciplining them for posting comments on Facebook that were critical of one of their professors. Similarly, Dwight Newman has argued that the application of the Charter to universities could further academic values. In his view, "[w]here universities limit Charter rights, they may have a justification for doing so in considerations of academic freedom, but they should need to prove this justification rather than simply to waive around generalized academic freedom considerations before claiming Charter immunity": see Dwight Newman, "Application of the Charter to Universities' Limitation of Expression" (2015) 45 Sherbrooke L Rev 133 at 151-52. Keep in mind that even though universities are not part of government, the Supreme Court of Canada's subsequent decision in Eldridge v British Columbia (AG), discussed below in Section II.B, has raised the possibility that some of their activities may be subject to the Charter if they involve the implementation of specific government policies or programs or the exercise of statutory powers of compulsion.

3. The Douglas College ruling was followed in Lavigne v Ontario Public Service Employees Union, [1991] 2 SCR 211, 1991 CanLII 68, which involved a Charter challenge by a faculty member at a community college to the union's expenditure of dues on political causes that he did not support. The collective agreement between the Ontario Council of Regents for Colleges of Applied Arts and Technology (which had exclusive statutory authority to negotiate collective agreements on behalf of all the community colleges in the province) and the union provided that it was compulsory for all employees to pay union dues, whether or not they belonged to the union. The Supreme Court ruled that, although the Charter would not apply to the union's activities, it did apply to those of the Council of Regents. Like Douglas College, the Ontario Council of Regents was subject to "routine or regular control" by the minister of education. The minister exercised "full control over all of the Council's activities," including collective bargaining with college employees. The council was therefore an emanation of government for the purposes of s 32. The provision in the collective agreement providing for the compulsory payment of union dues was found to be subject to the Charter, since the council's agreement to it was government conduct. Justice La Forest rejected the submission that the Charter should apply only to the regulatory activities of government, leaving its commercial or contractual activities exempt. This proposition, he said, rested on an outdated understanding of government. Contemporary governments may pursue policies by engaging in commercial activities and should not be exempt from the Charter when they do so. Lavigne is dealt with more extensively in Chapter 21, Freedom of Association.

4. In Greater Vancouver Transportation Authority v Canadian Federation of Students—British Columbia Component, the Court had to decide whether two corporations that operated public transportation systems in British Columbia, BC Transit and TransLink, had violated the Charter's guarantee of freedom of expression by refusing to accept political advertising on the sides of their buses. The Court found that both were bound by the Charter, and that their advertising policies had to be rewritten to comply with s 2(b) of the Charter. The Court found (at para 17) that BC Transit is a statutory body designated by legislation as an "agent of the government," with a board of directors whose members are all appointed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council (British Columbia Transit Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 38, ss. 2(5) and 4(1)). Moreover, the Lieutenant Governor in Council has the power to manage BC Transit's affairs and operations by means of regulations (s. 32(2)). Thus, BC Transit cannot be said to be operating autonomously from the provincial government, because the latter has the power to exercise substantial control over its day-to-day activities.

The Court reached the same conclusion for TransLink. It based its conclusion on a close reading of the relevant legislation, which gave the entity constituting the local level of government (the Greater Vancouver Regional District, hereafter GVRD), itself part of the apparatus of government, substantial control over TransLink's day-to-day operations. Pursuant to statute, the GVRD was required to appoint 12 of the 15 directors on TransLink's board and to ratify TransLink's strategic transportation plan and a variety of taxes and levies. Moreover, TransLink was required to prepare all its capital and service plans and policies and carry out all its activities and services in a manner that was consistent with its strategic transportation plan. Therefore, while TransLink was not itself part of the apparatus of government, it was governmental in the light of the substantial control that the GVRD exercised over it. (In the alternative, as discussed in Section II.B.1, below, the Charter was found applicable, following Eldridge, because the GVRD was implementing government policy with respect to public transit.)

See also R v Booyink, 2013 ABPC 185, in which the Calgary Airport Authority (CAA) was found to be a government entity because of the significant degree of control exercised over it by the federal, provincial, and municipal levels of government. The Charter was thus applicable to the removal of anti-abortion protesters from the Calgary International Airport. (Alternatively, as discussed in Section II.B.1, the Charter was found to apply because the CAA was implementing a government program.)

5. Do public schools or school boards enjoy the kind of internal autonomy possessed by the universities in McKinney and Harrison, or are they subject to routine or regular ministerial control like the college in Douglas College (see note 1, above)? The Supreme Court of Canada has not yet ruled on the issue of whether public schools are subject to the Charter. The application of the Charter was conceded by the Crown in R v M (MR), [\[1998\] 3 SCR 393, 1988 CanLII 770](#); as a result, the Court did not have to address the accused's submission that public school boards, schools, and their employees are part of the apparatus of government on the test set out in McKinney, Harrison, Stoffman, and Douglas College. The Court assumed, without deciding, that public schools "constitute part of government" (at para 25). In R v AM, \[2008 SCC 119, a case involving a "sniffer-dog" search for drugs at a high school, the Court's analysis focused on the actions of the police without directly addressing the question of whether school authorities are subject to the Charter.

Even if schools or school boards are not controlled by government, they may still be found to be governmental actors, and therefore subject to the Charter in all of their activities, on the ground that they exercise governmental functions: see Godbout v Longueuil (City), [\[1997\] 3 SCR 844, 1997 CanLII 335](#) in Section II.A.2, below. Moreover, even if schools or school boards are neither controlled by nor operating as government, they may be subject to the Charter when making discretionary decisions pursuant to statutory authority: see Slaight Communications Inc v Davidson, [\[1989\] 1 SCR 1038, 1989 CanLII 92](#), as discussed below in Section II.B.2. For example, in Multani v Commission scolaire Marguerite-Bourgeoys, 2006 SCC 6, the Court held that a decision of a school board's council of commissioners prohibiting a student from wearing a kirpan to school infringed his freedom of religion. Writing for the majority, Charron J found that "[t]here is no question that the Canadian Charter applies to the decision of the council of the commissioners" (at para 22). She noted that the council "is a creature of statute and derives all of its powers from statute" (at para 22). Citing the Court's ruling in Slaight, she held that where an administrative body makes a discretionary decision pursuant to statutory powers, it is bound to comply with the Charter. Multani is discussed further in Chapter 19, Freedom of Religion.

6. The "routine or regular" or "substantial" control test articulated by the majority in the mandatory retirement cases has left a number of quasi-governmental organizations beyond the reach of the Charter: see, for example, Canadian Blood Services v Freeman, 2010 ONSC 4885 (Canadian Blood Services not controlled by government; decision to exclude men who have had sex with men from donating blood not subject to the Charter); Sagen v Vancouver Organizing Committee for the 2010 Olympic and Paralympic Winter Games, 2009 BCCA 522 (organizing committee for Vancouver Olympics not controlled by government; decision to exclude women ski jumpers from participation in the games not subject to the Charter). Does the control test unduly limit the scope of the Charter's application? Would a public function test or a public purpose test, as proposed by Wilson J in McKinney, have been preferable?

7. An issue that still remains unsettled is whether Crown corporations (such as Canada Post) are subject to the Charter. Should the fact of governmental ownership be a sufficient connection to government for the purposes of Charter application? Should designation as a Crown agent be determinative? Will the degree of ministerial control be examined? Will Crown corporations be found subject to the Charter with respect to some of their activities but not others? Before the Supreme Court of Canada's decision in Lavigne, for example, several lower courts had expressed the view that while some aspects of Canada Post's operations might be subject to the Charter, the collective bargaining relationship between it and its union was not: see Canadian Union of Postal Workers, Calgary Local 710 v Canada Post Corporation, 1987 CanLII 3387, 40 DLR \(4th\) 67 \(Alta QB\) (holding that Canada Post security rules that required inspection of employees were open to review under the Charter); cf Canada Post Corp v CUPW, 1991 CanLII 8320, 84 DLR \(4th\) 150 \(Ont Gen Div\) (holding that the Charter had no application to union picketing of a post office during a labour dispute). Note, however, that in Lavigne, discussed above in note 3, the Supreme Court of Canada disapproved of the attempt to distinguish between the public and commercial/private transactions of government.

A number of decisions have found that the Charter does not apply to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Although recognizing that the CBC is a Crown agency whose functions are public in nature, the decisions have gone on to emphasize that the CBC has programming independence and its policy decisions are neither decisions of government nor subject to government influence or interference: see Trieger v Canadian Broadcasting Corp, 1988 CanLII 4568, 54 DLR \(4th\) 143 \(Ont H Ct J\); National Party of Canada v Canadian Broadcasting Corp, 1993 CanLII 7151, 106 DLR \(4th\) 568 \(Alta QB\), aff'd 1993 ABCA 269, leave to appeal to SCC refused, [\[1993\] 3 SCR 651, 1993 CanLII 85 \(4 October 1993\)](#) (decision of CBC to produce and televise a leadership debate that did not include the participation of the leader of the applicant party not subject to Charter scrutiny); Natural Law Party of Canada v Canadian Broadcasting Corp, [\[1994\] 1 FC 580, 1993 CanLII 3005 \(TD\)](#) (to the same effect); Adbusters Media Foundation v Canadian Broadcasting Corp, [1995 CanLII 1544, \[1996\] 2 WWR 698 \(BCSC\)](#) (Charter not applicable to CBC's policy on advocacy advertising).

As we shall see in Section II.B, even when entities such as universities, hospitals, or the CBC are found not to be governmental actors, they may be subject to the Charter when they are implementing specific government policies or programs or exercising statutory powers of compulsion.

8. In a portion of McKinney not in the excerpt above, La Forest J referred to US decisions under the state action doctrine. In some cases, US courts have applied the doctrine broadly, with the result that the Bill of Rights has been found to apply to private entities that perform a public function or that are connected to the state through funding and lease arrangements. Thus, in Marsh v Alabama, a company town was found subject to the First Amendment because it performed the same functions as a state-created municipality. And in Burton v Wilmington Parking Authority, 365 US 715, 81 S Ct 856 (1961), a private restaurant that leased premises from a parking authority that was an agency of the state of Delaware was held to be subject to the Fourteenth Amendment because (1) it leased premises in buildings that were owned and maintained by public funds, (2) there was mutual interdependence between the restaurant and the parking authority, and (3) the profits from discrimination contributed to the success of the governmental authority. As Katherine Swinton writes:

Some of the American tests are open to criticism, particularly those which seem to be based on leasing or financial support. Neither factor, alone, should convert private into public activity. If there is discrimination or restraint on freedoms by lessees or grant recipients, human rights codes or other legislation are likely to apply in Canada. Indeed, the state action doctrine developed, in part, because of the absence of comprehensive anti-discrimination legislation in many states and at the federal level, to restrain private action in the United States. It was not until 1964, with the enactment of the Civil Rights Act, that private discriminatory activity became subject to effective legislative restraint.

See Katherine Swinton, "Application of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms" in Walter Tarnopolsky & Gérald Beaudoin, eds, The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms: Commentary (Toronto: Carswell, 1982) at 41.

As Swinton notes, the US state action doctrine is one that proceeds not on the basis of clearly articulated rules, but on a case-by-case balancing of factors. Many of the cases decided since the 1960s have required a significant degree of state involvement in private activity before state action will be found. Thus in Jackson v Metropolitan Edison Co, 419 US 345, 95 S Ct 449 (1974), referred to by La Forest J in McKinney, a private utility was found not to be a state actor, and hence not subject to the due-process guarantees, despite the fact of state licensing and approval of the company's tariff, its monopoly status, and the nature of the service provided.

2. Entities Exercising Governmental Functions

Even if an entity is not part of the apparatus of either the federal or provincial government, because it is not subject to routine or regular ministerial control, it may nevertheless qualify as government for the purposes of s 32 of the Charter if it is exercising governmental functions. Many bodies exercise governmental functions that are conferred on them by federal or provincial legislation. Prominent examples include municipalities and professional regulatory bodies. How should the courts draw the line between entities that exercise governmental functions and those that do not? What is the difference between the public purpose test rejected by La Forest J in McKinney and the governmental function test he put forward in Godbout, immediately below? What are the markers of a "governmental" function?

Godbout v Longueuil (City)

[1997] 3 SCR 844, 1997 CanLII 335

[The city of Longueuil adopted a resolution requiring all new permanent employees to reside within its boundaries. As a condition of her employment, the respondent signed a declaration promising that she would establish her principal residence in the city and that she would continue to live there for as long as she remained in the city's employ. The declaration also provided that if she moved out of the city for any reason, she could be terminated without notice. When the respondent moved to a neighbouring municipality, her employment was terminated. The Supreme Court of Canada held unanimously that the city's residence requirement violated the right to respect for private life set out in s 5 of Quebec's Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms. Six members of the Court found it unnecessary to consider arguments based on the Canadian Charter. In his concurring opinion, La Forest J concluded that the residence policy also violated the Charter, specifically s 7, an aspect of the judgment that is discussed in Chapter 22, The Right to Life, Liberty, and Security of the Person. Before reaching this conclusion, however, La Forest J held that municipalities are subject to the Charter. His analysis of the application issue is excerpted below.]

LA FOREST J (McLachlin and L'Heureux-Dubé JJ concurring):

[47] ... [Where] entities other than Parliament, the provincial legislatures or the federal or provincial governments ... are, in reality, "governmental" in nature—as evidenced by such things as the degree of government control exercised over them, or by the governmental quality of the functions they perform—they cannot escape Charter scrutiny. ... This is not to say, of course, that the Charter applies only to those entities (other than Parliament, the provincial legislatures and the federal and provincial governments) that are, by their nature, governmental. Indeed, it may be that particular entities will be subject to Charter scrutiny in respect of certain governmental activities they perform, even if the entities themselves cannot accurately be described as "governmental" per se; see, e.g., Re Klein and Law Society of Upper Canada (1985), 1985 CanLII 3086 (ON SCDC), 50 O.R. (2d) 118 (Div. Ct.), at p. 157, where Callaghan J. held for the majority that even though the Law Society of Upper Canada is not itself governmental in nature, it may nevertheless be subject to the Charter in performing what amount to governmental functions. Rather, it is simply to say that where an entity can accurately be described as "governmental in nature," it will be subject in its activities to Charter review. Thus, the Charter applied to Douglas College (in Douglas) and to the Council of Regents (in Lavigne) because those bodies were wholly controlled by government and were, in essence, emanations of the provincial legislatures that created them. Since the same could not be said of the institutions under examination in McKinney, Harrison, and Stoffman (and since none of those institutions was implementing a specific government policy or programme in adopting its mandatory retirement regulations), the Charter did not apply in those cases.

[48] The possibility that the Canadian Charter might apply to entities other than Parliament, the provincial legislatures and the federal or provincial governments is, of course, explicitly contemplated by the language of s. 32(1) inasmuch as entities that are controlled by government or that perform truly governmental functions are themselves "matters within the authority" of the particular legislative body that created them. Moreover, interpreting s. 32 as including governmental entities other than those explicitly listed therein is entirely sensible from a practical perspective. Were the Charter to apply only to those bodies that are institutionally part of government but not to those that are—as a simple matter of fact—governmental in nature (or performing a governmental act), the federal government and the provinces could easily shirk their Charter obligations by conferring certain of their powers on other entities and having those entities carry out what are, in reality, governmental activities or policies. In other words, ... [they] could simply create bodies distinct from themselves, vest those bodies with the power to perform governmental functions and, thereby, avoid the constraints imposed upon their activities through the operation of the Charter. Clearly, this course of action would indirectly narrow the ambit of protection afforded by the Charter in a manner that could hardly have been intended and with consequences that are, to say the least, undesirable. Indeed, in view of their fundamental importance, Charter rights must be safeguarded from possible attempts to narrow their scope unduly or to circumvent altogether the obligations they engender.

[49] I pause here to reiterate an important observation made in the cases discussed earlier concerning how the notion of "government" is to be understood. The mere fact that an entity performs what may loosely be termed a "public function" will not by itself mean that the body under examination is "governmental" in nature. ... In order for the Canadian Charter to apply ..., an entity must truly be acting in what can accurately be described as a "governmental"—as opposed to a merely "public"—capacity. The factors that might serve to ground a finding that an institution is performing "governmental functions" do not readily admit of any a priori elucidation. Nevertheless, and as I stated further on in McKinney (at p. 269), "[a] public purpose test is simply inadequate" and "is simply not the test mandated by s. 32."

[50] Having set out what I take to be the guiding principles, I turn now to examine directly the Charter application issues in this appeal. The main issue concerns whether the Canadian Charter applies to municipalities—like the appellant—at all. To my mind, the analysis I have undertaken thus far leads inexorably to the conclusion that it does. While this Court has never before expressly endorsed that proposition, we have done so inferentially, inasmuch as we have already applied the Charter to municipal by-laws without specifically engaging in an analysis of the application issue; see Ramsden v. Peterborough (City), 1993, CanLII 60 (SCC), [1993] 2 S.C.R. 1084.

Moreover, the view that municipalities are subject to the Charter is not only sound, but also wholly consistent with the case law I have been discussing. Indeed, municipalities—though institutionally distinct from the provincial governments that create them—cannot but be described as “governmental entities.” I base this finding on a number of considerations.

[51] First, municipal councils are democratically elected by members of the general public and are accountable to their constituents in a manner analogous to that in which Parliament and the provincial legislatures are accountable to the electorates they represent. To my mind, this itself is a highly significant (although perhaps not a decisive) indictum of “government” in the requisite sense. Secondly, municipalities possess a general taxing power that, for the purposes of determining whether they can rightfully be described as “government,” is indistinguishable from the taxing powers of Parliament or the provinces. Thirdly, and importantly, municipalities are empowered to make laws, to administer them and to enforce them within a defined territorial jurisdiction. ... Finally, and most significantly, municipalities derive their existence and law-making authority from the provinces; that is, they exercise powers conferred on them by provincial legislatures, powers and functions which they would otherwise have to perform themselves. Since the Canadian Charter clearly applies to the provincial legislatures and governments, it must, in my view, also apply to entities upon which they confer governmental powers within their authority. Otherwise, provinces could (in the manner outlined earlier) simply avoid the application of the Charter by devolving powers on municipal bodies.

[54] The approach I have taken to the relation of municipalities to the provinces finds further support, I think, in the reasoning underlying this Court’s decision in Slaight Communications Inc. v. Davidson There, we had to decide, inter alia, whether the Canadian Charter applied to the discretionary orders of a statutorily appointed arbitrator. Speaking for the Court on this issue, Lamer J. (as he then was) stated, at pp. 1077-78:

The fact that the Charter applies to the order made by the adjudicator in the case at bar is not, in my opinion, open to question. The adjudicator is a statutory creature: he is appointed pursuant to a legislative provision and derives all his powers from the statute. As the Constitution is the supreme law of Canada and any law that is inconsistent with its provisions is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect, it is impossible to interpret legislation conferring discretion as conferring a power to infringe the Charter, unless, of course, that power is expressly conferred or necessarily implied. ... Legislation conferring an imprecise discretion must therefore be interpreted as not allowing the Charter rights to be infringed. Accordingly, an adjudicator exercising delegated powers does not have the power to make an order that would result in an infringement of the Charter [Emphasis added.]

While the application issues in Slaight and those in the present case are by no means identical, they can profitably be understood to share at least one salient feature; viz., both labour arbitrators (such as the one in Slaight itself) and municipalities (such as the appellant) exercise governmental powers conferred upon them by the appropriate legislative body. To be sure, the nature and scope of those powers is different. As regards the arbitrator in Slaight, the delegated power consisted in the discretion to make orders in the settlement of particular labour disputes. As regards municipalities, it consists in the much broader discretion to adopt and enforce coercive laws binding on a defined territory. In both cases, however, the ultimate source of authority is government per se and, consequently, the entity under scrutiny will be kept in check through the application of the Charter, just as government itself would be were it performing the functions conferred.

[55] For all these reasons, then, I am firmly of the opinion that the Canadian Charter applies to municipalities. But what of the appellant's submission that the Charter should not apply because the activity in question—i.e., the imposition of the residence requirement—is a "private" as opposed to a "governmental" act? As I have already suggested, I cannot accept this distinction. The particular modality a municipality chooses to adopt in advancing its policies cannot shield its activities from Charter scrutiny. All the municipality's powers are derived from statute and all are of a governmental character; see the cited passage from Slaight, supra. An act performed by an entity that is governmental in nature is, to my mind, necessarily "governmental" and cannot properly be viewed as "private" at all. [Emphasis in original.]

NOTES

1. Justice La Forest's (three-person) minority opinion in Godbout was the only one to address the application of the Charter. Six of the judges resolved the case on the basis of the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms and therefore did not need to address whether the Canadian Charter applied. As La Forest J noted, in a number of rulings involving challenges to municipal by-laws, the Court has assumed without discussion that the Charter applies to municipalities. But in those cases, the challenges were to municipal by-laws, a form of delegated legislation. Recall that in Dolphin Delivery, McIntyre J seemed to have little difficulty recognizing that the Charter would apply to delegated legislation:

[39] It would also seem that the Charter would apply to many forms of delegated legislation, regulations, orders in council, possibly municipal by-laws, and by-laws and regulations of other creatures of Parliament and the Legislatures.

Justice La Forest's ruling in Godbout went further and found that municipalities were governmental in nature and that all of their actions were therefore subject to the Charter. In Greater Vancouver Transportation Authority v Canadian Federation of Students, discussed above in Section II.A.1, the Supreme Court relied on Godbout to find that the Greater Vancouver Regional District was a "local government entity" bound by the Charter, and that the public transit authority controlled by it was also part of government (at para 21).

2. Are the territorial governments of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories subject to the Charter? On what basis? Is the government of Nunavut in the same position?

3. Are Indigenous governments subject to the Charter? Section 32 does not mention Indigenous governments; it refers to all matters within the authority of the federal and provincial governments. The issue is complicated by the different sources of Indigenous governmental powers: they arise from inherent rights to self-government; treaty rights; and, in the case of band councils, the provisions of the Indian Act, RSC 1985, c I-5. In Kahkewistahaw First Nation v Taypotat, 2015 SCC 30, the Supreme Court of Canada assumed that First Nations' band councils established under the Indian Act were government entities subject to the Charter. The terms of a treaty may also subject the exercise of Indigenous governmental powers to Charter constraints: see, for example, the Nisga'a Final Agreement (1998), as discussed in Section IX of Chapter 14, Distribution of Legislative Authority, which provides that the Charter applies to the Nisga'a government in respect of all matters within its authority.

4. Does the Charter apply to professional bodies endowed with statutory powers of regulation? In Re Klein and Law Society of Upper Canada, 1985 CanLII 3086, 50 OR \(2d\) 118 \(H Ct J \(Div Ct\)\) the Law Society of Upper Canada's (now the Law Society of Ontario's) rules with respect to lawyers' advertising were found to be subject to the Charter. The application of the Charter to law society rules was assumed without discussion by the Supreme Court in Black v Law Society of Alberta, [1989] 1 SCR 591, 1989 CanLII 132 (law society rule prohibiting partnerships with non-resident lawyers violating the mobility rights in s 6 of the Charter). As with municipal by-laws, the application of the Charter to these exercises of delegated law-making power would appear to be relatively uncontentious. As well, as discussed below in Section II.B.2, the Charter is applicable when professional bodies are exercising discretion pursuant to statutory authority, although the analysis of whether proportionate weight has been given to Charter rights and values is now to be conducted under the framework set out in Doré v Barreau du Québec, 2012 SCC 12; see Dore itself (Charter applicable to disciplinary ruling of law society); and Trinity Western University v The Law Society of Upper Canada, 2016 ONCA 518 (Charter applicable to law society decision about accreditation of a law school). (Both cases are discussed below, in Section IV.C.) Will the Charter apply to professional regulatory bodies in all of their activities, or only when they are exercising statutory powers of compulsion that are governmental in nature? Are they to be considered governmental actors or non-governmental actors exercising some governmental powers?

5. Does the Charter apply to human rights commissions? In Blencoe v British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), 2000 SCC 44, discussed below, in Section II.B.2, the Supreme Court of Canada found that the Ontario Human Rights Commission, although not part of government and not controlled by government, was subject to the Charter because it was a body created by statute to implement a government objective and all of its actions were pursuant to statutory authority. Does this reasoning suggest that the commission as a whole was "governmental in nature," like the municipalities in Godbout, or only that it was a non-governmental entity implementing a government policy and exercising statutory powers of compulsion, and hence bound by the Charter under the principles of Eldridge, below, with respect to specific actions? Does the latter characterization make sense when you are dealing with an entity created by statute, whose every action is pursuant to statutory authority?

B. GOVERNMENTAL ACTS

1. Non-Governmental Entities Implementing Government Programs

Eldridge v British Columbia (AG)

[1997] 3 SCR 624, 1997 CanLII 327

[Three individuals who were born deaf and whose preferred means of communication was sign language sought a declaration that the failure to provide public funding for sign language interpreters for the deaf when they received medical services violated s 15 of the Charter. According to the Medical and Health Care Services Act, SB 1992, c 76, the power to decide whether a service is "medically required" and hence a "benefit" under the Act is delegated to the Medical Services Commission. In the case of the Hospital Insurance Act, RSBC 1979, c 180, hospitals were given discretion to determine which services should be provided free of charge. The commission and the hospitals did not make sign language interpretation available as an insured service. Justice La Forest's analysis of the application issue follows. The portion of the decision dealing with the s 15 equality issue is found in Chapter 23, Equality Rights.]

LA FOREST J (Lamer CJ and L'Heureux-Dubé, Sopinka, Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin, Iacobucci, and Major JJ concurring):

Application of the Charter

[19] There are two distinct Charter “application” issues in this case. The first is to identify the precise source of the alleged s. 15(1) violations. As I will develop later, in my view it is not the impugned legislation that potentially infringes the Charter. Rather, it is the actions of particular entities—hospitals and the Medical Services Commission—exercising discretion conferred by that legislation that does so. The second question is whether the Charter applies to those entities. In my view, the Charter applies to both in so far as they act pursuant to the powers granted to them by the statutes. I deal with each of these questions in turn.

The Sources of the Alleged Charter Violations

[20] ... There is no question, of course, that the Charter applies to provincial legislation; see RWDSU v. Dolphin Delivery Ltd., ... [1986] 2 S.C.R. 573. There are two ways, however, in which it can do so. First, legislation may be found to be unconstitutional on its face because it violates a Charter right and is not saved by s. 1. In such cases, the legislation will be invalid and the Court compelled to declare it of no force or effect Secondly, the Charter may be infringed, not by the legislation itself, but by the actions of a delegated decision-maker in applying it. In such cases, the legislation remains valid, but a remedy for the unconstitutional action may be sought pursuant to s. 24(1) of the Charter.

[21] The s. 32 jurisprudence of this Court has for the most part focused on the first type of Charter violation. There is no doubt, however, that the Charter also applies to action taken under statutory authority. The rationale for this rule flows inexorably from the logical structure of s. 32. ...

[22] The question in the present case, then, is whether the alleged breach of s. 15(1) arises from the impugned legislation itself or from the actions of entities exercising decision-making authority pursuant to that legislation. The proper framework for determining this question was set out by Lamer J. (as he then was) and approved by a majority of this Court in Slaight Communications Inc. v. Davidson, ... [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1038. ...

[Justice La Forest concluded that the source of the violation of s 15 in this case was not the legislation, but the actions of the Medical Services Commission and the hospitals, the entities exercising statutory decision-making authority pursuant to that legislation.]

[35] Having identified the sources of the alleged s. 15(1) violations, it remains to be considered whether the Charter actually applies to them. At first blush, this may seem to be a curious question. As I have discussed, it is a basic principle of constitutional theory that since legislatures may not enact laws that infringe the Charter, they cannot authorize or empower another person or entity to do so; Slaight, supra. It is possible, however, for a legislature to give authority to a body that is not subject to the Charter. Perhaps the clearest example of this is the power of incorporation. Private corporations are entirely creatures of statute; they have no power or authority that does not derive from the legislation that created them. The Charter does not apply to them, however, because legislatures have not entrusted them to implement specific governmental policies. Of course, governments may desire corporations to serve certain social and economic purposes, and may adjust the terms of their existence to accord with those goals. Once brought into being, however, they are completely autonomous from government; they are empowered to exercise only the same contractual and proprietary powers as are possessed by natural persons. As a result, while the legislation creating corporations is subject to the Charter, corporations themselves are not part of "government" for the purposes of s. 32 of the Charter.

[36] Legislatures have created many other statutory entities, however, that are not as clearly autonomous from government. There are myriad public or quasi-public institutions that may be independent from government in some respects, but in other respects may exercise delegated governmental powers or be otherwise responsible for the implementation of government policy. When it is alleged that an action of one of these bodies, and not the legislation that regulates them, violates the Charter, it must be established that the entity, in performing that particular action, is part of "government" within the meaning of s. 32 of the Charter.

[Justice La Forest's review of the case law has been omitted.]

[40] In Douglas and Lavigne, the argument was made that even if the entities in question were generally part of "government" for the purposes of s. 32, the Charter should not apply to the "private" or "commercial" arrangements they engage in. In each case, the Court rejected this contention, holding that when an entity is determined to be part of the fabric of government, the Charter will apply to all its activities, including those that might in other circumstances be thought of as "private." The rationale for this principle is obvious: governments should not be permitted to evade their Charter responsibilities by implementing policy through the vehicle of private arrangements. . . .

[41] While it is well established that the Charter applies to all the activities of government, whether or not those activities may be otherwise characterized as "private," this Court has also recognized that the Charter may apply to non-governmental entities in certain circumstances . . . It has been suggested, for example, that the Charter will apply to a private entity when engaged in activities that can in some way be attributed to government. . . .

[42] It seems clear, then, that a private entity may be subject to the Charter in respect of certain inherently governmental actions. The factors that might serve to ground a finding that an activity engaged in by a private entity is "governmental" in nature do not readily admit of any a priori elucidation. McKinney makes it clear, however, that the Charter applies to private entities in so far as they act in furtherance of a specific governmental program or policy. In these circumstances, while it is a private actor that actually implements the program, it is government that retains responsibility for it. The rationale for this principle is readily apparent. Just as governments are not permitted to escape Charter scrutiny by entering into commercial contracts or other "private" arrangements, they should not be allowed to evade their constitutional responsibilities by delegating the implementation of their policies and programs to private entities. . . .

[43] Two important points must be made with respect to this principle. First, the mere fact that an entity performs what may loosely be termed a "public function," or the fact that a particular activity may be described as "public" in nature, will not be sufficient to bring it within the purview of "government" for the purposes of s. 32 of the Charter. . . In order for the Charter to apply to a private entity, it must be found to be implementing a specific governmental policy or program. . . .

[44] The second important point concerns the precise manner in which the Charter may be held to apply to a private entity. As the case law discussed above makes clear, the Charter may be found to apply to an entity on one of two bases. First, it may be determined that the entity is itself "government" for the purposes of s. 32. This involves an inquiry into whether the entity . . . can, either by its very nature or in virtue of the degree of governmental control exercised over it, properly be characterized as "government" within the meaning of s. 32(1). In such cases, all of the activities of the entity will be subject to the Charter, regardless of whether the activity in which it is engaged could, if performed by a non-governmental actor, correctly be described as "private." Second, an entity may be found to attract Charter scrutiny with respect to a particular activity that can be ascribed to government. This demands an investigation not into the nature of the entity whose activity is impugned but rather into the nature of the activity itself. In such cases, in other words, one must scrutinize the quality of the act at issue, rather than the quality of the actor. If the act is truly "governmental" in nature—for example, the implementation of a specific statutory scheme or a government program—the entity performing it will be subject to review under the Charter only in respect of that act, and not its other, private activities.

[45] In the present case, the controversy over the Charter's application centres on the question of hospitals. The respondents argue that if the failure to provide sign language interpreters does not flow from the Act but rather from the discretion of individual hospitals, then s. 15(1) is not engaged because the Charter does not apply to hospitals. Hospitals, they say, are not "government" for the purposes of s. 32 of the Charter. In their view, this result flows from a straightforward application of this Court's decision in Stoffman

[46] The foregoing analysis, however, establishes that it is not enough for the respondents to say that hospitals are not "government" for the purposes of s. 32 of the Charter. In Stoffman, the Court found that the Vancouver General Hospital was not part of the apparatus of government and that its adoption of a mandatory retirement policy did not implement a government policy. Stoffman made it clear that, as presently constituted, hospitals in British Columbia are non-governmental entities whose private activities are not subject to the Charter. It remains to be seen, however, whether hospitals effectively implement governmental policy in providing medical services under the Hospital Insurance Act.

[47] There is language in Stoffman that could be read as precluding the application of the Charter in the circumstances of the present case. There, I wrote, at p. 516, that "there can be no question of the Vancouver General's being held subject to the Charter on the ground that it performs a governmental function, for ... the provision of a public service, even if it is one as important as health care, is not the kind of function which qualifies as a governmental function under s. 32." That statement, however, must be read in the context of the entire judgment. I determined only that the fact that an entity performs a "public function" in the broad sense does not render it "government" for the purposes of s. 32 and specifically left open the possibility that the Charter could be applied to hospitals in different circumstances. ...

[48] [In Stoffman] the hospital's mandatory retirement policy, which was embodied in Medical Staff Regulation 5.04, was a matter of internal hospital management. ... It was not instigated by the government and did not reflect its mandatory retirement policy. Hospitals in British Columbia, moreover, exhibited great variety in their approaches to retirement. That each of these policies obtained ministerial approval reflected the large measure of managerial autonomy accorded to hospitals in this area.

[49] The situation in the present appeal is very different. The purpose of the Hospital Insurance Act is to provide particular services to the public. Although the benefits of that service are delivered and administered through private institutions—hospitals—it is the government, and not hospitals, that is responsible for defining both the content of the service to be delivered and the persons entitled to receive it. ...

[50] The structure of the Hospital Insurance Act reveals, therefore, that in providing medically necessary services, hospitals carry out a specific governmental objective. The Act is not, as the respondents contend, simply a mechanism to prevent hospitals from charging for their services. Rather, it provides for the delivery of a comprehensive social program. Hospitals are merely the vehicles the legislature has chosen to deliver this program. It is true that hospitals existed long before the statute, and have historically provided a full range of medical services. In recent decades, however, health care, including that generally provided by hospitals, has become a keystone tenet of governmental policy. The interlocking federal-provincial medicare system ... entitles all Canadians to essential medical services without charge. Although this system has retained some of the trappings of the private insurance model from which it derived, it has come to resemble more closely a government service than an insurance scheme

[51] Unlike Stoffman, then, in the present case there is a "direct and ... precisely-defined connection" between a specific government policy and the hospital's impugned conduct. The alleged discrimination—the failure to provide sign language interpretation—is intimately connected to the medical service delivery system instituted by the legislation. The provision of these services is not simply a matter of internal hospital management; it is an expression of government policy. Thus, while hospitals may be autonomous in their day-to-day operations, they act as agents for the government in providing the specific medical services set out in the Act. The Legislature, upon defining its objective as guaranteeing access to a range of medical services, cannot evade its obligations under s. 15(1) of the Charter to provide those services without discrimination by appointing hospitals to carry out that objective. In so far as they do so, hospitals must conform with the Charter.

[52] The case of the Medical Services Commission is more straightforward. It was not contested that the Charter applies to the Commission in exercising its power to determine whether a service is a benefit pursuant to s. 4(1) of the Medical and Health Care Services Act. It is plain that in so doing, the Commission implements a government policy, namely, to ensure that all residents receive medically required services without charge. In lieu of setting out a comprehensive list of insured services in legislation, the government has delegated to the Commission the power to determine what constitutes a "medically required" service. There is no doubt, therefore, that in exercising this discretion the Commission acts in governmental capacity and is thus subject to the Charter. As there is no need to do so, I refrain from commenting on whether the Commission might be considered part of government for other purposes.

[Justice La Forest went on to find that the failure to provide funding for sign language interpretation violated the applicants' equality rights. For this portion of the ruling, see Chapter 23.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. As noted above, in Greater Vancouver Transportation Authority v Canadian Federation of Students, Deschamps J, writing for a unanimous court, found that two BC public transit authorities, TransLink and BC Transit, were bound by the Charter. One reason Deschamps J gave for finding that Translink was bound by the Charter was because it was under the control of a local government—the Greater Vancouver Regional District. However, applying Eldridge, she went on to add another reason—that the GVRD and, hence, Translink were implementing the government's public transit policy:

[22] The conclusion that TransLink is a government entity is also supported by the principle enunciated by La Forest J. in Eldridge (at para. 42) and Godbout (at para. 48) that a government should not be able to shirk its Charter obligations by simply conferring its powers on another entity. The creation of TransLink by statute in 1998 and the partial vesting by the province of control over the region's public transit system in the GVRD was not a move towards the privatization of transit services, but an administrative restructuring designed to place more power in the hands of local governments . . . The devolution of provincial responsibilities for public transit to the GVRD cannot therefore be viewed as having created a "Charter-free" zone for the public transit system in Greater Vancouver.

As discussed in Chapter 20, Freedom of Expression, Deschamps J went on to find that the public transit authorities' policy of not accepting political advertisements infringed s 2(b) and was not a minimal impairment of freedom of expression.

2. Just as hospitals in British Columbia are not part of the apparatus of government (Stoffman) but are subject to the Charter when delivering public health care services (Eldridge), might universities be subject to the Charter when making decisions related to the delivery of post-secondary education services to students? The answer from lower courts has been mixed. Courts have rejected attempts to apply the reasoning in Eldridge to universities in BC Civil Liberties Association v University of Victoria, 2016 BCCA 162; Lobo v Carleton University, 2012 ONCA 498; Telfer v The University of Western Ontario, 2012 ONSC 1287; and AlGhaithy v University of Ottawa, 2012 ONSC 142. In several other rulings, however, judges have relied on Eldridge to find that universities were bound to comply with the Charter when engaged in activities related to the implementation of specific post-secondary education programs: R v Whatcott, 2011 ABPC 336, aff'd 2012 ABQB 231; Pridgen v University of Calgary, 2010 ABQB 644, aff'd on other grounds, 2012 ABCA 139. (As discussed in Section II.B.2, below, it may also be possible to characterize some actions of universities as exercises of statutory powers of compulsion and hence subject to the Charter.)

More recently, the Alberta CA in UAlberta Pro-Life v Governors of the University of Alberta, 2020 ABCA 1, held that the university's regulation of student expression on campus amounted to government action subject to the Charter because the university's purpose, established by statute, was to educate students and this was achieved "largely by means of free expression" (at para 148). In 2018, the Ontario government required all universities to establish free speech policies that conformed with the "Chicago Principles." Does this now mean that the decisions of Ontario universities concerning student speech on campus will be subject to Charter review? Does it matter that most Ontario universities already had some form of free speech protection written into their policies or by-laws?

3. As noted earlier, attempts to apply the "implementing a specific governmental policy or program" test to other non-governmental actors failed in Canadian Blood Services v Freeman; Sagen v Vancouver Organizing Committee for the 2010 Olympic and Paralympic Winter Games, and R v Booyink. See also Calgary Airport Authority v Canadian Centre for Bio-Ethical Reform, 2014 ABQB 493.

2. Entities Exercising Statutory Powers of Compulsion

In addition to government actors, and non-governmental actors implementing specific government programs, the Charter applies to non-governmental actors exercising coercive statutory powers. This was recognized by La Forest J in Eldridge, above, in paras 20 and 21.

Thus, in Slaight, the Charter was held to apply to the order of an adjudicator acting pursuant to the Canada Labour Code, RSC 1970, c L-1 because the adjudicator was exercising powers conferred by legislation. Justice Lamer, who wrote for the majority on the issue, reasoned as follows:

The fact that the Charter applies to the order made by the adjudicator in the case at bar is not, in my opinion, open to question. The adjudicator is a statutory creature: he is appointed pursuant to a legislative provision and derives all his powers from the statute. As the Constitution is the supreme law of Canada and any law that is inconsistent with its provisions is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect, it is impossible to interpret legislation conferring discretion as conferring a power to infringe the Charter, unless, of course, that power is expressly conferred or necessarily implied. Such an interpretation would require us to declare the legislation to be of no force or effect, unless it could be justified under s. 1. ... Legislation conferring an imprecise discretion must therefore be interpreted as not allowing the Charter rights to be infringed. Accordingly, an adjudicator exercising delegated powers does not have the power to make an order that would result in an infringement of the Charter, and he exceeds his jurisdiction if he does so. [Emphasis in original.]

On the facts of Slaight, the adjudicator's order requiring an employer who had wrongfully dismissed an employee to write a specific letter of reference for his employee was found to constitute a violation of freedom of expression, but one that could be upheld as a reasonable limit under s 1. (The treatment of this issue is discussed further in Chapter 20, Section III.)

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The Eldridge and Slaight rulings were followed in Blencoe v British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), which concerned whether the lengthy delays in processing a sexual harassment complaint had violated the respondent's rights under s 7 of the Charter. It was argued that the commission's independence from government rendered the Charter inapplicable to its actions. Justice Bastarache, writing for the majority, rejected this argument. He held that even though the commission was not part of the apparatus of government or controlled by the government, its acts could be subject to the Charter. First, like the Medical Services Commission and hospitals in Eldridge, the Human Rights Commission was charged with implementing a specific government policy or program. Second, the commission exercised statutory powers of compulsion:

[35] Bodies exercising statutory authority are bound by the Charter even though they may be independent of government. ...

[36] One distinctive feature of actions taken under statutory authority is that they involve a power of compulsion not possessed by private individuals (P.W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada ... at p. 34-12). Clearly the Commission possesses more extensive powers than a natural person. The Commission's authority is not derived from the consent of the parties. The Human Rights Code grants various powers to the Commission to both investigate complaints and decide how to deal with such complaints. Section 24 of the Code specifically allows the Commissioner to compel the production of documents.

For these two reasons, the Charter applied to the commission's acts in processing the complaint, although Bastarache J went on to find no violation of Blencoe's Charter rights. That aspect of the judgment is discussed in Chapter 22.

2. The result of the decisions in Slaight and Blencoe is that some adjudicative bodies, such as administrative tribunals and labour adjudicators, are bound by the Charter, while courts, following Dolphin Delivery, are not, at least insofar as their orders are at the request of private litigants relying on the common law. However, as we will see below in Section IV, two developments have significantly narrowed the gap in the Charter's role in common law adjudication and administrative decision-making that resulted from Dolphin Delivery and Slaight and Blencoe. First, a number of rulings have given effect to McIntyre J's dicta in Dolphin Delivery that the courts must develop the common law in accordance with Charter values. Second, the Supreme Court of Canada has reframed the role of the Charter in discretionary decision-making by administrative bodies exercising statutory powers, such as the arbitrator in Slaight and the Human Rights Commission in Blencoe: see Doré v Barreau du Québec and Loyola High School v Québec (AG), 2015 SCC 12. According to Doré and Loyola, the exercise of statutory discretion by administrative decision-makers must reflect a proportionate or reasonable balancing of Charter rights and values with legislative objectives.

3. Should the Charter apply to protect actions committed by private security guards, such as arbitrary detentions, unreasonable searches, denials of the right to counsel, or other rights violations? In R v Buhay, 2003 SCC 30, the issue arose in the context of a seizure of marijuana from a rented locker in a Winnipeg bus depot. The Court found that the Charter did not apply to the private security guards who conducted the initial search. Citing R v Broyles, [\[1991\] 3 SCR 595, 1991 CanLII 15](#) (police informer not acting as state agent) and R v M (MR), (school vice-principal not acting as state agent when searching student), Arbour J held that the question is whether the security guards were acting as state agents when searching the locker. In this case, the security guards had acted totally independently of the police in their initial search:

[28] Nothing in the evidence allows a conclusion that the security guards or the agency by which they were employed can be assimilated to the government itself, nor can their activities be ascribed to those of the government. Private security guards are neither government agents nor employees, and apart from a loose framework of statutory regulation, they are not subject to government control. Their work may overlap with the government's interest in preventing and investigating crime, but it cannot be said that the security guards were acting as delegates of the government carrying out its policies or programs. Even if one concedes that the protection of the public is a public purpose which is the responsibility of the state, this is not sufficient to qualify the functions of the security guards as governmental in nature.

Does the analysis in Buhay change if a private security guard or other non-governmental actor is exercising a power of "citizen's arrest" pursuant to s 494 of the Criminal Code? The issue is unresolved—some courts have decided that the Charter does apply to a citizen's arrest; others have concluded that it does not. Which view is more consistent with Slaight, Blencoe, or the overall purposes of the Charter? The Alberta Court of Appeal has found that the Charter applies on the ground that a citizen conducting an arrest is exercising a delegated government function: see R v Lerke, 1986 ABCA 15; R v Dell, 2005 ABCA 246. In R v Skeir, 2005 NSCA 86 (leave to appeal to the SCC denied), the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal considered and rejected the Alberta Court of Appeal's approach in Lerke. In the Court's view, s 494 of the Criminal Code does not amount to "an express delegation nor an abandonment in whole or part, of the police arrest power to private security officers" (at para 21). Moreover, the Supreme Court of Canada's approach in Buhay, above, was found to lend support to the view that a "private security guard's arrest function may be subject to the Charter only if, after a case specific analysis, it is determined that he acted as a state or police agent" (at para 18).

III. GOVERNMENT INACTION AND GOVERNMENT RESPONSIBILITY

Section 32 provides that the Charter applies to all matters within the authority of the federal and provincial governments. If a Charter right or freedom requires the fulfillment of a positive obligation, the Charter will apply to inaction on the part of the government with jurisdiction to meet that obligation. Thus, for example, if a province fails to fund minority language educational facilities in accordance with its obligations pursuant to s 23 of the Charter, its inaction will be subject to the Charter: see Arsenault-Cameron v Prince Edward Island, 2000 SCC 1; Mahe v Alberta, [\[1990\] 1 SCR 342, 1990 CanLII 133](#), found in Chapter 24, Language Rights. Since most Charter provisions impose a mix of positive and negative obligations on government, inaction may be the subject of Charter scrutiny in a variety of contexts.

Sometimes the state may be seen as responsible for, or implicated, in private wrongs to such an extent that it is considered itself to have breached a Charter right. The Vriend case, which follows, contains a discussion of the issue in the context of equality rights.

[This case involved a challenge to the omission of sexual orientation from Alberta's Individual's Rights Protection Act (IRPA). The general scheme of the IRPA, like similar legislation in all other provinces, was to prohibit discrimination in public life, and to establish a commission for enforcement. More particularly, it prohibited discrimination in public notices, public services, rentals, and employment or trade union membership on the basis of race, religious beliefs, colour, sex, marital status, age, and ancestry or place of origin. Sexual orientation was not included among the prohibited grounds, and the legislative history demonstrated clearly that the omission was deliberate.]

Vriend was an employee of King's College, a Christian educational institution. His employers asked him about his sexual orientation and dismissed him after he affirmed that he was gay. His attempt to file a complaint under the Act was rejected because of the omission. He then brought this action for a declaration that the omission offended the Charter, and he was joined by several supporting groups. The Supreme Court found that the omission violated Vriend's equality rights and held that the words "sexual orientation" should be read into the relevant provisions of the Act. Below are excerpts from Cory J's discussion of why the Charter applies to the legislative omission at issue. Further discussion of the Vriend ruling can be found in Chapter 23 and Chapter 25, Enforcement of Rights.]

CORY J (Lamer CJ and Gonthier, McLachlin, Iacobucci, and Bastarache JJ concurring):

[50] Does s. 32 of the Charter prohibit consideration of a s. 15 violation when that issue arises from a legislative omission?

[52] This issue is resolved simply by determining whether the subject of the challenge in this case is one to which the Charter applies pursuant to s. 32. Questions relating to the nature of the legislature's decision, its effect, and whether it is neutral, are relevant instead to the s. 15 analysis. The threshold test demands only that there is some "matter within the authority of the legislature" which is the proper subject of a Charter analysis. ...

[53] Further confusion results when arguments concerning the respective roles of the legislature and the judiciary are introduced into the s. 32 analysis. These arguments put forward the position that courts must defer to a decision of the legislature not to enact a particular provision, and that the scope of Charter review should be restricted so that such decisions will be unchallenged. I cannot accept this position. Apart from the very problematic distinction it draws between legislative action and inaction, this argument seeks to substantially alter the nature of considerations of legislative deference in Charter analysis. The deference very properly due to the choices made by the legislature will be taken into account in deciding whether a limit is justified under s. 1 and again in determining the appropriate remedy for a Charter breach. ...

[59] The respondents contend that a deliberate choice not to legislate should not be considered government action and thus does not attract Charter scrutiny. This submission should not be accepted. They assert that there must be some "exercise" of "s. 32 authority" to bring the decision of the legislature within the purview of the Charter. Yet there is nothing either in the text of s. 32 or in the jurisprudence concerned with the application of the Charter which requires such a narrow view of the Charter's application.

[60] The relevant subsection, s. 32(1)(b), states that the Charter applies to "the legislature and government of each province in respect of all matters within the authority of the legislature of each province." There is nothing in that wording to suggest that a positive act encroaching on rights is required; rather the subsection speaks only of matters within the authority of the legislature. Dianne Pothier has correctly observed that s. 32 is "worded broadly enough to cover positive obligations on a legislature such that the Charter will be engaged even if the legislature refuses to exercise its authority" ("The Sounds of Silence: Charter Application When the Legislature Declines to Speak" (1996), 7 Constitutional Forum 113, at p. 115). The application of the Charter is not restricted to situations where the government actively encroaches on rights.

[61] The IRPA is being challenged as unconstitutional because of its failure to protect Charter rights, that is to say its underinclusiveness. The mere fact that the challenged aspect of the Act is its underinclusiveness should not necessarily render the Charter inapplicable. If an omission were not subject to the Charter, underinclusive legislation which was worded in such a way as to simply omit one class rather than to explicitly exclude it would be immune from Charter challenge. If this position was accepted, the form, rather than the substance, of the legislation would determine whether it was open to challenge. This result would be illogical and more importantly unfair. Therefore, where, as here, the challenge concerns an Act of the legislature that is underinclusive as a result of an omission, s. 32 should not be interpreted as precluding the application of the Charter.

[62] It might also be possible to say in this case that the deliberate decision to omit sexual orientation from the provisions of the IRPA is an "act" of the Legislature to which the Charter should apply. This argument is strengthened and given a sense of urgency by the considered and specific positive actions taken by the government to ensure that those discriminated against on the grounds of sexual orientation were excluded from the protective procedures of the Human Rights Commission. However, it is not necessary to rely on this position in order to find that the Charter is applicable.

[63] It is also unnecessary to consider whether a government could properly be subjected to a challenge under s. 15 of the Charter for failing to act at all, in contrast to a case such as this where it acted in an underinclusive manner. It has been held that certain provisions of the Charter, for example those dealing with minority language rights (s. 23), do indeed require a government to take positive actions to ensure that those rights are respected . . . [Emphasis in original.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The Court apparently felt able to treat the omission as a state act first because the inclusion of sexual orientation had become the norm in human rights codes, and second, because the legislative record showed that the government had specifically decided not to include this ground—in other words, the omission was not simply an oversight. But what if the Alberta government had decided to include only some grounds of discrimination, such as race and religion, but not others? What if it had decided to repeal the Act entirely? At what point can we say that the failure to prohibit private sector discrimination is an act of the state contrary to s 15?

Richard Moon, in "Discrimination and Its Justification: Coping with Equality Rights Under the Charter" (1988) 26:4 Osgoode Hall LJ 673, points out that the state action doctrine does not apply easily to s 15, when the right is understood as ban on effects discrimination (at 703):

Even if the issue of constructive discrimination arises in the context of a legal action which involves a limited number of parties and focuses on the legitimacy of a particular law, the investigation of the court inevitably takes it beyond a simple examination of the provisions of the particular law and the effect of that law on the particular parties. The courts must assess the position of the group in society: is the group "discrete and insular" or generally in a disadvantaged position in relation to the rest of the community? A decision on this will require the courts to examine the wider social system and the overall distribution of social benefits. A particular law triggers review, but judicial consideration must extend to the general system of laws.

For further discussion, see the treatment of adverse impact discrimination in Chapter 23.

2. The courts have held on a number of occasions that once government has decided to implement a policy or program, it must do so in a non-discriminatory manner. Thus Vriend can be seen as simply confirming the view that "underinclusive" government laws or programs can be subject to Charter review: see, for example, Schachter v Canada, [1992] 2 SCR 679, 1992 CanLII 74; Tétreault-Gadoury v Canada (Employment and Immigration Commission), [1991] 2 SCR 22, 1991 CanLII 12; Eldridge. There is, by contrast, little judicial support for the view that s 15 imposes positive obligations on governments to initiate action against inequalities.

3. The courts have typically characterized the fundamental freedoms in s 2 of the Charter as being purely negative in character, imposing no positive obligations on the state. For example, the traditional view of freedom of expression is that it "prohibits gags, but does not compel the distribution of megaphones" (Haig v Canada; Haig v Canada (Chief Electoral Officer), [1993] 2 SCR 995 at 1035, 1993 CanLII 58 per L'Heureux-Dubé J). In some situations, however, exclusion from an established government program that supports expression may be experienced as censorship. Imagine a situation in which a private citizen physically interferes with a street corner speaker because they disagree with the speaker's views, and a police officer witnesses this but declines to intervene because they also oppose the speaker's views. Would we say that the failure by the police officer to protect the expression rights (and physical welfare) of the speaker counts as a breach of freedom of expression, even though the officer has taken no action?

However, in Dunmore v Ontario (AG), 2001 SCC 94, found in Chapter 21, the Supreme Court departed to some degree from this traditional view. The Court suggested that governments may have positive obligations to protect the freedom of association of vulnerable groups. At issue in Dunmore was labour legislation that excluded agricultural workers from the right to form a trade union and bargain collectively with their employers. The Court found that the exclusion violated freedom of association. Justice Bastarache, writing for the majority, asked whether the vulnerability of workers meant:

[20] ... in order to make the freedom to organize meaningful, s. 2(d) of the Charter imposes a positive obligation on the state to extend protective legislation to unprotected groups. More broadly, it may be asked whether the distinction between positive and negative state obligations ought to be nuanced in the context of labour relations, in the sense that excluding agricultural workers from a protective regime substantially contributes to the violation of protected freedoms.

He went on to reject the argument that the state has no obligation to facilitate the exercise of associational freedoms:

[26] ... In this case, it is said that the inability to form an association is the result of private action and that mandating inclusion in a statutory regime would run counter to this Court's decision in Dolphin Delivery However, it should be noted that this Court's understanding of "state action" has matured since the Dolphin Delivery case and may mature further in light of evolving Charter values. For example, this Court has repeatedly held that the contribution of private actors to a violation of fundamental freedoms does not immunize the state from Charter review; rather, such contributions should be considered part of the factual context in which legislation is reviewed. . . . Moreover, this Court has repeatedly held in the s. 15(1) context that the Charter may oblige the state to extend underinclusive statutes to the extent underinclusion licenses private actors to violate basic rights and freedoms Finally, there has been some suggestion that the Charter should apply to legislation which "permits" private actors to interfere with protected s. 2 activity, as in some contexts mere permission may function to encourage or support the act which is called into question. . . . If we apply these general principles to s. 2(d), it is not a quantum leap to suggest that a failure to include someone in a protective regime may affirmatively permit restraints on the activity the regime is designed to protect. The rationale behind this is that underinclusive state action falls into suspicion not simply to the extent it discriminates against an unprotected class, but to the extent it substantially orchestrates, encourages or sustains the violation of fundamental freedoms. [Emphasis in original.]

Justice Bastarache was quick to add that his comments should not be taken as suggesting that the state is obliged to act where it has not already legislated:

[29] . . . One must always guard against reviewing legislative silence, particularly where no legislation has been enacted in the first place. By the same token, it must be remembered why the Charter applies to legislation that is underinclusive. Once the state has chosen to regulate a private relationship such as that between employer and employee, I believe it is unduly formalistic to consign that relationship to a "private sphere" that is impervious to Charter review.

Is the distinction Bastarache J draws between legislative silence and underinclusive legislation persuasive? If underinclusive legislation can substantially interfere with the freedom to organize of excluded groups, as Bastarache J held in Dunmore, why would a complete failure to recognize associational freedom be less damaging?

IV. APPLICATION OF THE CHARTER TO COURTS, THE COMMON LAW, AND THE EXERCISE OF ADMINISTRATIVE DISCRETION

In Dolphin Delivery, the Supreme Court stated that the courts were not part of government for the purposes of s 32(1) of the Charter. This proposition makes little sense and has since been generally ignored. If the Charter did not apply to the courts, a number of the Charter's provisions, like the right to a fair trial within a reasonable time, would be impossible to enforce.

Dolphin Delivery also stands for the proposition that the Charter does not apply to the common law when relied on by private litigants, nor does it apply to a court order issued at the conclusion of litigation between private parties resolved on the basis of the common law. These aspects of the ruling have been followed. Their significance, however, appears to be dwindling as the courts become more comfortable with the notion, also emanating from Dolphin Delivery, that the common law needs to be applied and developed in a manner consistent with Charter values.

A. THE APPLICATION OF THE CHARTER ON THE COMMON LAW

In Dolphin Delivery, not only did the Court decide that the Charter did not apply to private action (as noted earlier), it also held that the Charter did not apply to the common law rules when relied on by a private litigant.

RWDSU v Dolphin Delivery Ltd

[At issue was the validity of a court order restraining the appellant union from picketing the premises of the respondent company, Dolphin Delivery. Union members were engaged in a labour dispute with their employer, Purolator, and they wished to picket Dolphin Delivery's premises on the grounds that the company was related to Purolator and was performing work for Purolator during the strike. Because the applicable labour legislation, the Canada Labour Code, did not regulate "secondary picketing," the legality of the proposed picketing fell to be determined by the common law. Relying on the common law tort of inducing breach of contract, a BC court issued an injunction to restrain the picketing. On appeal, the union sought to have the injunction overturned on the ground that it violated its members' freedom of expression. The BC Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal and the union appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada.]

Writing for the majority, McIntyre J held that peaceful picketing enjoyed protection pursuant to s 2(b). He went on to conclude that Dolphin Delivery was not related to Purolator, and therefore an injunction to restrain the union from picketing Dolphin Delivery's premises was a reasonable limit on expressive freedoms that could be justified pursuant to s 1. These aspects of the decision are dealt with further in Chapter 20. While the conclusion on infringement of freedom of expression was sufficient to dismiss the appeal, McIntyre J went on to discuss whether the Charter even applied to the dispute in the first place.

He began by asking whether the Charter applied to the common law. Relying on the text of s 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982, he gave this question an affirmative response (at para 25):

In my view, there can be no doubt that it does apply. ... The English text [of s 52] provides that "any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect." If this language is not broad enough to include the common law, it should be observed as well that the French text adds strong support to this conclusion in its employment of the words "elle rend inopérantes les dispositions incompatibles de tout autre règle de droit." (Emphasis added.) To adopt a construction of s. 52(1) which would exclude from Charter application the whole body of the common law which in great part governs the rights and obligations of the individuals in society, would be wholly unrealistic and contrary to the clear language employed in s. 52(1) of the Act.

He then asked whether the Charter applied to litigation between private parties. After quoting from a number of commentators, and relying on the text of s 32, he concluded in the excerpts below that it did not.]

McINTYRE J (Dickson CJ and Estey, Chouinard, and Le Dain JJ concurring):

[33] I am in agreement with the view that the Charter does not apply to private litigation. It is evident from the authorities and articles cited above that that approach has been adopted by most judges and commentators who have dealt with this question. In my view, s. 32 of the Charter, specifically dealing with the question of Charter application, is conclusive on this issue. ... Section 32(1) refers to the Parliament and Government of Canada and to the legislatures and governments of the Provinces in respect of all matters within their respective authorities. In this, it may be seen that Parliament and the Legislatures are treated as separate or specific branches of government, distinct from the executive branch of government, and therefore where the word "government" is used in s. 32 it refers not to government in its generic sense—meaning the whole of the governmental apparatus of the state—but to a branch of government. The word "government," following as it does the words "Parliament" and "Legislature," must then, it would seem, refer to the executive or administrative branch of government. This is the sense in which one generally speaks of the Government of Canada or of a province. I am of the opinion that the word "government" is used in s. 32 of the Charter in the sense of the executive government of Canada and the Provinces. This is the sense in which the words "Government of Canada" are ordinarily employed in other sections of the Constitution Act, 1867. Sections 12, 16, and 132 all refer to the Parliament and the Government of Canada as separate entities. The words "Government of Canada," particularly where they follow a reference to the word "Parliament," almost always refer to the executive government.

[34] It is my view that s. 32 of the Charter specifies the actors to whom the Charter will apply. They are the legislative, executive and administrative branches of government. It will apply to those branches of government whether or not their action is invoked in public or private litigation. It would seem that legislation is the only way in which a legislature may infringe a guaranteed right or freedom. Action by the executive or administrative branches of government will generally depend upon legislation, that is, statutory authority. Such action may also depend, however, on the common law, as in the case of the prerogative. To the extent that it relies on statutory authority which constitutes or results in an infringement of a guaranteed right or freedom, the Charter will apply and it will be unconstitutional. The action will also be unconstitutional to the extent that it relies for authority or justification on a rule of the common law which constitutes or creates an infringement of a Charter right or freedom. In this way the Charter will apply to the common law, whether in public or private litigation. It will apply to the common law, however, only in so far as the common law is the basis of some governmental action which, it is alleged, infringes a guaranteed right or freedom.

[35] The element of governmental intervention necessary to make the Charter applicable in an otherwise private action is difficult to define. We have concluded that the Charter applies to the common law but not between private parties. The problem here is that this is an action between private parties in which the appellant resists the common law claim of the respondent on the basis of a Charter infringement. The argument is made that the common law, which is itself subject to the Charter, creates the tort of civil conspiracy and that of inducing a breach of contract. The respondent has sued and has procured the injunction which has enjoined the picketing on the basis of the commission of these torts. The appellants say the injunction infringes their Charter right of freedom of expression under s. 2(b). ...

[36] I find the position [that the Charter applies to any court order based on the common law] troublesome and, in my view, it should not be accepted as an approach to this problem. While in political science terms it is probably acceptable to treat the courts as one of the three fundamental branches of Government, that is, legislative, executive, and judicial, I cannot equate for the purposes of Charter application the order of a court with an element of governmental action. This is not to say that the courts are not bound by the Charter. The courts are, of course, bound by the Charter as they are bound by all law. It is their duty to apply the law, but in doing so they act as neutral arbiters, not as contending parties involved in a dispute. To regard a court order as an element of governmental intervention necessary to invoke the Charter would, it seems to me, widen the scope of Charter application to virtually all private litigation. All cases must end, if carried to completion, with an enforcement order and if the Charter precludes the making of the order, where a Charter right would be infringed, it would seem that all private litigation would be subject to the Charter. In my view, this approach will not provide the answer to the question. A more direct and a more precisely-defined connection between the element of government action and the claim advanced must be present before the Charter applies.

[38] ... [I]t is difficult and probably dangerous to attempt to define with narrow precision that element of governmental intervention which will suffice to permit reliance on the Charter by private litigants in private litigation. ...

[39] It would also seem that the Charter would apply to many forms of delegated legislation, regulations, orders in council, possibly municipal by-laws, and by-laws and regulations of other creatures of Parliament and the Legislatures. It is not suggested that this list is exhaustive. Where such exercise of, or reliance upon, governmental action is present and where one private party invokes or relies upon it to produce an infringement of the Charter rights of another, the Charter will be applicable. Where, however, private party "A" sues private party "B" relying on the common law and where no act of government is relied upon to support the action, the Charter will not apply. I should make it clear, however, that this is a distinct issue from the question whether the judiciary ought to apply and develop the principles of the common law in a manner consistent with the fundamental values enshrined in the Constitution. The answer to this question must be in the affirmative. In this sense, then, the Charter is far from irrelevant to private litigants whose disputes fall to be decided at common law. But this is different from the proposition that one private party owes a constitutional duty to another, which proposition underlies the purported assertion of Charter causes of action or Charter defences between individuals.

[41] In the case at bar ... we have no offending statute. We have a rule of the common law which renders secondary picketing tortious and subject to injunctive restraint, on the basis that it induces a breach of contract. While, as we have found, the Charter applies to the common law, we do not have in this litigation between purely private parties any exercise of or reliance upon governmental action which would invoke the Charter. It follows then that the appeal must fail. ...

[Justices Wilson and Beetz each wrote concurring judgments in which they agreed with McIntrye J's treatment of the application issue, but disagreed with his reasoning on freedom of expression. Justice Beetz would have found that the picketing in issue was not a form of expression and that no question of an infringement of s 2(b) could arise. Justice Wilson would have reached a different result on the s 1 analysis.]

Appeal dismissed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The decision in Dolphin Delivery has spawned a great deal of criticism. While many commentators support the basic premise of the decision—that is, that constitutions are intended to bind governments and that the Charter applies only to governmental action—they are critical of the way in which the Court drew the line between governmental and non-governmental action. Some of the criticism has focused on the anomalies created by the decision's ruling that common law rules, when relied on by private litigants, are not subject to the Charter, whereas statutory rules governing private relationships are. The ruling creates the possibility of provincial variation in the application of the Charter depending on whether a province has codified a particular area of law—for example, libel law—or simply left the rules in common law form. As well, it raises the possibility of a significantly greater scope for the application of the Charter in Quebec than in the common law provinces, given that in Quebec the rules governing private relations are based on statute—the Civil Code of Quebec, CQLR c CCQ-1991. Numerous commentators have also pointed out the difficulty of maintaining that the courts are not bound by the Charter in the face of specific Charter guarantees that appear to be directed at courts. Others have argued that by leaving powerful private actors unchecked, the Charter cannot deliver on its promise of securing basic rights and liberties: see David Beatty, "Constitutional Conceits: The Coercive Authority of Courts" (1987) 37:2 UTLJ 183; Brian Slattery, "The Charter's Relevance to Private Litigation: Does Dolphin Delivery?" (1987) 32:4 McGill LJ 905; Allan C Hutchinson & Andrew Petter, "Private Rights/Public Wrongs: The Liberal Lie of the Charter" (1988) 38:3 UTLJ 278; Joel Bakan, Just Words: Constitutional Rights and Social Wrongs (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1997).

2. Peter Hogg, in "The Dolphin Delivery Case: The Application of the Charter to Private Action" (1987) 51 Sask L Rev 273, argues that, although it was correct in holding that purely private action should be unconstrained by the Charter, the Supreme Court drew the line in the wrong place and should have subjected the common law to the Charter to the extent that the common law has "crystallized" into a rule that can be enforced by the courts (at 279). This is the approach taken in some US cases. US courts have interpreted their Bill of Rights as applying only when there has been "state action," but in some cases have found state action when a judicial order is sought that would support the infringement of rights. Thus, in Shelley v Kraemer, the Court refused to enforce a racially discriminatory private agreement on the ground that a judicial remedy to aid private discrimination would be state action in violation of the equal protection guarantee found in the Fourteenth Amendment. In New York Times Co v Sullivan, 376 US 254, 84 S Ct 710 (1964), the common law of defamation was found to violate the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom of expression. Would this approach have been preferable to that adopted in Dolphin Delivery?

3. Is McIntyre J's narrow approach to the interpretation of s 32 consistent with the "large and liberal" interpretive principle the Court has applied to the rights-conferring provisions of the Charter? If not, what explains the difference in approach?

The significance of McIntyre J's ruling that the Charter does not apply directly to judges when developing and applying the common law in litigation between private parties has been significantly attenuated by subsequent rulings. In particular, the courts have followed McIntyre J's suggestion in Dolphin Delivery that "the judiciary ought to apply and develop the principles of the common law in a manner consistent with the fundamental values enshrined in the Constitution" (at para 39). This statement, though, raised many questions, including whether the courts' scrutiny/development of common law rules should be as rigorous as its review of statutory provisions.

B. RELIANCE BY GOVERNMENT ON COMMON LAW

The Charter will apply to the common law when it is relied on in litigation involving a government party or in proceedings initiated for a public purpose. In BCGEU v British Columbia (AG), [1988] 2 SCR 214, 1988 CanLII 3, for example, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of British Columbia, on his own motion, issued a temporary injunction restraining government employees on lawful strike from picketing a courthouse, on the ground that this interference with access to the courts constituted a contempt of Court. The union challenged the injunction as a violation of their Charter rights of freedom of expression. Chief Justice Dickson, writing for a majority of the Court, concluded at para 56 that the Charter applied to the Chief Justice's order:

As a preliminary matter, one must consider whether the order issued by McEachern C.J.S.C. is, or is not, subject to Charter scrutiny. ... Dolphin Delivery ... holds that the Charter does apply to the common law, although not where the common law is invoked with reference to a purely private dispute. At issue here is the validity of a common law breach of criminal law and ultimately the authority of the court to punish for breaches of that law. The court is acting on its own motion and not at the instance of any private party. The motivation for the court's action is entirely "public" in nature, rather than "private." The criminal law is being applied to vindicate the rule of law and the fundamental freedoms protected by the Charter. At the same time, however, this branch of the criminal law, like any other, must comply with the fundamental standards established by the Charter.

The Court concluded that the injunction did not violate the Charter.

Where a common law rule is relied on by the Crown in criminal proceedings, the Charter applies because state prosecution provides the requisite element of governmental action: see R v Swain, [1991] 1 SCR 933, 1991 CanLII 104 (common law rule permitting the Crown to raise the insanity defence over the objections of the accused found to violate the Charter); Dagenais v Canadian Broadcasting Corp, [1994] 3 SCR 835, 1994 CanLII 39 (common law rules regarding publication bans reformulated to better protect freedom of expression).

In both Swain and Dagenais, the Court did not hesitate to reformulate the common law rules at issue to bring them into conformity with the Charter. As Lamer CJ wrote for the majority in Swain:

Given that the common law rule was fashioned by judges and not by Parliament or a legislature, judicial deference to elected bodies is not an issue. If it is possible to reformulate a common law rule so that it will not conflict with the principles of fundamental justice, such a reformulation should be undertaken.

When same-sex couples across the country initiated s 15 Charter challenges to the refusal of government officials to issue them marriage licences, the courts had no difficulty finding that the Charter applied to the common law rule relied on by government officials—the rule that defined marriage as the union of a man and a woman. In the landmark ruling of the Ontario Court of Appeal in Halpern v Canada (AG), 2003 CanLII 26403, 65 OR (3d) 161 (CA), the Court found that the common law definition violated the equality rights of same-sex couples and went on to fashion a new common law definition of marriage as the "the voluntary union for life of two persons to the exclusion of all others" (at para 148). (The federal government did not seek leave to appeal this decision, or the similar decisions of several other courts of appeal, to the Supreme Court of Canada. Parliament subsequently enacted the Civil Marriage Act, SC 2005, c 33, which defines marriage, for civil purposes, as "the lawful union of two persons to the exclusion of all others." This advisory opinion is also discussed in Chapter 13, The Role of the Judiciary.)

C. RELIANCE ON COMMON LAW IN PRIVATE LITIGATION

The Supreme Court of Canada's first sustained discussion of the relevance of the Charter values to the development of the common law in private litigation is found in Hill, immediately below. As the notes that follow Hill show, the Court has since become comfortable with a somewhat bolder approach to applying Charter values to the common law.

Hill v Church of Scientology of Toronto

[This case arose as a libel action brought by Crown attorney Casey Hill against the Church of Scientology and its lawyer, Morris Manning. The action was brought in response to a press conference held by Church representatives and Manning to publicize criminal contempt proceedings, which they planned to commence against Hill. Their allegation was that Hill misled a judge of the Supreme Court of Ontario and breached orders sealing documents belonging to the Church of Scientology. These allegations were found to be untrue in the subsequent contempt proceedings.

In the libel action, Manning and Scientology were found liable at trial. Their appeal from this judgment was dismissed by a unanimous Court of Appeal, and the Supreme Court of Canada dismissed a further appeal. One of the main issues before the Supreme Court of Canada was whether the common law of defamation was inconsistent with the Charter guarantee of freedom of expression. Only the portions of the judgment dealing with the application of the Charter to libel law are included in the following extract.]

CORY J (La Forest, Gonthier, McLachlin, Iacobucci, and Major JJ concurring):

[65] The appellants have not challenged the constitutionality of any of the provisions of the Libel and Slander Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. L.12. The question, then, is whether the common law of defamation can be subject to Charter scrutiny. . . .

[91] It is clear from Dolphin Delivery . . . that the common law must be interpreted in a manner which is consistent with Charter principles. This obligation is simply a manifestation of the inherent jurisdiction of the courts to modify or extend the common law in order to comply with prevailing social conditions and values. . . .

[92] Historically, the common law evolved as a result of the courts making those incremental changes which were necessary in order to make the law comply with current societal values. The Charter represents a restatement of the fundamental values which guide and shape our democratic society and our legal system. It follows that it is appropriate for the courts to make such incremental revisions to the common law as may be necessary to have it comply with the values enunciated in the Charter.

[93] When determining how the Charter applies to the common law, it is important to distinguish between those cases in which the constitutionality of government action is challenged, and those in which there is no government action involved. It is important not to import into private litigation the analysis which applies in cases involving government action.

[95] Private parties owe each other no constitutional duties and cannot found their cause of action upon a Charter right. The party challenging the common law cannot allege that the common law violates a Charter right because, quite simply, Charter rights do not exist in the absence of state action. The most that the private litigant can do is argue that the common law is inconsistent with Charter values. It is very important to draw this distinction between Charter rights and Charter values. Care must be taken not to expand the application of the Charter beyond that established by s. 32(1), either by creating new causes of action, or by subjecting all court orders to Charter scrutiny. Therefore, in the context of civil litigation involving only private parties, the Charter will "apply" to the common law only to the extent that the common law is found to be inconsistent with Charter values. [Emphasis in original.]

[96] Courts have traditionally been cautious regarding the extent to which they will amend the common law. Similarly, they must not go further than is necessary when taking Charter values into account. Far-reaching changes to the common law must be left to the legislature.

[97] When the common law is in conflict with Charter values, how should the competing principles be balanced? In my view, a traditional s. 1 framework for justification is not appropriate. It must be remembered that the Charter "challenge" in a case involving private litigants does not allege the violation of a Charter right. It addresses a conflict between principles. Therefore, the balancing must be more flexible than the traditional s. 1 analysis undertaken in cases involving governmental action cases. Charter values, framed in general terms, should be weighed against the principles which underlie the common law. The Charter values will then provide the guidelines for any modification to the common law which the court feels is necessary.

[98] Finally, the division of onus which normally operates in a Charter challenge to government action should not be applicable in a private litigation Charter "challenge" to the common law. This is not a situation in which one party must prove a prima facie violation of a right while the other bears the onus of defending it. Rather, the party who is alleging that the common law is inconsistent with the Charter should bear the onus of proving both that the common law fails to comply with Charter values and that, when these values are balanced, the common law should be modified. In the ordinary situation, where government action is said to violate a Charter right, it is appropriate that the government undertake the justification for the impugned statute or common law rule. However, the situation is very different where two private parties are involved in a civil suit. One party will have brought the action on the basis of the prevailing common law which may have a long history of acceptance in the community. That party should be able to rely upon that law and should not be placed in the position of having to defend it. It is up to the party challenging the common law to bear the burden of proving not only that the common law is inconsistent with Charter values but also that its provisions cannot be justified.

[Justice Cory went on to discuss the importance of freedom of expression, and the protection of the reputation of the individual. He concluded that the common law of defamation reflected an appropriate balance between these competing interests. Therefore, it was consistent with the underlying values of the Charter and there was no need to amend or alter it.]

Appeal dismissed.

NOTES

1. In R v Salituro, [1991] 3 SCR 654, 1991 CanLII 17, the Court considered a common law rule that prevented the spouse of an accused from testifying against them in criminal proceedings. The common law recognized no exception to the rule of spousal testimonial incompetence even in circumstances where the spouses are irreconcilably separated and the witness spouse wishes to testify. The issue was whether the rule needed to be revised to conform to Charter values. Justice Iacobucci, writing for the Court, stated: "The Charter has played and will continue to play a central role in defining the legal and social fabric of this country ... even in the absence of legislation or government action." Courts, he wrote, should scrutinize common law rules closely to ensure that they are not out of step with the values enshrined in the Charter. At the same time, he expressed concern that the courts restrict themselves to incremental changes in the law; substantial exercises in law reform ought to be the prerogative of the legislative branch. He stated: "If it is possible to change the common law rule so as to make it consistent with Charter values, without upsetting the proper balance between judicial and legislative action that I have referred to above, then the rule ought to be changed." He concluded that the spousal incompetence rule was contrary to the dignity of witnesses who wished to testify, and that it was necessary to abrogate the rule where spouses are irreconcilably separated to better reflect Charter values.

2. In RWDSU, Local 558 v Pepsi-Cola Canada Beverages (West) Ltd, 2002 SCC 8, the Supreme Court applied the methodology set out in Hill, above, to boldly revise the common law rules regarding secondary picketing. The respondent union was engaged in a lawful strike against Pepsi-Cola, and its picketing activities had spread to "secondary" locations, including retail outlets that sold Pepsi products and the residences of Pepsi management personnel. As in Dolphin Delivery, above, the validity of the secondary picketing fell to be determined by the common law. Chief Justice McLachlin and LeBel J, in their joint judgment for the Court, began by affirming the importance of ensuring that the development of the common law is influenced by Charter values:

[18] ... The Charter constitutionally enshrines essential values and principles widely recognized in Canada, and more generally, within Western democracies. Charter rights, based on a long process of historical and political development, constitute a fundamental element of the Canadian legal order upon the patriation of the Constitution. The Charter must thus be viewed as one of the guiding instruments in the development of Canadian law.

They then considered which approach to the regulation of secondary picketing would be consistent with the Charter value of freedom of expression. They rejected an approach that presumed that secondary picketing is illegal and adopted instead a "wrongful action" model that treated secondary picketing as lawful unless it involves harmful conduct that amounts to a tort or a crime. Applying these new common law rules to the secondary picketing in this case, they concluded that the secondary picketing of retail outlets was lawful. The picketing of the homes of management personnel, on the other hand, was properly restrained, because the evidence showed that it amounted to the torts of intimidation and private nuisance.

Recall from Dolphin Delivery that McIntyre J found that the proposed picketing of secondary sites by the union would be illegal and an order restraining such picketing would not violate the Charter. Chief Justice McLachlin and LeBel J distinguished the Dolphin Delivery ruling on the grounds that McIntyre J in that case had assumed that the proposed picketing would be tortious. In Pepsi-Cola, the Supreme Court refused to make any such presumption, insisting instead that Charter values required proof of tortious or criminal conduct before secondary picketing could be restricted. Compared to Dolphin Delivery, Pepsi-Cola takes a much more robust approach to protecting freedom of expression in labour disputes and to bringing the common law into line with Charter values. Pepsi-Cola is discussed further in Chapter 20, Section II.

3. The Court revisited the interaction of the Charter and the common law of defamation in Grant v Torstar Corp, 2009 SCC 61, excerpted in Chapter 20. In a marked shift from the tone of Cory J's opinion in Hill, the Court in Grant v Torstar undertook an extended critical evaluation of the common law of defamation and found that it gave insufficient protection to freedom of expression. The Court found that communications on matters of public interest, even if defamatory, are essential to proper functioning of democratic society and the search for truth. According to McLachlin CJ:

[57] The statement in Hill (at para. 106) that "defamatory statements are very tenuously related to the core values which underlie s. 2(b)" must be read in the context of that case. It is simply beyond debate that the limited defences available to press-related defendants may have the effect of inhibiting political discourse and debate on matters of public importance, and impeding the cut and thrust of discussion necessary to discovery of the truth.

To better align the common law with the constitutional value of free expression, the Court fashioned a new common law defence of responsible communication on matters of public interest.

D. ADMINISTRATIVE DISCRETION

As we saw in Section II.B.2 above, in Slaight Communications Inc v Davidson, the Court found that the order of a labour adjudicator was subject to the Charter since the adjudicator was exercising statutory powers. Similarly, in Blencoe v British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), one of the reasons the Court gave for finding decisions taken by the Human Rights Commission to be subject to the Charter was that it was exercising a statutory power of compulsion not possessed by private individuals. In Slaight and Blencoe, the Court asked whether the challenged administrative decision infringed a Charter right or freedom, and, if so, whether it could be justified under s 1 pursuant to the Oakes test.

The Court has consistently affirmed the application of the Charter to administrative decision-making, but different approaches emerged. One was the approach taken in Slaight and Blencoe, where the Court asked whether the challenged administrative decision violated a Charter right or freedom, and, if it did, went on to conduct a full s 1 analysis. A competing approach was more flexible. It recognized the power of administrative decision-makers to decide Charter questions and showed deference to decisions that fell within their statutory jurisdiction and areas of expertise.

In Doré v Barreau du Québec, an excerpt from which can be found in Chapter 17, The Framework of the Charter, the Court came down squarely on the side of the more flexible approach to the role of the Charter in discretionary administrative decision-making. Gilles Doré, a lawyer in Quebec, challenged a decision of the Disciplinary Council to reprimand him for a letter he wrote to a judge that the council found to be rude and insulting. Doré argued that the penalty violated his freedom of expression pursuant to s 2(b) of the Charter. Justice Abella, writing for a unanimous court, did not doubt that administrative decision-makers had a duty to comply with Charter values; the issue, she wrote, was “what framework should be used to scrutinize how [Charter] values were applied” (at para 24). She chose “the more flexible administrative approach to balancing Charter values” (at para 37), one that does not involve a full Oakes analysis. On this approach, the question for a court on judicial review is:

[57] ... whether, in assessing the impact of the relevant Charter protection and given the nature of the decision and the statutory and factual contexts, the decision reflects a proportionate balancing of the Charter protections at play. ... Though this judicial review is conducted within the administrative framework, there is nonetheless conceptual harmony between a reasonableness review and the Oakes framework, since both contemplate a “margin of appreciation,” or deference, to administrative and legislative bodies in balancing Charter values against broader objectives.

[58] If, in exercising its statutory discretion, the decision-maker has properly balanced the relevant Charter value with the statutory objectives, the decision will be found to be reasonable.

Applying this test to the review of the Disciplinary Council’s decision, Abella J found that the council’s decision represented a reasonable balance between Doré’s freedom of expression and the statutory objective of maintaining civility in the legal profession. As a result, she dismissed the application for judicial review of the council’s decision.

The Doré ruling was followed by the Court in Loyola High School v Quebec (AG), excerpted in Chapter 19. The case arose from a judicial review application by Loyola High School, a private Catholic school, from a decision of the Minister of Education denying the school an exemption from the required curriculum on Ethics and Religious Culture (ERC). The ERC program aimed to teach about the world's religions from a neutral perspective. Exemptions could be granted for programs the Minister deemed to be equivalent in content. Loyola High School's program sought to teach the material from a Catholic perspective. The Minister denied Loyola an exemption because its proposal was not equivalent to the ERC. In a 7–0 ruling, the Court found that the Minister's decision was unreasonable and remitted the matter to her for reconsideration.

In her opinion on behalf of four members of the Court, Abella J cited Doré as setting out the applicable framework:

[3] ... The result in Doré was to eschew a literal s. 1 approach in favour of a robust proportionality analysis consistent with administrative law principles.

[4] Under Doré, where a discretionary administrative decision engages the protections enumerated in the Charter—both the Charter's guarantees and the foundational values they reflect—the discretionary decision-maker is required to proportionately balance the Charter protections to ensure that they are limited no more than is necessary given the applicable statutory objectives that she or he is obliged to pursue. [Emphasis in original.]

As explained by Abella J, the Doré analysis seeks to determine whether an administrative decision is reasonable because it reflects a proportionate balance between the Charter protections at stake and the relevant statutory mandate. The first step is to determine whether the challenged decision engages the Charter by limiting its protections. If it does, the question is whether the decision reflects a proportionate balancing of the Charter protections at play. A proportionate balancing gives as much effect as possible to Charter protections in light of the particular statutory mandate.

Applying this approach to the facts at hand, Abella J found that the Minister's decision to deny an exemption from the ERC engaged Loyola's freedom of religion. While this decision was proportionate for most of the ERC curriculum, Abella J held that it was not proportionate to require Loyola to teach about Catholicism from a neutral perspective. The Minister failed to strike a proportionate balance between freedom of religion and the statutory objectives.

The approach taken in Doré and Loyola to the application of the Charter in administrative decision-making was confirmed by the Supreme Court of Canada in two cases involving Trinity Western University. TWU is a private Christian university that requires students, staff, and faculty to sign and abide by a Community Covenant. At the relevant time, one clause in the covenant requires community members to refrain from "sexual intimacy that violates the sacredness of marriage between a man and a woman." When it sought to open a law school, several law societies were unwilling to accredit its program. TWU sought judicial review of the decisions of the law societies of Ontario and British Columbia. The Supreme Court's disposition of these appeals is discussed further in Chapter 19.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Do you agree with Abella J's statement that the "margin of appreciation" she granted to administrative decisions in Doré is similar to the leeway available to legislatures under the minimal impairment branch of the Oakes test? Or does her approach give administrative decision-makers too much power to reach decisions that infringe Charter rights or freedoms?

2. In light of the Court's decisions in Doré and Loyola, and its earlier rulings in Dolphin Delivery and Hill, does the Charter now play a role in administrative decision-making that is comparable to the role it plays in the development of the common law? If not, how would you describe the differences in the role played by the Charter in those two legal realms?

V. TERRITORIAL LIMITS ON THE APPLICATION OF THE CHARTER

Foreign governments are not bound to comply with the Charter: see R v Harrer, [1995] 3 SCR 562, 1995 CanLII 70; R v Terry, [1996] 2 SCR 207, 1996 CanLII 199 (US police not subject to the Charter when gathering evidence in the United States later used in Canadian trials). But does the Charter apply to the actions or decisions of Canadian government officials outside Canada? Or does it apply only to decisions taken by Canadian government actors on Canadian territory?

Section 32 of the Charter does not contain a territorial limitation: it simply provides that the Charter applies to "all matters within the authority" of Canadian governments. The courts, though, have placed significant limitations on the application of the Charter to the actions of Canadian government officials outside the country, relying not simply on the text of s 32 but also on the prohibition under international law of the extraterritorial application of domestic laws and the principle of the comity of nations—that is, the deference and respect owed to the actions of a state legitimately taken within its territory.

In R v Cook, [1998] 2 SCR 597, 1998 CanLII 802, Cory and Iacobucci JJ, writing for the majority, stated:

[26] ... [T]he scope of Charter application beyond Canadian territory cannot be determined merely by reference to s. 32(1). The analysis is further conditioned by the accepted principle of international law that "since states are sovereign and equal, it follows that one state may not exercise jurisdiction in a way that interferes with the rights of other states" (Hugh M. Kindred et al., International Law: Chiefly as Interpreted and Applied in Canada (5th ed. 1993), at p. 423). In essence, the principle of the sovereign equality of states generally prohibits extraterritorial application of domestic law since, in most instances, the exercise of jurisdiction beyond a state's territorial limits would constitute an interference under international law with the exclusive territorial jurisdiction of another state.

The general rule in public international law is that a state cannot enforce its law beyond its territory. The Charter therefore cannot be used to impose Canadian constitutional standards on foreign officials and procedures. However, the Court in Cook applied the Charter to the actions of Canadian detectives in the United States. Cook had been arrested on a warrant issued pursuant to an extradition request made by the Canadian government regarding a murder he was alleged to have committed in Vancouver. When detectives from the Vancouver Police Department interviewed Cook at a prison in New Orleans, they failed to provide him with a timely notification of his right to counsel as required by s 10(b) of the Charter. Justices Cory and Iacobucci held that:

[48] ... the Charter applies on foreign territory in circumstances where the impugned act falls within the scope of s. 32(1) of the Charter on the jurisdictional basis of the nationality of the state law enforcement authorities engaged in governmental action, and where the application of Charter standards will not conflict with the concurrent territorial jurisdiction of the foreign state.

Applying this principle, they concluded that the Charter applied:

[49] ... [W]e conclude that the Charter applies to the actions of the Vancouver detectives in New Orleans in the present case. First, both the appellant's arrest and detention and subsequent interrogation were actions initiated and carried out by Canadian law enforcement officials. The arrest warrant had been granted in response to an extradition request made by Canada. The interrogation was conducted by Canadian detectives, as opposed to foreign officials, in accordance with their powers of investigation as derived from Canadian law. Thus, the impugned action falls within the purview of s. 32(1) of the Charter and the first criterion is satisfied.

[50] Second, in the particular circumstances of this case, the application of the Charter on the jurisdictional basis of nationality to the actions of the Canadian detectives abroad does not result in an interference with the territorial jurisdiction of the foreign state. In reaching this conclusion, we are relying in particular on the following factual elements: although the physical arrest was executed by a US official pursuant to US law, the arrest and the interrogation were initiated by a Canadian extradition request and related exclusively to an offence committed in Canada and to be prosecuted in Canada; the trial judge concluded at para. 15 that the United States Marshal "took great care not to become involved in the Vancouver investigation and impair it in any way [and that h]e had no intention of questioning the accused or advising him in any way"; and the interview was conducted solely by Canadian officers deriving their investigatory powers from Canadian legislation. In these circumstances, Canadian criminal law standards are not being imposed on foreign officials. Further, the application of the Charter in the circumstances to the simple questioning of the appellant by Canadian authorities does not implicate or interfere with any criminal procedures engaged by or involving US authorities.

[51] In essence, the principle of state sovereignty is not violated by the application of the Charter to the taking of the appellant's statement by Canadian authorities in the United States. In this context, it is reasonable to expect the Canadian officers to comply with Charter standards. Furthermore, it is reasonable to permit the appellant, who is being made to adhere to Canadian criminal law and procedure, to claim Canadian constitutional rights relating to the interview conducted by the Canadian detectives in New Orleans.

More recently, in R v Hape, 2007 SCC 26, the Supreme Court of Canada took a narrower approach to the Charter's application abroad. While the Court did not expressly overrule Cook, it cast doubt on its precedential value. At issue in Hape was whether RCMP officers were subject to the Charter when conducting a search and seizure in Turks and Caicos Islands as part of an investigation into suspected money laundering activities of a Canadian businessman. RCMP officers sought permission from the authorities in Turks and Caicos Islands to conduct part of their investigation on the Islands where the accused's investment company was located. The detective with the local police force, who was in charge of criminal investigations on the Islands, agreed to allow the RCMP to continue the investigation on Turks and Caicos territory, with the understanding that he would be in charge and that the RCMP would be working under his authority. In these circumstances, the Court found that the Charter did not apply. Justice LeBel, writing for the majority, put significant weight on the principle of comity:

[52] ... Comity means that when one state looks to another for help in criminal matters, it must respect the way in which the other state chooses to provide the assistance within its borders. That deference ends where clear violations of international law and fundamental human rights begin. If no such violations are in issue, courts in Canada should interpret Canadian law, and approach assertions of foreign law, in a manner respectful of the spirit of international cooperation and the comity of nations.

Justice LeBel undertook a lengthy analysis and critique of the Court's reasoning in Cook, which he described as giving rise "to a number of difficulties and criticisms, both practical and theoretical" (at para 83). In his revised approach, the Court will consider two issues: first, whether the conduct of a Canadian state actor is at issue; and second, if so, whether the challenged state action is in respect of a matter falling within the authority of the Canadian government. Because Canadian governments have no authority in a foreign jurisdiction, the Charter will generally not apply to their actions outside Canada. Justice LeBel recognized two exceptions to the non-application of the Charter to Canadian governments abroad. The first, which he framed tentatively, relates to actions that violate international human rights:

[101] ... [T]here is an argument that comity cannot be invoked to allow Canadian authorities to participate in activities that violate Canada's international obligations. As a general rule, Canadian officers can participate in investigations abroad, but must do so under the laws of the foreign state. The permissive rule that allows Canadian officers to participate even when there is no obligation to do so derives from the principle of comity; the rule that foreign law governs derives from the principles of sovereign equality and non-intervention. But the principle of comity may give way where the participation of Canadian officers in investigative activities sanctioned by foreign law would place Canada in violation of its international obligations in respect of human rights. In such circumstances, the permissive rule might no longer apply and Canadian officers might be prohibited from participating. I would leave open the possibility that, in a future case, participation by Canadian officers in activities in another country that would violate Canada's international human rights obligations might justify a remedy under s. 24(1) of the Charter because of the impact of those activities on Charter rights in Canada.

The second exception is consent of the foreign state to the application of the Charter:

[106] In some cases, the evidence may establish that the foreign state consented to the exercise of Canadian enforcement jurisdiction within its territory. The Charter can apply to the activities of Canadian officers in foreign investigations where the host state consents. In such a case, the investigation would be a matter within the authority of Parliament and would fall within the scope of s. 32(1).

Applying this approach to the facts in Hape, the Court accepted that the RCMP officers were acting as agents of the Canadian state. However, "since the search was carried out in Turks and Caicos, it is not a matter within the authority of Parliament" (at para 115). In the absence of evidence that Turks and Caicos Islands had consented to the extraterritorial application of Canadian enforcement jurisdiction (and in the absence of a violation of international human rights), LeBel J concluded that the Charter did not apply.

In Canada (Justice) v Khadr, 2008 SCC 28, the Court gave effect to the international human rights exception to the general principle that the Charter does not apply extraterritorially. Canadian officials, including agents of the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service, had interviewed Omar Khadr, a Canadian citizen, while he was detained by US forces at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The Canadian officials shared the record of those interviews with US authorities. Khadr, facing murder and terrorism-related charges laid by the US government, sought to rely on the Charter to obtain disclosure, for the purposes of his defence, of all relevant documents in the possession of the Canadian Crown. The Canadian government, relying on Hape, argued that Charter disclosure obligations did not apply extraterritorially. The Court rejected the Canadian government's position and ordered the disclosure of the records of the interviews in the possession of the Crown, as well as the disclosure of any other information given to US authorities that was obtained as a result of the interviews. In a unanimous opinion, the Court wrote:

[18] In Hape ... the Court stated an important exception to the principle of comity. While not unanimous on all the principles governing extraterritorial application of the Charter, the Court was united on the principle that comity cannot be used to justify Canadian participation in activities of a foreign state or its agents that are contrary to Canada's international obligations. It was held that the deference required by the principle of comity "ends where clear violations of international law and fundamental human rights begin" (Hape, at para. 52, per LeBel J.; see also paras. 51 and 101). The Court further held that in interpreting the scope and application of the Charter, the courts should seek to ensure compliance with Canada's binding obligations under international law (para. 56, per LeBel J.).

[19] If the Guantanamo Bay process under which Mr. Khadr was being held was in conformity with Canada's international obligations, the Charter has no application and

Mr. Khadr's application for disclosure cannot succeed: Hape. However, if Canada was participating in a process that was violative of Canada's binding obligations under international law, the Charter applies to the extent of that participation.

[20] At this point, the question becomes whether the process at Guantanamo Bay at the time that CSIS handed the products of its interviews over to US officials was a process that violated Canada's binding obligations under international law.

[21] Issues may arise about whether it is appropriate for a Canadian court to pronounce on the legality of the process at Guantanamo Bay under which Mr. Khadr was held at the time that Canadian officials participated in that process. We need not resolve those issues in this case. The United States Supreme Court has considered the legality of the conditions under which the Guantanamo detainees were detained and liable to prosecution during the time Canadian officials interviewed Mr. Khadr and gave the information to US authorities, between 2002 and 2004. With the benefit of a full factual record, the United States Supreme Court held that the detainees had illegally been denied access to habeas corpus and that the procedures under which they were to be prosecuted violated the Geneva Conventions. Those holdings are based on principles consistent with the Charter and Canada's international law obligations. In the present appeal, this is sufficient to establish violations of these international law obligations, to which Canada subscribes.

[The Court's summary of the US Supreme Court rulings in Rasul v Bush, 542 US 466, 124 S Ct 2686 (2004) and Hamdan v Rumsfeld, 548 US 557, 126 S Ct 2749 (2006) has been omitted.]

[24] The violations of human rights identified by the United States Supreme Court are sufficient to permit us to conclude that the regime providing for the detention and trial of Mr. Khadr at the time of the CSIS interviews constituted a clear violation of fundamental human rights protected by international law.

[25] Canada is a signatory of the four Geneva Conventions of 1949, which it ratified in 1965 (Can. T.S. 1965 No. 20) and has incorporated into Canadian law with the Geneva Conventions Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. G-3. The right to challenge the legality of detention by habeas corpus is a fundamental right protected both by the Charter and by international treaties. It follows that participation in the Guantanamo Bay process which violates these international instruments would be contrary to Canada's binding international obligations.

[26] We conclude that the principles of international law and comity that might otherwise preclude application of the Charter to Canadian officials acting abroad do not apply to the assistance they gave to US authorities at Guantanamo Bay. Given the holdings of the United States Supreme Court, the Hape comity concerns that would ordinarily justify deference to foreign law have no application here. The effect of the United States Supreme Court's holdings is that the conditions under which Mr. Khadr was held and was liable for prosecution were illegal under both US and international law at the time Canadian officials interviewed Mr. Khadr and gave the information to US authorities. Hence no question of deference to foreign law arises. The Charter bound Canada to the extent that the conduct of Canadian officials involved it in a process that violated Canada's international obligations.

See also Canada (Prime Minister) v Khadr, 2010 SCC 3, in which the Court applied the rationale from Khadr 2008 to conclude that the actions of Canadian officials at Guantanamo Bay were subject to the Charter.

In Amnesty International Canada v Canada (Chief of the Defence Staff), 2008 FCA 401, leave to appeal to SCC refused, [2009] SCCA No 63 (QL) (21 May 2009), the Federal Court of Appeal considered the principles set out in Hape and Khadr. Amnesty International Canada and the BC Civil Liberties Association brought an application for judicial review with respect to Afghan detainees held by the Canadian Forces in Afghanistan and the transfer of these individuals to Afghan authorities. The applicants alleged that formal arrangements between Canada and Afghanistan did not adequately safeguard detainees from a substantial risk of torture, and sought various forms of relief, including a declaration that ss 7, 10, and 12 of the Charter apply to the detainees.

Justice Desjardins, writing for a unanimous court, concluded that the Charter was not applicable to the Afghan detainees. In her view, the situation in Khadr, where a Canadian citizen was claiming access to all documents in the possession of Canadian authorities that were relevant to his defence in proceedings before a US military tribunal, "is miles apart from the situation where foreigners, with no attachment whatsoever to Canada or its laws, are held in Canadian Forces detention facilities in Afghanistan" (at para 14). While she acknowledged that the Supreme Court stated in Hape and Khadr that "deference and comity end where clear violations of international law and fundamental human rights begin" (at para 20), [t]his does not mean that the Charter then applies as a consequence of these violations.

Even though section 7 of the Charter applies to "[e]veryone" (compare with the words "[e]very citizen" in section 6 of the Charter), all the circumstances in a given situation must be examined before it can be said that the Charter applies.

After finding that the Afghan government had not agreed to the application of Canadian law to its nationals, and that the Canadian Forces were not in effective control of the detention facilities, Desjardins JA concluded that the Charter did not apply to the Afghan detainees. This did not leave Afghan detainees in a legal vacuum, she noted, since "the applicable law is international humanitarian law" (at para 36).

Do you find the Federal Court of Appeal's ruling in Amnesty International persuasive? Or, following Khadr, would you have concluded that the Canadian Forces should be bound by the Charter extraterritorially if they are participating in processes that violate Canada's binding international law obligations? See also Slahi v Canada (Justice), 2009 FCA 259 (Charter does not entitle non-citizens to disclosure of records of their interviews by Canadian government officials at Guantanamo Bay). Following Hape, Khadr, Amnesty International, and Slahi, how would you summarize the principles regarding the extraterritorial application of the Charter?

VI. WHO IS PROTECTED BY THE CHARTER?

This chapter has focused on the issue of who is bound by the Charter—that is to say, who is obligated to conform to the norms of the Charter. This final section deals briefly with the other side of the application issue—that is, who may claim the protection of the Charter. Does a corporation, for example, have rights under the Charter? The issue has been resolved on a right-by-right basis having regard to the wording of the specific Charter provision and the nature of the right in issue. Thus, s 2 of the Charter, which in guaranteeing the fundamental freedoms speaks of "everyone," has been interpreted as extending to corporations, but s 15, the equality rights provision, which refers to "every individual," has been restricted to natural persons. Even some of the rights that are framed in terms of "everyone" have been held, because of their nature, to be inapplicable to corporations. In Quebec (AG) v 9147-0732 Québec inc, 2020 SCC 32 (discussed in Chapter 17), the Supreme Court held that the protection in s 12 against "cruel and unusual punishment or treatment" does not extend to corporations. The Supreme Court of Canada in Loyola High School v Quebec considered but did not finally decide whether a religious organization has standing in its own right to bring a s 2(a) freedom of religion claim. (This case is further examined in Chapter 19.) Similarly, while some Charter rights are expressly conferred on "citizens" (s 3, voting rights; s 6, mobility rights; and s 23, minority language education rights), non-citizens may claim the benefit of other rights and freedoms conferred on "everyone," "every individual," or "any person." These aspects of the application of the Charter are dealt with as each of the rights is examined in turn in the chapters that follow.

Note also that the rules of standing will in some circumstances allow a person (whether artificial or natural) whose rights have not been infringed to raise a Charter challenge to legislation based on the infringement of someone else's rights. Thus, a corporation, in defending a criminal charge, may base a Charter challenge to the legislation under which it is charged on rights that it is incapable of enjoying, such as freedom of religion or loss of liberty. The rules of standing in Charter litigation are discussed in Chapter 13.

I. INTRODUCTION

The early efforts of European colonizers—first, the French, and later, the British—to convert Indigenous peoples to a version of Christianity sometimes involved the active suppression of spiritual practices. Cultural suppression became standard practice with the growth of European settlement and the extension of political control by colonial and Canadian authorities over lands occupied by Indigenous peoples. Notably, in the late 1800s, spiritual practices, such as spirit dancing in the Prairies and the potlatch on the West Coast, were banned by the federal government. But perhaps the most significant programs of cultural suppression was the residential school system, which involved the forcible removal of Indigenous children from their families and communities, placing them in state-sanctioned residential Christian schools where they were prevented from speaking their language and engaging in cultural practices.

Yet the country's early history, as discussed in Chapter 3, From Contact to Confederation, was also marked by significant acts of religious tolerance. With the conquest of Quebec by the British in the mid-18th century, a Protestant monarch came to rule over the French Catholic population. However, under the Treaty of Paris, 1763, the British government agreed that the French Catholic inhabitants of Canada would retain the right to practise their religion. The Quebec Act, 1774 of the British Parliament formally extended to colonists the right to maintain the French language, the civil law system, and the Roman Catholic faith. The British government's motives in this were entirely pragmatic—to ensure stability and loyalty at a time of American revolutionary fervour.

Under the Constitution Act, 1867 (originally the British North America Act, 1867 [BNA Act]), provincial assemblies were given jurisdiction over culture, family, charitable organizations, and civil obligations, while the federal Parliament was given the power to establish and maintain a general economic infrastructure and to ensure public order and security. In this way, the federal system ensured the continuation and protection of some religious and cultural diversity in the country. The BNA Act also established certain rights for minority religious schools. While s 93 of the BNA Act gave the provinces jurisdiction in relation to education, it also protected the rights of dissentient schools in Ontario (principally, Roman Catholic schools) and Protestant and Roman Catholic schools in Quebec that existed at the time of Confederation. The recognition of Roman Catholic school rights was one of the terms of entry into the union of Manitoba in 1870 and Saskatchewan and Alberta in 1905.

The political accommodation between Roman Catholic and Protestant communities, while imperfect and precarious, shaped the national response to growing religious plurality in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. This response protected individual liberty in religious practice, but also the pragmatic accommodation of certain non-denominational Christian practices. In the late 1800s and early 1900s, the government of Canada, seeking to attract settlers to the western part of the country, agreed to exempt certain religious groups from public obligations that were inconsistent with the group's practices. For example, Anabaptist groups such as the Mennonites and the Hutterites were exempted from compulsory military service and standard schooling requirements. Yet despite the country's general commitment to religious liberty, the first half of the 20th century was marred by significant and traumatic acts of religious oppression by the state. The resulting judicial decisions helped to create a public and principled conception of religious freedom. Perhaps the most politically salient instance of religious oppression was the suppression by the province of Quebec of the Jehovah's Witness community in the 1950s.

While much of Canada's early commitment to religious freedom was simply a pragmatic compromise to ensure social peace and political stability, the Supreme Court of Canada in the post-war period, and in particular in the 1950s, sought to articulate a principled account of religious freedom. In Saumur v City of Quebec, [1953] 2 SCR 299, 1953 CanLII 3, the Supreme Court of Canada struck down a by-law that required the police to consent before distributing literature in the streets of Quebec City—obviously intended to limit proselytizing by Jehovah's Witnesses. After setting out some of the history of religious tolerance in Canada, Rand J observed in Saumur (at 327):

From 1760, therefore, to the present[,] ... religious freedom has, in our legal system, been recognized as a principle of fundamental character; and although we have nothing in the nature of an established church, that the untrammelled affirmations of religious belief and its propagation, personal or institutional, remain as of the greatest constitutional significance throughout the Dominion is unquestionable.

Justice Rand went on to hold that the provinces lacked the authority, under the constitutional division of powers, to restrict religious freedom and other fundamental rights (at 329):

[L]egislation "in relation" to religion and its profession is not a local or private matter ... : the dimensions of this interest are nationwide; ... it appertains to a boundless field of ideas, beliefs and faiths with the deepest roots and loyalties; a religious incident reverberates from one end of this country to the other

Justice Rand described (at 329) religious freedom as one of the "original freedoms which are at once the necessary attributes and modes of self-expression of human beings and the primary conditions of their community life within a legal order."

In Chaput v Romain, [1955] SCR 834, 1955 CanLII 74, the Quebec provincial police "broke up," without a warrant, a religious meeting in a private home, seizing bibles and other religious literature. The Supreme Court of Canada found that the police action breached a criminal prohibition against obstructing a minister conducting a religious meeting. In reaching this conclusion, Taschereau J declared that in Canada there is no state religion and that all denominations enjoy the same freedom of speech and thought: for more on the history of religious freedom in Canada, see Richard Moon, "Introduction" in Freedom of Conscience and Religion (Toronto: Irwin Law, 2014).

Although religious tolerance in Canada may initially have been based on pragmatic considerations, and conceived to ensure social peace or stability, the protection of freedom of conscience and religion in the Charter is now understood as a principled right—an aspect of the individual's basic liberty and, more particularly, the right to hold and live in accordance with fundamental spiritual or moral commitments. As you read the cases in this chapter, be alert to the extent to which religious freedom is grounded on both practical and principled concerns and requires pragmatic and context-based trade-offs between spiritual claims and civic interests. The same concerns about social peace that lay behind the earlier extension of religious tolerance in Canada may continue to play an important contemporary role.

A. A JUSTIFICATION FOR RELIGIOUS FREEDOM

The story of religious freedom in the West begins with the religious wars that disrupted Europe in the 16th and early 17th centuries. It was in this context that writers such as John Locke sought to develop a principled argument for religious tolerance. They argued not just that religious tolerance (rather than state-enforced religious conformity) was the better route to social peace, but also that it was morally required. At the centre of their principled defence of religious tolerance was the claim that spiritual matters lay within the sphere of individual conscience—the individual's divinely endowed capacity to recognize spiritual truth.

John Locke's Four Letters Concerning Toleration (1685) is regarded as the foundational defence of religious tolerance and freedom in the West. As you will see in the materials that follow, the Supreme Court of Canada referred to Locke's central arguments, and partly relied on them, in R v Big M Drug Mart, [1985] 1 SCR 295, 1985 CanLII 69, the Court's first religious freedom decision under the Charter—a decision in which the Court sought to articulate the theoretical basis for the freedom. Locke argued that it was essential "to distinguish exactly the business of civil government from that of religion and to settle the just bounds that lie between the one and the other." He insisted that the state should concern itself only with "civil interests" such as life, liberty, health, and property. The authority of the state, argued Locke, did not extend to spiritual matters—"the salvation of the soul"—that lay within the exclusive domain of the individual. This was so for several related reasons. The government, said Locke, ought not to concern itself with the individual's spiritual welfare because it had not been given authority in this matter. The individual was responsible for their own spiritual welfare and could not delegate this responsibility to anyone else because religious belief depended on "inner persuasion":

[N]o man can so far abandon the care of his own salvation as blindly to leave to the choice of any other, whether prince or subject, to prescribe to him what faith or worship he shall embrace. For no man can, if he would, conform his faith to the dictates of another. All the life and power of true religion consist in the inward and full persuasion of the mind; and faith is not faith without believing.

Locke observed that the power of government was exercised through coercion. But coercive power, he noted, was ineffective in spiritual matters. A government could require its citizens to conform to certain standards in their outward behaviour, but it could not compel them to embrace spiritual truth—to sincerely believe. According to Locke: "It is only light and evidence that can work a change in men's opinions." Locke added that it might be an offence to God when individuals worshiped him in the correct form without "inward sincerity."

Locke supplemented this argument about the nature of religious commitment with other practical considerations. He noted, for example, that even if the government could change people's minds through coercion, there was no reason to think that the faith it was imposing was the true one. While "princes" might have particular skill or knowledge in civil matters, their spiritual judgment was not superior to that of other people. After all, there were many different "princes" (or governments) in Europe, and each seemed to hold a different view about the true faith. They could not all be right. Moreover, said Locke, although governments might often be able to correct their mistakes in civil matters, they did not have the power to correct their spiritual mistakes. If the government forced the wrong religion on its citizens, the otherworldly consequences of its error would be borne exclusively by its citizens and the government could do nothing to mitigate their spiritual loss or injury.

B. RELIGIOUS FREEDOM UNDER THE CHARTER

The Canadian courts initially described the s 2(a) guarantee of freedom of conscience and religion as entailing the liberty to hold, and live in accordance with, spiritual or other fundamental beliefs without state interference. Freedom of religion, understood as a liberty, precludes the state from compelling an individual to engage in a religious practice and from restricting their religious practice without a legitimate public reason. Religious freedom then has two dimensions—the freedom to practise religion without interference by the state (the freedom to religion), and the freedom from state compulsion to follow a religious practice (the freedom from religion). At an earlier time, when most individuals adhered to a particular religious belief system, these two dimensions were closely tied. In seeking to advance its conception of religious truth or to ensure social stability through religious conformity, a state might both compel the “correct” or dominant religious practice and prohibit “erroneous” practices. However, the tie between these two dimensions of the freedom has been loosened with the expansion of non-religious or agnostic perspectives in the community. Indeed, as we shall see, most of the recent challenges against state support for a religious practice have been brought by non-believers who object not to the preference of one religion over another, but to any form of state support for religion.

In later court judgments, however, there has been a shift in the way courts describe the interest protected by religious freedom. The courts have said that the freedom does not simply protect against state coercion in matters of religion or conscience; it also requires that the state treat religious belief systems or communities in an equal or even-handed manner. The state must not support or prefer the practices and beliefs of one religious group over those of another. The requirement of state neutrality was most clearly affirmed in the unanimous judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in Mouvement laïque québécois v Saguenay (City), 2015 SCC 16: “[A] duty of religious neutrality on the state ... results from an evolving interpretation of freedom of conscience and religion” (at para 71). On this account, freedom of religion may be viewed as an equality right—a right to equal treatment or equal respect by the state without discrimination based on religious belief or association.

The courts’ initial account of religious freedom, as a ban on state coercion in religious matters, put the focus on the freedom or liberty of the individual. Does the introduction of a neutrality requirement—and an emphasis on inclusion and equal treatment—reflect a greater concern about the treatment and status of religious groups and associations? What does it mean for the state to be neutral in religious matters? As you read the cases that follow, consider whether the state has remained (or can remain) neutral in such matters. The most obvious difficulty with the requirement of state neutrality is that religious belief systems often have public or civic implications—they often say something about the way we should treat others and about the kind of society we should work to create. When religious belief addresses civic matters, should it be excluded (or protected) from political decision-making—that is, confined to the private sphere? What is the relationship between s 15 of the Charter (the equality guarantee that prohibits religious discrimination) and s 2(a), if the latter requires the state to remain neutral in religious matters? If s 2(a) simply protects the equality rights of religious believers, is it redundant? Or does s 2(a) protect something that s 15 does not protect; or protect the same interest, but in a different way?

C. FREEDOM OF CONSCIENCE

Section 2(a) protects freedom of conscience and religion. The term “freedom of conscience” was once used interchangeably with “freedom of religion” to refer to the individual’s freedom to hold beliefs that are spiritual or moral in character. At this earlier time, the moral beliefs of most individuals were almost invariably rooted in a religious system. However, freedom of conscience is now viewed as separate from religious freedom. While freedom of religion protects fundamental religious beliefs, freedom of conscience extends protection to fundamental beliefs that are not part of a religious belief system—to secular morality. Together, freedom of conscience and religion protect the expression of the individual’s most fundamental moral beliefs. Yet despite the courts’ formal definition of the scope of freedom of conscience and religion as encompassing both religious and non-religious beliefs, religious beliefs have been at the centre of the s 2(a) jurisprudence. Although the courts have said that freedom of conscience may be breached when the state restricts a non-religious practice, it is difficult to find cases in which s 2(a) has been successfully used to protect such a practice from state interference. Why might this be so? Non-religious conscientious belief has most often been referred to in contexts involving state support for religion, where the courts have said that both believers and non-believers should be protected from state-compelled religious practices.

One of the only reported cases in Canada in which freedom of conscience under s 2(a) was found to have been breached involved a refusal by the federal prison authorities to provide an inmate with vegetarian meals. In Maurice v Canada (AG), 2002 FCT 69, an inmate, as a member of the Hare Krishna community, had previously received vegetarian meals on religious grounds. After he disassociated himself from that community, he asked that he continue to receive vegetarian meals in the prison for moral rather than religious reasons. The prison authorities claimed that they were only obligated to provide vegetarian meals for religious reasons. The Federal Court, however, rejected this argument, noting that s 2(a) protects both religious and non-religious beliefs and practices. In the Court’s view, the prison could accommodate the inmate’s vegetarianism without difficulty, particularly since it was already providing vegetarian meals to inmates on religious grounds. The inmate’s claim was helped by the similarity of his particular practice, vegetarianism, to a recognized religious practice and indeed by the fact that he had previously been provided with vegetarian meals on religious grounds. Given the prison context, the Court may also have been willing to protect a moral practice that in ordinary circumstances is simply a private matter. Outside the prison context, vegetarianism is a practice in which the individual is free to engage and that has no obvious impact on the rights or interests of others. The state ordinarily has no direct involvement in the individual’s dietary choices. Within the prison, however, all aspects of an inmate’s life are controlled by the prison authorities. The inmate can do nothing without the support or cooperation of the state.

II. SUNDAY OBSERVANCE AND THE SCOPE OF SECTION 2(A)

The earliest s 2(a) cases to reach the Supreme Court of Canada involved challenges to federal and provincial Sunday closing laws. Sunday closing laws were initially enacted to support a religious obligation to refrain from work on the Sabbath (Sunday), the day of rest devoted to spiritual reflection and worship.

In R v Big M Drug Mart Ltd (excerpted immediately below), decided in 1985, the Supreme Court of Canada struck down the federal Lord’s Day Act, RSC 1970, c L-13 on the grounds that it interfered with freedom of conscience and religion under s 2(a) of the Charter, and that this interference could not be justified under s 1. The Act made it an offence, punishable on summary conviction, for anyone to engage in or carry on business on Sunday.

R v Big M Drug Mart Ltd[1985] 1 SCR 295, 1985 CanLII 69

DICKSON CJ (Beetz, McIntyre, Chouinard, and Lamer JJ concurring):

Big M Drug Mart Ltd. was charged with unlawfully carrying on the sale of goods, on Sunday, May 30, 1982 in the City of Calgary, Alberta, contrary to the Lord's Day Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. L-13.

Big M has challenged the constitutionality of the Lord's Day Act, both in terms of the division of powers and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Such challenge places in issue before this Court, for the first time, one of the fundamental freedoms protected by the Charter, the guarantee of "freedom of conscience and religion" entrenched in s. 2.

The constitutional validity of Sunday observance legislation has in the past been tested largely through the division of powers provided in ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Freedom of religion has been seen to be a matter falling within federal legislative competence. Today, following the advent of the Constitution Act, 1982, we must address squarely the fundamental issues raised by individual rights and freedoms enshrined in the Charter, as well as those concerned with legislative powers.

An understanding of the scheme of [the Lord's Day Act] and its basic purpose and effect is integral to any analysis of its constitutional validity. Section 2 defines, inter alia, the Lord's Day:

2. ... "Lord's Day" means the period of time that begins at midnight on Saturday night and ends at midnight on the following night; ...

Section 4 contains the basic prohibition against any work or commercial activity upon the Lord's Day:

4. It is not lawful for any person on the Lord's Day, except as provided herein, or in any provincial Act or law in force on or after the 1st day of March 1907, to sell or offer for sale or purchase any goods, chattels, or other personal property, or any real estate, or to carry on or transact any business of his ordinary calling, or in connection with such calling, or for gain to do, or employ any other person to do, on that day, any work, business, or labour.

Section 5 provides that any worker, required to work by an employer operating on Sunday in conformity with the Act, be given a substitute day of rest; s. 6 prohibits any games or performances where an admission fee is charged; s. 7 prohibits any transportation operated for pleasure where a fee is charged; s. 8 prohibits any advertisement of anything prohibited by the Act; s. 9 prohibits any shooting of firearms; s. 10 prohibits any sale or distribution of a foreign newspaper.

It is important to note that any person may be exempted from the operation of ss. 4, 6, and 7 by provincial legislation or municipal charter. The following exemptions are also contained in the legislation: s. 3—the railways may be operated for passenger traffic; s. 11—any person may do any work of necessity or mercy which covers a broad range of activities listed in subss. (a) to (x).

The Act makes it an offence punishable on summary conviction for: any person to violate the Act (s. 12); any employer to direct any violation of the Act (s. 13); any corporation to authorize, direct or permit any violation of the Act (s. 14).

The Characterization of the Lord's Day Act

(A) The Problem

There are obviously two possible ways to characterize the purpose of Lord's Day legislation, the one religious, namely securing public observance of the Christian institution of the Sabbath and the other secular, namely providing a uniform day of rest from labour. It is undoubtedly true that both elements may be present in any given enactment, indeed it is almost inevitable that they will be, considering that such laws combine a prohibition of ordinary employment for one day out of seven with a specification that this day of rest shall be the Christian Sabbath—Sunday.

[Chief Justice Dickson observed that the English Sunday observance legislation, which originated in 1677 and provided the model for the federal Lord's Day Act in Canada, had a clear religious purpose—to ensure that the fourth commandment was followed: "Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy." He also observed that the Canadian courts had previously held that Sunday observance legislation was intended to protect public order and morality and was therefore criminal law falling within the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal government.]

Purpose and Effect of Legislation

A finding that the Lord's Day Act has a secular purpose is, on the authorities, simply not possible. Its religious purpose, in compelling sabbatical observance, has been long-established and consistently maintained by the courts of this country.

The Attorney General for Alberta concedes that the Act is characterized by this religious purpose. He contends, however, that it is not the purpose but the effects of the Act which are relevant. ... [He submits] that it is effects alone which must be assessed in determining whether legislation violates a constitutional guarantee of freedom of religion.

I cannot agree. In my view, both purpose and effect are relevant in determining constitutionality; either an unconstitutional purpose or an unconstitutional effect can invalidate legislation. ...

Moreover, consideration of the object of legislation is vital if rights are to be fully protected. The assessment by the courts of legislative purpose focuses scrutiny upon the aims and objectives of the legislature and ensures they are consonant with the guarantees enshrined in the Charter. The declaration that certain objects lie outside the legislature's power checks governmental action at the first stage of unconstitutional conduct. Further, it will provide more ready and more vigorous protection of constitutional rights by obviating the individual litigant's need to prove effects violative of Charter rights. It will also allow courts to dispose of cases where the object is clearly improper, without inquiring into the legislation's actual impact.

... [T]he legislation's purpose is the initial test of constitutional validity and its effects are to be considered when the law under review has passed or, at least, has purportedly passed the purpose test. ...

... Both Stevenson, Prov. Ct. J., at trial, and the American Supreme Court, in its quartet on Sunday observance legislation [which sustained the legislation, finding no violation of either the free exercise or anti-establishment clauses of the American Constitution], suggest that the purpose of legislation may shift, or be transformed over time by changing social conditions. ... A number of objections can be advanced to this "shifting purpose" argument.

First, there are the practical difficulties. No legislation would be safe from a revised judicial assessment of purpose. Laws assumed valid on the basis of persuasive and powerful authority could, at any time, be struck down as invalid. Not only would this create uncertainty in the law, but it would encourage re-litigation of the same issues and, it could be argued, provide the courts with a means by which to arrive at a result dictated by other than legal considerations. It could effectively end the doctrine of stare decisis in division of power cases, ...

Furthermore, the theory of a shifting purpose stands in stark contrast to fundamental notions developed in our law concerning the nature of "Parliamentary intention." Purpose is a function of the intent of those who drafted and enacted the legislation at the time, and not of any shifting variable.

While the effect of such legislation as the Lord's Day Act may be more secular today than it was in 1677 or in 1906, such a finding cannot justify a conclusion that its purpose has similarly changed. In result, therefore, the Lord's Day Act must be characterized as it has always been, a law the primary purpose of which is the compulsion of sabbatical observance.

Freedom of Religion

A truly free society is one which can accommodate a wide variety of beliefs, diversity of tastes and pursuits, customs and codes of conduct. A free society is one which aims at equality with respect to the enjoyment of fundamental freedoms and I say this without any reliance upon s. 15 of the Charter. Freedom must surely be founded in respect for the inherent dignity and the inviolable rights of the human person. The essence of the concept of freedom of religion is the right to entertain such religious beliefs as a person chooses, the right to declare religious beliefs openly and without fear of hindrance or reprisal, and the right to manifest religious belief by worship and practice or by teaching and dissemination. But the concept means more than that.

Freedom can primarily be characterized by the absence of coercion or constraint. If a person is compelled by the state or the will of another to a course of action or inaction which he would not otherwise have chosen, he is not acting of his own volition and he cannot be said to be truly free. One of the major purposes of the Charter is to protect, within reason, from compulsion or restraint. Coercion includes not only such blatant forms of compulsion as direct commands to act or refrain from acting on pain of sanction, coercion includes indirect forms of control which determine or limit alternative courses of conduct available to others. Freedom in a broad sense embraces both the absence of coercion and constraint, and the right to manifest beliefs and practices. Freedom means that, subject to such limitations as are necessary to protect public safety, order, health, or morals or the fundamental rights and freedoms of others, no one is to be forced to act in a way contrary to his beliefs or his conscience.

What may appear good and true to a majoritarian religious group, or to the state acting at their behest, may not, for religious reasons, be imposed upon citizens who take a contrary view. The Charter safeguards religious minorities from the threat of "the tyranny of the majority."

To the extent that it binds all to a sectarian Christian ideal, the Lord's Day Act works a form of coercion inimical to the spirit of the Charter and the dignity of all non-Christians. In proclaiming the standards of the Christian faith, the Act creates a climate hostile to, and gives the appearance of discrimination against, non-Christian Canadians. It takes religious values rooted in Christian morality and, using the force of the state, translates them into a positive law binding on believers and non-believers alike. The theological content of the legislation remains as a subtle and constant reminder to religious minorities within the country of their differences with, and alienation from, the dominant religious culture.

Non-Christians are prohibited for religious reasons from carrying out activities which are otherwise lawful, moral and normal. The arm of the state requires all to remember the Lord's day of the Christians and to keep it holy. The protection of one religion and the concomitant non-protection of others imports disparate impact destructive of the religious freedom of the collectivity.

I agree with the submission of the respondent that to accept that Parliament retains the right to compel universal observance of the day of rest preferred by one religion is not consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians. To do so is contrary to the expressed provisions of s. 27, which as earlier noted reads:

27. This Charter shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians ...

If I am a Jew or a Sabbatarian or a Muslim, the practice of my religion at least implies my right to work on a Sunday if I wish. It seems to me that any law purely religious in purpose, which denies me that right, must surely infringe my religious freedom.

(iii) The Purpose of Protecting Freedom of Conscience and Religion

This Court has already, in some measure, set out the basic approach to be taken in interpreting the Charter. In Hunter v. Southam Inc., 1984 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145, this Court expressed the view that the proper approach to the definition of the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Charter was a purposive one. The meaning of a right or freedom guaranteed by the Charter was to be ascertained by an analysis of the purpose of such a guarantee; it was to be understood, in other words, in the light of the interests it was meant to protect.

In my view this analysis is to be undertaken, and the purpose of the right or freedom in question is to be sought by reference to the character and the larger objects of the Charter itself, to the language chosen to articulate the specific right or freedom, to the historical origins of the concepts enshrined, and where applicable, to the meaning and purpose of the other specific rights and freedoms with which it is associated within the text of the Charter. The interpretation should be, as the judgment in Southam emphasizes, a generous rather than a legalistic one, aimed at fulfilling the purpose of the guarantee and securing for individuals the full benefit of the Charter's protection. At the same time it is important not to overshoot the actual purpose of the right or freedom in question, but to recall that the Charter was not enacted in a vacuum, and must therefore ... be placed in its proper linguistic, philosophical and historical contexts.

With regard to freedom of conscience and religion, the historical context is clear. As they are relevant to the Charter, the origins of the demand for such freedom are to be found in the religious struggles in post-Reformation Europe. The spread of new beliefs, the changing religious allegiance of kings and princes, the shifting military fortunes of their armies and the consequent repeated redrawing of national and imperial frontiers led to situations in which large numbers of people—sometimes even the majority in a given territory—found themselves living under rulers who professed faiths different from, and often hostile to, their own and subject to laws aimed at enforcing conformity to religious beliefs and practices they did not share.

... Opposition to such laws [in England] was confined at first to those who upheld the prohibited faiths and practices, and was designed primarily to avoid the disabilities and penalties to which these specific adherents were subject. As a consequence, when history or geography put power into the hands of these erstwhile victims of religious oppression the persecuted all too often became the persecutors.

Beginning, however, with the Independent faction within the Parliamentary party during the Commonwealth or Interregnum, many, even among those who shared the basic beliefs of the ascendant religion, came to voice opposition to the use of the State's coercive power to secure obedience to religious precepts and to extirpate non-conforming beliefs. The basis of this opposition was ... the perception that belief itself was not amenable to compulsion. Attempts to compel belief or practice denied the reality of individual conscience and dishonoured the God that had planted it in His creatures. It is from these antecedents that the concepts of freedom of religion and freedom of conscience [came together as] the single integrated concept of "freedom of conscience and religion."

What unites [these and related] freedoms ... is the notion of the centrality of individual conscience and the inappropriateness of governmental intervention to compel or to constrain its manifestation. In Hunter v. Southam Inc., supra, the purpose of the Charter was identified, at p. 155, as "the unremitting protection of individual rights and liberties." It is easy to see the relationship between respect for individual conscience and the valuation of human dignity that motivates such unremitting protection.

It should also be noted, however, that an emphasis on individual conscience and individual judgment also lies at the heart of our democratic political tradition. The ability of each citizen to make free and informed decisions is the absolute prerequisite for the legitimacy, acceptability, and efficacy of our system of self-government. It is because of the centrality of the rights associated with freedom of individual conscience both to basic beliefs about human worth and dignity and to a free and democratic political system that American jurisprudence has emphasized the primacy or "firstness" of the First Amendment. It is this same centrality that in my view underlies their designation in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms as "fundamental." They are the sine qua non of the political tradition underlying the Charter.

Viewed in this context, the purpose of freedom of conscience and religion becomes clear. The values that underlie our political and philosophic traditions demand that every individual be free to hold and to manifest whatever beliefs and opinions his or her conscience dictates, provided inter alia only that such manifestations do not injure his or her neighbours or their parallel rights to hold and manifest beliefs and opinions of their own. Religious belief and practice are historically prototypical and, in many ways, paradigmatic of conscientiously-held beliefs and manifestations and are therefore protected by the Charter. Equally protected, and for the same reasons, are expressions and manifestations of religious non-belief and refusals to participate in religious practice. It may perhaps be that freedom of conscience and religion extends beyond these principles to prohibit other sorts of governmental involvement in matters having to do with religion. For the present case it is sufficient in my opinion to say that whatever else freedom of conscience and religion may mean, it must at the very least mean this: government may not coerce individuals to affirm a specific religious belief or to manifest a specific religious practice for a sectarian purpose. I leave to another case the degree, if any, to which the government may, to achieve a vital interest or objective, engage in coercive action which s. 2(a) might otherwise prohibit.

In my view, the guarantee of freedom of conscience and religion prevents the government from compelling individuals to perform or abstain from performing otherwise harmless acts because of the religious significance of those acts to others. The element of religious compulsion is perhaps somewhat more difficult to perceive (especially for those whose beliefs are being enforced) when, as here, it is non-action rather than action that is being decreed, but in my view compulsion is nevertheless what it amounts to.

I would like to stress that nothing in these reasons should be read as suggesting any opposition to Sunday being spent as a religious day; quite the contrary. It is recognized that for a great number of Canadians, Sunday is ... a day which brings a balanced perspective to life, an opportunity for man to be in communion with man and with God. In my view, however, as I read the Charter, it mandates that the legislative preservation of a Sunday day of rest should be secular, the diversity of belief and non-belief, the diverse socio-cultural backgrounds of Canadians make it constitutionally incompetent for the federal Parliament to provide legislative preference for any one religion at the expense of those of another religious persuasion.

In an earlier time, when people believed in the collective responsibility of the community toward some deity, the enforcement of religious conformity may have been a legitimate object of government, but since the Charter, it is no longer legitimate. With the Charter, it has become the right of every Canadian to work out for himself or herself what his or her religious obligations, if any, should be and it is not for the state to dictate otherwise. The state shall not use the criminal sanctions at its disposal to achieve a religious purpose, namely, the uniform observance of the day chosen by the Christian religion as its day of rest.

On the authorities and for the reasons outlined, the true purpose of the Lord's Day Act is to compel the observance of the Christian Sabbath and I find the Act, and especially s. 4 thereof, infringes upon the freedom of conscience and religion guaranteed in s. 2(a) of the Charter. ...

Section 1 of the Charter

At the outset, it should be noted that not every government interest or policy objective is entitled to s. 1 consideration. Principles will have to be developed for recognizing which government objectives are of sufficient importance to warrant overriding a constitutionally protected right or freedom. Once a sufficiently significant government interest is recognized then it must be decided if the means chosen to achieve this interest are reasonable—a form of proportionality test. The court may wish to ask whether the means adopted to achieve the end sought do so by impairing as little as possible the right or freedom in question.

Two reasons have been advanced to justify the legislation here in issue as a reasonable limit. It can be urged that the choice of the day of rest adhered to by the Christian majority is the most practical. This submission is really no more than an argument of convenience and expediency and is fundamentally repugnant because it would justify the law upon the very basis upon which it is attacked for violating s. 2(a).

The other more plausible argument is that everyone accepts the need and value of a universal day of rest from all work, business and labour and it may as well be the day traditionally observed in our society. I accept the secular justification for a day of rest in a Canadian context and the reasonableness of a day of rest has been clearly enunciated by the courts in the United States of America. The first and fatal difficulty with this argument is, as I have said, that it asserts an objective which has never been found by this Court to be the motivation for the legislation. It seems disingenuous to say that the legislation is valid criminal law and offends s. 2(a) because it compels the observance of a Christian religious duty, yet is still a reasonable limit demonstrably justifiable because it achieves the secular objective the legislators did not primarily intend. ...

The characterization of the purpose of the Act as one which compels religious observance renders it unnecessary to decide the question of whether s. 1 could validate such legislation whose purpose was otherwise or whether the evidence would be sufficient to discharge the onus upon the appellant to demonstrate the justification advanced.

Were its purpose not religious but rather the secular goal of enforcing a uniform day of rest from labour, the Act would come under s. 92(13), property and civil rights in the province, and, hence, fall under provincial rather than federal competence. ...

[The Lord's Day Act was declared to be of no force or effect under s 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982. Justice Wilson's separate concurring judgment has been omitted.] [Emphasis in original.]

Appeal dismissed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The Lord's Day Act prohibited individuals from working on Sunday, but did it compel them to follow a religious practice? Was the principal objection to the law that it had a religious purpose or that, in the words of Dickson CJ, it "creates a climate hostile to, and gives the appearance of discrimination against, non-Christians" (at para 97)? For a discussion, see Richard Moon, "Liberty, Neutrality, and Inclusion: Religious Freedom Under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms" (2003) 41 Brandeis L Rev 563.

2. In Big M, the Attorney General of Alberta argued that Big M did not have standing to challenge the law on freedom of religion grounds because a corporation, as a statutory creation, did not have a conscience and could not hold religious beliefs. Chief Justice Dickson replied to this argument in the following way (at paras 39-41):

Any accused, whether corporate or individual, may defend a criminal charge by arguing that the law under which the charge is brought is constitutionally invalid. Big M is arguing that the law under which it has been charged is inconsistent with section 2(a) of the Charter and ... is of no force and effect.

Whether a corporation can enjoy or exercise freedom of religion is therefore irrelevant. [Big M] is arguing that the legislation is constitutionally invalid because it impairs freedom of religion—if the law impairs freedom of religion it does not matter whether the company can possess religious belief. ...

The argument that [Big M], by reason of being a corporation, is incapable of holding religious belief and therefore incapable of claiming rights under s. 2(a) of the Charter, confuses the nature of this appeal. A law which itself infringes religious freedom is, by that reason alone, inconsistent with s. 2(a) of the Charter. ... It is the nature of the law, not the status of the accused, that is in issue.

3. In Loyola High School v Quebec (AG), 2015 SCC 12, an excerpt from which appears later in this chapter, the Supreme Court of Canada considered whether a religious organization could make a s 2(a) claim on its own behalf.

4. Other cases involving state-compelled religious practice are found below, in Section III, "Government Support for Religion."

Edwards Books and Art Ltd., excerpted immediately below, was decided by the Supreme Court of Canada a year after Big M. The case involved a challenge to the Ontario Retail Business Holidays Act, RSO 1980, c 435, a provincial law that established a common day of rest for retail workers.

R v Edwards Books and Art Ltd

[1986] 2 SCR 713, 1986 CanLII 12

DICKSON CJ (Chouinard and Le Dain JJ concurring):

In this appeal the Court is called upon to consider the constitutional validity of Sunday closing legislation enacted by the Province of Ontario sub nom. Retail Business Holidays Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 453. ...

The Legislation

The scheme of the Retail Business Holidays Act is simple. Section 1 defines "holiday" to include Sundays and various other days, including some days which are of special significance to Christian denominations, and some which are clearly secular in nature [the other days include New Year's Day, Good Friday, Victoria Day, Dominion Day, Labour Day, Thanksgiving Day, Christmas Day, and Boxing Day.] ...

Sections 2 and 7 make it an offence to carry on a retail business on a holiday, punishable by a maximum fine of $10,000. ...

Sections 3 and 4 contain a diverse array of exceptions. Most "corner store" operations are exempted by s. 3(1). Pharmacies, gas stations, flower stores, and, during the summer months, fresh fruit and vegetable stores or stands are excluded by s. 3(2) and (3). Section 3(6) exempts educational, recreational or amusement services. Prepared meals, laundromat services, boat and vehicle rentals and service are permitted under s. 3(7). Section 3(8) and s. 4 allow a municipality to create its own scheme of exemptions where necessary for the promotion of the tourist industry.

A particularly controversial exemption is contained in s. 3(4). It applies to businesses which, on Sundays, have seven or fewer employees engaged in the service of the public and less than 5,000 square feet used for such service. Its effect is to exempt these businesses from having to close on Sunday if they closed on the previous Saturday.

I agree with Tarnopolsky JA that the Retail Business Holidays Act was enacted with the intent of providing uniform holidays to retail workers. I am unable to conclude that the Act was a surreptitious attempt to encourage religious worship. ...

• • •

Freedom of Conscience and Religion Under Section 2(a)

... The Act has a secular purpose which is not offensive to the Charter guarantee of freedom of conscience and religion.

... Even if a law has a valid purpose, it is still open to a litigant to argue that it interferes by its effects with a right or freedom guaranteed by the Charter. It will therefore be necessary to consider in some detail the impact of the Retail Business Holidays Act. ...

A. The Constitutional Protection from State-Imposed Burdens on Religious Practices and Religious Non-Conformity

The Court was concerned in [Big M] with a direct command, on pain of sanction, to conform to a particular religious precept. The appeals with which we are now concerned are alleged to involve two forms of coercion. First, it is argued that the Retail Business Holidays Act makes it more expensive for retailers and consumers who observe a weekly day of rest other than Sunday to practise their religious tenets. In this manner, it is said, the Act indirectly coerces these persons to forego the practice of a religious belief. Second, it is submitted that the Act has the direct effect of compelling non-believers to conform to majoritarian religious dogma, by requiring retailers to close their stores on Sunday.

The first question is whether indirect burdens on religious practice are prohibited by the constitutional guarantee of freedom of religion. In my opinion [it is]. The Court said as much in the Big M Drug Mart Ltd. case and any more restrictive interpretation would, in my opinion, be inconsistent with the Court's obligation under s. 27 to preserve and enhance the multicultural heritage of Canadians. ... It matters not, I believe, whether a coercive burden is direct or indirect, intentional or unintentional, foreseeable or unforeseeable. All coercive burdens on the exercise of religious beliefs are potentially within the ambit of s. 2(a).

This does not mean, however, that every burden on religious practices is offensive to the constitutional guarantee of freedom of religion. It means only that indirect or unintentional burdens will not be held to be outside the scope of Charter protection on that account alone. Section 2(a) does not require the legislatures to eliminate every minuscule state-imposed cost associated with the practice of religion. Otherwise the Charter would offer protection from innocuous secular legislation such as ... a modest sales tax extending to all products, including those used in the course of religious worship. In my opinion, it is unnecessary to turn to s. 1 in order to justify legislation of that sort. ... The Constitution shelters individuals and groups only to the extent that religious beliefs or conduct might reasonably or actually be threatened. For a state-imposed cost or burden to be proscribed by s. 2(a) it must be capable of interfering with religious belief or practice. In short, legislative or administrative action which increases the cost of practising or otherwise manifesting religious beliefs is not prohibited if the burden is trivial or insubstantial

I propose, shortly, to apply the above principles to the legislation under review. First, however, I wish to consider the second form of religious coercion ... [which] involves not the freedom affirmatively to practise one's religious beliefs, but rather the freedom to abstain from the religious practices of others. The Retail Business Holidays Act prevents some retailers from selling their products on Sundays. Longo Brothers [one of the appellants] submits that these effects are identical to those which flow from any other form of Sunday closing legislation, including the Lord's Day Act, and submits that the Act thereby requires retailers to conform to the religious practices of dominant Christian sects.

In Big M Drug Mart Ltd. this Court acknowledged that freedom of conscience and religion included the freedom to express and manifest religious non-belief and the freedom to refuse to participate in religious practice These freedoms ... from conformity to religious dogma, are governed by somewhat different considerations Religious freedom is inevitably abridged by legislation which has the effect of impeding conduct integral to the practice of a person's religion. But it is not necessarily impaired by legislation which requires conduct consistent with the religious beliefs of another person. One is not being compelled to engage in religious practices merely because a statutory obligation coincides with the dictates of a particular religion. I cannot accept, for example, that a legislative prohibition of criminal conduct such as theft and murder is a state-enforced compulsion to conform to religious practices, merely because some religions enjoin their members not to steal or kill. Reasonable citizens do not perceive the legislation as requiring them to pay homage to religious doctrine. ...

In my view, legislation with a secular inspiration does not abridge the freedom from conformity to religious dogma merely because statutory provisions coincide with the tenets of a religion. I leave open the possibility, however, that such legislation might limit the freedom of conscience and religion of persons whose conduct is governed by an intention to express or manifest his or her non-conformity with religious doctrine. ... The second form of coercion allegedly flowing from the Retail Business Holidays Act has not been established in these appeals.

It therefore remains only to consider the impact of the Act with a view to determining whether it significantly impinges on the freedom to manifest or practise religious beliefs.

B. The Impact of the Retail Business Holidays Act

The Act has a different impact on persons with different religious beliefs. Four classes of persons might be differently affected: those not observing any religious day of rest, those observing Sundays, those observing Saturdays and those observing some other day of the week.

(i) Non-Observers

The Act prevents non-observing retailers who cannot fit themselves within one of the statutory exemptions from doing business on Sundays. In the absence of the Act, these retailers would be able to transact business on seven days of the week, and they would have a competitive advantage in this respect relative to [religiously observant] retailers[.] ...

... [T]he effects of the Act on non-observing retailers are generally secular in nature and do not impair or abridge their freedom of conscience or religion

(ii) Sunday Observers

The Act has a favourable impact on Sunday observers ... [who] are relieved of a loss of market share to retailers who would have been open for business on Sunday in the absence of the Act. ...

(iii) Saturday Observers

... [A number of] faiths may also observe Saturday as a religious day of rest, but for the purposes of the present appeals it is the effects on Jews and Seventh-day Adventists that will be considered.

The Attorney-General of Ontario submits that any disability suffered by Saturday-observing retailers is a consequence of their religious beliefs, and not of the Act. Even in the absence of the Act, devout Jews and Seventh-day Adventists would close on Saturdays. ... Consequently, it is argued, there is no nexus between the impugned law and the freedom of Saturday observers to exercise their religious beliefs. ... [The true effect of the Act, it is argued, is only to confer a benefit on Sunday observers.]

In view of the characteristics of the retail industry described in the [Ontario Law Reform Commission] Report on Sunday Observance Legislation, [1970] I find myself unable to draw such a neat distinction between benefits ... and burdens The Report refers on numerous occasions to the highly competitive nature of the retail industry, such that an increase in sales by one individual retailer occasioned by that retailer's marketing practices tends to result in significant decreases in the sales of other retailers. It follows that if the Act confers an advantage on Sunday-observing retailers relative to Saturday-observing retailers, the latter are burdened by the legislation.

A careful comparison of the effects of Sunday closing legislation on different religious groups clearly demonstrates the manner in which the burden flows from the legislation. In the absence of legislative intervention, the Saturday observer and the Sunday observer ... [b]oth might operate for a maximum of six days each week. Both would be disadvantaged relative to non-observing retailers who would have the option of a seven-day week. On this account, however, they would have no complaint cognizable in law since the disability would be one flowing exclusively from their religious tenets: I agree ... that the state is normally under no duty under s. 2(a) to take affirmative action to eliminate the natural costs of religious practices. But, exemptions aside, the Retail Business Holidays Act has the effect of leaving the Saturday observer at the same natural disadvantage relative to the non-observer and adding the new, purely statutory disadvantage of being closed an extra day relative to the Sunday observer. Just as the Act makes it less costly for Sunday observers to practise their religious beliefs, it thereby makes it more expensive for some Jewish and Seventh-day Adventist retailers to practise theirs.

... [I] do not think that the competitive pressure on non-exempt retailers to abandon the observance of a Saturday Sabbath can be characterized as insubstantial or trivial. It follows that their freedom of religion is abridged by the Act.

Finally, I note that the Act also imposes a burden on Saturday-observing consumers. For [many persons], the weekend is a time to do the things one did not have time to do during the week. The Act does not impair the ability of Sunday observers to go shopping or seek professional services on Saturdays, but it does circumscribe that of the Saturday observer on Sundays. Although there is no evidence before the Court of the degree to which shopping variety is restricted on Sundays, I am prepared to assume for the purposes of these appeals that the burden on Saturday-observing consumers is substantial and constitutes an abridgment of their religious freedom. ...

... I regard as self-evident the desirability of [a common pause day]. ... A family visit to an uncle or a grandmother, the attendance of a parent at a child's sports tournament, a picnic, a swim, or a hike in the park on a summer day, or a family expedition to a zoo, circus, or exhibition—these, and hundreds of other leisure activities are amongst the simplest but most profound joys that any of us can know. The aim of protecting workers, families and communities from a diminution of opportunity to experience the fulfilment offered by [family] activities, and from the alienation of the individual from his or her closest social bonds, is not one which I regard as unimportant or trivial. ... I am satisfied that the Act is aimed at a pressing and substantial concern. ...

The requirement of rational connection calls for an assessment of how well the legislative garment has been tailored to suit its purpose. In the context of the Retail Business Holidays Act two questions are raised. First, is it acceptable for the legislature to have focused exclusively on the retail industry? Second, is the scheme of exemptions within the Act, as between types of retail business, justifiable?

... [T]he [Ontario] Law Reform Commission ... told of competitive pressures forcing individual operators to extend their hours of business, largely against their wishes. [Its r]eport also documented the characteristics of the retail trade's labour force, including its low level of unionization, its high proportion of women, and its generally heterogeneous composition: p. 103. The Commission's conclusion that this labour force was especially vulnerable to subtle and overt pressure from its employers amply justified on the evidence the legislature's decision to single out the retail industry for special and immediate attention.

The exemptions for various types of business are also justifiable. ...

... [I]n regulating industry or business it is open to the legislature to restrict its legislative reforms to sectors in which there appear to be particularly urgent concerns or to constituencies that seem especially needy. ...

A more difficult question—and one which goes to the heart of this litigation—is whether the Retail Business Holidays Act abridges the freedom of religion of Saturday observers as little as is reasonably possible. Section 3(4) [was intended to] very substantially reduc[e] the impact of the Act on those religious groups for whom Saturday is a Sabbath. What must be decided, however, is whether there is some reasonable alternative scheme which would allow the province to achieve its objective with fewer detrimental effects on religious freedom.

One suggestion was that the objective of protecting workers from involuntary Sunday labour could be achieved by ... conferring on workers a right to refuse Sunday work. But such a scheme would in my view fall far short of achieving the objectives of the Retail Business Holidays Act. It would fail to recognize the subtle coercive pressure which an employer can exert on an employee. The vulnerability of retail employees makes them an improbable group to resist such pressures. ...

The other alternative would be to ... replace s. 3(4) with a complete exemption from s. 2 for those retailers who have a sincerely held religious belief requiring them to close their stores on a day other than Sunday. ...

... I am unable to say whether one scheme results in a greater availability of Sunday shopping services to the Jewish or Seventh-day Adventist consumer than the other. In this context, I note that the Report on Sunday Observance Legislation (1970) at p. 98, Table V, discloses that only 8.1 percent of retail stores had 10 or more employees at the time of the previous census in 1961. Since, subject to the square footage requirement, the exemption in s. 3(4) is available to any store provided that at any given time on Sunday the number of persons engaged in serving the public is fewer than eight, it appears that a very substantial variety of products, including specialty products such as Kosher foods, is available to Sunday shoppers, even if the proportion of large stores were to have doubled since 1961.

The most difficult questions stem from the different impacts of these exemptions on Saturday-observing retailers. ...

[I]t is legitimate for legislatures to be concerned with minimizing the disruptive effect of any exemption on the scope and quality of the pause day, and ... it would be highly undesirable [to condition the] exemption on the hiring by retailers of co-religionists. Because of their substantial share of total sales volume ... and their numerous employees, the operation of large retail outlets on Sundays would entail a substantial disruption of the quality of the pause day. It is, however, not so much the disruption of the quality of the pause day in terms of commercial activity that concerns me. What concerns me, rather, is the limitation of its scope in terms of the employees who would be denied the benefits which the Act was designed to provide them.

What cannot be forgotten is that the object of the legislation is to benefit retail employees by making available to them a weekly holiday which coincides with that enjoyed by most of the community. These employees do not constitute a powerful group in society. ...

The economic position of these employees affords them few choices in respect of their conditions of employment. It would ignore the realities faced by these workers to suggest that they stand up to their employer or seek a job elsewhere if they wish to enjoy a common day of rest with their families and friends. ... [I]t must also be recognized that larger retailers have available to them options flowing from the resources at their disposal which are foreclosed to their employees. It is, perhaps, worth stating the obvious: a store with eight or more employees serving the public at any one time or with 5,000 square feet of retail space indeed constitutes a substantial retail operation. Such a store is not, by any stretch, a mere corner store staffed by the family. In interpreting and applying the Charter I believe that the courts must be cautious to ensure that it does not simply become an instrument of better situated individuals to roll back legislation which has as its object the improvement of the condition of less advantaged persons. When the interests of more than seven vulnerable employees in securing a Sunday holiday are weighed against the interests of their employer in transacting business on a Sunday, I cannot fault the legislature for determining that the protection of the employees ought to prevail. This is not to say that the legislature is constitutionally obligated to give effect to employee interests in preference to the interests of the store owner for large retail operations, but only that it may do so if it wishes.

I turn now to the second factor which, in my opinion, contributes to the justification of the legislation under review. ... The striking advantage of the Ontario Act is that it makes available an exemption to the small and mid-size retailer without the indignity of having to submit to ... an inquiry [into religious belief]. In my view, state-sponsored inquiries into any person's religion should be avoided wherever reasonably possible, since they expose an individual's most personal and private beliefs to public airing and testing in a judicial or quasi-judicial setting. The inquiry is all the worse when it is demanded only of members of a non-majoritarian faith, who may have good reason for reluctance about so exposing and articulating their non-conformity.

I do not mean to suggest that a judicial inquiry into the sincerity of religious beliefs is unconstitutional. ... Judicial inquiries into religious beliefs are largely unavoidable if the constitutional freedoms guaranteed by s. 2(a) are to be asserted before the courts. ... Inquiries which are genuinely designed as a means of giving effect to religious freedoms will not therefore generally be unconstitutional. There will, however, be occasions when a substantial measure of religious freedom can be achieved without mandating a state-conducted inquiry into personal religious convictions and the legislatures ought to be encouraged to do so, if a fair balance is struck.

... In my view, there exists to some degree a trade-off between a scheme which provides complete relief ... to most Saturday-observing retailers by avoiding a distasteful inquiry, and, on the other hand, an alternative scheme which provides substantial relief from burdens on religious freedom to all Saturday-observing retailers. Both schemes provide incomplete relief for the class of Saturday-observing retailers as a whole, but the incompleteness is a necessary consequence of ensuring that as many employees as possible will realize the benefits of the common pause day legislation. Both schemes represent genuine and serious attempts to minimize the adverse effects of pause day legislation on Saturday observers. It is far from clear that one scheme is intrinsically better than the other.

... In my view, the balancing of the interests of more than seven employees to a common pause day against the freedom of religion of those affected constitutes justification for the exemption scheme selected by the Province of Ontario, at least in a context wherein any satisfactory alternative scheme involves an inquiry into religious beliefs.

I might add that I do not believe there is any magic in the number seven A "reasonable limit" is one which, having regard to the principles enunciated in [R v Oakes, [1986] 1 SCR 103, 1987 CanLII 46], it was reasonable for the legislature to impose. The courts are not called upon to substitute judicial opinions for legislative ones as to the place at which to draw a precise line.

Having said this, however, I do not share the views of the majority of the United States Supreme Court that no legislative effort need be made to accommodate the interests of any Saturday-observing retailers. In particular, I would be hard pressed to conceive of any justification for insisting that a small, family store which operates without any employees remain closed on Sundays when the tenets of the retailer's religion requires closing on Saturdays. In my view, the principles articulated in Oakes make it incumbent on a legislature which enacts Sunday closing laws to attempt very seriously to alleviate the effects of those laws on Saturday observers. The exemption in s. 3(4) of the Act under review in these appeals represents a satisfactory effort on the part of the legislature of Ontario to that end and is, accordingly, permissible.

In view of the extent and quality of the abridgment of rights flowing from the legislation, I have little difficulty in applying the third element of the proportionality test. The infringement is not disproportionate to the legislative objectives. A serious effort has been made to accommodate the freedom of religion of Saturday observers, in so far as that is possible without undue damage to the scope and quality of the pause day objective. It follows that I would uphold the Act under s. 1.

BEETZ J (McIntyre J concurring):

... [I]n my respectful opinion, the impugned legislation does not violate the freedom of conscience and religion guaranteed by s. 2(a) of the Charter and, accordingly, is of full force and effect without any need to rely on s. 1 of the Charter.

In my respectful opinion [the reasoning in Dickson CJ's judgment] is flawed as it postulates that the economic burden imposed upon Saturday observers is the effect of the impugned legislation. That this is not the case is made clear when one looks at the situation which would prevail should all Sunday observance laws be repealed. A devout Saturday observer would close shop on Saturdays whereas most of his competitors would remain open all week. ... [I]n the absence of any Sunday observance law[,] he would have to choose between the observance of his religion and the opening of his business in order to meet competition.

The economic harm suffered by a Saturday observer who closes shop on Saturdays is not caused by the Retail Business Holidays Act. ... It results from the deliberate choice of a tradesman who gives priority to the tenets of his religion over his financial benefit. It is accordingly erroneous to suggest that the effect of the Act is to induce a Saturday observer to choose between his religion and the requirements of business competition. ...

... [T]his Court has made it clear that in order to constitute a violation of the freedom of conscience and religion guaranteed by the Charter, the coercion must come from the state. ...

It may well be that the true reason why the constitutionality of the Retail Business Holidays Act was challenged is the apparent advantage that it may confer upon Sunday observers whose Sabbath coincides with the common pause day prescribed by the Act. If this be the case, the challenge would then be based on s. 15 of the Charter and not on s. 2. ... But, as I have already indicated, s. 15 did not have effect at the relevant time and I abstain from expressing any view on the merits of a challenge based on this provision.

WILSON J (dissenting in part):

... [I] agree with the Chief Justice that s. 2 of the statute infringes the freedom of religion of those who close on Saturdays for religious reasons because it attaches an economic penalty to their religious observance. It requires them to be closed two days in the week instead of one.

I part company with the Chief Justice, however, on the application of s. 1 of the Charter to the "Saturday exemption" contained in s. 3(4) of the Act. It seems to me that once it is accepted that s. 2 infringes the freedom of religion of those who close on Saturdays for religious reasons, the question becomes whether that infringement can be justified under s. 1 in order that a common pause day be established for retail workers. The Chief Justice finds that it can be justified in the case of large retailers but not in the case of small. He does so, as I understand his reasons, by reference to the number of persons the larger retailer employs, on the basis that a decision made by that retailer to stay open on Sundays would deprive a larger number of employees of their common pause day than would the same decision made by a smaller retailer. The Chief Justice finds that this disparate treatment of the members of the group whose religious freedom has been infringed can be justified on the basis that they are being differentiated on the ground of size which is not a prohibited ground of discrimination.

With respect, I do not think that a limit on freedom of religion which recognizes the freedom of some members of the group but not of other members of the same group can be reasonable and justified in a free and democratic society. The effect of the disparate treatment, characterized by the Chief Justice as being based on size, is that the religious freedom of some is respected by the legislation and the religious freedom of others is not. It is this effect which, in my view, makes the legislation vulnerable to attack on constitutional grounds.

[T]he legislature must decide whether to subordinate freedom of religion to the objective of a common pause day, one scheme of justice, or subordinate the common pause day to freedom of religion, the competing scheme of justice, and, having decided which scheme of justice to adopt, it must then apply it in all cases. It cannot decide to subordinate the freedom of religion of some members of the group to the objective of a common pause day and subordinate the common pause day to the freedom of religion of other members of the same group. Yet this is the effect of the distinction between the large and small retailer adopted by the legislature in this legislation. It is, in my view, "a compromised scheme of justice." It does not affirm a principle which is applicable to all. It reflects rather a failure on the part of the legislature to make up its mind which scheme of justice to adopt. The result is, in my opinion, what Professor Dworkin refers to as "checkerboard" legislation.

It follows from what I have said that, in my view, s. 3(4) cannot constitute a reasonable limit under s. 1 of the Charter or be justified in a free and democratic society. However, if I am wrong in this and disparate treatment of this kind can be justified under s. 1, it would, in my view, require much more compelling evidence The Crown adduced no evidence to establish that permitting all retailers who close on Saturdays on religious grounds to stay open on Sundays would cause a substantial disruption of the common pause day. Nor was it established that retailers who were not motivated to close on Saturdays by religious considerations would elect under s. 3(4)(a) to close on Saturdays for the sole purpose of being open on Sundays. Economic considerations may well make such a choice unlikely. ...

[Justice Wilson concluded that the fault with the s 3(4) exemption for stores that closed on Sunday was that it did not go far enough: "It [did] not protect the freedom of religion of all those who close on Saturdays for religious reasons" (at para 210). She would have severed those paragraphs that limited the scope of the exemption to smaller retailers.

Justice La Forest wrote a concurring judgment. He would have upheld the Act under s 1 even if it had not contained the s 3(4) exemption for smaller enterprises (at para 183):

In seeking to achieve a goal that is demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society ... a legislature must be given reasonable room to manoeuvre to meet these conflicting pressures. ... In a case like the present, it seems to me, the Legislature is caught between having to let the legislation place a burden on people who observe a day of worship other than Sunday or create exemptions which in their practical workings may substantially interfere with the goal the Legislature seeks to advance and which themselves result in imposing burdens on Sunday observers and possibly on others as well. That being so, it seems to me that the choice of having or not having an exemption for those who observe a day other than Sunday must remain, in essence, a legislative choice. That, barring equality considerations, is true as well of the compromises that must be made in creating religious exemptions. These choices require an in-depth knowledge of all the circumstances. They are choices a court is not in a position to make.] [Emphasis in original.]

Appeal dismissed. Appeal by Crown allowed and conviction restored.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The claim that the Sunday-closing law indirectly restricted the religious practice of Saturday Sabbatarians raised two issues for the Court. The first concerned the type or degree of burden on religious practice that would breach religious freedom. If a law does not ban a religious practice outright, but simply makes engagement in the practice more difficult, then the impediment or burden could be either minor or substantial. As a practical matter, not every burden on religious practice can be treated as a violation of s 2(a) that the government must justify under s 1. How significant, then, must the burden or impediment be before a court will hold that it breaches s 2(a)? The second and more fundamental question concerned the state's responsibility for the "impact" on the religious practice of a law that advances an otherwise legitimate public purpose. When should the state be seen as responsible for the relative "burden on" a religious practice, and when should the disadvantage be seen simply as a "cost" of the practice, for which the state is not responsible? In deciding that the state was responsible for this burden on religious practice, Dickson CJ emphasized the differential impact of the law on Sunday observers, who were advantaged by this law, in comparison to Saturday observers.

2. The Court accepted that the objective of the legislature was not the enforcement of the Christian Sabbath, but was simply the establishment of a common pause day and that this represented a substantial and pressing purpose under s 1. Did the Christian roots of this practice, and in particular the choice of Sunday as the pause day, contribute to the majority view that the law interfered with the religious practices of those who wished to keep Saturday as the Sabbath? Was the unequal treatment of different religious practices critical to the finding of a breach of s 2(a)?

3. Edwards Books introduced a more deferential, or "reasonableness," standard into the Oakes analysis: see Chapter 17, The Framework of the Charter. In applying the minimal impairment test, Dickson CJ framed the question as (at para 131) "whether there is some reasonable alternative scheme which would allow the province to achieve its objective with fewer detrimental effects on religious freedom" (emphasis added). At another point, discussing the cut-off point for the eligibility for the exemption at para 147, he stated: "A 'reasonable' limit is one which ... it was reasonable for the legislature to impose. The courts are not called upon to substitute judicial opinions for legislative ones as to the place at which to draw a precise line." One of the "contextual" factors triggering the more deferential approach in this case was that the government's objective was the protection of a vulnerable group—retail workers. In a frequently quoted passage, Dickson CJ stated (at para 141):

In interpreting and applying the Charter I believe that the courts must be cautious to ensure that it does not simply become an instrument of better situated individuals to roll back legislation which has as its object the improvement of the condition of disadvantaged persons. When the interests of more than seven vulnerable employees in securing a Sunday holiday are weighed against the interests of their employer in transacting business on Sunday, I cannot fault the legislature for determining that the protection of employees ought to prevail.

4. Neither Big M nor Edwards Books explored in any detail the issues of how religion is defined and how religious and conscientious beliefs are distinguished from other beliefs and opinions. These issues are important because s 2(a) protects not only the right to hold and express religious and conscientious beliefs (which even in the absence of s 2(a) would be protected by s 2(b), freedom of expression) but also the right to engage in practices associated with those beliefs. It was not until 2004, in Syndicat Northcrest v Amselem, 2004 SCC 47, excerpted below in Section IV, "The Restriction and Accommodation of Religious Practice," that the Supreme Court of Canada addressed these issues.

As noted in the introduction to this chapter, freedom of religion, as it emerges from the framework cases of Big M and Edwards Books, has as its central focus the protection against state "coercion." This freedom from coercion is understood to have two sides: (1) the protection of the individual's freedom from religion—that is, the freedom from being compelled by the state to engage in any form of religious practice; and (2) the protection of the individual's freedom to religion—that is, the freedom to engage in religious practice without restriction by the state. The materials that follow explore further developments with respect to each of these aspects of religious freedom: first, state support for religion, and second, the restriction and accommodation of religious practice. As you will see, it is sometimes difficult to keep the two aspects of freedom of religion separate—state efforts to accommodate religious practice may in some cases raise issues of state imposition of religion and may be experienced as discrimination and even as disadvantaging non-believers.

III. GOVERNMENT SUPPORT FOR RELIGION

This section explores the imposition or support of religion by the state. As we saw above in Big M, the Supreme Court of Canada found that the Sunday closing requirement in the federal Lord's Day Act violated s 2(a) because its purpose was to impose observance of the Christian Sabbath.

The Canadian Charter, in contrast to the US Bill of Rights, does not include an explicit anti-establishment clause. Nevertheless, as we will see in this section, the Canadian courts have said that s 2(a) precludes the state not just from compelling an individual to engage in a religious practice, but also from supporting or preferring the beliefs and practices of one religion over those of another or preferring religion over non-religion and vice versa.

In two cases dealing with the recitation of the Lord's prayer in a public setting, Zylberberg v Sudbury Board of Education, 1988 CanLII 189, 65 OR (2d) 641 (CA) (a public school) and Freitag v Penetanguishene (Town), 1999 CanLII 3786, 47 OR (3d) 301 (CA) (a town council meeting), the Ontario Court of Appeal held that the practice of reciting the prayer amounted to state compulsion—of the students or town residents—to adhere to a religious practice, even though in both cases the affected individuals had the right or opportunity to opt out of the prayer. The Supreme Court of Canada, in its more recent judgment in Mouvement laïque québécois v Saguenay (City), held that the recitation of an ecumenical prayer (with explicitly Christian references made at the beginning and end of the prayer) at a town council meeting breached the state's duty to remain neutral in religious matters.

NOTE: ZYLBERBERG V SUDBURY BOARD OF EDUCATION

In Zylberberg, a majority of the Ontario Court of Appeal ruled that a regulation under the province's Education Act, RSO 1990, c E.2 mandating the Lord's Prayer in the opening exercises of public schools was contrary to s 2(a) of the Charter and could not be justified under s 1. Students could opt out of the practice by either remaining silent or withdrawing from the classroom during the recitation of the prayer. Nonetheless, the Court found that the purpose of the state action was religious and, following the Supreme Court of Canada in Big M Drug Mart, concluded that it breached s 2(a). The Court also found that the effect of the practice was to compel students to participate in a religious practice. The Court recognized that, in the public school context, children would feel pressure from their peers to recite the prayer—that non-participants would feel isolated or stigmatized. In the Court's view, this was enough for the prayer to be regarded as coercive—as state compulsion to engage in a religious practice. Although the children had a formal right to opt out of the prayer, they would feel significant pressure to conform to the school-supported practices of the majority community.

The Court went on to find that because the law had a religious purpose, it could not be a reasonable limit under s 1. Furthermore, the Court said that even if the pressing and substantial purpose of the law was described in more general (non-religious) terms—such as the affirmation of important values in the schools—the law did not interfere with s 2(a) rights as little as was necessary to advance this objective. The schools could advance this objective in ways other than a daily recitation of a Christian prayer. In holding that the law did not represent a minimal impairment of the religious freedom of non-Christians, the Court referred to the practice of the Toronto School Board, which involved daily readings on a rotating basis from a book of materials that drew from a wide range of spiritual and philosophical traditions. The Court did not decide that the Toronto School Board's practice was constitutional, but only that it offered a way to affirm public values in the schools that intruded less on religious freedom than the practice of reciting the Lord's Prayer.

In his dissenting judgment, Lacourcière J disagreed with the majority's application of s 2(a). Noting the omission from the Charter of any provision resembling the anti-establishment clause of the US Bill of Rights, he argued that s 2(a) "does not prohibit all governmental aid to or advancement of religion per se." In his view, the prayer was simply a "state-created opportunity to participate in [a] religious activity." Given the broad exemption granted to dissenters, it could not reasonably be said that either the purpose or effect of the regulation was to compel participation in a religious practice.

Justice Lacourcière went on to consider the application of s 15 of the Charter to both the provincial law and the practice of the Sudbury School Board of Education. He found that the provincial regulation, which required that the school day be opened or closed "with religious exercises consisting of the reading of the Scriptures or other suitable readings and the repeating of the Lord's Prayer or other suitable prayers" did not breach s 15. He could not imagine that the inclusive wording of the Lord's Prayer "could offend any religious group." He added that, even if the prayer (along with the reference to the Scriptures) was understood "to favour the Christian faith," the regulation permitted the use of other "suitable" prayers or readings. However, Lacourcière J did find that the particular practice of the Sudbury Board breached s 15. He noted that the board's practice had been to "formally open each school day by the singing of O Canada and the recitation of the Lord's Prayer, often followed by Scripture readings or Biblical stories, in order to encourage respect for the moral principles emphasized within the Judeo-Christian tradition." This practice, he accepted, breached s 15 because "it gives preference to that tradition at the expense of all non-Christians," and could not be justified under s 1 because "there are other ways, which are less intrusive on the equality rights of religious minorities, to implement religious exercises which encourage respect for moral principles."

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In Zylberberg, the Court took a broad view of coercive pressure. Even though children could opt out of the prayer, the Court found that they were under unacceptable pressure to conform. Does this apply only in the case of children? In Freitag v Penetanguishene (Town), the Ontario Court of Appeal held that the mayor's practice of opening town council meetings by inviting councillors (and, indirectly, members of the public) to rise with him and recite the Lord's Prayer violated s 2(a) and could not be justified under s 1. The following excerpt is from the Court's decision:

[24] ... The appellant conceded that he did not feel forced to stand and recite the Lord's Prayer when others did. Others have observed that he does not stand, nor does he recite the prayer. They also note that he participates in meetings and that outwardly he does not appear to be uncomfortable. However, he has deposed, without challenge by cross-examination, that he feels great pressure to stand, and as a non-Christian, he feels intimidated by and uncomfortable with the practice of having the councillors stand and recite the prayer. ...

[25] ... Because the purpose of the practice, to impose a specifically Christian moral tone contravenes s. 2(a) of the Charter, there is no need to examine the effects of the practice. However, even if one does consider the effects, the application judge erred in finding that they are trivial and insubstantial.

[33] The main factor which distinguishes this case from Zylberberg ... is that the person who is seeking the relief ... is an adult citizen attending Town Council meetings, rather than children attending school[.] ... Clearly the nature and potential effect of the coercion are much different for an adult who wishes to attend Town Council meetings than for children who are in the school environment all year with friends and teachers, and are subject to the pressures that those important relationships engender.

[34] However, in my view, the fact that the applicants in Zylberberg may be perceived as more vulnerable than the appellant in this case is not determinative of the issue. Just as children are entitled to attend public school and be free from coercion or pressure to conform to the religious practices of the majority, so everyone is entitled to attend public local council meetings and to enjoy the same freedom.

[36] In this case there is no expert evidence on the effect of peer pressure on adults. There is, however, direct evidence, first from the appellant that he feels intimidation when he attends the meeting of his local Town Council. This does not mean he is so fearful that he does not participate. He does so, but as a citizen who is singled out as being not part of the majority recognized officially in the proceedings. Because of the exclusionary practice of the council, he has also been dissuaded from running for council in an election. Second, there is the evidence from the Town's witnesses that in fact the appellant[s] ... actions are analyzed and made the subject of comment. ... Someone who chooses to object to government action which is inclusive of the majority but forces the religious minority to conform or to accept exclusion, is then subjected to further scrutiny

[39] The "subtle and constant reminder" of his difference from the majority is what causes the appellant to feel intimidated and uncomfortable at council meetings. It has also deterred him from running for a council which proclaims and identifies itself as it does. In Zylberberg, this court also found an infringement of s. 2(a) in "a broader sense." It held, at p. 655, that the need to seek an exemption from attending the opening exercises "compels students and parents to make a religious statement" ... so that the effect of the exemption provisions was to discriminate against religious minorities by stigmatizing them. The court concluded that the exemption provision, which was invoked to seek to avoid the compulsion of the infringing legislation, failed to mitigate the infringement.

[40] Similarly, the appellant is clearly stigmatized by his decision not to stand and recite the Lord's Prayer, so that the fact that he is not prohibited from making that choice does not save the Town's practice from infringing his Charter right.

[41] In my view, ... this is not a case where the effect of the Charter infringement is either trivial or insubstantial.

2. Despite the determination by Canadian courts that the recitation of Christian prayers in public schools or at municipal meetings breaches s 2(a) of the Charter, the daily session in several provincial legislatures still begins with the Lord's Prayer. The same Freitag brought a complaint under the Ontario Human Rights Code against the Ontario legislature, which opens its daily session with the Lord's Prayer. In Ontario (Speaker of the Legislative Assembly) v Ontario (Human Rights Commission), 2001 CanLII 8549, 54 OR \(3d\) 595 \(CA\), the Ontario Court of Appeal held that the opening exercises of the provincial legislature, including the recitation of the prayer, was part of its internal operation and immune from Charter and other forms of external review. It followed then that the Ontario Human Rights Commission had no jurisdiction to consider whether the practice of opening the daily session in the legislature with a recitation of the Lord's Prayer was contrary to the Human Rights Code.

In 2008, the Premier of Ontario proposed that the legislature introduce a more inclusive opening to its daily session, involving a rotation of readings and recitations from different religious and other belief systems. The government backed down from this plan, however, following a public outcry. The Lord's Prayer continues to be part of the opening exercises of the Ontario legislature, although it is now supplemented with readings and prayers from other traditions.

Mouvement laïque québécois v Saguenay (City)

2015 SCC 16

[At public meetings of the municipal council of the city of Saguenay, it was the practice of the mayor to begin each meeting by reciting the following prayer:

[TRANSLATION] O God, eternal and almighty, from Whom all power and wisdom flow, we are assembled here in Your presence to ensure the good of our city and its prosperity.

We beseech You to grant us the enlightenment and energy necessary for our deliberations to promote the honour and glory of Your holy name and the spiritual and material [well-being] of our city.

Amen.

Both before and after reciting the prayer, the mayor would make the sign of the cross while saying [TRANSLATION] "[i]n the name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit." Other councillors and municipal officials would cross themselves at the beginning and end of the prayer as well. Mr Simoneau was an interested citizen who regularly attended the municipal council's public meetings. As an atheist, he objected to the practice of reciting the prayer and lodged a complaint with the Quebec Human Rights Tribunal.

In the interim, the city of Saguenay adopted a by-law that established and regulated the recitation of the prayer, made minor changes to the wording of the prayer, and provided for a two-minute delay between the end of the prayer and the official opening of the council meeting. Simoneau, along with the Mouvement laïque québécois, applied to the tribunal for a declaration that the by-law was inoperative. The tribunal granted the application, finding that the prayer was religious in nature and that its recitation, which showed a preference for one religion, was in breach of the state's duty of neutrality. The tribunal also found that the prayer constituted a discriminatory interference with Simoneau's freedom of conscience and religion.

The Quebec Court of Appeal reversed the Tribunal's decision, holding that the prayer expressed universal values that could not be identified with any particular religion, and that it did not amount to a breach of the state's duty of neutrality. In addition, the Quebec Court of Appeal decided that any interference with Simoneau's freedom of conscience and religion was insubstantial.

The Supreme Court of Canada allowed the appeal against the decision of the Quebec Court of Appeal.]

GASCON J (McLachlin CJ and Lebel, Rothstein, Cromwell, Moldaver, Karakatsanis, and Wagner JJ concurring):

[1] The state is required to act in a manner that is respectful of every person's freedom of conscience and religion. This is a fundamental right that is protected by the Quebec Charter of human rights and freedoms, CQLR, c. C-12 ("Quebec Charter"), and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms ("Canadian Charter"). Its corollary is that the state must remain neutral in matters involving this freedom. The interplay between freedom of conscience and religion, on the one hand, and this duty of neutrality, on the other, is sometimes a delicate one.

[64] In my opinion, the appellants' position must prevail. Sponsorship of one religious tradition by the state in breach of its duty of neutrality amounts to discrimination against all other such traditions (S.L. v. Commission scolaire des Chênes, 2012 SCC 7, [2012] 1 S.C.R. 235, at para. 17). If the state favours one religion at the expense of others, it imports a disparate impact that is destructive of the religious freedom of the collectivity (R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., ... [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295, at p. 337). In a case such as this, the practice of reciting the prayer and the By-law that regulates it result in the exclusion of Mr. Simoneau on the basis of a listed ground, namely religion. That exclusion impairs his right to full and equal exercise of his freedom of conscience and religion. The discrimination of which he complains relates directly to the determination of whether, on the one hand, the prayer is religious in nature and whether, on the other hand, the City is entitled to have it recited as it did. In my opinion, I must therefore begin the discussion by establishing the scope of the state's duty of neutrality in the context of freedom of conscience and religion. I will then consider the rules [governing] whether the state has breached its duty of neutrality in adopting a statute, regulations or a practice. Finally, I will apply these rules to the facts

(1) Neutrality of the State as Regards Freedom of Conscience and Religion

[65] Section 3 of the Quebec Charter protects the freedom of conscience and religion of every person[.]

[66] Section 10 supplements s. 3 and prohibits discrimination based on various grounds, including religion:

10. Every person has a right to full and equal recognition and exercise of his human rights and freedoms, without distinction, exclusion or preference based on ... religion

Discrimination exists where such a distinction, exclusion or preference has the effect of nullifying or impairing such right.

[67] Section 2(a) of the Canadian Charter is the constitutional counterpart of s. 3[.]

[68] Because of the similarity between s. 3 of the Quebec Charter and s. 2 of the Canadian Charter, it is well established that s. 3 should be interpreted in light of the principles that have been developed in relation to the application of the Canadian Charter

[69] ... [F]reedom of conscience and religion protects the right to entertain beliefs, to declare them openly and to manifest them, while at the same time guaranteeing that no person can be compelled to adhere directly or indirectly to a particular religion or to act in a manner contrary to his or her beliefs

[70] These protections are not limited to religious beliefs. ... For the purposes of the protections afforded by the charters, the concepts of "belief" and "religion" encompass non-belief, atheism and agnosticism.

[71] Neither the Quebec Charter nor the Canadian Charter expressly imposes a duty of religious neutrality on the state. This duty results from an evolving interpretation of freedom of conscience and religion. ... LeBel J. in [Congrégation des témoins de Jéhovah de St-Jérôme-Lafontaine v Lafontaine (Village), 2004 SCC 48, dissenting but not on this point] ... described the evolution of the concept of religious neutrality ... :

... [T]he appearance and growing influence of new ... theories on the organization and bases of civil society have gradually led to a dissociation of the functions of church and state; Canada's demographic evolution has also had an impact on this process, as have the urbanization and industrialization of the country. Although it has not excluded religions and churches from the realm of public debate, this evolution has led us to consider [religion] to relate more to individuals' private lives or to voluntary associations These societal changes have tended to create a clear distinction between churches and public authorities, placing the state under a duty of neutrality. ... The concept of neutrality allows churches and their members to play an important role in the public space where societal debates take place, while the state acts as an essentially neutral intermediary in relations between the various denominations and between those denominations and civil society. [Emphasis added; paras. 66-67.]

[72] ... [N]eutrality requires that the state neither favour nor hinder any particular belief, and the same holds true for non-belief (S.L., at para. 32). It requires that the state abstain from taking any position and thus avoid adhering to a particular belief.

[73] In "Freedom of Religion Under the Charter of Rights: The Limits of State Neutrality" (2012), 45 U.B.C. L. Rev. 497, at p. 507, Professor R. Moon points out that a religious belief is more than an opinion. It is the lens through which people perceive and explain the world in which they live. It defines the moral framework that guides their conduct. Religion is an integral part of each person's identity. When the state adheres to a belief, it is not merely expressing an opinion on the subject. It is creating a hierarchy of beliefs and casting doubt on the value of those it does not share. It is also ranking the individuals who hold such beliefs:

If religion is an aspect of the individual's identity, then when the state treats his or her religious practices or beliefs as less important or less true than the practices of others, or when it marginalizes her or his religious community in some way, it is not simply rejecting the individual's views and values, it is denying her or his equal worth. [Emphasis added; p. 507.]

[74] By expressing no preference, the state ensures that it preserves a neutral public space that is free of discrimination and in which true freedom to believe or not to believe is enjoyed by everyone equally, given that everyone is valued equally. I note that a neutral public space does not mean the homogenization of private players in that space. Neutrality is required of institutions and the state, not individuals (see R. v. N.S., 2012 SCC 72, [2012] 3 S.C.R. 726, at paras. 31 and 50-51). On the contrary, ... [t]he neutrality of the public space ... helps preserve and promote the multicultural nature of Canadian society enshrined in s. 27 of the Canadian Charter. ...

[75] I would add that ... the state's duty of religious neutrality is based on a democratic imperative. The rights and freedoms set out in the Quebec Charter and the Canadian Charter reflect the pursuit of an ideal: a free and democratic society. This pursuit requires the state to encourage everyone to participate freely in public life regardless of their beliefs The state may not ... create a preferential public space that favours certain religious groups and is hostile to others. It follows that the state may not, by expressing its own religious preference, promote the participation of believers to the exclusion of non-believers or vice versa.

[76] When all is said and done, the state's duty to protect every person's freedom of conscience and religion means that it may not ... promote the participation of certain believers or non-believers in public life to the detriment of others. ... Today, the state's duty of neutrality has become a necessary consequence of enshrining the freedom of conscience and religion in the Canadian Charter and the Quebec Charter.

[77] The Tribunal was therefore correct in holding that the state's duty of neutrality means that a state authority cannot make use of its powers to promote or impose a religious belief (paras. 209-11). As for Gagnon J.A., although he [referred to] these principles ... he found that absolute state neutrality is not possible from a constitutional point of view (para. 68). In his opinion, absolute neutrality is contrary to the state's duty to preserve its history, including its multi-religious heritage (para. 69). A society's cultural reality precludes an excessively radical conception of state neutrality (paras. 70 and 74). He considered the concept of [TRANSLATION] "benevolent neutrality" to be more appropriate to define the state's duty of religious neutrality (para. 76). It follows that the state's duty of neutrality does not go so far as to require complete secularity (para. 79).

[78] With respect, what is in issue here is not complete secularity, but true neutrality on the state's part and the discrimination that results from a violation of that neutrality. In this regard, contrary to what the Court of Appeal suggested, I do not think that the state's duty to remain neutral on questions relating to religion can be reconciled with a benevolence that would allow it to adhere to a religious belief. State neutrality means—and the Court of Appeal in fact agreed with this (at paras. 76 and 78)—that the state must neither encourage nor discourage any form of religious conviction whatsoever. If the state adheres to a form of religious expression under the guise of cultural or historical reality or heritage, it breaches its duty of neutrality. If that religious expression also creates a distinction, exclusion or preference that has the effect of nullifying or impairing the right to full and equal recognition and exercise of freedom of conscience and religion, there is discrimination.

(2) Interference by the State With Freedom of Conscience and Religion

[80] The state might interfere with freedom of conscience and religion by, for example, adopting a statute, regulations or a by-law, or it might do so [through] its officials[.] ...

[81] A [legislative] provision ... will be inoperative if its purpose is religious The legislation, including its preamble, its structure and its evolution, as well as its context and the legislative debate, are all indicators that can be used to delineate the provision's purpose The legislative objective cannot be to impose or favour, or to express or profess, one belief to the exclusion of all others.

[82] ... [T]his appeal does not relate strictly to a legislative provision. The respondents adopted the By-law to regulate the recitation of the prayer, but the complaint filed with the Commission was not limited to this. Moreover, the By-law was adopted after the complaint had been filed. The complaint also concerned a practice ... , namely the recitation of a prayer. [Therefore] ... , the analysis of the provision must also take account of the practice it regulates.

[83] In a case like this one ... , the alleged breach of the duty of neutrality must be established by proving that the state is professing, adopting or favouring one belief to the exclusion of all others (S.L., at para. 32) and that the exclusion has resulted in interference with the complainant's freedom of conscience and religion

[87] ... [I]t must be recognized that the Canadian cultural landscape includes many traditional and heritage practices that are religious in nature. Although it is clear that not all of these cultural expressions are in breach of the state's duty of neutrality, there is also no doubt that the state may not consciously ... adopt or favour one religious view at the expense of all others.

[88] Thus, it is essential to review the circumstances carefully. If they reveal an intention to profess, adopt or favour one belief to the exclusion of all others, and if the practice at issue interferes with the freedom of conscience and religion of one or more individuals, ... the state has breached its duty of religious neutrality. This is true regardless of whether the practice has a traditional character.

(3) Application to the Facts

[96] On the evidence in the record, I find that it was reasonable for the Tribunal to conclude that the City's prayer is in fact a practice of a religious nature. ... Its decision on this point was supported by reasons that were both extensive and intelligible. The Court of Appeal was required to show deference and could not therefore substitute its own opinion on the facts for that of the expert decision-maker.

[Justice Gascon relied on the following factors: the practice was implemented in 2002 and thus did not reflect long-standing tradition; the original prayer was clearly Catholic in origin; the 2008 by-law did not change the prayer's denominational nature. While the new by-law included a period between the end of the prayer and the start of the meeting to permit persons who had left the chamber to re-enter, this only highlighted "the exclusive effect of the practice" (at para 101). Finally, the practice involved a clearly religious ritual of entering the chamber, standing for the prayer, and then making the sign of the Cross.]

(iii) The Alleged Discrimination

[112] In light of the context and evidence discussed above, the Tribunal concluded that there had been discriminatory interference with Mr. Simoneau's freedom of conscience and religion . . . But the Court of Appeal found that Mr. Simoneau had not been treated unfairly in relation to other citizens who attended the council meetings . . . [Justice Gagnon stated that there was no evidence of harm.]

1. Exclusion Based on Religion

[113] The Court of Appeal could not disregard the Tribunal's findings of fact . . . unless they could be held to be unreasonable. The evidence does not support such a result. . . In my opinion, it was open to the Tribunal to conclude that the municipality's practice, given its religious nature, was in breach of the state's duty of neutrality and resulted in an exclusion based on religion. . .

[115] . . . I note that the Court of Appeal stressed that the state's duty of neutrality does not require the elimination of every allusion to [TRANSLATION] "a society's historical points of reference" (para. 98). It held that neutrality does not preclude "historical manifestations of the religious dimension of Quebec society, which, when viewed with proper perspective, cannot have the effect of undermining the neutrality of the various branches of the State" (para. 104). It considered the prayer to be one of a number of "mere references to religious heritage" (para. 107).

[116] I concede that the state's duty of neutrality does not require it to abstain from celebrating and preserving its religious heritage. But that cannot justify the state engaging in a discriminatory practice for religious purposes, which is what happened in the case of the City's prayer. The mayor's public declarations are revealing of the true function of the council's practice:

[TRANSLATION] I'm in this battle because I worship Christ.

When I get to the hereafter, I'm going to be able to be a little proud. I'll be able to say to Him: "I fought for You; I even went to trial for You." There's no better argument. It's extraordinary.

I'm in this fight because I worship Christ. I want to go to heaven and it is the most noble fight of my entire life. [Emphasis deleted.]

(Tribunal's reasons, at para. 88)

[118] These comments confirm that the recitation of the prayer at the council's meetings was above all else a use by the council of public powers to manifest and profess one religion to the exclusion of all others. . . What the respondents are defending is not a tradition, but the municipality's right to manifest its own faith. . .

[119] I repeat that what is at issue here is the state's adherence, through its officials acting in the performance of their functions, to a religious belief. The state, I should point out, does not have a freedom to believe or to manifest a belief; compliance with its duty of neutrality does not entail a reconciliation of rights. On the other hand, it goes without saying that the same restrictions do not apply to the exercise by state officials of their own freedom of conscience and religion when they are not acting in an official capacity. Although they are not entitled to use public powers to profess their beliefs, this does not affect their right to exercise this freedom on a personal basis.

2. The Impairment of Mr. Simoneau's Rights

[120] The prayer ... turned the meetings into a preferential space for people with theistic beliefs. ... Although non-believers could also participate, the price for doing so was isolation, exclusion and stigmatization. This impaired Mr. Simoneau's right to exercise his freedom of conscience and religion.

[121] In this regard, ... when Mr. Simoneau went to meetings of the municipal council, he had to choose between remaining in the chamber and conforming to the City's religious practice, excluding himself from the practice by refusing to participate in it, and physically excluding himself from the chamber for the duration of the prayer. If he chose to conform to the council's practice, he would be acting in direct contradiction with his atheistic beliefs. ... According to the Tribunal's findings, Mr. Simoneau had experienced a strong feeling of isolation and exclusion (paras. 265-66). This led the Tribunal to conclude that the interference caused by this situation was more than trivial or insubstantial (para. 262). Such interference constitutes an infringement of the complainant's freedom of conscience and religion.

[124] [The Tribunal's] findings are similar to findings made by other courts in similar circumstances [such as Zylberberg v Sudbury Board of Education and Freitag v Penetanguishene (Town)]

[126] In sum, ... the Tribunal's finding in the instant case of discrimination contrary to ss. 3 and 10 of the Quebec Charter was reasonable. ...

[127] In closing, as to the City's by-law regulating the prayer, ... [a] by-law adopted to regulate a discriminatory religious practice that is incompatible with the state's duty of neutrality must also be discriminatory. Even though the By-law's preamble indicates an intention [TRANSLATION] "to ensure decorum and highlight the importance of the work of the councillors," it can be seen from the evidence as a whole that this purpose was secondary. Decorum could have been ensured in many other ways that would not have led the City to adopt a religious belief.

[128] Finally, although the adoption of a by-law normally opens the door to the application of the justificatory provision ... [s 9.1 of the Quebec Charter, the equivalent of s 1 of the Canadian Charter], the onus of justification was on the respondents Since they have advanced no substantive argument in this regard, I will not discuss this further.

(c) Other Submissions of the Respondents

[129] Despite these findings of the Tribunal, the respondents raise four other arguments in favour of finding that the prayer is valid and is not discriminatory, which I will now discuss.

(i) Absolute Neutrality and True Neutrality

[130] In the respondents' view, barring the municipal council from reciting the prayer would amount to giving atheism and agnosticism prevalence over religious beliefs. The Court of Appeal advanced this same argument in its reasons (para. 71). Its comments on benevolent neutrality were along the same lines.

[131] This Court has referred in the past to the difficulty the definition of the concept of neutrality seems to cause. In S.L., the Court referred to comments made by Professor R. Moon:

We must recognize that trying to achieve religious neutrality in the public sphere is a major challenge for the state. The author R. Moon has clearly described the difficulty of implementing a legislative policy that will be seen by everyone as neutral and respectful of their freedom of religion:

If secularism or agnosticism constitutes a position, worldview, or cultural identity equivalent to religious adherence, then its proponents may feel excluded or marginalized when the state supports even the most ecumenical religious practices. But by the same token, the complete removal of religion from the public sphere may be experienced by religious adherents as the exclusion of their worldview and the affirmation of a non-religious or secular perspective

... Ironically, then, as the exclusion of religion from public life, in the name of religious freedom and equality, has become more complete, the secular has begun to appear less neutral and more partisan. With the growth of agnosticism and atheism, religious neutrality in the public sphere may have become impossible. What for some is the neutral ground on which freedom of religion and conscience depends is for others a partisan anti-spiritual perspective.

("Government Support for Religious Practice," in Law and Religious Pluralism in Canada (2008), 217, at p. 231) [para. 30]

[132] Stressing that absolute state neutrality is impossible to attain, the Court defined its non-absolutist conception of neutrality as follows:

Therefore, following a realistic and non-absolutist approach, state neutrality is assured when the state neither favours nor hinders any particular religious belief, that is, when it shows respect for all postures towards religion, including that of having no religious beliefs whatsoever, while taking into account the competing constitutional rights of the individuals affected.

(S.L., at para. 32)

Thus, a neutrality that is non-absolute is nevertheless a true neutrality. But this true neutrality presupposes that the state abstains from taking a position on questions of religion.

[133] Contrary to the respondents' argument, abstaining does not amount to taking a stand in favour of atheism or agnosticism. ... A practice according to which a municipality's officials, rather than reciting a prayer, solemnly declared that the council's deliberations were based on a denial of God would be just as unacceptable. ...

[134] In short, there is a distinction between unbelief and true neutrality. True neutrality presupposes abstention, but it does not amount to a stand favouring one view over another. No such inference can be drawn from the state's silence. ...

(ii) Non-denominational Nature of the Prayer

[135] The respondents stress the non-denominational nature of the prayer I find that this argument must fail for two reasons.

[136] First, it has not been established in this case that the prayer is non-denominational. ... [To the contrary, the tribunal found that the council's practice was strongly associated with Catholicism.]

[137] Second, even if it were accepted that the prayer at issue is prima facie a non-denominational practice, it is nonetheless a religious practice, as the respondents themselves conceded at the hearing in this Court. The respondents argue in this regard that a state that is "somewhat religious" can be tolerated in the context of state neutrality provided that it is inclusive, and that this tolerance can be justified on the basis of historical and traditional values. They add that the separation of church and state does not necessarily mean that the two are totally separate. I find that the respondents are on the wrong track in this respect. True neutrality is concerned not with a strict separation of church and state on questions related to religious thought. The purpose of neutrality is instead to ensure that the state is, and appears to be, open to all points of view regardless of their spiritual basis. Far from requiring separation, true neutrality requires that the state neither favour nor hinder any religion, and that it abstain from taking any position on this subject. Even if a religious practice engaged in by the state is "inclusive," it may nevertheless exclude non-believers; whether it is consistent with the Quebec Charter depends not on the extent to which it is inclusive, but on its exclusive nature and its effect on the complainant's ability to act in accordance with his or her beliefs.

(iii) The Prayer of the House of Commons

[141] The respondents submit that the City's prayer must be valid because it is similar to the one recited by the Speaker of the House of Commons before that body's meetings. Gagnon J.A. also referred to the latter prayer in his reasons (paras. 94-95).

[142] In the specific context of this appeal, this argument must fail for three reasons. First, there is no evidence before us on the purpose of the prayer of the House of Commons. Second, the circumstances of the recitation of the two prayers are different. Third, it is possible that the House's prayer is subject to parliamentary privilege, as certain courts have suggested (Ontario (Speaker of the Legislative Assembly) v. Ontario (Human Rights Commission) (2001), ... 54 O.R. (3d) 595 (C.A.); see also Renfrew, at para. 22).

[143] In the absence of detailed evidence on Parliament's practice and the circumstances thereof, and of full argument on this point, it would be inappropriate for the Court to discuss its content or to use it to support a finding that the City's prayer is valid.

(iv) Preamble to the Canadian Charter and the Supremacy of God

[144] Finally, the respondents argue that the reference to the supremacy of God in the preamble to the Canadian Charter establishes the moral source of the values that charter protects. In their view, a prayer that refers to that same source cannot, in itself, interfere with anyone's freedom of conscience and religion. ...

[145] The preamble to the Canadian Charter reads as follows:

Whereas Canada is founded upon principles that recognize the supremacy of God and the rule of law;

[146] In my opinion, the respondents' argument in this regard truncates the analysis on the issue of freedom of conscience and religion. Contrary to what their argument suggests, that analysis is not limited to a single reference to God in the prayer. ... Rather, the analysis concerns the state's observance of a religious practice ... [which breaches] the state's duty of neutrality.

[147] The reference to the supremacy of God in the preamble to the Canadian Charter cannot lead to an interpretation of freedom of conscience and religion that authorizes the state to consciously profess a theistic faith. The preamble, including its reference to God, articulates the "political theory" on which the Charter's protections are based It must nevertheless be borne in mind that the express provisions of the Canadian Charter, such as those regarding freedom of conscience and religion, must be given a generous and expansive interpretation....

[148] ... [T]he reference to God in the preamble cannot be relied on to reduce the scope of a guarantee that is expressly provided for in the charters. Professor L. Sossin explains this as follows in "The 'Supremacy of God,' Human Dignity and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms" (2003), 52 U.N.B.L.J. 227, at p. 229:

The reference to the supremacy of God in the Charter should not be construed so as to suggest one religion is favoured over another in Canada, nor that monotheism is more desirable than polytheism, nor that the God-fearing are entitled to greater rights and privileges than atheists or agnostics. Any of these interpretations would be at odds with the purpose and orientation of the Charter, as well as with the specific provisions regarding freedom of religion and conscience under s. 2. [Emphasis added.]

[149] This leads me to conclude that the reference to the supremacy of God does not limit the scope of freedom of conscience and religion and does not have the effect of granting a privileged status to theistic religious practices. Contrary to what the respondents suggest, I do not believe that the preamble can be used to interpret this freedom in this way.

(d) Conclusion

[150] ... The Tribunal's findings of fact on the religious and discriminatory nature of the By-law and of the practice were not unreasonable; quite the contrary. The prayer creates a distinction, exclusion and preference based on religion that has the effect of impairing Mr. Simoneau's right to full and equal exercise of his freedom of conscience and religion. The Court of Appeal could not simply substitute its own view for that of the Tribunal without first establishing in what way the Tribunal's findings were unreasonable, which it did not do. This Court must intervene to restore the Tribunal's judgment in this regard [which included a declaration that the by-law was inoperative and an order that the city, the members of the municipal council, and the mayor cease reciting a prayer in the municipal council chamber].

[Justice Abella agreed with the disposition of the appeal, but wrote separate reasons on the applicable standard of review. Justice Gascon had found that the correctness standard applied to the question of law relating to the scope of the state's duty of religious neutrality, with the reasonableness standard applying to the other questions before the Tribunal. Justice Abella disagreed with the practice of applying different standards of review to different aspects of the decision of a specialized tribunal and would have applied the reasonableness standard to all aspects of the tribunal's decision.] [Emphasis in original.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In Saguenay, the Court stated that when a complaint concerns a "state practice" (rather than a law), the test for determining a breach of s 2(a) has an additional step. The complainant must establish "that the state is professing, adopting or favouring one belief to the exclusion of all others ... and that the exclusion has resulted in interference with the complainant's freedom of conscience and religion" (at para 83). More specifically, it must be shown that the state practice impedes "the individual's ability to act in accordance with his or her beliefs" (at para 85). Is this second step redundant? Why do you think the Court included this step?

2. Are there limits to the neutrality requirement set out in Saguenay? According to the Supreme Court of Canada, “the state’s duty of neutrality does not require it to abstain from celebrating and preserving its religious heritage” (at para 116). Yet it may often be difficult to determine when the use of religious symbols or practices by that state is simply an acknowledgment of the country’s religious history, and when it amounts to a present affirmation of the truth of a particular religious belief system. Also, as the Court seemed to recognize in Edwards Books, if a large part of the population is Christian (or of Christian background), it is difficult to see how the state could not take the practices of this group into account when, for example, it selects statutory holidays or establishes a “pause day” from work.

3. Is neutrality neutral? The complete removal of religion from the political sphere may be experienced by religious adherents as the exclusion of their world view and the affirmation of a non-religious, agnostic, or atheist perspective—the culture or identity of a particular segment of the community. If the basis for excluding religious practice from the political sphere is that atheists or agnostics represent an identity group that should be treated with equal respect, then excluding religion may be viewed as a preference for the beliefs or world view of the atheist or agnostic community. How does the Court answer this concern?

4. In Saguenay, the municipality argued that the reference to God in the preamble to the Charter meant that the invocation of God in the town’s prayer could not be unconstitutional—that is, that the Constitution could not be read as prohibiting any reference to God by the state. Does the Court adequately respond to this argument?

5. One of the decisions that the Court relied on in Saguenay is SL v Commission scolaire des Chênes, 2012 SCC 7. This case is discussed in more detail below, in Section V, “Religious Families, Communities, and Organizations.”

6. For further discussion of the principle of state neutrality, see Loyola High School v Quebec (AG), excerpted below, in Section V.

7. At para 74 of Saguenay, there is a reference to R v NS, 2012 SCC 72, which involved the issue of whether s 2(a) of the Charter would give a witness in a criminal trial the right to wear a niqab when giving evidence. This case is discussed in Section IV.

8. In Servatius v Alberni School District No 70, 2020 BCSC 15, the BC Supreme Court held that a smudging ceremony conducted in an elementary public school in BC did not breach s 2(a). At para 94, the judge concluded that these smudging and hoop dancing demonstrations were in no way—either by design or in their execution—an expression of the School District’s beliefs or an expression of religious favouritism. Rather, the organization of these events reflected a gathering momentum to incorporate the teaching of Indigenous worldviews and perspectives. I accept the evidence of Ms. Dyer, the petitioner’s daughter’s teacher, that the smudging or anything that the Elder said could not be construed as trying to make someone else believe what the Elder believed—when the Elder spoke, she used words like “our tradition is” or “we believe.” And, arranging for students to observe hoop dancing, even if the dancing is accompanied by an Indigenous prayer, cannot reasonably be interpreted as the School District professing, adopting, or promoting religious beliefs.

Is this analysis consistent with Saguenay? With Zylberberg?

Is it a breach of religious freedom for the government to act on the basis of religious values? If so, how do we distinguish between religious and non-religious moral considerations? Is it reasonable to expect a religiously committed politician or voter to make decisions without relying on religious values? It is worth noting that religion has played a significant role in Canadian politics. The Social Gospel movement, for example, played an important role in the enactment of progressive legislation in the first half of the last century. In the United States, religious adherents and organizations played a central role in the civil rights movement. The Supreme Court of Canada grappled with these issues in Chamberlain v Surrey School District

No 36, discussed in the note immediately below. Although Chamberlain was not decided on Charter grounds, and, on the facts, a school board's decision was quashed because it was unduly influenced by the religious and moral views of one group of parents, the reasoning suggests that it is permissible for a state actor to act on the basis of religious values.

NOTE: CHAMBERLAIN V SURREY SCHOOL DISTRICT NO 36

In Chamberlain v Surrey School District No 36, 2002 SCC 86, a local school board rejected a proposal to include three books depicting same-sex parent families on the list of approved teaching resources for the primary grades. The appellants challenged the board's decision ("the resolution") on two grounds, arguing first, that the board had acted outside its mandate under the School Act of British Columbia, RSBC 1996, c 412 s 76, which provided that "[a]ll schools ... must be conducted on strictly secular and non-sectarian principles" (at para 18); and second, that the resolution violated the Charter. A majority of the Supreme Court of Canada, in a judgment written by McLachlin CJ, held that the school board "acted outside the mandate of the School Act ... and [its] own regulation for approval of supplementary material" (at para 2) when it refused to include these three books on the list of approved teaching resources. Having reached this conclusion, it was unnecessary for the majority to consider whether the resolution breached the Charter.

Chief Justice McLachlin accepted that the secularism requirement in the BC School Act did not preclude the board from taking religious values and beliefs into account when making decisions, but that it did prevent the board from supporting or enforcing a religious or moral view that denied respect or recognition to another group or perspective in the community:

[19] The Act's insistence on strict secularism does not mean that religious concerns have no place in the deliberations and decisions of the Board. Board members are entitled, and indeed required, to bring the views of the parents and communities they represent to the deliberation process. Because religion plays an important role in the life of many communities, these views will often be motivated by religious concerns. Religion is an integral aspect of people's lives, and cannot be left at the boardroom door. What secularism does rule out, however, is any attempt to use the religious views of one part of the community to exclude from consideration the values of other members of the community. A requirement of secularism implies that, although the Board is indeed free to address the religious concerns of parents, it must be sure to do so in a manner that gives equal recognition and respect to other members of the community. Religious views that deny equal recognition and respect to the members of a minority group cannot be used to exclude the concerns of the minority group. This is fair to both groups, as it ensures that each group is given as much recognition as it can consistently demand while giving the same recognition to others.

Chief Justice McLachlin found that the board, in acting on the concerns of some parents about the morality of same-sex relationships, had failed to take seriously the rights of same-sex parents, and the children of such relationships, to be equally respected within the public school system. The board in this case had "failed to proceed as required by the secular mandate of the School Act by letting the religious views of a certain part of the community trump the need to show equal respect for the values of other members of the community" (at para 71).

Chief Justice McLachlin held that the inclusion of these books as teaching materials did not amount to the affirmation of same-sex relationships and the repudiation of contrary views. What the School Act demanded, she said, was tolerance:

[66] ... [T]he demand for tolerance cannot be interpreted as the demand to approve another person's beliefs or practices. When we ask people to be tolerant of others, we don't ask them to abandon their personal convictions. We merely ask them to respect the rights, values and ways of being of those who may not share those convictions. The belief that others are entitled to equal respect depends, not on the belief that their values are right, but only on the belief that they have a claim to equal respect regardless of whether they are right.

Tolerance requires only that we respect the right of each individual to form their own judgments and, in this case, their choice of intimate partner or family arrangement. Teaching tolerance does not require that public actors, such as the schools, affirm a particular value or viewpoint. More specifically, it does not require that the schools teach or affirm that same-sex and opposite-sex relationships are equally valuable. In the Chief Justice's view, the books would simply "expose" children to non-traditional family forms and encourage them to tolerate these forms. According to McLachlin CJ, the use of the three books in the kindergarten classes would encourage "discussion and understanding of all family groups" (at para 72).

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Chief Justice McLachlin accepted that religious values may play a role in political decision-making; at the same time, however, she seemed to say that the state must remain neutral in matters of basic values. If the "secularism" requirement means that schools should not favour one moral perspective over another in their teaching—that they should remain neutral on moral and religious issues—then religion, and indeed any value system, will have a role in school board (and public) decision-making only when it has no bite. That is, only when it does not involve the repudiation of other values or viewpoints. Moreover, if the board's rejection of the three books for use in the primary grades amounted to the improper exclusion of gay, lesbian, and other perspectives or lifestyles, would not the inclusion of these books, by the same token, amount to the exclusion or rejection of the religious views of those parents who regard homosexuality as sinful? Can schools affirm the equal value of same-sex relationships without, in effect, repudiating the religious belief that homosexuality is immoral or unnatural?

2. The majority in Chamberlain based its decision to invalidate the school board's resolution on principles of statutory interpretation—that is, on the wording of the BC School Act and, in particular, the requirement of adherence to strictly secular principles. The majority did not deal with the constitutional challenge to the resolution based on s 2(b). How do you think the majority would have decided the freedom of religion claim apart from the statutory requirement of secularism in the BC School Act? Could the board resolution be considered a coercive state imposition of religion? Under a Charter analysis, could other Charter claims also have come into play—for example, claims by same-sex parents and their children that the resolution violated their equality rights under s 15 of the Charter; or claims by religious parents that the use of the books at issue in the classroom would violate their rights of freedom of religion? Note that Gonthier and Bastarache JJ, who wrote dissenting reasons upholding the resolution, did discuss the Charter values at stake and concluded that the resolution reflected an appropriate balance between the values of equality and freedom of religion.

3. For a critical discussion of Chamberlain and the Chief Justice's attempt to adopt a neutral stance, see Richard Moon, "The Supreme Court of Canada's Attempt to Reconcile Freedom of Religion and Sexual Orientation Equality in the Public Schools" in David Rayside & Clyde Wilcox, eds, Faith, Politics, and Sexual Diversity (Vancouver: University of British Columbia Press, 2011).

4. In Chamberlain, McLachlin CJ did seem to accept that religious values may play a role in political decision-making. She wrote that "[b]ecause religion plays an important role in the life of many communities, these views [of parents and communities] will often be motivated by religious concerns. Religion is an integral aspect of people's lives, and cannot be left at the boardroom door" (at para 19). Has the Supreme Court of Canada thus endorsed the principle that it is permissible for elected officials to draw on their religious values (or the religious values of their constituents) when making political decisions?

NOTE: SECTION 93 OF THE CONSTITUTION ACT, 1867 AND THE PUBLIC FUNDING OF RELIGIOUS SCHOOLS

Section 2(a) of the Charter prohibits state support for the practices or institutions of a particular religion, but does not prevent the state from providing general support for religious practices or institutions. A province, then, may fund religious schools as long as it does so in an even-handed way. There is, however, a constitutional exception to the requirement of equal treatment—s 93 of the Constitution Act, 1867, which provides:

93. In and for each Province the Legislature may exclusively make Laws in relation to Education, subject and according to the following Provisions:

(1) Nothing in any such Law shall prejudicially affect any Right or Privilege with respect to Denominational Schools which any Class of Persons have by Law in the Province at the Union;

(2) All the Powers, Privileges and Duties at the Union by Law conferred and imposed in Upper Canada on the Separate Schools and School Trustees of the Queen's Roman Catholic Subjects shall be and the same are hereby extended to the Dissentient Schools of the Queen's Protestant and Roman Catholic Subjects in Quebec;

(3) Where in any Province a System of Separate or Dissentient Schools exists by Law at the Union or is thereafter established by the Legislature of the Province, an Appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council from any Act or Decision of any Provincial Authority affecting any Right or Privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic Minority of the Queen's Subjects in relation to Education;

(4) In case any such Provincial Law as from Time to Time seems to the Governor General in Council requisite for the due Execution of the Provisions of this Section is not made, or in case any Decision of the Governor General in Council on any Appeal under this Section is not duly executed by the proper Provincial Authority in that Behalf, then and in every such Case, and as far only as the Circumstances of each Case require, the Parliament of Canada may make remedial Laws for the due Execution of the Provisions of this Section and of any Decision of the Governor General in Council under this Section.

Although s 93 gives the provinces general jurisdiction in relation to education, ss 93(2), 93(3), and 93(4) limit that power by guaranteeing the rights and privileges of certain denominational schools.

In the following passage from Trinity Western University v British Columbia College of Teachers, 2001 SCC 31, the Supreme Court of Canada reiterated the view expressed in previous judgments that the protection of separate religious schools was a compromise or agreement necessary to bring about Confederation:

[34] ... Furthermore, s. 93 of the Constitution Act, 1867 enshrined religious public education rights into our Constitution, as part of the historic compromise which made Confederation possible. Section 17 of the Alberta Act ... and Saskatchewan Act ... , s. 22 of the Manitoba Act, 1870 ... , and Term 17 of the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada ... were to the same effect.

The rights of religious schools were altered by constitutional amendment in Newfoundland in 1998 and eliminated in Quebec in 1997. These rights remain in effect in Ontario, Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Manitoba.

In Ontario, at the time of Confederation, a separate Roman Catholic school system was established by law alongside the much larger public system. In the early 1900s, the public system was reorganized and extended to include high school grades or courses. However, the government of Ontario denied funding to the separate Catholic school system for the teaching of high school courses (and it prohibited the separate schools from teaching such courses). A separate school board argued that, under s 93(1), it had a right to teach these courses and to receive funding in the same manner as a public school board. This argument was rejected in R v Tiny Township Separate School Trustees, [1928 CanLII 355, \[1928\] AC 363 \(UKJCPC\)](#), in which the Privy Council ruled that in 1867 the separate schools in Ontario had no existing legal right to funding for high school courses.

In 1986, the government of Ontario decided to extend funding to the separate school system to cover all the high school grades. In Reference re Bill 30, an Act to Amend the Education Act (Ont), [\[1987\] 1 SCR 1148, 1987 CanLII 65](#), the Supreme Court of Canada considered whether this extension of funding to the Catholic schools, but not to other religious schools, violated s 2(a) or s 15 of the Charter. Although s 29 of the Charter provides that “[n]othing in this Charter abrogates from any rights or privileges guaranteed by or under the Constitution of Canada in respect of denominational, separate or dissentient schools,” those opposing the funding argued that s 29 was not applicable in this case because, as had been established by the Tiny case, there was no constitutional right to funding for the later grades of high school. However, a majority of the Court thought that the Tiny decision was wrong and that

Roman Catholic separate school supporters had at Confederation a right or privilege, by law, to have their children receive an appropriate education which could include instruction at the secondary school level and that such right or privilege is therefore constitutionally guaranteed under s. 93(1) of the Constitution Act, 1867. [at para 58]

Moreover, all the members of the Court agreed that regardless of whether s 93(1) guarantees secondary school funding to the separate schools, s 93(3) specifically empowers the provincial government to grant new rights and privileges to separate or dissentient schools and the exercise of this power could not be seen as a violation of the Charter. Justice Wilson wrote:

[62] ... I have indicated that the rights or privileges protected by s. 93(1) are immune from Charter review under s. 29 of the Charter. ... What is less clear is whether s. 29 of the Charter was required in order to achieve that result. In my view, it was not. I believe it was put there simply to emphasize that the special treatment guaranteed by the constitution to denominational, separate or dissentient schools, even if it sits uncomfortably with the concept of equality embodied in the Charter because not available to other schools, is nevertheless not impaired by the Charter. It was never intended, in my opinion, that the Charter could be used to invalidate other provisions of the Constitution, particularly a provision such as s. 93 which represented a fundamental part of the Confederation compromise. Section 29, in my view, is present in the Charter only for greater certainty, at least in so far as the Province of Ontario is concerned.

[63] ... The section 93(3) rights and privileges are not guaranteed in the sense that the s. 91(1) rights and privileges are guaranteed, i.e., in the sense that the legislature which gave them cannot later pass laws which prejudicially affect them. But they are insulated from Charter attack as legislation enacted pursuant to the plenary power in relation to education granted to the provincial legislatures as part of the Confederation compromise. ... [T]he province is master of its own house when it legislates under its plenary power in relation to denominational, separate or dissentient schools. This was the agreement at Confederation and, in my view, it was not displaced by the enactment of the Constitution Act, 1982. ...

[64] I would conclude, therefore, that even if Bill 30 is supportable only under the province's plenary power and s. 93(3), it is insulated from Charter review.

Justice Estey made the point in this way:

[80] ... The power to establish or add to a system of Roman Catholic separate schools found in s. 93(3) expressly contemplates that the province may legislate with respect to a religion-based school system funded from the public treasury. Although the Charter is intended to constrain the exercise of legislative power conferred under the Constitution Act,

1867 where the delineated rights of individual members of the community are adversely affected, it cannot be interpreted as rendering unconstitutional distinctions that are expressly permitted by the Constitution Act, 1867.

In Adler v Ontario, [1996] 3 SCR 609, 1996 CanLII 148, the appellants argued that public funding should be extended to other religious schools in Ontario. In making their case, they did not simply repeat the argument rejected in Reference re Bill 30—that is, that funding of Catholic schools but not other religious schools breached ss 2(a) and 15. They also argued that state funding of “secular” public schools but not religious schools breached these rights. The Supreme Court of Canada concluded unanimously that the government’s failure to fund religious schools did not violate s 2(a). A majority of the Court also held that the government’s practice of funding secular public schools but not religious schools did not breach the s 15 guarantee of equality rights. However, two judges, McLachlin and L’Heureux-Dubé JJ, disagreed and found that this practice breached s 15. Justice McLachlin went on to hold that the breach was justified under s 1, while L’Heureux-Dubé J held that the s 15 violation was not justified.

In Waldman v Canada (1999), Communication No 694/1996, the United Nations Human Rights Committee ruled that the practice in Ontario of funding Catholic schools and not other religious schools was a breach of art 26 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the right against religious discrimination. The committee observed (at para 10.6) that “the Covenant does not oblige States parties to fund schools that are established on a religious basis. However, if a State party chooses to provide public funding to religious schools, it should make this funding available without discrimination.” The committee was clear that simply because “a distinction [is] enshrined in the [Canadian] Constitution does not render it reasonable and objective” (at para 10.4) under the International Covenant. It is important to note, however, that the decisions of the Human Rights Committee are not automatically part of the domestic law of Canada.

Publicly funded Roman Catholic schools in Ontario are subject to the Charter, unless they are exercising a right or privilege granted to them under s 93 of the Constitution Act, 1867. In Hall (Litigation guardian of) v Powers, 2002 CanLII 49475, 59 OR (3d) 423 (Sup Ct J), a judge found that there was a prima facie case that a Roman Catholic school in Ontario breached s 15 of the Charter when it refused to permit a student to bring a same-sex date to the graduation dance, held off school property. The judge issued an interlocutory injunction prohibiting the school from preventing the student’s attendance at the dance with his date.

IV. THE RESTRICTION AND ACCOMMODATION OF RELIGIOUS PRACTICE

As noted above, in Big M and Edwards Books, the central focus of s 2(a) seemed to be the protection against state “coercion.” This freedom from coercion was understood to have two sides: (1) the protection of the individual’s freedom from religion—that is, the freedom from being compelled by the state to engage in any form of religious practice; and (2) the protection of the individual’s freedom to religion—that is, the freedom to engage in religious practice without restriction by the state. In Section III, we addressed the first aspect—state support for religion. This section explores the second aspect—the restriction and accommodation of religious practice. According to the Canadian courts, s 2(a) of the Charter is breached any time the state restricts a religious practice in a non-trivial way. Even when a law advances a legitimate public purpose, such as the prevention of drug use, cruelty to animals, or violence in the schoolyard, the state must justify, under s 1 of the Charter, the law’s nontrivial interference with a religious practice. However, in the cases that follow, the Supreme Court of Canada seems to set the s 1 balance strongly in favour of state restriction and appears willing to uphold a legal restriction if it has a legitimate or serious objective that would be noticeably compromised if an exception was made. A restriction will be found unjustifiable under s 1 only if its purpose is less important or would not be significantly compromised by the particular religious practice.

In Syndicat Northcrest v Amselem, an excerpt from which appears immediately below, the Supreme Court of Canada held that a condominium association's refusal to permit Orthodox Jewish unit owners to construct succahs on their balconies as part their celebration of the Jewish festival of Succot breached their freedom of religion under the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms, RSQ c C-12. Because the restriction on religious practice was imposed by a non-state actor, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms was not applicable. However, the majority judgment of Iacobucci J was clear in saying (at para 37) that "the principles ... applicable in cases where an individual alleges that his or her freedom of religion is infringed under the Quebec Charter" are also applicable to a claim under s 2(a) of the Canadian Charter. Note also that this is the first case in which the Supreme Court of Canada attempted to define what constitutes a "religious" belief or practice.

Syndicat Northcrest v Amselem

2004 SCC 47

IACOBUCCI J (McLachlin CJ and Major, Arbour, and Fish JJ concurring):

I. Introduction

[1] An important feature of our constitutional democracy is respect for minorities, which includes, of course, religious minorities: see Reference re Secession of Quebec, ... [1998] 2 S.C.R. 217, at paras. 79-81. Indeed, respect for and tolerance of the rights and practices of religious minorities is one of the hallmarks of an enlightened democracy. But respect for religious minorities is not a stand-alone absolute right; like other rights, freedom of religion exists in a matrix of other correspondingly important rights that attach to individuals. Respect for minority rights must also coexist alongside societal values that are central to the make-up and functioning of a free and democratic society. This appeal requires the Court to deal with the inter-relationship between fundamental rights both at a conceptual level and for a practical outcome.

[2] More specifically, the cases which are the subject of this appeal involve a religious claim by the appellants for the setting up of a "succah" for nine days a year ... on their co-owned property under the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms, RSQ, c. C-12 (the "Quebec Charter"). The Quebec courts denied the claim. With respect, I disagree and would allow the appeal.

[3] ... While the respondent has raised rights to enjoy property and personal security as justification for its refusal to allow a succah to be set up, I find that the impairment of the appellants' religious freedom is serious whereas I conclude that the intrusion on the respondent's rights is minimal. As such, I hold that the appellants must be permitted to set up succahs on their balconies, provided that the succahs remain only for the limited time necessary—in this case nine days, allow for an emergency access route, and conform, as much as possible, with the general aesthetics of the property. I also find the argument that the appellants waived their religious rights cannot be maintained under the circumstances, nor did they implicitly agree not to set up succahs on their balconies by signing the declaration of co-ownership.

II. Background

[4] The appellants, all Orthodox Jews, are divided co-owners of residential units in "Place Northcrest," two luxury buildings [in the "Sanctuaire"] ...

[5] In late September 1996, Mr. Amselem, at the time a new resident of the Sanctuaire, set up a "succah" on his balcony ... during the Jewish religious festival of Succot. A succah is a small enclosed temporary hut or booth, traditionally made of wood or other materials such as fastened canvas, and open to the heavens Th[e] nine-day festival, which begins in late September or early-to mid-October, commemorates the 40-year period during which, according to Jewish tradition, the Children of Israel wandered in the desert, living in temporary shelters.

[6] Under the Jewish faith, ... Jews are obligated to dwell in these succahs, as their ancestors did in the desert. Orthodox Jews ... [transform] the succah into the practitioner's primary residence for the entire holiday period. ...

[7] Technically, a succah must minimally consist of a three-walled, open-roofed structure which must meet certain size specifications in order to fulfill the biblical commandment of dwelling in it properly according to the requirements of the Jewish faith. ...

[9] After Mr. Amselem put up his succah in September 1996, the syndicate of co-ownership, Syndicat Northcrest (the "respondent" or "Syndicat"), requested its removal, claiming the succah was in violation of the Sanctuaire's by-laws as stated in the declaration of co-ownership, which inter alia prohibited decorations, alterations and constructions on the Sanctuaire's balconies[.] ... None of the appellants had read the declaration of co-ownership prior to purchasing or occupying their individual units.

[11] ... Mr. Amselem requested permission from the Syndicat to set up a succah on, and thus enclose part of, his balcony to celebrate the same holiday of Succot. The Syndicat refused, invoking the restrictions in the declaration of co-ownership.

[13] In a letter dated October 10, 1997, the Syndicat proposed to allow ... a communal succah in the Sanctuaire's gardens.

[14] In their October 14, 1997 letter to the Syndicat, the appellants ... explained why a communal succah would not only cause extreme hardship with their religious observance, but would also be contrary to their personal religious beliefs which, they claimed, called for "their own succah, each on his own balcony."

[Despite the Syndicat's refusal of their request, the appellants each set up their own individual succahs. In response, the Syndicat filed an application for a permanent injunction prohibiting the appellants from setting up the succahs and, if necessary, permitting their demolition.]

III. Relevant Legislative Provisions

[18] Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms, RSQ, c. C-12

1. Every human being has a right to life, and to personal security, inviolability and freedom. He also possesses juridical personality.

3. Every person is the possessor of the fundamental freedoms, including freedom of conscience, freedom of religion, freedom of opinion, freedom of expression, freedom of peaceful assembly and freedom of association.

6. Every person has a right to the peaceful enjoyment and free disposition of his property, except to the extent provided by law.

9.1. In exercising his fundamental freedoms and rights, a person shall maintain a proper regard for democratic values, public order and the general well-being of the citizens of Québec. In this respect, the scope of the freedoms and rights, and limits to their exercise, may be fixed by law. ...

IV. Judicial History

[The trial judge, Rochon J, found that the impugned by-laws were not in violation of the Quebec Charter and issued the injunction requested by the Syndicat. The decision was upheld by the Quebec Court of Appeal.]

V. Issues

[35] In my view, the key issues before us are: (1) whether the clauses in the by-laws of the declaration of co-ownership, which contained a general prohibition against decorations or constructions on one's balcony, infringe the appellants' freedom of religion protected under the Quebec Charter; (2) if so, whether the refusal by the respondent to permit the setting up of a succah is justified by its reliance on the co-owners' rights to enjoy property under s. 6 of the Quebec Charter and their rights to personal security under s. 1 thereof; and (3) whether the appellants waived their rights to freedom of religion by signing the declaration of co-ownership.

VI. Analysis

A. Freedom of Religion

[37] The analysis that follows sets out the principles that are applicable in cases where an individual alleges that his or her freedom of religion is infringed under the Quebec Charter or under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. ...

(1) Definition of Religious Freedom

[39] ... Defined broadly, religion typically involves a particular and comprehensive system of faith and worship. Religion also tends to involve the belief in a divine, superhuman or controlling power. In essence, religion is about freely and deeply held personal convictions or beliefs connected to an individual's spiritual faith and integrally linked to one's self-definition and spiritual fulfilment, the practices of which allow individuals to foster a connection with the divine or with the subject or object of that spiritual faith.

[40] What then is the definition and content of an individual's protected right to religious freedom under the Quebec (or the Canadian) Charter? This Court has long articulated an expansive definition of freedom of religion, which revolves around the notion of personal choice and individual autonomy and freedom. ...

[Reference was then made to R v Big M Drug Mart Ltd and R v Edwards Books and Art Ltd..]

[42] This understanding is consistent with a personal or subjective conception of freedom of religion, one that is integrally linked with an individual's self-definition and fulfilment and is a function of personal autonomy and choice, elements which undergird the right. ...

[43] The emphasis then is on personal choice of religious beliefs. In my opinion, these decisions and commentary should not be construed to imply that freedom of religion protects only those aspects of religious belief or conduct that are objectively recognized by religious experts as being obligatory tenets or precepts of a particular religion. Consequently, claimants seeking to invoke freedom of religion should not need to prove the objective validity of their beliefs in that their beliefs are objectively recognized as valid by other members of the same religion, nor is such an inquiry appropriate for courts to make In fact, this Court has indicated on several occasions that, if anything, a person must show "[s]incerity of belief" (Edwards Books, supra, at p. 735) and not that a particular belief is "valid."

[46] To summarize up to this point, our Court's past decisions and the basic principles underlying freedom of religion support the view that freedom of religion consists of the freedom to undertake practices and harbour beliefs, having a nexus with religion, in which an individual demonstrates he or she sincerely believes or is sincerely undertaking in order to connect with the divine or as a function of his or her spiritual faith, irrespective of whether a particular practice or belief is required by official religious dogma or is in conformity with the position of religious officials.

[47] But, at the same time, this freedom encompasses objective as well as personal notions of religious belief, "obligation," precept, "commandment," custom or ritual. Consequently, both obligatory as well as voluntary expressions of faith should be protected under the Quebec (and the Canadian) Charter. It is the religious or spiritual essence of an action, not any mandatory or perceived-as-mandatory nature of its observance, that attracts protection. An inquiry into the mandatory nature of an alleged religious practice is not only inappropriate, it is plagued with difficulties.

[49] To require a person to prove that his or her religious practices are supported by a mandatory doctrine of faith, leaving it for judges to determine what those mandatory doctrines of faith are, would require courts to interfere with profoundly personal beliefs in a manner inconsistent with the principles set out by Dickson C.J. in Edwards Books, supra, at p. 759:

The purpose of s. 2(a) is to ensure that society does not interfere with profoundly personal beliefs that govern one's perception of oneself, humankind, nature, and, in some cases, a higher or different order of being. These beliefs, in turn, govern one's conduct and practices. [Emphasis added.]

[50] In my view, the State is in no position to be, nor should it become, the arbiter of religious dogma. Accordingly, courts should avoid judicially interpreting and thus determining, either explicitly or implicitly, the content of a subjective understanding of religious requirement, "obligation," precept, "commandment," custom or ritual. Secular judicial determinations of theological or religious disputes, or of contentious matters of religious doctrine, unjustifiably entangle the court in the affairs of religion.

[51] That said, while a court is not qualified to rule on the validity or veracity of any given religious practice or belief, or to choose among various interpretations of belief, it is qualified to inquire into the sincerity of a claimant's belief, where sincerity is in fact at issue It is important to emphasize, however, that sincerity of belief simply implies an honesty of belief

[52] ... [I]nquiries into a claimant's sincerity must be as limited as possible. ... [T]he court's role in assessing sincerity is intended only to ensure that a presently asserted religious belief is in good faith, neither fictitious nor capricious, and that it is not an artifice. Otherwise, nothing short of a religious inquisition would be required to decipher the innermost beliefs of human beings.

[53] Assessment of sincerity is a question of fact that can be based on several non-exhaustive criteria, including the credibility of a claimant's testimony ..., as well as an analysis of whether the alleged belief is consistent with his or her other current religious practices. It is important to underscore, however, that it is inappropriate for courts rigorously to study and focus on the past practices of claimants in order to determine whether their current beliefs are sincerely held. Over the course of a lifetime, individuals change and so can their beliefs. Religious beliefs, by their very nature, are fluid and rarely static. A person's connection to or relationship with the divine or with the subject or object of his or her spiritual faith, or his or her perceptions of religious obligation emanating from such a relationship, may well change and evolve over time. Because of the vacillating nature of religious belief, a court's inquiry into sincerity, if anything, should focus not on past practice or past belief but on a person's belief at the time of the alleged interference with his or her religious freedom.

[54] A claimant may choose to adduce expert evidence to demonstrate that his or her belief is consistent with the practices and beliefs of other adherents of the faith. While such evidence may be relevant to a demonstration of sincerity, it is not necessary. Since the focus of the inquiry is not on what others view the claimant's religious obligations as being, but rather what the claimant views these personal religious "obligations" to be, it is inappropriate to require expert opinions to show sincerity of belief. An "expert" or an authority on religious law is not the surrogate for an individual's affirmation of what his or her religious beliefs are. Religious belief is intensely personal and can easily vary from one individual to another. Requiring proof of the established practices of a religion to gauge the sincerity of belief diminishes the very freedom we seek to protect.

[55] This approach to freedom of religion effectively avoids the invidious interference of the State and its courts with religious belief. The alternative would undoubtedly result in unwarranted intrusions into the religious affairs of the synagogues, churches, mosques, temples and religious facilities of the nation with value-judgment indictments of those beliefs that may be unconventional or not mainstream. As articulated by Professor Tribe [LH Tribe, American Constitutional Law, 2nd ed (Mineola, NY: Foundation Press, 1988)], at p. 1244, "an intrusive government inquiry into the nature of a claimant's beliefs would in itself threaten the values of religious liberty."

[56] Thus, at the first stage of a religious freedom analysis, an individual advancing an issue premised upon a freedom of religion claim must show the court that (1) he or she has a practice or belief, having a nexus with religion, which calls for a particular line of conduct, either by being objectively or subjectively obligatory or customary, or by, in general, subjectively engendering a personal connection with the divine or with the subject or object of an individual's spiritual faith, irrespective of whether a particular practice or belief is required by official religious dogma or is in conformity with the position of religious officials; and (2) he or she is sincere in his or her belief. Only then will freedom of religion be triggered.

(2) Infringement of Religious Freedom

[57] Once an individual has shown that his or her religious freedom is triggered, as outlined above, a court must then ascertain whether there has been enough of an interference with the exercise of the implicated right so as to constitute an infringement of freedom of religion under the Quebec (or the Canadian) Charter.

[58] ... Section 2(a) of the Canadian Charter prohibits only burdens or impositions on religious practice that are non-trivial. This position was confirmed and adopted by Dickson C.J. for the majority in Edwards Books, supra, at p. 759[.] ...

[59] It consequently suffices that a claimant show that the impugned contractual or legislative provision (or conduct) interferes with his or her ability to act in accordance with his or her religious beliefs in a manner that is more than trivial or insubstantial. The question then becomes: what does this mean?

[60] At this stage, as a general matter, one can do no more than say that the context of each case must be examined to ascertain whether the interference is more than trivial or insubstantial. But it is important to observe what examining that context involves.

[61] In this respect, it should be emphasized that not every action will ... receive automatic protection under the banner of freedom of religion. No right, including freedom of religion, is absolute This is so because we live in a society of individuals in which we must always take the rights of others into account.

[62] Freedom of religion, as outlined above, quite appropriately reflects a broad and expansive approach to religious freedom under both the Quebec Charter and the Canadian Charter and should not be prematurely narrowly construed. However, our jurisprudence does not allow individuals to do absolutely anything in the name of that freedom. Even if individuals demonstrate that they sincerely believe in the religious essence of an action ..., they will still have to consider how the exercise of their right impacts upon the rights of others in the context of the competing rights of private individuals. Conduct which would potentially cause harm to or interference with the rights of others would not automatically be protected. The ultimate protection of any particular Charter right must be measured in relation to other rights and with a view to the underlying context in which the apparent conflict arises.

[63] Indeed, freedom of religion, like all other rights, ... may be made subject to overriding societal concerns. As with other rights, not every interference with religious freedom would be actionable, in accordance with the limitations on the exercise of fundamental rights recognized by the Quebec Charter.

B. Application to the Facts

(1) Freedom of Religion and Infringement

(a) As Pertaining to Setting Up One's Own Succah

[65] ... At trial, Rochon J., relying primarily on the testimony of Rabbi Levy, whose testimony he found more compelling than that of Rabbi Ohana, found that the impugned clauses in the declaration of co-ownership did not infringe the appellants' rights to freedom of religion since, according to him, Judaism does not require its adherents to build their own succah (at p. 1909):

[TRANSLATION] First of all, the court notes that practising Jews are not under a religious obligation to erect their own succahs. There is no commandment as to where they must be erected.

As a result, Rochon J. believed that freedom of religion was not even triggered. Although Morin J.A., in his concurring opinion, quite properly concluded that this was not the correct approach to take to freedom of religion, the majority of the Court of Appeal seemed to endorse the trial judge's reasoning. With respect, I believe their approach was mistaken.

[66] More particularly, the approach adopted by Rochon J. at trial and Dalphond J. for the majority of the Court of Appeal is inconsistent with the proper approach to freedom of religion. First, the trial judge's methodology was faulty in that he chose between two competing rabbinical authorities on a question of Jewish law. Second, he seems to have based his findings with respect to freedom of religion solely on what he perceived to be the objective obligatory requirements of Judaism. He thus failed to recognize that freedom of religion under the Quebec (and the Canadian) Charter does not require a person to prove that his or her religious practices are supported by any mandatory doctrine of faith.

[67] Furthermore, in my opinion, any incorporation of distinctions between "obligation" and "custom" or, as made by the respondent and the courts below, between "objective obligation" and "subjective obligation or belief" within the framework of a religious freedom analysis is dubious, unwarranted and unduly restrictive. In my view, when courts undertake the task of analysing religious doctrine in order to determine the truth or falsity of a contentious matter of religious law, or when courts attempt to define the very concept of religious "obligation," as has been suggested in the courts below, they enter forbidden domain. It is not within the expertise and purview of secular courts to adjudicate questions of religious doctrine.

[68] Similarly, to frame the right either in terms of objective religious "obligation" or even as the sincere subjective belief that an obligation exists and that the practice is required would lead to arbitrary and hierarchical determinations of religious "obligation," would exclude religious custom from protection, and would disregard the value of non-obligatory religious experiences by excluding those experiences from protection. Jewish women, for example, strictly speaking, do not have a biblically mandated "obligation" to dwell in a succah during the Succot holiday. If a woman, however, nonetheless sincerely believes that sitting and eating in a succah brings her closer to her Maker, is that somehow less deserving of recognition simply because she has no strict "obligation" to do so? Is the Jewish yarmulke or Sikh turban worthy of less recognition simply because it may be borne out of religious custom, not obligation? ... Surely not.

[69] Rather, as I have stated above, regardless of the position taken by religious officials and in religious texts, provided that an individual demonstrates that he or she sincerely believes that a certain practice or belief is experientially religious in nature in that it is either objectively required by the religion, or that he or she subjectively believes that it is required by the religion, or that he or she sincerely believes that the practice engenders a personal, subjective connection to the divine or to the subject or object of his or her spiritual faith, and as long as that practice has a nexus with religion, it should trigger the protection of s. 3 of the Quebec Charter or that of s. 2(a) of the Canadian Charter, or both, depending on the context.

[70] On the question of sincerity, the respondent argues that the appellants do not sincerely believe that their religion requires them to build their own individual succahs on their balconies. That said, the trial judge did find that Mr. Amselem, at least, sincerely believed that he was obliged to set up a succah on his own property, thus triggering his freedom of religion protection according to the first step in our analysis.

[71] With respect to the appellants Mr. Klein and Mr. Fonfeder, Rochon J. relied primarily on their past practices to question their sincerity and concluded that they must view the setting up of their own succah as a purely optional practice, which precluded their freedom of religion from being triggered. This conclusion is troublesome for a variety of reasons. First, Rochon J. misconstrued the scope of freedom of religion. Given this mistaken approach, it is somewhat difficult to assess the sincerity of the appellants' religious beliefs regarding the setting up of succahs on their balconies. Second, I do not accept that one may conclude that a person's current religious belief is not sincere simply because he or she previously celebrated a religious holiday differently. Beliefs and observances evolve and change over time. If, as I have underscored, sincerity of belief at the relevant time is the governing standard to ensure that a claim is honest and not an artifice, then a rigorous examination of past conduct cannot be determinative of sincerity of belief.

[72] Furthermore, ... it appears that the trial judge applied the wrong test to the evidence adduced by the appellants in support of their belief. For if freedom of religion encompasses not only what adherents feel sincerely obliged to do, but also includes what an individual demonstrates he or she sincerely believes or is sincerely undertaking in order to engender a connection with the divine ... , then the proper test would be whether the appellants sincerely believe that dwelling in or setting up their own individual succah is of religious significance to them, irrespective of whether they subjectively believe that their religion requires them to This is because it is hard to qualify the value of religious experience. Religious fulfilment is by its very nature subjective and personal. To some, the religious and spiritual significance of building and eating in one's own succah could vastly outweigh the significance of a strict fulfilment of the biblical commandment of "dwelling" in a succah, and that, in and of itself, would suffice in grounding a claim of freedom of religion.

[73] When the appellants adduced Rabbi Ohana's expert testimony, they were submitting evidence of their sincere individual belief as to the inherently personal nature of fulfilling the commandment of dwelling in a succah. As expounded upon by Rabbi Ohana, according to Jewish law the obligation of "dwelling" must be complied with festively and joyously, without causing distress to the individual. Great distress, such as ... the extreme unpleasantness rendered by forced relocation to a communal succah, with all attendant ramifications, for the entire nine-day period would not only preclude the acknowledged obligation of dwelling in a succah but would also render voluntary compliance wrongful and inappropriate, thus necessitating the setting up of a private succah. In light of our test for freedom of religion, such expert testimony, although not required, would in my view certainly support a positive finding of sincerity and honesty of the appellants' belief. As a result, all of the appellants have, in my opinion, successfully implicated freedom of religion.

[74] ... [T]he interference with the right needs to be more than trivial or insubstantial. ... [If] Mr. Amselem sincerely believes that he is obligated by the Jewish religion to set up and dwell in his own succah, then a prohibition against setting up his own succah obliterates the substance of his right, let alone interferes with it in a non-trivial fashion. A communal succah is simply not an option. Thus, his right is definitely infringed.

[With respect to the other appellants, who did not hold a belief that they were required to build their own succah, Iacobucci J found that using a communal succah or imposing on friends and family would detract significantly from the joyous celebration of the holiday, which was essential to its proper religious celebration, and would therefore constitute a non-trivial infringement of their freedom of religion.]

(2) The Alleged Justification for the Limit on the Exercise of Freedom of Religion in This Case

[84] ... I am of the view that the alleged intrusions or deleterious effects on the respondent's rights or interests under the circumstances are, at best, minimal and thus cannot be reasonably considered as imposing valid limits on the exercise of the appellants' religious freedom.

[85] In practice, to what degree would the respondent be harmed were the appellants allowed to set up a succah for a period of 9 out of 365 days a year? The evidence before us does not provide a satisfactory answer. The respondent has simply not adduced enough evidence Even if I were to consider the possibility that the economic value of the property might decrease ... , any drop in value caused by the presence of a small number of succahs for a period of nine days each year would undoubtedly be minimal. Consequently, in this case, the exercise of the appellants' freedom of religion, which I have concluded would be significantly impaired, would clearly outweigh the unsubstantiated [property value] concerns

[86] Similarly, protecting the co-owners' enjoyment of the property by preserving the aesthetic appearance of the balconies and thus enhancing the harmonious external appearance of the building cannot be reconciled with a total ban imposed on the appellants' exercise of their religious freedom. Although residing in a building with a year-long uniform and harmonious external appearance might be the co-owners' preference, the potential annoyance caused by a few succahs being set up for a period of nine days each year would undoubtedly be quite trivial.

[87] In a multiethnic and multicultural country such as ours, which ... is in many ways an example thereof for other societies[,] the argument that nominal, minimally intruded-upon aesthetic interests should outweigh the exercise of the appellants' religious freedom is unacceptable. Indeed, mutual tolerance is one of the cornerstones of all democratic societies. Living in a community that attempts to maximize human rights invariably requires openness to and recognition of the rights of others. ...

[88] Finally, the respondent alleges that banning succahs ... ensures that the balconies, as fire escape routes, would remain unobstructed in the case of emergency and, as such, the ban seeks to protect the co-owners' rights to personal security under s. 1 of the Quebec Charter. I agree that security concerns, if soundly established, would require appropriate recognition in ascertaining any limit on the exercise of the appellants' religious freedom.

[89] However, in their October 14, 1997 letter to the respondent, the appellants obviated any such concerns by all offering to set up their succahs "in such a way that they would not block any doors, would not obstruct fire lanes, [and] would pose no threat to safety or security in any way."

[90] Since the appellants have never claimed that the succah need have any exterior aesthetic religious component, the appellants should set up their succahs in a manner that conforms, as much as possible, with the general aesthetics of the property in order to respect the co-owners' property interests. Counsel for the appellants acknowledged this undertaking in oral argument.

[104] For the foregoing reasons, I would allow the appeal with costs throughout [Emphasis in original.]

Appeal allowed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The dissenting judgment of Bastarache J adopted a much narrower approach to the scope of freedom of religion. He argued that a practice is protected under s 3 of the Quebec Charter and s 2(a) of the Canadian Charter only if it is part of an established religious belief system and only if it is regarded by the individual claimant as a mandatory part of that system. In support of this narrower approach, Bastarache J emphasized that freedom of religion protects not just beliefs but also consequent religious practices:

[137] ... [T]here are in fact two elements to consider in analysing freedom of religion. First, there is the freedom to believe and profess one's beliefs; second, there is the right to manifest one's beliefs, primarily by observing rites, and by sharing one's faith by establishing places of worship and frequenting them. Thus, although private beliefs have a purely personal aspect, the other dimension of the right has genuine social significance and involves a relationship with others.

Thus, according to Bastarache J, individuals who claim that their practices fall within the guarantee of freedom of religion protection must show a "nexus" (at para 135) between their personal beliefs and the precepts of their religion. This connection between personal belief and established religious precepts that "constitute a body of objectively identifiable data" enabled Bastarache J to distinguish between "genuine religious beliefs and personal choices or practices that are unrelated to freedom of conscience" (at para 135). At para 137, Bastarache J included the following passage in support of his argument that the right of freedom of religion has "genuine social significance and involves a relationship with others":

Notwithstanding the wide variety of religious experience, no religion is or can be purely individual in its outlook, as ultimate concern is said to be. On the contrary, religions are necessarily collective endeavours. By the same token, no religion is or can be defined purely by an act of personal commitment, as the ultimate concerns of an individual are said to be. Instead, all religions demand a personal act of faith in relation to a set of beliefs that is historically derived and shared by the religious community. It follows that any genuine freedom of religion must protect, not only individual belief, but the institutions and practices that permit the collective development and expression of that belief.

More fundamentally, while it is possible to understand religion in such a way as to include practices that would conventionally be regarded as secular, it is simply not possible to understand religion in such a way that the distinction between the religious and the secular collapses, for the religious and the secular exist in contradistinction to one another. Yet such a collapse is implicit in the view that the secular becomes religious as and when it becomes a matter of ultimate concern to any individual, for whether a practice is secular or religious would then be a purely subjective question. Any objective distinction between the two would disappear.

(T. Macklem, "Faith as a Secular Value" (2000) 45 McGill L.J. 1 at p. 25.)

2. In his judgment, Iacobucci J sought to distinguish religion from other belief systems. Why did he think it necessary to do this? The problem of distinguishing religious beliefs and practices from secular beliefs and practices, which has bedeviled the American courts, was something that Canadian courts and commentators thought s 2(a) had avoided by creating a single right to freedom of conscience and religion. Indeed, in Big M, Dickson CJ had said that "freedom of conscience and religion" in s 2(a) of the Charter formed a "single integrated concept" (at para 120). If freedom of conscience and religion are parts of a single, integrated right that protects deeply held commitments or beliefs about right and truth, why was it necessary for the Court to embark on the difficult task of determining when a belief or practice is religious rather than secular?

3. Justice Iacobucci rejected argument that the appellants had waived their freedom of religion rights when they purchased their units and agreed to the by-laws. In his view, even if it were possible for an individual to waive their right to religious freedom, the appellants could not be understood to have done so in this case. Signing the declaration of co-ownership, which included the by-law, did not amount to a waiver of their right to practise their religion. First, the waiver was not unconditional because the prohibition was subject to exemptions. Second, it was not voluntary because the appellants had no choice but to sign the declaration if they wanted to reside in the building. Moreover, they had not read the by-laws and so did not know what they were agreeing to. Third, the waiver was not explicit because it did not make specific reference to the affected Charter right.

Justice Binnie, dissenting, did not think it necessary for the association to establish that the appellants had waived their right to freedom of religion when they formally agreed to the condominium by-laws. In his view, when the appellants agreed to the by-laws, the other unit owners were entitled to conclude that the practice of their religion was compatible with these rules. He said: "[T]here is a vast difference ... between using freedom of religion as a shield against interference with religious freedoms by the State and as a sword against co-contractors in a private building" (at para 185). In holding the appellants to their agreement, Binnie J stressed the following factors: that the appellants were in the best position to determine, prior to their purchase of a unit in the building, what their religion required; that they could have purchased a unit in another building; that they had chosen not to read the by-laws when they entered into the contract with the other unit owners; and, finally, that they had rejected the accommodation of a communal succah, offered by the association, even though this accommodation was not inconsistent with their religious beliefs. Which of these positions do you find more persuasive?

The minimal impairment analysis in the majority judgment in Amselem bears some similarities to the concept of "reasonable accommodation" that has developed in anti-discrimination law under human rights codes. That concept is examined in the following excerpt from the Bouchard-Taylor Report. Note that in Alberta v Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony, 2009 SCC 37 (excerpted below), McLachlin CJ, writing for a majority of the Court, stated that while the reasonable accommodation analysis may be appropriately applied in cases involving an administrative act that interferes with a religious practice, it should not be applied when the claim is that a statute or regulation has breached s 2(a).

Gérard Bouchard & Charles Taylor, Building the Future: A Time for Reconciliation

Report of the Commission de consultation sur les pratiques d'accommodement reliées aux différences culturelles (Government of Quebec, 2008) at 160-62 (emphases in original)

The question of the management of diversity inevitably arises in any society in which two or more cultures meet. Until recently, it was usually resolved in an authoritarian manner: one more powerful culture attempted either to dominate the others by marginalizing them or to eliminate them through assimilation. Even so, practices aimed at relaxation or reconciliation have always existed, even in empires. However, for several decades, above all in the West, attitudes and the law have changed as the democratic nations have ... become more respectful of diversity. This method of managing cohabitation that is taking shape is based on a general ideal of intercultural harmonization.

At the same time as this change (and perhaps in its wake), a new tradition has taken shape in the realm of law. The traditional conception of equality, which assumed uniform treatment, has given way to a conception that pays closer attention to differences. ... Over the past 25 years, this change has taken concrete form, in particular in the legal tool or provision called reasonable accommodation, which is basically dictated by the general principle of equality and fairness. ... The result is a reconciliation ethic that encompasses all social intervenors and, in particular, public and private managers.

Initially, the objective was to counteract certain forms of discrimination that courts described as indirect, which, without directly or explicitly excluding an individual or a group of people, nonetheless lead to adverse effect discrimination. This type of discrimination stems from the rigid application of a norm under certain circumstances in the realms of employment, public and private services, housing and so on. Since then, according to certain recent court judgments, some forms of direct discrimination can also lead to solutions that fall under reasonable accommodation. In short, the courts now focus on discriminatory impact, whether it is deliberate (direct) or fortuitous (indirect).

By way of illustration, consider the rule that prohibits students from bringing syringes into the classroom. A diabetic child's life could thus be endangered, which explains the relevance of the relaxation of the rule. Similar concerns guide the adjustment of certain rules in the workplace, e.g., the relaxation of a compulsory dress code for pregnant workers. The same principle applies to parking spaces, toilets and access ramps for the disabled.

In the absence of an adjustment of the rules, all of these individuals could be put at a disadvantage or excluded, which could jeopardize their right to equality. In these situations, the duty of accommodation created by law does not require that a regulation or a statute be abrogated but only that its discriminatory effects be mitigated in respect of certain individuals[.] ...

In accordance with the law, the harmonization measures requested or granted for religious reasons spring from the same logic. For example, let us mention the case of Jews or Muslims who have obtained leave to celebrate their religious holidays in the same way as Catholics, who, almost without exception, have always had permission to be absent from work on Sunday, Christmas Day and at Easter. Here, too, it is the rule of equality or fairness that prevails: what is legitimate for one faith is legitimate for the others. ...

... [T]he logic inherent in harmonization [is that ...] a number of apparently neutral or universal norms reproduce in actual fact worldviews, values, and implicit norms specific to the majority culture or population, e.g., restaurant, airline or cafeteria menus, which, in bygone days, did not take into account vegetarians or individuals with food allergies. ... It follows that absolute rigour in the application of legislation and regulations does not always guarantee fairness. ...

We can thus see that equality and freedom of religion do not necessarily have as a corollary uniformity or homogeneity. ... As the experts have expressed it, a treatment can be differential without being preferential.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The link between the minimal impairment analysis and the concept of reasonable accommodation was made explicit by the Court in another freedom of religion case decided shortly after Amselem, Multani v Commission scolaire Marguerite-Bourgeoys, 2006 SCC 6. Justice Charron wrote for a majority of the Court:

[53] ... In relation to discrimination, the courts have held that there is a duty to make reasonable accommodation for individuals who are adversely affected by a policy or rule that is neutral on its face, and that this duty extends only to the point at which it causes undue hardship to the party who must perform it. Although it is not necessary to review all the cases on the subject, the analogy with the duty of reasonable accommodation seems to me to be helpful to explain the burden resulting from the minimal impairment test with respect to a particular individual, as in the case at bar.

Multani involved an orthodox Sikh student who was forbidden by a school board in Quebec from wearing his kirpan, or ceremonial dagger, to school pursuant to a rule forbidding all weapons in the school. The Supreme Court of Canada held that the decision breached s 2(a) and that a total prohibition on the wearing of the kirpan could not be justified under s 1—some accommodation was required. The school did not dispute that the student had a sincere belief in the spiritual significance of the kirpan, and that he considered himself bound to wear it at all times.

In her reasons for the majority, Charron J noted that it was unrealistic to imagine that the school could ban all safety risks. Pens, scissors, and bats were all permitted despite their potential use as weapons. Justice Charron observed that for Sikhs, the kirpan was a religious symbol rather than a weapon: “[W]hile the kirpan undeniably has characteristics of a bladed weapon capable of wounding or killing a person ... for Orthodox Sikhs [it] is above all a religious symbol” (at para 37). She rejected the school authority’s claim that “kirpans are inherently dangerous” (at para 67) and noted that there were no recorded incidents in Canada of a Sikh student drawing his kirpan in a public school.

Justice Charron further observed that in contrast to an airplane or a court house, where a ban on the kirpan might be justified, the school had an ongoing relationship with its students and so could monitor their actions and assess the risk of violent behaviour. Finally, she thought that if the kirpan was sewn into the student’s clothes (something to which his family and the school administration had previously agreed), there would be little risk of it falling out or being taken by anyone else and used as a weapon. Allowing the kirpan to be worn in this way would be a “reasonable accommodation.” The school context clearly influenced this conclusion, with Charron J emphasizing the importance of creating an educational culture that instills values of tolerance and respect for minorities.

2. In the context of the recent “reasonable accommodation” debate, some Quebec scholars have noted that, due to its peculiar history and exposure to alternative cultural influences, societal attitudes in Quebec about the appropriate relationship between the state and religion tend to incorporate a stronger conception of secularism, and that this difference is reflected in legal conceptions of that relation: see Sébastien Grammond, “Conceptions canadienne et québécoise des droits fondamentaux: convergence ou conflit?” [“Canadian and Quebecois Concepts of Fundamental Rights: Convergence or Conflict?”] (2009) 43:1 RJT 83.

To what extent should particular societal contexts be taken into consideration when adjudicating cases concerning fundamental freedoms? Are all such freedoms to be treated similarly, or is freedom of religion qualitatively different from other fundamental freedoms? How do you reconcile the sometimes significant cultural differences between Canadian provinces and regions in Charter adjudication? Can some degree of asymmetry be reconciled with the implementation of fundamental freedoms?

The case that follows, Alberta v Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony, is a significant decision not only on the issue of reasonable accommodation of religious minorities, but also on s 1 of the Charter.

Alberta v Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony

2009 SCC 37

[Regulations under Alberta’s Traffic Safety Act, RSA 2000, c T-6 require that all drivers hold a driver’s licence. Since 1974, each licence has borne a photograph of the licence holder, subject to exemptions for people who objected to having their photographs taken on religious grounds. At the registrar’s discretion, religious objectors were granted a non-photo licence called a Condition Code G licence. In 2003, the province made the photo requirement universal. The photograph taken at the time of issuance of the licence is placed in the province’s facial recognition data bank. There were about

450 Condition Code G licences in Alberta, 56 percent of which were held by members of Hutterian Brethren colonies. The Wilson Colony of Hutterian Brethren maintains a rural, communal lifestyle, carrying on a variety of commercial activities. They sincerely believe that the second commandment prohibits them from having their photograph willingly taken and thus objected to having their photographs taken on religious grounds. The province proposed two measures to lessen the impact of the universal photo requirement, but because these measures still required that a photograph be taken for placement in the province's facial recognition data bank, the Wilson Colony rejected the measures. Instead, they proposed that no photograph be taken and that they be issued non-photo driver's licences marked: "Not to be used for identification purposes." Unable to reach an agreement with the province, the members of the Wilson Colony alleged an unjustifiable breach of their religious freedom. The claimants asserted that if members could not obtain driver's licences, the viability of their communal lifestyle would be threatened. The province, for its part, led evidence that the adoption of the universal photo requirement was connected to a new system aimed at minimizing identity theft associated with driver's licences, and that the new facial recognition data bank was aimed at reducing the risk of this type of fraud. Both the chambers Judge and the majority of the Court of Appeal held that the infringement of freedom of religion was not justified under s 1 of the Charter.]

McLACHLIN CJ (Binnie, Deschamps, and Rothstein JJ concurring):

(1) The Nature of the Limit on the Section 2(a) Right

[29] The members of the Colony believe that permitting their photo to be taken violates the Second Commandment: "You shall not make for yourself an idol, or any likeness of what is in heaven above or on the earth beneath or in the water under the earth" (Exodus 20:4). ... The impact of having a photo taken might involve censure, such as being required to stand during religious services.

[30] Given these beliefs, the effect of the universal photo requirement is to place Colony members who wish to obtain driver's licences either in the position of violating their religious commitments, or of forgoing driver's licences. ... The regulation, they argue, forces members to choose between obeying the Second Commandment and adhering to their rural communal lifestyle, thereby limiting their religious freedom and violating s. 2(a) of the Charter.

[31] My colleague Abella J. notes at para. 130 that "freedom of religion has 'both individual and collective aspects.'" She asserts that "[b]oth ... are engaged in this case." While I agree that religious freedom has both individual and collective aspects, I think it is important to be clear about the relevance of those aspects at different stages of the analysis in this case. The broader impact of the photo requirement on the Wilson Colony community is relevant at the proportionality stage of the s. 1 analysis, specifically in weighing the deleterious and salutary effects of the impugned regulation. The extent to which the impugned law undermines the proper functioning of the community properly informs that comparison. Community impact does not, however, transform the essential claim—that of the individual claimants for photo-free licences—into an assertion of a group right.

[32] An infringement of s. 2(a) of the Charter will be made out where: (1) the claimant sincerely believes in a belief or practice that has a nexus with religion; and (2) the impugned measure interferes with the claimant's ability to act in accordance with his or her religious beliefs in a manner that is more than trivial or insubstantial[.] ...

[33] The Province concedes the first element of this s. 2(a) test, sincere belief in a belief or practice that has a nexus with religion. ...

[34] The record does not disclose a concession on the second element of the test—whether the universal photo requirement interferes with Colony members' religious freedom in a manner that is more than trivial or insubstantial. ... [H]owever, the courts below seem to have proceeded on the assumption that this requirement was met. Given this assumption, I will proceed to consider whether the limit is a reasonable one, demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

(2) Is the Limit on the Section 2(a) Right Justified Under Section 1 of the Charter?

[35] This Court has recognized that a measure of leeway must be accorded to governments in determining whether limits on rights in public programs that regulate social and commercial interactions are justified under s. 1 of the Charter. ... The primary responsibility for making the difficult choices involved in public governance falls on the elected legislature and those it appoints to carry out its policies. Some of these choices may trench on constitutional rights.

[36] Freedom of religion presents a particular challenge in this respect because of the broad scope of the Charter guarantee. Much of the regulation of a modern state could be claimed by various individuals to have a more than trivial impact on a sincerely held religious belief. Giving effect to each of their religious claims could seriously undermine the universality of many regulatory programs ... to the overall detriment of the community.

[37] If the choice the legislature has made is challenged as unconstitutional, it falls to the courts to determine whether the choice falls within a range of reasonable alternatives. Section 1 of the Charter does not demand that the limit on the right be perfectly calibrated, judged in hindsight, but only that it be "reasonable" and "demonstrably justified." Where a complex regulatory response to a social problem is challenged ... [t]he bar of constitutionality must not be set so high that responsible, creative solutions to difficult problems would be threatened. A degree of deference is therefore appropriate

[38] With this in mind, I turn to the question of whether the limit on freedom of religion raised in this case has been shown to be justified under s. 1 of the Charter.

(b) Is the Purpose for Which the Limit Is Imposed Pressing and Substantial?

[42] Maintaining the integrity of the driver's licensing system in a way that minimizes the risk of identity theft is clearly a goal of pressing and substantial importance, capable of justifying limits on rights. The purpose of a universal photo requirement is to have a complete digital data bank of facial photos to prevent wrongdoers from using driver's licences as breeder documents for purposes of identity theft. As discussed above (para. 10), the requirement permits the system to ensure that each licence in the system is connected to a single individual, and that no individual has more than one licence.

[43] The chambers judge found that the universal photo requirement was also aimed at harmonization of international and interprovincial standards for photo identification. The evidence supports [this] contention While the fact that other provinces have not yet moved to this requirement arguably undercuts the position that a universal photo requirement is necessary in Alberta now, governments are entitled to act in the present with a view to future developments. Accordingly, harmonization may be considered as a factor relevant to the Province's goal

(c) Is the Means by Which the Goal Is Furthered Proportionate?

(i) Is the Limit Rationally Connected to the Purpose?

[49] The government argues that a universal system of photo identification for drivers will be more effective in preventing identity theft than a system that grants exemptions to people who object to photos being taken on religious grounds. The affidavit evidence filed by the government supports this view.

[52] I conclude that the Province has established that the universal photo requirement is rationally related to its goal of protecting the integrity of the driver's licensing system and preventing it from being used for purposes of identity theft.

(ii) Does the Limit Minimally Impair the Right?

[54] In [RJR-MacDonald Inc v Canada (AG), [1995] 3 SCR 199, 1995 CanLII 64], the minimal impairment analysis was explained as follows, at para. 160:

As the second step in the proportionality analysis, the government must show that the measures at issue impair the right of free expression as little as reasonably possible in order to achieve the legislative objective. The impairment must be "minimal," that is, the law must be carefully tailored so that rights are impaired no more than necessary. The tailoring process seldom admits of perfection and the courts must accord some leeway to the legislator. If the law falls within a range of reasonable alternatives, the courts will not find it overbroad merely because they can conceive of an alternative which might better tailor objective to infringement. ... On the other hand, if the government fails to explain why a significantly less intrusive and equally effective measure was not chosen, the law may fail. [Emphasis added; citations omitted.]

... As Aharon Barak, former President of the Supreme Court of Israel, puts it, "the rational connection test and the least harmful measure [minimum impairment] test are essentially determined against the background of the proper objective, and are derived from the need to realize it" President Barak describes this as the "internal limitation" in the minimum impairment test, which "prevents it [standing alone] from granting proper protection to human rights" (p. 373). The ... minimum impairment test requires only that the government choose the least drastic means of achieving its objective. Less drastic means which do not actually achieve the government's objective are not considered at this stage.

[55] I hasten to add that ... the court need not be satisfied that the alternative would satisfy the objective to exactly the same extent or degree as the impugned measure. In other words, the court should not accept an unrealistically exacting or precise formulation of the government's objective The requirement for an "equally effective" alternative measure in the passage from RJR-MacDonald, quoted above, should not be taken to an impractical extreme. It includes alternative measures that give sufficient protection, in all the circumstances, to the government's goal: Charkaoui v. Canada (Citizenship and Immigration), 2007 SCC 9, [2007] 1 S.C.R. 350. ... [D]eference is not blind or absolute. The test at the minimum impairment stage is whether there is an alternative, less drastic means of achieving the objective in a real and substantial manner. As I will explain, in my view the record in this case discloses no such alternative.

[56] The purpose of the limit in this case, I earlier concluded, is to [minimize] the risk of driver's licences being used for purposes of identity theft, so as to prevent fraud and various other misuses of the system. The regulation is part of a complex regulatory scheme and is aimed at an emerging and challenging problem. The question, therefore, is whether ... the universal photo requirement for all licensed drivers ... is reasonably tailored to address the problem of identity theft

[57] The Province proposes alternatives which maintain the universal photo requirement, but minimize its impact on Colony members by eliminating or alleviating the need for them to carry photos. ...

[58] However, the Hutterian claimants reject these proposals. For them, the only acceptable measure is one that entirely removes the limit on their s. 2(a) rights. They object to any photo being taken and held in a photo data bank. ...

[59] The problem with the claimants' proposal in the context of the minimum impairment inquiry is that it compromises the Province's goal of minimizing the risk of misuse of driver's licences for identity theft. ... [W]ithout the photo in the bank, the bank is neutralized and the risk that the identity of the holder can be stolen and used for fraudulent purposes is increased. ... The claimants' argument that the reduction in risk would be low, since few people are likely to request exemption from the photo requirement, assumes that some increase in risk and impairment of the government goal may occur, and hence does not assist at the stage of minimal impairment.

[60] The claimants' proposal, instead of asking what is minimally required to realize the legislative goal, asks the government to significantly compromise it. ... Contrary to the suggestion of LeBel J. (para. 201), the evidence discloses no alternative measures which would substantially satisfy the government's objective while allowing the claimants to avoid being photographed. In short, the alternative proposed by the claimants would significantly compromise the government's objective and is therefore not appropriate for consideration at the minimal impairment stage.

[61] This is not to suggest the Colony members are acting improperly. Freedom of religion cases may often present this "all or nothing" dilemma. Compromising religious beliefs is something adherents may understandably be unwilling to do. ... The result may be that the justification of a limit on the right fails to be decided not at the point of minimal impairment, which proceeds on the assumption the state goal is valid, but at the stage of proportionality of effects, which is concerned about balancing the benefits of the measure against its negative effects.

[63] Much has been made of the fact that over 700,000 Albertans do not hold driver's licences. The argument is that the risk posed by a few hundred potential religious objectors is minuscule as compared to the much larger group of unlicensed persons. This argument is accepted by the dissent. In my view, it rests on an overly broad view of the objective ... being to eliminate all identity theft in the province. Casting the government objective in these broad terms, my colleague Abella J. argues that the risk posed by a few religious dissenters is minimal But with respect, that is the wrong comparison. We must take the government's goal as it is. It is not the broad goal of eliminating all identity theft, but the more modest goal of maintaining the integrity of [the] driver's licensing system so as to minimize identity theft associated with that system. ...

[65] The courts below approached minimum impairment in a different fashion. First, they conducted the balancing inquiry at the stage of minimal impairment. Second, drawing on this Court's decision in Multani, the courts below applied a reasonable accommodation analysis instead of the Oakes test.

[66] In my view, a distinction must be maintained between the reasonable accommodation analysis undertaken when applying human rights laws, and the s. 1 justification analysis that applies to a claim that a law infringes the Charter. Where the validity of a law is at stake, the appropriate approach is a s. 1 Oakes analysis. ...

[67] A different analysis applies where a government action or administrative practice is alleged to violate the claimant's Charter rights. If a Charter violation is found, the court's remedial jurisdiction lies not under s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982 but under s. 24(1) of the Charter ... In such cases, the jurisprudence on the duty to accommodate, which applies to governments and private parties alike, may be helpful "to explain the burden resulting from the minimal impairment test with respect to a particular individual" (emphasis added): Multani, at para. 53, per Charron J.

[68] Minimal impairment and reasonable accommodation are conceptually distinct. Reasonable accommodation is a concept drawn from human rights statutes and jurisprudence. It envisions a dynamic process whereby the parties—most commonly an employer and employee—adjust the terms of their relationship in conformity with the requirements of human rights legislation, up to the point [...] of undue hardship for the accommodating party. ...

[69] A very different kind of relationship exists between a legislature and the people subject to its laws. By their very nature, laws of general application are not tailored to the unique needs of individual claimants. The legislature ... cannot be expected to tailor a law to every possible future contingency, or every sincerely held religious belief. Laws of general application affect the general public, not just the claimants before the court. The broader societal context in which the law operates must inform the s. 1 justification analysis. ... While the law's impact on the individual claimants is undoubtedly a significant factor for the court to consider in determining whether the infringement is justified, the court's ultimate perspective is societal. The question the court must answer is whether the Charter infringement is justifiable in a free and democratic society, not whether a more advantageous arrangement for a particular claimant could be envisioned.

[70] Similarly, "undue hardship," a pivotal concept in reasonable accommodation, is not easily applicable to a legislature enacting laws. ... [I]t is difficult to apply the concept of undue hardship to the cost of achieving or not achieving a legislative objective, especially when the objective is (as here) preventative or precautionary. ... Rather than strain to adapt "undue hardship" to the context of s. 1 of the Charter, it is better to speak in terms of minimal impairment and proportionality of effects.

[71] In summary, where the validity of a law of general application is at stake, reasonable accommodation is not an appropriate substitute for a proper s. 1 analysis based on the methodology of Oakes. ...

(iii) Is the Law Proportionate in its Effect?

[73] [The] final question [is]: are the overall effects of the law on the claimants disproportionate to the government's objective? ...

[75] Despite the importance Dickson C.J. accorded to this [third and final] stage of the justification analysis, it has not often been used. Indeed, Peter W. Hogg argues that the fourth branch of Oakes is actually redundant: Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. Supp.), vol. 2, at section 38.12. ...

[76] It may be questioned how a law which has passed the rigours of the first three stages of the proportionality analysis—pressing goal, rational connection, and minimum impairment—could fail at the final inquiry of proportionality of effects. The answer lies in the fact that the first three stages of Oakes are anchored in an assessment of the law's purpose. Only the fourth branch takes full account of the "severity of the deleterious effects of a measure on individuals or groups." As President Barak explains:

Whereas the rational connection test and the least harmful measure test are essentially determined against the background of the proper objective, and are derived from the need to realize it, the test of proportionality (stricto sensu) examines whether the realization of this proper objective is commensurate with the deleterious effect upon the human right. ... It requires placing colliding values and interests side by side and balancing them according to their weight. [p. 374]

In my view, the distinction drawn by Barak is a salutary one, though it has not always been strictly followed by Canadian courts. Because the minimal impairment and proportionality of effects analyses involve different kinds of balancing, analytical clarity and transparency are well served by distinguishing between them. Where no alternative means are reasonably capable of satisfying the government's objective, the real issue is whether the impact of the rights infringement is disproportionate to the likely benefits of the impugned law. Rather than reading down the government's objective within the minimal impairment analysis, the court should acknowledge that no less drastic means are available and proceed to the final stage of Oakes.

[78] In my view, this is a case where the decisive analysis falls to be done at the final stage of Oakes. ...

1. Salutary Effects

[79] ... Three salutary effects of the universal photo requirement were raised on the evidence: (1) enhancing the security of the driver's licensing scheme; (2) assisting in roadside safety and identification; and (3) eventually harmonizing Alberta's licensing scheme with those in other jurisdictions.

[80] The most important of these ... is the enhancement of the security or integrity of the driver's licensing scheme. ... Mandatory photos represent a significant gain to the integrity and usefulness of the computer comparison system. In short, requiring that all licence holders are represented by a digital photo in the data bank will accomplish these security-related objectives more effectively than would an exemption for an as yet undetermined number of religious objectors. ... This evidence stands effectively uncontradicted.

[81] Though it is difficult to quantify in exact terms how much risk of fraud would result from permitted exemptions, it is clear that the internal integrity of the system would be compromised. In this respect, the present case may be contrasted with previous religious freedom cases where this Court has found that the potential risk was too speculative.

[Reference was then made to Trinity Western University v British Columbia College of Teachers, which dealt with the risk of discriminatory conduct, and Amselem, which dealt with security concerns.]

[85] In summary, the salutary effects of the universal photo requirement for driver's licences are sufficient ... to support some restriction of the right. ... Legislatures can only be asked to impose measures that reason and the evidence suggest will be beneficial. If legislation designed to further the public good were required to await proof positive that the benefits would in fact be realized, few laws would be passed and the public interest would suffer.

2. Deleterious Effects

[86] This brings us to the deleterious effects of the limit . . . Several points call for discussion.

[89] There is no magic barometer to measure the seriousness of a particular limit on a religious practice. Religion is a matter of faith, intermingled with culture. It is individual, yet profoundly communitarian. Some aspects of a religion, like prayers and the basic sacraments, may be so sacred that any significant limit verges on forced apostasy. Other practices may be optional or a matter of personal choice. Between these two extremes lies a vast array of beliefs and practices, more important to some adherents than to others.

[90] ... [I]t is inevitable that some religious practices will come into conflict with laws and regulatory systems of general application. ... In judging the seriousness of the limit in a particular case, the perspective of the religious or conscientious claimant is important. However, this perspective must be considered in the context of a multicultural, multi-religious society ... The bare assertion by a claimant that a particular limit curtails his or her religious practice does not, without more, establish the seriousness of the limit for purposes of the proportionality analysis. Indeed to end the inquiry with such an assertion would cast an impossibly high burden of justification on the state. We must go further and evaluate the degree to which the limit actually impacts on the adherent.

[91] The seriousness of a particular limit must be judged on a case-by-case basis. However, guidance can be found in the jurisprudence. Limits that amount to state compulsion on matters of belief are always very serious. ...

[92] Canadian law reflects the fundamental proposition that the state cannot by law directly compel religious belief or practice. [Reference is then made to a series of cases, including Big M.] To compel religious practice by force of law deprives the individual of the fundamental right to choose his or her mode of religious experience, or lack thereof. Such laws will fail at the first stage of Oakes and proportionality will not need to be considered.

[93] ... However, it may be more difficult to measure the seriousness of a limit on freedom of religion where the limit arises not from a direct assault on the right to choose, but as the result of incidental and unintended effects of the law. In many such cases, the limit does not preclude choice as to religious belief or practice, but it does make it more costly.

[94] The incidental effects of a law passed for the general good on a particular religious practice may be so great that they effectively deprive the adherent of a meaningful choice ... Or the government program to which the limit is attached may be compulsory, with the result that the adherent is left with a stark choice between violating his or her religious belief and disobeying the law: Multani. The absence of a meaningful choice in such cases renders the impact of the limit very serious.

[95] However, in many cases, the incidental effects of a law passed for the general good on a particular religious practice may be less serious. The limit may impose costs on the religious practitioner in terms of money, tradition or inconvenience. However, these costs may still leave the adherent with a meaningful choice ... The Charter guarantees freedom of religion, but does not indemnify practitioners against all costs incident to the practice of religion. ... A limit on the right that exacts a cost but nevertheless leaves the adherent with a meaningful choice about the religious practice at issue will be less serious than a limit that effectively deprives the adherent of such choice.

[96] This returns us to the task at hand . . . This is not a case like Edwards Books or Multani where the incidental and unintended effect of the law is to deprive the adherent of a meaningful choice as to the religious practice. The impugned regulation, in attempting to secure a social good for the whole of society—the regulation of driver's licences in a way that minimizes fraud—imposes a cost on those who choose not to have their photos taken: the cost of not being able to drive on the highway. But on the evidence before us, that cost does not rise to the level of depriving the Hutterian claimants of a meaningful choice as to their religious practice, or adversely impacting on other Charter values.

[97] The Hutterian claimants argue that the limit presents them with an invidious choice: ... violating the Second Commandment on the one hand, or accepting the end of their rural communal life on the other hand. However, the evidence does not support the conclusion that arranging alternative means of highway transport would end the Colony's rural way of life. The claimants' affidavit says that it is necessary for at least some members to be able to drive from the Colony to nearby towns and back. It does not explain, however, why it would not be possible to hire people with driver's licences for this purpose, or to arrange third party transport to town for necessary services, like visits to the doctor. Many businesses and individuals rely on hired persons and commercial transport for their needs, either because they cannot drive or choose not to drive. Obtaining alternative transport would impose an additional economic cost on the Colony, and would go against their traditional self-sufficiency. But there is no evidence that this would be prohibitive.

[98] On the record before us, it is impossible to conclude that Colony members have been deprived of a meaningful choice to follow or not to follow the edicts of their religion. The law does not compel the taking of a photo. It merely provides that a person who wishes to obtain a driver's licence must permit a photo to be taken for the photo identification data bank. Driving automobiles on highways is not a right, but a privilege. While most adult citizens hold driver's licences, many do not, for a variety of reasons.

3. Weighing the Salutary and Deleterious Effects

[101] The law has an important social goal ... that should [not] lightly be sacrificed. The evidence supports the conclusion that the universal photo requirement addresses a pressing problem and will reduce the risk of identity-related fraud, when compared to a photo requirement that permits exceptions.

[102] Against this important public benefit must be weighed the impact of the limit on the claimants' religious rights. While the limit imposes costs . . . , it does not deprive members of their ability to live in accordance with their beliefs. Its deleterious effects, while not trivial, fall at the less serious end of the scale.

[103] Balancing the salutary and deleterious effects of the law, I conclude that the impact of the limit on religious practice associated with the universal photo requirement for obtaining a driver's licence, is proportionate.

ABELLA J (dissenting):

[130] ... [I]t is important to recognize that freedom of religion has "both individual and collective aspects" (Edwards Books, at p. 781, per Dickson C.J.). ... Both the individual and group aspects are engaged in this case.

[After further discussion of the nature of the religious rights asserted, Abella J moved on to s 1.]

Minimal Impairment

[143] Where I start to part company with the majority, with respect, is at the minimal impairment stage of the analysis. ...

[144] As McLachlin J. wrote in RJR-MacDonald, at para. 160, if the option chosen by the government "falls within a range of reasonable alternatives, the courts will not find it overbroad merely because they can conceive of an alternative which might better tailor objective to infringement." However, "if the government fails to explain why a significantly less intrusive and equally effective measure was not chosen, the law may fail."

[145] ... To be characterized as minimal, the impairment must be "carefully tailored so that rights are impaired no more than necessary" (RJR-MacDonald, at para. 160).

[146] In assessing whether Alberta's regulation satisfies the minimal impairment stage, the majority rejects the Colony's alternative proposal of a photoless licence stamped with an indication that it not be used for identification purposes, on the grounds that "[t]he only way to reduce that risk [of misusing driver's licences for identity theft] as much as possible is through a universal photo requirement" and "the alternative proposed by the claimants would significantly compromise the government's objective" (paras. 59-60 (emphasis in original)). But as discussed later in these reasons, there is no cogent or persuasive evidence [as required in Oakes] of any such dramatic interference with the government's objective.

[147] It is not difficult for the state to argue that only the measure it has chosen will maximize the attainment of the objective But at the minimal impairment stage, we do not assess whether the infringing measure fulfills the government's objective more perfectly than any other, but whether the means chosen impair the right no more than necessary to achieve the objective.

[148] In RJR-MacDonald, McLachlin J. rejected a complete ban on advertising on the grounds that a full prohibition will only be constitutionally acceptable at the minimal impairment stage of the analysis if the government can show that only a full prohibition will enable it to achieve its goal. In this case, all of the alternatives presented by the government involve the taking of a photograph. ... The requirement therefore completely extinguishes the right, and is, accordingly, analogous to the complete ban in RJR-MacDonald. It is therefore difficult to conclude that it minimally impairs the Hutterites' religious rights.

[149] The minimal impairment stage should not, however, be seen to routinely end the s. 1 analysis. It is possible, for example, to have a law, which is not minimally impairing but may, on balance, given the importance of the government objective, be proportional. In my view, most of the heavy conceptual lifting and balancing ought to be done at the final step—proportionality. Proportionality is, after all, what s. 1 is about.

Proportionality

[154] Turning to the salutary effects in this case, in my view, the government has not discharged its evidentiary burden or demonstrated that the salutary effects in these circumstances are anything more than a web of speculation (Sujit Choudhry, "So What Is the Real Legacy of Oakes? Two Decades of Proportionality Analysis Under the Canadian Charter's Section 1" (2006), 34 S.C.L.R. (2d) 501, at pp. 503-4).

[155] The positive impact of the mandatory photo requirement and the use of facial recognition technology is that it is a way to help ensure that individuals will not be able to commit identity theft. But the facial recognition technology is hardly fool-proof. [Here Abella J cited affidavit evidence that facial recognition software cannot perfectly determine whether two photographs are of the same person.] ...

[156] There is, in fact, no evidence from the government to suggest that the Condition Code G licences, in place for 29 years ... , caused any harm at all to the integrity of the licensing system. ...

[158] Seven hundred thousand Albertans are without a driver's licence. That means that 700,000 Albertans have no photograph in the system that can be checked by facial recognition technology. While adding approximately 250 licence holders to the database will reduce some opportunity for identity theft, it is hard to see how it will make a significant impact on preventing it when there are already several hundred thousand unlicensed and therefore unphotographed Albertans. ... [T]he benefit of adding the photographs of the few Hutterites who wish to drive, would be marginal.

[159] It is worth noting too that in Alberta, numerous documents are used for identity purposes, including birth certificates, social insurance cards and health cards—not all of which include a photograph. ... This suggests that the risk is not sufficiently compelling to justify universality.

[160] The fact that Alberta is seemingly unengaged by the impact on identity theft of over 700,000 Albertans being without a driver's licence, makes it difficult to understand why it feels that the system cannot tolerate 250 or so more exemptions.

[162] The salutary effects of the infringing measure are, therefore, slight and largely hypothetical. The addition of the unphotographed Hutterite licence holders to the system seems only marginally useful to the prevention of identity theft.

[163] On the other hand, the harm to the religious rights of the Hutterites weighs more heavily. The majority assesses the Wilson Colony members' freedom of religion as being a choice between having their picture taken or not having a driver's licence which may have collateral effects on their way of life. This, with respect, is not a meaningful choice for the Hutterites.

[164] The chambers judge found that the mandatory photo requirement threatened the autonomous ability of the respondents to maintain their communal way of life, Conrad J.A. of the Alberta Court of Appeal similarly wrote that the "evidence shows that although the colonies attempt to be self-sufficient, certain members must drive regularly on Alberta highways in order to ... facilitate the sale of agricultural products, purchase raw materials from suppliers, transport colony members (including children) to medical appointments, and conduct the community's financial affairs" (para. 6).

[165] ... [I]n Hofer v. Hofer, ... [1970] S.C.R. 958, ... [Ritchie J observed:] "To a Hutterian the whole life is the Church. ... The tangible evidence of this spiritual community is the secondary or material community around them. They are not farming just to be farming—it is the type of livelihood that allows the greatest assurance of independence from the surrounding world" (p. 968). Justice Ritchie further noted that to the colonies, "the activities of the community were evidence of the living church" (p. 969).

[170] The mandatory photo requirement is a form of indirect coercion that places the Wilson Colony members in the untenable position of having to choose between compliance with their religious beliefs or giving up the self-sufficiency of their community ... that has historically preserved its religious autonomy through its communal independence.

[171] I also have some discomfort with the majority's approach to assessing the seriousness of a religious infringement. It appears to suggest that there is a difference between the constitutional scrutiny of a government program that is "compulsory," and one that is "conditional" or a "privilege." This approach, with great respect, is troubling. It is both novel and inconsistent with the principle enunciated in Eldridge v. British Columbia (Attorney General), ... [1997] 3 S.C.R. 624, that "once the state does provide a benefit, it is obliged to do so in a non-discriminatory manner" (para. 73).

[172] The question, it seems to me, is whether the government has acted constitutionally. This should not depend on whether it does so through a law, a regulation, or a licence. Moreover, I have difficulty understanding what is meant by a "privilege" in the context of the provision of government services. As long ago as Roncarelli v. Duplessis, ... [1959] S.C.R. 121, this Court recognized the profound significance a licence may have on an individual's life or livelihood and that the government is required to exercise its power in administering the licensing system in a fair and constitutional manner.

[176] Given the disproportion in this case between the harmful effects of the mandatory photo requirement on religious freedom, compared to the minimal salutary effects of requiring photographs from the Hutterites, the government has not discharged its burden of demonstrating that the infringement is justified under s. 1. ...

[177] I would therefore dismiss the appeal, but would suspend a declaration of invalidity for one year to give Alberta an opportunity to fashion a responsive amendment.

LeBEL J (Fish J concurring) (dissenting):

[Justice LeBel agreed with Abella J that the restriction on the colony's freedom of religion was not justified under s 1. He noted the significant impact of the regulation on the colony's belief system and way of life. He took issue with McLachlin CJ's position that any balancing or trading-off of competing interests should be confined to the final step in the Oakes test, and argued instead that a degree of balancing must occur at the minimal impairment stage of the test.] [Emphasis in original.]

Appeal allowed.

NOTES

1. For a discussion of the Wilson Colony case, see Benjamin L Berger, "Section 1, Constitutional Reasoning and Cultural Difference: Assessing the Impacts of Alberta v Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony" (2010) 51 SCLR 25; Richard Moon, "Accommodation Without Compromise: Comment on Alberta v Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony" (2010) 51 SCLR 95.

2. In R v NS, the Supreme Court of Canada considered whether a witness in a criminal proceeding had a right under s 2(a) to wear a niqab (face covering) when giving evidence. The majority judgment of McLachlin CJ noted that two sets of Charter rights were "potentially engaged" in the case—the witness's freedom of religion and the accused's right to a fair trial. The issue, in her view, could not be resolved by a fixed rule applicable to all cases, but must instead be resolved on a case-by-case basis.

Chief Justice McLachlin set out the general approach that a trial judge should follow. The judge (in this particular case, the preliminary inquiry judge) should take account of the particular circumstances of the case before them and ask the following questions: First, does the witness have a sincere religious belief that would be compromised if she were required to testify without the niqab? Second, would permitting the witness to wear the niqab while testifying create a serious risk to the fairness of the trial? Chief Justice McLachlin said that the answer to this second question will depend on the nature of the witness's evidence—if, for example, the witness's evidence is uncontested and credibility is not at issue, then wearing a niqab while testifying will not affect the fairness of the trial. Third, if both rights are “engaged,” the judge should consider whether both could be “accommodate[d]” (at para 9) so as to avoid any conflict or trade-off between them. In other words, is there a way in which the witness may be permitted to give evidence while wearing a niqab without putting the fairness of the trial at risk? Finally, if accommodation is not possible, the issue becomes whether “the salutary effects of requiring the witness to remove the niqab … outweigh the deleterious effects of doing so” (at para 8). In answering this final question, the judge should consider the importance of the religious practice to the witness, the degree of state interference with that practice, and the actual situation in the courtroom—most important, who will see the witness’s face if she is not permitted to wear the niqab when giving evidence. The judge should also take into consideration “broader societal harms”—most significantly, whether requiring removal of the niqab will discourage women from reporting offences or otherwise participating in the justice system. On the other side, the judge must consider whether the witness’s evidence is peripheral or central to the case and whether the credibility of the witness is a significant issue in the case. In your view, does the majority’s approach properly balance the competing rights at issue?

3. In 2019, the Quebec legislature passed An Act Respecting the laicity of the State SQ 2019, c 12, which prohibits certain civil servants, such as police officers and teachers, from wearing religious symbols “in the exercise of their functions.” A religious symbol was defined as “any object, including clothing, a symbol, jewellery, an adornment, an accessory or head-wear, that (1) is worn in connection with a religious conviction or belief; or (2) is reasonably considered as referring to a religious affiliation.” The consensus among constitutional lawyers and academics is that this law violates religious freedom. However, the law also states that its provisions apply “notwithstanding” s 2 (and 7-15) of the Charter. This use by the legislature of s 33 of the Charter (the notwithstanding clause) would seem to preclude a s 2(a) challenge. Are there other constitutional arguments that can be made against the law’s validity?

4. In Reference re Same-Sex Marriage, 2004 SCC 79, the Supreme Court of Canada held that the extension of the right to civil marriage to same-sex couples would not breach the Charter guarantee of freedom of religion. The Court easily dismissed the argument that freedom of religion would be violated because the legalization of same-sex marriage would limit the freedom to hold religious views to the contrary. According to the Court, the purpose of the measure, “far from violating the Charter, flows from it” (at para 43) and that “[t]he mere recognition of the equality rights of one group cannot, in itself, constitute a violation of the [Charter] rights of another” (at para 46). The Court went on to acknowledge that although [52] [I]t[he] right to same-sex marriage conferred by the Proposed Act may conflict with the right to freedom of religion if the Act becomes law Conflicts of rights do not imply conflict with the Charter; rather, the resolution of such conflicts generally occurs within the ambit of the Charter itself by way of internal balancing and delineation.

[54] ... It has not been shown that impermissible conflicts—conflicts incapable of resolution under s. 2(a)—will arise.

The Court also observed that “the guarantee of religious freedom in s 2(a) of the Charter is broad enough to protect religious officials from being compelled by the state to perform civil or religious same-sex marriages that are contrary to their religious beliefs” (at para 60).

5. The more difficult issue, which the Supreme Court of Canada did not address in the Same-Sex Marriage Reference (see note 4 above) was the right of a civil marriage commissioner to refuse, for religious reasons, to perform a same-sex marriage. When the definition of civil marriage was changed (first by court order under the Charter and then by legislation), a number of civil marriage commissioners objected on religious grounds to performing such marriages. While some provinces agreed to excuse these commissioners from performing same-sex marriage ceremonies, other provinces, most notably Saskatchewan, were unwilling to do so and instructed their marriage commissioners to perform such marriages or face dismissal.

On three occasions the courts (and human rights tribunals) in Saskatchewan have considered whether marriage commissioners should be excused from performing same-sex marriages when they have religious objections to such relationships. In each case, the right of same-sex couples to be free from discrimination has outweighed the religious freedom of marriage commissioners to be excused from performing same-sex marriages.

In the most significant of the three cases, Marriage Commissioners Appointed Under the Marriage Act (Re), 2011 SKCA 3, the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal considered the constitutionality of a legislative proposal that would permit provincially appointed civil marriage commissioners to refuse on religious grounds to perform same-sex marriage ceremonies. The Court found that this arrangement would violate the s 15 equality rights of gays and lesbians and could not be justified under s 1. The majority reasons were written by Richards JA, with concurring reasons by Smith JA.

Under the Saskatchewan civil marriage system, as Richards JA noted, "commissioners are the route—the only route—by which individuals who wish to be married by way of a non-religious ceremony may have their union solemnized" (at para 9). He observed that under the proposed law, a same-sex couple who approached a marriage commissioner could be told that they were being refused because of their sexual orientation. The harm from such a denial would be significant:

[41] ... It is not difficult for most people to imagine the personal hurt involved in a situation where an individual is told by a governmental office "I won't help you because you are black (or Asian or First Nations) but someone else will" or "I won't help you because you are Jewish (or Muslim or Buddhist) but someone else will." Being told "I won't help you because you are gay/lesbian but someone else will" is no different.

Moreover, a significant number of commissioners might decide that they were unable to perform same-sex marriages, and the law provided no assurance that a minimum complement of commissioners would always be available to provide services to same-sex couples. The majority then had no difficulty concluding that the legislative proposal would have "the effect of creating a negative distinction based on sexual orientation" (at para 44) and that given the "historical marginalization and mistreatment of gay and lesbian individuals" (at para 45), the proposal would be discriminatory contrary to s 15 of the Charter.

In its s 1 analysis, the majority accepted that the protection of commissioners' religious freedom represented a substantial and compelling purpose. However, the proposed restriction on the rights of gay and lesbian couples failed both the minimal impairment and proportionality components of the Oakes test. The majority said that there were other ways in which the state might protect the commissioners' religious freedom. The majority identified as a less restrictive measure "a 'single entry point' system under which a couple [... would contact a] central office," (at para 85) so that any accommodation of religious beliefs would not be apparent to the couple. No judgment was made about whether a single entry point system would breach the s 15 equality rights of gay and lesbian couples. The majority concluded only that such a system would be "less restrictive" of their equality rights than the proposed law.

The majority also found that the freedom of religion interests accommodated by the proposed law "[did] not lie at the heart of s. 2(a)" because they concerned the ability of the commissioners "to act on their beliefs in the world at large" and not their freedom "to hold the religious beliefs they [chose] or to worship as they wish[ed]" (at para 93). Moreover, the majority stated that "[p]ersons who voluntarily choose to assume an office, like that of marriage commissioner, cannot expect to directly shape the office's intersection with the public so as to make it conform with their personal religious or other beliefs" (at para 97).

In her concurring reasons, Smith JA expressed the view that requiring marriage commissioners to perform same-sex civil marriages might not constitute an interference with their religious beliefs or practices since they were not "compelled to engage in the sexual activity" to which they objected; rather, "[t]heir objection [was] that it is sinful for others to engage in such activity" (at para 148, emphasis in original). Furthermore, it was not at all clear that officiating at a marriage conneded the officiant's approval of that union. Any interference with religious beliefs was trivial or insubstantial in that it did not threaten actual religious beliefs or conduct. In Smith JA's view, then, a refusal by a marriage commissioner fell outside the scope of s 2(a) protection.

6. The term "conscience" is used in two different ways in discussions about religious freedom. Sometimes conscience is contrasted with religion. Freedom of conscience, in contrast to freedom of religion, is concerned with the protection of fundamental beliefs or commitments that are not part of a religious or spiritual system. Other times, though, the term "conscience" refers to a particular kind of accommodation claim. In most religious accommodation cases, an individual (or group) seeks to be exempted from a law that prevents them from engaging in a religious practice—for example, from wearing religious dress or keeping religious holidays. In conscientious objection cases, however, the individual (or group) asks to be exempted from a law that requires them to perform an act that they regard as immoral. In many of these cases the claimant asks to be excused from performing an act that is not itself immoral but that supports or facilitates (what they see as) the immoral action of others, and so makes them complicit in this immorality.

7. Many provincial human rights codes provide some sort of exemption from anti-discrimination requirements for religious organizations that are serving a religious community: see below, Section V. But should private actors who provide services to the public also be exempted from non-discrimination requirements when they have religious objections to serving a particular group, or to what in their view amounts to supporting an immoral practice?

In Brockie v Brillinger (No 2), 2002 CanLII 63866, 222 DLR \(4th\) 174 \(Ont Sup Ct J\), the Canadian Lesbian and Gay Archives, a registered charity devoted to preserving information about lesbian and gay persons, ordered letterhead and business cards from a small printing business. The owner of the business, Brockie, refused to do the work based on his religious beliefs. Brockie indicated that he was willing to provide printing services to gay and lesbian customers, but not to an organization that "was involved in furthering and supporting the homosexual 'lifestyle'" (at para 15). The Gay Archives initiated a human rights complaint. The tribunal held that Brockie's refusal to provide printing services (which were otherwise available to the public) to a gay group amounted to discrimination under the Code. The Divisional Court of Ontario upheld the tribunal's decision. The Court rejected as "specious" the distinction proposed by Brockie, "between discrimination because of the presence of or association with a human characteristic referred to in s. 1 [of the Ontario Code] per se and discrimination because a person engages in the political act of promoting the causes of those who have such characteristics" (at para 29). The Court said that even if Brockie's objection was to "the Archives' objects and political purposes" rather than to "its mere association with people who bear such characteristics," the purpose of the Code is to create "a climate of understanding and mutual respect" (at para 29). In the Court's view, "efforts to promote an understanding and respect for those possessing any specified characteristic should not be regarded as separate from the characteristic itself" (at para 31). The Court found that although the tribunal's order breached Brockie's s 2(a) rights, it was nevertheless justified under s 1. According to the Court, claims to religious freedom "in the commercial marketplaces" are "at the fringes" of s 2(a) (at para 54).

Yet, in its s 1 analysis, the Court said that if the tribunal's order was read as requiring Brockie to print not just the archive's letterhead and business cards but also "brochures or posters with editorial content espousing causes or activities clearly repugnant to [his] fundamental religious tenets" (at para 49), it would fail the s 1 proportionality requirement. In the Court's view, the Code prohibits only "discrimination arising from denial of services because of certain characteristics of the person requesting the services" (at para 49).

8. In The Christian Medical and Dental Society of Canada v College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario, 2018 ONSC 579, a group of doctors in Ontario challenged the policy of the provincial College of Physicians and Surgeons that required its members to provide a patient with an "effective referral" to another doctor if they were unwilling or unable on moral grounds to offer a particular medical service such as an abortion or medical assistance in dying (MAiD). The doctors argued that giving an effective referral would make them complicit in acts they regarded as immoral. The doctors' claim was rejected by the Ontario Court of Appeal, which held that the interests of patients (in accessing medical services) outweighed the doctors' freedom of religion claim. For a discussion of the general issue, see Bruce Ryder, "Physicians' Rights to Conscientious Objection" in B Berger & R Moon, eds, Religion and the Exercise of Public Authority (Oxford: Hart, 2016) 127; Richard Moon, "The Conscientious Objection of Medical Practitioners to the CPSO's 'Effective Referral' Requirement" (2020) 29:1 Constitutional Forum 29.

V. RELIGIOUS FAMILIES, COMMUNITIES, AND ORGANIZATIONS

The issue of accommodation becomes more complicated when a religious group is not simply seeking an exemption from a law that interferes with a particular religious practice but is instead making a larger claim to govern its affairs according to its religious rules or judgments either with state support or, more often, simply without state interference. In Canada, many religious groups seek to regulate their internal affairs on the basis of their understanding of religious law, even when that law is inconsistent with state law or public values. Should the state interfere with the decisions religious parents make about how to educate and rear their children? Should it enforce a contract dealing with a religious subject, such as the obligation under Islamic law of a husband to pay mahr (a dowry) to his wife, or enforce arbitration decisions that are based on religious law? Should the state intervene when the husband in a Jewish marriage refuses to give his wife a get, a religious divorce, thereby preventing her from remarrying within the faith; or when someone is expelled from a Hutterite community, where all property is collectively held? Can a private religious university claim exemption from anti-discrimination laws and limit admission to those who agree to follow the precepts of the religion? Can a private religious school claim an exemption from a mandatory curricular requirement to teach a course about world religions and ethics from a "neutral and objective" perspective?

A. RELIGIOUS FAMILIES AND COMMUNITIES

We begin by looking at cases dealing with the relationship between secular law and the religious norms that govern family life. As you will see, many of the cases involve parental choices about the religious education of their children. This is not surprising. The parent-child relationship exposes most clearly the tension in our conception of religious belief or commitment. Religious commitment is viewed as both a matter of choice—that is, something the individual chooses or adopts—and identity—that is, something that the individual is socialized into or nurtured within and that forms part of their identity or group membership. Education seems to give rise to some of the most contentious freedom of religion issues. It involves competing private and public interests or claims—on the one hand, the claim of parents to determine the basic upbringing of their children and to transmit their faith to their children and, on the other, a claim of the state, on behalf of the larger community, to teach children important community values such as tolerance and respect and to encourage children's development as thoughtful and informed citizens. The issues become even more complicated when we begin to think of children as having their own religious freedom claims separate from their parents.

The issue of religion in the schools has several strands, some of which have already been dealt with in other sections of this chapter—for example, the role of religion in the public schools (Multani, Zylberberg, and Chamberlain) and the public funding of religious schools (s 93 of the Constitution Act, 1867 and the Reference re Bill 30 and Adler cases). The cases here focus on parental choices about the religious education of their children—choices to remove their children from the public school system or shield them from certain components of the state curriculum that clash with the parents' religious precepts.

The issue of state oversight of private education arose in R v Jones, [1986] 2 SCR 284, 1986 CanLII 32. In that case, Alberta's School Act, RSA 1980, c S-3 allowed children to be exempted from the requirement of compulsory public school attendance if either (1) they were attending a school approved by the provincial department of education or (2) the department or school board certified that the pupil was under "efficient instruction" at home or elsewhere. Jones, a Baptist pastor who was educating his children in a small school in the basement of his church, refused to seek departmental approval of his school or to apply for a certificate that would exempt his children from compulsory public school attendance. He argued that applying to the state for permission to do what he was authorized to do by God violated his religious convictions and thus infringed his s 2(a) right to freedom of religion. The Court dismissed his claim, with the majority finding a justified infringement of freedom of religion and Wilson J, in dissent, being unwilling to find even an infringement of freedom of religion.

Jones leaves many unanswered questions about state control of private education. Should parents be able to prevent their children from being exposed to values such as tolerance by withdrawing them from the public school system and placing them in a private school or schooling them at home? Does freedom of religion give parents the right to insulate their children from competing or critical views? What kind of intervention or supervision of private education by the state is appropriate or practical? Should the state intervene if a private school is teaching racist or homophobic beliefs? Should the state require private schools to teach sex education or evolution? Are the freedom-of-religion claims of children subsumed within those of their parents, or do children have independent rights that allow them, at least at some point in the future, to choose a different religious path from their parents? If so, can the state assert a claim to protect these rights by exposing children to different points of view in the course of their education?

SL v Commission scolaire des Chênes

DESCHAMPS J (McLachlin CJ and Binnie, Abella, Charron, Rothstein, and Cromwell JJ concurring):

[2] The appellants, S.L. and D.J., are parents of school-aged children. They submit that the refusal of the respondent Commission scolaire des Chênes ("school board") to exempt their children from the Ethics and Religious Culture ("ERC") course infringes their freedom of conscience and religion, which is protected by s. 2(a) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (the "Canadian Charter") and s. 3 of the Charter of human rights and freedoms, R.S.Q., c. C-12 (the "Quebec Charter"). Their arguments cannot succeed. Although the sincerity of a person's belief that a religious practice must be observed is relevant to whether the person's right to freedom of religion is at issue, an infringement of this right cannot be established without objective proof of an interference with the observance of that practice. In this case, given the trial judge's findings of fact and the evidence in the record concerning the neutrality of the ERC Program, I conclude that the appellants have failed to prove such an interference. There is therefore no basis for declaring that the school board erred in refusing to exempt the appellants' children from the ERC course. As a result, I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

IV. Background

[10] The place of religion in civil society has been a source of public debate since the dawn of civilization. The gradual separation of church and state in Canada has been part of a broad movement to secularize public institutions in the Western World Religious neutrality is now seen by many Western states as a legitimate means of creating a free space in which citizens of various beliefs can exercise their individual rights

[11] The religious portrait of our society is a key factor in the adoption of a policy of neutrality, not only in Quebec but also elsewhere in Canada. As a result of globalization of trade and increased individual mobility, the diversity of religious beliefs in Canada has increased sharply over the past decades.

[Justice Deschamps reviewed the history of the secularization of the public education system in Quebec, beginning in 1964 with the creation of a Ministry of Education, followed 30 years later in 1997 by a constitutional amendment that made possible the abolition of the denominational school system and the reorganization of Quebec school boards on the basis of language. With this secularization of the school system, the focus of government became the need to make the adjustments required, in a pluralistic society, to ensure that religious diversity was taken into account in the school curriculum. The result was legislation passed in 2005, introducing the mandatory ERC course, the objective of which was to provide instruction about ethics and world religions. The course would become mandatory in the 2008-9 school year. The appellants made their request for exemptions in May 2008.]

V. Applicable Principles

[17] The historical, political and social context of the late 20th century, the enactment of the Quebec and Canadian Charters, and the interpretation of freedom of religion by Canadian courts have played an important role in the Quebec government's decision to remain neutral in religious matters. While it is true that the Canadian Charter, unlike the U.S. Constitution, does not explicitly limit the support the state can give to a religion, Canadian courts have held that state sponsorship of one religious tradition amounts to discrimination against others.

[21] The concept of state religious neutrality in Canadian case law has developed alongside a growing sensitivity to the multicultural makeup of Canada and the protection of minorities.

[22] ... [I]n Syndicat Northcrest v. Amselem ..., Iacobucci J. explained that a person does not have to show that the practice the person sincerely believes he or she must observe or the belief the person endorses corresponds to a religious precept recognized by other followers. If the person believes that he or she has an obligation to act in accordance with a practice or endorses a belief "having a nexus with religion," the court is limited to assessing the sincerity of the person's belief (paras. 39, 43, 46 and 54).

[23] At the stage of establishing an infringement, however, it is not enough for a person to say that his or her rights have been infringed. The person must prove the infringement on a balance of probabilities. This may of course involve any legal form of proof, but it must nonetheless be based on facts that can be established objectively. ...

[24] It follows that ... the question is not whether the person sincerely believes that a religious practice or belief has been infringed, but whether a religious practice or belief exists that has been infringed. The subjective part of the analysis is limited to establishing that there is a sincere belief that has a nexus with religion As with any other right or freedom protected by the Canadian Charter and the Quebec Charter, proving the infringement requires an objective analysis of the rules, events or acts that interfere with the exercise of the freedom. To decide otherwise would allow persons to conclude themselves that their rights had been infringed and thus to supplant the courts in this role.

VI. Application

[26] The appellants sincerely believe that they have an obligation to pass on the precepts of the Catholic religion to their children The sincerity of their belief in this practice is not challenged by the respondents in this case. The only question at issue is whether the appellants' ability to observe the practice has been interfered with.

[27] To discharge their burden at the stage of proving an infringement, the appellants had to show that, from an objective standpoint, the ERC Program interfered with their ability to pass their faith on to their children. This is not the approach they took. Instead, they argued that it was enough for them to say that the program infringed their right Dubois J. of the Superior Court was ... correct in rejecting that interpretation

[29] The [appellants'] principal argument ... is that the obligation they believe they have, namely to pass on their faith to their children, has been interfered with. In this regard, the freedom of religion asserted by the appellants is their own freedom, not that of the children. The common theme that runs through the appellants' objections is that the ERC Program is not in fact neutral. According to the appellants, students following the ERC course would be exposed to a form of relativism, which would interfere with the appellants' ability to pass their faith on to their children. ... I will discuss this in my analysis of the alleged infringement of the appellants' freedom of religion.

[30] We must recognize that trying to achieve religious neutrality in the public sphere is a major challenge for the state. The author R. Moon has clearly described the difficulty of implementing a legislative policy that will be seen by everyone as neutral and respectful of their freedom of religion[.] [Here Deschamps J cited the same passages from Law and Religious Pluralism in Canada (Vancouver: UBC Press, 2008) 217 at 231 as cited in the Saguenay case excerpted earlier in this chapter.]

[31] We must also accept that, from a philosophical standpoint, absolute neutrality does not exist. Be that as it may, absolutes hardly have any place in the law. ...

[32] Therefore, following a realistic and non-absolutist approach, state neutrality is assured when the state ... shows respect for all postures towards religion, including that of having no religious beliefs whatsoever, while taking into account the competing constitutional rights of the individuals affected.

[33] It should be noted that the appellants' criticisms cannot address the way the course was taught to their children, since their children have never followed the course. The trial judge only examined the program.

[34] The ERC Program has two components: instruction in ethics and instruction in religious culture. [Here Deschamps J quoted a government document stressing that the program's purpose was to "[foster] an understanding of several religious traditions whose influence has been felt and is still felt in our society today ... [not] to promote some new common religious doctrine aimed at replacing specific beliefs."] ...

[35] The Ministère's formal purpose thus does not appear to have been to transmit a philosophy based on relativism or to influence young people's specific beliefs.

[36] Regarding the program itself, Dubois J. ... [concluded that making a comprehensive presentation of various religions without forcing the children to join them could not be seen in itself as an indoctrination of students that would interfere with the parents' freedom of religion.]

[37] After reviewing the record, I see no error in the trial judge's assessment. ...

[38] The appellants also maintain that exposing children to various religious facts is confusing for them. The confusion or "vacuum" allegedly results from the fact that different beliefs are presented on an equal footing.

[39] In Chamberlain v. Surrey School District No. 36, 2002 SCC 86, [2002] 4 S.C.R. 710, ... [t]he Chief Justice made the following comments (paras. 65-66):

Children encounter [some cognitive dissonance] every day in the public school system as members of a diverse student body. They see their classmates, and perhaps also their teachers, eating foods at lunch that they themselves are not permitted to eat, whether because of their parents' religious strictures or because of other moral beliefs. They see their classmates wearing clothing with features or brand labels which their parents have forbidden them to wear. And they see their classmates engaging in behaviour on the playground that their parents have told them not to engage in. The cognitive dissonance that results from such encounters is simply a part of living in a diverse society. It is also a part of growing up. Through such experiences, children come to realize that not all of their values are shared by others.

Exposure to some cognitive dissonance is arguably necessary if children are to be taught what tolerance itself involves.

[40] Parents are free to pass their personal beliefs on to their children if they so wish. However, the early exposure of children to realities that differ from those in their immediate family environment is a fact of life in society. ... Although such exposure can be a source of friction, it does not in itself constitute an infringement of s. 2(a) of the Canadian Charter and of s. 3 of the Quebec Charter.

[41] The appellants have not proven that the ERC Program infringed their freedom of religion. Therefore, the trial judge did not err in holding that the school board's refusal to exempt their children from the ERC course did not violate their constitutional right.

[In their concurring judgment, LeBel and Fish JJ noted that at the time the complaint was made, the course had not yet been implemented in the schools. They found no breach of s 2(a), but left open the possibility that the course, once in place, might be shown to advance a relativistic view of religion, contrary to the parents' beliefs.]

• • •

Appeal dismissed.

NOTE

Quebec's ERC program was subsequently considered in Loyola High School v Quebec (AG), excerpted below, which dealt with the issue of a private religious school's request for an exemption from the requirement to teach the course.

B (R) v Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto, discussed immediately below, dealt with parental decision-making about the medical care of children.

NOTE: B (R) V CHILDREN'S AID SOCIETY OF METROPOLITAN TORONTO

B (R) v Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto, [1995] 1 SCR 315, 1995 CanLII 115 dealt with the issue of the state's ability to interfere with the decisions that religious parents make about the medical care of their children. The case involved a court order for wardship authority granted to the Children's Aid Society under the Ontario Child Welfare Act, RSO 1980, c 66. This order enabled the Children's Aid Society to consent to a blood transfusion for a one-month-old baby who was critically ill. The parents, who were Jehovah's Witnesses, had refused for religious reasons to consent to the transfusion. The parents challenged the order under the Charter. The principal argument was that the wardship order violated the parents' right to liberty under s 7. However, the Supreme Court of Canada also addressed the argument that the order violated the parents' religious freedom. Five judges, in reasons written by La Forest J, held that because the law denied the parents the right to choose medical treatment for their infant according to their religious beliefs, their rights under s 2(a) had been breached. However, these five judges went on to find that this breach was justified under s 1, because the state had an interest in protecting children at risk and because the legislative scheme provided full procedural rights for parents wishing to challenge a state claim that their child was in need of protection.

Four judges, in reasons written by Iacobucci and Major JJ, found no breach of the Charter guarantee of freedom of religion. In their view, the internal limits on freedom of religion articulated by Dickson J in Big M meant that the parents' freedom of religion would not include any actions that threatened their child's life or health. Justices Iacobucci and Major also considered the religious freedom of the child in their s 2(a) analysis (at 437):

The appellants proceed on the assumption that Sheena is of the same religion as they, and hence cannot submit to a blood transfusion. Yet, Sheena has never expressed any agreement with the Jehovah's Witness faith, nor, for that matter, with any religion, assuming any such agreement would be effective. There is thus an infringement on Sheena's freedom of conscience, which arguably includes the right to live long enough to make her own reasoned choice about the religion she wishes to follow as well as the right not to hold a religious belief. In fact, denying an infant necessary medical care could preclude that child from exercising any of her constitutional rights, because the child, due to parental beliefs, may not live long enough to make choices about the ideas she should like to express, the religion she should like to profess, or the associations she should like to join. "Freedom of religion" should not encompass activity that so categorically negates the "freedom of conscience" of another.

The issue of religiously based decisions about medical care is different when the child is old enough to express a view and indicates their opposition to treatment. Adults have a general right to refuse medical treatment, including life-saving treatment, and are not required to justify their refusal on religious or other grounds. The law in most provinces extends to "mature minors" this right to refuse treatment. In AC v Manitoba (Director of Child and Family Services), 2009 SCC 30, the Supreme Court of Canada considered the constitutionality of a version of the mature-minor exemption from the state's power to authorize treatment in the best interests of children.

NOTES

1. In Bruker v Marcovitz, 2007 SCC 54, a majority of the Supreme Court of Canada, in a judgment written by Abella J, held that Marcovitz's promise to consent to a religious divorce was legally enforceable and that Bruker was entitled to damages for the loss she had suffered as a consequence of her husband's failure to do as he had promised. Justice Abella thought that a contract could have a religious object, provided that object was not "prohibited by law" or "contrary to public order" (at para 59). In her view, the religious character of Marcovitz's undertaking did not "immunize it from judicial scrutiny" (at para 47). The promise by Marcovitz was negotiated between two consenting adults, each represented by counsel, as part of a voluntary exchange of commitments intended to have legally enforceable consequences. A court, said Abella J, may take jurisdiction so long as the dispute concerns the legal rights of the parties. She observed that in this case, "[w]e are not dealing with judicial review of doctrinal religious principles, such as whether a particular get is valid" (at para 47). Justice Abella noted that Marcovitz had offered no religious reasons for his failure to perform his undertaking and that, in any event, Judaism recognized no reasons to refuse consent. According to Abella J, the enforcement of the undertaking did not breach Marcovitz's religious freedom:

[69] ... [h]is religion does not require him to refuse to give Ms. Bruker a get. ... There is no doubt that at Jewish law he could refuse to give one, but that is very different from Mr. Marcovitz being prevented by a tenet of his religious beliefs from complying with a legal obligation he voluntarily entered into and of which he took the negotiated benefits. (Emphasis in original.)

She concluded that the enforcement of his promise was supported by a public policy favouring the removal of such barriers and, more generally, by a public commitment to gender equality and freedom of choice in marriage.

In her dissenting judgment, Deschamps J held that Marcovitz's promise was not legally binding because it lacked a justiciable "object," one of the essential elements of an enforceable agreement at civil law. According to Deschamps J, a contract with an exclusively religious object (or an object that could only be understood in religious terms) was not legally enforceable under the Civil Code of Quebec, SQ 1991, c 64. The contractual obligation at issue in the Bruker case had no civic consequences; it related to Bruker's position or status within the religious community and not to her legal status or property rights.

Not far in the background of Abella J's judgment is the issue of the constitutionality of s 21.1 of the Divorce Act, RSC 1985, c 3 (2nd Supp), an issue that was specifically not pursued in this case, in part because the provision, which was enacted in 1990, was not in force when the parties divorced in 1980. Section 21.1 empowers a judge in a civil divorce case to exert pressure on a spouse who refuses to give their consent to a religious divorce by "dismiss[ing] any application filed by that spouse" and "strik[ing] out any other pleadings and affidavits filed by that spouse": see also the Ontario Family Law Act, RSO 1990, c F.3, s 2(5). While Abella J insisted that nothing in her reasons "purports in any way to decide the constitutionality of s 21.1" (at para 35), her finding that Marcovitz's freedom of religion was not breached by the enforcement of his promise would seem to apply equally to this provision of the Divorce Act.

2. There are several reasons why the courts may hesitate or refuse to enforce agreements that are based on religious norms or deal with religious matters. First, the interpretation of such an agreement may draw the courts into disputes about the proper understanding of religious doctrine or practice. Second, legal enforcement may be inappropriate given the subject matter of the agreement—matters of faith or deep commitment—and the relationship between the parties—members of a community bound by a shared commitment to a set of values or practices or to a way of life. Third, agreements between religious community members may be tainted by undue influence or unfair pressure.

3. Polygamy has traditionally been practised or accepted in some religious and cultural groups from Africa, Asia, and the Middle East. The Mormon (LDS) church repudiated the practice of polygamy in the late 19th century; however, a breakaway fundamentalist group continues to follow this practice. In Reference re: Section 293 of the Criminal Code of Canada, 2011 BCSC 1588, the BC Superior Court was asked by the BC government for its opinion concerning the constitutionality of the Criminal Code ban on polygamy. Section 293(1) of the Code provides:

293(1) Every person is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term of not more than five years or is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction who

(a) practises or enters into or in any manner agrees or consents to practise or enter into any form of polygamy or any kind of conjugal union with more than one person at the same time, whether or not it is by law recognized as a binding form of marriage; or

(b) celebrates, assists or is a party to a rite, ceremony, contract or consent that purports to sanction a relationship mentioned in paragraph (a).

(2) Where an accused is charged with an offence under this section, no averment or proof of the method by which the alleged relationship was entered into, agreed to or consented to is necessary in the indictment or on the trial of the accused, nor is it necessary on the trial to prove that the persons who are alleged to have entered into the relationship had or intended to have sexual intercourse.

After hearing a significant amount of expert evidence concerning the practice of polygamy, the judge held that the ban breached s 2 (a) of the Charter, but was justified under s 1 because Parliament had “a very strong basis for a reasoned apprehension of harm to many in our society inherent in the practice of polygamy” (at para 6), including harm to the women and children in polygamous families and to the “institution of monogamous marriage” (at para 5). For a critique of the Court’s reasoning, see Carissima Mathen, “Reflecting Culture: Polygamy and the Charter,” in B Berger and J Stribopoulos, eds, Unsettled Legacy: Thirty Years of Criminal Justice Under the Charter (Toronto: LexisNexis, 2012) 389.

B. RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATIONS AND INSTITUTIONS

Sometimes an accommodation claim is made not by an individual who is seeking exemption for a specific practice, but instead by a religious organization or institution, which is insisting upon significant autonomy in the governance of its internal affairs. In these institutional autonomy cases, the key question for courts is whether the exemption from state law will impact the rights and interests of non-members—of outsiders to the spiritual community. The right of the Catholic Church, for example, to exclude women from the priesthood (to discriminate against women) is not decided by balancing the religious claim or interest against the claim to gender equality. As a private religious organization or institution, the Catholic Church should be free to govern its internal affairs according to its own rules or norms and not be subject to public anti-discrimination requirements. Similarly, a religious school may dismiss a teacher who enters a same-sex relationship contrary to church doctrine, not because the religious interests of the group or school outweigh the public value of sexual orientation equality but simply because the school is understood to be a private religious organization.

The courts have generally treated religious organizations as voluntary associations of individuals pursuing common ends who should be free to operate as they choose. However, the state may sometimes decide to intervene in the affairs of a religious community characterized by hierarchy and insularity when the prevailing practices in that community are thought to be harmful to some of its members, even though the members have, in at least a formal sense, chosen to participate in those practices. Richard Moon has argued that the deep communal connections that are part of the value of religious life and commitment—a source of meaning and value for adherents—may also be the source of what the courts regard as harm—the lack of meaningful choice or opportunity open to the members of such communities or the oppression of vulnerable group members: see Richard Moon, Freedom of Conscience and Religion (Toronto: Irwin Law, 2014). In most of these institutional autonomy cases, though, the issue is simply do the actions of the organization impact outsiders to the group?—a matter of drawing the line between the civil sphere (of government action) and the private or communal sphere (of religious practice).

In Lakeside Colony of Hutterian Brethren v Hofer, [1992] 3 SCR 165, 1992 CanLII 37, Gonthier J noted that the courts will not generally intervene in doctrinal or spiritual matters, but may do so when civil or property rights are involved. According to Gonthier J, once the court assumes jurisdiction over a dispute with religious components, “there is no alternative but to come to the best understanding possible of the applicable tradition and custom.”

In Highwood Congregation of Jehovah’s Witnesses (Judicial Committee) v Wall, 2018 SCC 26, Wall, a member of the Highwood Congregation of Jehovah’s Witnesses, was “disfellowshipped” by the Judicial Committee of elders because he was judged to have engaged in sinful behaviour without being sufficiently repentant. Wall applied for judicial review of the committee’s decision, arguing that the decision should be quashed on the ground that it was procedurally unfair. The Supreme Court of Canada held that the application must fail for several reasons:

First, judicial review is limited to public decision makers, which the Judicial Committee is not. ...

Second, there is no free-standing right to procedural fairness absent an underlying legal right. Courts may only interfere to address procedural fairness concerns related to the decisions of religious groups or other voluntary associations if legal rights are at stake and the claim is founded on a valid cause of action, for example, contract, tort or restitution. ... No basis has been shown that W and the Congregation intended to create legal relations. No contractual right exists. The Congregation does not have a written constitution, by-laws or rules to be enforced. ...

Third, even where review is available, the courts will consider only those issues that are justiciable. The ecclesiastical issues raised by W are not justiciable. Justiciability relates to whether the subject matter of a dispute is appropriate for a court to decide. ... Even the procedural rules of a particular religious group may involve the interpretation of religious doctrine, such as in this case. The courts have neither legitimacy nor institutional capacity to deal with contentious matters of religious doctrine.

More recently, in Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church of Canada St Mary Cathedral v Aga, 2021 SCC 22, several members of a church sought a declaration that their expulsion from the congregation violated the principles of natural justice and so was “null and void.” The Supreme Court of Canada held that the courts may review the decision of voluntary associations only when the decision affects a legal right such as “property, contract, tort or unjust enrichment and statutory causes of action.” “The question” said the Court, “is whether the particular relief sought by the plaintiff is the vindication of a legal right. If not, then there is no cause of action or basis for relief.” The Court found, in this case, no evidence of an intention by the members of the church to enter into legal relations. It held that

[b]ecoming a member of a religious voluntary association, and even agreeing to be bound by certain rules, does not, without more, evince an objective intention to enter into a legal contract enforceable by the courts. ... The absence of any evidence of an objective intention to enter into legal relations is fatal to the expelled members' claim.

Each of the human rights codes in Canada includes an exemption from its ban on employment discrimination for a "bona fide occupational qualification" (BFOQ)—an exemption that has been applied to religion-based requirements for employment at religious organizations. Some of these codes also include more specific exemptions for organizations that serve "the interests of persons identified by their ... creed." Most obviously, a church community will not be found to have breached the ban on religious discrimination in employment when it selects a minister or pastor based on their commitment to a particular religious belief system. A more difficult case arises when an organization requires that all its employees, regardless of the specific tasks they perform, adhere to certain religious practices. For example, in Caldwell v Stuart, [1984] 2 SCR 603, 1984 CanLII 128, the Supreme Court of Canada held that a Roman Catholic high school could dismiss a teacher who, although a member of the Church, had married a divorced man in a civil ceremony contrary to church doctrine. The Court found that the school's requirement that all teachers adhere to church doctrine was a BFOQ.

Human rights codes may also have exemptions for "special interest" organizations, allowing religious organizations, among others, to discriminate in providing services to members of their organizations: see, for example, the following provision in the Ontario Human Rights Code, RSO 1990, c H-19:

18. The rights under Part I to equal treatment with respect to services and facilities ... are not infringed where membership or participation in a religious, philanthropic, educational, fraternal or social institution or organization that is primarily engaged in serving the interests of persons identified by a prohibited ground of discrimination is restricted to persons who are similarly identified.

Or this provision in the BC Human Rights Code, RSBC 1996, c 210:

41(1) If a charitable, philanthropic, educational, fraternal, religious or social organization or corporation that is not operated for profit has as a primary purpose the promotion of the interests and welfare of an identifiable group or class of persons characterized by a physical or mental disability or by a common race, religion, age, sex, marital status, political belief, colour, ancestry or place of origin, that organization or corporation must not be considered to be contravening this Code because it is granting a preference to members of the identifiable group or class of persons.

Trinity Western University (TWU) is an evangelical Christian university, located in Langley, British Columbia, that required its students to sign a covenant that prohibited them from engaging in certain behaviours, including same-sex intimacy.

In Trinity Western University v British Columbia College of Teachers, the Supreme Court of Canada held that the BCCT acted outside its powers when it refused to accredit a teacher training program at TWU. The BCCT believed that the program would not adequately prepare students to teach in the public school system in BC because it affirmed the view that homosexuality was sinful. In making this decision, the BCCT referred specifically to the Contract of Responsibilities signed by teachers and students that prohibited "homosexual behaviour" and other activities. According to the BCCT, an institution that wishes to train teachers for the public school system must "provide an institutional setting that appropriately prepares future teachers for the public school environment, and in particular for the diversity of public school students" (at para 11), which, because of the contract, this program did not do.

The majority of the Supreme Court of Canada, in a judgment written by Iacobucci and Bastarache JJ, accepted that the denial of accreditation "places a burden on members of a particular religious group ... preventing them from expressing freely their religious beliefs and associating to put them into practice" (at para 32). In the majority's view, the BCCT decision meant that TWU must abandon its religiously based "community standards" if it is to run a program that trains teachers for the public school system. Graduates of TWU "are likewise affected because the affirmation of their religious beliefs and attendance at TWU will not lead to certification as public school teachers" (at para 32). Furthermore, "[t]he issue at the heart of this appeal," said the majority, "is how to reconcile the religious freedoms of individuals wishing to attend TWU with the equality concerns of students in B.C.'s public school system."

The majority, however, found no reason to deny accreditation to the TWU program. The majority agreed that if a teacher engages in discriminatory conduct, they "can be subject to disciplinary proceedings" (at para 37), but maintained that the right of gays and lesbians to be free from discrimination is not violated simply because a teacher holds discriminatory views. In the majority's view, "the proper place to draw the line in cases like the one at bar is generally between belief and conduct" (at para 36). A teacher may believe that homosexuality is sinful or wrongful, but as long as they do not act on those views when dealing with their students, they will not be found to have breached their right to equality. The majority found no evidence that any TWU graduate had acted in a discriminatory way in the classroom. And so, the limitation on the religious freedom of the staff and graduates of TWU (the denial of accreditation) was imposed in the absence of any evidence that the program had a detrimental impact on the school system. In the absence of "concrete evidence that training teachers at TWU fosters discrimination in the public schools of B.C." (at para 36), the BCCT had no grounds to deny accreditation to TWU and interfere with the religious freedom of TWU instructors and students to hold certain beliefs.

In 2010, TWU applied to the various provincial law societies for accreditation of a law program. In Canada, the graduates of an accredited program are eligible to take provincial law society exams, and, if they pass these exams, to be called to the bar in the particular province following a brief articling period. The graduates of an unaccredited program may still be called to the provincial bar but must also satisfy some additional requirements. While many of the provincial law societies were prepared to accredit the TWU program, the law societies of British Columbia (LSBC) and Ontario (LSUC/LSO) declined to do so. The law societies of BC and Ontario were concerned that this covenant would have the effect of excluding gay and lesbian students from the program and, as a consequence, would limit their access to the legal profession.

Law Society of British Columbia v Trinity Western University

2018 SCC 32

[Trinity Western University (TWU), an evangelical Christian postsecondary institution, sought to open a law school that would require its students and faculty to adhere to a religiously based code of conduct prohibiting "sexual intimacy that violates the sacredness of marriage between a man and a woman" (at para 1). The Law Society of British Columbia (LSBC) regulates the province's legal profession under a statute, the Legal Profession Act, SBC 1998, c 9. The LSBC decided not to recognize TWU's proposed law school. While the appeal also raises issues of statutory interpretation and administrative law, the excerpt below is confined to the issue of whether or not the LSBC's decision unreasonably limited rights under s 2(a) of the Charter.]

ABELLA, MOLDAVER, KARAKATSANIS, WAGNER and GASCON JJ:

I. Overview

• • •

[3] In our respectful view, the LSBC's decision not to recognize TWU's proposed law school represents a proportionate balance between the limitation on the Charter right at issue and the statutory objectives governing the LSBC. The LSBC's decision was therefore reasonable.

• • •

(1) Whether Freedom of Religion Is Engaged

[61] TWU is a private religious institution created to support the collective religious practices of its members. For the reasons set out below, we find that the religious freedom of members of the TWU community is limited by the LSBC's decision. It is unnecessary to determine whether TWU, as an institution, possesses rights under s. 2(a) of the Charter.

[63] Section 2(a) of the Charter is limited when the claimant demonstrates two things: first, that he or she sincerely believes in a practice or belief that has a nexus with religion; and second, that the impugned state conduct interferes, in a manner that is more than trivial or insubstantial, with his or her ability to act in accordance with that practice or belief . . . If, based on this test, s. 2(a) is not engaged, there is nothing to balance.

[64] Although this Court's interpretation of freedom of religion reflects the notion of personal choice and individual autonomy and freedom, religion is about both religious beliefs and religious relationships . . . The protection of individual religious rights under s. 2(a) must therefore account for the socially embedded nature of religious belief, as well as the "deep linkages between this belief and its manifestation through communal institutions and traditions" (Loyola, at para. 60). In other words, religious freedom is individual, but also "profoundly communitarian" (Hutterian Brethren, at para. 89). The ability of religious adherents to come together and create cohesive communities of belief and practice is an important aspect of religious freedom under s. 2(a).

[65] On the sincerity of the belief, the respondents have articulated the religious interest at stake in various ways. In their factum, they contend that "[t]he sincere beliefs of evangelical Christians include 'the belief in the importance of being in an institution with others who either share that belief or are prepared to honour it in their conduct'" (para. 96, quoting Trinity Western University v. Nova Scotia Barristers' Society, 2015 NSSC 25, 381 D.L.R. (4th) 296, at para. 235). Elsewhere they argue that evangelicals believe "they should carry their beliefs into educational communities" and in the value of educating the whole person with a Christian ethos (para. 113).

[66] The affidavit evidence from TWU students focusses primarily on the spiritual growth that is engendered by studying law in a religious learning environment.

[67] There is no doubt evangelical Christians believe that studying in a religious environment can help them grow spiritually. Evangelical Christians carry their religious beliefs and values beyond their private lives and into their work, education, and politics.

[68] TWU seeks to foster this spiritual growth. . . TWU seeks to promote "total student development through . . . deepened commitment to Jesus Christ and a Christian way of life" (p. 120).

[69] Several alumni of TWU emphasized the spiritual benefits of receiving an education from a Christian perspective in an environment infused with evangelical Christian values. . .

[70] Because s. 2(a) protects beliefs which are sincerely held by the claimant, the court must "ensure that a presently asserted religious belief is in good faith, neither fictitious nor capricious, and that it is not an artifice" (Amselem, at para. 52; see also Multani v. Commission scolaire Marguerite-Bourgeoys, 2006 SCC 6, [2006] 1 S.C.R. 256, at para. 35). It is clear from the record that evangelical members of TWU's community sincerely believe that studying in a community defined by religious beliefs in which members follow particular religious rules of conduct contributes to their spiritual development. In our view, this is the religious belief or practice implicated by the LSBC's decision.

[71] This belief is, in turn, supported through the universal adoption of the Covenant. ... A core value at TWU is "obeying the authority of Scripture" (R.R., vol. I, at p. 121), and the Covenant promotes this compliance. Specifically, it requires TWU community members to "encourage and support other members of the community in their pursuit of these values and ideals" (A.R., vol. III, at p. 402). Thus, the mandatory Covenant helps create an environment in which TWU students can grow spiritually. ...

[72] Members of the TWU community have noted that the mandatory Covenant "makes it easier" for them to adhere to their faith, and it creates an environment where their moral discipline is not constantly tested. ...

[73] To summarize, it is clear from this evidence that evangelical Christians believe that studying in an environment defined by religious beliefs in which members follow particular religious rules of conduct enhances the spiritual growth of members of that community. And the Covenant supports the practice of studying in an environment infused with evangelical beliefs.

[74] The next question is whether the LSBC's decision not to approve TWU's law school limits the ability of TWU's community members to act in accordance with these beliefs and practices in a manner that is more than trivial or insubstantial (Amselem, at para. 74; Ktunaxa, at para. 68). ... This is an objective analysis that looks at the impact on the claimants, rather than the impact of the implicated practices or beliefs on others (S.L. v. Commission scolaire des Chênes, 2012 SCC 7, [2012] 1 S.C.R. 235, at paras. 23-24; Ktunaxa, at para. 70).

[75] By interpreting the public interest in a way that precludes the approval of TWU's law school governed by the mandatory Covenant, the LSBC has interfered with TWU's ability to maintain an approved law school as a religious community defined by its own religious practices. The effect is a limitation on the right of TWU's community members to enhance their spiritual development through studying law in an environment defined by their religious beliefs in which members follow certain religious rules of conduct. Accordingly, their religious rights were engaged by the decision.

(3) Proportionate Balancing

[79] In Doré and Loyola, this Court held that where an administrative decision engages a Charter protection, the reviewing court should apply "a robust proportionality analysis consistent with administrative law principles" instead of "a literal s. 1 approach" (Loyola, at para. 3). Under the Doré framework, the administrative decision will be reasonable if it reflects a proportionate balancing of the Charter protection with the statutory mandate Doré's approach recognizes that an administrative decision-maker, exercising a discretionary power under his or her home statute, typically brings expertise to the balancing of a Charter protection with the statutory objectives at stake Consequently, the decision-maker is [best able] to weigh the Charter protections with his or her statutory mandate in light of the specific facts of the case (Doré, at para. 54). It follows that deference [by a reviewing court] is warranted . . . Doré recognizes that there may be more than one outcome that strikes a proportionate balance . . . As long as the decision “falls within a range of possible, acceptable outcomes,” it will be reasonable (Doré, at para. 56). . . .

[80] . . . For a decision to be proportionate, it is not enough for the decision-maker to simply balance the statutory objectives with the Charter protection in making its decision. Rather, the reviewing court must be satisfied that the decision proportionately balances these factors, that is, that it “gives effect, as fully as possible to the Charter protections at stake given the particular statutory mandate” (Loyola, at para. 39). Put another way, the Charter protection must be “affected as little as reasonably possible” in light of the applicable statutory objectives (Loyola, at para. 40). . . . Simply put, a decision that has a disproportionate impact on Charter rights is not reasonable.

[81] The reviewing court must consider whether there were other reasonable possibilities that would give effect to Charter protections more fully in light of the objectives. This does not mean that the administrative decision-maker must choose the option that limits the Charter protection least. The question for the reviewing court is always whether the decision falls within a range of reasonable outcomes This is a highly contextual inquiry.

[82] The reviewing court must also consider how substantial the limitation on the Charter protection was compared to the benefits to the furtherance of the statutory objectives in this context The Doré framework therefore finds “analytical harmony with the final stages of the Oakes framework . . . ” (Loyola, at para. 40). In working “the same justificatory muscles” as the Oakes test (Doré, at para. 5), the Doré analysis ensures that the pursuit of objectives is proportionate. In the context of a challenge to an administrative decision where the constitutionality of the statutory mandate itself is not at issue, the proper inquiry is whether the decision-maker has furthered his or her statutory mandate in a manner that is proportionate to the resulting limitation on the Charter right.

[83] We now turn to whether the limitation on the religious freedom of the members of the TWU community is a proportionate one in light of the LSBC’s statutory mandate.

[84] The LSBC was faced with only two options—to approve or reject TWU’s proposed law school. Given the LSBC’s interpretation of its statutory mandate, approving TWU’s proposed law school would not have advanced the relevant statutory objectives, and therefore was not a reasonable possibility [85] The LSBC’s decision also reasonably balanced the severity of the interference with the Charter protection against the benefits to its statutory objectives. To begin, the LSBC’s decision did not limit religious freedom to a significant extent. The LSBC did not deny approval to TWU’s proposed law school in the abstract; rather, it denied a specific proposal that included the mandatory Covenant. Indeed, when the LSBC asked TWU whether it would “consider” amendments to its Covenant, TWU expressed no willingness to compromise The decision therefore only prevents TWU’s community members from attending an approved law school at TWU that is governed by a mandatory covenant.

[86] The Court of Appeal described the limitation in this case as “severe” because it precludes graduates of TWU’s proposed law school from practising law in British Columbia (para. 168). However, the LSBC’s decision . . . is limited to preventing prospective students from studying law at TWU with a mandatory covenant.

[87] First, the limitation in this case is of minor significance because a mandatory covenant is, on the record before us, not absolutely required . . . to study law in a

Christian learning environment in which people follow certain religious rules of conduct. The decision ... only prevents prospective students from studying law in their optimal religious learning environment where everyone has to abide by the Covenant.

[88] Second, ... the record makes clear that prospective TWU law students view studying law in a learning environment infused with the community's religious beliefs as preferred (rather than necessary) for their spiritual growth. ...

[89] Attending TWU's proposed law school is said to make it "easier" to practise evangelical beliefs. That attending law at TWU, with a mandatory covenant, is a preference is clear from TWU's own affiants who, like Mr. Volkenant, expressed a desire to attend TWU's proposed law school:

I do not know if I would have chosen to attend TWU law school, but I certainly would have appreciated the option. [Emphasis added.]

(R.R., vol. II, at p. 154)

I am familiar with TWU's proposal for its School of Law. Had this option existed when I was considering law schools, I likely would have applied to it. [Emphasis added.]

(R.R., vol. I, at p. 7)

... I am familiar with the proposal put forward by TWU in respect to its School of Law and believe I would have considered attending had this option been available to me. [Emphasis added.]

(R.R., vol. I, at p. 143)

[90] Our point is that, on the record before us, prospective TWU law students effectively admit that they have much less at stake than claimants in many other cases that have come before this Court[.] ...

[91] On the other side of the scale is the extent to which the LSBC's decision furthered its statutory objectives. ...

[92] It is clear that the decision not to approve TWU's proposed law school significantly advanced the LSBC's statutory objectives—to promote and protect the public interest in the administration of justice by preserving and protecting the rights and freedoms of all persons and ensuring the competence of the legal profession (see LPA, ss. 3(a) and 3(b)).

[93] First, the decision advances the LSBC's relevant statutory objectives by maintaining equal access to and diversity in the legal profession. ... As this Court acknowledged in TWU 2001, "[a]lthough the Community Standards are expressed in terms of a code of conduct rather than an article of faith, we conclude that a homosexual student would not be tempted to apply for admission, and could only sign the so-called student contract at a considerable personal cost" (para. 25). It follows that the 60 law school seats created by TWU's proposed law school will be effectively closed to the vast majority of LGBTQ students. This barrier to admission may discourage qualified candidates from gaining entry to the legal profession.

[94] TWU submits that ... there are many other options open to LGBTQ people who wish to attend law school (R.F., at para. 175). Even further, TWU asserts that its law school will result in an overall increase in law school seats, which expands choices for all students (para. 138). The British Columbia Court of Appeal accepted this argument

[95] Such arguments fail to recognize that ... an entire law school would be closed off to the vast majority of LGBTQ individuals on the basis of their sexual identity. Those who are able to sign the Covenant will be able to apply to 60 more law school seats per year, whereas those 60 seats remain effectively closed to most LGBTQ people. ... This undermines true equality of access to legal education, and by extension, the legal profession. Substantive equality demands more than just the availability of options and opportunities—it prevents “the violation of essential human dignity and freedom” and “eliminate[s] any possibility of a person being treated in substance as ‘less worthy’ than others” (Quebec (Attorney General) v. A, 2013 SCC 5, [2013] 1 S.C.R. 61, at para. 138). The public confidence in the administration of justice may be undermined if the LSBC is seen to approve a law school that effectively bars many LGBTQ people from attending.

[96] Second, the decision furthers the statutory objective—protecting the public interest in the administration of justice by preserving rights and freedoms—by preventing the risk of significant harm to LGBTQ people who attend TWU’s proposed law school. The British Columbia Court of Appeal accepted that if LGBTQ students signed the Covenant to gain access to TWU “they would have to either ‘live a lie to obtain a degree’ ... or face the prospect of disciplinary action including expulsion” (para. 172). ... Attending TWU’s law school would mean that LGBTQ students would have to deny a crucial component of their identity in the most private and personal of spaces for three years in order to receive a legal education (I.F., Egale Canada Human Rights Trust (file No. 37318), at para. 14; Start Proud and OUTlaws (file No. 37209), at para. 6).

[97] Despite this, TWU asserts that LGBTQ students will suffer no harm ... because the Covenant requires all members of TWU’s community to “treat all persons with dignity, respect and equality, regardless of personal differences” (R.F., at para. 92). However, as this Court recognized in Saskatchewan (Human Rights Commission) v. Whatcott, 2013 SCC 11, [2013] 1 S.C.R. 467, it is not possible “to condemn a practice so central to the identity of a protected and vulnerable minority without thereby discriminating against its members and affronting their human dignity and personhood” [pinpoint citation omitted].

[99] The TWU community has the right to determine the rules of conduct which govern its members. ... Where a religious practice impacts others, however, this can be taken into account at the balancing stage. The Covenant is a commitment to enforcing a religiously based code of conduct, not just in respect of one’s own behaviour, but also in respect of other members of the TWU community (D. Pothier, “An Argument Against Accreditation of Trinity Western University’s Proposed Law School” (2014), 23:1 Const. Forum Const. 1, at p. 2). The effect of the mandatory Covenant is to restrict the conduct of others.

[100] The limitation on religious freedom in this case must be understood in light of the reality that conflict between the pursuit of statutory objectives and individual freedoms may be inevitable. As this Court has held, state interferences with religious freedom “must be considered in the context of a multicultural, multi-religious society where the duty of state authorities to legislate for the general good inevitably produces conflicts with individual beliefs” (Hutterian Brethren, at para. 90; see also Loyola, at para. 47). Accordingly, minor limits on religious freedom are often an unavoidable reality of a decision-maker’s pursuit of its statutory mandate in a multicultural and democratic society.

[101] In saying this, we do not dispute that “[d]isagreement and discomfort with the views of others is unavoidable in a free and democratic society” (C.A. reasons, at para. 188), and that a secular state cannot interfere with religious freedom unless it conflicts with or harms overriding public interests (para. 131, citing Loyola, at para. 43). But more is at stake here than simply “disagreement and discomfort” This Court has held that religious freedom can be limited where an individual’s religious beliefs or practices have the effect of "injur[ing] his or her neighbours or their parallel rights to hold and manifest beliefs and opinions of their own" (Big M, at p. 346). ... Being required by someone else's religious beliefs to behave contrary to one's sexual identity is degrading and disrespectful. Being required to do so offends the public perception that freedom of religion includes freedom from religion.

[102] In the end, it cannot be said that the denial of approval is a serious limitation on the religious rights of members of the TWU community. The LSBC's decision does not suppress TWU's religious difference. Except for the limitation we have identified, no evangelical Christian is denied the right to practise his or her religion as and where they choose.

[103] The refusal ... means that members of the TWU religious community are not free to impose those religious beliefs on fellow law students, since they have an inequitable impact and can cause significant harm. The LSBC chose an interpretation of the public interest in the administration of justice which mandates access to law schools based on merit and diversity, not exclusionary religious practices. The refusal to approve TWU's proposed law school prevents concrete, not abstract, harms to LGBTQ people and to the public in general. ... It also maintains public confidence in the legal profession

[104] Given the significant benefits to the relevant statutory objectives and the minor significance of the limitation on the Charter rights at issue ... , the decision to refuse to approve TWU's proposed law school represents a proportionate balance. In other circumstances, a more serious limitation may be entitled to greater weight in the balance and change the outcome. But that is not this case.

[105] In our view, the decision made by the LSBC "gives effect, as fully as possible to the Charter protections at stake given the particular statutory mandate" (Loyola, at para. 39). Therefore, the decision amounted to a proportionate balancing and was reasonable.

V. Disposition

[106] The resolution of the LSBC to declare that TWU's proposed law school not be approved is restored. As a result, the appeal from the Court of Appeal for British Columbia is allowed, with costs.

• • •

CÔTÉ and BROWN JJ (dissenting):

I. Introduction

[260] One way of understanding this appeal and the appeal in Trinity Western University v. Law Society of Upper Canada, 2018 SCC 33 ... is that they call upon this Court to decide who controls the door to "the public square." In other words, accepting that the liberal state must foster pluralism by striving to accommodate difference in the public life of civil society, where does that state obligation—that is, where does that public life—begin? With a private denominational university? Or with a judicially reviewable statutory delegate charged by the provincial legislature to regulate the profession and entry thereto in the public interest?

[261] In our view, fundamental constitutional principles and the statutory jurisdiction of the Law Society of British Columbia ("LSBC"), properly interpreted, lead unavoidably to the legal conclusion that the public regulator controls the door to the public square and owes that obligation. The private denominational university, which is not subject to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and is exempt from provincial human rights legislation, does not. And, in conditioning access to the public square as it has, the regulator has—on this Court's own jurisprudence—profoundly interfered with the constitutionally guaranteed freedom of a community of co-religionists to insist upon certain moral commitments from those who wish to join the private space within which it pursues its religiously based practices. ... In our respectful view, this unfortunate state of affairs merits judicial intervention, not affirmation.

I. The LSBC Benchers' Decision Is an Infringement of TWU's Section 2(a) Charter Rights

[315] We agree with the majority that the LSBC decision not to approve TWU's proposed law school infringes the religious freedom of members of the TWU community[.] ...

[316] We emphasize, like our colleague McLachlin C.J. (paras. 122 and 124), that freedom of religion under the Charter, interpreted broadly and purposively, also captures the freedom of members of the TWU community to express their religious beliefs through the Covenant and to associate with one another in order to study law in an educational community which reflects their religious beliefs. ... Freedom of religion is among the "original freedoms which are at once the necessary attributes and modes of self-expression of human beings and the primary conditions of their community life within a legal order" (Saumur v. City of Quebec, ... [1953] 2 S.C.R. 299, at p. 329, per Rand J.).

[317] It follows, therefore, that we reject our colleague Rowe J.'s proposed narrowing of the scope of activity protected by the right to freedom of religion (paras. 231-34). In our view, looking only to circumstances in which "the claimant sincerely believes that their religion compels them to act" does not begin to account for the scope of activities identified by this Court in Big M Drug Mart, at p. 336. ... Not every adherent will "declare religious beliefs openly" because they feel compelled to do so. Nor will every adherent "teach" or "disseminate" religious belief out of compulsion. Rather, they may freely choose to do so.

[318] We agree ... [that] a s. 2(a) Charter infringement is made out where a claimant establishes that impugned state conduct interferes, in a manner that is more than trivial or insubstantial, with their ability to act in accordance with a sincere practice or belief that has a nexus with religion

[319] In this case, it is the TWU community's expression of religious belief through the practice of creating and adhering to a biblically grounded Covenant that is at issue. ... Covenanting assists in the creation and strengthening of a religious community which includes all those who study and work at TWU. It fosters their moral and spiritual growth in an academic setting. Members of the TWU community sincerely believe that, as a manifestation of their creed, studying, teaching and working in a post-secondary educational environment where all participants covenant with those around them—regardless of their personal beliefs—subjectively engenders their personal connection with the divine.

[320] ... The denial of the benefit of LSBC approval in this case negatively impacts the TWU community's ability to practise its beliefs through the Covenant at an approved law school. As we explain below, not only was this interference not trivial or insubstantial, it violated the state's duty of neutrality and profoundly interfered with the religious freedom of the TWU community.

J. Proportionality: The Infringement Was Not Proportionate

(1) The LSBC Approval Decision Does Not Balance the TWU Community's Section 2(a) Rights With a Relevant Statutory Objective

[322] ... We accept that in the administrative law context, judicial review of individualized decisions made pursuant to statutory authority which is not itself challenged may not require the objectives of the legislation to be reviewed at the justification stage (Multani, at para. 155, per LeBel J.). [However, and particularly where a decision-maker does not provide any formal reasons,] ... the objectives put forward by the state actor [must] find their source in the actual grant of authority. [Otherwise] a statutory mandate might be invented holus-bolus after an infringement is claimed. This is precisely [what] materialized here: ... the decision-making process adopted by the LSBC did not, at the time of the decision, involve any delineation or articulation of any particular statutory objectives.

[323] ... [T]he LSBC's statutory objective ... is to ensure that individual applicants are fit for licensing. And, as the fitness of future graduates of TWU's proposed law school was not in dispute, this statutory objective cannot justify any limitations on the TWU community's s. 2(a) rights. But ... even if the LSBC's statutory mandate had permitted the consideration of broader "public interest" concerns invoked by the LSBC and the majority, the LSBC's decision would not be justified, since withholding approval substantially interferes with the TWU community's freedom of religion and approving TWU's proposed law school was not against the public interest, so understood.

(2) The LSBC Approval Decision Substantially Interferes with Freedom of Religion

[324] In our view, the LSBC approval decision represents a profound interference with religious freedom: it is a measure that undermines the core character of a lawful religious institution and disrupts the vitality of the TWU community (Loyola, at para. 67). ... [I]t is substantively coercive in nature. ... [T]he LSBC approval decision makes state acceptance contingent upon the TWU community manifesting its beliefs in a particular way. ... As noted by the British Columbia Court of Appeal, "[t]he Law Society was prepared to approve the law school if TWU agreed to remove the offending portions of the Covenant requiring students to abstain from 'sexual intimacy that violates the sacredness of marriage between a man and a woman'" This is highly intrusive conduct ... [that] contravened the state's duty of religious neutrality ... [and expressed a] religious preference which promotes the participation of non-believers, or believers of a certain kind, to the exclusion of the community of believers found at TWU (Mouvement laïque, at paras. 74-78).

[325] ... We agree with the Chief Justice (at paras. 128-32) that the fact the Covenant is not "absolutely required" and "preferred (rather than necessary)" does not diminish the severity of the infringement in this case.

(3) Approving TWU's Proposed Law School Is Not Against the LSBC's Public Interest Mandate

[326] ... [A]pproving TWU's proposed law school would not undermine the statutory objectives which the majority identifies as relevant Accommodating religious diversity is in "the public interest," broadly understood, and approving the proposed law school does not condone discrimination against LGBTQ persons.

[327] The majority states that the decision not to approve TWU's proposed law school furthers its public interest objective by "maintaining equal access to and diversity in the legal profession" (Majority Reasons, at paras. 93-95). We recognize, as this Court has previously recognized, that ... the vast majority of LGBTQ students "would not be tempted to apply for admission, and could only sign the so-called student contract at a considerable personal cost[.]" (TWU 2001, at para. 25). In our view, however, the majority fails to appreciate that the unequal access resulting from the Covenant is a function of accommodating religious freedom, which itself advances the public interest by promoting diversity in a liberal, pluralist society.

[328] The rights recognized in the Charter and the enshrinement of multiculturalism therein reflect the premise of our constitutional law and history that pluralism is intrinsically valuable. Our colleague McLachlin C.J. notes Canada's long history of religious schools (para. 130). Similarly, and writing extra-judicially, our colleague Karakatsanis J. has observed that, "[i]n a global environment where religious accommodation is sometimes seen as a detriment, Canada has found a way to welcome difference" [citations omitted].

[329] But this generous and historically Canadian posture towards religious accommodation stands in stark contrast to the majority's view of the pursuit of statutory objectives as "unavoidabl[y]" limiting the individual freedoms protected by the Charter (Majority Reasons, at para. 100). This view fundamentally misconceives the role of the state in a multicultural and democratic society ... [and that fact that] "if society is to be open and democratic in the fullest sense it needs to be tolerant and accepting of cultural pluralism" and allow "individuals and communities ... to enjoy what has been called the 'right to be different'" [citations omitted].

[330] We emphasize that it is the state and state actors—not private institutions like TWU—which are constitutionally bound to accommodate difference in order to foster pluralism in public life.

[333] Simply put, the secular state is a neutral state, which refrains from espousing "values" that undermine or go beyond what is necessary for the civic participation of all. As Iacobucci J. recognized in Amselem, at para. 50, "the State is in no position to be, nor should it become, the arbiter of religious dogma." ...

[334] It follows from the foregoing that accommodating diverse beliefs and values is a precondition to secularism and pluralism. ...

[335] The "public interest," broadly understood, is therefore served by accommodating TWU's religious practices, including the Covenant. ...

[336] ... [T]he holding and expression of the moral views of marriage ... have been expressly recognized by Parliament as being not inconsistent with the public interest and worthy of accommodation (Civil Marriage Act, S.C. 2005, c. 33, preamble and s. 3.1)[.] ...

[337] That [legislators] have taken this view should not surprise. Pluralism, and the religious accommodation necessary to secure it, is inherently valuable. In a country whose people sometimes harbour conflicting moral values that cannot be reconciled to a single conception of how one should live life, there is wisdom in the idea that the public sphere is for all to share, even where beliefs differ. ...

[340] ... [B]oth Parliament and British Columbia's Legislature have recognized the so-called "discriminatory" (McLachlin C.J.'s Reasons, at para. 138), "degrading and disrespectful" (Majority Reasons, at para. 101) practices represented by the TWU Covenant as consistent with the public interest, legal and worthy of accommodation. Such legislatively accommodated and Charter-protected religious practices, once exercised, cannot be cited by a state-actor as a reason justifying the exclusion of a religious community from public recognition. Approval of TWU's proposed law school would not represent a state preference for evangelical Christianity, but rather a recognition of the state's duty—which the LSBC failed to observe—to accommodate diverse religious beliefs without scrutinizing their content.

[342] The appeal should be dismissed. We therefore dissent.

[Chief Justice McLachlin and Rowe J wrote separate concurring reasons. While McLachlin CJ agreed with the majority that the LSBC's decision represented a proportionate balancing of freedom of religion against the LSBC's duty to combat discrimination, she wrote separately so as to clarify, among other things, that if, as in this case, a claimant's constitutional rights have been limited, the state actor (here the LSBC) should bear the onus of demonstrating that the limitation is reasonable and demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society (at para 117). In addition, she disagreed with the majority's characterization of the negative impacts of the decision on religious freedom as "of minor significance," for "[i]f the community wishes to operate a law school, it must relinquish the mandatory Covenant it says is core to its religious beliefs, with the attendant ramifications on religious practices" (at para 145). Nevertheless, McLachlin CJ accepted the LSBC's contention that it could not comply with its duty to combat discrimination while accrediting TWU:

[146] ... [T]here is great force in the LSBC's contention that it cannot condone a practice that discriminates by imposing burdens on LGBTQ people on the basis of sexual orientation, with negative consequences for the LGBTQ community, diversity and the enhancement of equality in the profession. It was faced with an either-or decision on which compromise was impossible ... In the end, after much struggle, the LSBC concluded that the imperative of refusing to condone discrimination and unequal treatment on the basis of sexual orientation outweighed TWU's claims to freedom of religion.

[147] In a case like Multani, the claimant was vindicated because the school board could not show that it would be unable to ensure its mandate of public safety. In Loyola, we found that the limitation at issue did nothing to advance the ministerial objectives of instilling understanding and respect for other religions. This case is very different. The LSBC cannot abide by its duty to combat discrimination and accredit TWU at the same time.

For this reason, the Chief Justice concluded, the decision was reasonable.

Justice Rowe concurred with the majority that the LSBC's decision should be restored, albeit on the basis that the decision did not infringe the freedom of religion. (It was therefore unnecessary, in his view, to consider whether any such infringement was reasonable.) The essence of the mandatory covenant, according to Rowe J, was to compel observance by non-believers attending TWU. The covenant, therefore, fell outside the protection of s 2(a):

[213] ... [R]eligious freedom is also defined by the absence of constraint. From this perspective, religious freedom aims to protect individuals from interference with their religious beliefs and practices. Its character is noncoercive; its antithesis is coerced conformity. ...

[251] In the end, I agree that "a right designed to shield individuals from religious coercion cannot be used as a sword to coerce [conformity to] religious practice": Canadian Secular Alliance, I.F., at para. 11. This follows if we accept that the freedom of religion guaranteed by the Charter is "a function of personal autonomy and choice": Amselem, at paras. 42. It is based on the idea "that no one can be forced to adhere to or refrain from a particular set of religious beliefs": Loyola, at para. 59. For this reason, it protects against interference with profoundly personal beliefs and with the voluntary choice to abide by the practices those beliefs require. It does not protect measures by which an individual or a faith community seeks to impose adherence to their religious beliefs or practices on others who do not share their underlying faith. I therefore conclude that what the claimants seek in this appeal falls outside the scope of freedom of religion as guaranteed by the Charter. [Emphasis in original]

NOTES AND COMMENTS

1. Richard Moon, in "The Law Society of BC v Trinity Western University: Complicated Answers to a Simple Question" (2019) 94:2 SCLR 335, argues that the conclusions reached in the majority and dissenting judgments rest on very different assumptions, that are unarticulated and undefended, about the character of TWU (or its proposed law program) as either public or private. But the public/private character of the institution is the very thing that is at issue in the case. The consequence of this—of assuming rather than determining the character of the institution or the law program—is that the two judgments never actually engage with each other.

2. Not long after the Supreme Court of Canada's decision, TWU announced that it would no longer require students to sign the covenant. Does this mean that the law societies must now accredit the TWU program?

In SL v Commission scolaires des Chênes, which was examined earlier, the Supreme Court considered a claim by parents of students in the Quebec public school system that their children be exempted from a compulsory Ethics, Religion, and Culture course. In the Loyola case, which follows immediately below, the Court considers whether a private Catholic school should be exempted from teaching the course.

Loyola High School v Quebec (AG)

[As part of the process of the progressive secularization of the public school system in Quebec, legislation in effect since 2008 required that every school in the province have a program on ethics and religious culture (ERC) that would provide instruction about the beliefs and ethics of different world religions from a neutral and objective perspective. (This same legislation was at issue in SL v Commission scolaire des Chênes, above). Under the relevant legislation, the provincial Minister of Education was empowered to grant private schools an exemption if they offered an alternative that the Minister considered to be "equivalent" to the program. Loyola, a private Catholic school, sought an exemption, which was denied on the basis that its alternative program was to be taught from a Catholic perspective. In the Minister's view, the alternative program had to be completely neutral and objective.

Loyola brought an application for judicial review of the Minister's decision, arguing that requiring Loyola to teach religion through a neutral lens was incompatible with Loyola's character as a Catholic institution. The Superior Court found that the Minister's refusal to grant Loyola an exemption was an unjustifiable infringement of freedom of religion. The Quebec Court of Appeal overturned the decision, concluding that the ERC program did not interfere with religious freedom in any substantial way and that the Minister had exercised her discretion in a reasonable manner.

On appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, Loyola altered its position, arguing that it did not object to teaching other religions in a neutral and objective manner, but that it should be allowed to teach Catholic doctrine and ethics, as well as the ethical perspectives of other traditions, from a Catholic perspective. The Supreme Court was unanimous in allowing the appeal, but two sets of reasons were issued—the majority reasons, written by Abella J, were supported by four members of the Court, while McLachlin CJ and Moldaver J wrote a partial concurrence that was supported by three other members of the Court. The two sets of reasons are long and complex and differ on several important points.

First, with respect to the applicable framework, the majority reasons of Abella J applied the Doré framework. The majority found that the Minister's decision interfered with religious freedom while doing little to further the objectives of the ERC program. On that basis, the majority held that the ministerial decision did not strike a proportionate balance. Chief Justice McLachlin and Moldaver J, in contrast, did not apply the Doré framework, but instead considered the ministerial decision to deny the exemption through the lens of s 1 of the Charter and the Oakes test. On that basis, the minority held that Minister's decision breached the appellants' religious freedom under s 2(a) of the Charter and that the breach was not justified under s 1.

The second difference concerned the standing of the institutional claimant. While Abella J, writing for the majority, acknowledged the collective aspects of religion, she avoided the issue of whether corporations could claim a right of freedom of religion under the Charter and instead focused on the religious freedom of the members of the Loyola community. Chief Justice McLachlin and Moldaver J, in contrast, held that Loyola, as a religious institution, was protected under s 2(a) of the Charter.

Third, the judgments differed on which parts of the ERC program unreasonably infringed on freedom of religion. Justice Abella, writing for the majority, concluded that the Minister's decision preventing Loyola from teaching Catholicism from a Catholic perspective did not strike an appropriate balance between Charter protections and statutory objectives. However, she found that the Minister could reasonably require Loyola to teach the ethics of other religions from a neutral perspective. Chief Justice McLachlin and Moldaver J, in contrast, understood Loyola's protected rights to be broader in scope, and found that the Minister's restriction on Loyola's ability to teach the ethics of other religions from a Catholic perspective was not justifiable. In their view, Loyola could not be expected to teach religious doctrines or ethics that were contrary to the Catholic faith in a way that portrayed them as equally credible or worthy of belief.

Finally, the reasons differed in the remedy chosen. Justice Abella, for the majority, set aside the decision to deny the exemption as unreasonable and remitted the matter back to the Minister for reconsideration. Chief Justice McLachlin and Moldaver J, on the other hand, would have crafted a remedy under s 24(1) of the Charter ordering the Minister to grant Loyola's application for an exemption.]

ABELLA J (LeBel, Cromwell, and Karakatsanis JJ concurring):

[4] Under Doré, where a discretionary administrative decision engages the protections enumerated in the Charter—both the Charter's guarantees and the foundational values they reflect—the discretionary decision-maker is required to proportionately balance the Charter protections to ensure that they are limited no more than is necessary given the applicable statutory objectives that she or he is obliged to pursue.

[5] In this case, the Minister's decision reflected the fundamental assumption that any program taught from a religious perspective could not be an alternative to the ERC Program and that the religious school could not teach even its own religion from its own perspective.

[6] For the reasons that follow, in my view prescribing to Loyola how it is to explain Catholicism to its students seriously interferes with freedom of religion, while representing no significant benefit to the ERC Program's objectives. In a context like Quebec's, where private denominational schools are legal, this represents a disproportionate, and therefore unreasonable interference with the values underlying freedom of religion of those individuals who seek to offer and who wish to receive a Catholic education at Loyola. On the other hand, I see no significant impairment of freedom of religion in requiring Loyola to offer a course that explains the beliefs, ethics and practices of other religions in as objective and neutral a way as possible, rather than from the Catholic perspective.

[33] Loyola, a non-profit corporation ... also argued that its own religious freedom had been violated by the decision. [While] individuals may sometimes require a legal entity in order to give effect to the constitutionally protected communal aspects of their religious beliefs and practice ... I do not believe it is necessary ... to decide whether corporations enjoy religious freedom in their own right under s. 2(a) of the Charter or s. 3 of the ... Quebec Charter ... in order to dispose of this appeal.

[34] ... As the subject of the administrative decision, Loyola is entitled to apply for judicial review and to argue that the Minister failed to respect the values underlying the grant of her discretion as part of its challenge of the merits of the decision. In my view, as a result, it is not necessary to decide whether Loyola itself, as a corporation, enjoys the benefit of s. 2(a) rights

[43] The context before us—state regulation of religious schools—poses the question of how to balance robust protection for the values underlying religious freedom with the values of a secular state. Part of secularism, however, is respect for religious differences. A secular state does not—and cannot—interfere with the beliefs or practices of a religious group unless they conflict with or harm overriding public interests. Nor can a secular state support or prefer the practices of one group over those of another: Richard Moon, "Freedom of Religion Under the Charter of Rights: The Limits of State Neutrality" (2012), 45 U.B.C. L. Rev. 497, at pp. 498–99. The pursuit of secular values means respecting the right to hold and manifest different religious beliefs. A secular state respects religious differences, it does not seek to extinguish them.

[44] Through this form of neutrality, the state affirms and recognizes the religious freedom of individuals and their communities. As Prof. Moon noted:

Underlying the [state] neutrality requirement, and the insulation of religious beliefs and practices from political decision making, is a conception of religious beliefs or commitment as deeply rooted, or commitment as an element of the individual's identity, rather than simply a choice or judgment she or he has made. Religious belief lies at the core of the individual's worldview. It orients the individual in the world, shapes his or her perception of the social and natural orders, and provides a moral framework for his or her actions. Moreover, religious belief ties the individual to a community of believers and is often the central or defining association in her or his life. The individual believer participates in a shared system of practices and values that may, in some cases, be described as a "way of life." If religion is an aspect of the individual's identity, then when the state treats his or her religious practices or beliefs as less important or less true than the practices of others, or when it marginalizes her or his religious community in some way, it is not simply rejecting the individual's views and values, it is denying her or his equal worth. [Footnote omitted; p. 507.]

[45] Because it allows communities with different values and practices to peacefully co-exist, a secular state also supports pluralism. ...

[46] This does not mean that religious differences trump core national values. On the contrary, as this Court observed in Bruker v. Marcovitz, ... [2007] 3 S.C.R. 607:

Not all differences are compatible with Canada's fundamental values and, accordingly, not all barriers to their expression are arbitrary. Determining when the assertion of a right based on difference must yield to a more pressing public interest is a complex, nuanced, fact-specific exercise that defies bright-line application. It is, at the same time, a delicate necessity for protecting the evolutionary integrity of both multiculturalism and public confidence in its importance. [para. 2] ...

[47] These shared values—equality, human rights and democracy—are values the state always has a legitimate interest in promoting and protecting. They enhance the conditions for integration and points of civic solidarity by helping connect us despite our differences This is what makes pluralism work. ... Religious freedom must therefore be understood in the context of a secular, multicultural and democratic society with a strong interest in protecting dignity and diversity, promoting equality, and ensuring the vitality of a common belief in human rights.

[48] The state, therefore, has a legitimate interest in ensuring that students in all schools are capable, as adults, of conducting themselves with openness and respect as they confront cultural and religious differences. A pluralist, multicultural democracy depends on the capacity of its citizens "to engage in thoughtful and inclusive forms of deliberation amidst, and enriched by," different religious worldviews and practices: Benjamin L. Berger, "Religious Diversity, Education, and the 'Crisis' in State Neutrality" (2014), 29 C.J.L.S. 103, at p. 115.

[49] With this context in mind, we turn to assessing the Minister's decision in order to determine whether it proportionately balanced religious freedom with the statutory objectives of the ERC Program.

[Justice Abella then examined the statutory objectives and the regulatory context.]

[53] The power to grant exemptions from the mandatory curriculum in cases where a school offers an "equivalent" program is part of the Minister's broader regulatory role of ensuring that basic educational standards are met by schools and students alike. As a result, in order to be consistent with the scheme as a whole, the Minister's interpretation of which programs are "equivalent" should take into account the objectives each course seeks to meet and the competencies it seeks to inculcate in students.

[54] At the same time, however, there would be little point in offering an exemption if, in order to receive it, the proposed alternative program had to be identical to the mandatory program in every way. ... In order to respect values of religious freedom in this context, as well as to cohere with the larger regulatory scheme, a reasonable interpretation of the process for granting exemptions from the mandatory curriculum would leave at least some room for the religious character of those schools. [Otherwise, the regulation would] prevent what the Act respecting private education itself allows—a private school being denominational.

[55] Although it prescribes some course content, the documentation describing the ERC Program does not set out detailed lesson plans that teachers are required to cover. The program is instead structured to be flexible and thematic, providing only a general framework to guide students in developing competencies in ethics, dialogue and religious culture, in service of the two key objectives of the program: the recognition of others and the pursuit of the common good.

[56] Given the highly flexible nature of the ERC Program and its heavy emphasis on these two objectives, as well as the context of the regulatory scheme as a whole, it is unreasonable to interpret equivalence as requiring a strict adherence to specific course content, rather than in terms of the ERC's program objectives generally. ... The Minister's task was therefore to arrive at a decision that proportionately balanced the realization of the ERC Program's objectives of promoting respect for others and openness to diversity, with respect for Charter-protected religious freedom in this context.

[57] ... [I]n the Minister's view, a program that departs in any way from the ERC Program's posture of strict neutrality, even partially, cannot achieve the state's objectives of promoting respect for others and openness to diversity. This was also the position that Quebec took before this Court.

[58] The Minister's decision necessarily engages religious freedom. The starting point, and the inspiration for most of this Court's subsequent jurisprudence about religious freedom, is R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., ... [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295

[59] Justice Dickson's formulation of religious freedom is founded on the idea that no one can be forced to adhere to or refrain from a particular set of religious beliefs. This includes both the individual and collective aspects of religious belief In the words of Justice LeBel: "Religion is about religious beliefs, but also about religious relationships" (Hutterian Brethren, at para. 182).

[60] Religious freedom under the Charter must therefore account for the socially embedded nature of religious belief, and the deep linkages between this belief and its manifestation through communal institutions and traditions To fail to recognize this dimension of religious belief would be to "effectively denigrate those religions in which more emphasis is placed on communal worship or other communal religious activities": Dwight Newman, Community and Collective Rights: A Theoretical Framework for Rights held by Groups (2011), at p. 78. ...

[61] These collective aspects of religious freedom—in this case, the collective manifestation and transmission of Catholic beliefs through a private denominational school—are a crucial part of Loyola's claim. In [SL v Commission scolaire des Chênes] this Court held that the imposition of the ERC Program in public schools did not impose limits on the religious freedom of individual students and parents. This case, however, can be distinguished from S. L. because Loyola is a private religious institution created to support the collective practice of Catholicism and the transmission of the Catholic faith. The question is not only how Loyola is required to teach about other religions, but also how it is asked to teach about the very faith that animates its character and the comparative relationship between Catholicism and other faiths. The Minister's decision therefore demonstrably interferes with the manner in which the members of an institution formed for the very purpose of transmitting Catholicism, can teach and learn about the Catholic faith. This engages religious freedom protected under s. 2(a) of the Charter.

[62] I agree with Loyola that the Minister's decision had a serious impact on religious freedom in this context

[63] ... Although the state's purpose here is secular, requiring Loyola's teachers to take a neutral posture even about Catholicism means that the state is telling them how to teach the very religion that animates Loyola's identity. It amounts to requiring a Catholic institution to speak about Catholicism in terms defined by the state rather than by its own understanding of Catholicism.

[64] It also interferes with the rights of parents to transmit the Catholic faith to their children, not because it requires neutral discussion of other faiths and ethical systems, but because it prevents a Catholic discussion of Catholicism. . . .

[67] Ultimately, measures which undermine the character of lawful religious institutions and disrupt the vitality of religious communities represent a profound interference with religious freedom.

[68] There is, on the other hand, insufficient demonstrable benefit to the furtherance of the state's objectives in requiring Loyola's teachers to teach Catholicism from a neutral perspective. . . [T]he central [problem] with the Minister's decision [is that] it treats teaching any part of the proposed alternative program from a Catholic perspective as necessarily inimical to the state's core objectives in imposing the ERC Program and it gives no weight to the values of religious freedom engaged by the decision. . . . The result is a disproportionate outcome that does not protect Charter values as fully as possible in light of those statutory objectives.

[69] In the Quebec context, where private denominational schools are authorized, forcing a religious school to teach its own religion from a non-religious perspective does not assist in realizing the ERC Program's basic curricular goals of encouraging among students respect for others and openness to others. The Minister's decision suggests that engagement with an individual's own religion on his or her own terms can simply be presumed to impair respect for others. This assumption runs counter to the objectives of the regulatory scheme as a whole and it has a disproportionate impact on the values underlying religious freedom in this context. This necessarily renders the Minister's decision unreasonable.

[70] The disproportionate nature of this decision is reinforced by the fact that . . . preventing Loyola from teaching Catholicism seriously impairs its Catholic identity.

[71] . . . Unlike my colleagues in their concurring opinion, however, I agree with the Court of Appeal that requiring Loyola to teach about the ethics of other religions in a neutral, historical and phenomenological way would not interfere disproportionately with the relevant Charter protections implicated by the decision. . . .

[73] I quickly acknowledge that in a religious school, teaching other ethical frameworks in a neutral way may be a delicate exercise. A school like Loyola must be allowed some flexibility as it navigates these difficult moments. Catholicism's answer to ethical questions, for instance, will sometimes conflict with the approach taken by the ethics of other religions. It would be surprising if, in classes discussing other belief systems, students did not ask for comparative explanations, questions Loyola's teachers are clearly free to answer. A comparative approach that explains the Catholic ethical perspective and responds to questions about it is of course legitimate.

[75] The alternative program that Loyola submitted to the Minister would teach other ethical frameworks primarily through the lens of Catholic ethics and morality. Even if Loyola's teachers do so respectfully, this fundamentally transforms the ethics component of the ERC Program from a study of different ethical approaches into a class on Catholicism. The resulting risk is that other religions would necessarily be seen not as differently legitimate belief systems, but as worthy of respect only to the extent that they aligned with the tenets of Catholicism. This contradicts the ERC Program's goal of ensuring respect for those whose religious beliefs are different, a goal no less worthy in a religious school than in a public one.

[76] The key is in how the discussion is framed. An emphasis on objective instruction insofar as possible, and on teaching other ethical positions in their own right, does not mean stifling debate or denying Loyola's Catholic identity. On the contrary, the framework of the discussions would be wider because they are not based solely on a particular religion's perspective. That religion's own ethical framework would necessarily be part of the discussion, but the role will be one of significant participant rather than hegemonic tutor.

[77] There is no doubt that this will not always be easy. The question is, given the undisputed significance of the ERC Program's objectives, can requiring Loyola's teachers to teach and discuss other religions and their ethical positions as objectively as possible really be seen as a serious interference with freedom of religion merely because it may be difficult to execute neatly?

[78] I have difficulty seeing how this can undermine the values of religious freedom. ... [T]eaching about the ethics of other religions is largely a factual exercise. It need not be a clash of values. Nor is asking Loyola's teachers to teach other religions and ethical positions as objectively as possible a requirement that they shed their own beliefs. It is, instead, a pedagogical tool utilized by good teachers for centuries—let the information, not the personal views of the teacher, guide the discussion. The fact that those personal principles are not central when discussing the ethical principles of other religions does not mean that ... Loyola's teachers are foreclosed from explaining the Catholic perspective and its differences from other faiths.

[79] In any event, it is the Minister's decision as a whole that must reflect a proportionate and therefore reasonable balancing of the Charter protections and statutory objectives in issue. It does not, in my respectful view, because it rests on the assumption that a confessional program cannot achieve the objectives of the ERC Program. ...

[80] This is not to suggest, however, that in a religious school, the Minister is required to allow the ERC Program ... to be replaced by a program that focuses on that religion's doctrine and morality. ... But preventing a school like Loyola from teaching and discussing Catholicism in any part of the program from its own perspective does little to further those objectives while at the same time seriously interfering with the values underlying religious freedom.

[81] I would therefore allow the appeal, set aside the Minister's decision, and remit the matter to the Minister for reconsideration in light of these reasons. An exemption cannot be withheld on the basis that Loyola must teach Catholicism and Catholic ethics from a neutral perspective. ...

A. Does Loyola as a Religious Organization Enjoy Freedom of Religion Under Section 2(a) of the Canadian Charter and Section 3 of the Quebec Charter?

[91] In our view, Loyola may rely on the guarantee of freedom of religion found in s. 2(a) of the Canadian Charter. The communal character of religion means that protecting the religious freedom of individuals requires protecting the religious freedom of religious organizations, including religious educational bodies such as Loyola. Canadian and international jurisprudence supports this conclusion.

[92] This Court has affirmed that freedom of religion under s. 2(a) ... has both an individual and a collective dimension. ...

[94] The individual and collective aspects of freedom of religion are indissolubly intertwined. The freedom of religion of individuals cannot flourish without freedom of religion for the organizations through which those individuals express their religious practices and through which they transmit their faith.

[99] The Attorney General of Quebec points out that in R. v. Edwards Books and Art Ltd., ... [1986] 2 S.C.R. 713, Dickson C.J. commented that "a business corporation cannot possess religious beliefs" (p. 784). However, a religious organization may in a very real sense have religious beliefs and rights. Thus, Dickson C.J. referred to the s. 2(a) freedom of "individuals and groups" (p. 759 (emphasis added)), describing that freedom using language from R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd. ... at p. 336, as "the right to manifest religious belief by worship and practice or by teaching and dissemination" (p. 757).

[100] On the submissions before us, and given the collective aspect of religious freedom long established in our jurisprudence, we conclude that an organization meets the requirements for s. 2(a) protection if (1) it is constituted primarily for religious purposes, and (2) its operation accords with these religious purposes.

[101] The precise scope of these requirements may require clarification in future cases which test their boundaries, but it is evident that Loyola falls within their ambit. ...

B. The Interpretation of the Legislative and Regulatory Scheme at Issue

[112] Section 22 [the exemption provision] functions to ensure the legislative and regulatory scheme's compliance with the freedom of religion guaranteed by s. 2(a) of the Charter. It guards against the possibility that, in certain situations, the mandatory imposition of a purely secular curriculum may violate the Charter rights of a private religious school. This safeguard is consistent with the obligations of the state in a multicultural society. ... The state may not discourage religious faith in the public education system; this obligation has even more resonance in the context of a private religious school.

C. Analytical Approach Under the Charter

[114] The first issue is whether Loyola's freedom of religion was infringed by the Minister's decision. The second issue is whether the Minister's decision—that only a purely secular course of study may serve as an equivalent to the ERC Program—limits Loyola's freedom of religion more than reasonably necessary to achieve the goals of the program. ...

E. Analysis of Loyola's Religious Freedom Claim

[130] ... As we have explained, Loyola is entitled to the freedom of religion protected by s. 2(a) of the Charter. This is not to say that the religious freedoms of other actors are not implicated by the Minister's denial. To the extent that the ERC Program would require Loyola's teachers to express a neutral viewpoint on religious matters, their religious freedoms may be at issue. The religious freedom of the parents of Loyola's students may be implicated, as they have the right to seek moral and religious education for their children. Perhaps even the religious freedom of Loyola's students themselves is raised by the denial of an exemption for Loyola to implement its alternative program.

[131] It is not necessary to conclusively decide these matters. Deciding the case on the basis of the religious freedom of Loyola itself is sufficient to dispose of this appeal. ...

[132] The freedom of religion protected by s. 2(a) of the Charter is not limited to religious belief, worship and the practice of religious customs. Rather, it extends to conduct more readily characterized as the propagation of, rather than the practice of, religion. ... Thus, Loyola's expressed desire to teach its curriculum in accordance with Catholic beliefs falls within the scope of s. 2(a)'s protection.

• • •

[135] ... [W]e recognize that where the claimant is an organization rather than an individual, the "sincerity of belief" inquiry required by our jurisprudence [see Amselem] poses some difficulties. The existing test need not be abandoned, but a few clarifications are warranted.

[138] There is no reason why the expressed belief of an organization cannot be examined to ensure it is made in good faith and is neither a fiction nor an artifice. ... Rather than demonstrating a sincere belief—which we readily concede a mere legal person is incapable of doing—an organizational claimant must show that the claimed belief or practice is consistent with both the purpose and operation of the organization.

[139] In evaluating this consistency between the claimed belief or practice and the organization's purpose and operation, the same non-exhaustive criteria from Amselem can be relied on. ... Objective indicators will perhaps play a more prominent role. It is proper to assess the claimed belief or practice in light of objective facts such as the organization's other practices, policies and governing documents. The beliefs and practices of an organization may also reasonably be expected to be more static and less fluid than those of an individual. Therefore, inquiry into past practices and consistency of position would be more relevant than in the context of a claimant who is a natural person.

[140] The two-part test from Amselem and Multani, modified to apply to an organization, yields the following questions: (1) Is Loyola's claimed belief that it must teach ethics and its own religion from the Catholic perspective consistent with its organizational purpose and operation? (2) Does the Minister's decision to deny Loyola an exemption from the ERC Program interfere with Loyola's ability to act in accordance with this belief, in a manner that is more than trivial or insubstantial? ...

[On the basis of the application judge's findings, McLachlin CJ and Moldaver J concluded that (1) Loyola's claimed belief that it was required to teach ethics and its own religion from the Catholic perspective was consistent with its organizational purpose and operation; and (2) the Minister's decision to deny Loyola an exemption from the ERC Program interfered with Loyola's ability to act in accordance with this belief in a manner that was more than trivial or insubstantial.]

(3) Is the Minister's Decision Justified by Section 1 as a Reasonable Limit on Loyola's Religious Freedom?

[146] As discussed earlier, the core issue on this appeal is whether the Minister's insistence on a purely secular program of study to qualify for an exemption limited Loyola's right to religious freedom no more than reasonably necessary to achieve the ERC Program's goals. The government bears the burden of showing this. If it fails to do so, the Minister's decision is unconstitutional and must be set aside.

[148] In our view, there is nothing inherent in the ERC Program's objectives (recognition of others and pursuit of the common good) or competencies (world religions, ethics, and dialogue) that requires a cultural and non-denominational approach. As we noted earlier ... , the intention of the government was to allow religious schools to teach the ERC Program without sacrificing their own religious perspectives. This goal is entirely realistic. A program of purely denominational instruction designed primarily to indoctrinate students to the correctness of certain religious precepts would not achieve the objectives of the ERC Program; however, a balanced curriculum, taught from a religious perspective but with all viewpoints presented and respected could, in our view, serve as an equivalent to the ERC Program. To the extent Loyola's proposal meets these criteria, it should not have been rejected out of hand.

[149] And yet it was, because the Minister premised her denial on the flawed determination that only a cultural and non-denominational approach could serve as equivalent. ...

[151] ... The Minister's definition of equivalency casts [the] intended flexibility in the narrowest of terms, and limits deviation to a degree beyond that which is necessary to ensure the objectives of the ERC Program are met. This led to a substantial infringement on the religious freedom of Loyola. In short, the Minister's decision was not minimally impairing. Therefore, it cannot be justified under s. 1 of the Charter as a reasonable limit on Loyola's s. 2(a) right to religious freedom.

F. The Appropriate Scope of an Equivalent Program

[154] In assuring compliance with the Charter, an exemption must take into account the practical classroom realities posed by the ERC Program's topics. While Loyola's complaint rests on its Catholic identity, this identity has implications throughout the ERC Program. In our view, it would be insufficient to merely grant an exemption for Loyola to teach Catholicism from a Catholic perspective, while requiring an unmodified curriculum and a neutral posture in all other aspects of the program. Binding Loyola to a secular perspective at all times, other than during their discussion of the Catholic religion, offers scant protection to Loyola's freedom of religion, and would be unworkable in practice.

[155] Loyola proposes to teach the ethics competency in a way that recognizes its Catholic perspective. It does not want its teachers to be forced to remain neutral—or more realistically, mum—in the face of ethical positions that do not accord with the Catholic faith. Rather, Loyola proposes to have its teachers facilitate respectful and open-minded debate, where all positions are presented, but where students evaluate ethics and morals not in a vacuum but with knowledge of the Catholic perspective.

[156] Requiring Loyola's teachers to maintain a neutral posture on ethical questions poses serious practical difficulties and represents a significant infringement on how Loyola transmits an understanding of the Catholic faith. It is inevitable that ethical standards that do not comport with Catholic beliefs will be raised for discussion. Faced with a position that is fundamentally at odds with the Catholic faith, Loyola's teachers would be coerced into adopting a false and facile posture of neutrality. The net effect would be to render them mute during large portions of the ethics discussion—a discussion that is, as the ERC Program presupposes, crucial to developing a civilized and tolerant society.

[158] ... Loyola has ... committed, however, to ensure that on every major ethical topic, students "understand not only the position of the Roman Catholic Church, but also those of all major thinkers and viewpoints[.]" ...

[160] There are subtle but important distinctions to make between the respectful treatment of differing viewpoints that Loyola proposes and the strict neutrality required under the generic ERC Program, unalleviated by a s. 22 exemption. The ERC Program compels teachers to adopt a professional posture of strict neutrality, such that all points of view and all religious perspectives are presented as equally valid. The Minister's denial appears to be rooted in the assumption that this posture is vital to attaining the objectives of the ERC Program. If a religious perspective is offered, then all other viewpoints that do not conform to it will necessarily be derogated and disrespected. This position presents a false dichotomy. Loyola has strongly and repeatedly expressed that its proposed alternative program would treat other religious viewpoints with respect—going to the extent of inviting religious leaders from other faiths into the classroom to ensure students have a rich and full understanding of differing perspectives. However, requiring a religious school to present the viewpoints of other religions as equally legitimate and equally credible is incompatible with religious freedom. Indeed, presenting fundamentally incompatible religious doctrines as equally legitimate and equally credible could imply that they are both equally false. Surely this cannot be a perspective that a religious school can be compelled to adopt.

[161] Additionally, this dichotomy does not accord with principles of interfaith cooperation and collaboration, which brings together people with deeply held commitments to their own faiths (and who therefore, by implication, have rejected other religious doctrines as "equally legitimate" or "equally credible") but who are nonetheless able to foster deep ties based on sincere mutual respect. ...

[162] With the foregoing in mind, we offer the following guidelines to delineate the boundaries of a s. 22 exemption in this case, and to inform the Minister's evaluation of future exemption applications:

- Loyola's teachers must be permitted to describe and explain Catholic doctrine and ethical beliefs from the Catholic perspective, and cannot be required to adopt a neutral position.
- Loyola's teachers must describe and explain the ethical beliefs and doctrines of other religions in an objective and respectful way.
- Loyola's teachers must maintain a respectful tone of debate—both by conveying their own contributions in a respectful way, and by ensuring the classroom dialogue proceeds in accordance with respect, tolerance and understanding for those with different beliefs and practices.
- Where the context of the classroom discussion requires it, Loyola's teachers may identify what Catholic beliefs are, why Catholics follow those beliefs, and the ways in which another specific ethical or doctrinal proposition does not accord with those beliefs, be it in the context of a particular different religion or an ethical position considered in the abstract.
- Loyola's teachers cannot be expected to teach ethics or religious doctrines that are contrary to the Catholic faith in a way that portrays them as equally credible or worthy of belief. Respect, tolerance, and understanding are all properly required, and the highlighting of differences must not give rise to denigration or derision. However, ensuring that all viewpoints are regarded as equally credible or worthy of belief would require a degree of disconnect from, and suppression of, Loyola's own religious perspective that is incompatible with freedom of religion.

G. Remedy

[163] We have concluded that the Minister's decision infringes Loyola's right to religious freedom under s. 2(a) of the Charter, in a manner that cannot be justified under s. 1. The Court is empowered by s. 24(1) of the Charter to craft an appropriate remedy in light of all of the circumstances.

[165] We find it neither necessary nor just to send this matter back to the Minister for reconsideration, further delaying the relief Loyola has sought for nearly seven years. Based on the application judge's findings of fact, and considering the record and the submissions of the parties, we conclude that the only constitutional response to Loyola's application for an exemption would be to grant it. Accordingly, we would order the Minister to grant an exemption to Loyola, as contemplated under s. 22 of the regulation at issue, to offer an equivalent course to the ERC Program in line with Loyola's proposal and the guidelines we have outlined. [Emphasis in original.]

Appeal allowed.

NOTES

1. Both judgments in the Loyola decision seem to say that the Minister's refusal to grant an exemption from the ERC course meant that the school would be prevented from teaching Catholicism from a Catholic perspective. Yet the religious education (RE) course would continue to be part of Loyola's curriculum—even if it were taught separately from the ERC program.

2. Benjamin L Berger makes the following observation about the Loyola decision:

The differences between the majority and minority may ... fade on close inspection. Both sets of reasons insist that other religions must be discussed with respect and toleration, allow teachers to contrast the Catholic viewpoint with other religious systems, and allow for Catholicism to be taught from a Catholic viewpoint. Ultimately, then, the Loyola decision might be most telling in its reflection of the difficulties of managing the process of teaching and education from the elevation of constitutional adjudication. The unpredictability and dynamism of the classroom is, in some ways, antithetical to the aesthetic coherence sought through jurisprudence. Perhaps this—combined with the deep interest that both state and community hold in the cultivation of the child—is why education has persisted as such a fertile ground for the emergence of issues of law and religion.

3. The Doré decision relied upon by Abella J is excerpted in Chapter 17. Further discussion of both Doré and Loyola can also be found in Chapter 18, Application, Section IV, dealing with the application of the Charter to administrative decision-making.

The Ktunaxa case, which follows, involved the application of s 2(a) to Indigenous spiritual practices.

The BC government approved a ski resort development on land with which the Ktunaxa people had a spiritual connection, which, they argued, breached their religious freedom under s 2(a) of the Charter. The community also argued that the province had failed to fulfill its obligations to consult properly with the community under s 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982, before approving the development. The Supreme Court rejected both claims.

The Ktunaxa believe that the Great Bear Spirit dwells in a section of Jumbo Valley in BC, known to the community as Qat'muk, but that the construction and operation of a ski resort in the area would cause the spirit to leave. They argued that if the Bear Spirit was forced out of the area, many of their rituals would be emptied of meaning and their spiritual and material well-being would be harmed. The Court rejected the Ktunaxa's claim; however the two judgments, one by McLachlin CJ and Rowe J and the other by Moldaver J, followed different paths to this conclusion.

Ktunaxa Nation v British Columbia (Forests, Lands and Natural Resource Operations)

2017 SCC 54

[The appellants represent the Ktunaxa people. The Ktunaxa's traditional territories include an area called Qat'muk, located in a valley in southeastern British Columbia. This area is spiritually significant to the Ktunaxa. It is home to an important population of grizzly bears, and to Grizzly Bear Spirit, or Klawta Tuktulakpis, "a principal spirit within Ktunaxa religious beliefs and cosmology."

The respondent is Glacier Resorts Ltd ("Glacier Resorts"). In 1991, Glacier Resorts filed a formal proposal to build a year-round ski resort in Qat'muk. For more than two decades, Glacier Resorts negotiated with the BC government and stakeholders, including the Ktunaxa, on the terms and conditions of the development. Early in the process, the Ktunaxa informed Glacier Resorts of the spiritual significance of Qat'muk, as well as the presence of Klawta Tuktulakpis. In response, Glacier Resorts made significant changes to the planned development. However, these changes did not completely satisfy the Ktunaxa. Consultations continued. In 2009, the Ktunaxa took the uncompromising position that development would drive Klawta Tuktulakpis from Qat'muk and irrevocably impair their religious beliefs and practices (the "Late-2009 Claim"). In November 2010, the Ktunaxa issued the "Qat'muk Declaration," which, among other things, mapped an area in which the Ktunaxa would not permit development. The mapped area included land vital to the resort's construction and operation. In 2012, the Minister signed a Master Development Agreement with Glacier Resorts, allowing development to proceed despite the Ktunaxa's claim.]

McLACHLIN CJ and ROWE J (Abella, Karakatsanis, Wagner, Gascon, and Brown JJ concurring):

- [57] A. Did the Minister's decision violate the Ktunaxa's freedom of conscience and religion?
- B. Was the Minister's decision that the Crown had met its duty to consult and accommodate under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 reasonable?

V. Analysis

A. Did the Minister's Decision Violate the Ktunaxa's Freedom of Conscience and Religion?

(1) The Claim

[58] The Ktunaxa contend that the Minister's decision to allow the Glacier Resorts project to proceed violates their right to freedom of conscience and religion protected by s. 2(a) of the Charter. This claim is asserted independently from the Ktunaxa's s. 35 claim. Even if the Minister undertook adequate consultation under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982, his decision could be impeached on the ground that it violated the Ktunaxa's Charter guarantee of freedom of religion. We note that with respect to the s. 2(a) claim, the Ktunaxa stand in the same position as non-Aboriginal litigants.

[59] The Ktunaxa assert that the project, and in particular permanent overnight accommodation, will drive Grizzly Bear Spirit from Qat'muk. As Grizzly Bear Spirit is central to Ktunaxa religious beliefs and practices, its departure, they say, would remove the basis of their beliefs and render their practices futile. The Ktunaxa argue that the vitality of their religious community depends on maintaining the presence of Grizzly Bear Spirit in Qat'muk.

[60] The Ktunaxa fault the Minister for not having considered their right to freedom of religion in the course of his decision. The Ktunaxa raised the potential breach of s. 2(a) before the Minister. Nevertheless, the Minister's Rationale for approving the Jumbo Glacier Resort did not analyze the s. 2(a) claim. The Minister should have discussed the s. 2(a) claim. However, his failure to conduct an analysis of the Ktunaxa's right to freedom of religion is immaterial because the claim falls outside the scope of s. 2(a). This was the finding of both the chambers judge and the Court of Appeal and we agree, though for somewhat different reasons.

(2) The Scope of Freedom of Religion

[61] The first step ... is to determine whether the claim falls within the scope of s. 2(a). If not, there is no need to consider whether the decision represents a proportionate balance between freedom of religion and other considerations: Amselem, at para. 181.

[62] ... [I]n Big M Drug Mart, [t]he majority of the Court, per Justice Dickson (as he then was), defined s. 2(a) as protecting "the right to entertain such religious beliefs as a person chooses, the right to declare religious beliefs openly and without fear of hindrance or reprisal, and the right to manifest religious belief by worship and practice or by teaching and dissemination" (p. 336).

[63] So defined, s. 2(a) has two aspects—the freedom to hold religious beliefs and the freedom to manifest those beliefs. This definition has been adopted in subsequent cases [citations omitted].

[64] These two aspects of the right to freedom of religion—the freedom to hold a religious belief and the freedom to manifest it—are reflected in international human rights law. Article 18 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, G.A. Res. 217 A (III), U.N. Doc. A/810, at 71 (1948) ("UDHR"), first defined the right in international law in these terms: "Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance."

[65] Similarly, art. 18(1) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Can. T.S. 1976 No. 47 ("ICCPR"), defined the right to freedom of religion as consisting of "freedom to have or to adopt a religion or belief of [one's] choice" and "freedom, either individually or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in worship, observance, practice and teaching." ... Tarnopolsky J.A., in R. v. Videoflicks Ltd. (1984), 1984 CanLII 44 (ON CA), 48 O.R. (2d) 395 (C.A.) ... observed that art. 18(1) defined freedom of religion "as including not only the right to have or adopt a religion or belief of one's choice, but also to be able to 'manifest' the religion or belief" (p. 421 (emphasis deleted)), and added that s. 2(a) of the Charter—then a new and judicially unconsidered feature of Canada's Constitution—should be "interpreted in conformity with our international obligations" (p. 420). ... Dickson C.J.

approved Tarnopolsky J.A.'s approach to s. 2(a), noting that his definition of freedom of religion "to include the freedom to manifest and practice one's religious beliefs ... anticipated conclusions which were reached by this Court in the Big M Drug Mart Ltd. case": [citations omitted]. ... Dickson C.J. proposed, as Tarnopolsky J.A. had done, that the Charter be presumed to provide at least as great a level of protection as is found in Canada's international human rights obligations. The Court has since adopted this interpretive presumption: [citations omitted].

[Chief Justice McLachlin and Rowe J then noted similar language in international human rights instruments to which Canada is not a party, finding them to be "important illustrations of how freedom of religion is conceived around the world" (at para 66).]

[67] The scope of freedom of religion in these instruments is expressed in terms of the right's two aspects: the freedom to believe and the freedom to manifest belief. ... The question, then, is whether the Ktunaxa's claim falls within that scope.

(3) Application to This Case

[68] To establish an infringement of the right to freedom of religion, the claimant must demonstrate (1) that he or she sincerely believes in a practice or belief that has a nexus with religion, and (2) that the impugned state conduct interferes, in a manner that is non-trivial or not insubstantial, with his or her ability to act in accordance with that practice or belief: see Multani, at para. 34.

[69] In this case, it is undisputed that the Ktunaxa sincerely believe in the existence and importance of Grizzly Bear Spirit. They also believe that permanent development in Qat'muk will drive this spirit from that place. The chambers judge indicated that Mr. Luke came to this belief in 2004 but whether this belief is ancient or recent plays no part in our s. 2(a) analysis. The Charter protects all sincere religious beliefs and practices, old or new.

[70] The second part of the test, however, is not met in this case. This stage of the analysis requires an objective analysis of the interference caused by the impugned state action: S.L. v. Commission scolaire des Chênes, 2012 SCC 7, [2012] 1 S.C.R. 235, at para. 24. The Ktunaxa must show that the Minister's decision to approve the development interferes either with their freedom to believe in Grizzly Bear Spirit or their freedom to manifest that belief. But the Minister's decision does neither of those things. This case is not concerned with either the freedom to hold a religious belief or to manifest that belief. The claim is rather that s. 2(a) of the Charter protects the presence of Grizzly Bear Spirit in Qat'muk. This is a novel claim and invites this Court to extend s. 2(a) beyond the scope recognized in our law.

[71] We would decline this invitation. The state's duty under s. 2(a) is not to protect the object of beliefs, such as Grizzly Bear Spirit. Rather, the state's duty is to protect everyone's freedom to hold such beliefs and to manifest them in worship and practice or by teaching and dissemination. In short, the Charter protects the freedom to worship, but does not protect the spiritual focal point of worship. We have been directed to no authority that supports the proposition that s. 2(a) protects the latter, rather than individuals' liberty to hold a belief and to manifest that belief. Section 2(a) protects the freedom to pursue practices, like the wearing of a kirpan in Multani or refusing to be photographed in Alberta v. Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony, 2009 SCC 37, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 567. And s. 2(a) protects the right to freely hold the religious beliefs that motivate such practices. In this case, however, the appellants are not seeking protection for the freedom to believe in Grizzly Bear Spirit or to pursue practices related to it. Rather, they seek to protect Grizzly Bear Spirit itself and the subjective spiritual meaning they derive from it. That claim is beyond the scope of s. 2(a).

[72] The extension of s. 2(a) proposed by the Ktunaxa would put deeply held personal beliefs under judicial scrutiny. Adjudicating how exactly a spirit is to be protected would require the state and its courts to assess the content and merits of religious beliefs. In Amselem, this Court chose to protect any sincerely held belief rather than examining the specific merits of religious beliefs:

In my view, the State is in no position to be, nor should it become, the arbiter of religious dogma. Accordingly, courts should avoid judicially interpreting and thus determining, either explicitly or implicitly, the content of a subjective understanding of religious requirement, "obligation," precept, "commandment," custom or ritual. Secular judicial determinations of theological or religious disputes, or of contentious matters of religious doctrine, unjustifiably entangle the court in the affairs of religion.

(para. 50, per Iacobucci J.)

The Court in Amselem concluded that such an inquiry into profoundly personal beliefs would be inconsistent with the principles underlying freedom of religion (para. 49).

[73] The Ktunaxa argue that the Big M Drug Mart definition of the s. 2(a) guarantee has been subsequently enriched by an understanding that freedom of religion has a communal aspect, and that the state cannot act in a way that constrains or destroys the communal dimension of a religion. Grizzly Bear Spirit's continued occupation of Qat'muk is essential to the communal aspect of Ktunaxa religious beliefs and practices, they assert. State action that drives Grizzly Bear Spirit from Qat'muk will, the Ktunaxa say, "constrain" or "interfere" with—indeed destroy—the communal aspect of s. 2(a) protection.

[74] The difficulty with this argument is that the communal aspect of the claim is also confined to the scope of freedom of religion under s. 2(a). It is true that freedom of religion under s. 2(a) has a communal aspect: Loyola; Hutterian Brethren, at para. 89; Congrégation des témoins de Jéhovah de St-Jérôme-Lafontaine v. Lafontaine (Village), 2004 SCC 48, [2004] 2 S.C.R. 650. But the communal aspects of freedom of religion do not, and should not, extend s. 2(a)'s protection beyond the freedom to have beliefs and the freedom to manifest them.

[75] We conclude that s. 2(a) protects the freedom to have and manifest religious beliefs, and that the Ktunaxa's claim does not fall within these parameters. It is therefore unnecessary to consider whether the Minister's decision represents a reasonable balance between freedom of religion and other considerations.

B. Was the Minister's Decision That the Crown Had Met Its Duty to Consult and Accommodate Under Section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 Reasonable?

[The majority Justices held that, contrary to the appellant's assertions, the Minister's conclusion that the Crown had met its duty to consolidate was reasonable. The Minister engaged in deep consultation on the spiritual claim prior to the Late-2009 Claim, and the changed the development plan in order accommodate the Ktunaxa spiritual claim. The Minister continued to attempt to consult for two years after the Late-2009 Claim, after which point it was clear that, given the position of the Ktunaxa, more consultation would be fruitless.]

MOLDAVER J (Côté J concurring):

[117] I agree with the Chief Justice and Rowe J. that the Minister reasonably concluded that the duty to consult and accommodate the Ktunaxa under s. 35 was met. Respectfully, however, I disagree with my colleagues' s. 2(a) analysis. In my view, the Ktunaxa's right to religious freedom was infringed by the Minister's decision to approve the development of the ski resort proposed by the respondent Glacier Resorts Ltd. ...

(4) The Minister's Decision Infringes the Ktunaxa's Freedom of Religion Under Section 2(a) of the Charter

[124] As indicated, the s. 2(a) inquiry focuses on whether state action has interfered with the ability of a person to act in accordance with his or her religious beliefs or practices. This Court has recognized that religious beliefs are "deeply held personal convictions ... integrally linked to one's self-definition and spiritual fulfilment," while religious practices are those that "allow individuals to foster a connection with the divine" (Amselem, at para. 39). In my view, where a person's religious belief no longer provides spiritual fulfillment, or where the person's religious practice no longer allows him or her to foster a connection with the divine, that person cannot act in accordance with his or her religious beliefs or practices, as they have lost all religious significance. Though an individual could still publicly profess a specific belief, or act out a given ritual, it would hold no religious significance for him or her.

[125] The same holds true of a person's ability to pass on beliefs and practices to future generations. This Court has recognized that the ability of a religious community's members to pass on their beliefs to their children is an essential aspect of religious freedom protected under s. 2(a) (Loyola, at paras. 64 and 67). Where state action has rendered a certain belief or practice devoid of spiritual significance, this interferes with one's ability to pass on that tradition to future generations, as there would be no reason to continue a tradition that lacks spiritual significance.

[126] Therefore, where the spiritual significance of beliefs or practices has been taken away by state action, this interferes with an individual's ability to act in accordance with his or her religious beliefs or practices—whether by professing a belief, engaging in a ritual, or passing traditions on to future generations.

[129] The Chief Justice and Rowe J. take a different approach. ... If I understand my colleagues' approach correctly, s. 2(a) of the Charter protects only the freedom to hold beliefs and manifest them through worship and practice (para. 71). In their view, even where the effect of state action is to render beliefs and practices devoid of all spiritual significance, claimants still have the freedom to hold beliefs and manifest those beliefs through practices, and there is therefore no interference with their ability to act in accordance with their beliefs. Thus, under my colleagues' approach, as long as a Sikh student can carry a kirpan into a school (Multani), Orthodox Jews can erect a personal succah (Amselem), or the Ktunaxa have the ability to conduct ceremonies and rituals, there is no infringement of s. 2(a), even where the effect of state action is to reduce these acts to empty gestures.

[130] I cannot accept such a restrictive reading of s. 2(a). As I have indicated, where a belief or practice is rendered devoid of spiritual significance, there is obviously an interference with the ability to act in accordance with that religious belief or practice. The scope of s. 2(a) is therefore not limited to the freedom to hold a belief and manifest that belief through religious practices. Rather, as this Court noted in Amselem, "[i]t is the religious or spiritual essence of an action" that attracts protection under s.2(a) (para. 47). In my view, the approach adopted by my colleagues does not engage with this crucial point. It does not take into account that if a belief or practice becomes devoid of spiritual significance, it is highly unlikely that a person would continue to hold those beliefs or engage in those practices. Indeed, that person would have no reason to do so. With respect, my colleagues' approach amounts to protecting empty gestures and hollow rituals, rather than guarding against state conduct that interferes with "profoundly personal beliefs," the true purpose of s. 2(a)'s protection (Edwards Books, at p. 759).

[131] This approach also risks excluding Indigenous religious freedom claims involving land from the scope of s. 2(a)'s protection. As indicated, there is an inextricable link between spirituality and land in Indigenous religious traditions. In this context, state action that impacts land can sever the spiritual connection to the divine, rendering Indigenous beliefs and practices devoid of their spiritual significance. My colleagues have not taken this unique and central feature of Indigenous religion into account. Their approach therefore risks foreclosing the protections of s. 2(a) of the Charter to substantial elements of Indigenous religious traditions.

4) The Minister's Decision Infringes the Ktunaxa's Freedom of Religion Under Section 2(a) of the Charter

[132] I turn now to the facts of this case. The Ktunaxa's religion encompasses multiple spirits and several places of spiritual significance (see, e.g., A.R., vol. II, at pp. 119 and 197). The Ktunaxa sincerely believe that Qat'muk is a highly sacred site, home to a very important spirit—Grizzly Bear Spirit. The Ktunaxa assert that Grizzly Bear Spirit provides them with spiritual guidance and assistance. They claim that the proposed development would drive Grizzly Bear Spirit out, sever their spiritual connection with Qat'muk, and render their beliefs in Grizzly Bear Spirit devoid of spiritual significance.

[133] The Chief Justice and Rowe J. frame the Ktunaxa's religious freedom claim as one that seeks to protect the "spiritual focal point of worship"—that is, Grizzly Bear Spirit (para. 71). I disagree. The Ktunaxa are seeking protection of their ability to act in accordance with their religious beliefs and practices, which falls squarely within the scope of s. 2(a). If the Ktunaxa's religious beliefs in Grizzly Bear Spirit become entirely devoid of religious significance, their prayers, ceremonies and rituals in recognition of Grizzly Bear Spirit would become nothing more than empty words and hollow gestures. There would be no reason for them to continue engaging in these acts, as they would be devoid of any spiritual significance. Members of the Ktunaxa assert that without their spiritual connection to Qat'muk and to Grizzly Bear Spirit, they would be unable to pass on their beliefs and practices to future generations in any meaningful way, as illustrated in the following excerpt from an affidavit quoted in the appellants' factum:

If the proposed resort were to go ahead in the heart of Qat'muk, I do not see how I can meaningfully speak to my grandchildren about Grizzly Bear Spirit. How can I teach them his songs, what to ask from him, if he no longer has a place recognizable to us and respected as his within our world? [para. 28]

[134] Viewed this way, I am satisfied that the Minister's decision approving the proposed development interferes with the Ktunaxa's ability to act in accordance with their religious beliefs or practices in a manner that is more than trivial or insubstantial. The decision therefore amounts to an infringement of the Ktunaxa's freedom of religion under s. 2(a).

[Justice Moldaver determined, however, that the Minister's decision was reasonable in the circumstances. In particular, it "limited the Ktunaxa's [s 2(a)] right 'as little as reasonably possible' given the statutory objectives ... and amounted to a proportionate balancing" (at para 120).] [Emphasis in original.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The most frequently made criticism of the Supreme Court of Canada's decision in Ktunxana v BC echoes a familiar and more general criticism of the Anglo-American understanding of religious freedom. The Court's narrow or "protestant" conception of religious freedom, which is focused on the individual—on their belief or commitment and their personal relationship with a transcendent God—is said to have the effect of denying meaningful protection to Indigenous and other spiritual systems that emphasize ritual and community life and that recognize a spiritual presence in the natural world. Is this criticism right or fair?
2. The majority judgment excluded from s 2(b) protection "the object of worship." Is this exclusion? What is the point of this exclusion?
3. The majority said that the s 2(a) claim must be decided without any account being taken of the particular circumstances of the claimant—the Ktunaxa. Can and should s 2(a) accommodation claims be considered without account being taken of such factors?
4. Some have argued that the Court misunderstood the religious practice and that the Grizzly Bear Spirit was not an object of worship for the Ktunaxa. Was the Court relying on a Christian understanding of religious practice?

I. INTRODUCTION

A. THE CANADIAN FREE SPEECH TRADITION

Kent Roach & David Schneiderman, "Freedom of Expression in Canada" in Errol Mendes & Stéphane Beaulac, eds, Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, 5th ed (Toronto: LexisNexis, 2013) at 431-33 (footnotes omitted)

The Canadian tradition of freedom of expression is usually traced back to the English common law. Yet the common law has not been particularly sympathetic to free speech claimants. Dicey admitted in his treatise on constitutional law that it is not "specially favourable to free speech or to free writing in the rules which it maintains in theory and often forces in fact as to the kind of statements which a man has a legal right to make" [AV Dicey, Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution of England, 7th ed (London: Macmillan, 1885) at 236]. Rather, for Dicey, the solicitude owed to freedom of discussion in English law principally was due to the "supremacy" or "rule" of law—the idea that restraints on liberty require legislative prohibition and then prosecution before judges and juries. This practically had resulted in liberty of discussion [Dicey at 243].

The Constitution Act, 1867 brought to Canada a constitution "similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom," though it was silent about liberties accruing to individuals. Nevertheless, the preamble suggested to courts that similar degrees of freedom practically would be available in Canada. The Supreme Court of Canada, on occasion, has been prepared to vindicate freedom of expression rights by denying jurisdiction to provinces to enact laws in regard to speech. In the Alberta Press Case, Chief Justice Duff characterized "free public discussion of public affairs, notwithstanding its incidental mischiefs, [as] the breath of life for parliamentary institutions" [Reference re Alberta Statutes, [1938] SCR 100, 1938 CanLII 1 at 132-35]. Alberta's legislation would have permitted substantial governmental interference with the operation of newspapers in the province. This was beyond provincial competence, according to the Court, for it curtailed the right of public discussion and trespassed on the federal criminal law power. In Switzman v. Ebling [[1957] SCR 285, 1957 CanLII 2], one of the pivotal "implied bill-of rights" cases, Justices Rand and Abbott went further and suggested that jurisdiction to limit free speech rights may even be denied to Parliament. These cases are exceptional, however, as provinces continued to have authority to regulate expressive activity in so far as it related to matters falling within s. 92: laws concerning the regulation of streets, parks, and zoning by-laws were all within provincial competence though they may have impacted negatively on expressive freedoms. Even shortly before the coming into force of the Charter, in [Dupond v City of Montreal, [1978] 2 SCR 770, 1978 CanLII 201], concerning a Montreal municipal by-law temporarily prohibiting public gatherings and assemblies on the streets of the City, Justice Beetz for the majority of the Court wrote that "the right to hold public meetings on a highway or in a park is unknown to English law."

Nor did the experience under the Canadian Bill of Rights enhance Canada's free speech tradition. The Bill of Rights' fundamental freedoms (s. 1) were interpreted to reflect rights and freedoms in no "abstract sense" but "as they existed in Canada immediately before the statute was enacted" [R v Burnshire, [1975] 1 SCR 693, 1974 CanLII 150 at 705], in which case, the Bill of Rights "froze" the practice of rights as of 1960. We should add to this historical mix the panoply of federal restrictions on freedom of expression, whether they be the overly restrictive Official Secrets Act (now the Security of Information Act), the criminalization of sedition, false news and scandalizing the courts, the powers of surveillance over Canadian citizens and permanent residents, or the regrettable denials of freedom of speech under the War Measures Act. The Canadian law of freedom of expression, then, does not appear to have very deep roots.

With freedom of expression poorly anchored in Canadian constitutional law, section 2(b) might be viewed as having profoundly altered the Canadian constitutional scene. As our detailed discussion of the cases below suggest, the overall judicial orientation toward freedom of expression claims certainly has shifted, but perhaps not all that significantly.

B. PURPOSES OF THE GUARANTEE

Numerous explanations have been offered for the importance accorded to freedom of expression. Some of the main rationales are reviewed by McLachlin J in the following excerpt from her judgment in R v Keegstra. (Although the judgment was a dissenting opinion, the comments on freedom of expression were not the source of the disagreement.)

R v Keegstra

[1990] 3 SCR 697, 1990 CanLII 24

McLACHLIN J:

Various philosophical justifications exist for freedom of expression. Some of these posit free expression as a means to other ends. Others see freedom of expression as an end in itself.

Salient among the justifications for free expression in the first category is the postulate that the freedom is instrumental in promoting the free flow of ideas essential to political democracy and the functioning of democratic institutions. This is sometimes referred to as the political process rationale. ... The locus classicus of this rationale is A. Meiklejohn, Free Speech and its Relation to Self-Government (1948).

A corollary of the view that expression must be free because of its role in the political process is that only expression relating to the political process is worthy of constitutional protection. However, within these limits protection for expression is said to be absolute. The political process rationale has played a significant role in the development of First Amendment doctrine in the United States, and various justices of the US Supreme Court (though never a majority) have embraced its theory that protection of speech is absolute within these restricted bounds. Its importance has also been affirmed by Canadian courts, both before and since the advent of the Charter.

The validity of the political process rationale for freedom of expression is undeniable. It is, however, limited. It justifies only a relatively narrow sector of free expression—one much narrower than either the wording of the First Amendment or s. 2(b) of the Charter would suggest.

Another venerable rationale for freedom of expression (dating at least to Milton's Areopagitica in 1644) is that it is an essential precondition of the search for truth.

[Milton wrote:

And though all the winds of doctrine were let loose to play upon the earth, so Truth be in the field, we do injuriously by licensing and prohibiting to misdoubt her strength. Let her and Falsehood grapple; who ever knew Truth put to the worse, in a free and open encounter?]

Like the political process model, this model is instrumental in outlook. Freedom of expression is seen as a means of promoting a "marketplace of ideas," in which competing ideas vie for supremacy to the end of attaining the truth. The "marketplace of ideas" metaphor was coined by Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, in his famous dissent in Abrams v. United States, 250 US 616 (1919).

[The passage by Holmes J referred to reads as follows:

Persecution for the expression of opinions seems to me perfectly logical. If you have no doubt of your premises or your power and want a certain result with all your heart, you naturally express your wishes in law and sweep away all opposition. To allow opposition by speech seems to indicate that you think the speech impotent, as when a man says that he has squared the circle, or that you do not care wholeheartedly for the result, or that you doubt either your power or your premises. But when men have realized that time has upset many fighting faiths, they may come to believe even more than they believe the very foundations of their own conduct that the ultimate good desired is better reached by free trade in ideas—that the best test of truth is the power of the thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the market, and that truth is the only ground upon which their wishes safely can be carried out. That at any rate is the theory of our Constitution.]

This approach, however, has been criticized on the ground that there is no guarantee that the free expression of ideas will in fact lead to the truth. Indeed, as history attests, it is quite possible that dangerous, destructive and inherently untrue ideas may prevail, at least in the short run.

Notwithstanding the cogency of this critique, it does not negate the essential validity of the notion of the value of the marketplace of ideas. While freedom of expression provides no guarantee that the truth will always prevail, it still can be argued that it assists in promoting the truth in ways which would be impossible without the freedom. One need only look to societies where free expression has been curtailed to see the adverse effects both on truth and on human creativity. It is no coincidence that in societies where freedom of expression is severely restricted truth is often replaced by the coerced propagation of ideas that may have little relevance to the problems which the society actually faces. Nor is it a coincidence that industry, economic development and scientific and artistic creativity may stagnate in such societies.

Moreover, to confine the justification for guaranteeing freedom of expression to the promotion of truth is arguably wrong, because however important truth may be, certain opinions are incapable of being proven either true or false. Many ideas and expressions which cannot be verified are valuable. Such considerations convince me that freedom of expression can be justified at least in part on the basis that it promotes the "marketplace of ideas" and hence a more relevant, vibrant and progressive society.

But freedom of expression may be viewed as more than a means to other ends. Many assert that free expression is an end in itself, a value essential to the sort of society we wish to preserve. This view holds that freedom of expression "derives from the widely accepted premise of Western thought that the proper end of man is the realization of his character and potentialities as a human being." It follows from this premise that all persons have the right to form their own beliefs and opinions, and to express them. "For expression is an integral part of the development of ideas, of mental exploration and of the affirmation of self": T.I. Emerson, "Toward a General Theory of the First Amendment" (1963), 72 Yale L.J. 877, at p. 879. It is demeaning of freedom of expression and wrong, the proponents of this view argue, to conceive the right only in terms of the ends it may assist in achieving. "[I]t is not a general measure of the individual's right to freedom of expression that any particular exercise of the right may be thought to promote or retard other goals of the society" (p. 880). Freedom of expression is seen as worth preserving for its own intrinsic value.

Those who assert that freedom of expression is worth protecting for its intrinsic value to the self-realization of both speaker and listener tend to combine this rationale with others. ... On its own, this justification for free expression is arguably too broad and amorphous to found constitutional principle. Furthermore, it does not answer the question of why expression should be deserving of special constitutional status, while other self-fulfilling activities are not. Nevertheless, an emphasis on the intrinsic value of freedom of expression provides a useful supplement to the more utilitarian rationales, justifying, for example, forms of artistic expression which some might otherwise be tempted to exclude.

Arguments based on intrinsic value and practical consequences are married in the thought of F. Schauer (Free Speech: A Philosophical Enquiry (1982)). Rather than evaluating expression to see why it might be worthy of protection, Schauer evaluates the reasons why a government might attempt to limit expression. Schauer points out that throughout history, attempts to restrict expression have accounted for a disproportionate share of governmental blunders—from the condemnation of Galileo for suggesting the [E]arth is round to the suppression as “obscene” of many great works of art. Professor Schauer explains this peculiar inability of censoring governments to avoid mistakes by the fact that, in limiting expression, governments often act as judge in their own cause. They have an interest in stifling criticism of themselves, or even in enhancing their own popularity by silencing unpopular expression. These motives may render them unable to carefully weigh the advantages and disadvantages of suppression in many instances. That is not to say that it is always illegitimate for governments to curtail expression, but government attempts to do so must prima facie be viewed with suspicion.

Schauer’s approach reminds us that no one rationale provides the last word on freedom of expression. Indeed, it seems likely that theories about freedom of expression will continue to develop.

How do these diverse justifications of freedom of expression relate to s. 2(b) of the Charter? First, it may be noted that the broad wording of s. 2(b) of the Charter is arguably inconsistent with a justification based on a single facet of free expression. This suggests that there is no need to adopt any one definitive justification for freedom of expression. Different justifications for freedom of expression may assume varying degrees of importance in different fact situations. However, each of the above rationales is capable of providing guidance as to the scope and content of s. 2(b). [Emphasis in original.]

Compare McLachlin J’s views on the values associated with freedom of expression with those identified by Richard Moon in the excerpt below.

Richard Moon, The Constitutional Protection of Freedom of Expression

(Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2000) at 3-4, 24-26
(footnotes omitted)

Freedom of expression does not simply protect individual liberty from state interference. Rather, it protects the individual’s freedom to communicate with others. The right of the individual is to participate in an activity that is deeply social in character that involves socially created languages and the use of community resources such as parks, streets, and broadcast stations. Yet the structure of constitutional adjudication, reinforced by an individual rights culture, tends to suppress the social or relational character of freedom of expression and its distributive demands (concern about the individual’s effective opportunity to communicate with others).

Recognition of the social character of freedom of expression is critical to understanding both the value and potential harm of expression and to addressing questions about the freedom’s scope and limits. Freedom of expression is valuable because human agency and identity emerge in discourse. We become individuals capable of thought and judgment and we develop as rational and feeling persons when we join in conversation with others. The social emergence of human thought, feeling, and identity can be expressed in the language of truth or individual autonomy or democratic self-government. Each of the traditional accounts of the value of freedom of expression (democratic-, truth-, and self-realization-based accounts) represents a particular perspective on, or dimension of, the constitution of human agency in community life. ... While the social character of human agency is seldom mentioned in the traditional accounts of the value of freedom of expression, it is the unstated premise of each. ...

Recognition that individual agency and identity emerge in communicative interaction is crucial to understanding not only the value of expression but also its potential for harm. Our dependence on expression means that words can sometimes be hurtful. Our identity is shaped by what we say and by what others say to us and about us. Expression can cause fear, it can harass, and it can undermine self-esteem. Expression can also be deceptive or manipulative. Human reflection and judgment are dependent on socially created languages, which give shape to thought and feeling. While language enables us to formulate and communicate our ideas and to understand the ideas of others, it is not a transparent vehicle, an instrument that lies within our perfect control.

The established accounts of the value of freedom of expression are described as either instrumental or intrinsic

[But the] value (and potential harm) of expression will remain unclear as long as discussion about freedom of expression is locked into the intrinsic/instrumental dichotomy, in which the freedom is concerned with either the good of the community or the right of the individual. The value of freedom of expression rests on the social nature of individuals and the constitutive character of public discourse. This understanding of the freedom, however, has been inhibited by the individualism that dominates contemporary thinking about rights—its assumptions about the pre-social individual and the instrumental value of community life. Once we recognize that individual agency and identity emerge in the social relationship of communication, the traditional split between intrinsic and instrumental accounts (or social and individual accounts) of the value of freedom of expression dissolves. Expression connects the individual (as speaker or listener) with others and in so doing contributes to her capacity for understanding and judgment, to her engagement in community life and to her participation in a shared culture and collective governance.

The arguments described as instrumental focus on the contribution of speech to the collective goals of truth and democracy. However, we value truth not as an abstract social achievement but rather as something that is consciously realized by members of the community, individually and collectively, in the process of public discussion. Similarly, freedom of expression is not simply a tool or instrument that contributes to democratic government. We value freedom of expression not simply because it provides individuals with useful political information but more fundamentally because it is the way in which citizens participate in collective self-governance. There is no way to separate the goal from the process or the individual good from the public good.

Attaching the label “intrinsic” to autonomy or self-realization accounts of the freedom seems also to misdescribe the value at stake. Communication is a joint or public process, in which individual participants realize their human capacities and their individual identities. The individual does not simply gain satisfaction from expressing his pre-existing views on things: an individual’s views, and more broadly his judgment and identity, take shape in the communicative process.

Freedom of expression theories are also categorized as either “listener” or “speaker” centred. Listener-centred theories emphasize the right of the listener to hear and judge expression for herself. The listener’s right is protected as a matter of respect for her autonomy as a rational agent or for its contribution to social goals such as the development of truth or the advancement of democratic government.

Speaker-centred theories emphasize the value of self-expression. The individual's freedom to express himself is a part of his basic human autonomy or is critical to his ability to direct the development of his own personality. Each of these accounts recognizes the connection between speaking and listening, yet each values one or the other of these activities or, if it values them both, it values them as distinct or independent interests. ...

The focus of these accounts on the different interests of the speaker and the listener, misses the central dynamic of the freedom, the communicative relationship, in which the interests of speaker and listener are tied. The activities of speaking and listening are part of a process and a relationship. This relationship is valuable because individual agency emerges and flourishes in the joint activity of creating meaning.

NOTE: ROLE OF THE UNDERLYING RATIONALES IN FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION CASES

What role have these rationales, which McLachlin J describes as "philosophical justifications," played in freedom of expression cases under the Charter? One might have expected a fairly significant one, with the rationales being heavily relied on to determine which forms of expressive activity should receive protection under s 2(b). It turns out that these rationales have played some role in the s 2(b) analysis, although not as much as might have initially been expected.

One example is where a law, in its effects, limits expressive activity. The Supreme Court has distinguished between two different inquiries in s 2(b) cases depending on the nature of the limit on freedom of expression. More details are provided in the case of Irwin Toy Ltd v Quebec (AG), [1989] 1 SCR 927, 1989 CanLII 87, excerpted below. Here we briefly introduce the distinctions the Court has developed. Where the purpose of a governmental measure is to "restrict content"—by singling out particular content (like children's advertising), controlling access to content (by, for example, mandating French-only language laws), or by controlling the ability to convey meaning (such as a ban on posting)—then the measure "necessarily limits" the guarantee of freedom of expression and the judicial inquiry moves onto s 1. Where a measure is content neutral and limits only the "physical consequences of certain human activity" (such as a rule against littering or a noise by-law), then the law limits freedom of expression not in its purpose but in its effects. In such a case, there is a further inquiry before moving onto s 1. A claimant must demonstrate that the expressive activity promotes or reflects at least one of the principles underlying the guarantee. In the case of a noise by-law, for example, it is not enough to show that the by-law merely restricts loud shouting; rather, a plaintiff must demonstrate that "her aim was to convey a meaning reflective of the principles underlying freedom of expression" (Irwin Toy at 977)—namely, one of the three rationales of self-government, truth, and individual fulfillment. Although this inquiry shifts the burden of proof onto Charter claimants, it might not be too burdensome. After all, because the Court has adopted a broad view of s 2(b), in which "all expressions of the heart and mind, however unpopular or distasteful" (Irwin Toy at 968), and even purely physical conduct that conveys meaning will qualify for constitutional protection, it should not be too difficult to show that the activity promotes one of the underlying values.

A second instance where the underlying rationales play a role in s 2(b) concerns expressive activity on government-owned property. As discussed below, in Montréal (City) v 2952-1366 Québec Inc, 2005 SCC 62, the Supreme Court of Canada has outlined a test for determining whether there exists a constitutional right to free expression on government-owned property that takes into account "(a) the historical or actual function of the place; and (b) whether other aspects of the place suggest that expression within it would undermine the values underlying free expression" (at para 74, emphasis added).

It turns out that the underlying rationales have played a much greater role under s 1, as shown in Keegstra, excerpted in Section IV, "Hate Speech."

For further reflection on the rationales the Court has used for protecting freedom of expression, see Robin Elliot, "The Supreme Court's Understanding of Democratic Self-Government Advancement of Truth and Knowledge and Individual Self-Realization Rationales for Protecting Freedom of Expression: Part I—Taking Stock" (2012) 59 SCLR (2d) 435.

II. THE SCOPE AND LIMITS OF FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

What is the scope or content of s 2(b)? In its early freedom of expression judgments, the Supreme Court of Canada adopted an expansive view of the scope of s 2(b). The Court could have adopted any one of a number of strategies to more narrowly confine its scope—that is, the Court could have "defined in" certain expressive activities, while "defining out" other kinds: see Frederick Schauer, "Categories and the First Amendment: A Play in Three Acts" (1981) 34 Vand L Rev 265. In what follows, we examine each of these potentially limiting strategies and the Supreme Court of Canada's treatment of them. (The material that follows has been adapted from Kent Roach & David Schneiderman, "Freedom of Expression in Canada," above, at 429–525.)

A. SPEECH VERSUS CONDUCT

The speech versus conduct distinction has been used by Canadian courts in the past to weed out claims to expressive freedom. In the pre-Charter case of Dupond v City of Montreal, [1978] 2 SCR 770, 1978 CanLII 201, excerpted in Chapter 15, Antecedents of the Charter, Beetz J characterized public demonstrations as a form of "collective action" rather than a form of speech: "[They are] of the nature of a display of force rather than that of an appeal to reason; their inarticulateness prevents them from becoming part of language and from reaching the level of discourse." Yet the Supreme Court of Canada chose to reject this distinction in the first significant freedom of expression case to come before it, RWDSU v Dolphin Delivery Ltd, [1986] 2 SCR 573, 1986 CanLII 5. The dispute concerned the constitutionality of an injunction against labour picketing. The striking employees of Purolator planned to set up a picket line at the workplace of Dolphin Delivery. They believed that Dolphin Delivery was doing work for Supercourier, a company related to Purolator, which was carrying on Purolator's BC business during the strike. The Purolator workers hoped that the Dolphin Delivery workers would respect their picket line, putting pressure on Dolphin Delivery to stop doing Purolator work and, indirectly, on Purolator to settle the contract dispute.

Dolphin Delivery brought an application for an injunction against the Purolator union to prevent it from setting up the picket line. The Supreme Court of British Columbia granted the injunction on the grounds that a line by Purolator workers at the site of Dolphin Delivery would be a secondary picket meant to induce Dolphin Delivery to breach its contract with Supercourier and that this amounted to a common law tort.

The issue that came to the Supreme Court of Canada was whether the injunction violated freedom of expression under the Charter. In deciding whether the Charter had been breached, the Court had to decide, first, whether an injunction issued under the common law rules concerning picketing was subject to review under the Charter; second, whether picketing was a matter of freedom of expression protected by s 2(b); and, finally, if picketing was expression, whether the restriction of picketing in this case was a justifiable limit under s 1.

Justice McIntyre, writing for the majority of the Court, decided that the injunction was not government action subject to Charter review (that portion of the judgment can be found in Chapter 18, Application). However, he went on to consider the substantive issues in the event that the Charter applied. The following excerpt focuses on whether the union's freedom of expression claim fell within the scope of s 2(b).

RWDSU v Dolphin Delivery Ltd[1986] 2 SCR 573, 1986 CanLII 5

McINTYRE J (Dickson CJ and Estey, Chouinard, and Le Dain JJ concurring):

[1] This appeal raises the question of whether secondary picketing by members of a trade union in a labour dispute is a protected activity under s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and, accordingly, not the proper subject of an injunction to restrain it. ...

[After reviewing the decisions of the lower courts, McIntyre J made the following observations about the facts of the case.]

[10] ... In summary then, [the Chambers judge] found that the respondent was a third party, that the anticipated picketing would be tortious, that the purpose was to injure the plaintiff. It was assumed that the picketing would be peaceful, that some employees of the respondent and other trade union members of customers would decline to cross the picket lines, and that the business of the respondent would be disrupted to a considerable extent.

• • •

Freedom of Expression

[17] ... Is freedom of expression involved in this case? ... [I]n any form of picketing there is involved at least some element of expression. The picketers would be conveying a message which at a very minimum would be classed as persuasion, aimed at deterring customers and prospective customers from doing business with the respondent. ...

[18] The appellants argue strongly that picketing is a form of expression fully entitled to Charter protection and rely on various authorities to support the proposition They reject the American distinction between the concept of speech and that of conduct made in picketing cases, and they accept the view of Hutcheon J.A. in the Court of Appeal ... that "Peaceful picketing falls within freedom of speech."

[The respondent argued that "constitutional protection under section 2(b) should only be given to those forms of expression that warrant such protection," as to do otherwise "would trivialize freedom of expression generally".]

[19] ... [T]he Court of Appeal [observed] that picketing in a labour dispute is more than mere communication of information. It is also a signal to trade unionists not to cross the picket line ... such that the result of the picketing would be to damage seriously the operation of the employer, not to communicate any information. Therefore, it is argued, since the picket line was not intended to promote dialogue or discourse ... , it cannot qualify for protection under the Charter.

[20] ... [I]t is evident that the purpose of the picketing in this case was to induce a breach of contract ... [and] that, if successful, the picketing would have done serious injury to the respondent. There is nothing remarkable about this, however, because all picketing is designed to bring economic pressure [...] ... Action on the part of the picketers will, of course, always accompany the expression, but not every action will remove it from Charter protection for freedom of expression. That freedom, of course, would not extend to protect threats of violence or acts of violence. It would not protect the destruction of property, or assaults, or other clearly unlawful conduct. [Here, however] the picketing would have been peaceful. I am therefore of the view that the picketing ... involved the exercise of the right of freedom of expression.

[22] ... Can an injunction based on the common law tort of inducing a breach of contract, which has the effect of limiting the Charter right to freedom of expression, be sustained as a reasonable limit imposed by law in the peculiar facts of this case. ...

[23] ... [T]he concern of the respondent is pressing and substantial. It will suffer economically in the absence of an injunction to restrain picketing. On the other hand, the injunction has imposed a limitation upon a Charter freedom. A balance between the two competing concerns must be found. ... This case involves secondary picketing—picketing of a third party not concerned in the dispute which underlies the picketing. The basis of our system of collective bargaining is the proposition that the parties themselves should, wherever possible, work out their own agreement. ... When the parties do exercise the right to disagree, picketing and other forms of industrial conflict are likely to follow. The social cost is great Such industrial conflict may be tolerated by society but only as an inevitable corollary to the collective bargaining process. It is therefore necessary in the general social interest that picketing be regulated and sometimes limited. It is reasonable to restrain picketing so that the conflict will not escalate beyond the actual parties. While picketing is, no doubt, a legitimate weapon ... , it should not be permitted to harm others. ...

[24] ... I would say that the requirement of proportionality is also met, particularly when it is recalled that this is an interim injunction effective only until trial when the issues may be more fully canvassed on fuller evidence. It is my opinion then that a limitation on secondary picketing against a third party ... is "a reasonable limit prescribed by law which can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society."

Appeal dismissed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In UFCW, Local 1518, v KMart Canada Ltd, [1999] 2 SCR 1083, 1999 CanLII 650, the Supreme Court of Canada distinguished between leafleting and picketing. The workers at several KMart stores, who had been locked out for six months while trying to negotiate a first collective agreement, distributed leaflets outside several non-unionized stores not directly involved. The leaflets described the dispute and asked potential customers to boycott KMart. There was no interference with employees or with the delivery of supplies. Nor was public access to the stores impeded in any way. Nevertheless, the Labour Relations Board held that the distribution of leaflets fell within the definition of secondary picketing in the BC Labour Relations Code, SBC 1992, c 82 and was therefore unlawful.

The Supreme Court of Canada ruled that the ban on secondary picketing in the BC Labour Relations Code, "which undoubtably encompass[es] leafleting" (at para 32), violated s 2(b) and was not justified under s 1. In reaching this conclusion, the Court distinguished between labour picketing and consumer leafleting. Since the latter "seeks to persuade" the public by means of "informed and rational discourse," it "does not trigger the 'signal' effect inherent in [a] picket line" and thus lacks "the same coercive component" (at para 43).

2. More recently, in RWDSU, Local 558 v Pepsi-Cola Canada Beverages (West) Ltd, 2002 SCC 8, which is also discussed in Chapter 18, the Supreme Court of Canada (re)interpreted the common law rules concerning secondary picketing in light of Charter values and held that "secondary picketing is generally lawful [under the common law] unless it involves tortious or criminal conduct" (at para 3). In a judgment written by McLachlin CJ and LeBel J, the Court rejected the suggestion that expression in a labour context was “fundamentally less important than expression in other contexts”:

[97] ... It is far from clear that union speech is more likely to elicit an irrational or reflexive response than, for example, speech by a political organization. If we say that the signalling effect justifies a special prohibition in the labour context, does it not follow that signalling in other contexts may also justify blanket prohibitions? Moreover, it seems clear that freedom of expression is not confined to “rational” speech. Irrationality may support according less protection to particular kinds of speech. But it does not justify denying all protection as a matter of principle. [at para 97]

The Court understood “tortious” conduct to include inducing breach of contract. Is it obvious that expression should be restricted when it encourages an individual or corporation to breach a contract? (It is generally accepted that freedom of expression protects the right to argue in support of unlawful action.) Does the Court’s willingness to uphold the tort of inducement to breach of contract rest on an assumption that labour picketing has a “signalling effect”?

B. FORM VERSUS CONTENT

A second related strategy that could have been used to confine s 2(b) is the form versus content distinction. According to this view, the guarantee protects the content of messages, but not their form. This was a distinction advanced by the Attorney General of Quebec in the Supreme Court of Canada’s second major decision on freedom of expression, Ford v Quebec (AG), [\[1988\] 2 SCR 712, 1988 CanLII 19](#). The case involved a challenge to the provisions of the Quebec Charter of the French Language, RSQ, c C-11, which required that outdoor commercial signs be exclusively in French. The Supreme Court of Canada found that the legislation violated freedom of expression under the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms (which was considered equivalent to the Charter’s s 2[b]) and could not be upheld as a reasonable restriction under s 1. Invoking the language of Marshall McLuhan, the Attorney General of Quebec maintained that the Charter right protected not the medium but the message; there was a constitutional right to convey a message, but not the language, or form, in which that message was conveyed. The Court rejected this distinction, ruling that freedom of expression includes the freedom to express oneself in the language of one’s choice (at para 40):

Language is so intimately related to the form and content of expression that there cannot be true freedom of expression by means of language if one is prohibited from using the language of one’s choice. Language is not merely a means or medium of expression; it colours the content and meaning of expression. It is, as the preamble of the Charter of the French Language itself indicates, a means by which a people may express its cultural identity. It is also the means by which the individual expresses his or her personal identity [Section 2(b) of the Canadian Charter accords specific protection] to “freedom of thought, belief [and] opinion” That suggests that “freedom of expression” is intended to extend to more than the content of expression in its narrow sense.

In Ford, the Supreme Court of Canada also held that commercial expression—that is, advertising—falls within the scope of s 2(b):

[59] ... Given the earlier pronouncements of this Court [that Charter rights] should be given a large and liberal interpretation, there is no sound basis on which commercial expression can be excluded from the protection of s. 2(b) of the Charter. ... Over and above its intrinsic value as expression, commercial expression ... [, which] protects listeners as well as speakers, plays a significant role in enabling individuals to make informed economic choices, an important aspect of individual self-fulfillment and personal autonomy. The Court accordingly rejects the view that commercial expression serves no individual or societal value in a free and democratic society

A more extensive extract from the Ford decision is found in Chapter 24, Language Rights.

C. HIGH VALUE VERSUS LOW VALUE EXPRESSION

A third strategy that could have been used to confine the scope of s 2 (b) is to distinguish between high and low value expression: those expressive activities closely connected to the core of the guarantee of freedom of expression and those that lie farther from the core. Political speech, it is said, lies at or near the core, while pornography or hate speech is so far removed from that core as to be disqualified from constitutional protection. In Ford, the Court also rejected this distinction. Political speech was held to be only one among many forms of expression worthy of constitutional protection. Moreover, linking protection to these "philosophical" rationales would fuse two distinct processes that need to be kept separate—whether, on the one hand, expression is "within the ambit of the interests protected by the value of freedom of expression," and whether, on the other hand, an act of expression "deserves protection from interference under the structure of the Canadian Charter" (Ford, above at para 57). The Court also rejected the high value–low value distinction in determining whether an expressive activity was worthy of constitutional protection in Irwin Toy, immediately below—a case in which the Court consolidated its earlier rulings in Dolphin Delivery and Ford and, in a comprehensive set of reasons, laid out the basic approach to be followed when s 2(b) claims are made.

Irwin Toy Ltd v Quebec (AG) [\[1989\] 1 SCR 927, 1989 CanLII 87](#)

[This case involved a challenge to the provisions and related regulations of Quebec's Consumer Protection Act, SQ 1978, c 9 (CPA) governing children's advertising. Section 248 provided that "no person may make use of commercial advertising directed at persons under 13 years of age." Factors to be considered in determining whether an advertisement is directed to persons under 13 years of age included the nature and intended purpose of the goods advertised, the manner of presenting such advertisement, and the time and place it is shown. The regulations set out certain exemptions, such as advertising in children's magazines and announcements of children's programs or shows. After being charged with scores of breaches of the law, Irwin Toy sought a declaration that it was invalid on a number of bases, including the division of powers, and s 2(b) and s 7 of the Charter. The Supreme Court held that s 7 did not protect corporations and other artificial entities that were incapable of enjoying life, liberty, and security of the person. The Court also concluded that the provisions were intra vires the province as valid consumer protection legislation and did not invade federal jurisdiction over broadcasting or criminal law.]

DICKSON CJ and LAMER and WILSON JJ:

VI. Whether ss. 248 and 249 Limit Freedom of Expression as Guaranteed by the Canadian and Quebec Charters

B. The First Step: Was the Plaintiff's Activity Within the Sphere of Conduct Protected by Freedom of Expression?

... Clearly, not all activity is protected by freedom of expression, and governmental action restricting this form of advertising only limits the guarantee if the activity in issue was protected in the first place. ...

"Expression" has both a content and a form, and the two can be inextricably connected. Activity is expressive if it attempts to convey meaning. That meaning is its content. Freedom of expression was entrenched in our Constitution ... so as to ensure that everyone can manifest their thoughts, opinions, beliefs, indeed all expressions of the heart and mind, however unpopular, distasteful or contrary to the mainstream. Such protection is ... "fundamental" because in a free, pluralistic and democratic society we prize a diversity of ideas and opinions for their inherent value both to the community and to the individual. ...

We cannot, then, exclude human activity from the scope of guaranteed free expression on the basis of the content or meaning being conveyed. Indeed, if the activity conveys or attempts to convey a meaning, it has expressive content and prima facie falls within the scope of the guarantee. Of course, ... some human activity is purely physical and does not convey or attempt to convey meaning. It might be difficult to characterize certain day-to-day tasks, like parking a car, as having expressive content. To bring such activity within the protected sphere, the plaintiff would have to show that it was performed to convey a meaning. For example, an unmarried person might, as part of a public protest, park in a zone reserved for spouses of government employees If that person could demonstrate that his activity did in fact have expressive content, he would, at this stage, be within the protected sphere and the s. 2(b) challenge would proceed.

The content of expression can be conveyed through an infinite variety of forms of expression: for example, the written or spoken word, the arts, and even physical gestures or acts. While the guarantee of free expression protects all content of expression, certainly violence as a form of expression receives no such protection. It is not necessary here to delineate precisely when and on what basis a form of expression chosen to convey a meaning falls outside the sphere of the guarantee. But it is clear, for example, that a murderer or rapist cannot invoke freedom of expression in justification of the form of expression he has chosen. ...

Thus, the first question remains: Does the advertising aimed at children fall within the scope of freedom of expression? Surely it aims to convey a meaning, and cannot be excluded as having no expressive content. Nor is there any basis for excluding the form of expression chosen from the sphere of protected activity. ...

Consequently, we must proceed to the second step of the inquiry and ask whether the purpose or effect of the government action in question was to restrict freedom of expression. ...

C. The Second Step: Was the Purpose or Effect of the Government Action to Restrict Freedom of Expression?

a. Purpose

When applying the purpose test to the guarantee of free expression, one must beware of drifting to either of two extremes. On the one hand, the greatest part of human activity has an expressive element and so one might find, on an objective test, that an aspect of the government's purpose is virtually always to restrict expression. On the other hand, the government can almost always claim that its subjective purpose was to address some real or purported social need, not to restrict expression. To avoid both extremes, the government's purpose must be assessed from the standpoint of the guarantee in question. ...

If the government's purpose is to restrict the content of expression by singling out particular meanings that are not to be conveyed, it necessarily limits the guarantee of free expression. If the government's purpose is to restrict a form of expression in order to control access by others to the meaning being conveyed or to control the ability of the one conveying the meaning to do so, it also limits the guarantee. On the other hand, where the government aims to control only the physical consequences of certain human activity, regardless of the meaning being conveyed, its purpose is not to control expression. Archibald Cox has described the distinction as follows (Freedom of Expression (1981), at pp. 59-60):

The bold line ... between restrictions upon publication and regulation of the time, place and manner of expression tied to content, on the one hand, and regulation of time, place, or manner of expression regardless of content, on the other hand, reflects the difference between the state's usually impermissible effort to suppress "harmful" information, ideas, or emotions and the state's often justifiable desire to secure other interests against interference from the noise and the physical intrusions that accompany speech, regardless of the information, ideas, or emotions expressed.

Thus, for example, a rule against handing out pamphlets is a restriction on a manner of expression and is "tied to content," even if that restriction purports to control litter. The rule aims to control access by others to a meaning being conveyed as well as to control the ability of the pamphleteer to convey a meaning. To restrict this form of expression, handing out pamphlets, entails restricting its content. By contrast, a rule against littering is not a restriction "tied to content." It aims to control the physical consequences of certain conduct regardless of whether that conduct attempts to convey meaning. To restrict littering as a "manner of expression" need not lead inexorably to restricting a content. Of course, rules can be framed to appear neutral as to content even if their true purpose is to control attempts to convey a meaning. ...

... In determining [the state's purpose], the question becomes: does the mischief consist in the meaning of the activity or the purported influence that meaning has on the behaviour of others, or does it consist, rather, only in the direct physical result of the activity.

b. Effects

Even if the government's purpose was not to control or restrict attempts to convey a meaning, the Court must still decide whether the effect of the government action was to restrict the plaintiff's free expression. Here, the burden is on the plaintiff to demonstrate that such an effect occurred. In order so to demonstrate, a plaintiff must state her claim with reference to the principles and values underlying the freedom.

... [T]he nature of the principles and values underlying the vigilant protection of free expression in a society such as ours ... can be summarized as follows: (1) seeking and attaining the truth is an inherently good activity; (2) participation in social and political decision-making is to be fostered and encouraged; and (3) the diversity in forms of individual self-fulfillment and human flourishing ought to be cultivated in an essentially tolerant, indeed welcoming, environment [for speakers and listeners]. In showing that the effect of the government's action was to restrict her free expression, a plaintiff must demonstrate that her activity promotes at least one of these principles. It is not enough that shouting, for example, has an expressive element. If the plaintiff challenges the effect of government action to control noise, presuming ... a [state] purpose neutral as to expression, she must show that her aim was to convey a meaning reflective of the principles underlying freedom of expression. ... [W]hat kinds of activity promote these principles is, of course, a matter for judicial appreciation to be developed on a case-by-case basis. But the plaintiff must at least identify the meaning being conveyed and how it relates to [one of the three values just articulated].

In the instant case, the plaintiff's activity is not excluded from the sphere of conduct protected by freedom of expression. The government's purpose ... was to prohibit particular content of expression in the name of protecting children. These provisions therefore constitute limitations to s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter. ... They fall [sic] to be justified under s. 1 of the Canadian Charter

VII. Whether the Limit on Freedom of Expression Imposed by ss. 248 and 249 Is Justified Under Section 9.1 of the Quebec Charter or Section 1 of the Canadian Charter

[The three judges then dealt with the issue of whether the scheme put into place by the impugned provisions is so vague as not to constitute a limit "prescribed by law." They concluded that there is nothing inherently confusing or contradictory about the provisions and that despite the element of discretion involved in the interpretation of the sections, the legislature had provided an intelligible standard. That aspect of the judgment is dealt with further in the discussion of "prescribed by law" and vagueness found in Chapter 17, The Framework of the Charter. The analysis then moved to the issue of justification under s 1.]

The question becomes whether the evidence submitted by the government establishes that children under 13 are unable to make choices and distinctions respecting products advertised and whether this in turn justifies the restriction on advertising put into place. Studies subsequent to the enactment of the legislation can be used for this purpose.

[On the evidentiary issue, the three judges found that although it is not open to the government, under s 1, to assert a legislative objective that did not animate the legislation at the time of enactment, in proving that the objective remains pressing and substantial the government is allowed to draw on the best evidence currently available.]

a. Pressing and Substantial Objective

In our view, the Attorney General of Quebec has demonstrated that the concern which prompted the enactment of the impugned legislation is pressing and substantial The concern is for the protection of a group which is particularly vulnerable to the techniques of seduction and manipulation abundant in advertising. In the words of the Attorney General of Quebec, [TRANSLATION] "Children experience most manifestly the kind of inequality and imbalance between producers and consumers which the legislature wanted to correct." The material given in evidence before this Court is indicative of a generalized concern in Western societies with the impact of media, and particularly but not solely televised advertising, on the development and perceptions of young children. ... Broadly speaking, the concerns which have motivated both legislative and voluntary regulation in this area are the particular susceptibility of young children to media manipulation, their inability to differentiate between reality and fiction and to grasp the persuasive intention behind the message, and the secondary effects of exterior influences on the family and parental authority. Responses to the perceived problems are [varied.] However the consensus of concern is high.

In establishing the factual basis for this generally identified concern, the Attorney General relied heavily upon the US Federal Trade Commission (FTC) Final Staff Report and Recommendation, In the Matter of Children's Advertising, which ... [concludes] that young children (2-6) cannot distinguish fact from fiction or programming from advertising and are completely credulous when presented with advertising messages[...] ... The Report thus provides a sound basis on which to conclude that television advertising directed at young children is per se manipulative. Such advertising aims to promote products by convincing those who will always believe.

It is reasonable to extend this conclusion in two ways. First, it can be extended to advertising in other media. ... Second, it can be extended to advertising aimed at older children (7-13). The Attorney General filed a number of studies reaching somewhat different conclusions ... [but they all] suggest that at some point between age seven and adolescence, children become as capable as adults of understanding and responding to advertisements. The majority in the Court of Appeal interpreted this evidence narrowly and found that it only justified the objective of regulating advertising aimed at children six or younger They concluded, and we agree, that the evidence was strongest with respect to the younger age category. Opinion is more divided when children [between 7 and 13] are involved. But the legislature was not obliged to confine itself solely to protecting the most clearly vulnerable group. It was only required to exercise a reasonable judgment in specifying the vulnerable group.

[Reference was then made to Dickson CJ's ruling in R v Edwards Books and Art Ltd, [1986] 2 SCR 713, 1986 CanLII 12, excerpted in Chapter 19, Freedom of Religion, to the effect that s 1 requires a "reasonable limit" (at para 31), with the result that "courts are not called upon to substitute judicial opinions for legislative ones as to the place at which to draw a precise line" (at para 147). The "line" in issue in Edwards Books was a legislative decision to exempt businesses having seven or fewer employees from a Sunday closing rule.]

The same can be said of evaluating competing credible scientific evidence and choosing ... the upper age limit for the protected group here in issue. Where the legislature mediates between the competing claims of different groups in the community, it will inevitably be called upon to draw a line marking where one set of claims legitimately begins and the other fades away without access to complete knowledge as to its precise location. If the legislature has made a reasonable assessment ... , especially if that assessment involves weighing conflicting scientific evidence and allocating scarce resources on this basis, it is not for the court to second guess. That would only be to substitute one estimate for another. In dealing with inherently heterogeneous groups defined in terms of age or a characteristic analogous to age, evidence showing that a clear majority of the group requires the protection which the government has identified can help to establish that the group was defined reasonably. Here, the legislature has mediated between the claims of advertisers and those seeking commercial information on the one hand, and the claims of children and parents on the other. There is sufficient evidence to warrant drawing a line at age thirteen, and we would not presume to re-draw the line. ...

... The s. 1 ... materials demonstrate, on the balance of probabilities, that children up to the age of thirteen are manipulated by commercial advertising and that the objective of protecting all children in this age group is predicated on a pressing and substantial concern. We thus conclude that the Attorney General has discharged the onus under the first part of the Oakes test.

b. Means Proportional to the Ends

[The rational connection test was easily found to have been satisfied. The analysis then moved to the issue of minimal impairment.]

... [I]n matching means to ends and asking whether rights or freedoms are impaired as little as possible, a legislature mediating between the claims of competing groups will be forced to strike a balance without the benefit of absolute certainty concerning how that balance is best struck. Vulnerable groups will claim the need for protection by the government whereas other groups and individuals will assert that the government should not intrude. In Edwards Books, supra, Dickson C.J. expressed an important concern about the situation of vulnerable groups (at p. 779):

In interpreting and applying the Charter I believe that the courts must be cautious to ensure that it does not simply become an instrument of better situated individuals to roll back legislation which has as its object the improvement of the condition of less advantaged persons.

When striking a balance between the claims of competing groups, the choice of means, like the choice of ends, frequently will require an assessment of conflicting scientific evidence and differing justified demands on scarce resources. Democratic institutions are meant to let us all share in the responsibility for these difficult choices. Thus, as courts review the results of the legislature's deliberations, particularly with respect to the protection of vulnerable groups, they must be mindful of the legislature's representative function. ...

In other cases, however, rather than mediating between different groups, the government is best characterized as the singular antagonist of the individual whose right has been infringed. For example, in justifying an infringement of legal rights enshrined in ss. 7 to 14 of the Charter, the state, on behalf of the whole community, typically will assert its responsibility for prosecuting crime whereas the individual will assert the paramountcy of principles of fundamental justice. There might not be any further competing claims among different groups. ... [W]henever the government's purpose relates to maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judicial system, the courts can assess with some certainty whether the "least drastic means" for achieving the purpose have been chosen, especially given their accumulated experience in dealing with such questions The same degree of certainty may not be achievable in cases involving the [competing claims and] scarce government resources.

In the instant case, the Court is called upon to assess competing social science evidence respecting ... children's advertising. The question is whether the government had a reasonable basis, on the evidence tendered, for concluding that the ban on all advertising directed at children impaired freedom of expression as little as possible given the government's pressing and substantial objective.

[The three judges found that the "strongest evidence" in support of minimal impairment was from the FTC Report, which found that young children (2 to 6 years of age) were "cognitively limited" and so could not distinguish advertising from entertainment. The report had determined that the only effective means for dealing with advertising directed at young children was a ban, but had also concluded that, on a practical level, such a ban would be impossible to implement (in addition, presumably, to First Amendment problems under the US Constitution). It did not make any recommendation regarding children aged 7 to 13. The Quebec law was found to have overcome the practical limitations faced by the FTC. It contemplated a ban on advertising directed at children older than in the FTC report, confined the ban to only certain times of the day when children make up a larger segment of the audience, and specified categories of products and advertisements that allowed for a sophisticated appraisal of whether an advertisement was aimed at children.]

... [T]he respondent argued that a ban was not the only effective means for dealing with the problem posed by children's advertising. In particular, it pointed to the self-regulation mechanism provided by the Broadcast Code for Advertising to Children as an obvious alternative and emphasized that Quebec was unique among industrialized countries in banning advertising aimed at children The latter assertion must be qualified in two respects. First, as of 1984, Belgium, Denmark, Norway and Sweden did not allow any commercials on television and radio. Second, throughout Canada, as in Italy, the public network does not accept children's commercials (except, in the case of the CBC, during "family programs"). Consequently, Quebec's ban on advertising aimed at children is not out of proportion to measures taken in other jurisdictions. Nor is legislative action to protect vulnerable groups necessarily restricted to the least common denominator of actions taken elsewhere. Based on narrower objectives than those pursued by Quebec, some governments might reasonably conclude that self-regulation is an adequate mechanism for addressing the problem of children's advertising. But having identified advertising aimed at persons under thirteen as per se manipulative, the legislature of Quebec could conclude, just as reasonably, that the only effective statutory response was to ban such advertising.

In sum, the evidence sustains the reasonableness of the legislature's conclusion that a ban on commercial advertising directed to children was the minimal impairment of free expression consistent with the pressing and substantial goal of protecting children against manipulation through such advertising. While evidence exists that other less intrusive options reflecting more modest objectives were available to the government, there is evidence establishing the necessity of a ban to meet the objectives the government had reasonably set. This Court will not, in the name of minimal impairment, take a restrictive approach to social science evidence and require legislatures to choose the least ambitious means to protect vulnerable groups. There must nevertheless be a sound evidentiary basis for the government's conclusions

iii. Deleterious Effects

There is no suggestion here that the effects of the ban are so severe as to outweigh the government's pressing and substantial objective. Advertisers are always free to direct their message at parents and other adults. They are also free to participate in educational advertising. The real concern animating the challenge to the legislation is that revenues are in some degree affected. This only implies that advertisers will have to develop new marketing strategies for children's products. ...

[The impugned provisions were therefore upheld under s 1 of the Charter.]

McINTYRE J (Beetz J concurring) (dissenting):

• • •

While I agree with [my colleagues] that ss. 248 and 249 of the Consumer Protection Act infringe s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. ... I do not agree that they may be justified under s. 1 of the Canadian Charter

Can it be said that the welfare of children is at risk because of advertising directed at them? I am not satisfied that any case has been shown that it is. There was evidence that small children are incapable of distinguishing fact from fiction in advertising. This is hardly surprising: many adults have the same problem. Children, however, do not remain children. They grow up and, while advertising directed at children may well be a source of irritation to parents, no case has been shown here that children suffer harm. Children live in a world of fiction, imagination and make believe. Children's literature is based upon these concepts. As they mature, they make adjustments and can be expected to pass beyond the range of any ill which might be caused by advertising. In my view, no case has been made that children are at risk. Furthermore, even if I could reach another conclusion, I would be of the view that the restriction fails on the issue of proportionality. A total prohibition of advertising aimed at children below an arbitrarily fixed age makes no attempt at the achievement of proportionality.

In conclusion, I would say that freedom of expression is too important to be lightly cast aside or limited. It is ironic that most attempts to limit freedom of expression and hence freedom of knowledge and information are justified on the basis that the limitation is for the benefit of those whose rights will be limited. It was this proposition that motivated the early church in restricting access to information, even to prohibiting the promulgation and reading of the scriptures in a language understood by the people. The argument that freedom of expression was dangerous was used to oppose and restrict public education in earlier times. The education of women was greatly retarded on the basis that wider knowledge would only make them dissatisfied with their role in society. I do not suggest that the limitations imposed by ss. 248 and 249 are so earth shaking or that if sustained they will cause irremediable damage. I do say, however, that these limitations represent a small abandonment of a principle of vital importance in a free and democratic society and, therefore, even if it could be shown that some child or children have been adversely affected by advertising of the kind prohibited, I would still be of the opinion that the restriction should not be sustained. Our concern should be to recognize that in this century we have seen whole societies utterly corrupted by the suppression of free expression. We should not lightly take a step in that direction, even a small one.

... Freedom of expression, whether political, religious, artistic or commercial, should not be suppressed except in cases where urgent and compelling reasons exist and then only to the extent and for the time necessary for the protection of the community.

Appeal dismissed.

As we have seen, the Court in Irwin Toy rejected the high value–low value distinction in the determination of whether an expressive activity falls within s 2(b). Yet it appears to have embraced the distinction in the determination of whether a governmental interference is justified under s 1, an approach that has continued in subsequent cases. At the s 1 stage, the Court has taken to characterizing the expression at stake as being of high or low value, a characterization that helps to determine whether a strict or attenuated s 1 justification analysis is appropriate: see Keegstra, excerpted in Section IV. This is understood to be an application of the “contextual” approach to Charter interpretation introduced in Edmonton Journal v Alberta (AG), [1989] 2 SCR 1326, 1989 CanLII 20.

The distinction between core and marginal expression, or high value versus low value speech, plays a significant role in the Supreme Court’s approach to a variety of freedom of expression issues, including commercial advertising, hate promotion, and pornography. When the Court decides that a certain kind of expression has only a marginal connection to the values underlying freedom of expression, it applies some or all of the s 1 steps in a more flexible or less rigorous way. When reading the various cases in this chapter, consider whether there is any basis for this distinction.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. According to the Supreme Court of Canada, s 2(b) protects any activity that “conveys or attempts to convey a message.” The Court uses the example of illegal or unauthorized parking to illustrate the potential breadth of the category of protected expression. Although parking, illegal or otherwise, is not ordinarily an expressive act, if an individual parks their car illegally as a protest of some kind, then that act of parking will be considered expression and fall within the scope of s 2(b).

An individual may communicate using symbolic forms such as spoken or written language, hand gestures, or wearing a black armband that may also be seen as conveying a message. Because the Supreme Court of Canada has defined expression so broadly that it includes all acts intended to convey a message, any act is potentially an act of expression. This also means that any law is potentially a restriction on expression. Has the Court defined the scope of s 2(b) too broadly? Could it have been defined more narrowly? For an argument that the Court’s “exceedingly broad” understanding of protected expression is fundamentally flawed, see Robin Elliot, “Back to Basics: A Critical Look at the Irwin Toy Framework for Freedom of Expression” (2011) 15 Rev Const Stud 205.

2. In Irwin Toy, the Supreme Court introduced an exception to its broad definition of constitutionally protected expression—expressive activity that takes the form of violence is not included within the guarantee of freedom of expression. All acts of expression have some sort of direct physical consequences—if not a broken nose, then perhaps broken silence. When will the physical effects of an expressive act be considered violent, so that the act falls outside the scope of s 2(b), and when will the act be protected under that section even though it causes injury to the interests of another—such as obstruction or harassment that might justify restriction under s 1?

In Montréal (City) v 2952-1366 Québec Inc, 2005 SCC 62, excerpted below, the Supreme Court of Canada discussed the “violence exception.” The majority judgment of McLachlin CJ and Deschamps J (Binnie J dissenting on another point) included the following observations:

[60] Expressive activity may fall outside the scope of s. 2(b) protection because of how or where it is delivered. While all expressive content is worthy of protection (see Irwin Toy, at p. 969), the method or location of the expression may not be. For instance, ... violent expression is not protected . . . [not] because of the message it conveys (no matter how hateful) but rather because the method by which the message is conveyed is not consonant with Charter protection.

[72] Expressive activity should be excluded from the protective scope of s. 2(b) only if its method or location clearly undermines the values that underlie the guarantee. . . . Violent expression may be a means of political expression and may serve to enhance the self-fulfillment of the perpetrator. However, it is not protected by s. 2(b) because violent means and methods undermine the values that s. 2(b) seeks to protect. Violence prevents dialogue rather than fostering it. Violence prevents the self-fulfillment of the victim rather than enhancing it. And violence stands in the way of finding the truth rather than furthering it. [Emphasis in original.]

Are threats of violence included in the violence exception? In RWDSU v Dolphin Delivery Ltd, above, McIntyre J suggested that threats of violence might also be excluded, but in Keegstra (excerpted below), which was decided shortly after Irwin Toy, the Court held that threats of violence do not fall within the exception. However, more recently, in R v Khawaja, 2012 SCC 69, McLachlin CJ, writing for the Court, appears to have settled the matter in favour of excluding threats of violence:

[70] ... It makes little sense to exclude acts of violence from the ambit of s 2(b), but to confer protection on threats of violence. Neither are worthy of protection. Threats of violence, like violence, undermine the rule of law. As I wrote in dissent in R. v. Keegstra, ... [1990] 3 S.C.R. 697, threats of violence take away free choice and undermine freedom of action. They undermine the very values and social conditions that are necessary for the continued existence of freedom of expression (pp. 830–31). I therefore reject that the violence exception to s. 2(b) is confined to actual physical violence, without however deciding the precise ambit of the exception. Threats of violence fall outside the s. 2(b) guarantee of free expression.

3. In Irwin Toy, the Court introduced a distinction between laws that have as their purpose the control or restriction of expression and laws that have the effect of merely restricting expression. Where the law's purpose is to restrict protected expressive activity, the law will "automatically" violate s 2(b). However, where the law simply has the effect of limiting expressive activity, a violation of s 2(b) will occur only if the plaintiff can establish that the restricted expression advances one of the values underlying the guarantee. Some commentators argue that this step in the analysis is redundant because any activity that conveys meaning will be found to serve the values underlying the guarantee. If a municipal noise by-law has the effect of preventing me from communicating my political message using a megaphone at midnight in a residential neighbourhood, will it be difficult for me to show that my chosen form of expression advances freedom of expression values?

In introducing this, the Court in Irwin Toy was clearly drawing on a distinction central to US First Amendment jurisprudence between "content-based" restrictions and content-neutral, "time, place and manner" restrictions. In the United States, state-imposed content-based restrictions are viewed as a serious threat to First Amendment values and are difficult to justify. On the other hand, time, place, and manner restrictions, which seek to prevent harms caused by the form rather than the message of expression—for example, physical disruption of quiet or property use—will be upheld provided they are narrowly tailored and leave adequate alternative channels for communicative activity.

Is there any reason to differentiate between purpose-based and effects-based restrictions at the s 2(b) stage of Charter analysis? It is worth noting that on several occasions, the Court has said that "time, place and manner" restrictions may be easier to justify under s 1 than other types of restrictions. For a critical view of this aspect of the Irwin Toy framework, see Elliot, "Back to Basics," note 1 above.

4. As discussed in Chapter 17, we also see in Irwin Toy the development of a more deferential, flexible, reasonableness-based approach to the various strands of the s 1 test, and in particular the minimal impairment test. Irwin Toy builds on the initial developments in this direction in R v Edwards Books and Art Ltd, [1986] 2 SCR 713, 1986 CanLII 12, excerpted in Chapter 19. In Irwin Toy, this less stringent application of s 1 is viewed as appropriate in cases classified as "regulatory"—that is, involving socio-economic considerations where the government acts as the mediator between the claims of competing individuals or groups in the community. In contrast, a more rigorous application of s 1 is warranted in criminal law cases where the government is the singular antagonist of the individual. Are the two kinds of cases as easily distinguished as the Court suggests?

A second theme is intertwined with the concerns expressed in Irwin Toy about the comparative institutional competence of courts and legislatures with respect to socio-economic matters. There are also suggestions that the more deferential standard of review is particularly appropriate in circumstances where the government is acting to protect a vulnerable group—retail workers in Edwards Books and children in Irwin Toy. This second rationale for deference reflects a desire on the part of the Court to ensure that the Charter be used as a tool of social justice—that it be interpreted in such a way as to improve, or at least not worsen, the situation of the economically and socially disadvantaged.

In later judgments, the Supreme Court of Canada has indicated that a variety of factors may affect the standard of proof under s 1, including (1) the nature of the harm and the inability to measure it, (2) the vulnerability of the group protected, (3) subjective fears and apprehension of harm, and (4) the nature of the infringed activity: see R v Bryan, [\[2007 SCC 12\]](#), per Bastarache J at para 10.

5. For a review of many of the freedom of expression cases found in this chapter from the perspective of the s 1 analysis and the evolution of the Oakes test, see Sujit Choudhry, "So What Is the Real Legacy of Oakes? Two Decades of Proportionality Analysis Under the Canadian Charter's Section 1" (2006) 34 SCLR (2d) 501, excerpted in Chapter 17.

III. COMMERCIAL EXPRESSION

As noted above, in Ford v Quebec (AG), the Supreme Court of Canada held that commercial expression fell within the scope of s 2(b). Some commentators disagreed with this ruling, arguing that advertising is an instrumental form of expression undeserving of constitutional protection. For these critics, regulation of advertising is simply a form of economic regulation within the legitimate domain of the legislature: see, for example, Allan Hutchinson, "Money Talk: Against Constitutionalizing (Commercial) Speech" (1990) 17 Can Bus LJ 2. In partial recognition of these concerns, the Court has said in subsequent judgments that, while commercial expression is protected under s 2(b), its restriction may be more easily justified because it is less directly connected to the values underlying our commitment to freedom of expression.

Rocket v Royal College of Dental Surgeons of Ontario, [\[1990\] 2 SCR 232, 1990 CanLII 121](#) involved a challenge to a regulation enacted under the Ontario Health Disciplines Act, RSO 1980, c 196 by the College of Dental Surgeons imposing stringent restrictions on advertising by dentists. The Supreme Court of Canada concluded that the regulation violated the Charter's guarantee of freedom of expression. In dealing with the s 1 analysis, McLachlin J, writing for a unanimous court, noted that although commercial expression is constitutionally protected, its commercial nature would be significant in the balancing exercise under s 1. She suggested that because the motive behind the expression was primarily the pursuit of economic profit, and because consumers of dental services are highly vulnerable to unregulated advertising, restrictions on expression of this kind might be easier to justify than other infringements of s 2(b). On the other hand, she also recognized the public interest served by such expression in enhancing the ability of consumers (or in this case, patients) to make informed choices. In the end, the Court concluded that the regulation could not be justified under s 1. While acknowledging that the regulation of advertising might be necessary to protect members of the public (who would have difficulty judging claims of quality) and maintain standards of professionalism, the Court found that:

The public has an interest in obtaining information as to dentists' office hours, the languages they speak, and other objective facts relevant to their practice—information which s. 37(39) prohibits dentists from conveying by advertising. Useful information is restricted without justification.

Another form of commercial expression, soliciting for the purposes of prostitution, was found to be protected by s 2(b) of the Charter in Reference re ss 193 and 195.1(1)(c) of the criminal code (Man), [1990] 1 SCR 1123, 1990 CanLII 105. A majority of the Court concluded, however, that the Criminal Code provision prohibiting any communication in a public place for the purpose of engaging in prostitution could be upheld under s 1 as a proportionate response to the nuisance created by street solicitation. The economic purpose motivating the expression was taken into account by Dickson CJ in the balancing process:

[T]he expressive activity, as with any infringed Charter right, should also be analyzed in the particular context of the case. Here, the activity to which the impugned legislation is directed is expression with an economic purpose. It can hardly be said that communications regarding an economic transaction of sex for money lie at, or even near, the core of the guarantee of freedom of expression.

The Supreme Court was invited to revisit this finding in Canada (AG) v Bedford, 2013 SCC 72, excerpted in Chapter 22, The Right to Life, Liberty, and Security of the Person, but declined to do so because no new legal issue was raised nor was there a significant change in the circumstances or evidence.

The regulation of the advertising of tobacco products has been the subject of two significant freedom of expression cases, discussed below. Although the object of these laws is to promote health by reducing tobacco consumption, they have attracted scrutiny under s 2(b) of the Charter.

NOTE ON RJR MACDONALD INC V CANADA, [1995] 3 SCR 199, 1995 CANLII 64

The federal Tobacco Products Control Act, SC 1988, c 20 prohibited tobacco advertising, the promotion of tobacco products, and required mandatory unattributed health warnings on all tobacco products sold in Canada. The law was held to be intra vires under the federal government's criminal law power. But for the mandatory health warnings, the government conceded that 2(b) was infringed. However, the government refused to divulge a report that was prepared and introduced to the Federal Cabinet that would have identified the alternative means the government had considered in enacting the law.

Justice La Forest (L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, Cory JJ concurring) dissented, calling for a deferential s 1 test:

[63] This Court has on many occasions affirmed that the Oakes requirements must be applied flexibly, having regard to the specific factual and social context of each case. The word "reasonable" in s. 1 necessarily imports flexibility

[67] ... Simply put, a strict application of the proportionality analysis in cases of this nature would place an impossible onus on Parliament by requiring it to produce definitive social scientific evidence respecting the root causes of a pressing area of social concern every time it wishes to address its effects. This could have the effect of virtually paralyzing the operation of government in the socio-economic sphere.

Courts are better placed, they wrote, to intervene to protect liberty. They are "not specialists in the realm of policy making, nor should they be" (at para 68). They continued:

[69] ... Health underlies many of our most cherished rights and values, and the protection of public health is one of the fundamental responsibilities of Parliament. On the other hand, however, it is clear that a prohibition on the manufacture, sale or use of tobacco products is unrealistic. Nearly seven million Canadians use tobacco products, which are highly addictive. Undoubtedly, a prohibition of this nature would lead to an increase in illegal activity, smuggling and, quite possibly, civil disobedience. Well aware of these difficulties, Parliament chose a less drastic, and more incremental, response to the tobacco health problem. In prohibiting the advertising and promotion of tobacco products, as opposed to their manufacture or sale, Parliament has sought to achieve a compromise among the competing interests of smokers, non-smokers and manufacturers, with an eye to protecting vulnerable groups in society. Given the fact that advertising, by its very nature, is intended to influence consumers and create demand, this was a reasonable policy decision.

Moreover, tobacco advertising falls far from the "core" of freedom of expression:

[75] In my view, the harm engendered by tobacco, and the profit motive underlying its promotion, place this form of expression as far from the "core" of freedom of expression values as prostitution, hate mongering, or pornography, and thus entitle it to a very low degree of protection under s. 1. It must be kept in mind that tobacco advertising serves no political, scientific or artistic ends; nor does it promote participation in the political process. Rather, its sole purpose is to inform consumers about, and promote the use of, a product that is harmful, and often fatal, to the consumers who use it. The main, if not sole, motivation for this advertising is, of course, profit.

Reduction in smoking, the principal cause of deadly cancer, was a pressing and substantial objective. Though the social science evidence was ambivalent about the effects of banning tobacco advertising, rational connection was also satisfied. It must have some effect on consumer habits, otherwise why engage in expensive advocacy campaigns other than to maintain and expand their market? Minimal impairment was also satisfied, though a less expansive ban (a "partial ban," at para 17) could have been implemented. It is described as "relatively unintrusive" and "narrow" (at para 97, emphasis in original). Proportionate effects analysis also tilted in favour of the government ban. The dissenting judges did not find that the unattributed health warnings offended s 2(b). They were akin to labels on hazardous products. No adverse inference was drawn against the government for refusing to disclose evidence of alternative means.

Chief Justice McLachlin (Lamer CJ, Sopinka, Iacobucci, and Major JJ concurring) agreed that, although deference may be appropriate, the government is obliged to offer some "reasoned demonstration" for its choice of means:

[134] ... Context is essential in determining legislative objective and proportionality, but it cannot be carried to the extreme of treating the challenged law as a unique socio-economic phenomenon, of which Parliament is deemed the best judge. This would be to undercut the obligation on Parliament to justify limitations which it places on Charter rights and would be to substitute ad hoc judicial discretion for the reasoned demonstration contemplated by the Charter.

Nor should the Court distinguish too sharply between criminal prohibitions and social policy:

[135] ... [S]uch distinctions may not always be easy to apply. For example, the criminal law is generally seen as involving a contest between the state and the accused, but it also involves an allocation of priorities between the accused and the victim, actual or potential. The cases at bar provide a cogent example. We are concerned with a criminal law, which pits the state against the offender.

Turning to s 1, a pressing and substantial objective and rational connection with the law was satisfied with reference to "reason and logic" (at para 164). Minimal impairment, however, was not satisfied. What was required was that the means fall within a "range of reasonable alternatives" (at para 160) but, here, there was insufficient evidence to justify a "full prohibition" (at para 163). The law, wrote the majority:

[162] ... bans all forms of advertising of Canadian tobacco products while explicitly exempting all foreign advertising of non-Canadian products which are sold in Canada. It extends to advertising which arguably produces benefits to the consumer while having little or no conceivable impact on consumption. Purely informational advertising, simple reminders of package appearance, advertising for new brands and advertising showing relative tar content of different brands—all these are included in the ban. Smoking is a legal activity yet consumers are deprived of an important means of learning about product availability to suit their preferences and to compare brand content with an aim to reducing the risk to their health.

A “partial ban” would have reasonably achieved the important objective. Having been denied access to cabinet confidences, which would have explained the reasonable alternative means available, the Court was presented with “no evidence in defence of the total ban” (at para 165).

This omission, the majority continued, was “all the more glaring” (at para 166) since the Attorney General had carried out at least one study of alternatives to a total ban but refused to disclose it along with hundreds of other related documents. The Attorney General cited for its refusal “Cabinet confidentiality” protected under the Canada Evidence Act, RSC 1985, c C-5. The majority noted that: “In the face of this behaviour, one is hard-pressed not to infer that the results of the studies must undercut the government’s claim that a less invasive ban would not have produced an equally salutary result” (at para 166). The Attorney General failed to respond to RJR’s claim that there were, in fact, alternatives—instead “content[ing] himself with the bland statement that a complete ban is justified because Parliament ‘had to balance competing interests’” (at para 167). The majority found that assertion to not be the kind of evidence capable of demonstrating minimal impairment.

In addition, the majority said that it was important not to undervalue commercial expression. While tobacco consumption itself was not banned, consumers “who lawfully choose to smoke” (at para 170) are deprived “of information relating to price, quality and even health risks associated with different brands” (at para 162). Moreover, the profit motive was not determinative given that many forms of expression—such as books and newspapers—were also associated with generating revenue. Thus, “motivation to profit is irrelevant to the determination of whether the government has established that the law is reasonable or justified as an infringement of freedom of expression” (at para 171).

The government failed to establish proportionality, not even as regards unattributed health warnings. The government could, as in the US, identify the government (in the US, the Surgeon General) as the author of these warnings rather than force tobacco companies to be associated with the opinion that smoking is detrimental to health.

Justice Iacobucci issued a concurring opinion that provided some guidance to the federal government moving forward. They could tailor the law by attributing warnings to government and enact a partial ban by prohibiting “lifestyle advertising only and limitations on advertising aimed at adolescents” (at para 191).

In 1997, the federal government passed new legislation regulating tobacco advertising and labelling. The Tobacco Act, SC 1997, c 13 prohibits most tobacco advertising, but creates an exception for “information advertising” and “brand-preference advertising” contained in publications (primarily magazines) directed at an adult readership. All “lifestyle” advertising is banned. The legislation also requires the placement of health warnings, in a prescribed form and manner, on tobacco packages, but the warnings are attributed to a prescribed person or body. The Court was satisfied with changes to the federal law, roughly along the lines suggested in RJR-MacDonald, in Canada (AG) v JTI-Macdonald Corp, 2007 SCC 30.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Justice McLachlin was prepared to uphold a ban on lifestyle advertising because she accepted that this sort of advertising had the effect of increasing tobacco consumption.

However, she concluded that informational and brand preference advertising should not be restricted because they did not encourage the smoking habit but simply reinforced brand loyalty or encouraged brand switching. Is there any real basis for this distinction? Can an ad reinforce brand loyalty without reinforcing the smoking habit? Can it encourage brand switching without encouraging smokers not to quit or non-smokers to start?

Both McLachlin and La Forest JJ seemed to assume that cigarette advertising could be restricted if it was shown to be effective in persuading its audience to smoke, but that it could not be restricted if it was shown to be ineffective. Yet how can it be that the justification for restricting expression is stronger when the expression persuades its audience to start or continue smoking? If people have a legal right to perform a particular act, such as smoking, is it not wrong to prevent them from hearing expression that supports performance of that act? Does the Court's judgment rest on an assumption that at least some forms of tobacco advertising are manipulative or deceptive?

2. In Rocket v Royal College of Dental Surgeons of Ontario, McLachlin J noted that the motive behind commercial expression was "primarily economic" and that the loss caused by censorship of this form of expression "is merely loss of profit, and not loss of opportunity to participate in the political process or the marketplace of ideas, or to realize one's spirited or artistic self-fulfillment." For these reasons she decided that "restrictions on expression of this kind might be easier to justify than other infringements of s. 2(b)." However, in RJR-MacDonald, she argued that the profit motive or economic orientation should not lessen the claim of expression to constitutional protection. Did McLachlin J change her mind and accept that profit-motivated expression is no less valuable than other forms of expression?

3. David Schneiderman has argued that the Court treated commercial expression as essentially benign:

In RJR-MacDonald the Court did not perceive the legislative objective as prohibiting harmful speech. Even though tobacco consumption admittedly was harmful to one's health, the advertising at issue, promoting a lawful product, was not itself harmful. The state interest in protecting vulnerable groups and preventing harm may help to explain the Court's approach to commercial speech as a whole. The Court does not consider that commercial speech— manipulative advertising with the primary (if not exclusive) purpose of constructing needs and shaping purchasing habits—causes harm to anyone. Full and rigorous protection of much commercial speech makes sense because such speech is not controversial. It does not target vulnerable groups and it does not cause harm. This approach is particularly justifiable when the advertising conveys "information" to consumers. In societies with market economies, commercial speech provides important information to citizens about a matter that concerns them immensely: the acquisition of goods and services as an expression of their individuality.

See David Schneiderman, "Consumer Interests and Commercial Speech: A Comment on RJR-Macdonald v Canada (AG)" (1996) 30 UBC L Rev 165 at 175 (footnotes omitted).

4. Justice McLachlin found that the provision in the Tobacco Act requiring tobacco manufacturers to place unattributed health warnings on tobacco packages violated their freedom of expression and could not be justified under s 1. Do all product labelling laws, including those that require the identification of poisons or the listing of food ingredients, violate the right to freedom of expression (and the Charter)? If not, why are cigarette health warnings different?

Freedom of expression is understood as entailing not just the right to express one's own ideas, but also the right not to speak. What is objectionable about compelled expression? Is it that the audience might mistakenly attribute the message to the speaker? In many or most cases in which individuals are compelled to express themselves, the audience is aware that the message is compelled and is not the individual's own. Did the cigarette purchasers think that the health warnings on packages were the voluntarily expressed opinions of the manufacturers? Another view is that compelled expression is objectionable not because individuals will be incorrectly identified with views that are not their own, but because they will suffer the indignity of having to express such views. Does this sort of shame arise in the RJR-MacDonald case?

In Canada, prior to RJR-MacDonald, the right not to speak was recognized in Slaight Communications Inc v Davidson, [1989] 1 SCR 1038, 1989 CanLII 92. In that case, a labour adjudicator, after finding that an employee had been wrongfully dismissed, ordered the employer, inter alia, to provide the employee with a letter of recommendation. The letter was to include specified information concerning the employee's sales performance and also a statement to the effect that the adjudicator had found the employee's termination to constitute unjust dismissal. The order was found to violate freedom of expression. However, it was upheld under s 1. Central to the Court's s 1 assessment was a recognition of the "unequal balance of power that normally exists between an employer and employee."

How far does the right not to speak extend? Does it prohibit the state from using, or allowing someone else to use, an individual's property to support expressive activity with which the individual does not agree? In Lavigne v Ontario Public Service Employees Union, [1991] 2 SCR 211, 1991 CanLII 68, the Supreme Court of Canada addressed the issue of compulsory union dues and their expenditure by the union on political issues. Lavigne was an employee at a community college. As a member of the bargaining unit, but not of the union, he was subject to a mandatory dues check-off. After the union made contributions to left-leaning causes, Lavigne argued that his freedom of expression was violated since his compulsory payments to the union were spent on political matters not directly related to collective bargaining. The Court was unanimous that the compelled union dues did not violate freedom of expression under s 2(b). It stressed that others were unlikely to attribute to Lavigne the views expressed by the union and that he had plenty of opportunity to disassociate himself from those views. For further reading on compelled expression, see Robin Elliot & David W-L Wu, "Compelled Expression and the Charter" (2015) 68 SCLR (2d) 485.

Signs and posters are a common means of commercial expression. To what extent can their use be limited? The Supreme Court of Canada first dealt with this issue in Ramsden v Peterborough (City), [1993] 2 SCR 1084, 1993 CanLII 60 (discussed further in Section VII, "Access to Public Property"). Ramsden was found charged with breaching a by-law that prohibited posterizing on city utility poles. At the Supreme Court of Canada, Iacobucci J, writing for the Court, held that posterizing on public property, such as utility poles, fell within the scope of s 2(b) and (at 1107) that the total ban on posterizing on public property does not impair the right as little as is reasonably possible, given the many alternatives available to the appellant.

Moreover, the benefits of the by-law are limited while the abrogation of the freedom is total, thus proportionality between the effects and the objective has not been achieved. While the legislative goals are important, they do not warrant the complete denial of access to a historically and politically significant form of expression. I would agree ... that "[a]s between a total restriction of this important right and some litter, surely some litter must be tolerated." Therefore, the by-law cannot be justified under s. 1.

R v Guignard, immediately below, deals with another aspect of commercial expression—"counter-advertising" by consumers—in the context of a challenge to a municipal by-law that prohibited advertising signs in certain parts of a municipality. In a judgment authored by LeBel J, the Court struck down the by-law.

R v Guignard2002 SCC 14

[In 1996, after an insurance dispute, Guignard erected a sign criticizing his insurance provider. A municipal inspector ordered him to remove the sign within 24 hours, citing a by-law prohibiting advertising signs outside an industrial area (Règlement d'urbanisme no 1200 de la Ville de Saint-Hyacinthe, s 14.1.5(p)). When he refused to comply, the municipality charged Guignard with contravening the by-law.]

LeBEL J (McLachlin CJ and L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, Iacobucci, Major, Bastarache, and Arbour JJ concurring):

[23] ... [C]ommercial enterprises have a constitutional right to engage in activities to inform and promote, by advertising. As we know and can attest, sometimes with mixed feelings, the ubiquitous presence of advertising is a defining characteristic of western societies. Usually, it attempts to convey a positive message to potential consumers. However, it sometimes involves comparisons and may even be negative. On the other hand, consumers also have freedom of expression. This sometimes takes the form of "counter-advertising" Within limits prescribed by the legal principles relating to defamation, every consumer enjoys this right ... [to] express their frustration or disappointment with a product or service ... [and to share] their concerns, worries or even anger with other consumers and try to warn them against the practices of a business. Given the tremendous importance of economic activity in our society, a consumer's "counter-advertising" assists in circulating information and protecting the interests of society just as much as does advertising or certain forms of political expression. This type of communication may be of considerable social importance, even beyond the merely commercial sphere.

[24] "Counter-advertising" is not ... a form of expression derived from commercial speech. Rather, it is a form of the expression of opinion that has an important effect on the social and economic life of a society. It is a right not only of consumers, but of citizens.

[25] ... In Ramsden v. Peterborough (City), ... [1993] 2 S.C.R. 1084, this Court stressed the importance of signs as an effective and inexpensive means of communication for individuals and groups that do not have sufficient economic resources. Signs, which have been used for centuries to communicate political, artistic or economic information, sometimes convey forceful messages. Signs, in various forms, are thus a public, accessible and effective form of expressive activity for anyone who cannot undertake media campaigns. ...

[26] ... Even when a legislative or regulatory provision is neutral in appearance, it can have a major impact on the ability of a person or group to engage in expressive activity (see Irwin Toy, at pp. 974-75).

[30] ... The by-law severely curtails Guignard's freedom to express his dissatisfaction with the practices of his insurance company publicly. It forces him to use advertising methods that presuppose the availability of adequate financial resources. Alternatively, it restricts him to private or virtually private communications such as distributing leaflets in the neighbourhood around his property, which is undoubtedly less effective, to convey to the public his opinion about the quality of his insurer's services.

[32] The only appropriate remedy in this case is a declaration that the provisions of the municipal by-law the appellant has challenged are invalid. ... However, given the importance of the zoning by-law in municipal land use planning and the risk of creating acquired rights, during a period in which there was a legal vacuum, ... that relief must be tempered by suspending the declaration of invalidity for a period of six months, to give the municipality an opportunity to revise its by-law.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Should a municipality be able to regulate billboards for aesthetic reasons? Can it regulate the size of signs, or can it go further and simply ban all signs? See, for example, Vann Niagara Ltd v Oakville (Town), 2003 SCC 65; Vancouver (City) v Jaminer, 2001 BCCA 240; Ontario (Minister of Transportation) v Miracle, 249 DLR (4th) 680, [2005] OJ No 299 (QL) (CA).

2. In May 2019, the Ontario legislature enacted the Federal Carbon Tax Transparency Act, 2019, SO 2019, c 7. The law required gas stations in Ontario to affix stickers to gas pumps notifying consumers that the federal carbon pricing scheme "cost[s] the consumer an additional 4.4 cents per litre of gasoline, which will escalate gradually to a high of 11.1 cents per litre in three years' time." Retailers failing to do so would engender substantial, daily fines. In CCLA v AG of Ontario, 2020 ONSC 4838, the Ontario Superior Court struck down the relevant provisions as a form of compelled speech inconsistent with the Charter. It noted:

[63] ... [I]n designing the Sticker and making it mandatory the government is trying to accomplish a task that is only coincidentally related to conveying the price of automobile fuel of carbon emissions. That is, the government is not so much explaining a policy, but rather is making a partisan argument. In placing its version of Fuel Charge information on every gas pump in the province, the government is attempting to, in Premier Ford's words, demonstrate to Ontarians how the governing federal Liberals are "gouging them."

[64] In this way, the [provisions] create not so much consumer messages but political missives. ... The message is that the incumbent party in Ontario has better policy ideas than the incumbent party in Ottawa. That is a perfectly acceptable message in a political campaign, but it is not the one that the government has purported to enact.

[65] ... It is essential to the concept of the rule of law that the law does not serve political leaders, but rather political leaders serve the law: Roncarelli v. Duplessis, 1959 CanLII 50 (SCC), [1959] SCR 121, 142. By using the law for partisan ends, the Ontario legislature has enacted a measure that runs counter to, rather than in furtherance of, the purposes underlying freedom of expression.

For discussion of the constitutional battles over the federal carbon pricing scheme, see Chapter 9, Peace, Order, and Good Government.

IV. HATE SPEECH

Hate speech in Canada is currently restricted or regulated by both federal and provincial laws. The Criminal Code of Canada prohibits three types of "hate propaganda." Section 318(1) prohibits the advocacy or promotion of genocide; s 319(1) prohibits the incitement of hatred against an identifiable group, when this incitement is likely to lead to a breach of the peace; and s 319(2) prohibits the wilful promotion of hatred against an identifiable group. As well, s 320 enables a court to order the seizure or erasure of material that the court determines to be "hate propaganda."

The Criminal Code prohibitions were adopted pursuant to recommendations made by the Special Committee on Hate Propaganda in Canada, otherwise known as the Cohen Committee, whose members included Pierre Elliott Trudeau, Associate Professor of Law at Université de Montréal, and Mark MacGuigan, Associate Professor of Law at the University of Toronto. The committee reported on the state of hate mongering in Canada in 1965 and concluded:

The Committee firmly believes that Canadians who are members of any identifiable group in Canada are entitled to carry on their lives as Canadians without being victimized by the deliberate, vicious promotion of hatred against them. In a democratic society, freedom of speech does not mean the right to villify. ... However small the actors may be in number, the individuals and groups promoting hate in Canada constitute a "clear and present danger" to the functioning of a democratic society. For in times of social stress such "hate" could mushroom into a real and monstrous threat to our way of life.

See Report of the Special Committee on Hate Propaganda in Canada (Ottawa: Queen's Printer, 1966) at 24.

Building on the Criminal Code provisions, the Customs Tariff, SC 1997, c 36 prohibits the importation of materials that constitute hate propaganda. Human rights codes also regulate hate speech. Until its repeal in 2013 (c 37, s 2), s 13 of the Canadian Human Rights Act, SC 1976-77, c 33 (CHRA) prohibited telephonic or Internet communication that was likely to expose the members of an identifiable group to hatred or contempt. The human rights codes of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, and the Northwest Territories continue to include provisions similar to s 13 of the CHRA, prohibiting signs, notices, and other representations that are likely to expose the members of an identifiable group to hatred or contempt.

US courts have tended to view laws regulating hate speech as unconstitutional content-based restrictions of the First Amendment. Hate speech is considered to fall within the scope of constitutionally protected expression. For the US Supreme Court, the harm to target audiences caused by most hate speech is not sufficient to justify the restriction of the fundamental right to free speech. However, if hate speech is directed at particular individuals with an intent to threaten or intimidate, such expression will not be protected by the First Amendment: Virginia v Black, 538 US 343, 123 S Ct 1536 (2003).

In Keegstra, which follows, and its companion case, Canada (Human Rights Commission) v Taylor, [1990] 3 SCR 892, 1990 CanLII 26, discussed in the subsequent notes, the Supreme Court of Canada seems to have taken a different approach, one that gives greater weight to equality values. As you read Keegstra, consider the following questions: What is the harm caused by hate speech? Can a hate-speech law be drafted with sufficient precision to catch only harmful speech? Should the promoters of hate be seen as a persecuted minority, or as extreme representatives of the dominant culture? In answering these questions, should we distinguish between different forms of hate speech—for example, between racist threats and insults directed at members of a particular racial or ethnic group and racist claims meant to "persuade" members of the general community about the undesirable characteristics of certain racial or ethnic groups?

R v Keegstra

[Keegstra, a high school teacher, was charged with hate propaganda for a number of comments he made in his classes. He attributed various evil qualities to Jews, including describing them as as "treacherous," "subversive," "sadistic," "money-loving," "power hungry," and "child killers." He taught his classes that Jewish people seek to destroy Christianity, are responsible for wars and revolution, "created the Holocaust to gain sympathy," and are deceptive, secretive, and inherently evil. Mr Keegstra expected his students to reproduce his teachings in class and on exams.

The relevant sections of the Criminal Code read:

319(2) Every one who, by communicating statements, other than in private conversation, wilfully promotes hatred against any identifiable group is guilty of

- (a) an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years; or
(b) an offence punishable on summary conviction.
- (3) No person shall be convicted of an offence under subsection (2)
- (a) if he establishes that the statements communicated were true;
 - (b) if, in good faith, he expressed or attempted to establish by argument an opinion upon a religious subject;
 - (c) if the statements were relevant to any subject of public interest, the discussion of which was for the public benefit, and if on reasonable grounds he believed them to be true; or
 - (d) if, in good faith, he intended to point out, for the purpose of removal, matters producing or tending to produce feelings of hatred towards an identifiable group in Canada.

(6) No proceeding for an offence under subsection (2) shall be instituted without the consent of the Attorney General.

(7) In this section,

"communicating" includes communicating by telephone, broadcasting or other audible or visible means;

"identifiable group" has the same meaning as in section 318;

"public place" includes any place to which the public have access as of right or by invitation, express or implied;

"statements" includes words spoken or written or recorded electronically or electro-magnetically or otherwise, and gestures, signs or other visible representations.

318(4) In this section, "identifiable group" means any section of the public distinguished by colour, race, religion or ethnic origin]

DICKSON CJ (Wilson, L'Heureux-Dubé, and Gonthier JJ concurring):

V. The History of Hate Propaganda Crimes in Canada

• • •

... Following the Second World War and revelation of the Holocaust, in Canada and throughout the world a desire grew to protect human rights, and especially to guard against discrimination. Internationally, this desire led to the landmark Universal Declaration of Human Rights in 1948, and, with reference to hate propaganda, was eventually manifested in two international human rights instruments. In Canada, ... Justice Minister Guy Favreau [appointed] a special committee to study problems associated with the spread of hate propaganda in Canada.

[The composition of the Cohen Committee has been discussed above.]

... [The] Committee ... in 1966 ... released the unanimous Report of the Special Committee on Hate Propaganda in Canada.

The tenor of the Report is reflected in the opening paragraph of its preface, which reads:

This Report is a study in the power of words to maim, and what it is that a civilized society can do about it. Not every abuse of human communication can or should be controlled by law or custom. But every society from time to time draws lines at the point where the intolerable and the impermissible coincide. In a free society such as our own, where the privilege of speech can induce ideas that may change the very order itself, there is bias weighted heavily in favour of the maximum of rhetoric whatever the cost and consequences. But that bias stops this side of injury to the community itself and to individual members or identifiable groups innocently caught in verbal cross-fire that goes beyond legitimate debate.

In keeping with these remarks, the recurrent theme running throughout the Report is the need to prevent the dissemination of hate propaganda without unduly infringing the freedom of expression[.] ...

VI. Section 2(b) of the Charter: Freedom of Expression

Having briefly set out the history of attempts to prohibit hate propaganda, I can now address ... whether the Charter guarantee of freedom of expression is infringed by s. 319(2) of the Criminal Code. ...

... Communications which wilfully promote hatred against an identifiable group without doubt convey a meaning, and are intended to do so by those who make them. ... [I]t must therefore be concluded that the first step of the Irwin Toy test is satisfied.

Moving to the second stage of the s. 2(b) inquiry, one notes that the prohibition in s. 319(2) aims directly at words—in this appeal, Mr. Keegstra's teachings—that have as their content and objective the promotion of racial or religious hatred. ... Section 319(2) therefore overtly seeks to prevent the communication of expression, and hence meets the second requirement of the Irwin Toy test.

... I thus find s. 319(2) to constitute an infringement of the freedom of expression guaranteed by s. 2(b) of the Charter. ...

[Chief Justice Dickson then briefly canvassed and rejected two arguments that hate speech did not fall within the ambit of s 2(b). He concluded, first, that hate speech was not a form of violence that would fall within the Irwin Toy exception. See the earlier notes about the treatment of violence under section 2(b). Second, he considered whether freedom of expression should be defined and limited by reference to other Charter provisions and Canada's international commitments (discussed below). He rejected that idea in favour of defining the freedom broadly and leaving consideration of those other values to the s 1 stage.]

VII. Section 1 Analysis of Section 319(2)

A. General Approach to Section 1

Obviously, ... [the phrase "free and democratic society"] embraces the very values and principles which Canadians have sought to protect and further by entrenching specific rights and freedoms in the Constitution, although the balancing exercise in s. 1 is not restricted to values expressly set out in the Charter[.] ...

... [A] rigid or formalistic approach to the application of s. 1 must be avoided. The ability to use s. 1 as a gauge which is sensitive to the values and circumstances particular to an appeal has been identified as vital in past cases

[Chief Justice Dickson then rejected the applicability of US constitutional doctrine in this area, noting that the Canadian Charter, unlike the US Bill of Rights, contains an express limitation clause. Moreover, he posited that Canada's international law commitments, as well as the Charter's provisions with respect to equality and multiculturalism, suggested different pathways for the development of Canadian constitutional analysis.]

C. Objective of Section 319(2)

(i) Harm Caused by Expression Promoting the Hatred of Identifiable Groups

[The Chief Justice noted the conclusions of the Cohen Committee as well as a 1984 House of Commons Special Committee on Participation of Visible Minorities in Canadian Society.]

... [T]he presence of hate propaganda in Canada is sufficiently substantial to warrant concern. ... Essentially, there are two sorts of injury caused by hate propaganda. First, there is harm done to members of the target group. It is indisputable that the emotional damage caused by words may be of grave psychological and social consequence. ...

... The derision, hostility and abuse encouraged by hate propaganda therefore have a severely negative impact on the individual's sense of self-worth and acceptance. ...

A second harmful effect of hate propaganda ... is its influence upon society at large. ... [It is] not inconceivable that the active dissemination of hate propaganda can attract individuals to its cause, and in the process create serious discord between various cultural groups in society. Moreover, the alteration of views held by the recipients of hate propaganda may occur subtly, and is not always attendant upon conscious acceptance of the communicated ideas. ...

(ii) International Human Rights Instruments

... I would also refer to international human rights principles ... for guidance with respect to assessing the legislative objective. [Here Dickson CJ cited the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, Can. TS 1970, No. 28 (hereinafter CERD) and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 999 UNTS 171 (1966).]

(iii) Other Provisions of the Charter

Significant indicia of the strength of the objective behind s. 319(2) are ... also expressly evident in various provisions of the Charter itself. ... Most importantly ... , ss. 15 and 27 represent a strong commitment to the values of equality and multiculturalism, and hence underline the great importance of Parliament's objective in prohibiting hate propaganda.

(iv) Conclusion Respecting Objective of Section 319(2)

In my opinion, it would be impossible to deny that Parliament's objective in enacting s. 319(2) is of the utmost importance. ...

D. Proportionality

... [T]he interpretation of s. 2(b) under Irwin Toy gives protection to a very wide range of expression. Content is irrelevant to this interpretation, ... [which] often operates to leave unexamined the extent to which the expression at stake in a particular case promotes freedom of expression principles. ... [H]owever, the s. 1 analysis ... cannot ignore the nature of the expressive activity which the state seeks to restrict. While we must guard carefully against judging expression according to its popularity, it is equally destructive of free expression values ... to treat all expression as equally crucial to those principles at the core of s. 2(b).

... [I]n my opinion the expression prohibited by s. 319(2) is not closely linked to the rationale underlying s. 2(b). ...

At the core of freedom of expression lies the need to ensure that truth and the common good are attained, whether in scientific and artistic endeavors or in the process of determining ... political affairs. Since truth and the ideal form of political and social organization can rarely, if at all, be identified with absolute certainty, it is difficult to prohibit expression without impeding the free exchange of potentially valuable information. ... Taken to its extreme, this argument would require us to permit the communication of all expression The problem with this extreme position, however, is that the greater the degree of certainty that a statement is erroneous or mendacious, the less its value in the quest for truth. ... There is very little chance that statements intended to promote hatred against an identifiable group are true, or that their vision of society will lead to a better world. To portray such statements as crucial to truth and the betterment of the political and social milieu is therefore misguided.

Another component central to ... s. 2(b) concerns the vital role of free expression as a means of ... self-fulfillment by developing and articulating thoughts and ideas It is true that s. 319(2) inhibits this process among those individuals whose expression it limits, and hence arguably works against freedom of expression values. On the other hand, such self-autonomy stems in large part from ... [nurturing] an identity derived from membership in a cultural or religious group. The message put forth by individuals who fall within the ambit of s. 319(2) represents a most extreme opposition to [this] idea The extent to which the unhindered promotion of this message furthers free expression values must therefore be tempered insofar as it advocates ... an intolerance and prejudice which views as execrable the process of individual self-development and human flourishing among all members of society.

Moving on to a third strain of thought[,] ... [t]he connection between freedom of expression and the political process is perhaps the linchpin of the s. 2(b) guarantee, and ... is largely derived from the Canadian commitment to democracy. ...

The suppression of hate propaganda undeniably muzzles the participation of a few individuals in the democratic process, and hence detracts somewhat from free expression values, but the degree of this limitation is not substantial. I am aware that the use of strong[, even hateful] language in political and social debate ... is an unavoidable part of the democratic process. Moreover, I recognize that hate propaganda is expression of a type which would generally be categorized as "political," thus putatively placing it at the very heart of ... the democratic process. Nonetheless, expression can work to undermine our commitment to democracy where employed to propagate ideas anathemic [sic] to democratic values. Hate propaganda ... [argues] for a society in which the democratic process is subverted and individuals are denied respect and dignity simply because of racial or religious characteristics. This brand of expressive activity is thus wholly inimical to the democratic aspirations of the free expression guarantee.

Indeed, one may ... contend that it is through rejecting hate propaganda that the state can best encourage the protection of values central to freedom of expression, while simultaneously demonstrating dislike for the vision forwarded by hate-mongers. ...

(ii) Rational Connection

... [I]t would be difficult to deny that the suppression of hate propaganda reduces the harm such expression does to individuals who belong to identifiable groups and to relations between various cultural and religious groups in Canadian society.

Doubts have been raised, however, as to whether the actual effect of s. 319(2) is to undermine any rational connection between it and Parliament's objective. As stated in the reasons of McLachlin J., there are three primary ways in which ... the impugned legislation might be seen as an irrational means of carrying out the Parliamentary purpose. First, ... the provision may actually promote the cause of hate-mongers[.] ... [P]ersons accused of intentionally promoting hatred often see themselves as martyrs, and may actually generate sympathy ... in the role of under-dogs engaged in battle against the immense powers of the state. Second, the public may view the suppression of expression by the government with suspicion, [possibly perceiving it as] containing an element of truth. Finally, it is often noted ... that Germany of the 1920s and 1930s possessed and used hate propaganda laws similar to those existing in Canada, and yet these laws did nothing to stop the triumph of a racist philosophy under the Nazis.

... I recognize that the effect of s. 319(2) is impossible to define with exact precision—the same can be said for many laws, criminal or otherwise. In my view, however, the position that there is no strong and evident connection between the criminalization of hate propaganda and its suppression is unconvincing. ...

It is undeniable that media attention has been extensive ... Yet from my perspective, s. 319(2) serves to illustrate to the public the severe reprobation ... [for] messages of hate directed towards racial and religious groups. ... [Criminal law and processes are themselves] a form of expression, and the message sent out is that hate propaganda is harmful to target group members and threatening to a harmonious society[.] ...

In this context, it can also be said that government suppression of hate propaganda will not make the expression attractive and hence increase acceptance of its content. Similarly, it is very doubtful that Canadians will have sympathy for either propagators of hatred or their ideas. Governmental disapproval of hate propaganda does not invariably result in dignifying the suppressed ideology. Pornography is not dignified by its suppression, nor are defamatory statements against individuals seen as meritorious because the common law lends its support to their prohibition. Again, I stress my belief that hate propaganda legislation and trials are a means by which the values beneficial to a free and democratic society can be publicized. ...

As for ... pre-World War Two Germany ... [N]o one is contending that hate propaganda laws can in themselves prevent the tragedy of a Holocaust; conditions particular to Germany made the rise of Nazi ideology possible despite the existence and use of these laws ... Rather, hate propaganda laws are one part of a free and democratic society's bid to prevent the spread of racism, and their rational connection to this objective must be seen in such a context. ... Indeed, this Court's attention has been drawn to the fact that a great many countries possess legislation similar to that found in Canada[.] ...

... [I] therefore conclude that the first branch of the proportionality test has been met. ...

(iii) Minimal Impairment of the Section 2(b) Freedom

... [It is argued that the law] creates a real possibility of punishing expression that is not hate propaganda. It is thus submitted that the legislation is overbroad, ... and also unduly vague In either instance, it is said that the effect of s. 319(2) is to limit the expression of merely unpopular or unconventional communications. Such communications may present no risk of causing the harm which Parliament seeks to prevent, and will perhaps be closely associated with the core values of s. 2(b). This overbreadth and vagueness could consequently allow the state to ... infringe excessively the freedom of expression or, what is more likely, could have a chilling effect whereby persons potentially within s. 319(2) would exercise self-censorship. Accordingly, those attacking the validity of s. 319(2) contend that vigorous debate on important political and social issues, so highly valued in a society that prizes a diversity of ideas, is unacceptably suppressed by the provision. ...

... In order to ... determine whether s. 319(2) minimally impairs the freedom of expression, the nature and impact of specific features of the provision must be examined in some detail. ...

[Chief Justice Dickson first noted that statements made in private conversation were excluded from s 319(2), even if such statements were made in a public forum, indicating Parliament's concern not to intrude on the privacy of the individual. He then noted the demanding mens rea element entailed by the requirement that the promotion of hatred be "wilful," which had been interpreted as requiring that the accused have subjectively desired the promotion of hatred or have foreseen such a consequence as certain to result from the communication.]

It has been argued, however, that even a demanding mens rea component fails to give s. 319(2) a constitutionally acceptable breadth. The problem is said to lie in the failure of the offence to require proof of actual hatred resulting from a communication, the assumption being that only such proof can demonstrate a harm serious enough to justify limiting ... freedom of expression[.] ...

While mindful of the dangers ... , I do not find them sufficiently grave to compel striking down s. 319(2). First, to predicate the limitation of free expression upon proof of actual hatred gives insufficient attention to the severe psychological trauma suffered by members of those identifiable groups targeted by hate propaganda. Second, it is clearly difficult to prove a causative link between a specific statement and hatred of an identifiable group. In fact, to require direct proof of hatred in listeners would severely debilitate the effectiveness of s. 319(2) in achieving Parliament's aim. It is well-accepted that Parliament can use the criminal law to prevent the risk of serious harms[,] ... and in view of the grievous harm to be avoided ... , I conclude that proof of actual hatred is not required in order to justify a limit under s. 1.

The meaning of "hatred" remains to be elucidated. ... [T]he word "hatred" [must] be defined according to the context in which it is found. A dictionary definition may be of limited aid to such an exercise, for by its nature a dictionary seeks to offer a panoply of possible usages, rather than the correct meaning of a word as contemplated by Parliament. Noting the purpose of s. 319(2), in my opinion the term "hatred" connotes emotion of an intense and extreme nature that is clearly associated with vilification and detestation. ... Hatred is predicated on destruction, and hatred against identifiable groups therefore thrives on insensitivity, bigotry and destruction of both the target group and of the values of our society. Hatred in this sense is a most extreme emotion that belies reason; an emotion that, if exercised against members of an identifiable group, implies that those individuals are to be despised, scorned, denied respect and made subject to ill-treatment on the basis of group affiliation.

The factors mentioned above suggest that s. 319(2) does not unduly restrict the s. 2(b) guarantee. The terms of the offence, as I have defined them, rather indicate that s. 319(2) possesses definitional limits which act as safeguards to ensure that it will capture only expressive activity which is openly hostile to Parliament's objective, and will thus attack only the harm at which the prohibition is targeted. ...

[Chief Justice Dickson then reviewed the defences found in s 319(3) as further evidence of the narrow scope of s 319(2). With respect to the defence of truth found in s 319(3)(a), he expressed doubt as to whether even truthful statements communicated with an intention to promote hatred would be required to be free from criminal condemnation.]

... I should comment on a final argument marshalled in support of striking down s. 319(2) because of overbreadth or vagueness. It is said that the presence of the legislation has led authorities to interfere with a diverse range of political, educational and artistic expression, demonstrating only too well the way in which overbreadth and vagueness can result in undue intrusion and the threat of persecution. In this regard, a number of incidents are cited where authorities appear to have been overzealous in their interpretation of the law, including the arrest of individuals distributing pamphlets admonishing Americans to leave the country and the temporary holdup at the border of a film entitled Nelson Mandela and Salman Rushdie's novel Satanic Verses ... note that the latter two examples involve not s. 319(2), but similar wording found in the Customs Tariff, S.C. 1987, c. 49, s. 114, and Schedule VII, Code 9956(b)).

That s. 319(2) may in the past have led authorities to restrict [valuable] expression ... is surely worrying. I hope, however, that my comments as to the scope of the provision make it obvious that only the most intentionally extreme forms of expression will find a place within s. 319(2). In this light, one can safely say that the incidents mentioned above illustrate not over-expansive breadth and vagueness in the law, but rather actions by the state which cannot be lawfully taken pursuant to s. 319(2). The possibility of illegal police harassment clearly has minimal bearing on the proportionality of hate propaganda legislation to legitimate Parliamentary objectives, and hence the argument based on such harassment can be rejected.

C. Alternative Modes of Furthering Parliament's Objective

One of the strongest arguments [against] s. 319(2) ... [is] that non-criminal responses can more effectively combat the harm caused by hate propaganda. Most generally, it is said that discriminatory ideas can best be met with information and education programmes extolling the merits of tolerance and cooperation between racial and religious groups. As for the prohibition of hate propaganda, human rights statutes are pointed to as being a less severe and more effective response than the criminal law. ... This conciliatory tack is said to be preferable to penal sanction because an incentive is offered the disseminator to cooperate with human rights tribunals and thus to amend his or her conduct.

Given the stigma and punishment associated with a criminal conviction and the presence of other modes of government response in the fight against intolerance, it is proper to ask whether s. 319(2) can be said to impair minimally the freedom of expression. With respect to the efficacy of criminal legislation in advancing the goals of equality and multicultural tolerance in Canada, I agree that the role of s. 319(2) will be limited. It is important, in my opinion, not to hold any illusions about the ability of this one provision to rid our society of hate propaganda and its associated harms. Indeed, to become overly complacent, forgetting that there are a great many ways in which to address the problem of racial and religious intolerance, could be dangerous. Obviously, a variety of measures need be employed in the quest to achieve such lofty and important goals.

In assessing the proportionality of a legislative enactment to a valid governmental objective, however, s. 1 should not ... in every instance ... force the government to rely upon only the mode of intervention least intrusive of a Charter right or freedom. It may be that a number of courses of action are available in the furtherance of a pressing and substantial objective, each imposing a varying degree of restriction upon a right or freedom. In such circumstances, the government may legitimately employ a more restrictive measure, either alone or as part of a larger programme of action, if that measure is not redundant, furthering the objective in ways that alternative responses could not, and is in all other respects proportionate to a valid s. 1 aim.

I thus conclude that s. 319(2) of the Criminal Code does not unduly impair the freedom of expression. ...

[With respect to the third branch of the proportionality test, Dickson CJ emphasized the enormous importance of the objective of s 319(2): "Few concerns can be as central to the concept of a free and democratic society as the dissipation of racism, and the especially strong value which Canadian society attaches to this goal must never be forgotten in assessing the effects of an impugned legislative measure." He then concluded that, in light of that objective, the effects of s 319(2), "involving as they do the restriction of expression largely removed from the heart of free expression values, are not of such a deleterious nature as to outweigh any advantage gleaned from the limitation of s 2(b)." The infringement of freedom of expression was therefore upheld as a reasonable limit under s 1. Chief Justice Dickson's discussion of s 319(3)(a) and the presumption of innocence guaranteed under s 11(d) of the Charter have been omitted. He concluded that the presumption of innocence was infringed, but that the limitation of the right could be upheld under s 1.]

McLACHLIN J (Sopinka J concurring; La Forest J concurring in part) (dissenting):

Hate literature presents a great challenge to our conceptions about the value of free expression. Its offensive content often constitutes a direct attack on many of the other principles which are cherished by our society. Tolerance, the dignity and equality of all individuals; these and other values are all adversely affected by the propagation of hateful sentiment. The problem is not peculiarly Canadian; it is universal. Wherever racially or culturally distinct groups of people live together, one finds people, usually a small minority of the population, who take it upon themselves to denigrate members of a group other than theirs. ...

The evil of hate propaganda is beyond doubt. It inflicts pain and indignity upon individuals who are members of the group in question. Insofar as it may persuade others to the same point of view, it may threaten social stability. And it is intrinsically offensive to people—the majority in most democratic countries—who believe in the equality of all people regardless of race or creed.

[Justice McLachlin reviewed the treatment of hate propaganda under the US First Amendment and then went on to discuss the approach adopted under international instruments.]

Both the American and international approach recognize that freedom of expression is not absolute, and must yield in some circumstances to other values. The divergence lies in the way the limits are determined. On the international approach, the objective of suppressing hatred appears to be sufficient to override freedom of expression. In the United States, it is necessary to go much further and show clear and present danger before free speech can be overridden.

The Charter follows the American approach in method, affirming freedom of expression as a broadly-defined and fundamental right, and contemplating balancing the values protected by and inherent in freedom of expression against the benefit conferred by the legislation limiting that freedom under s. 1 of the Charter. This is in keeping with the strong liberal tradition favouring free speech in this country—a tradition which had led to conferring quasi-constitutional status on free expression in this country prior to any bill of rights or Charter. At the same time, the tests are not necessarily the same as in the United States.

[After finding that s 319(2) infringed freedom of expression, McLachlin J proceeded to the s 1 analysis. She easily concluded that the legislative goals of protecting social harmony and individual dignity were of a substantial nature. She then moved to the proportionality analysis.]

(b) Rational Connection

... [I]t is clear that the legislation does, at least at one level, further Parliament's objectives. Prosecutions of individuals for offensive material directed at a particular group may bolster its members' beliefs that they are valued and respected Such a use of the criminal law may well affirm certain values and priorities which are of a pressing and substantial nature.

It is necessary, however, to go further, and consider ... whether, given the actual effect of the legislation, a rational connection exists between it and its objectives. Legislation designed to promote an objective may in fact impede that objective.

... Section 319(2) may well have a chilling effect on defensible expression by law-abiding citizens. At the same time, it is far from clear that it provides an effective way of curbing hatemongers. Indeed, many have suggested it may promote their cause. Prosecutions under the Criminal Code for racist expression have attracted extensive media coverage. Zundel, prosecuted not under s. 319(2) but for the crime of spreading false news (s. 181), claimed that his court battle had given him "a million dollars worth of publicity": Globe and Mail, March 1, 1985, p. P1.

Not only does the criminal process confer on the accused publicity for his dubious causes—it may even bring him sympathy.

The argument that [hate speech] prosecutions ... will reduce racism and foster multiculturalism depends on the assumption that some listeners are gullible enough to believe the expression if exposed to it. But if this assumption is valid, these listeners might be just as likely to believe that there must be some truth in the racist expression because the government is trying to suppress it. Theories of a grand conspiracy ... can become all too appealing if government dignifies them by completely suppressing their utterance.

Historical evidence also gives reason to be suspicious of the claim that hate propaganda laws contribute to the cause of multiculturalism and equality. ...

[Justice McLachlin referred to evidence about the ineffectiveness of anti-hate laws in pre-Hitler Germany and the use of criminal prosecutions by the Nazis as platforms to propagate their message.]

Viewed from the point of view of actual effect, the rational connection ... may be argued to be tenuous. Certainly it cannot be said that there is a strong and evident connection between the criminalization of hate propaganda and its suppression.

(c) Minimum Impairment

... Despite the limitations found in s. 319(2), a strong case can be made that it is overbroad

The first difficulty lies in the different interpretations which may be placed on the word "hatred." ...

It is argued that the requirement of "wilful promotion" eliminates from the ambit of s. 319(2) statements which are made for honest purposes such as telling a perceived truth or contributing to a political or social debate. The difficulty with this argument is that those purposes are compatible with the intention ... of promoting hatred. A belief that what one says about a group is true and important to political and social debate is quite compatible with and indeed may inspire an intention to promote active dislike of that group. Such a belief is equally compatible with foreseeing that promotion of such dislike may stem from one's statements. The result is that people who make statements primarily for non-nefarious reasons may be convicted of wilfully promoting hatred.

[Justice McLachlin refused to place much weight on the absence of any requirement that actual harm or incitement to hatred be shown, recognizing the difficulty of assessing with any precision the effects that expression of a particular message will have on those who are ultimately exposed to it. She also acknowledged that the breadth of s 319(2) was narrowed somewhat by the defences.]

The real answer to the debate about [overbreadth] is provided by the section's track record. Although the section is of relatively recent origin, it has provoked many questionable actions on the part of the authorities. There have been no reported convictions, other than the instant appeals. But the record amply demonstrates that intemperate statements about identifiable groups, particularly if they represent an unpopular viewpoint, may attract state involvement or calls for police action. [McLachlin noted calls for banning Leon Uris's pro-Zionist novel The Haj (1984); barriers to importing Salman Rushdie's Satanic Verses (1988) and a film about Nelson Mandela ordered as an educational tool by a post-secondary institution; and arrests for distributing pamphlets containing the words "Yankee Go Home." Even if "many cases are winnowed out" by prosecutors, it showed that "initially quite a lot of speech is caught by s. 319(2)."]

Even [absent specific criminal proceedings], ... the chilling effect of the law may be substantial. The more vague the language of the prohibition, the greater the danger that right-minded citizens may curtail ... their expression [so as not to] run afoul of the law. The danger here is not so much that the legislation will deter those bent on promoting hatred The danger is rather that the legislation may have a chilling effect on legitimate activities important to our society . . . Given the vagueness of the prohibition of expression in s. 319(2), one may ask how speakers are to know when their speech may be seen as encroaching on the forbidden area. The reaction is predictable. The combination of overbreadth and criminalization may well lead people desirous of avoiding even the slightest brush with the criminal law to protect themselves in the best way they can—by confining their expression to non-controversial matters. Novelists may steer clear of controversial characterizations of ethnic characteristics, such as Shakespeare's portrayal of Shylock in The Merchant of Venice. Scientists may well think twice before researching and publishing results of research suggesting difference between ethnic or racial groups. Given the serious consequences of criminal prosecution, it is not entirely speculative to suppose that even political debate on crucial issues such as immigration, educational language rights, foreign ownership and trade may be tempered. These matters go to the heart of the traditional justifications for protecting freedom of expression.

... [The] second aspect of minimum impairment [is that] ... the very fact of criminalization [may] represent an excessive response to the problem of hate propagation. ... Given the stigma that attaches and the freedom which is at stake, the contest between the individual and the state ... must be regarded as difficult and harrowing in the extreme. ... The additional sanction of the criminal law may pose little deterrent to a convinced hate-monger who may welcome the publicity it brings; it may, however, deter the ordinary individual.

Moreover, it is arguable whether criminalization of expression calculated to promote racial hatred is necessary. Other remedies are perhaps more appropriate and more effective. Discrimination on grounds of race and religion is worthy of suppression. Human rights legislation, focusing on reparation rather than punishment, has had considerable success in discouraging such conduct. ...

Finally, it can be argued that greater precision is required in the criminal law than, for example, in human rights legislation because of the different character of the two types of proceedings. ...

(d) Importance of the Right Versus Benefit Conferred

... Viewed from the perspective of our society as a whole, the infringement of the guarantee of freedom of expression before this Court is a serious one. Section 319(2) ... strikes directly at [expressive] content and at the viewpoints of individuals. It strikes, moreover, at viewpoints in widely diverse domains, whether artistic, social or political. It is capable of catching ... works of art and the intemperate statement made in the heat of social controversy. While few may actually be prosecuted ... , many fall within the shadow of its broad prohibition. These dangers are exacerbated by the fact that s. 319(2) applies to all public expression. ...

The consequences of the infringement of freedom of speech imposed by s. 319(2) of the Criminal Code considered from the viewpoint of the individual caught within its net are equally serious. [Here McLachlin J cited the possible penalties, the difficulty of determining hateful speech in advance, and associated fears of speakers who are not hate-mongers.] ...

I turn then to the other side of the scale . . . As indicated earlier, ... the objectives ... are of a most worthy nature. Unfortunately, the claims of gains to be achieved ... are tenuous. It is far from clear that the legislation does not promote the cause of hate-mongering extremists and hinder the possibility of voluntary amendment of conduct more than it discourages the spread of hate propaganda. ...

In my opinion, the result is clear. Any questionable benefit of the legislation is outweighed by the significant infringement on the constitutional guarantee of free expression effected by s. 319(2) of the Criminal Code. ...

[Justice McLachlin concluded that the limit on expression effected by s 319(2) could not be justified under s 1. On the presumption of innocence issue, she found that s 319(3) of the Criminal Code infringed the presumption of innocence and could not be upheld under s 1. Justice La Forest agreed with McLachlin J on the freedom of expression issue but found it unnecessary to deal with the issue respecting the right to be presumed innocent.] [Emphasis in original.]

Appeal allowed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The definition of "identifiable group" in s 318(4) of the Criminal Code now reads:

318(4) In this section, identifiable group means any section of the public distinguished by colour, race, religion, national or ethnic origin, age, sex, sexual orientation, or mental or physical disability.

2. The "chilling effect" discussed in Keegstra is a term drawn from US First Amendment jurisprudence: see New York Times v Sullivan, 376 US 254, 84 S Ct 710 (1964). The concern is that a broad and imprecisely worded restriction will deter or "chill" expression—that speakers will prefer to steer clear of the prohibited zone rather than risk running afoul of the law.

The disagreement between Dickson CJ and McLachlin J turns, in part, on their willingness to accept the argument from chilling effect. Do you think that hate-speech regulation has a chilling effect? Can the problem be avoided by better drafting—by defining the prohibited activity more precisely?

Note that in Hill v Church of Scientology of Toronto, [1995] 2 SCR 1130, 1995 CanLII 59 [Hill], the Court appeared to give little weight to the argument that the common law of defamation, combined with high damage awards, chills criticism of public officials. The Court may now be more open to this argument in light of their subsequent decision in Grant v Torstar Corp, 2009 SCC 61. Both Hill and Grant are discussed in more detail in Section VIII, "Defamation."

3. Many of the concerns expressed by McLachlin J resurfaced in her decision for a majority of the Court in R v Zundel, [1992] 2 SCR 731, 1992 CanLII 75. Ernst Zundel was one of the world's most prolific Holocaust deniers, operating out of a boarded-up house in downtown Toronto. A private citizen swore an information before a Justice of the Peace alleging that Zundel wilfully published news that he knew was false and likely to cause injury or mischief to a public interest, contrary to s 181 of the Criminal Code.

In Zundel, the Supreme Court of Canada unanimously agreed that the deliberate publication of statements that the speaker knows to be false is a protected form of expression under s 2(b). The Court referred to the difficulty of determining whether the statements were in fact false and the dangers of excluding statements from constitutional protection that had even a marginal relation to the values protected by freedom of expression. However, the Court split 4–3 over whether s 181, the false news provision, was a justified and reasonable limit on freedom of expression.

Justice McLachlin held for the majority that the false news provision, an old and obscure provision of the Code, had not been enacted for a purpose that was important enough to limit a Charter right or freedom. She stressed that other countries did not have similar laws and that, at best, the law was originally enacted "to protect the mighty and the powerful from discord or slander." Even assuming that the law was intended to promote racial and social tolerance, McLachlin J concluded that it was disproportionate and overbroad for that purpose. She warned that it "makes possible conviction for virtually any statement which does not accord with currently accepted 'truths,' and lends force to the argument that the section could be used (or abused) in a circular fashion essentially to permit the prosecution of unpopular ideas."

The minority stressed, as did the majority in Keegstra, the importance of prohibiting speech that ran counter to the constitutional values of equality and multiculturalism, the tenuous connection between hate speech and the purposes of freedom of expression, and the procedural safeguards provided by a criminal prosecution.

NOTE: CANADA (HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSION) V TAYLOR

Canada (Human Rights Commission) v Taylor was decided at the same time as Keegstra. At issue was the constitutionality of s 13 of the Canadian Human Rights Act, SC 1976-77, c 33, which, as it then read, provided that it was a discriminatory practice for a person to use the telephone to repeatedly communicate messages "likely to expose a person or persons to hatred or contempt by reason of the fact that that person or those persons are identifiable on the basis of a prohibited ground of discrimination." (Section 13 was subsequently amended to extend to Internet communication.) Taylor and the Western Guard Party instituted a telephone message service with pre-recorded messages on the theme of the Jewish conspiracy to control Canadian society. After several successful complaints against him, Taylor challenged s 13(1) under s 2(b) of the Charter (which had since come into force).

Chief Justice Dickson, writing for the majority, held that s 13 of the Canadian Human Rights Act breached s 2(b) of the Charter, but was a "reasonable" and "demonstrably justified" limit under s 1. In defining the scope of s 13, and more particularly the terms "hatred" and "contempt," the Chief Justice focused on "unusually strong and deep-felt emotions of detestation, calumny and vilification" was not "particularly expansive." He noted, however, that "the nature of human rights legislation militates against an unduly narrow reading of s 13(1)" and indicated that he had no "wish to transgress the well-established principle that the rights enumerated in such a code should be given their full recognition and effect through a fair, large and liberal interpretation." Even though "the section may impose a slightly broader limit upon freedom of expression than does s. 319(2) [the hate-promotion provision] of the Criminal Code ... the conciliatory bent of a human rights statute renders such a limit more acceptable than would be the case with a criminal provision." In his view, as long as the Human Rights Tribunal continues to be well aware of the purpose of s. 13(1) and pays heed to the ardent and extreme nature of the feeling described in the phrase "hatred or contempt," there is little danger that subjective opinion as to offensiveness will supplant the proper meaning of the section.

In her dissenting judgment in Taylor, McLachlin J argued that the "absence of any requirement of intent or foreseeability of the actual promotion of hatred or contempt," while "consistent with the remedial ... focus of human rights legislation," broadened the scope of the section so that it included communication that ought not to be prohibited. In response, Dickson CJ observed that in contrast to criminal law, the purpose of human rights legislation is to "compensate and protect" the victim rather than to "stigmatize or punish" the person who has discriminated against them.

NOTES: HUMAN RIGHTS CODES AND FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

1. In 2001, s 13(1) of the Canadian Human Rights Act was amended to apply to messages communicated over the Internet, significantly expanding the scope of its application. This expansion raised questions of whether s 13(1) was restricting freedom of expression in ways that were no longer constitutional. The ensuing debate resulted in the repeal of the provision in 2013 (see note 3 below).

2. Section 12 of the Canadian Human Rights Act, another provision dealing with discriminatory speech, states that it is unlawful to display any notice, sign, symbol, emblem, or other representation that indicates discrimination or an intention to discriminate against an identifiable group. All provincial and territorial human rights laws, except for those in the Yukon Territory, include a provision similar to s 12. When this provision was first enacted in Ontario, its purpose was to prohibit signs in store windows that indicated that members of certain racial or ethnic groups would not be served. However, in some jurisdictions, the discriminatory sign provision has been interpreted broadly so that it extends to discriminatory speech that appears on signs and, in some provinces, that occurs in publications.

3. Human rights code regulation of hate speech has become the subject of public debate over the past few years. A controversy arose from complaints made to the Canadian Human Rights Commission and the BC Human Rights Tribunal against Maclean's magazine for its publication of an article by Mark Steyn, "The Future Belongs to Islam," Maclean's (20 October 2006). Steyn argued (among other things) that Muslims would come to dominate Europe through immigration and higher birth rates and that their goal is to make European countries into Muslim states that enforce sharia law. He also argued that Muslims are generally supportive of violence to achieve this end. Both complaints were dismissed. Another well-publicized Canadian case involved a complaint made to the Alberta Human Rights Commission against Ezra Levant and the Western Standard magazine following the publication of the "Danish cartoons." The complaint was dismissed by the commission.

A report written by Richard Moon, "Report to the Canadian Human Rights Commission Concerning Section 13 of the Canadian Human Rights Act and the Regulation of Hate Speech on the Internet" (Canadian Human Rights Commission, October 2008), recommended the repeal of s 13, which occurred in 2013 (c 37, s 2). Professor Moon wrote (at 1-2):

The use of censorship by the government should be confined to a narrow category of extreme expression—that which threatens, advocates or justifies violence against the members of an identifiable group, even if the violence that is supported or threatened is not imminent. ... Less extreme forms of discriminatory expression, although harmful, cannot simply be censored out of public discourse. Any attempt to [do so] would require extraordinary intervention by the state and would dramatically compromise the public commitment to freedom of expression. Because these less extreme forms of discriminatory expression are so commonplace, it is impossible to establish clear and effective rules for their identification and exclusion. But because they are so pervasive, it is also vital that they be addressed or confronted. We must develop ways other than censorship to respond to [this sort of] expression

This understanding of the purpose of hate speech law, as the protection of the members of identifiable groups from the risk of violence generated by hate speech, is narrower than the more familiar justification which emphasizes the protection of the individual's dignity and his/her right to equal respect within the community. It may, however, offer a better account of the actual practice of hate speech law in Canada, which focuses on the most extreme and hateful instances of expression. ... However, [it] does not fit easily or simply into a human rights law that takes an expansive view of discrimination, emphasizes the effect of the action on the victim rather than the intention or misconduct of the actor and employs a process that is designed to engage the parties and facilitate a non-adjudicative resolution of the "dispute" between them. [He concluded that hate speech should continue to be prohibited under the Criminal Code.]

The hate-speech provisions of the Saskatchewan Human Rights Code, SS 1979, c S-24.1 were challenged, and upheld, in Saskatchewan (Human Rights Commission) v Whatcott, 2013 SCC 11, excerpted below. As you will see, the Supreme Court of Canada acknowledged, but dismissed, concerns that the definition of "hatred" in the Code was unduly subjective and overbroad.

4. Human rights codes prohibit racial and other forms of discrimination in the provision of employment, accommodation, and other services available to the public. This prohibition has been interpreted as covering acts that create a "negative environment" that adversely affects a person's ability to access and enjoy a particular service. Thus, expression that contributes to the creation of such an environment may be found to constitute a discriminatory practice. An obvious example of expression that contributes to a negative environment is racial name-calling and verbal abuse directed at an individual in their workplace.

The issue of expression creating a negative environment was dealt with by the Supreme Court of Canada in Ross v New Brunswick School District No 15, [\[1996\] 1 SCR 825, 1996 CanLII 237](#). The case involved a schoolteacher (Ross) whose expression of anti-Semitic views outside the classroom (in published writings and public appearances) was found by a human rights tribunal to have created a poisoned environment within the classroom. The tribunal found that the school board, in allowing Ross to continue to teach, was guilty of discrimination under the provincial human rights code. In reaching this conclusion, the human rights tribunal relied on evidence of discriminatory conduct engaged in by some students. Although there was no evidence that anti-Jewish statements by students in the school were directly influenced by Ross's teachings, the tribunal concluded that it was reasonable to anticipate such an influence given the high degree of publicity surrounding Ross's publications. The tribunal ordered the school board to remove Ross from the classroom and to make efforts to find him a non-teaching position. Ross was also permanently prohibited from publishing or distributing anti-Semitic writings as a condition of retaining employment with the school board. Ross appealed, arguing that the orders violated his freedom of expression under the Charter.

The Supreme Court of Canada upheld the order removing Ross from the classroom as a reasonable limit on freedom of expression. In doing so La Forest J, writing for the Court, stressed the importance of the educational context (at 873-74):

There can be no doubt that the attempt to foster equality, respect and tolerance in the Canadian educational system is a laudable goal. But the additional driving factor in this case is the nature of the educational services in question: we are dealing here with the education of young children. ... Young children are especially vulnerable to the messages conveyed by their teachers. They are less likely to make an intellectual distinction between comments a teacher makes in the school and those the teacher makes outside the school. They are, therefore, more likely to feel threatened and isolated by a teacher who makes comments that denigrate personal characteristics of a group to which they belong. Furthermore, they are unlikely to distinguish between falsehoods and truth and more likely to accept derogatory views espoused by a teacher. The importance of ensuring an equal and discrimination free educational environment, and the perception of fairness and tolerance in the classroom, are paramount in the education of young children. This helps foster self-respect and acceptance by others.

The Court did not, however, uphold the permanent speech ban as a reasonable limit under s 1. In the Court's view, once Ross was no longer in a teaching position, there was no reason to think that his writings would continue to produce a poisoned atmosphere in the classroom: see also the Court of Appeal's decision in Kempling v College of Teachers (British Columbia), 2005

BCCA 327, upholding the one-month suspension of a teacher for anti-homosexual statements published in a newspaper and dismissing Charter challenges based on ss 2(a) and 2(b).

Saskatchewan (Human Rights Commission) v Whatcott

2013 SCC 11

[This case concerned a challenge to a prohibition on hateful publications in the Saskatchewan Human Rights Code. Although the decision was similar to the Court's reasons in Canada (Human Rights Commission) v Taylor, the relevant provision in the Saskatchewan Code, s 14(1), was broader than s 13(1) of the Canadian Human Rights Code, providing:

- 14(1) No person shall publish or display, or cause or permit to be published or displayed, on any lands or premises or in a newspaper, through a television or radio broadcasting station or any other broadcasting device, or in any printed matter or publication or by means of any other medium that the person owns, controls, distributes or sells, any representation, including any notice, sign, symbol, emblem, article, statement or other representation:
 - (a) tending or likely to tend to deprive, abridge or otherwise restrict the enjoyment by any person or class of persons, on the basis of a prohibited ground, of any right to which that person or class of persons is entitled under law; or
 - (b) that exposes or tends to expose to hatred, ridicules, belittles or otherwise affronts the dignity of any person or class of persons on the basis of a prohibited ground.
- (2) Nothing in subsection (1) restricts the right to freedom of expression under the law upon any subject.

"Prohibited ground" as defined in the Act includes "sexual orientation."]

ROTHSTEIN J (McLachlin CJ and LeBel, Fish, Abella, and Cromwell JJ concurring):

[Whatcott was the subject of complaints relating to four flyers he distributed on behalf of the Christian Truth Activists. The flyers, which were placed in household mailboxes, contained many offensive statements, many offensive statements linking homosexuality to pedophilia and HIV/AIDS. Also included were references to biblical texts. Four individuals alleged that the material promoted hatred against individuals because of their sexual orientation, thereby violating s 14 of the Code.

The Human Rights Tribunal found that Mr Whatcott's flyers promoted hatred against individuals because of their sexual orientation and so violated the Code. It concluded that the prohibition was a reasonable restriction on Whatcott's freedom of expression and religion. Whatcott was barred from distributing the flyers or similar material and was ordered to pay compensation to each of the complainants.

Before beginning a constitutional analysis of the Code, Rothstein J addressed the definition of hatred from Taylor and the criticisms of it as being either unduly subjective or overbroad. Taylor had defined hatred as involving "unusually strong and deep-felt emotions of detestation, calumny and vilification." Justice Rothstein felt it appropriate to tweak the Taylor definition of hatred by excluding "calumny"—that is, speech amounting to false misrepresentations. Detestation and vilification were thus the harmful effects that the Code sought to eliminate and "only extreme and egregious examples of delegitimizing expression" (at para 46) would be considered hate speech. This definition of hatred, he declared, "excludes merely offensive or hurtful expression" (at para 46). "The question courts must ask," wrote Rothstein J, "is whether a reasonable person, aware of the context and circumstances surrounding the expression, would view it as exposing the protected group to hatred" (at para 56).

Justice Rothstein noted that in the years following Taylor, there had been considerable human rights and academic commentary about what constitutes hatred, and that concerns had been voiced about the subjective and overbroad nature of the term. He concluded, however, that it was possible to identify the "hallmarks" of hatred:

[44] ... Hate speech often vilifies the targeted group by blaming its members for the current problems in society, alleging that they are a "powerful menace" ... ; that they are carrying out secret conspiracies to gain global control ... ; or plotting to destroy western civilization Hate speech also further delegitimizes the targeted group by suggesting its members are illegal or unlawful, such as by labelling them "liars, cheats, criminals and thugs" ... , a "parasitic race" or "pure evil"

[45] Exposure to hatred can also result from expression that equates the targeted group with groups traditionally reviled in society, such as child abusers, pedophiles ... , or "deviant criminals who prey on children" One of the most extreme forms of vilification is to dehumanize a protected group by describing its members as animals or as subhuman. References to a group as "horrible creatures who ought not to be allowed to live"; "incognizant primates," "genetically inferior" and "lesser beasts"; or "sub-human filth" are examples of dehumanizing expression that calls into question whether group members qualify as human beings.

Having thus interpreted the Code provision, the Court moved on to determine its constitutionality. The standard of review for issues of constitutionality was held to be that of correctness.

The Human Rights Commission conceded that Whatcott's freedom of expression was infringed, and so the Court turned to s 1, finding the legislative objective pressing and substantial. But the Court found that the words "ridicules, belittles or otherwise affronts the dignity of" in s 14(1)(b) were not "rationally connected to reducing systemic discrimination against vulnerable groups" (at para 99). The expression captured by those words was found not to rise to the level of "ardent and extreme feelings" (at para 89) essential to the constitutionality of the limitation on expression in Taylor, so the Court ordered those words struck out. The following passages address the minimal impairment branch of the s 1 analysis and Whatcott's s 2(a) argument.]

[111] In my view, once the additional words are severed from s. 14(1)(b), the remaining prohibition is not overbroad. A limitation predicated on expression which exposes groups to hatred tries to distinguish between healthy and heated debate on controversial topics of political and social reform, and impassioned rhetoric which seeks to incite hatred as a means to effect reform. The boundary will not capture all harmful expression, but it is intended to capture expression which, by inspiring hatred, has the potential to cause the type of harm that the legislation is trying to prevent. In that way, the limitation is not overbroad, but rather tailored to impair freedom of expression as little as possible.

2. Nature of the Expression

[112] Violent expression and expression that threatens violence does not fall within the protected sphere of s. 2(b) of the Charter: R. v. Khawaja, 2012 SCC 69, [2012] 3 S.C.R. 555, at para. 70. However, apart from that, not all expression will be treated equally in determining an appropriate balancing of competing values under a s. 1 analysis. That is because different types of expression will be relatively closer to or further from the core values behind the freedom, depending on the nature of the expression. This will, in turn, affect its value relative to other Charter rights, the exercise or protection of which may infringe freedom of expression.

[114] Hate speech is at some distance from the spirit of s. 2(b) because it does little to promote, and can in fact impede, the values underlying freedom of expression. As noted by Dickson C.J. in Keegstra, expression can be used to the detriment of the search for truth (p. 763). As earlier discussed, hate speech can also distort or limit the robust and free exchange of ideas by its tendency to silence the voice of its target group. It can achieve the self-fulfillment of the publisher, but often at the expense of that of the victim. These are important considerations in balancing hate speech with competing Charter rights and in assessing the constitutionality of the prohibition in s. 14(1)(b) of the Code.

[120] In my view, s. 14 of the Code provides an appropriate means by which to protect almost the entirety of political discourse as a vital part of freedom of expression. It extricates only an extreme and marginal type of expression which contributes little to the values underlying freedom of expression and whose restriction is therefore easier to justify ... [citations omitted]. This suggests that, at least in this respect, the provision is not overbroad in its application.

C. Section 2(a) of the Charter

[152] I now turn to a consideration of whether s. 14(1)(b) infringes the Charter guarantee of freedom of conscience and religion under s. 2(a). Mr. Whatcott argues that, to the extent that s. 14(1)(b) of the Code precludes criticism of same-sex conduct or activity, it infringes freedom of religion under s. 2(a). He submits that sexual conduct has long been a topic of religious discussion and debate, and that "[o]bjectection to same-sex sexual activity is common among religious people. They object because they believe this conduct is harmful; and many religious people also believe that they are obligated to do good and warn others of the danger": R.F., at para. 78. Mr. Whatcott contends that s. 2(a) protects his right to proclaim this aspect of his religion.

[156] It was not in dispute that Mr. Whatcott sincerely believes that his religion requires him to proselytize homosexuals. To this end, he appears to employ expression of an extreme and graphic nature to make his point more compelling. To the extent that his choice of expression is caught by the hatred definition in s. 14(1)(b), the prohibition will substantially interfere with Mr. Whatcott's ability to disseminate his belief by display or publication of those representations. Section 14(1)(b) of the Code infringes freedom of conscience and religion as guaranteed under s. 2(a) of the Charter.

[Turning again to s 1, Rothstein J repeated the exercise of excising the words "ridicules, belittles or otherwise affronts the dignity of" from the Code (at para 164) and found the remainder of the provision to be a justifiable limit on freedom of religion.

Having determined the constitutionality of s 14 of the Code, the Court then turned to the issue of whether the flyers contravened the Code. On this issue, the standard of review regarding the tribunal's decision was found to be one of reasonableness (at para 168)].

[174] I agree that the words and phrases in a publication cannot properly be assessed out of context. The expression must be considered as a whole, to determine the overall impact or effect of the publication. However, it is also legitimate to proceed with a closer scrutiny of those parts of the expression which draw nearer to the purview of s. 14(1)(b) of the Code. In most cases, the overall context of the expression will affect the presentation, tone, or meaning of particular phrases or excerpts. However, a dissertation on public policy issues will not necessarily cleanse passages within a publication that would otherwise contravene a hate speech prohibition [citations omitted].

[175] In my view, it was not unreasonable for the Tribunal in this case to isolate the phrases it considered to be in issue. If, despite the context of the entire publication, even one phrase or sentence is found to bring the publication, as a whole, in contravention of the Code, this precludes publication of the flyer in its current form.

[177] Genuine comments on sexual activity are not likely to fall into the purview of a prohibition against hate. If Mr. Whatcott's message was that those who engage in sexual practices not leading to procreation should not be hired as teachers or that such practices should not be discussed as part of the school curriculum, his expression would not implicate an identifiable group. If, however, he chooses to direct his expression at sexual behaviour by those of a certain sexual orientation, his expression must be assessed against the hatred definition in the same manner as if his expression was targeted at those of a certain race or religion.

[Turning to the content of the flyers, Rothstein J found that some of them combined many of the "hallmarks" of hatred: "The message which a reasonable person would take from the flyers is that homosexuals, by virtue of their sexual orientation, are inferior, untrustworthy and seek to proselytize and convert our children" (para 188).]

[190] Whether or not Mr. Whatcott intended his expression to incite hatred against homosexuals, in my view it was reasonable for the Tribunal to hold that, by equating homosexuals with carriers of disease, sex addicts, pedophiles and predators who would proselytize vulnerable children and cause their premature death, Flyers D and E would objectively be seen as exposing homosexuals to detestation and vilification.

[194] However, in my view, the Tribunal's decision with respect to Flyers F and G was unreasonable. ...

[195] Flyers F and G are identical, and are comprised mainly of a reprint of a page of the classified advertisements from a publication called Perceptions. Printed by hand in bold print at the top of the page are the words "Saskatchewan's largest gay magazine allows ads for men seeking boys." Although there were conflicting views expressed on whether the references in the ads in question to "any age"; "boys/men"; or "[y]our age ... is not so relevant" were in fact a reference to men seeking children (as Mr. Whatcott meant to imply by his additional biblical reference), the true purpose and meaning of the personal ads are, for our purposes, irrelevant. Mr. Whatcott also added the handwritten words: "If you cause one of these little ones to stumble it would be better that a millstone was tied around your neck and you were cast into the sea' Jesus Christ" and "[t]he ads with men advertising as bottoms are men who want to get sodomized. This shouldn't be legal in Saskatchewan!"

[196] In my view, it cannot reasonably be found that Flyers F and G contain expression that a reasonable person, aware of the relevant context and circumstances, would find as exposing or likely to expose persons of same-sex orientation to detestation and vilification. Reproduction of the ads themselves, and the statement as to how the ads could be interpreted as "men seeking boys," do not manifest hatred. The implication that the ads reveal men seeking under-aged males, while offensive, is presented as Mr. Whatcott's interpretation of what the ads mean. He insinuates that this is a means by which pedophiles can advertise for victims, but the expression falls short of expressing detestation or vilification in a manner that delegitimizes homosexuals. The expression, while offensive, does not demonstrate the hatred required by the prohibition.

[197] With respect to the purported excerpt from the Bible, I would agree with the comments of Richards J.A., at para. 78 of [Owens v Human Rights Commission (Sask), 2002 SKQB 506, rev'd 2006 SKCA 41] that it is apparent that a human rights tribunal or court should exercise care in dealing with arguments to the effect that foundational religious writings violate the Code. While the courts cannot be drawn into the business of attempting to authoritatively interpret sacred texts such as the Bible, those texts will typically have characteristics which cannot be ignored if they are to be properly assessed in relation to s. 14(1)(b) of the Code.

[198] Richards J.A. found that objective observers would interpret excerpts of the Bible with an awareness that it contains more than one sort of message, some of which involve themes of love, tolerance and forgiveness. He also found that the meaning and relevance of the specific Bible passages cited in that case could be assessed in a variety of ways by different people.

[199] In my view, these comments apply with equal force to the biblical passage paraphrased in Flyers F and G that "[i]f you cause one of these little ones to stumble it would be better that a millstone was tied around your neck and you were cast into the sea." Whether or not Mr. Whatcott meant this as a reference that homosexuals who seduced young boys should be killed, the biblical reference can also be interpreted as suggesting that anyone who harms Christians should be executed. The biblical passage, in and of itself, cannot be taken as inspiring detestation and vilification of homosexuals. While use of the Bible as a credible authority for a hateful proposition has been considered a hallmark of hatred, it would only be unusual circumstances and context that could transform a simple reading or publication of a religion's holy text into what could objectively be viewed as hate speech.

[202] Having found the Tribunal's decisions with respect to Flyers F and G unreasonable, I would uphold the Court of Appeal's conclusion that those two flyers do not contravene s. 14(1)(b) of the Code.

[The tribunal's compensation awards as regards the flyers D and E were reinstated.]

V. REGULATION OF SEXUALLY EXPLICIT EXPRESSION

The following discussion draws from Pornography and Prostitution in Canada: Report of the Special Committee on Pornography and Prostitution, vol 1 (Ottawa: Minister of Supply and Services Canada, 1985) at 111-12.

The first general statutory prohibition of obscenity was s 179 of the original Criminal Code enacted in 1892, which made it an indictable offence to knowingly and without lawful excuse publicly sell obscene material or expose obscene material for public sale or to public view. It did not define the term "obscene." In applying the section, the courts adopted the so-called Hicklin test devised by Cockburn CJ in 1868 in R v Hicklin (1868), LR 3 QB 360. That test asked:

Whether the tendency of the matter charged as obscenity is used to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to immoral influences, and into whose hands the publication of this sort may fall.

The Hicklin test was stringently criticized. The phrase "a tendency to deprave and corrupt" was viewed as unclear and subjective; the requirement to look at the tendency of material to corrupt the most vulnerable individuals unjustifiably impinged on the materials available to others; the test gave no importance to the creator's purpose or to literary, artistic, or scientific value; and material could be found obscene on the basis of isolated passages rather than a consideration of the work as a whole.

Only in 1959 was the Criminal Code amended to provide a definition of the word "obscene." That section (now s 163) provides:

- 163(1) Everyone commits an offence who
- (a) makes, prints, publishes, distributes, circulates, or has in his possession for the purpose of publication, distribution or circulation any obscene written matter, picture, model, phonograph record or other thing whatever; or
 - (b) makes, prints, publishes, distributes, sells or has in his possession for the purpose of publication, distribution or circulation a crime comic.
- (2) Every one commits an offence who knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse,
- (a) sells, exposes to public view or has in his possession for such a purpose any obscene written matter, picture, model, phonograph record or other thing whatever;
 - (b) publicly exhibits a disgusting object or an indecent show;
 - (c) offers to sell, advertises or publishes an advertisement of, or has for sale or disposal, any means, instructions, medicine, drug or article intended or represented as a method of causing abortion or miscarriage; or
 - (d) advertises or publishes an advertisement of any means, instructions, medicine, drug or article intended or represented as a method for restoring sexual virility or curing venereal diseases or diseases of the generative organs.
- (8) For the purposes of this Act, any publication a dominant characteristic of which is the undue exploitation of sex, or of sex and any one or more of the following subjects, namely, crime, horror, cruelty and violence, shall be deemed to be obscene.

Over time, confusion over the relevance of the Hicklin test was resolved by deciding that the Code provided an exhaustive definition of obscenity. The question of whether a dominant characteristic of a publication was the "undue exploitation of sex" was difficult. The courts settled on a meaning referring to evolving "community standards," moving beyond the offensive or immoral character of such material to the idea that sexually explicit representations sometimes have harmful consequences.

In its 1992 decision in R v Butler, immediately below, the Supreme Court of Canada reinterpreted the Criminal Code obscenity prohibition as a ban on harmful sexual representation and went on to uphold the law as a justified restriction on freedom of expression.

R v Butler

[\[1992\] 1 SCR 452, 1992 CanLII 124](#)

[The accused, Butler, operated a shop that sold and rented what was described as "hard core pornography" in the form of videotapes, magazines, and sexual paraphernalia.]

SOPINKA J (Lamer CJ and La Forest, Cory, McLachlin, Stevenson, and Iacobucci JJ concurring):

... [This] case requires the Court to address one of the most difficult and controversial of contemporary issues, that of determining whether, and to what extent, Parliament may legitimately criminalize obscenity. ...

[Justice Sopinka set out the relevant section of the Criminal Code, s 163 (reproduced above) and then indicated that the appeal would deal only with the constitutional validity of s 163(8), the definition of obscenity.]

4. Analysis

B. Judicial Interpretation of s. 163(8)

In order for the work or material to qualify as "obscene," the exploitation of sex must not only be its dominant characteristic, but such exploitation must be "undue." In determining when the exploitation of sex will be considered "undue," the courts have attempted to formulate workable tests. The most important of these is the "community standard of tolerance" test.

In [Brody, Dansky, Rubin v The Queen, [1962] SCR 681, 1962 CanLII 80], Judson J. accepted the view espoused notably by the Australian and New Zealand courts that obscenity is to be measured against "community standards." He cited the following passage in the judgment of Fullager J. in R v. Close, [1948] V.L.R. 445, at p. 465:

There does exist in any community at all times—however the standard may vary from time to time—a general instinctive sense of what is decent and what is indecent, of what is clean and what is dirty, and when the distinction has to be drawn, I do not know that today there is any better tribunal than a jury to draw it. ... What is obscene is something which offends against those standards.

The community standards test has been the subject of extensive judicial analysis. ... Our Court was called upon to elaborate the community standards test in Towne Cinema Theatres Ltd. v. The Queen, ... [1985] 1 S.C.R. 494. Dickson C.J. reviewed the case law and found (at pp.508–9):

The cases all emphasize that it is a standard of tolerance, not taste, that is relevant. What matters is not what Canadians think is right for themselves to see. What matters is what Canadians would not abide other Canadians seeing because it would be beyond the contemporary Canadian standard of tolerance to allow them to see it. ... [Emphasis in original.]

There has been a growing recognition in recent cases that material which may be said to exploit sex in a "degrading or dehumanizing" manner will necessarily fail the community standards test. ...

Among other things, degrading or dehumanizing materials place women (and sometimes men) in positions of subordination, servile submission or humiliation. They run against the principles of equality and dignity of all human beings. In the appreciation of whether material is degrading or dehumanizing, the appearance of consent is not necessarily determinative. Consent cannot save materials that otherwise contain degrading or dehumanizing scenes. Sometimes the very appearance of consent makes the depicted acts even more degrading or dehumanizing.

This type of material would, apparently, fail the community standards test not because it offends against morals but because it is perceived by public opinion to be harmful to society, particularly to women. While the accuracy of this perception is not susceptible of exact proof, there is a substantial body of opinion that holds that the portrayal of persons being subjected to degrading or dehumanizing sexual treatment results in harm, particularly to women and therefore to society as a whole. . . .

... [T]he artistic defence is the last step in the analysis of whether the exploitation of sex is undue. Even material which by itself offends community standards will not be considered "undue," if it is required for the serious treatment of a theme. . . .

Accordingly, the "internal necessities" test, or what has been referred to as the "artistic defence," has been interpreted to assess whether the exploitation of sex has a justifiable role in advancing the plot or the theme, and in considering the work as a whole, does not merely represent "dirt for dirt's sake" but has a legitimate role when measured by the internal necessities of the work itself.

This review of jurisprudence shows that it fails to specify the relationship of the tests one to another. Failure to do so with respect to the community standards test and the degrading or dehumanizing test, for example, raises a serious question as to the basis on which the community acts in determining whether the impugned material will be tolerated. With both these tests being applied to the same material and apparently independently, we do not know whether the community found the material to be intolerable because it was degrading or dehumanizing, because it offended against morals or on some other basis. In some circumstances a finding that the material is tolerable can be over-ruled by the conclusion by the court that it causes harm and is therefore undue. Moreover, is the internal necessities test dominant so that it will redeem material that would otherwise be undue or is it just one factor? Is this test applied by the community or is it determined by the court without regard for the community? This hiatus in the jurisprudence has left the legislation open to attack on the ground of vagueness and uncertainty. That attack is made in this case. This lacuna in the interpretation of the legislation must, if possible, be filled before subjecting the legislation to Charter scrutiny. . . .

Pornography can be usefully divided into three categories: (1) explicit sex with violence, (2) explicit sex without violence but which subjects people to treatment that is degrading or dehumanizing, and (3) explicit sex without violence that is neither degrading nor dehumanizing. Violence in this context includes both actual physical violence and threats of physical violence. Relating these three categories to the terms of s. 163(8) of the Code, the first, explicit sex coupled with violence, is expressly mentioned. Sex coupled with crime, horror or cruelty will sometimes involve violence. Cruelty, for instance, will usually do so. But, even in the absence of violence, sex coupled with crime, horror or cruelty may fall within the second category. As for category (3), subject to the exception referred to below, it is not covered.

The courts must determine as best they can what the community would tolerate others being exposed to on the basis of the degree of harm that may flow from such exposure. Harm in this context means that it predisposes persons to act in an anti-social manner as, for example, the physical or mental mistreatment of women by men, or, what is perhaps debatable, the reverse. Anti-social conduct for this purpose is conduct which society formally recognizes as incompatible with its proper functioning. The stronger the inference of a risk of harm the lesser the likelihood of tolerance. The inference may be drawn from the material itself or from the material and other evidence. Similarly, evidence as to the community standards is desirable but not essential.

In making this determination with respect to the three categories of pornography referred to above, the portrayal of sex coupled with violence will almost always constitute the undue exploitation of sex. Explicit sex which is degrading or dehumanizing may be undue if the risk of harm is substantial. Finally, explicit sex that is not violent and neither degrading nor dehumanizing is generally tolerated in our society and will not qualify as the undue exploitation of sex unless it employs children in its production.

... How does the "internal necessities" test fit into this scheme? The need to apply this test only arises if a work contains sexually explicit material that by itself would constitute the undue exploitation of sex. The portrayal of sex must then be viewed in context to determine whether that is the dominant theme of the work as a whole. Put another way, is undue exploitation of sex the main object of the work or is this portrayal of sex essential to a wider artistic, literary, or other similar purpose? Since the threshold determination must be made on the basis of community standards, that is, whether the sexually explicit aspect is undue, its impact when considered in context must be determined on the same basis. The court must determine whether the sexually explicit material when viewed in the context of the whole work would be tolerated by the community as a whole. Artistic expression rests at the heart of freedom of expression values and any doubt in this regard must be resolved in favour of freedom of expression.

C. Does s. 163 Violate s. 2(b) of the Charter?

The majority of the Court of Appeal in this case allowed the appeal of the Crown on the ground that s. 163 does not violate freedom of expression as guaranteed under s. 2(b) of the Charter. ...

In my view, the majority of the Manitoba Court of Appeal erred Huband J.A. misinterpreted the distinction between purely physical activity and activity having expressive content. The subject matter of the materials in this case is clearly "physical," but this does not mean that the materials do not convey or attempt to convey meaning such that they are without expressive content. ...

• • •

In light of our recent decision in R v. Keegstra, ... [1990] 3 S.C.R. 697, the respondent, and most of the parties intervening in support of the respondent, do not take issue with the proposition that s. 163 of the Criminal Code violates s. 2(b) of the Charter. ...

• • •

D. Is s. 163 Justified Under s. 1 of the Charter?

(a) Is s. 163 a Limit Prescribed by Law?

The appellant argues that the provision is so vague that it is impossible to apply it. Vagueness must be considered in relation to two issues in this appeal: (1) is the law so vague that it does not qualify as "a limit prescribed by law"; and (2) is it so imprecise that it is not a reasonable limit. Dealing with (1), the test is ... does the law provide "an intelligible standard according to which the judiciary must do its work" (Irwin Toy ... at p. 983; adopted in Osborne v. Canada (Treasury Board), [[1991] 2 SCR 69, 1991 CanLII 60], at p. 96).

In assessing whether s. 163(8) prescribes an intelligible standard, consideration must be given to the manner in which the provision has been judicially interpreted. ...

Standards which escape precise technical definition, such as "undue," are an inevitable part of the law. The Criminal Code contains other such standards. ... It is within the role of the judiciary to attempt to interpret these terms. If such interpretation yields an intelligible standard, the threshold test for the application of s. 1 is met. In my opinion, the interpretation of s. 163(8) in prior judgments which I have reviewed, as supplemented by these reasons, provides an intelligible standard.

(b) Objective

The respondent argues that there are several pressing and substantial objectives which justify overriding the freedom to distribute obscene materials. Essentially, these objectives are the avoidance of harm resulting from antisocial attitudinal changes that exposure to obscene material causes and the public interest in maintaining a "decent society." On the other hand, the appellant argues that the objective of s. 163 is to have the state act as "moral custodian" in sexual matters and to impose subjective standards of morality.

... The Hicklin philosophy posits that explicit sexual depictions, particularly outside the sanctioned contexts of marriage and procreation, threatened the morals or the fabric of society In this sense, its dominant, if not exclusive, purpose was to advance a particular conception of morality. ...

... [T]his particular objective is no longer defensible in view of the Charter. To impose a certain standard of public and sexual morality, solely because it reflects the conventions of a given community, is inimical to the exercise and enjoyment of individual freedoms, which form the basis of our social contract. ... The prevention of "dirt for dirt's sake" is not a legitimate objective which would justify the violation of one of the most fundamental freedoms enshrined in the Charter.

On the other hand, I cannot agree with the suggestion of the appellant that Parliament does not have the right to legislate on the basis of some fundamental conception of morality for the purposes of safeguarding the values which are integral to a free and democratic society. ...

... [M]uch of the criminal law is based on moral conceptions of right and wrong and the mere fact that a law is grounded in morality does not automatically render it illegitimate. In this regard, criminalizing the proliferation of materials which undermine another basic Charter right may indeed be a legitimate objective.

In my view, however, the overriding objective of s. 163 is not moral disapprobation but the avoidance of harm to society. ...

The harm was described in the following way in the Report on Pornography by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs (MacGuigan Report) (1978) at p. 18:4:

The clear and unquestionable danger of this type of material is that it reinforces some unhealthy tendencies in Canadian society. The effect of this type of material is to reinforce male-female stereotypes to the detriment of both sexes. It attempts to make degradation, humiliation, victimization, and violence in human relationships appear normal and acceptable. A society which holds that egalitarianism, non-violence, consensualism, and mutuality are basic to any human interaction, whether sexual or other, is clearly justified in controlling and prohibiting any medium of depiction, description or advocacy which violates these principles.

The appellant argues that to accept the objective of the provision as being related to the harm associated with obscenity would be to adopt the "shifting purpose" doctrine explicitly rejected in R v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., ... [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295. ...

I do not agree that to identify the objective of the impugned legislation as the prevention of harm to society, one must resort to the "shifting purpose" doctrine. First, the notions of moral corruption and harm to society are not distinct, as the appellant suggests, but are inextricably linked. It is moral corruption of a certain kind which leads to the detrimental effect on society. Second, and more importantly, I am of the view that with the enactment of s. 163, Parliament explicitly sought to address the harms which are linked to certain types of obscene materials. The prohibition of such materials was based on a belief that they had a detrimental impact on individuals exposed to them and consequently on society as a whole. Our understanding of the harms caused by these materials has developed considerably since that time; however this does not detract from the fact that the purpose of this legislation remains, as it was in 1959, the protection of society from harms caused by the exposure to obscene materials. ...

A permissible shift in emphasis was built into the legislation when, as interpreted by the courts, it adopted the community standards test. Community standards as to what is harmful have changed since 1959.

This being the objective, is it pressing and substantial? ... In this regard, it should be recalled that in Keegstra ... this Court unanimously accepted that the prevention of the influence of hate propaganda on society at large was a legitimate objective. ...

This Court has thus recognized that the harm caused by the proliferation of materials which seriously offend the values fundamental to our society is a substantial concern which justifies restricting the otherwise full exercise of the freedom of expression. In my view, the harm sought to be avoided in the case of the dissemination of obscene materials is similar. ... [I]f true equality between male and female persons is to be achieved, we cannot ignore the threat to equality resulting from exposure to audiences of certain types of violent and degrading material. Materials portraying women as a class as objects for sexual exploitation and abuse have a negative impact on "the individual's sense of self-worth and acceptance."

In reaching the conclusion that legislation proscribing obscenity is a valid objective which justifies some encroachment of the right to freedom of expression, I am persuaded in part that such legislation may be found in most free and democratic societies. ...

Finally, it should be noted that the burgeoning pornography industry renders the concern even more pressing and substantial than when the impugned provisions were first enacted. ... The analysis of whether the measure is proportional to the objective must, in my view, be undertaken in light of the conclusion that the objective of the impugned section is valid only insofar as it relates to the harm to society associated with obscene materials. ... The objective of maintaining conventional standards of propriety, independently of any harm to society, is no longer justified in light of the values of individual liberty which underlie the Charter. ...

(c) Proportionality

(i) General

In assessing whether the proportionality test is met, it is important to keep in mind the nature of expression which has been infringed. ...

The values which underlie the protection of freedom of expression relate to the search for truth, participation in the political process, and individual self-fulfillment. The Attorney General for Ontario argues that ... only "individual self-fulfillment," and only in its most base aspect, that of physical arousal, is engaged by pornography. On the other hand, the civil liberties groups argue that pornography forces us to question conventional notions of sexuality and thereby launches us into an inherently political discourse. [Here Sopinka J cited the work of American legal scholar Robin West that "[g]ood pornography ... validates a range of female sexuality that is wider and truer than that legitimated by the non-pornographic culture."]

A proper application of the test should not suppress what West refers to as "good pornography." The objective of the impugned provision is not to inhibit the celebration of human sexuality. However, it cannot be ignored that the realities of the pornography industry are far from the picture which the BC Civil Liberties Association would have us paint. ... In my view, the kind of expression which is sought to be advanced does not stand on equal footing with other kinds of expression which directly engage the "core" of the freedom of expression values.

This conclusion is further buttressed by the fact that the targeted material is expression which is motivated, in the overwhelming majority of cases, by economic profit. This Court held in Rocket v. Royal College of Dental Surgeons of Ontario, ... [1990] 2 S.C.R. 232, at p. 247, that an economic motive for expression means that restrictions on the expression might "be easier to justify than other infringements."

I will now turn to an examination of the three basic aspects of the proportionality test.

(ii) Rational Connection

The message of obscenity which degrades and dehumanizes is analogous to that of hate propaganda. As the Attorney General of Ontario has argued in its factum, obscenity wields the power to wreak social damage in that a significant portion of the population is humiliated by its gross misrepresentations.

Accordingly, the rational link between s. 163 and the objective of Parliament relates to the actual causal relationship between obscenity and the risk of harm to society at large. On this point, it is clear that the literature of the social sciences remains subject to controversy. ...

While a direct link between obscenity and harm to society may be difficult, if not impossible, to establish, it is reasonable to presume that exposure to images bears a causal relationship to changes in attitudes and beliefs. [Here Sopinka J cited The Meese Commission Report, (US, 1986) which concluded that "the available evidence strongly supports the hypothesis that substantial exposure to sexually violent materials as described here bears a causal relationship to antisocial acts of sexual violence and, for some subgroups, possibly to unlawful acts of sexual violence." The Report stated that "it would be strange indeed if graphic representations of a form of behavior, especially in a form that almost exclusively portrays such behavior as desirable, did not have at least some effect on patterns of behavior."]

In the face of inconclusive social science evidence, the approach adopted by our Court in Irwin Toy is instructive. In that case, the basis for the legislation was that television advertising directed at young children is per se manipulative. The Court made it clear that in choosing its mode of intervention, it is sufficient that Parliament had a reasonable basis[.] ...

Similarly, in Keegstra ... the absence of proof of a causative link between hate propaganda and hatred of an identifiable group was discounted as a determinative factor in assessing the constitutionality of the hate literature provisions of the Criminal Code. ...

... I [find] that Parliament was entitled to have a "reasoned apprehension of harm" resulting from the desensitization of individuals exposed to materials which depict violence, cruelty, and dehumanization in sexual relations.

Accordingly, I am of the view that there is a sufficiently rational link between the criminal sanction ... and the objective.

(iii) Minimal Impairment

In determining whether less intrusive legislation may be imagined, this Court [has] stressed ... that it is not necessary that the legislative scheme be the "perfect" scheme, but that it be appropriately tailored in the context of the infringed right[.] ... There are several factors which contribute to the finding that the provision minimally impairs the freedom which is infringed.

First, the impugned provision does not proscribe sexually explicit erotica without violence that is not degrading or dehumanizing. It is designed to catch material that creates a risk of harm to society. It might be suggested that proof of actual harm should be required. It is apparent from what I have said above that it is sufficient in this regard for Parliament to have a reasonable basis for concluding that harm will result and this requirement does not demand actual proof of harm.

Second, materials which have scientific, artistic or literary merit are not captured by the provision. As discussed above, the court must be generous in its application of the "artistic defence." ...

Third, ... it is legitimate for the court to take into account Parliament's past abortive attempts to replace the definition with one that is more explicit. ... The attempt to provide exhaustive instances of obscenity has been shown to be destined to fail (Bill C-54, 2nd Sess., 33rd Parl.). It seems that the only practicable alternative is to strive towards a more abstract definition of obscenity which is contextually sensitive and responsive to progress in the knowledge and understanding of the phenomenon to which the legislation is directed. In my view, the standard of "undue exploitation" is therefore appropriate. The intractable nature of the problem and the impossibility of precisely defining a notion which is inherently elusive makes the possibility of a more explicit provision remote. ...

Fourth, ... it is only the public distribution and exhibition of obscene materials which is in issue here.

It is ... submitted [by the intervenors] that there are more effective techniques to promote the objectives of Parliament. For example, if pornography is seen as encouraging violence against women, there are certain activities which discourage it—counselling rape victims to charge their assailants, provision of shelter and assistance for battered women, campaigns for laws against discrimination on the grounds of sex, education to increase the sensitivity of law enforcement agencies and other governmental authorities. In addition, it is submitted that education is an under-used response.

It is noteworthy that many of the above suggested alternatives are in the form of responses to the harm engendered by negative attitudes against women. ... However, given the gravity of the harm, and the threat to the values at stake, I do not believe that the measure chosen by Parliament is equalled by the alternatives which have been suggested. ... Serious social problems such as violence against women require multi-pronged approaches by government. Education and legislation are not alternatives but complements in addressing such problems. There is nothing in the Charter which requires Parliament to choose between such complementary measures.

(iv) Balance Between Effects of Limiting Measures and Legislative Objective

... The infringement on freedom of expression is confined to a measure designed to prohibit the distribution of sexually explicit materials accompanied by violence, and those without violence that are degrading or dehumanizing. As I have already concluded, this kind of expression lies far from the core of the guarantee of freedom of expression. It appeals only to the most base aspect of individual fulfillment, and it is primarily economically motivated.

The objective of the legislation, on the other hand, is of fundamental importance in a free and democratic society. It is aimed at avoiding harm, which Parliament has reasonably concluded will be caused directly or indirectly, to individuals, groups such as women and children, and consequently to society as a whole, by the distribution of these materials. It thus seeks to enhance respect for all members of society, and non-violence and equality in their relations with each other.

I therefore conclude that the restriction on freedom of expression does not outweigh the importance of the legislative objective.

I conclude that while s. 163(8) infringes s. 2(b) of the Charter, freedom of expression, it constitutes a reasonable limit and is saved by virtue of the provisions of s. 1. ...

[Justice Gonthier, L'Heureux-Dubé J concurring, wrote a concurring judgment in which he agreed with Sopinka J's disposition of the case, but differed somewhat in his understanding of s 163 and its constitutional validity. He understood obscene materials as harmful because they convey a distorted image of human sexuality, by making public and open elements of human nature which are usually hidden behind a veil of modesty and privacy. ... This distorted image of human sexuality often comprises violence, cruelty, infliction of pain, [and] humiliation, among other elements of pornographic imagery.

This conceptualization of the harm of obscene materials led him to a different conclusion than Sopinka J with respect to the issue of whether s 163 captures the third category of materials—explicit sex that is neither violent, degrading, nor dehumanizing. For Gonthier J, some public representations of explicit sexual activity, such as on a billboard rather than in a film or movie, may, because of the manner of the representation, trigger the application of s 163, because they "contribute to the deformation of sexuality, through the loss of its humanity." [Emphasis in original.]

Appeal allowed; new trial ordered.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Shifting purpose. In R v Big M Drug Mart Ltd, [1985] 1 SCR 295, 1985 CanLII 69, it was held that the government, when seeking to justify a restriction under s 1, could not put forward a "pressing and substantial" purpose different from that which originally animated the legislation. In Butler, does Sopinka J's reinterpretation of the objective of the obscenity provisions of the Criminal Code as the prevention of harm to women and children amount to an impermissible shift in purpose? Or does Butler simply involve a permissible shift in emphasis built into the wording of the legislation, as Sopinka J argued? Brenda Cossman has argued that the "Butler decision and its discourse of harm against women is really just sexual morality in drag." She writes:

First, Sopinka J. tells us that the law is not about morality, but about harm (morality is bad, and distinct from harm). But then he tells us that harm is not actually distinct from morality, so there is no shifting purpose (morality is OK, and related to harm). And, finally, he tells us that the harm intended to be addressed is the harm caused by pornography, which used to be immorality but now is harm to women (morality is bad, and distinct from harm). So morality is bad, except when it is related to harm, in which case it is no longer morality. The Court's effort to cast the objective of s. 163 as something other than moral approbation is, at best, on rather shaky ground.

See Brenda Cossman, "Feminist Fashion or Morality in Drag? The Sexual Subtext of the Butler Decision" in Brenda Cossman et al, eds, Bad Attitude/s on Trial: Pornography, Feminism, and the Butler Decision (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1997) at 102.

2. Social science evidence and proof of harm. In Butler, Sopinka J referred to the inconclusive social science evidence concerning the link between pornography and acts of sexual violence. Most of the empirical research concerns changes in the attitudes of men toward rape and sexual violence following exposure to violent pornography in a laboratory setting. However, these studies do not show that an individual's attitudes are changed over the long term or that it is more likely that he will act in a violent way after exposure to violent sexual imagery. The shortcomings of the empirical research are discussed in Daniel Linz, Steven D Penrod & Edward Donnerstein, "The Attorney General's Commission on Pornography: The Gaps Between 'Findings' and 'Facts'" (1987) 4 Am Bar Foundation Research J 713. The authors advocate caution in making generalizations about behaviour on the basis of laboratory experiments. They do say, however, that one of the things the studies show is that nudity is not the problem. Any attitudinal changes that may occur are the result of exposure to images of violence against women who may be naked or clothed.

Because the empirical evidence of harm was not clear-cut, Sopinka J found it necessary to rely on common sense—that it was "reasonable to presume that exposure to images bears a causal relationship to changes in attitudes and beliefs"—and to defer to Parliament's reasonable judgment that pornography causes harm to women (even though it is not clear what sort of causal judgment Parliament made when it enacted this provision). When we express ourselves to others, we want to affect their thinking and action. Is the state justified in restricting expression simply because it might persuade others to engage in harmful or wrongful action? Or is there something different about pornography, and the way it affects behaviour, that justifies its restriction?

3. Catherine MacKinnon applauded the Court in Butler for having embraced a feminist understanding of pornography:

The Supreme Court of Canada [upheld] the obscenity provision on sex equality grounds. It said that harm to women—which the Court was careful to make "contextually sensitive" and found could include humiliation, degradation, and subordination—was harm to society as a whole. The evidence on the harm of pornography was sufficient for a law against it.

Although the Canadians consider the U.S. experience on these issues closely in [Keegstra and Butler] the striking absence of a U.S.-style political speech litany suggests that taking equality seriously precludes it, or makes it look like the excuse for enforcing inequality that it has become. The decision did not mention the marketplace of ideas. Maybe in Canada, people talk to each other, rather than buy and sell each other as ideas. ... Fundamentally, the Supreme Court of Canada recognized the reality of inequality in the issues before it: this is not the bad state power jumping on poor powerless individual citizen[s], but a law passed to stand behind a comparatively powerless group in its social fight for equality against socially powerful and exploitative groups. [Emphasis in original.]

See Catherine MacKinnon, Only Words (Cambridge, Mass: Harvard University Press, 1985) at 101-3.

Do you agree that Butler can be read as an equality-promoting decision?

4. Other forms of expression harmful to women. Why do we continue to focus on sexually explicit imagery? Images of women in television advertising, film, and fashion magazines often have the same structure as sexually explicit pornography and contribute to the social picture of women as subordinate. If the impact of representations of sexual violence or degradation does not depend on the nudity of the persons represented, then is there any reason to focus on sexually explicit material? Does the use of sexual explicitness as an essential element in the definition of the category of restricted material suggest that concerns about offence and public morals continue to affect our thinking about obscenity and pornography? Could the state successfully regulate these other forms of sexist expression, given Charter guarantees?

5. Post-Butler application of the harm-based model of obscenity. Does Sopinka J's (re)interpretation of the Criminal Code's obscenity prohibition, as a ban on "harmful" sexual representations, provide a manageable standard for identifying prohibited material? Does the community-standards test help in any way? Do the concepts "degrading" and "dehumanizing" provide sufficient guidance to those administering the law, such as police officers and Customs officials? The Supreme Court of Canada has both affirmed and developed the harm test for obscenity in subsequent decisions, first in Little Sisters Book and Art Emporium v Canada (Minister of Justice), 2000 SCC 69, which dealt with gay and lesbian erotica, and, second, in R v Labaye, 2005 SCC 80, which involved the interpretation of the related concept of indecency. For a critique of Butler and Labaye, see Michael Plaxton, "What Butler Did" (2012) 57 SCLR 317. Little Sisters is discussed in more detail below.

6. Child pornography. Discussing the third category of pornography, explicit sex that is not violent and neither degrading nor dehumanizing, Sopinka J stated that it is "generally tolerated in our society and will not qualify as the undue exploitation of sex unless it employs children in its production." This suggests that a different understanding of harm will be operative in cases involving child pornography. The Supreme Court addressed this issue nine years later in R v Sharpe, 2001 SCC 2, discussed below.

NOTE: LITTLE SISTERS BOOK AND ART EMPORIUM V CANADA (MINISTER OF JUSTICE)

Censorship of both hate speech and obscene materials occurs under the Customs Tariff, SC 1997, c 36 (formerly RSC 1985, c 41 (3rd Supp)), which governs the importation of goods into Canada and dictates those materials that are not to be allowed entry. Section 136 of the Customs Tariff (formerly s 114) prohibits the importation of goods, including goods referred to in Tariff item 9899.00.00 (formerly Code 9956 of Schedule VII of the Act), which reads in part:

Books, printed paper drawings, paintings, prints, photographs, or representations of any kind that:

- (a) are deemed to be obscene under subsection 163(8) of the Criminal Code;
 - (b) constitute hate propaganda within the meaning of s. 320(8) of the Criminal Code;
 - (c) are of a treasonable character within the meaning of section 46 of the Criminal Code;
- or
- (d) are of a seditious character within the meaning of sections 59 and 60 of the Criminal Code.

Alleging that it was the victim of a long-standing Canada Customs practice of targeting shipments destined for gay and lesbian bookstores, Little Sisters bookstore in Vancouver and its owners challenged the provisions of the Customs legislation that prohibited the importation of obscene publications. In Little Sisters Book and Art Emporium v Canada (Minister of Justice), 2000 SCC 69 [Little Sisters No 1], the Supreme Court, in a judgment written by Binnie J (Iacobucci, Arbour, and LeBel JJ dissenting in part), held that these provisions restricted the appellants' freedom of expression, but that this restriction (with the exception of a reverse onus provision, discussed further below) was justified under s 1. However, the Court also found that the manner in which the legislation had been implemented by customs officials violated the bookstore's rights and could not be justified under s 1.

Under the Customs Tariff, Customs officials are empowered to determine whether imported materials are obscene. If material is classified as obscene, the importer may request a redetermination by a specialized Customs unit. A further appeal can be made to the deputy minister or their designate. Once these administrative procedures have been exhausted, the importer can appeal the prohibition to a judge of the superior court in the province where the material was seized, with a further appeal on a question of law to the Federal Court, and a final appeal (with leave) to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Justice Binnie noted that the trial judge had identified high error rates in determinations respecting Little Sisters' imports at all levels of the Customs review procedure and had concluded that "[s]uch high rates of error indicate more than mere differences of opinion and suggest systemic causes" (at para 6). Specifically, the trial judge found (at para 6):

Many publications, particularly books, are ruled obscene without adequate evidence. This highlights perhaps the most serious defect in the present administration of code 9956(a), that is, that classifying officers are neither adequately trained to make decisions on obscenity nor are they routinely provided with the time and the evidence necessary to make such decisions. There is no formal procedure for placing evidence of artistic or literary merit before the classifying officers. Consequently, many publications are prohibited entry into Canada that would likely not be found to be obscene if full evidence were considered by officers properly trained to weigh and evaluate that evidence.

Justice Binnie found that Little Sisters bookstore had been "targeted as importers of obscene materials despite the absence of any evidence to suggest that gay and lesbian erotica is more likely to be obscene than heterosexual erotica, or that the appellants are likely offenders in this regard" and that "[i]n consequence of the targeting, [Little Sisters] have suffered excessive and unnecessary prejudice in terms of delays, cost and other losses in having their goods cleared (if at all) through Canada Customs" (at para 154). He concluded that the Customs authorities had exercised their legislative powers in a way that violated the appellants' s 2(b) rights and could not be justified under s 1. These constitutional violations were traced, in part, to understaffing, inadequate training of Customs officials, the failure to provide proper guides and manuals and develop workable procedures, and the failure to establish internal deadlines.

Little Sisters, however, had sought more than just a declaration of unconstitutional application of the legislation to themselves. They had brought a challenge to the constitutionality of the legislation itself, seeking to have it declared invalid. In this they were largely unsuccessful. Their constitutional challenge to the Customs legislation was based on two grounds. As described by Binnie J, the first argument, or set of arguments, was that the decision in Butler to uphold the Criminal Code prohibition on obscene materials was incorrect and, "in any event, that [the] approach [taken in Butler to determine whether material is obscene] cannot be freely transferred from heterosexual erotica to gay and lesbian erotica" (at para 53). The second argument was that the procedure set out in the Customs legislation was so cumbersome and procedurally defective that it could not be administered in a way that respected the appellant's Charter rights.

Justice Binnie dismissed the first set of arguments concerning Butler and its applicability to gay and lesbian material:

[53] ... [Little Sisters bookstore and its owners] argue that in the context of the Customs legislation a "harm-based" approach which utilizes a single community standard across all regions and groups within society is insufficiently "contextual" or sensitive to specific circumstances to give effect to the equality rights of gays and lesbians. The appellants, supported by the interveners LEAF and EGALE, contend that homosexual erotica plays an important role in providing a positive self-image to gays and lesbians, who may feel isolated and rejected in the heterosexual mainstream. Erotica provides a positive celebration of what it means to be gay or lesbian. As such, it is argued that sexual speech in the context of gay and lesbian culture is a core value and Butler cannot legitimately be applied to locate it at the fringes of s. 2(b) expression. Erotica, they contend, plays a different role in a gay and lesbian community than it does in a heterosexual community, and the Butler approach based, they say, on heterosexual norms, is oblivious to this fact. ...

[55] The appellants contend that importing a majoritarian analysis into the definition of obscenity (e.g. what the broader Canadian community will tolerate) inevitably creates prejudice against non-mainstream, minority representations of sex and sexuality. They argue that the "national" community is by definition majoritarian and is more likely than the homosexual community itself to view gay and lesbian imagery as degrading and dehumanizing. The whole idea of a community standards test, they say, is incompatible with Charter values that were enacted to protect minority rights. ...

[56] This line of criticism underestimates Butler. ... [The community standards] test was adopted to underscore the unacceptability of the trier of fact indulging personal biases A concern for minority expression is one of the principal factors that led to adoption of the national community test in Butler in the first place[.] ...

[57] ... [A] person's constitutionally protected space does not shrink by virtue of his or her geographical location or participation in a certain context or community, or indeed by the taste of a particular judge or jury. ...

[60] The appellants argue that the "degrading or dehumanizing" language in Butler is highly subjective and encouraged Customs, for example, to prohibit depictions of anal intercourse long after the Department of Justice advised Customs to the contrary. This argument seems to ignore that the phrase "degrading or dehumanizing" in Butler is qualified immediately by the words "if the risk of harm is substantial" (emphasis added). This makes it clear that not all sexually explicit erotica depicting adults engaged in conduct which is considered to be degrading or dehumanizing is obscene. The material must also create a substantial risk of harm which exceeds the community's tolerance. The potential of harm and a same-sex depiction are not necessarily mutually exclusive. Portrayal of a dominatrix engaged in the non-violent degradation of an ostensibly willing sex slave is no less dehumanizing if the victim happens to be of the same sex, and no less (and no more) harmful in its reassurance to the viewer that the victim finds such conduct both normal and pleasurable. Parliament's concern was with behavioural changes in the voyeur that are potentially harmful in ways or to an extent that the community is not prepared to tolerate. There is no reason to restrict that concern to the heterosexual community.

[63] The intervener LEAF took the position that sado-masochism performs an emancipatory role in gay and lesbian culture and should therefore be judged by a different standard from that applicable to heterosexual culture. In support of this position LEAF points out that, by definition, gender discrimination is not an issue in "same-sex erotica." On the other hand, the intervener Equality Now took the view that gay and lesbian individuals have as much right as their heterosexual counterparts to be protected from depictions of sex with violence or sexual conduct that is dehumanizing or degrading in a way that can cause harm that exceeds community standards of tolerance.

[64] LEAF's argument seems to presuppose that the Butler test is exclusively gender-based. Violence against women was only one of several concerns, albeit an important one, that led to the formulation of the Butler harm-based test, which itself is gender neutral. While it would be quite open to the appellants to argue that a particular publication does not exceed the general community's tolerance of harm for various reasons, gay and lesbian culture as such does not constitute a general exemption from the Butler test.

[66] ... The trial judge ... relied on the conclusion of Professor Neil M. Malamuth that "homosexual pornography may have harmful effects even if it is distinct in certain ways from heterosexual pornography." Professor Malamuth further observed that:

In recent years, [there] has been increasing scientific research indicating that some of the behaviors that might be related to exposure to some types of pornography are a serious problem within the gay community as well as within the heterosexual one. ... [T]here are studies suggesting that within homosexual interactions the frequency of sexually coercive acts as well as non-sexual aggression between intimates occurs at a frequency quite comparable to heterosexual interactions.

In adopting the Butler test to justify the prohibition on the importation of obscene material under s 1, Binnie J also specifically rejected the appellants' argument that the restriction was too vague to satisfy the "prescribed by law" requirement:

[146] Section 163 having been upheld in Butler, and the Customs Tariff having incorporated s. 163 and the related jurisprudence, it follows that the Customs Tariff prohibition is not void for vagueness or uncertainty, and is therefore validly "prescribed by law." The appellants argued that a legal standard which may be intelligible to a judge in a criminal trial surrounded with all the appropriate procedural protections is not necessarily intelligible to a Customs official left to his or her own devices . . . I do not think "intelligibility" varies with the level of procedural sophistication. The standard set out in s. 163(8) of the Criminal Code either affords a reasonable guide to well-intentioned individuals seeking to keep themselves within the law or it does not. Butler held that it did. The standard is related to the community's tolerance of harm. It is the severity of the potential consequences that requires a judge to preside over a criminal trial, not the intelligibility of the "community tolerance" standard.

Justice Binnie also rejected Little Sisters' second argument that the Customs legislation failed to provide adequate procedural safeguards and was therefore unconstitutional:

[71] The appellants say a regulatory structure that is open to the level of maladministration described in the trial judgment is unconstitutionally underprotective of their constitutional rights and should be struck down in its entirety. In effect they argue that Parliament was required to proceed by way of legislation rather than the creation of a delegated power of regulation in s. 164(1)(j), which authorizes the Governor in Council to "make regulations ... generally, to carry out the purposes and provisions of this Act," or by ministerial directive. My colleague Iacobucci J. accepts the propositions that "[t]his Court's precedents demand sufficient safeguards in the legislative scheme itself to ensure that government action will not infringe constitutional rights" and because "the legislation makes no reasonable effort to ensure that it will be applied constitutionally to expressive materials" Code 9956 should be struck from the Customs Tariff. I do not think there is any constitutional rule that requires

Parliament to deal with Customs' treatment of constitutionally protected expressive material by legislation (as the appellants contend) rather than by way of regulation (as Parliament contemplated in s. 164(1)(j)) or even by ministerial directive or departmental practice. Parliament is entitled to proceed on the basis that its enactments "will be applied constitutionally" by the public service.

[72] ... [T]he appellants' complaint is about what Parliament did not enact rather than what it did enact. The imposition on Parliament of a constitutional obligation to deal itself with Charter-sensitive matters rather than by permitting Parliament the option of enacting a delegated regulation-making power has serious ramifications for the machinery of government. I do not agree that Parliament's options are so limited.

Justice Binnie examined the different procedures contained in the Customs legislation and concluded that, with one exception, they did not infringe any Charter rights. In his view, the problem was in the implementation of the legislated rules and procedures.

The one procedural provision that Binnie J found to be unconstitutional was a reverse onus clause. Section 152(3) of the Customs Tariff, which was applicable to "any proceeding under this Act," directed the decision-maker to assume that Customs officials were right unless and until the importer proved them to be wrong. In the view of Binnie J:

[101] ... [This] provision cannot constitutionally apply to put on the importer the onus of disproving obscenity. Otherwise entry of expressive materials could be denied by reason of the onus even where the standard of obscenity is not met, as for example, where an importer lacks the resources or the stamina to contest an initial determination. An importer has a Charter right to receive expressive material unless the state can justify its denial. It is not open to the state to put the onus on an individual to show why he or she should be allowed to exercise a Charter right. It is for the state to establish that a limitation on the Charter right is justified.

Justice Iacobucci (dissenting in part) would have struck down the restriction on the importation of obscene material, although he would have suspended the declaration of invalidity for an 18-month period. In his opinion:

[166] ... [T]he current procedures by which Customs enforces s. 163(8) at the border are grossly inadequate. With a few minor exceptions, expressive materials are classified when entering Canada in the same manner as mundane commercial goods. The Customs legislation lacks the most basic procedures necessary for a fair and accurate determination of whether something is obscene. Compounding these legislative deficiencies is the fact that Customs officers, while no doubt well-intentioned and conscientious civil servants, lack the training, time or resources to accomplish the task set for them. In my respectful opinion, the Customs legislation makes no meaningful accommodation for the expressive freedoms raised by this appeal. Such a regime cannot be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

[167] The appropriate remedy for this violation of the appellants' constitutional rights is to strike down [the relevant provision of the Customs legislation]. Particularly in a case like the one before us, where there is an extensive record of the improper detention of non-obscene works, the only choice to ensure full protection of the constitutional rights at stake is to invalidate the legislation and invite Parliament to remedy the constitutional infirmities.

The portions of the judgment dealing with the appropriate remedy are excerpted in Chapter 25, Enforcement of Rights. A second case initiated by the bookstore was unsuccessful when it could not obtain an advance costs award as contemplated in British Columbia (Ministers of Forests) v Okanagan Indian Band, 2003 SCC 71. The trial judge granted the advance costs, but his order was ultimately reversed by the Supreme Court of Canada in Little Sisters

Book and Art Emporium v Canada (Commissioner of Customs and Revenue), 2007 SCC 2 [Little Sisters No 2]. Justice Bastarache, for the majority, held that there was no prima facie evidence that Little Sisters continued to be the subject of targeting by Customs officials that could warrant an order of advanced costs: "The fact that Customs continues to detain a number of titles is not, in itself, prima facie evidence of anything" (at para 55).

Justice Binnie (with Fish J), in dissent, saw a pattern of behaviour that warranted the order sought by the bookstore owners and seemed to express some doubt about his decision for the majority in the earlier case:

[114] I differ from my colleagues about what is truly at stake in this appeal and this leads to our disagreement about the appropriate outcome. In my view, the earlier case of Little Sisters Book and Art Emporium v. Canada (Minister of Justice), [2000] 2 S.C.R. 1120, 2000 SCC 69 ("Little Sisters No. 1"), provides more than "important context" (as my colleagues Bastarache and LeBel JJ. describe it ...). The ramifications of that decision go to the heart and soul of the appellant's present application. Were it not for the findings of serious abuses on the part of Customs authorities in Little Sisters No. 1, I doubt if the appellant's request for advance costs in the present follow-up case would have had the legs to make it this far. This case is not the beginning of a litigation journey. It is 12 years into it.

• • •

[120] The present application for advance costs comes before us precisely because the appellant says that the Minister's assurances proved empty in practice, that the systemic abuses established in the earlier litigation have continued, and that (in its view) Canada Customs has shown itself to be unwilling to administer the Customs legislation fairly and without discrimination. ... The question of public importance is this: was the Minister as good as his word when his counsel assured the Court that the appropriate reforms had been implemented? ...

[129] The government is in effect being accused of fighting a war of attrition. Today four books, tomorrow another four books. Litigation follows litigation until the rational business-person is forced to throw in the towel. This is how civil liberties can be eroded, little by little, yielded in small increments that case by case are not worth the cost of the fight. It takes an unbusinesslike litigant like Little Sisters to elbow aside purely financial considerations (to the extent it can) and carry on what it sees as unfinished Charter business against the government. Having done so successfully and at its own expense in Little Sisters No. 1, it asks the court for an exceptional order of advance costs to make good the victory it thought it had won in Little Sisters No. 1. Little Sisters may be right or it may be wrong in its allegations, but its motive can hardly be financial, and its claim to advance costs should not be assessed on that basis.

NOTE: R V SHARPE

In 1993, the federal government enacted amendments to the Criminal Code prohibiting not only the production, sale, and distribution of child pornography, but also its possession. Under s 163.1 of the Criminal Code, child pornography is defined as:

- (a) a photographic, film, video, or other visual representation, whether or not it was made by electronic or mechanical means, (i) that shows a person who is or is depicted as being under the age of eighteen years and is engaged in or is depicted as engaged in explicit sexual activity, or (ii) the dominant characteristic of which is the depiction, for a sexual purpose, of a sexual organ or the anal region of a person under the age of eighteen years; or
- (b) any written material or visual representation that advocates or counsels sexual activity with a person under the age of eighteen years that would be an offence under this Act.

An exemption is provided for works that have artistic merit or an educational, scientific, or medical purpose, but the onus is on the accused to prove such.

The Supreme Court of Canada upheld the law in R v Sharpe, but it read in two exceptions to its application. Chief Justice McLachlin, writing for the majority, held that the possession of child pornography is a form of expression protected by s 2(b):

[25] ... The possession of [expressive] material allows us to understand the thought of others or consolidate our own thought. Without the right to possess expressive material, freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression would be compromised.

In her s 1 analysis, McLachlin CJ accepted that the law's objective "to criminalize possession of child pornography that poses a reasoned risk of harm to children" (at para 82) was pressing and substantial. She also found that the means chosen were rationally connected to the law's purpose:

[89] ... The lack of unanimity in scientific evidence is not fatal. Complex human behaviour may not lend itself to precise scientific demonstration, and the courts cannot hold Parliament to a higher standard of proof than the subject matter admits of. Some studies suggest that child pornography, like other forms of pornography, will fuel fantasies and may incite offences in the case of certain individuals. This reasoned apprehension of harm demonstrates a rational connection between the law and the reduction of harm to children through child pornography.

[94] ... [T]he social science evidence adduced in this case, buttressed by experience and common sense, amply meets the Oakes requirement of a rational connection between the purpose of the law and the means adopted to effect this purpose. Possession of child pornography increases the risk of child abuse. It introduces risk, moreover, that cannot be entirely targeted by laws prohibiting the manufacture, publication and distribution of child pornography. Laws against publication and distribution of child pornography cannot catch the private viewing of child pornography, yet private viewing may induce attitudes and arousals that increase the risk of offence. Nor do such laws catch the use of pornography to groom and seduce children. Only by extending the law to private possession can these harms be squarely attacked.

However, the Chief Justice found:

[99] ... the law may also capture the possession of material that one would not normally think of as "child pornography" and that raises little or no risk of harm to children: (1) written materials or visual representations created and held by the accused alone, exclusively for personal use; and (2) visual recordings, created by or depicting the accused, that do not depict unlawful sexual activity and held by the accused exclusively for private use.

[100] Possession of material in these categories is less closely tied to harm to children than the vast majority of material caught by the law. ... [T]he risk [involved in permitting the possession of such material] is small, incidental and more tenuous than that associated with the vast majority of material targeted by s. 163.1(4). ... The bulk of the material in these two problematic classes, while engaging important values underlying the s. 2(b) guarantee, poses no reasoned risk of harm to children.

In applying the third and final step of the proportionality requirement, "the final balance," McLachlin CJ concluded:

[110] ... in broad impact and general application, the limits s. 163.1(4) imposes on free expression are justified by the protection the law affords children from exploitation and abuse. I cannot, however, arrive at the same conclusion in regard to the two problematic categories of materials described above. The legislation prohibits a person from articulating thoughts in writing or visual images, even if the result is intended only for his or her own eyes. It further prohibits a teenager from possessing, again exclusively for personal use, sexually explicit photographs or videotapes of him- or herself alone or engaged with a partner in lawful sexual activity. The inclusion of these peripheral materials in the law's prohibition trenches heavily on freedom of expression while adding little to the protection the law provides children. To this extent, the law cannot be considered proportionate in its effects, and the infringement of s. 2(b) contemplated by the legislation is not demonstrably justifiable under s. 1.

Instead of nullifying "a law that is valid in most of its applications" (at para 111), McLachlin CJ decided "to read into the law an exclusion of the problematic applications of s. 163.1":

[114] ... [I]n my view the appropriate remedy in this case is to read into the law an exclusion of the problematic applications of s. 163.1 following Schachter v. Canada, ... [1992] 2 S.C.R. 679 [found in Chapter 25]. Schachter suggests that the problem of peripheral unconstitutional provisions or applications of a law may be addressed by striking down the legislation, severing of the offending sections ..., reading down or reading in. The Court decides on the appropriate remedy on the basis of "twin guiding principles": respect for the role of Parliament, and respect for the purposes of the Charter. Applying these principles, I conclude that in the circumstances of the case reading in an exclusion is the appropriate remedy.

She thus went on to hold:

[128] ... The guarantees provided in ss. 2(b) and 7 of the Charter require the recognition of two exemptions to s. 163.1(4) [and (2)], where the prohibition's intrusion into free expression and privacy is most pronounced and its benefits most attenuated:

- (a) The first exception protects the possession of expressive material created through the efforts of a single person and held by that person alone, exclusively for his or her own personal use. This exception protects deeply private expression, such as personal journals and drawings intended solely for the eyes of their creator.
- (b) The second exemption protects a person's possession of visual recordings created by or depicting that person, but only where these recordings do not depict unlawful sexual activity, are held only for private use, and were created with the consent of those persons depicted.

The portions of McLachlin CJ's decision dealing with the choice of remedy are more fully extracted in Chapter 25. Why do you think that the Court decided to "read in" these exemptions (or "read out" part of the law) instead of simply striking down the law? Was the Court engaging in judicial redrafting of the legislation? What other options did the Court have? According to Kent Roach and David Schneiderman:

Cases such as Butler, Sharpe, [and] Little Sisters ... are united by a perhaps overly optimistic faith that leaving potentially overbroad laws on the books will not chill freedom of expression and that police and other officials will properly interpret the law as it has been interpreted by the courts. It also means that as in Little Sisters any improper application of the law will only result in a s. 24(1) remedy designed to cure specific unconstitutional acts as opposed to the broader legislative framework. As in Little Sisters, it is unclear that such remedies will effectively change governmental behavior.

VI. CONTROLS ON ELECTION SPENDING

Yasmin Dawood, "Democracy and the Freedom of Speech: Rethinking the Conflict Between Liberty and Equality"

(2013) 26 Can JL & Jurisprudence 293 at 293-94, 309 (footnotes omitted)

The right to free speech is generally viewed as the fundamental right in a liberal democratic system. It is seen as essential for the discovery of truth and the full expression of individual autonomy. In addition, the freedom of speech is essential for democracy; indeed, one of the most influential justifications of free speech is that it is a prerequisite for democratic governance. Given the fundamental importance of free speech, there is a strong presumption against state restrictions on speech. This presumption is particularly true for political speech, which is viewed as being the most deserving of constitutional protection.

Yet there is one kind of political speech—speech that takes place within the context of an election—that raises complicated problems for constitutional law. One might think that speech that occurs in the context of an election is the most “political” of political speech and for this reason deserves the greatest constitutional protection from state regulation. Yet many jurisdictions do impose restrictions on electoral speech by engaging in campaign finance regulation. The debate over campaign finance regulation is concerned with the following question: should the state impose rules on the giving and spending of money by private individuals and entities in the context of an election?

There are two main approaches to this debate in the scholarly literature on campaign finance regulation—the libertarian approach and the egalitarian approach, respectively. Proponents of the libertarian approach argue that the state should not restrict electoral speech by imposing limits on independent contributions and expenditures. Advocates of the egalitarian approach, by contrast, argue that the state regulation of speech is required in some instances to support the freedom of speech by preventing the wealthy from monopolizing political discourse. The debate ... is, at heart, a debate about the central values in a democratic system.

In recent years, the debate over electoral speech has become increasingly urgent in light of the considerable resources that are spent during political campaigns. [It is worthwhile to re-examine] the central distinction between the libertarian approach and the egalitarian approach. ... I argue that although the libertarian/egalitarian distinction is usually presented as a binary choice, the laws of a given jurisdiction often simultaneously display both libertarian and egalitarian characteristics. For this reason, I claim that the libertarian/egalitarian distinction is better conceived of as a “libertarian-egalitarian spectrum.” Ideal versions of the libertarian and egalitarian approaches, respectively, serve as the endpoints of the spectrum, while points along the spectrum represent particular combinations of the libertarian and egalitarian approaches.

The recent approaches by the U.S. Supreme Court and the Supreme Court of Canada, respectively, have privileged one value—liberty or equality—at the expense of the other. Both of these approaches are detrimental to democratic participation and governance. Too great an emphasis on equality can lead to an impairment of free speech liberties of citizens, while too great an emphasis on liberty can lead to vast spending by powerful groups on electoral advertising. For these reasons ... [I claim] that the law that governs electoral speech should simultaneously instantiate the values of liberty and equality despite the irreconcilable tensions between them.

The Canada Elections Act, SC 2000, c 9 places limits on expenditures during an election campaign by parties, candidates, and "third parties." When Stephen Harper was president of the National Citizens' Coalition lobby group, he brought a challenge to third-party spending limits in Harper v Canada (AG), immediately below.

Harper v Canada (AG)

McLACHLIN CJ and MAJOR J (Binnie J concurring) (dissenting in part):

[1] This Court has repeatedly held that liberal democracy demands the free expression of political opinion, and affirmed that political speech lies at the core of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms' guarantee of free expression. It has ... observed that the electoral process is the primary means by which the average citizen participates in the public discourse that shapes our polity. The question now before us is whether these high aspirations are fulfilled by a law that effectively denies the right of an ordinary citizen to give meaningful and effective expression to her political views during a federal election campaign.

[2] The law at issue sets advertising spending limits for citizens—called third parties—at such low levels that they cannot effectively communicate with their fellow citizens on election issues during an election campaign. The practical effect is that effective communication during the writ period is confined to registered political parties and their candidates. Both enjoy much higher spending limits. This denial of effective communication to citizens violates free expression where it warrants the greatest protection—the sphere of political discourse. ... It follows that the law is inconsistent with the guarantees of the Charter and, hence, invalid.

I. Citizen Spending Limits

A. What the Law Does

[3] The Canada Elections Act, S.C. 2000, c. 9, sets limits for spending on advertising for individuals and groups. It limits citizens to spending a maximum of $3,000 in each electoral district up to a total of $150,000 nationally. Section 350 provides:

350(1) A third party shall not incur election advertising expenses of a total amount of more than $150,000 during an election period in relation to a general election.

(2) Not more than $3,000 of the total amount referred to in subsection (1) shall be incurred to promote or oppose the election of one or more candidates in a given electoral district[.] ...

Section 350(2)(d) is particularly restrictive. It prohibits individuals from spending more than the allowed amounts on any issue with which a candidate is "particularly associated." The candidates in an election are typically associated with a wide range of views on a wide range of issues. The evidence shows that the effect of the limits is to prevent citizens from effectively communicating their views on issues during an election campaign.

[4] The limits do not permit citizens to effectively communicate through the national media. The Chief Electoral Officer testified that it costs approximately $425,000 for a one-time full-page advertisement in major Canadian newspapers. ...

[5] Nor do the limits permit citizens to communicate through the mail. The Canada Post bulk mailing rate for some ridings amounts to more than $7,500, effectively prohibiting citizens from launching a mail campaign in these ridings without exceeding the $3,000 limit.

[6] The $3,000 riding limits are further reduced by the national limit of $150,000, which precludes citizens from spending the maximum amount in each of the 308 ridings in Canada. This effectively diminishes the $3,000 riding maximum. Quite simply, it puts effective radio and television communication within constituencies or throughout the country beyond the reach of "third party" citizens.

[7] Under the limits, a citizen ... cannot effectively communicate her position to her fellow citizens throughout the country in the ways those intent on communicating such messages typically do—through mail-outs and advertising in the regional and national media. The citizen's message is thus confined to minor local dissemination with the result that effective local, regional and national expression of ideas becomes the exclusive right of registered political parties and their candidates.

[9] It is therefore clear that the Canada Elections Act's advertising limits prevent citizens from effectively communicating their views on election issues to their fellow citizens, restricting them instead to minor local communication. As such, they represent a serious incursion on free expression in the political realm. The Attorney General raises three reasons why this restriction is justified as a reasonable limit in a free and democratic society under s. 1 of the Charter: to ensure the equality of each citizen in elections; to prevent the voices of the wealthy from drowning out those of others; and to preserve confidence in the electoral system. Whether that is so is the question in this appeal.

B. Is the Incursion on Free Speech Justified?

(1) The Significance of the Infringement

[10] One cannot determine whether an infringement of a right is justified without examining the seriousness of the infringement. ... [S]ome restrictions on freedom of expression are easier to justify than others. ...

[11] Political speech, the type of speech here at issue, is the single most important and protected type of expression. It lies at the core of the guarantee of free expression

[12] The right of the people to discuss and debate ideas forms the very foundation of democracy[.] ...

[13] Section 2(b) of the Charter aims not just to guarantee a voice to registered political parties, but an equal voice to each citizen. ...
