PREFACE TO THE SIXTH EDITION

The sixth edition of Canadian Constitutional Law continues and, in our opinion, strengthens a truly national project. Drawing upon an editorial team rich with regional, linguistic, and scholarly diversity, this text remains true to the structure and purposes of previous editions while reflecting timely preoccupations in the field, touching upon such diverse areas as the separation of powers, federalism, and the role of the courts. Throughout, we have placed increased emphasis on the intersection of constitutional and administrative law and the crucial role of executive actors.

From the beginning, Canadian Constitutional Law has embraced the idea that understanding constitutional history is critical to comprehending the present and future of Canadian constitutional law. Like its predecessors, in order to illuminate present-day issues, this edition reaches back to pre-colonial and colonial times, to the earliest encounters between Indigenous peoples and European colonies, and to conflicts between European empires over control of the continent.

A number of chapters have been substantively re-written. Highlighting a functional approach, Chapter 1, Introduction, now focuses exclusively on constitutive elements of Canadian constitutionalism. Chapter 2, Judicial Review and Constitutional Interpretation, has been narrowed to introduce the mechanism of judicial review and the practice of constitutional interpretation. Chapters 4–6, on the history of the division of powers and early related cases, have been greatly refreshed, as has Chapter 8, Interpreting the Division of Powers. Chapter 9, Peace, Order, and Good Government, required substantial reworking to incorporate ground-breaking decisions—most notably, though not limited to, the 2021 References re Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act.¹ Chapter 10, Economic Regulation, has been overhauled, with greater attention paid to s 91(2) and the Canadian common market. Chapter 13, The Judiciary, has also been extensively re-written, with less focus on early s 96 cases; it also now incorporates material previously appearing in Chapter 2 on constitutional litigation and constitutional references. Chapter 14, Indigenous Peoples, reflects the remarkable evolution of scholarly, political, and judicial treatment of Indigenous peoples, nations, and issues. The final chapter to be re-written, and the one about which we are particularly excited, is Chapter 23, Equality. Aside from these extensive revisions, all chapters have been thoroughly updated to reflect recent developments in constitutional jurisprudence.

For reasons of space, a number of chapters have not been included in the print version of the sixth edition: Chapter 12, Instruments of Flexibility in the Federal System; Chapter 16, The Advent of the Charter; Chapter 24, Language Rights; and Chapter 26, Amending the Constitution. These chapters can be found online at <<https://lemond.ca/ccl06>>.

This edition continues to have a flexible design so that different teachers can use it to teach constitutional law in different ways. Each part is designed to be relatively free-standing; the book can operate as a reader for a course on any combination of issues relating to federalism, Indigenous peoples, and the Charter. Those who wish to underscore the historical dimensions of the field may want to follow the order of the chapters; others can bypass the early chapters and commence with contemporary issues and approaches.

We wish to thank our publisher, Paul Emond, and his staff, including Darren Smith, Kelly Dickson, Natalie Berchem, and Jennifer Ditta, as well as the copy editors, Dancy Mason and Ward Jardine, and the proofreaders, Darryl Kamo and Valerie Adams, for their support and institutional dexterity in publishing this edition so quickly. We also wish to thank our academic colleagues and student readers for their constructive comments on the previous edition. Finally, we note with gratitude the many contributions of Professor Carol Rogerson, who has retired from her role as general editor.

ABOUT THE GENERAL EDITORS

Carissima Mathen, LSM, is a professor of law at the University of Ottawa. She holds degrees from McGill University, Osgoode Hall Law School, and Columbia University. A noted constitutional scholar, she is the author of The Tenth Justice: Judicial Appointments, Marc Nadon and the Supreme Court Act Reference (Vancouver: UBC Press, 2020) (with Michael Plaxton) and Courts Without Cases: The Law and Politics of Advisory Opinions (Oxford: Hart, 2019), which won Second Place Distinction in the prestigious Walter Owen Book Competition. As the former director of litigation for the Women's Legal Education and Action Fund (LEAF), Professor Mathen undertook path-breaking litigation in equality rights cases before the Supreme Court of Canada. An award-winning media commentator and Ontario Law Society medalist, Professor Mathen is committed to public education and legal literacy. In addition to her books, Professor Mathen has published on all aspects of constitutional law, as well as criminal law, legal theory, and law and technology.

Patrick Macklem is an emeritus professor of law at the University of Toronto. He holds law degrees from Harvard University and the University of Toronto and an undergraduate degree from McGill University. Professor Macklem is the former William C Graham Professor of Law and a Fellow of the Royal Society of Canada. He served as law clerk for Chief Justice Brian Dickson of the Supreme Court of Canada and as constitutional advisor to the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples. Professor Macklem is a respected constitutional law expert and a long-standing author and general editor of Canadian Constitutional Law. In addition to this title, he authored and co-edited several books and published numerous articles on constitutional law, labour law, Indigenous peoples and the law, and human rights.

I. INTRODUCTION

Welcome to the study of constitutional law. It is an important and fascinating subject, and we hope that you will come to appreciate its place in both our system of law and our political culture. Constitutional law affects all aspects of our lives. Because of its development over time and application in diverse contexts, constitutional law also expresses deep social divisions—between, for example, following community commitments and respecting individual autonomy. It reflects the profound challenge in any society of finding the means to live together in mutual respect. In this chapter, we briefly describe the subject, expecting that lectures and classroom discussions will attend in greater detail to the issues and themes discussed below.

Any definition of constitutional law runs the risk of being too wide, too narrow, or too vague. Remembering that constitutional law broadly engages the organization of our social life, we suggest that a constitution is an assortment of foundational rules, principles, and practices relating to the governance of a society.

Constitutions address a wide range of subjects and relationships. Typically, they deal with the structures, procedures, and powers of governmental institutions and the nature and scope of personal rights and responsibilities. Often, they address relations among groups and between groups and governments. In Canada, the latter relationship characterizes the complex and evolving relationship between Indigenous peoples and the state. In some countries, the constitution includes protection for individual rights against the exercise of private power or imposes general economic and social obligations—for example, a right to housing or basic income.

Constitutional provisions perform several different kinds of functions. They often establish legally enforceable obligations. They serve to ground judicial decisions concerning the exercise of power. And by setting out the fundamental values and aspirations of a country, they perform a significant symbolic role.

In many countries, including Canada, the term “constitution” has at least two meanings. The first refers to all the rules by which a country has chosen to govern itself, regardless of where they might be found. On this meaning, a constitution can include rules found in ordinary statutes and the common law. The second is a particular document or set of documents that has special legal and political significance. In Canada, that set of documents is called “the Constitution of Canada.” They have the character of “the supreme law of Canada,” and they can be changed only in accordance with specially prescribed rules.

Given the preliminary definition above, what, then, is “constitutional law”? In our view, it is an open-ended set of rules, principles, and practices that identify, define, and reconcile competing rights, responsibilities, and functions of governments, communities, and individuals. Responding more fully to that question is a central task of this book. We hope as well that, in reading the chapters that follow, students will gain some insight into the nature of law itself.

II. BREAKING DOWN CANADA’S CONSTITUTION

A. ELEMENTS

The Canadian Constitution encompasses five components: parliamentary democracy, federalism, individual and group rights, Aboriginal rights, and the principle of constitutionalism. These five components interact with each other in complex ways.

Parliamentary democracy is the mechanism that ensures that primary legal rules (statutes) are created by elected legislative bodies. Those bodies confer extensive authority on executive actors (the chief one of which is the Cabinet), whose members remain formally accountable to the legislature, to administer those laws. Additionally, laws are interpreted and applied by courts and quasi-judicial bodies such as administrative tribunals.

Federalism is the division of “orders of government” along territorial lines. Generally, it consists of a national order and one or more subnational orders (here, provinces). In Canada, federalism’s most critical function is to allocate the powers of different legislatures: Parliament at the national level and assemblies/legislatures at the provincial level. Parliament enacts laws over matters of general concern to the country, whereas provincial legislatures enact laws in relation to more local concerns. As you will discover, the distinction between those two kinds of matters is hotly contested and has changed over time.

The third feature of our Constitution is rights: claims that citizens, either individually or in particular communities, have against the state. Among other things, they include rights to democratic government, to mobility, to fundamental freedoms such as religion or expression, to fair criminal justice processes, and to equality.

Aboriginal rights, the fourth feature, are recognized by the Constitution as belonging to Indigenous peoples in light of the fact that they lived on this continent in organized societies long before their contact with European nations. The precise nature and scope of such rights are still being worked out by Indigenous peoples, politicians, and courts.

The principle of constitutionalism refers to the requirement that state power be limited by overarching rules and norms that cannot be changed by ordinary legislative processes. It means that state decisions that are inconsistent with a provision of the Constitution of Canada are considered (and will be so declared by courts) to be “of no force or effect.”

Another feature of the Constitution is the rule of law, an expansive, complex, and challenging concept. At its most basic, the rule of law means that governments exercise power according to law, not arbitrarily. Somewhat related, and thus worth mentioning, is the collection of constitutional conventions, which, although they are not legally enforceable, nonetheless form an essential part of the Canadian constitutional order.

For centuries, legislative supremacy has been a central principle of the British Constitution. Under this principle, any law passed by the British Parliament is supreme and may not be modified or circumscribed by any other institution. In theory, Parliament can make laws about whatever it wishes, however it wishes, and expect those laws to be followed and enforced. Because British colonial constitutions were formed in the model of the British Constitution, legislative supremacy carried over to Canadian legislatures. That supremacy, however, was tempered by imperial power. Since Confederation, legislative supremacy has also been modified by the principle of federalism, under which Parliament and the provincial legislatures are “supreme” only insofar as they exercise powers the Constitution confers on them. Legislative supremacy was further modified by the 1982 Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, Part I of the Constitution Act, 1982, being Schedule B to the Canada Act 1982 (UK), 1982, c 11, the focus of many of the following chapters.

B. SOURCES

Constitutions take different forms. Some, like the US Constitution, primarily derive from a single document that is amended from time to time. Others, including the Canadian Constitution, are made up of a variety of sources, often generated over a long period.

An important source for the Canadian Constitution is the common law—the case law rendered by judges first in Great Britain and now in Canada. The common law is a source for recognizing such things as the rights of Indigenous peoples and the law of parliamentary privilege. It also provides a measure of protection for individual rights, through presumptions for the interpretation of statutes. Other constitutional rules are found in ordinary statutes created by legislatures and can modify and even overrule common law rules. For example, the Supreme Court of Canada was created by a federal statute, the Supreme Court Act, RSC 1985, c S-26, but is still considered to be part of the fabric of the Canadian Constitution (in a 2014 advisory opinion discussed in Chapter 13, The Role of the Judiciary, the Court confirmed its own distinct constitutional status).

Another source, constitutional convention, develops from long-standing patterns of behaviour of elected political actors. They are “enforced” not by the courts but through political means—by public rebuke and, potentially, defeat at the ballot box. Although conventions are not legally enforceable, they often lie at the heart of constitutional tradition. For example, the principle of responsible government, whereby the executive actors forming the government are chosen from the party or parties with the greatest support in the elected chamber of the legislature, is one of our most important constitutional practices. Yet it is a convention—not a judicially enforceable rule.

Some of Canada’s most significant constitutional sources are the result of actions by the British Crown and the British Parliament. An example is the Royal Proclamation of 1763. Issued by King George III after the British conquest of the French colony of New France, it continues to be an important source of constitutional protection of Aboriginal rights. Similarly, the Quebec Act, enacted by the British Parliament in 1774, ensured the continuation of French civil law in Quebec. Another important British statute, the British North America Act, 1867 (renamed the Constitution Act, 1867 (UK), 30 & 31 Vict, c 3, reprinted in RSC 1985, Appendix II, No 5, in 1982) (BNA Act), created the new federal state of Canada by uniting the colonies of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Canada, which was divided into Ontario and Quebec. The BNA Act gave the new dominion a constitution, in the words of its preamble, “similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom.” By conferring on provincial legislatures powers to pass laws in relation to property and civil rights and local and private matters, the BNA Act also acknowledged Quebec’s strong desire to retain its civil law tradition.

As other provinces joined Confederation, they too became bound by the BNA Act. However, the conditions, or “terms of union,” on which they joined varied. Thus, for example, the Manitoba Act, 1870 provided for settlement of Métis land claims and protection of the French language; Prince Edward Island’s 1873 Terms of Union guaranteed a steam ferry link; the three prairie provinces were not given the same jurisdiction as the other provinces over their natural resources (until a constitutional amendment in the Natural Resources Transfer Agreements in 1930); and Newfoundland saw not only special provisions for denominational schools but also a guarantee for the continued manufacture and sale of, of all things, “oleomargarine.”

Although the BNA Act clearly was meant to provide a measure of self-government, it applied to a colony (Canada) expected to remain fundamentally “British.” That probably explains why so much was left unsaid about the operation of the colony’s parliamentary institutions and structures, such as the Office of the Prime Minister or the Cabinet. Those practices would continue to be governed by long-standing British constitutional conventions. As well, there was no domestic mechanism to change the Act (save for s 92(1), which allowed the provinces to change their own provincial constitutions); there was no explicit provision for Canada to create international treaties and thus no process to implement them; and there was no requirement for a Canadian supreme court, although s 101 did confer the power on the federal Parliament to create one.

III. INSTITUTIONS AND THE SEPARATION OF POWERS

A. SEPARATION OF POWERS

The Constitution is primarily a mechanism for ordering the rules by which a nation-state is governed. As such, it is important to delineate how that governance is structured. This section briefly considers the main institutions of the Canadian state. The following excerpt explains an important overarching concept: the separation of powers.

Carissima Mathen, Courts Without Cases: The Law and Politics of Advisory Opinions

(Oxford: Hart, 2019) at 20–21, 26–28 (footnotes omitted)

The separation of powers is a doctrine that sets out how the various entities that wield state power ... should function, both singly and in relation to each other. There are many different versions of the doctrine, which is inescapably political. But the core of the doctrine, whatever the particular version on offer, is that the state is optimally divided into three branches of government—legislative, executive and judicial—and that each branch should stay in its respective “lane.” The legislative branch has primary, and usually exclusive, authority to create positive legal rules. The executive branch is charged with administering those rules, as well as any number of other tasks (which may themselves be either delegated or conferred by statute). Finally, the judicial branch is charged with interpreting and applying legal rules in a variety of contexts.

The concept of separating government functions goes back (at least) to the origins of Western political thought. In the Politics, Aristotle identified deliberative, magistral and judicial elements of government action. Even so, the idea of three distinct branches of the state was not a common feature of early accounts, which tended not to distinguish between executive and judicial functions. Indeed, American political scientist Martin Shapiro has described the modern focus, in separation of powers doctrine, on the institutional separation of courts as "the most deviant case."

It is sometimes said that there is no separation of powers in Canada. It is true that the country does not adhere to the peculiarly strong version of that doctrine that operates in, say, the United States. As a parliamentary democracy ... Canada's governance is incompatible with such a rigid division of the state. Instead, there is an explicit connection between the legislature and executive.

Another feature of the Canadian Constitution that may appear to complicate the application of separation of powers doctrine is the fact that the judiciary is appointed exclusively by the executive branch with no formal input from the legislature. Indeed, Canada appears to be virtually alone among constitutional democracies in allocating such a broad appointment discretion to "the leader of the government"

At first, Canadian courts did not pay much attention to the separation of powers. The Canadian Supreme Court did not even mention the term until 1975, and only in 1981 did it address the doctrine's role in constitutional terms. The Court's early references tended to be dismissive, noting, for example, that "there is no general 'separation of powers' in the British North America Act, 1867" and that the Constitution "does not separate the legislative, executive, and judicial functions and insist that each branch of government exercise only its own function."

After the Constitution Act 1982, the Court started to view the doctrine in starkly different terms: as "essential," "defining," and "fundamental." In 1993, it said:

While we do not share the turbulent history of the United Kingdom with respect to the relationships between the different branches of government, there is no question that the maintenance of the independence of the different branches from one another is necessary to their proper functioning.

As you read the materials throughout the book, consider how much they adhere, or do not, to the idea that the state is best served by some separation of governance functions.

As a federal system operating in the Westminster tradition, the organization of the Canadian state is somewhat complicated. Below are set out its primary institutions and actors.

B. THE CROWN

Canada is a constitutional monarchy. Although Canada is governed by the "supreme law" of its Constitution, that political order is organized around a hereditary monarch who also acts as the sovereign ruler of the United Kingdom (at the time of writing Queen Elizabeth II). Note that under our Constitution the Queen acts as the Queen of Canada, not the United Kingdom.

With one exception, the Queen never takes any personal decisions vis-à-vis Canada. The exception is the appointment of her viceregal representatives: the governor general for Canada and lieutenant governors for individual provinces (the territories have a different position called "commissioner"). Although the Queen personally appoints her representatives, she does so on the advice of the prime minister.

The notion of "advice" is core to the monarchical, or sovereign, role in Canada. The basic principle is that the sovereign always acts on the advice of executive actors (namely, the prime minister) who are themselves accountable to elected members of the House of Commons (discussed below). The sovereign follows this convention as long as the prime minister enjoys the confidence of a majority of elected members in the House of Commons. In this way, the Crown operates consistently with Canada's democratic character. Although it is possible for the Crown to disregard a prime minister's advice, by convention that would cause the prime minister to resign—a grave outcome that the sovereign would do their utmost to avoid. Such a situation has occurred only once in Canada: an incident known as the "King–Byng" affair of 1926, which created a constitutional crisis. For a discussion, see Eugene A Forsey, The Royal Power of Dissolution of Parliament in the British Commonwealth (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1943, reprinted 1968) chs 5, 6.

C. PARLIAMENT

Parliament is the legislative branch of Canada. Its name reveals both a historical and a conceptual link to the centuries-old Parliament of the United Kingdom (Westminster). Formally, Parliament is composed of three elements: the Queen through her representative, the governor general; the House of Commons, composed of 338 elected members; and the Senate, made up of 105 individuals appointed by the governor general on the advice of the prime minister.

Two of Parliament's most significant responsibilities are to ensure supply (funds) for the operation of the state and to pass legislation in areas of federal responsibility. Legislation may be introduced in either chamber (except for money bills, which must originate in the House). Upon majority votes by both chambers, the bill is then sent to the governor general for "royal assent," after which it gains the force of law. Note that, by convention, the Crown always assents upon being advised of the will of both Houses of Parliament. Therefore, royal assent does not involve the sovereign in the legislative process in more than a pro forma way.

It is common (if technically inaccurate) to hear references to "Parliament" as only the House and Senate or, indeed, the House alone. One reason that the House of Commons, especially, is thought of as Parliament is because of its critical function vis-à-vis the government. Through the votes of its members, the House demonstrates confidence in the prime minister and thereby empowers the Cabinet to govern. A prime minister only remains in office while holding that confidence; this is a key principle of "responsible government." The House is the one to give confidence because the House is elected by the general public.

D. CABINET AND EXECUTIVE

In Westminster-style democracies, the term "government" refers to the executive branch. At the centre of this branch is Cabinet. Cabinet is ordinarily composed of members of the legislative branch. Those members are selected by the prime minister, the head of Cabinet, who must maintain the confidence of the House in order to stay in office. Cabinet members are sworn in by the governor general. All ministers, including the prime minister, are "responsible" to the legislature, are expected to respond to its questions and demands, and must abide by its laws. Through the prime minister, Cabinet advises the governor general on things that require Crown approval—for example, judicial appointments. The term "governor in council" is used to refer to the governor general acting on that advice.

One of the less desirable features of the Canadian parliamentary system is that decision-making can become concentrated in the executive to the detriment of the accountability function of Parliament. This can occur when a political party has a majority of seats in the House, which mutes much of the potential conflict between the two branches. It can also occur in a minority Parliament, where, for whatever reason, the opposition parties are not motivated to register non-confidence in the government. Compared to other Westminster-style systems, Canada tends to cede a great amount of practical political control to the executive. For more discussion of this issue, see Donald J Savoie, Governing from the Centre: The Concentration of Power in Canadian Politics (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1999).

E. JUDICIARY

The judicial branch interprets and applies primary and subordinate legal rules (statutes and regulations), reviews the actions of state actors, and evaluates laws and state action for consistency with the Constitution. It consists of a hierarchy of courts with the Supreme Court of Canada at the top. Other courts operate either in the provinces (provincial, superior, and appellate courts) or for the entire country (federal courts). The judiciary's role in Canada's constitutional order is a focus of much of this book, beginning with the next chapter. Its special features and constitutional character are covered in Chapter 13.

F. PROVINCES

Similar to the federal level, provinces operate under the separation of powers as modified by a framework of responsible government. Provinces have their own sovereign representatives: the lieutenant governors. In Canada, the term "Parliament" is used exclusively to refer to the national legislature. Provincial legislatures are known as "legislatures" or "assemblies." Note that, for over a hundred years, all Canadian provincial legislatures have been unicameral—with one elected chamber.

IV. CANADA'S CONSTITUTIONAL EVOLUTION

After Confederation in 1867, Canada grew in population and international stature. It moved gradually toward independence from the United Kingdom. Under the British Statute of Westminster in 1931 (found in RSC 1985, Appendix II, No 27), Canadian legislatures gained the power to repeal or amend imperial statutes applicable to Canada, and no further such statutes could be enacted without their consent. The sole exception was s 7(1) of the Statute of Westminster, which provided that the BNA Act could be changed only through the Imperial Parliament.

In 1949, another badge of colonial status was removed when appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (JCPC) were abolished. From the British colonies' earliest days, the JCPC was the apex judicial body. Abolishing JCPC appeals was debated both during and after Confederation, especially when the Supreme Court was created in 1875. But the JCPC remained in place (albeit with a more narrow jurisdiction) until 1949. As the next few chapters demonstrate, the British law lords who presided over it had a large impact on the evolution of the Canadian Constitution.

Beginning in the early 1960s, there was increasing pressure for constitutional reform in Canada. This was spurred largely by demands from Quebec but attracted growing sympathy in many other regions. Advocates took primary aim at the BNA Act. Its status as a British imperial law was an irritant, if not an affront, to many Canadians. To see the Act "patriated," however, required agreement on a domestic amending formula. That would prove exceptionally difficult. There were demands as well to rearrange the powers and functions of the federal and provincial governments; to reform the Senate and replace it with a more regionally representative body; to give the Supreme Court constitutional status; to entrench individual rights; and to recognize the rights of the Indigenous peoples of Canada.

In 1982, a number of these objectives were achieved. In the Canada Act, 1982 (UK), c 11, s 2, the British Parliament affirmed that "[n]o Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom passed after the Constitution Act, 1982 comes into force shall extend to Canada as part of its law." Thus, from April 17, 1982 (the date on which the Constitution Act, 1982 was proclaimed), Canada took possession of a fully domesticated, or "patriated," Constitution.

The Constitution Act, 1982 introduced fundamental changes to Canada's Constitution. Foremost is the protection for individual and group rights in the Charter. Equally important is s 35(1), which recognizes and affirms existing Aboriginal and treaty rights. The Act implements a complex amending formula, described in more detail below, and has altered the distribution of powers in relation to natural resources. Crucially, it modifies the concept of legislative supremacy as a basic element of the Constitution. Section 52(1) of the Act declares that the Constitution is “the supreme law of Canada, and any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is ... of no force or effect.”

For some, the changes brought by the Constitution Act, 1982 were insufficient. The government of Quebec never agreed to the 1982 package, which had failed to address its traditional demands for controls on the federal spending power and increased legislative authority. Many in Quebec demanded further reforms. In an effort to win Quebec’s support, the provincial premiers and the prime minister agreed on the Meech Lake Accord in 1987. Among other things, the Accord proposed the recognition of Quebec as a “distinct society” and Canada as a country with two linguistic groups, controls on the federal spending power, a mechanism to constitutionalize federal–provincial immigration agreements, and changes to the amending formula. The Accord died in 1990 after failing to secure the necessary provincial support before the expiry of a three-year time limit.

Pressure for reform continued from Quebec, now joined by Indigenous peoples demanding recognition of the inherent right to self-government and Westerners committed to Senate reform. Once more, a package of constitutional amendments, the Charlottetown Accord, was agreed to by first ministers and Indigenous leaders. Far more comprehensive than Meech Lake, it included much of that document plus detailed provisions dealing with Aboriginal rights, a new elected Senate, and changes to the distribution of powers. The Accord was rejected by a majority of voters in a national referendum in 1992.

Despite public sentiment to the contrary, the prospect of constitutional reform never disappears completely. The strong commitment of many Quebecers to a different relationship with the rest of Canada persists, whether in the form of independence for Quebec or a new form of sovereignty association. Continued insistence by Indigenous peoples for explicit constitutional recognition of ancestral territories and rights of self-government also remains.

V. PERSPECTIVES ON THE CONSTITUTION AND CONSTITUTIONAL CHANGE

Much of the stuff of constitutional law involves disagreement over the meaning and relative weight to be accorded to various constitutional sources. For example, in 1867, the BNA Act was viewed within Quebec as a protection for its distinctive culture but within Ontario as a means of nation-building or opening up the West. For many Indigenous peoples, the Royal Proclamation signifies a fundamental commitment to the territory and autonomy of their nations. The transfer of natural resources to the Western provinces in 1930 may represent to a Westerner the affirmation of their equality with other provinces. And for many, the Charter is a strong guarantee of universal individual rights, creating a new “citizen’s constitution,” whereas for others it continues the Canadian tradition of respect for group rights and community values.

Differing perspectives on the Constitution also emerge from disagreement over the function of constitutional law. Some scholars emphasize constitutional law’s relationship to economic ordering. They examine the law’s relationship to the distribution of economic entitlements, as well as its capacity to maximize efficient allocations of goods and resources. Others focus on the nature and effect of constitutional rights as instruments of defining individual and collective identities, in light of political struggles over such matters as gender, race, and Indigeneity. Additional perspectives on the Constitution emerge from its relationship to democratic participation and accountability. Although the Constitution expresses basic democratic aspirations, it is interpreted and enforced primarily by courts, which are not democratically accountable in the ordinary sense of that term.

Some constitutions are quite flexible. In Britain, the doctrine of legislative supremacy meant that Parliament could modify the Constitution through an ordinary statute, although social expectations did restrict what was politically possible. Other constitutions are more rigid, specifying special procedures for amendment on the theory that, as a form of supreme law, constitutions should change only by special mechanisms ensuring broad consensus.

In Canada, the supremacy of the constitution acts is affirmed by s 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982. Part V of the Act sets out rules for constitutional amendment. The rule to be used depends upon the type of amendment. The general formula, set out in s 38, requires the approval of the federal Parliament and at least two-thirds of the provincial legislatures representing at least 50 percent of the population of all of the provinces. Section 41 provides that other amendments, such as changes to the amending formula itself, require the approval of Parliament and all the provincial legislatures. Still other configurations are needed for other types of amendments.

Formal amendment of the Constitution is difficult and time-consuming. However, the Constitution also evolves in other ways. An important, if controversial, example is judicial interpretation. Through scores of decisions, courts explain and apply the words of the Constitution, often in ways never contemplated by its original drafters. Judicial decisions drive much of the study of constitutional law. Other, less formal constitutional arrangements include the use of taxation and spending powers. Over various periods of Canadian history, these powers have substantially altered the distribution of functions between the federal and provincial governments.

Whether it should be easy to change a constitution is fundamental to the idea of constitutional law, raising important questions about the balance between stability and evolution. Written constitutions codify discrete exercises of political self-determination. They aim to enshrine a society's most deeply held beliefs and to impose constraints and obligations on governments. Citizens want the Constitution to endure, as a public symbol and as a guide and limit for political conduct. Canadians expect the Constitution to guarantee such things as periodic elections, responsible government, and freedom of expression. Therefore, they tend to assume that those guarantees either will not be changed or will not be changed absent extraordinary reasons and justification.

At the same time, some constitutional change is inevitable. It is impossible for a constitution's original framers to perfectly predict the needs of future generations. Moreover, values considered by those framers to be fundamental may over time be understood quite differently, even negatively. In such circumstances, why should the framers' beliefs prevail? And if that is true, why should the rules for constitutional change be especially onerous?

Thinking about these questions raises broader, quite complex questions of legitimacy and social and political accountability. Over the course of this book, you will have many opportunities to consider these issues.

VI. THE LAWYER'S ROLE

Although a constitution is a profoundly political and social document, it has a special place in the world of law. Lawyers are frequently involved in drafting a constitution and are essential to how constitutional disputes get worked out—namely, litigation before courts. Courts are treated as primary constitutional actors, sometimes at the expense of the legislatures that craft legal rules and the executive that administers them. Lawyers make constitutions effective on the ground. If lawyers in government ignore the constitution in advising “clients,” then there is a very real sense in which the constitution is no longer the constitution.

As made plain throughout this book, constitutional law requires examining court decisions. This judicial focus is distinctive to legal studies. Political scientists, for example, tend to examine other state actors at least as frequently and view the singular focus on courts in law courses as overly narrow. For a discussion of the executive's role in constitutional decisions, see Vanessa A MacDonnell, "The Constitution as Framework for Governance" (2013) 63:4 UTJ 624.

As you work through the materials, remember that most Canadians never find themselves before courts. They tend not to think about the values implicated by our constitutional order in legal terms. Remember too that the very nature of litigation shapes the way that arguments are presented and decided. Litigation presses constitutional thinking into a formal and detached mode that can be quite different from the political dynamics that create constitutions and set public expectations for their use.

In other words, when learning about constitutional law, try to remember that courts are not the only institutions that matter. Although many important decisions about our Constitution are made by courts, decisions of constitutional significance occur in all branches of government, including administrative bodies that "adjudicate" on Charter rights. As you read the cases and notes that follow, consider: which values are furthered, and which are frustrated, by assigning primary responsibility for the Constitution to the judiciary?

Constitutions are often drafted in very general terms to allow for some degree of flexibility and change. The text of constitutional documents can be open to many meanings, and courts are often called on to decide which of these meanings is to prevail—a process called interpretation. Chapter 2, Judicial Review and Constitutional Interpretation, contains an excerpt from the "Persons" case, in which the main issue concerned whether the reference to "person" in the Constitution Act, 1867 included women. Other examples appear throughout this book. Section 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867 gives the federal government the power to legislate in relation to "the Criminal Law." Does this extend to legislation restricting abortions or requiring content labels on food? Section 7 of the Charter guarantees the right to "life, liberty and security of the person." Does this mean that individuals have a right to refuse vaccination, to access medical services, or to commit assisted suicide? In answering these questions, judges are faced with the difficult task of determining the meaning of highly contested concepts, sometimes holding invalid the actions of elected legislators who hold broad public support. Inevitably, this calls into question the legitimacy of what judges do, a question that will be considered at great length in many of the following chapters.

VII. THE CONSTITUTION AND THE ADMINISTRATIVE STATE

Although this book deals with issues specific to the Constitution of Canada, numerous other legal areas raise constitutional concerns. One of the most important is administrative law: the law relating to the actions and decisions of executive branch officials and agencies. Those decisions are critical to the operation of the Canadian state, overseeing such important functions as food safety, environmental protection, and tax collection. Canadians saw some of the administrative state in action during the COVID-19 pandemic, when various agencies and public officials made critical decisions to, for example, approve vaccines and impose public health measures to limit the spread of the virus.

Given that the decisions of public officials and agencies intersect with the Constitution in important ways, administrative law occasionally will surface throughout this book. The excerpt below gives a sense of the complexity of the relationship between administrative and constitutional law.

Kate Glover Berger, "The Constitutional Status of the Administrative State"

<http://dx.doi.org/10.2139/ssrn.3727613>

It goes without saying that administrative decision-makers engage widely and directly with the obligations and values of the constitution as they execute their mandates. Modern jurisprudence confirms that administrative decision-makers are bound to act in accordance with the Charter and must exercise their discretion in ways that are infused with Charter values and substantive commitments to proportionality. Further, public actors who are empowered to decide questions of law are correlatively empowered to answer the constitutional questions attached to those legal matters and to grant remedies under section 24(1) of the Charter, unless such authority has been clearly revoked. Moreover, administrative actors are on the front lines of interpreting and implementing constitutional rights and obligations in their interactions with the public, from the exercise of police power to the issuance of a passport to the termination of public service employment.

The courts have not always recognized a direct relationship between administrative decision-makers and the constitution. However, since the later decades of the twentieth century, public law jurisprudence in Canada reflects an overwhelming trend towards upholding the jurisdiction of administrative decision-makers over constitutional matters and loosening the exclusive judicial grip on constitutional interpretation. In the Supreme Court's words, the relationship between the courts, the constitution, and administrative decision-makers has been "completely revised" over time. The shift has been justified on the grounds of advancing access to justice, respecting administrative expertise, and responding to the realities of administrative justice, in which administrative actors are the primary legal decision-makers for most disputes and for most individuals interacting with or seeking an outcome from the public sector. It is again these shifts and justifications that contribute to a vision of the constitutional order in which administrative decision-makers are critical to carrying out the rule of law.

Consider three sets of cases in which we see expansion and affirmation of the authority and responsibility of administrative decision-makers in carrying out constitutional mandates.

First, in Conway [R v Conway, 2010 SCC 22, a case dealing with the medical confinement of a criminal defendant found not criminally responsible by reason of mental disorder], the Supreme Court examined separate strands of administrative law jurisprudence, each of which ultimately facilitated and entrenched direct access of administrative decision-makers to the constitution. Justice Abella, for the Court, held that the evolution in the jurisprudence lead to two observations: "first, that [certain] administrative tribunals ... have the authority to resolve constitutional questions that are linked to matters properly before them. And secondly, they must act consistently with the Charter and its values when exercising their statutory functions." ...

Second, the courts have adopted a deferential posture when reviewing the discretionary decisions of administrative decision-makers that engage Charter values. ... The claim is that administrative decision-makers are in a better position than the courts to assess how the Charter is relevant to the exercise of their statutory mandate and, as such, the rule of law counsels deference.

Third, the actions of administrative decision-makers can both trigger and fulfill the Crown's duty to consult Indigenous peoples in circumstances in which a public decision affects the rights and interests of Indigenous communities. As Justices Karakatsanis and Brown explain in Clyde River [discussed in Chapter 14, Indigenous Peoples and the Constitution], "once it is accepted that a regulatory agency exists to exercise executive power as authorized by legislatures, any distinction between its actions and Crown action quickly falls away. In this context, the [agency] is the vehicle through which the Crown acts. ... It therefore does not matter whether the final decision-maker on a resource project is Cabinet or the [agency]. In either case, the decision constitutes Crown action that may trigger the duty to consult. ... '[T]he duty, like the honour of the Crown, does not evaporate simply because a final decision has been made by a tribunal established by Parliament, as opposed to Cabinet.'" Further affirming the expertise of administrative agencies in their statutory context, the Court held that administrative actors can also carry out consultation. While ultimate responsibility remains with the Crown, the "Crown may rely on steps undertaken by a regulatory agency to fulfill the duty to consult" as long as "the agency's statutory duties and powers enable it to do what the duty requires in the particular circumstances." The effect of these holdings is that administrative actors are drawn into treaty relationships, are accountable for upholding and manifesting the Crown's obligation to act honourably in its dealings with Indigenous Peoples, and must assist in the pursuit of reconciliation between Indigenous Peoples and the Crown.

Together, these three brief descriptions again show shifts in the institutional vision and role of the administrative state. Reluctance to recognize the constitutional capacity and jurisdiction of administrative decision-makers diminished, replaced by a direct and close relationship between administrative actors and the constitution, with significant responsibility for administrative actors in upholding, fulfilling, and applying the constitutional obligations of the state and remedying the state's constitutional failures. It would be difficult to reconcile such a shift with the conclusion that the administrative state is not itself vital within the architecture of the constitution, embedded within the sprawling network of decision-makers responsible for carrying out the practicalities and manifesting the aspirations of Canadian constitutionalism.

VIII. A BRIEF TOUR OF WHAT IS TO FOLLOW

We end with a description of this book. Remember: it is designed as an introduction to an enormous subject. We have compiled a set of materials that is extensive but not comprehensive. Inevitably, certain topics are omitted. We have included most of what we think is important or useful. As well, at several points we have taken care to permit teachers to omit parts, or to change the order of the materials, to suit their purposes.

Chapter 2, introducing judicial review, follows this introduction. Next comes Part Two, which deals with federalism. It contains ten chapters, which can be divided into two sections: history and modern federalism. These two sections are not as different from each other as the names above might suggest because law is usually shaped in one way or another by an accumulation of past experience. Users of this book may follow the book as it is arranged; others may find it preferable to introduce the interpretation of the distribution of powers in the Canadian federal system by working through one or more cases in Chapter 8, Interpreting the Division of Powers.

After the federalism part of the book, there is a single chapter in Part Three: Chapter 13. It explores the essential role of the judiciary in our constitutional structure and the constitutional principles that underpin that role: the rule of law, judicial independence, and the separation of powers. It provides an overview of the basic structure of the Canadian judicial system, followed by an examination of the judicial interpretation of the constitutional provisions—especially s 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867—designed to preserve the institutional role of the superior courts. It examines the special status of the Supreme Court, including the appointment process, which in recent years has undergone significant development. It offers an introduction to the issue of judicial tenure and discipline. Finally, it discusses how constitutional cases get to court, including the special reference function of Canadian courts, which sets Canada apart from many comparable countries.

Part Four, Indigenous Peoples, integrates a number of otherwise discrete areas of law, including the common law of Aboriginal title, the distribution of legislative authority as it affects Indigenous peoples, and constitutional recognition of Aboriginal and treaty rights.

Part Five, Rights, is dedicated to the role of rights in the Canadian Constitution. It is dominated by the Charter, although it begins with Chapter 15, Antecedents of the Charter, tracing other rights-protecting mechanisms in our constitutional structure. The treatment of the Charter begins with two chapters, Chapter 16, The Advent of the Charter, and Chapter 17, The Framework of the Charter, introducing basic and pervasive themes in Charter interpretation, followed by Chapter 18, Application, reviewing the scope of the Charter's application. The remaining chapters are about selected rights—for example, the right to freedom of expression (Chapter 20, Freedom of Expression) and the right to equality (Chapter 23, Equality Rights). The chapters on rights are presented according to their order in the Charter but are easily switched to suit the needs of the instructor. There is little material on Charter rights in the criminal justice system; because that material draws so heavily on criminal law and the law of evidence, we felt it would be more effectively studied in those courses. Part Five ends with Chapter 25, Enforcement of Rights, which primarily focuses on remedies but also deals with other procedural aspects of Charter litigation. The book concludes with Chapter 26, Amending the Constitution.

CHAPTER TWO

JUDICIAL REVIEW AND CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION

I. Introduction	17
II. Judicial Review and the Legitimacy Issue	17
III. Constitutional Interpretation	19

I. INTRODUCTION

The purpose of this chapter is twofold: to introduce the practice of judicial review and to identify and provide a very brief discussion of some of the issues surrounding it.

II. JUDICIAL REVIEW AND THE LEGITIMACY ISSUE

"Judicial review" can describe more than one judicial function. For the purposes of this book, it refers to the power of the courts to determine whether law or state action is in compliance with the Constitution, and, if it is not, to declare such law or action to be unconstitutional. (The notion that governmental action has to comply with the requirements of the Constitution is known as the principle of constitutionalism: see Reference re Secession of Quebec, [1998] 2 SCR 217, 1998 CanLII 793, excerpted below.) In contrast to the early days of the American republic (see in this regard Marbury v Madison, 5 US 137, 2 L Ed 60 (1803)), there was relatively little doubt that this power existed in Canada. As you will see in Chapter 4, The Late Nineteenth Century: The Courts Set an Initial Course, Canadian courts in the 1870s were quite prepared to rule on the constitutionality of federal and provincial laws. In their view, they were simply being asked to give effect to an imperial statute—the British North America Act, 1867 (BNA Act)—which had long been a duty of colonial courts.

Today, s 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 provides that "[t]he Constitution of Canada is the supreme law of Canada, and any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect." In addition, s 24(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms states that "[a]nyone whose rights or freedoms, as guaranteed by this Charter, have been infringed or denied may apply to a court of competent jurisdiction to obtain such remedy as the court considers appropriate and just in the circumstances."

For some, the fact that judicial review is a long-accepted tradition in Canada resolves the question of its legitimacy. For others, it does not. If "legitimacy" is understood to refer not only to whether a power exists, but also the appropriateness of its exercise, the question cannot be settled simply by pointing to tradition or text. In some instances, the Constitution makes it clear to all that governmental action of a particular kind is unconstitutional. For example, to maintain a Parliamentary session longer than five years would expressly contradict s 4 of the Charter. In such instances, a judicial decision to that effect would be seen to be legitimate. But those kind of instances are rare, in part because governments do not habitually violate such clear rules. The disputes that come before the courts are precisely those where the text is less clear. In most cases, both the challenger and the responding state party make plausible arguments, grounded directly or indirectly in the relevant text. When courts decide that the impugned governmental action in these cases is unconstitutional, that implicates a separate—and, for practical purposes, more important—understanding of the legitimacy question.

In recent years, courts have been asked to declare legislation unconstitutional not because it conflicts with the text of the Constitution but because it contradicts one or more of the organizing or underlying principles of the Constitution. In Reference re Secession of Quebec, the Supreme Court of Canada said that federalism, democracy, the rule of law, and the protection of minorities are examples of such principles. Subsequently, the Court has added to the list judicial independence and the separation of powers. Should the courts rely on these unwritten principles to strike down legislation? The Supreme Court, at least partially, addressed these issues in two cases: British Columbia v Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd, 2005 SCC 49 and British Columbia (AG) v Christie, 2007 SCC 21. (These cases are discussed in more detail below.)

Basic to the legitimacy of judicial review is whether unelected judges should have the power to declare unconstitutional the decisions of democratically elected majorities. If a court relies on extra-textual sources to strike down laws or other state action, from where does it get the authority to do so? How can such decisions be compatible with our commitment to democratic self-government? Bear these questions in mind as you work through the readings that follow. As you will see, some judges and scholars do not agree that judicial review is anti-democratic. Others think that it is, or at least can be, and suggest ways to eliminate or minimize the incompatibility between judicial review and democratic values. Still others take the position that that incompatibility is of no concern.

In the latter part of the 19th century and the first part of the 20th, the legitimacy issue did not dominate discussions of judicial review under the BNA Act. This is primarily because, in the overriding legal culture of that time, constitutional commentators either did not consider broader questions of "legitimacy," or were reluctant to say so. As well, commentators tended to be more willing to accept judicial statements at face value, for example, that courts were simply giving effect to constitutional text. That did not mean that those commentators never questioned court decisions; as you will see from the readings in Chapter 4 through Chapter 6, The 1930s: The Depression and the New Deal, some of them did, and with considerable vigour. It simply means that those criticisms did not explicitly challenge the legitimacy of those decisions.

In recent decades, a number of constitutional scholars have questioned the legitimacy of judicial review. One of them, Paul Weiler, author of In the Last Resort: A Critical Study of the Supreme Court of Canada (Toronto: Carswell/Methuen, 1974), went so far as to question whether the courts should ever intervene in division of powers disputes. In his view, such conflicts were better resolved through federal–provincial negotiations and the democratic process. Another scholar, Peter Hogg, author of Constitutional Law of Canada, 5th ed (Toronto: Thomson Carswell, 2007), was an advocate of judicial restraint, at least in federalism cases.

The legitimacy issue has featured more prominently in literature that relates to the Charter from the time it was first enacted—this is reflected in some of the readings in Chapter 16, The Advent of the Charter. It is also a recurring theme in many of the later, rights-focused chapters.

The special role of the courts in constitutional review is related to certain constitutional protections for the courts and the judiciary, in particular their independence, which is dealt with in Chapter 13, The Role of the Judiciary.

III. CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION

Important to any consideration of the legitimacy of judicial review is the question of how judges interpret a written constitution. In most cases the meaning of the relevant text is unclear. What sources can judges employ for guidance, and which ones do they in fact employ? These questions are explored throughout this book in the context of a broad range of readings, some taken from decisions rendered by the courts and others from scholarly commentary. An excerpt from a recent article by Robin Elliot provides a brief introduction to the subject, as do excerpts from the reasons for judgment of both the Supreme Court of Canada and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in a famous Canadian constitutional advisory opinion known as the "Persons" case, Edwards v Canada (AG), 1929 CanLII 438, [\[1929\] UKPC 86](#).

[In this article, Professor Elliot examines the increasing use by the Supreme Court of Canada of a kind of interpretive argument that has come to be called "structural argumentation," as well as some of the issues that that form of argumentation raises in the Canadian context. He provides a summary of six different forms of argumentation identified by American scholar Philip Bobbitt and suggests that all of them have been used at one time or another by Canadian courts. As you will see, each of these forms of argumentation relies on a different source of interpretive guidance. You will encounter most of the cases he refers to as you work your way through this casebook, and the citations have therefore been omitted.]

The first of these ... forms of argumentation is labelled historical. [H]istorical argumentation ... means "argument that marshals the intent of the draftsmen of the Constitution and the people who adopted the Constitution." This form of argumentation has been a good deal less popular in Canada than in the United States, where it forms the basis of a theory of judicial review, known as "originalism," to which a number of American constitutional scholars and at least one current member of the Supreme Court of the United States, Justice Scalia, subscribe. However, it is clearly a legitimate form of argumentation in this country as well, in relation to both the Constitution Act, 1867 and the Constitution Act, 1982. And while it generally is viewed as having little persuasive force, it can on occasion play quite a significant role in the resolution of disputes about the proper meaning to be given to a provision of the Constitution. For example, in R v. Prosper, the Supreme Court placed considerable weight on the fact that the drafters of the Charter chose not to constitutionalize a right to state-funded counsel under section 10 when it decided not to read such a right into section 10(b).

Textual argument comes next. This ... is "argument that is drawn from a consideration of the present sense of the words of the provision [in question]." Examples of its use in Canada are not difficult to find. One that comes quickly to mind is the interpretation given by the Privy Council in both the Radio Reference and the Labour Conventions Reference to section 132 of the Constitution Act, 1867, relating to the power of Parliament to implement treaty obligations. Because section 132 had been formulated in terms of the power to implement obligations towards foreign countries arising under treaties between the Empire and such foreign countries, the Privy Council was quick to hold that it had no application in relation to obligations undertaken towards foreign countries in treaties that Canada itself had entered into with those countries. Another more recent example is provided by Société des Acadiens v. Association of Parents, in which Beetz J for the majority of the Supreme Court held that the right in section 19(2) of the Charter to use either English or French in the courts of New Brunswick did not include the right to be understood in the language chosen.

Third comes doctrinal argument, or argument from previously decided cases, which is also clearly accepted in Canada. In fact, it is probably fair to say that it is the predominant form of argumentation here. Examples of it abound—there is the definition of section 91(2) [“regulation of trade and commerce”] of the Constitution Act, 1867 in Citizens Insurance v. Parsons, there is the analytical framework for freedom of expression cases under the Charter prescribed by Irwin Toy v. Quebec, and there is the analytical framework for section 1 of the Charter established in R v. Oakes, to name but three.

Next on the list comes prudential argument, or “argument about costs and benefits,” or simply “practical argument.” This is the form of argumentation that is used in the context of the final component of the proportionality test under section 1 of the Charter prescribed by Oakes, in which the question is in effect whether or not society loses more than it gains as a result of the impugned governmental action. But this form of argumentation can also be found in the federalism context, for example, in the tests devised in General Motors v. City National Leasing and R v. Crown Zellerbach respectively for the second branch of section 91(2) of the Constitution Act, 1867 and the national concern branch of Parliament’s residual power. In both of these tests, explicit consideration is given to the question of whether or not the legislative initiative is one that can be effectively pursued at the provincial level, or whether, by contrast, the initiative is one that can only be effectively undertaken at the national level. In other words, the court is concerned about how best the governmental task in question can be performed—the very stuff of practical or prudential argument.

The last of these other forms of argumentation ... is ethical argumentation ... [meaning] “constitutional argument whose force relies on a characterization of American institutions and the role within them of the American people”; elsewhere [Bobbitt describes it] as “an appeal to the American ethos: not necessarily what we are, but perhaps what we think we are, and thus how we think about ourselves and our society” This form of argumentation may be peculiarly American. But it is possible that it too finds at least some resonance within our jurisprudence. For example, the concern underlying the admonition in Chief Justice Dickson’s reasons for judgment in Edwards Books that, “in interpreting and applying the Charter I believe that the courts must be cautious to ensure that it does not simply become an instrument of better situated individuals to roll back legislation which has as its object the improvement of the condition of less advantaged persons,” can be said to be what we might like to think of as an important part of the Canadian ethos. This admonition has ... now been formalized in the principle that the courts in exercising their power of judicial review the Charter should show considerable deference to Parliament and the provincial legislatures when they [are asked to review] action that can be said to further the interests of vulnerable groups within Canadian society.

That brings us to structural argumentation. This form of argumentation ... is based on “inferences from the existence of constitutional structures and the relationships which the Constitution ordains among these structures.” “Structural arguments,” [Bobbit says], “are largely factless and depend on deceptively simple logical moves from the entire Constitutional text rather than from one of its parts.” [I]t is clearly accepted as a legitimate form of argumentation in [Canada]. [Emphasis in original.]

[Professor Elliot then examines the use of structural argumentation in the Canadian context. The two main examples he gives of cases in which this form of argumentation is used are Reference re Provincial Court Judges, [1997] 3 SCR 3, 1997 CanLII 317, in which the Court held that the true constitutional basis of the principle of judicial independence was the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867, and Reference re Secession of Quebec, in which the court invoked four of the organizing principles of our Constitution—federalism, democracy, the rule of law, and the protection of minorities—to resolve the issue of the constitutionality of secession by a province.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The American scholar Bobbitt argues that the six different forms of argumentation are the only viable forms of argumentation for purposes of determining the meaning of the American Constitution. From your admittedly early vantage point, does this seem plausible for a country like Canada? Or could there be other forms? What about arguments that are based on a particular community's collective memory of events that were foundational to its existence, such as an argument that Quebec is a distinct society within Canada in part because unique cultural and legal traditions have survived in Quebec despite the conquest of New France? Are such arguments historical or ethical? What is a court to do when the forms of argumentation yield conflicting answers, or when history is remembered differently by different communities? These questions are explored at greater length in Chapter 3, From Contact to Confederation.

2. Consider, as you read through the many decisions in this book, whether particular forms of argumentation feature more prominently in some historical periods than others, or in cases dealing with certain kinds of constitutional questions.

The excerpts below from the judgments of the Supreme Court of Canada and Privy Council in the Persons case provide a good opportunity to explore the differing approaches that courts and judges can take to the task of interpreting provisions of the Constitution. Some commentators view Lord Sankey's reasons for judgment in the Privy Council opinion as a dramatic departure from the approach to constitutional interpretation that had previously been taken by these two courts. That earlier approach, it is said, was grounded in the conviction that the BNA Act was no different from other statutes the Privy Council had to construe and should therefore be interpreted in the same way those other statutes were interpreted. See if you can find support for this view of Lord Sankey's judgment in his reasoning.

Reference re Meaning of the Word "Persons" in S.24 of the British North America Act, 1867

ANGLIN CJ (Mignault, Lamont, and Smith JJ concurring):

By Order of the 19th of October, 1927, made on a petition of five ladies, His Excellency the Governor in Council was pleased to refer to this court "for hearing and consideration" the question:

Does the word "Persons" in section 24 of the British North America Act, 1867 include female persons?

The British North America Act, 1867, does not contain provisions in regard to the Senate corresponding to its sections 41 and 52, which, respectively, empower the Parliament of Canada from time to time to alter the qualifications or disqualifications of persons to be elected to the House of Commons and to determine the number of members of which that House shall consist. Except in regard to the number of Senators required to constitute a quorum (s. 35), the provisions affecting the constitution of the Senate are subject to alteration only by the Imperial Parliament.

It should be observed that, while the question now submitted by His Excellency to the court deals with the word "Persons," section 24 of the BNA Act speaks only of "qualified Persons"; and the other sections empowering the Governor General to make appointments to the Senate (26 and 32) speak, respectively, of "qualified Persons" and of "fit and qualified Persons." The question which we have to consider, therefore, is whether "female persons" are qualified to be summoned to the Senate by the Governor General; or, in other words—Are women eligible for appointment to the Senate of Canada? ...

In considering this matter we are, of course, in no wise concerned with the desirability or the undesirability of the presence of women in the Senate, nor with any political aspect of the question submitted. Our whole duty is to construe, to the best of our ability, the relevant provisions of the BNA Act, 1867, and upon that construction to base our answer.

Passed in the year 1867, the various provisions of the BNA Act (as is the case with other statutes, Bank of Toronto v. Lambe (1887), 12 AC 575 at 579) bear to-day the same construction which the courts would, if then required to pass upon them, have given to them when they were first enacted. If the phrase "qualified persons" in s. 24 includes women to-day, it has so included them since 1867.

"In deciding the question before us," said Turner LJ, in Hawkins v. Gathercole (1855), 6 DeG M & G 1, 43 ER 1129, we have to construe not merely the words of the Act of Parliament but the intent of the Legislature as collected, from the cause and necessity of the Act being made, from a comparison of its several parts and from foreign (meaning extraneous) circumstances so far as they can be justly considered to throw light upon the subject.

Two well-known rules in the construction of statutes are that, where a statute is susceptible of more than one meaning, in the absence of express language an intention to abrogate the ordinary rules of law is not to be imputed to Parliament (Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (1876), 1 QBD 546 at 554); and, as they are framed for the guidance of the people, their language is to be considered in its ordinary and popular sense," per Byles J, in Chorlton v. Lings (1868), LR 4 CP 374.

Two outstanding facts or circumstances of importance bearing upon the present reference appear to be

- (a) that the office of Senator was a new office first created by the BNA Act.

It is an office, therefore, which no one apart from the enactments of the statute has an inherent or common law right of holding, and the right of any one to hold the office must be found within the four corners of the statute which creates the office, and enacts the conditions upon which it is to be held, and the persons who are entitled to hold it; (Beresford-Hope v. Sandhurst (1881), 131 Mass. 371, per Lord Coleridge CJ);

(b) that by the common law of England (as also, speaking generally, by the civil and the canon law: foeminae ab omnibus officiis civilibus vel publicis remotae sunt) women were under a legal incapacity to hold public office, referable to the fact (as Willes J said in Chorlton v. Lings), that in this country in modern times, chiefly out of respect to women, and a sense of decorum, and not from their want of intellect, or their being for any other such reason unfit to take part in the government of the country, they have been excused from taking any share in this department of public affairs.

The same very learned judge had said, at p. 388:

Women are under a legal incapacity to vote at elections. What was the cause of it, it is not necessary to go into: but, admitting that fickleness of judgment and liability to influence have sometimes been suggested as the ground of exclusion, I must protest against its being supposed to arise in this country from any underrating of the sex either in point of intellect or worth. That would be quite inconsistent with one of the glories of our civilization, the respect and honour in which women are held. This is not a mere fancy of my own, but will be found in Selden, de Synedriis Veterum Ebraeorum, in the discussion of the origin of the exclusion of women from judicial and like public functions, where the author gives preference to this reason, that the exemption was founded upon motives of decorum, and was a privilege of the sex (honestatis privilegium): Selden's Works, vol. 1, pp. 1083-1085. Selden refers to many systems of law in which this exclusion prevailed, including the civil law and the canon law, which latter, as we know, excluded women from public functions in some remarkable instances. With respect to the civil law, I may add a reference to the learned and original work of Sir Patrick Colquhon (sic) on the Roman Law, vol. 1, c. 580, where he compares the Roman system with ours, and states that a woman "cannot vote for members of parliament, or sit in either the House of Lords or Commons."

[Anglin CJ then cited further cases on women's common law legal incapacity.]

Prior to 1867 the common law legal incapacity of women to sit in Parliament had been fully recognized in the three provinces—Canada (Upper and Lower), Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, which were then confederated as the Dominion of Canada.

Moreover, paraphrasing an observation of Lord Coleridge CJ, in Beresford-Hope v. Sandhurst, supra at 370, it is not also perhaps to be entirely left out of sight, that in the sixty years which have run since 1867, the questions of the rights and privileges of women have not been, as in former times they were, asleep. On the contrary, we know as a matter of fact that the rights of women, and the privileges of women, have been much discussed, and able and acute minds have been much exercised as to what privileges ought to be conceded to women. That has been going on, and surely it is a significant fact, that never from 1867 to the present time has any woman ever sat in the Senate of Canada, nor has any suggestion of women's eligibility for appointment to that House until quite recently been publicly made.

Has the Imperial Parliament, in sections 23, 24, 25, 26 and 32 of the BNA Act, read in the light of other provisions of the statute and of relevant circumstances proper to be considered, given to women the capacity to exercise the public functions of a Senator? Has it made clear its intent to effect, so far as the personnel of the Senate of Canada is concerned, the striking constitutional departure from the common law for which the petitioners contend, which would have rendered women eligible for appointment to the Senate at a time when they were neither qualified to sit in the House of Commons nor to vote for candidates for membership in that House? Has it not rather by clear implication, if not expressly, excluded them from membership in the Senate? Such an extraordinary privilege is not conferred furtively, nor is the purpose to grant it to be gathered from remote conjectures deduced from a skilful piecing together of expressions in a statute which are more or less precisely accurate. (Nairn v. University of St. Andrews, [1909] AC 147 to 161.) When Parliament contemplates such a decided innovation it is never at a loss for language to make its intention unmistakable. "A judgment," said Lord Robertson in the case last mentioned, at pp. 165-6 is wholesome and of good example which puts forward subject-matter and fundamental constitutional law as guides of construction never to be neglected in favour of verbal possibilities.

There can be no doubt that the word "persons" when standing alone prima facie includes women. (Per Loreburn LC, Nairn v. University of St. Andrews.) It connotes human beings—the criminal and the insane equally with the good and the wise citizen, the minor as well as the adult. Hence the propriety of the restriction placed upon it by the immediately preceding word "qualified" in ss. 24 and 26 and the words "fit and qualified" in s. 32, which exclude the criminal and the lunatic or imbecile as well as the minor, who is explicitly disqualified by s. 23(1). Does this requirement of qualification also exclude women?

[In answering his question, Anglin CJ went on to deal with the rule of statutory interpretation found in Lord Brougham's Act, 1850, 13 & 14 Vict c 21, where s 4 read as follows: "Be it enacted that in all Acts words importing the Masculine Gender shall be deemed and taken to include Females, and the Singular to include the Plural, and the Plural the Singular, unless the contrary as to Gender or Number is expressly provided."]

"Persons" is not a "word importing the masculine gender." Therefore, ex facie, Lord Brougham's Act has no application to it. It is urged, however, that that statute so affects the word "Senator" and the pronouns "he" and "his" in s. 23 that they must be "deemed and taken to include Females," "the contrary" not being "expressly provided."

The application and purview of Lord Brougham's Act came up for consideration in Chorlton v. Lings, supra, where the Court of Common Pleas was required to construe a statute (passed, like the British North America Act, in 1867) which conferred the parliamentary franchise on "every man" possessing certain qualifications and registered as a voter. The chief question discussed was whether, by virtue of Lord Brougham's Act, "every man" included "women." Holding that "women" were "subject to a legal incapacity from voting at the election of members of Parliament," the court unanimously decided that the word "man" in the statute did not include a "woman." Having regard to the subject-matter of the statute and its general scope and language and to the important and striking nature of the departure from the common law involved in extending the franchise to women, Bovill CJ declined to accept the view that Parliament had made that change by using the term "man" and held that this word was intentionally used expressly to designate the male sex; and that it amounts to an express enactment and provision that every man, as distinguished from women, possessing the qualification, is to have the franchise. In that view, Lord Brougham's Act does not apply to the present case, and does not extend the meaning of the word "man" so as to include "women." (386-87)

In our opinion Chorlton v. Lings is conclusive against the petitioners alike on the question of the common law incapacity of women to exercise such public functions as those of a member of the Senate of Canada and on that of their being expressly excluded from the class of "qualified persons" within s. 24 of the BNA Act by the terms in which s. 23 is couched (New South Wales Taxation Commissioners v. Palmer, [1907] AC 179 at 184), so that Lord Brougham's Act cannot be invoked to extend those terms to bring "women" within their purview.

We are, for these reasons, of the opinion that women are not eligible for appointment by the Governor General to the Senate of Canada under s. 24 of the British North America Act, 1867, because they are not "qualified persons" within the meaning of that section. The question submitted, understood as above indicated, will, accordingly, be answered in the negative.

[Duff J delivered a concurring judgment in which he rejected the idea that the common law disabilities of women established a rule of interpretation for the BNA Act. He found that the language of the Act as a whole did not give rise to a general presumption that the legislative and executive powers it conferred should be interpreted to preclude women from public office, but rather that they be interpreted to provide for adaptation over time. He reasoned, for example, that once women had been allowed to sit in the House of Commons, the principle of responsible government would require that the term "persons" in s 11 of the Act dealing with the constitution of the Privy Council—that is, the Cabinet—be interpreted to include women. He concluded, however, that the provisions in the BNA Act with respect to the Senate were intended to create a chamber whose constitution would in all respects be fixed and determined by the Act itself. Hence the rules for appointment would not be open to adaptation over time, and women were ineligible for appointment.]

Edwards v Canada (AG)

1929 CanLII 438, [1929] UKPC 86 [The Persons Case]

LORD SANKEY LC:

By s. 24 of the B.N.A. Act, 1867, it is provided that "The Governor General shall from time to time, in the Queen's name, by instrument under the Great Seal of Canada, summon qualified persons to the Senate; and, subject to the provisions of this Act, every person so summoned shall become and be a member of the Senate and a senator."

The question at issue in this appeal is whether the words "qualified persons" in that section include a woman, and consequently whether women are eligible to be summoned to and become members of the Senate of Canada.

Of the appellants, Henrietta Muir Edwards is the Vice-President for the Province of Alberta of the National Council of Women for Canada; Nellie L. McClung and Louise C. McKinney were for several years members of the Legislative Assembly of the said Province; Emily F. Murphy is a police magistrate in and for the said Province; and Irene Parlby is a member of the Legislative Assembly of the said Province and a member of the Executive Council thereof.

Their Lordships are of opinion that the word "persons" in s. 24 does include women, and that women are eligible to be summoned to and become members of the Senate of Canada.

In coming to a determination as to the meaning of a particular word in a particular Act of Parliament it is permissible to consider two points—viz.: (i) The external evidence derived from extraneous circumstances such as previous legislation and decided cases. (ii) The internal evidence derived from the Act itself. As the learned counsel on both sides have made great researches and invited their Lordships to consider the legal position of women from the earliest times, in justice to their argument they propose to do so and accordingly turn to the first of the above points—viz.: (i) The external evidence derived from extraneous circumstances.

[Lord Sankey then reviewed the history of the exclusion of women from public offices from before the time of the Roman Empire through to the early part of the 20th century. In the course of this review, he noted that the courts in England had recently held that women were not entitled either to sit in the House of Lords or to become barristers or solicitors.]

The passing of Lord Brougham's Act in 1850 does not appear to have greatly affected the current of authority. Section 4 provided that in all acts words importing the masculine gender shall be deemed and taken to include female unless the contrary as to gender is expressly provided.

The application and purview of that Act came up for consideration in Chorlton v. Lings (1868), LR 4 CP 374, where the Court of Common Pleas was required to construe a statute passed in 1861, which conferred the parliamentary franchise on every man possessing certain qualifications and registered as a voter. The chief question discussed was whether by virtue of Lord Brougham's Act the words "every man" included women. Bovill CJ, having regard to the subject-matter of the statute and its general scope and language and to the important and striking nature of the departure from the common law involved in extending the franchise to women, declined to accept the view that Parliament had made that change by using the term "man" and held that the word was intentionally used expressly to designate the male sex. Willes J said: "It is not easy to conceive that the framer of that Act, when he used the word 'expressly,' meant to suggest that what is necessarily or properly implied by language is not expressed by such language."

Great reliance was placed by the respondents to this appeal upon that decision, but in our view it is clearly distinguishable.

The case was decided on the language of the Representation of the People Act, 1867, which provided that "every man" with certain qualifications and "not subject to any legal incapacity" should be entitled to be registered as a voter. Legal incapacity was not defined by the Act, and consequently reference was necessary to the common law disabilities of women.

No doubt in any code where women were expressly excluded from public office the problem would present no difficulty, but where instead of such exclusion those entitled to be summoned to or placed in public office are described under the word "person" different considerations arise.

The word is ambiguous, and in its original meaning would undoubtedly embrace members of either sex. On the other hand, supposing in an Act of Parliament several centuries ago it had been enacted that any person should be entitled to be elected to a particular office it would have been understood that the word only referred to males, but the cause of this was not because the word "person" could not include females but because at common law a woman was incapable of serving a public office. The fact that no woman had served or has claimed to serve such an office is not of great weight when it is remembered that custom would have prevented the claim being made or the point being contested.

Customs are apt to develop into traditions which are stronger than law and remain unchallenged long after the reason for them has disappeared.

The appeal to history therefore in this particular matter is not conclusive.

As far back as Stradling v. Morgan (1560), 75 ER 305 it was laid down that extraneous circumstances may be admitted as an aid to the interpretation of a statute, and in Herron v. Rathmines and Rathgar Improvement Commissioners, [1892] AC 498 Lord Halsbury LC said: "The subject matter with which the legislature was dealing, and the facts existing at the time with respect to which the legislature was legislating, are legitimate topics to consider in ascertaining what was the object and purpose of the legislature in passing the Act," but the argument must not be pushed too far, and their Lordships are disposed to agree with Farwell LJ in Rex v. West Riding of Yorkshire County Council, [1906] 2 KB 676, "although it may, perhaps, be legitimate to call history in aid to show what facts existed to bring about a statute, the inferences to be drawn therefrom are extremely slight"; see Craies, Statute Law, 3d ed., p. 118.

Over and above that, their Lordships do not think it right to apply rigidly to Canada of to-day the decisions and the reasons therefor which commended themselves, probably rightly, to those who had to apply the law in different circumstances, in different centuries, to countries in different stages of development. Referring therefore to the judgment of the Chief Justice and those who agreed with him, their Lordships think that the appeal to Roman law and to early English decisions is not of itself a secure foundation on which to build the interpretation of the B.N.A. Act of 1867.

Their Lordships now turn to the second point—namely, (ii) the internal evidence derived from the Act itself.

Before discussing the various sections they think it necessary to refer to the circumstances which led up to the passing of the Act.

The communities included within the Britannic system embrace countries and peoples in every stage of social, political and economic development and undergoing a continuous process of evolution.

His Majesty the King in Council is the final Court of Appeal from all these communities, and this Board must take great care therefore not to interpret legislation meant to apply to one community by a rigid adherence to the customs and traditions of another. ...

The B.N.A. Act planted in Canada a living tree capable of growth and expansion within its natural limits. The object of the Act was to grant a Constitution to Canada. "Like all written constitutions it has been subject to development through usage and convention". Canadian Constitutional Studies, Sir Robert Borden (1922), p. 55.

Their Lordships do not conceive it to be the duty of this Board—it is certainly not their desire—to cut down the provisions of the Act by a narrow and technical construction, but rather to give it a large and liberal interpretation so that the Dominion to a great extent, but within certain fixed limits, may be mistress in her own house, as the Provinces to a great extent, but within certain fixed limits, are mistresses in theirs. "The Privy Council, indeed, has laid down that Courts of law must treat the provisions of the British North America Act by the same methods of construction and exposition which they apply to other statutes. But there are statutes and statutes; and the strict construction deemed proper in the case, for example, of a penal or taxing statute or one passed to regulate the affairs of an English parish, would be often subversive of Parliament's real intent if applied to an Act passed to ensure the peace, order and good government of a British Colony": see Clement's Canadian Constitution, 3d ed., p. 347.

The author of that treatise quotes from the argument of Mr. Mowat and Mr. Edward Blake before the Privy Council in St. Catherine's Milling and Lumber Co. v. The Queen (1888), 14 AC 46 at 50: "That Act should be on all occasions interpreted in a large, liberal and comprehensive spirit, considering the magnitude of the subjects with which it purports to deal in very few words." With that their Lordships agree, but as was said by the Lord Chancellor in Brophy v. Attorney-General of Manitoba, [1895] AC 202, the question is not what may be supposed to have been intended, but what has been said.

It must be remembered, too, that their Lordships are not here considering the question of the legislative competence either of the Dominion or its Provinces which arise under ss. 91 and 92 of the Act providing for the distribution of legislative powers and assigning to the Dominion and its Provinces their respective spheres of Government. Their Lordships are concerned with the interpretation of an Imperial Act, but an Imperial Act which creates a constitution for a new country. Nor are their Lordships deciding any question as to the rights of women but only a question as to their eligibility for a particular position. No one, either male or female, has a right to be summoned to the Senate. The real point at issue is whether the Governor General has a right to summon women to the Senate.

Such being the general analysis of the Act, their Lordships turn to the special sections dealing with the Senate.

It will be observed that s. 21 provides that the Senate shall consist of seventy-two members, who shall be styled senators. The word "member" is not in ordinary English confined to male persons. Sect. 24 provides that the Governor General shall summon qualified persons to the Senate.

As already pointed out, "persons" is not confined to members of the male sex, but what effect does the adjective "qualified" before the word "persons" have?

In their Lordship's view it refers back to the previous section, which contains the qualifications of a senator.

Their Lordships agree with Duff J when he says; "I attach no importance to the use of the masculine personal pronoun in s. 23 ..." and refer to s. 1 of the Interpretation Act, 1889, which in s. 1, sub-s. 2, provides that words importing the masculine gender shall include females.

The reasoning of the Chief Justice would compel their Lordships to hold that the word "persons" as used in s. 11 relating to the constitution of the Privy Council for Canada was limited to "male persons," with the resultant anomaly that a woman might be elected a member of the House of Commons but could not even then be summoned by the Governor General as a member of the Privy Council.

Looking at the sections which deal with the Senate as a whole (ss. 21-36) their Lordships are unable to say that there is anything in those sections themselves upon which the Court could come to a definite conclusion that women are to be excluded from the Senate.

So far with regard to the sections dealing especially with the Senate—are there any other sections in the Act which shed light upon the meaning of the word "persons"?

Their Lordships think that there are. For example, s. 41 refers to the qualifications and disqualifications of persons to be elected or to sit or vote as members of the House of Assembly or Legislative Assembly, and by a proviso it is said that until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides at any election for a member of the House of Commons for the district of Algoma in addition to persons qualified by the law of the Province of Canada to vote every male British subject aged twenty-one or upwards being a householder shall have a vote. This section shows a distinction between "persons" and "males." If persons excluded females it would only have been necessary to say every person who is a British subject aged twenty-one years or upwards shall have a vote.

Again in s. 84, referring to Ontario and Quebec, a similar proviso is found stating that every male British subject in contradistinction to "person" shall have a vote.

Again in s. 133 it is provided that either the English or the French language may be used by any person or in any pleadings in or issuing from any court of Canada established under this Act and in or from all of any of the courts of Quebec. The word "person" there must include females, as it can hardly have been supposed that a man might use either the English or the French language but a woman might not.

If Parliament had intended to limit the word "persons" in s. 24 to male persons it would surely have manifested such intention by an express limitation, as it has done in ss. 41 and 84. The fact that certain qualifications are set out in s. 23 is not an argument in favour of further limiting the class, but is an argument to the contrary, because it must be presumed that Parliament has set out in s. 23 all the qualifications deemed necessary for a senator, and it does not state that one of the qualifications is that he must be a member of the male sex.

A heavy burden lies on an appellant who seeks to set aside a unanimous judgment of the Supreme Court, and this Board will only set aside such a decision after convincing argument and anxious consideration, but having regard: (1) To the object of the Act—namely, to provide a constitution for Canada, a responsible and developing State; (2) that the word "person" is ambiguous, and may include members of either sex; (3) that there are sections in the Act above referred to which show that in some cases the word "person" must include females; (4) that in some sections the words "male persons" are expressly used when it is desired to confine the matter in issue to males; and (5) to the provisions of the Interpretation Act; their Lordships have come to the conclusion that the word "persons" in s. 24 includes members both of the male and female sex, and that, therefore, the question propounded by the Governor General should be answered in the affirmative, and that women are eligible to be summoned to and become members of the Senate of Canada, and they will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

NOTES

1. As one scholar notes:

In its own time, academic discussion of the reference was uniformly negative. British scholar Berriedale Keith said that "no decision of the Privy Council is probably harder to defend as sound in law." GF Henderson was equally cutting, charging that the case was "not written in strict accordance with well understood legal principles"; that the federal government had manipulated the situation to secure its preferred outcome; and that the JCPC had by "judicial legislation ... altered the constitution of the Senate of Canada."

See Carissima Mathen, Courts Without Cases: The Law and Politics of Advisory Opinions (Oxford: Hart, 2019) at 136.

Does this criticism seem well-founded? What might explain it?

2. The procedure by which the Persons case got to court was the reference, a procedure often used in Canada in constitutional litigation. That procedure is invoked in two ways: when the federal Cabinet refers a question to the Supreme Court of Canada for an opinion; or a provincial Cabinet sends a question to the provincial Court of Appeal, which can then be further appealed to the Supreme Court. The reference power is discussed in Chapter 13.

3. The approach to constitutional interpretation taken by Lord Sankey in the Persons case has not always prevailed in Canadian constitutional law. As we noted in Chapter 1, Introduction, there is a real tension between the desire for stability and the desire for change in constitutional interpretation. While the Privy Council spoke of a “living tree” in Persons, a few years later it emphasized the value of stability in the following passage from Canada (AG) / Ontario (AG), [\[1937\] CanLII 362, \[1937\] AC 326 at 684 \(UKJCPC\)](#) [Labour Conventions]:

While the ship of state now sails on larger ventures and into foreign waters she still retains the watertight compartments which are an essential part of her original structure.

As you proceed through the cases in this book, the tensions between stability and change—between a “living tree” and “watertight compartments”—will emerge regularly, whether in disputes about federalism or the interpretation of the Charter. For a more recent discussion of the role of “original intent” in interpreting the division of powers in ss 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867, 30 & 31 Vict c 3, see Reference re Employment Insurance Act (Can), ss 22 and 23, 2005 SCC 56, in Chapter 8, Interpreting the Division of Powers. With respect to the interpretation of the Charter, see Chapter 17, The Framework of the Charter.

4. A detailed examination of the Persons case can be found in Robert J Sharpe & Patricia I McMahon, The Persons Case: The Origins and Legacy of the Fight for Legal Personhood (Toronto: University of Toronto Press for the Osgoode Society for Canadian Legal History, 2007).

The next excerpt is from a paradigm-shifting 1998 advisory opinion called the Secession Reference. As you will see, the opinion reflects a number of the issues discussed in Chapter 1. As you read it, consider how the Court engages in constitutional interpretation. Which approaches are most prominent?

THE COURT (Lamer CJ and L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin, Iacobucci, Major, Bastarache, and Binnie JJ):

[After some introductory comments, the Court listed the three reference questions put to it:

1. Under the Constitution of Canada, can the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally?
2. Does international law give the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec the right to effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally? In this regard, is there a right to self-determination under international law that would give the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec the right to effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally?
3. In the event of a conflict between domestic and international law on the right of the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec to effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally, which would take precedence in Canada?

The following excerpt deals with the principles used to answer these questions.]

(1) Introduction

[32] As we confirmed in Reference re Objection by Quebec to a Resolution to amend the Constitution, [[1982] 2 SCR 793, 1998 CanLII 793], at p. 806, "The Constitution Act, 1982 is now in force. Its legality is neither challenged nor assailable." The "Constitution of Canada" certainly includes the constitutional texts enumerated in s. 52(2) of the Constitution Act, 1982. Although these texts have a primary place in determining constitutional rules, they are not exhaustive. The Constitution also "embraces unwritten, as well as written rules," as we recently observed in the Provincial Judges Reference [Reference re Remuneration of Judges of the Prov Court of PEI; Ref re Independence and Impartiality of Judges of the Prov Court of PEI, [[1997] 3 SCR 3, 1997 CanLII 317] at para. 92. Finally, as was said in the Patriation Reference [Re: Resolution to amend the Constitution, [1981] 1 SCR 753, 1981 CanLII 25] at p. 874, the Constitution of Canada includes the global system of rules and principles which govern the exercise of constitutional authority in the whole and in every part of the Canadian state.

... In our view, there are four fundamental and organizing principles of the Constitution which are relevant to addressing the question before us (although this enumeration is by no means exhaustive): federalism; democracy; constitutionalism and the rule of law; and respect for minorities. ...

(2) Historical Context: The Significance of Confederation

[33] In our constitutional tradition, legality and legitimacy are linked. ...

[34] Because this Reference deals with questions fundamental to the nature of Canada, ... it is necessary to review the context in which the Canadian union has evolved. To this end, we will briefly describe the legal evolution of the Constitution and the foundational principles governing constitutional amendments. Our purpose is not to be exhaustive, but to highlight the features most relevant in the context of this Reference.

[35] Confederation was an initiative of elected representatives of the people then living in the colonies scattered across part of what is now Canada. ...

[36] ... On September 1, 1864, 23 delegates (five from New Brunswick, five from Nova Scotia, five from Prince Edward Island, and eight from the Province of Canada) met in Charlottetown. After five days of discussion, the delegates reached agreement on a plan for federal union.

[37] The salient aspects of the agreement may be briefly outlined. There was to be a federal union featuring a bicameral central legislature. Representation in the Lower House was to be based on population, whereas in the Upper House it was to be based on regional equality, the regions comprising Canada East, Canada West and the Maritimes. The significance of the adoption of a federal form of government cannot be exaggerated. Without it, neither the agreement of the delegates from Canada East nor that of the delegates from the maritime colonies could have been obtained.

[38] Several matters remained to be resolved, and so the Charlottetown delegates agreed to meet again at Quebec in October, and to invite Newfoundland to send a delegation to join them. ... Thirty-three delegates ... approved 72 resolutions, addressing almost all of what subsequently made its way into the final text of the Constitution Act, 1867. ...

[39] Legally, there remained only the requirement to have the Quebec Resolutions put into proper form and passed by the Imperial Parliament in London. However, politically, it was thought that more was required. Indeed, Resolution 70 provided that "The Sanction of the Imperial and Local Parliaments shall be sought for the Union of the Provinces, on the principles adopted by the Conference." (Cited in J. Pope, ed., Confederation: Being a Series of Hitherto Unpublished Documents Bearing on the British North America Act (1895), at p. 52 (emphasis added).)

[41] Sixteen delegates ... met in London in December 1866 to finalize the plan for Confederation. To this end, they agreed to some slight modifications and additions to the Quebec Resolutions. Minor changes were made to the distribution of powers, provision was made for the appointment of extra senators in the event of a deadlock between the House of Commons and the Senate, and certain religious minorities were given the right to appeal to the federal government where their denominational school rights were adversely affected by provincial legislation. The British North America Bill ... was proclaimed on July 1, 1867. The Dominion of Canada thus became a reality.

[42] There was an early attempt at secession. In the first Dominion election in September 1867, Premier Tupper's forces were decimated: members opposed to Confederation won 18 of Nova Scotia's 19 federal seats, and in the simultaneous provincial election, 36 of the 38 seats in the provincial legislature. Newly-elected Premier Joseph Howe [sought] to undo the new constitutional arrangements, but it was too late. The Colonial Office rejected Premier Howe's plea to permit Nova Scotia to withdraw from Confederation. As the Colonial Secretary wrote in 1868:

The neighbouring province of New Brunswick has entered into the union in reliance on having with it the sister province of Nova Scotia; and vast obligations, political and commercial, have already been contracted on the faith of a measure so long discussed and so solemnly adopted. ... I trust that the Assembly and the people of Nova Scotia will not be surprised that the Queen's government feel that they would not be warranted in advising the reversal of a great measure of state, attended by so many extensive consequences already in operation. ...

(Quoted in H. Wade MacLauchlan, "Accounting for Democracy and the Rule of Law in the Quebec Secession Reference" (1997), 76 Can. Bar Rev. 155, at p. 168.)

The interdependence characterized by "vast obligations, political and commercial," referred to by the Colonial Secretary in 1868, has, of course, multiplied immeasurably in the last 130 years.

[43] Federalism was a legal response to the underlying political and cultural realities that existed at Confederation and continue to exist today. At Confederation, political leaders told their respective communities that the Canadian union would be able to reconcile diversity with unity. ... The Constitution Act, 1867 was an act of nation-building. It was the first step in the transition from colonies separately dependent on the Imperial Parliament for their governance to a unified and independent political state in which different peoples could resolve their disagreements and work together toward common goals and a common interest. ...

[44] A federal–provincial division of powers necessitated a written constitution which circumscribed the powers of the new Dominion and Provinces of Canada.

[46] Canada's evolution from colony to fully independent state was gradual. ... The proclamation of the Constitution Act, 1982 removed the last vestige of British authority over the Canadian Constitution and re-affirmed Canada's commitment to the protection of its minority, aboriginal, equality, legal and language rights, and fundamental freedoms as set out in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

[47] Legal continuity, which requires an orderly transfer of authority, necessitated that the 1982 amendments be made by the Westminster Parliament, but the legitimacy ... derived from political decisions taken in Canada It should be noted, parenthetically, that the 1982 amendments did not alter the basic division of powers in ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867... . It did, however, have the important effect that, despite the refusal of the government of Quebec to join in its adoption, Quebec has become bound to the terms of a Constitution

[48] ... We now turn to a discussion of the general constitutional principles that bear on the present Reference.

(3) Analysis of the Constitutional Principles

(a) Nature of the Principles

[49] ... Behind the written word [of the Constitution] is an historical lineage stretching back through the ages, which aids in the consideration of the underlying constitutional principles. These principles ... are the vital unstated assumptions upon which the text is based. [The ...] four foundational constitutional principles that are most germane for resolution of this Reference [are] federalism, democracy, constitutionalism and the rule of law, and respect for minority rights. These defining principles function in symbiosis. No single principle can be defined in isolation from the others, nor does any one principle trump or exclude the operation of any other.

[50] Our Constitution has an internal architecture The individual elements of the Constitution are linked to the others, and must be interpreted by reference to the structure of the Constitution as a whole. As we recently emphasized in the Provincial Judges Reference, certain underlying principles infuse our Constitution and breathe life into it. Speaking of the rule of law principle in the Manitoba Language Rights Reference, supra, at p. 750, we held that "the principle is clearly implicit in the very nature of a Constitution." The same may be said of the other three constitutional principles we underscore today.

[51] Although these underlying principles are not explicitly made part of the Constitution by any written provision, other than in some respects by the oblique reference in the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867, it would be impossible to conceive of our constitutional structure without them. The principles dictate major elements of the architecture of the Constitution itself and are as such its lifeblood.

[52] The principles assist in the interpretation of the text and the delineation of spheres of jurisdiction, the scope of rights and obligations, and the role of our political institutions. Equally important, observance of and respect for these principles is essential to the ongoing process of constitutional development and evolution of our Constitution as a "living tree," to invoke the famous description in Edwards v. Attorney-General for Canada [1929] CanLII 438, [1929] UKPC 86], at p. 136.

[53] Given the existence of these underlying constitutional principles, what use may the Court make of them? In the Provincial Judges Reference, supra, at paras. 93 and 104, we cautioned that the recognition of these constitutional principles ... could not be taken as an invitation to dispense with the written text of the Constitution. On the contrary, we confirmed that there are compelling reasons to insist upon the primacy of our written constitution. A written constitution promotes legal certainty and predictability, and it provides a foundation and a touchstone for the exercise of constitutional judicial review. However, we also observed ... that the effect of the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867 was to incorporate certain constitutional principles by reference, [and that it] "invites the courts to turn those principles into the premises of a constitutional argument that culminates in the filling of gaps in the express terms of the constitutional text."

[54] Underlying constitutional principles may in certain circumstances give rise to substantive legal obligations The principles are not merely descriptive, but are also invested with a powerful normative force, and are binding upon both courts and governments. "In other words," as this Court confirmed in the Manitoba Language Rights Reference, supra, at p. 752, "in the process of Constitutional adjudication, the Court may have regard to unwritten postulates which form the very foundation of the Constitution of Canada." It is to a discussion of those underlying constitutional principles that we now turn.

[55] It is undisputed that Canada is a federal state. Yet many commentators have observed that, according to the precise terms of the Constitution Act, 1867, the federal system was only partial. ... This was so because, on paper, the federal government retained sweeping powers which threatened to undermine the autonomy of the provinces. Here again, however, a review of the written provisions of the Constitution does not provide the entire picture. Our political and constitutional practice has adhered to an underlying principle of federalism, and has interpreted the written provisions of the Constitution in this light. For example, although the federal power of disallowance was included in the Constitution Act, 1867, the underlying principle of federalism triumphed early. Many constitutional scholars contend that the federal power of disallowance has been abandoned

[56] In a federal system of government such as ours, political power is shared by ... the federal government on the one hand, and the provinces on the other. Each is assigned respective spheres of jurisdiction by the Constitution Act, 1867. ... It is up to the courts "to control the limits of the respective sovereignties." ... In interpreting our Constitution, the courts have always been concerned with the federalism principle, inherent in the structure of our constitutional arrangements, which has from the beginning been the lodestar by which the courts have been guided.

[57] This underlying principle of federalism, then, has exercised a role of considerable importance in the interpretation of the written provisions of our Constitution. In the Patriation Reference, supra, at pp. 905-9, we confirmed that the principle of federalism runs through the political and legal systems of Canada. Indeed, Martland and Ritchie JJ, dissenting in the Patriation Reference, at p. 821, considered federalism to be "the dominant principle of Canadian constitutional law." With the enactment of the Charter, that proposition may have less force than it once did, but there can be little doubt that the principle of federalism remains a central organizational theme of our Constitution. ...

[58] The principle of federalism recognizes the diversity of the component parts of Confederation, and the autonomy of provincial governments to develop their societies within their respective spheres of jurisdiction. The federal structure of our country also facilitates democratic participation by distributing power to the government thought to be most suited to achieving the particular societal objective having regard to this diversity. The scheme of the Constitution Act, 1867, it was said in Re the Initiative and Referendum Act, [1919] CanLII 426, [1919] AC 935 (UKJCPC) at p. 942, was not to weld the Provinces into one, nor to subordinate Provincial Governments to a central authority, but to establish a central government in which these Provinces should be represented, entrusted with exclusive authority only in affairs in which they had a common interest. Subject to this each Province was to retain its independence and autonomy and to be directly under the Crown as its head.

More recently, in Haig v. Canada [[1993] 2 SCR 995, 1993 CanLII 58], at p. 1047, the majority of this Court held that differences between provinces "are a rational part of the political reality in the federal process." It was referring to the differential application of federal law in individual provinces, but the point applies more generally. ...

[59] The principle of federalism facilitates the pursuit of collective goals by cultural and linguistic minorities

[61] Democracy is a fundamental value in our constitutional law and political culture. While it has both an institutional and an individual aspect, the democratic principle was also argued before us in the sense of the supremacy of the sovereign will of a people, in this case potentially to be expressed by Quebecers in support of unilateral secession. It is useful to explore in a summary way these different aspects of the democratic principle.

[62] The principle of democracy has always informed the design of our constitutional structure, and continues to act as an essential interpretive consideration to this day. A majority of this Court in OPSEU v. Ontario, supra, at p. 57, confirmed that "the basic structure of our Constitution, as established by the Constitution Act, 1867, contemplates the existence of certain political institutions, including freely elected legislative bodies at the federal and provincial levels." As is apparent from an earlier line of decisions emanating from this Court, including Switzman v. Elbling [[1957] SCR 285, 1957 CanLII 2], Saumur v. City of Quebec [1953] 2 SCR 299, 1953 CanLII 3], Boucher v. The King [[1951] SCR 265, 1950 CanLII 2], and Reference re Alberta Statutes [[1938] SCR 100, 1938 CanLII 1], the democracy principle can best be understood as a sort of baseline against which the framers of our Constitution, and subsequently, our elected representatives under it, have always operated. It is perhaps for this reason that the principle was not explicitly identified in the text of the Constitution Act, 1867 itself. To have done so might have appeared redundant, even silly, to the framers. ... [I]t is evident that our Constitution contemplates that Canada shall be a constitutional democracy. Yet this merely demonstrates the importance of underlying constitutional principles that are nowhere explicitly described in our constitutional texts. The representative and democratic nature of our political institutions was simply assumed.

[63] Democracy is commonly understood as being a political system of majority rule. It is essential to be clear what this means. The evolution of our democratic tradition can be traced back to the Magna Carta (1215) and before, through the long struggle for Parliamentary supremacy which culminated in the English Bill of Rights of 1689, the emergence of representative political institutions in the colonial era, the development of responsible government in the 19th century, and eventually, the achievement of Confederation itself in 1867. "[T]he Canadian tradition," the majority of this Court held in Reference re Provincial Electoral Boundaries (Sask.) [[1991] 2 SCR 158, 1991 CanLII 61], at p. 186, is "one of evolutionary democracy moving in uneven steps toward the goal of universal suffrage and more effective representation." Since Confederation, efforts to extend the franchise to those unjustly excluded from participation in our political system—such as women, minorities, and aboriginal peoples—have continued, with some success, to the present day.

[64] Democracy is not simply concerned with the process of government. On the contrary, ... democracy is fundamentally connected to substantive goals, most importantly, the promotion of self-government. Democracy accommodates cultural and group identities: Reference re Provincial Electoral Boundaries, at p. 188. Put another way, a sovereign people exercises its right to self-government through the democratic process. In considering the scope and purpose of the Charter, the Court in R v. Oakes [[1986] 1 SCR 103, 1986 CanLII 46], articulated some of the values inherent in the notion of democracy (at p. 136):

The Court must be guided by the values and principles essential to a free and democratic society which I believe to embody, to name but a few, respect for the inherent dignity of the human person, commitment to social justice and equality, accommodation of a wide variety of beliefs, respect for cultural and group identity, and faith in social and political institutions which enhance the participation of individuals and groups in society.

[65] In institutional terms, democracy means that each of the provincial legislatures and the federal Parliament is elected by popular franchise. ... In individual terms, the right to vote in elections to the House of Commons and the provincial legislatures, and to be candidates in those elections, is guaranteed to "Every citizen of Canada" by virtue of s. 3 of the Charter. ... In addition, the effect of s. 4 of the Charter is to oblige the House of Commons and the provincial legislatures to hold regular elections and to permit citizens to elect representatives to their political institutions. The democratic principle is affirmed with particular clarity in that s. 4 is not subject to the notwithstanding power contained in s. 33.

[66] It is, of course, true that democracy expresses the sovereign will of the people. Yet this expression, too, must be taken in the context of the other institutional values we have identified as pertinent to this Reference. The relationship between democracy and federalism means, for example, that in Canada there may be different and equally legitimate majorities in different provinces and territories and at the federal level. No one majority is more or less "legitimate" than the others A federal system of government enables different provinces to pursue policies responsive to the particular concerns and interests of people in that province. At the same time, Canada as a whole is also a democratic community in which citizens construct and achieve goals on a national scale The function of federalism is to enable citizens to participate concurrently in different collectivities and to pursue goals at both a provincial and a federal level.

[67] The consent of the governed is a value that is basic to our understanding of a free and democratic society. Yet democracy in any real sense of the word cannot exist without the rule of law. It is the law that creates the framework within which the "sovereign will" is to be ascertained and implemented. To be accorded legitimacy, democratic institutions must rest, ultimately, on a legal foundation. That is, they must allow for the participation of, and accountability to, the people, through public institutions created under the Constitution. Equally, however, a system of government cannot survive through adherence to the law alone. A political system must also possess legitimacy, and in our political culture, that requires an interaction between the rule of law and the democratic principle. The system must be capable of reflecting the aspirations of the people. But there is more. Our law's claim to legitimacy also rests on an appeal to moral values, many of which are imbedded in our constitutional structure. It would be a grave mistake to equate legitimacy with the "sovereign will" or majority rule alone, to the exclusion of other constitutional values.

[68] Finally, we highlight that a functioning democracy requires a continuous process of discussion. The Constitution mandates government by democratic legislatures, and an executive accountable to them, 'resting ultimately on public opinion reached by discussion and the interplay of ideas' (Saumur v. City of Quebec, supra, at p. 330). ... No one has a monopoly on truth, and our system is predicated on the faith that in the marketplace of ideas, the best solutions to public problems will rise to the top Inevitably, there will be dissenting voices. A democratic system of government is committed to considering those dissenting voices, and seeking to acknowledge and address those voices in the laws by which all in the community must live.

[69] The Constitution Act, 1982 gives expression to this principle by conferring a right to initiate constitutional change on each participant in Confederation. In our view, the existence of this right imposes a corresponding duty on the participants in Confederation to engage in constitutional discussions in order to acknowledge and address democratic expressions of a desire for change in other provinces. This duty is inherent in the democratic principle which is a fundamental predicate of our system of governance.

(d) Constitutionalism and the Rule of Law

[70] The principles of constitutionalism and the rule of law lie at the root of our system of government. The rule of law, as observed in Roncarelli v. Duplessis, [[1959] SCR 121, 1959 CanLII 50] at p. 142, is "a fundamental postulate of our constitutional structure." As we noted in the Patriation Reference, supra, at pp. 805-6, "[t]he 'rule of law' is a highly textured expression, ... conveying, for example, a sense of orderliness, of subjection to known legal rules and of executive accountability to legal authority." At its most basic level, the rule of law vouchsafes to the citizens and residents of the country a stable, predictable and ordered society in which to conduct their affairs. It provides a shield for individuals from arbitrary state action.

[The Court then cites an earlier case, Re Manitoba Language Rights, [1985] 1 SCR 721, 1985 CanLII 33, at para 71 that outlines the elements of the rule of law: (1) the law is supreme over the acts of both government and private persons; (2) the rule of law "requires the creation and maintenance of an actual order of positive laws which preserves and embodies the more general principle of normative order;" and (3) "the exercise of all public power must find its ultimate source in a legal rule."]

[72] The constitutionalism principle bears considerable similarity to the rule of law, although they are not identical. The essence of constitutionalism in Canada is embodied in s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982... . Simply put, the constitutionalism principle requires that all government action comply with the Constitution. The rule of law principle requires that all government action must comply with the law, including the Constitution. ... The Constitution binds all governments, both federal and provincial, including the executive branch.... . They may not transgress its provisions: indeed, their sole claim to exercise lawful authority rests in the powers allocated to them under the Constitution, and can come from no other source.

[73] An understanding of the scope and importance of the principles of the rule of law and constitutionalism is aided by acknowledging explicitly why a constitution is entrenched beyond the reach of simple majority rule. There are three overlapping reasons.

[74] First, a constitution may provide an added safeguard for fundamental human rights and individual freedoms which might otherwise be susceptible to government interference. ... [T]here are occasions when the majority will be tempted to ignore fundamental rights in order to accomplish collective goals more easily or effectively. Constitutional entrenchment ensures that those rights will be given due regard and protection. Second, a constitution may seek to ensure that vulnerable minority groups [can] maintain and promote their identities against the assimilative pressures of the majority. And third, a constitution may provide for a division of political power ... amongst different levels of government. That purpose would be defeated if one of those democratically elected levels of government could ... allocate additional political power to itself unilaterally.

[75] The argument that the Constitution may be legitimately circumvented by resort to a majority vote in a province-wide referendum is superficially persuasive, in large measure because it seems to appeal to ... democracy and self-government. In short, it is suggested that ... the same popular sovereignty that originally led to the present Constitution must (it is argued) also permit "the people" in their exercise of popular sovereignty to secede by majority vote alone. However, closer analysis reveals that this argument is unsound, because it misunderstands the meaning of popular sovereignty and the essence of a constitutional democracy.

[76] Canadians have never accepted that ours is a system of simple majority rule. Our principle of democracy, taken in conjunction with the other constitutional principles discussed here, is richer. Constitutional government is necessarily predicated on the idea that the political representatives of the people of a province have the capacity and the power to commit the province to be bound into the future by the constitutional rules being adopted. These rules are "binding" not in the sense of frustrating the will of a majority of a province, but as defining the majority which must be consulted in order to alter the fundamental balances of political power (including the spheres of autonomy guaranteed by the principle of federalism), individual rights, and minority rights in our society. Of course, those constitutional rules are themselves amenable to amendment, but only through a process of negotiation which ensures that there is an opportunity for the constitutionally defined rights of all the parties to be respected and reconciled.

[77] In this way, our belief in democracy may be harmonized with our belief in constitutionalism. Constitutional amendment often requires some form of substantial consensus precisely because the content of the underlying principles of our Constitution demand it. [It] ensures that minority interests must be addressed before proposed changes which would affect them may be enacted.

[78] It might be objected, then, that constitutionalism is therefore incompatible with democratic government. This would be an erroneous view. Constitutionalism facilitates—indeed, makes possible—a democratic political system by creating an orderly framework within which people may make political decisions. Viewed correctly, constitutionalism and the rule of law are not in conflict with democracy; rather, they are essential to it. Without that relationship, the political will upon which democratic decisions are taken would itself be undermined.

(e) Protection of Minorities

[79] The fourth underlying constitutional principle we address here concerns the protection of minorities. ... As this Court observed in Reference re Bill 30, An Act to amend the Education Act (Ont.) [[1987] 1 SCR 1148, 1987 CanLII 65], at p. 1173, and in Reference re Education Act (Que.) [[1993] 2 SCR 511, 1993 CanLII 100], at pp. 529-30, the protection of minority religious education rights was a central consideration in the negotiations leading to Confederation. In the absence of such protection, it was felt that the minorities in what was then Canada East and Canada West would be submerged and assimilated. ... Similar concerns animated the provisions protecting minority language rights, as noted in Société des Acadiens du Nouveau-Brunswick Inc. v. Association of Parents for Fairness in Education [[1986] 1 SCR 549, 1986 CanLII 66], at p. 564.

[80] ... [E]ven though those provisions were the product of negotiation and political compromise, that does not render them unprincipled. Rather, such a concern reflects a broader principle related to the protection of minority rights. Undoubtedly, the three other constitutional principles inform the scope and operation of the specific provisions that protect the rights of minorities. We emphasize that the protection of minority rights is itself an independent principle underlying our constitutional order. The principle is clearly reflected in the Charter's provisions for the protection of minority rights. ...

[81] ... [T]he protection of minority rights had a long history before the enactment of the Charter. Indeed, the protection of minority rights was clearly an essential consideration in the design of our constitutional structure even at the time of Confederation Although Canada's record of upholding the rights of minorities is not a spotless one, that goal is one towards which Canadians have been striving since Confederation, and the process has not been without successes. The principle of protecting minority rights continues to exercise influence in the operation and interpretation of our Constitution.

[82] Consistent with this long tradition of respect for minorities, which is at least as old as Canada itself, the framers of the Constitution Act, 1982 included in s. 35 explicit protection for existing aboriginal and treaty rights, and in s. 25, a non-derogation clause in favour of the rights of aboriginal peoples. The "promise" of s. 35, as it was termed in R v. Sparrow [(1990) 1 SCR 1075, 1990 CanLII 104] at p. 1083, recognized not only the ancient occupation of land by aboriginal peoples, but their contribution to the building of Canada, and the special commitments made to them by successive governments. The protection of these rights, so recently and arduously achieved, whether looked at in their own right or as part of the larger concern with minorities, reflects an important underlying constitutional value.

[The Court went on to apply these constitutional principles to the secession context, ruling that while unilateral secession would be unconstitutional, a clear expression by the people of Quebec of their will to secede from Canada would impose a reciprocal obligation on all parties to Confederation to negotiate constitutional changes to respond to that desire. This portion of the judgment is reproduced in Chapter 26, Amending the Constitution.]

Answers to questions 1 and 2: No; not necessary to answer question 3.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Quebec refused to appear in the proceedings before the Court. Its position was that the Court lacked the jurisdiction to consider a matter—secession—that was fundamentally political in nature. Because the Court wished to hear all sides of the legal argument, it appointed a lawyer to make arguments on Quebec's behalf. The Court acted pursuant to s 53(7) of the Supreme Court Act, RSC 1985, c S-26, which provides that in the case of references (discussed in Chapter 13):

The Court may, in its discretion, request any counsel to argue the case with respect to any interest that is affected and with respect to which counsel does not appear

A lawyer acting in this capacity is known as an amicus curiae, or "friend of the court."

2. Like the Persons case, the Secession Reference was an advisory opinion. The amicus curiae argued that the Court should decline to answer the reference questions because they were political in nature, and hence incapable of legal resolution. The Court rejected this argument:

[26] Though a reference differs from the Court's usual adjudicative function, the Court should not, even in the context of a reference, entertain questions that would be inappropriate to answer. However, given the very different nature of a reference, the question of the appropriateness of answering a question should not focus on whether the dispute is formally adversarial or whether it disposes of cognizable rights. Rather, it should consider whether the dispute is appropriately addressed by a court of law. ... [T]he circumstances in which the Court may decline to answer a reference question on the basis of "non-justiciability" include:

- (i) if to do so would take the Court beyond its own assessment of its proper role in the constitutional framework of our democratic form of government or
- (ii) if the Court could not give an answer that lies within its area of expertise: the interpretation of law.

[27] As to the "proper role" of the Court, it is important to underline ... that the questions posed in this Reference do not ask the Court to usurp any democratic decision that the people of Quebec may be called upon to make. The questions posed by the Governor in Council, as we interpret them, are strictly limited to aspects of the legal framework in which that democratic decision is to be taken. ... The legal framework having been clarified, it will be for the population of Quebec, acting through the political process, to decide whether or not to pursue secession. As will be seen, the legal framework involves the rights and obligations of Canadians who live outside the province of Quebec, as well as those who live within Quebec.

[28] As to the "legal" nature of the questions posed, if the Court is of the opinion that it is being asked a question with a significant extralegal component, it may interpret the question so as to answer only its legal aspects; if this is not possible, the Court may decline to answer the question. In the present Reference the questions may clearly be interpreted as directed to legal issues, and, so interpreted, the Court is in a position to answer them.

Do you agree with the Court's analysis? What was the most likely effect of the judgment on "any democratic decision that the people of Quebec may be called on to make"? Does it seem like the Court confined itself to a consideration of the legal aspects of the reference questions, or did it address extralegal components as well? If it did, was it justified in doing so? If it did not, should it have? Why? How?

3. In cases both before and after the Secession Reference, the Court has articulated and elaborated on other "organizing or underlying principles of the Constitution": judicial independence: Reference re Provincial Court Judges; the foundational role of the Supreme Court of Canada: Reference re Supreme Court Act, ss 5 and 6, 2014 SCC 21; and the role of the Senate as an independent chamber of "sober second thought": Reference re Senate Reform, 2014 SCC 32. Excerpts from the Provincial Judges Reference and the Supreme Court Reference can be found in Chapter 13; excerpts from the Senate Reform Reference can be found in Chapter 26.

4. The Court's use in the Secession Reference of "unwritten" constitutional principles to generate legally enforceable constitutional obligations has generated confusion and controversy. While the use of such principles to guide the interpretation of written constitutional provisions is relatively uncontroversial, there are concerns about using them to ground free-standing constitutional obligations and, potentially, to invalidate legislation. The Supreme Court of Canada has partially addressed these issues in subsequent cases that involved the unwritten principle of the rule of law.

British Columbia v Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd involved legislation that provided for special evidentiary and procedural rules, making it easier for the province to recover from tobacco manufacturers health care expenditures incurred in treating individuals exposed to tobacco products. The Court held that the judiciary has the authority to strike down legislation that conflicts with judicial independence, but that the law in question did not compromise judicial independence. The Court also appeared to hold that it is not open for courts to strike down legislation on the ground that it conflicts with principle of the rule of law.

Subsequently, in British Columbia (AG) v Christie, the Court had occasion to determine whether the principle of the rule of law gives rise to an enforceable right to be represented by a lawyer in a court or tribunal proceeding where legal rights or obligations are at stake. The Court held that the text of the Constitution, the jurisprudence, and the historical understanding of the rule of law do not foreclose the possibility that a right to counsel might be recognized in specific and varied situations. It held, however, that they do not support the conclusion that there is a general right to counsel in proceedings before courts and tribunals dealing with legal rights or obligations.

In Toronto (City) v Ontario (AG), 2021 SCC 34, the Supreme Court considered a challenge arising from a 2018 Ontario law that greatly reduced the size of a city council in the middle of a municipal election. A narrow majority found that the law, while controversial, did not breach either s 2(b) (freedom of expression) or s 3 (the right to vote) of the Charter. Moreover, the majority rejected the idea that the unwritten constitutional principle of democracy could provide an independent basis for striking down otherwise valid provincial legislation, suggesting that unwritten constitutional principles generally may not be used in that way.

I. INTRODUCTION

For decades, many Canadian jurists have assumed that Canada was born after the British conquest of New France and the assertion of Great Britain's sovereignty over the territory of what is now Canada. For example, Bora Laskin, who later became Chief Justice of Canada, wrote in the introductory sentence of his 1969 Hamlyn Lecture that "[m]ore than two hundred years have passed since English law and English legal institutions were rooted in a yet unborn Canada" [emphasis added]: Bora Laskin, The British Tradition in Canadian Law (London: Stevens & Sons, 1969) at 1. Jurists such as Laskin essentially believed that Canada's constitutional history started either with the Treaty of Paris of 1763, by which the French Crown ceded to the British Crown all of its rights over the territory of Canada, or, alternatively, with the creation of Canada as a confederation of colonies in 1867.

Such accounts often fail to acknowledge the presence of legal orders in North America prior to the imposition of British rule. Indigenous peoples exercised law-making authority over territory and persons prior to European contact (more on this can be found in Chapter 14, Indigenous Peoples and the Constitution). Contact led to the establishment of French colonies—again, with law-making authority over territory and persons—on the continent. These different legal orders expressed and produced diverse legal and constitutional norms that structured the economic, social, and political affairs of their citizens. They also interacted with each other and, later, with British North American colonial legal orders. A complex web of often competing narratives invested these legal orders, and their interaction, with constitutional significance. Some of these narratives diverge in important respects from those that inform and perhaps dominate contemporary constitutional discourse. But some nonetheless have become ingrained in the collective memory of various communities across Canada and continue to influence constitutional debates—sometimes directly affecting constitutional argument and interpretation.

What is the distinction between “history” and “memory,” and how can that distinction improve our understanding of constitutional law? How does memory influence the creation and evolution of “imagined communities,” to use an expression coined by Benedict Anderson, Imagined Communities: Reflections on the Origin and Spread of Nationalism, rev ed (New York: Verso, 2006)? To what extent can constitutional law be described as an intellectual tool by which an imagined community is institutionalized? According to Jean-François Gaudreault-DesBiens:

At the heart of the Canadian constitutional debate lies a clash of stories about Canada’s history. Contrary to a universally shared understanding of Canada’s founding historical events, these stories reflect divergent collective memories. This raises the distinction properly drawn between “history” and “memory.” History refers to an intellectual undertaking which attempts to look at past events from a self-described objective standpoint and, therefore, to view them as uncontested material facts. In contrast, memory describes a subjective interpretation of past events, that has been elaborated over a long period of time and that sheds light on contemporary events, while at the same time being fed by them. While history has more to do with the research of “hard facts,” memory is related to how a community remembers and interprets its past, and, ultimately, to the manner in which it perceives itself. It crystallizes the community’s particular remembrance of things past, [as Proust might have said].

From Jean-François Gaudreault-DesBiens, “The Quebec Secession Reference and the Judicial Arbitration of Conflicting Narratives About Law, Democracy, and Identity” (1998) 23 Vt L Rev 793 at 796.

This chapter provides an overview of some of the main features of these prior legal orders, the constitutional narratives that account for their presence, and the events marking their interaction, before turning to the events of 1867. Perhaps contrary to popular understandings, Canada’s constitutional evolution was not a tranquil and incremental process of development, but one that had its share of tragedies, collective traumas, and major conflicts. Canada is not a young country—the very word “Canada” is of Indigenous origins—which is why it is worth looking at what happened before 1867, most notably to determine the extent to which Canada was—and is—constituted by events that occurred before the formal confederation of British North American colonies in 1867. As we shall see, while not being entirely determined by these events, contemporary Canada cannot be abstracted from them—or from the competing constitutional narratives to which they gave rise.

II. PRE-CONTACT, CONTACT, AND THE MYTH OF TERRA NULLIUS

Prior to European contact, Indigenous peoples lived in North America in organized societies exercising law-making authority over territory and persons since time immemorial. Although the laws of these societies did not resemble, formally or substantively, European models of legality, they were laws nevertheless. European models of legality are of relatively recent origins, essentially linked to the emergence of the nation-state in the 16th century. Before this time, the law in much of Europe was customary, and it was only in the 12th century, with the rediscovery of Rome’s Corpus Juris Civilis, that the idea of “written law” was rekindled. Legal anthropologist Alain Bissonnette puts it this way:

[TRANSLATION] One must recognize a juridical character to any rule of social conduct that is rendered obligatory by the members of a given group. Native law is a traditional form of law; it is oral and unwritten. It has not been enacted by a supreme authority; it is customary. It reflects a cosmocentric view of the world which, in turn, is not reflected in dominant Western law.

See Alain Bissonnette, "‘Les droits des peuples autochtones: D’hier à demain,’ (Étude réalisée pour la Commission royale sur les peuples autochtones, juin 1992)” [“The Rights of Indigenous Peoples: From Yesterday to Tomorrow,” (Study conducted for the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, June 1992)] 24:1 Revue general de droit at 5.

Based mainly on oral traditions and customs, and modelling radically different views of the relationship between human beings and the world, Indigenous legal orders that existed at the time of contact belonged to the family of what anthropologists now call traditional legal systems. The commonalities among them should not obscure their differences. Some were more formalized—or at least more cognizable to European legal consciousness—than others, such as the legal order governing the Iroquois nations, which eventually culminated into a confederacy of nations. Given their diversity, and the paucity of available data, it is impossible to fully account for all the Indigenous legal orders that existed at the time of contact. And, given that they are based in oral, rather than written, legal traditions, relying on their existence in our current judicial context raises complex evidentiary problems. For more discussion of the rules of evidence in the context of constitutional claims of Indigenous rights, see Delgamuukw v British Columbia, [1997] 3 SCR 1010, 1997 CanLII 302, excerpted in Chapter 14.

Chapter 14 examines in some detail the contemporary constitutional status of Indigenous lands and peoples. In the remainder of this section, we wish to highlight how European nations asserted sovereignty over the lands newly “discovered” in the Americas by relying on what is known as the doctrine of terra nullius, or nobody’s land.

Patrick Macklem, Indigenous Difference and the Constitution of Canada

The initial distribution of sovereignty over North America among European powers was generated not by a single decision-making authority, but by and through a series of acts of mutual recognition by European powers. Each colonizing power viewed itself and others as entitled to claim sovereignty to territory if it could establish a valid claim according to rules and principles that governed European colonial practice. According to “the doctrine of discovery,” sovereignty could be acquired over unoccupied territory by discovery. Sovereignty over occupied territory could be acquired only by conquest or cession. However, international law deemed North America to be unoccupied, or terra nullius, for the purposes of distributing sovereignty. European settlement thus vested sovereignty in settling nations despite an indigenous presence. Because North America was treated as vacant, neither conquest nor cession was necessary to transfer sovereignty from Aboriginal nations to European powers.

International law deemed North America to be terra nullius under the doctrine of discovery because European powers viewed Aboriginal nations as insufficiently Christian or insufficiently civilized to justify recognizing them as sovereign over their lands and people. An Aboriginal nation did not constitute “a legal unit in international law” [Cayuga Indians (Great Britain) v United States (1926), 6 RIAA 173 at 176]. [I]n the words of Chief Justice Marshall [of the United States Supreme Court, in Johnson v M’Intosh, 21 US 543, 8 Wheat 543 at 573 (1823)], “the character and religion of [North America’s] inhabitants afforded an apology for considering them as a people over whom the superior genius of Europe might claim an ascendancy. The potentates of the old world found no difficulty in convincing themselves that they made ample compensation to the inhabitants of the new, by bestowing on them civilization and Christianity, in exchange for unlimited independence.”

The doctrine of terra nullius has had a lasting impact on Western juridical and political thought: see generally Michel Morin, L'usurpation de la souveraineté autochtone: Le cas des peuples de la Nouvelle-France et des colonies anglaises de l'Amérique du Nord [The Usurpation of Aboriginal Sovereignty: The People of New France and the English Colonies of North America] (Montreal: Boreal, 1997). One of its underlying assumptions was that Indigenous societies were essentially lawless societies.

Although the influence of the terra nullius doctrine cannot be underestimated, in what was known as "Indian policy" in both England and France, practical reason often prevailed. For example:

The law of the Prairie West, according to the Hudson's Bay Company Royal Charter of 1670, was the law of England insofar as it applied to those people in Prince Rupert's Land who did not live under the authority of other previously established nations in the regions. While never expressed officially, the Company in practice accepted the rule of aboriginal law for domestic concerns of native people.

See Louis A Knafla, "From Oral to Written Memory: The Common Law Tradition in Western Canada" in Louis A Knafla, ed, Law & Justice in a New Land: Essays in Western Canadian Legal History (Toronto: Carswell, 1986) 31 at 35.

In other words, even under a legal regime not naturally receptive to the existence of Indigenous legal orders, there was still room for some degree of Indigenous self-government. That paradoxical logic also inspired the numerous treaties that were concluded between the French and British Crowns and different Indigenous nations.

As you will see in Chapter 14, contemporary Canadian constitutional law today recognizes that what is now Canada was not in fact terra nullius when the Europeans began to assert territorial sovereignty over it. It also recognizes that treaties between Indigenous nations and the Crown possess constitutional significance. What might constitutional recognition of Indigenous legal orders mean for the future of the Canadian constitutional order?

III. NEW FRANCE: CANADA'S FIRST EUROPEAN CONSTITUTIONAL REGIME

France was the first European nation to establish a colony on Canadian territory. New France comprised different administrative divisions, such as Acadie (now Nova Scotia), Canada (now Quebec), and Louisiane. Although Jacques Cartier claimed sovereignty over Canada on behalf of the French Crown in 1534, it was only in the early 17th century that the first settlements were established here.

The colony of New France was created at a time when the king of France personally ruled his kingdom with the assistance of a council placed under his direction. Recent historiography shows that the king's powers were not "absolute" and that his authority in a practical sense depended on the continuing support of the nobility in all of his kingdom's regions. In New France, in addition to the rules governing the monarchy itself, colonial laws included royal ordinances and edicts, rulings made by the council, customary laws governing private relations, and seigniorial rights. Concepts of Roman law and Canon law in its Gallican interpretation also were sources of law. Even though the king of France was vested with broad constitutional prerogatives, he could fully exercise his sovereignty over his kingdom and his colonies only by delegating some of his authority to act to colonial intermediaries. Thus, officials acting on his behalf in New France were mere delegates of the king and did not possess any original jurisdiction, or power, to do things.

Initially, the governor of New France exercised a virtually monopolistic jurisdiction. That was reduced as colonial institutions slowly took shape, a process that culminated in 1663, the year of a major administrative reform in the colony. After a brief period under the co-administration, a council was created in 1647 that became responsible for the regulation of the fur trade, the control of public finances, and general protection of the public good. The council was composed of the governor, a representative of the clergy, and, from 1657 to 1663, four councillors elected by the inhabitants of the colony. It was abolished in 1663 and until the end of the French regime in 1760, the same functions were carried out by the Sovereign Council ("Conseil souverain" or "Conseil supérieur" beginning in 1703).

The creation of this council, based on similar arrangements in some French provinces, heralded a period of significant institutional changes in New France. Louis XIV regained the ownership of the colony from the Compagnie des Cent-Associés and eventually placed it under his direct administration, delegating functions to the above-named Conseil including police and appellate judicial powers. There was no real separation of legislative, executive, and judicial authority in the colony, which was the state of affairs in most European countries at the time.

At the end of the French regime, there were three major institutional actors whose responsibilities and prerogatives sometimes overlapped, partly because of the terms and conditions of the royal delegation under which they were working, and partly because of the absence of a separation between the branches of the state. These actors were the council, the governor, and the intendant. Although all of them were vested with executive powers, the intendant, practically, ended up exercising most of these powers. Under the terms of their mandate, which included military and Indian affairs, the intendant was responsible for justice, police, and finances. Although the governor exercised concurrent jurisdiction over "general police," the broad jurisdiction conferred on the intendant meant that, in practice, the intendant was responsible for everything that touched on agriculture, trade, industry, professions, health, public safety and order, and education.

Legislative authority was exercised by the king in France, whose edicts and ordinances there also applied in the colony. Officials such as the governor and the intendant were responsible for applying and enforcing these laws. However, the terms of their respective mandates allowed them to adapt those laws to the sometimes different situation of the colony, and to enact local legislation called "ordinances." This legislative power also fell under the responsibility of the intendant, one that they mostly exercised alone, except for ordinances concerning important issues in which the council was called on to participate. The council, through its "droit de remonstrance," could also ask the king to introduce changes in the ordinances enacted by the king himself.

This account of legislative authority points to the absence of an assembly composed of elected representatives, except for the period between 1657 and 1663 noted above. Indeed, formal representative institutions did not exist in New France. But from the beginning to the end of the French regime, public meetings where the inhabitants of the different cities of the colony could express their views were called on a relatively frequent basis by colonial officials. The need to hold such meetings arose out of practical necessity. Given its large territory and widely dispersed population, New France required the inhabitants' collaboration and input for its effective administration. In 1700, Intendant Bochart de Champigny even proposed, albeit unsuccessfully, to formalize the existence of these meetings. Although the inhabitants of the colony could express their views in such meetings, they could only do so on issues that had been previously identified by colonial officials. Moreover, although votes were sometimes taken, they could never constitute "decisions" because they had no binding legal effect on colonial officials. Another impediment to the effectiveness of these informal consultations was the absence in the colony of recognized rights to freedom of association and to petition colonial officials.

Finally, the exercise of judicial power in New France was characterized by the involvement of non-judicial actors. At the end of the French regime, the Superior Council, as the ultimate appellate tribunal in the colony, could hear civil and criminal appeals from lower courts in Quebec, Montreal, and Trois-Rivières. The governor, the intendant, the bishop, and the attorney general were among the 17 councillors. In addition to being members of a judicial body, the Superior Council, the governor and the intendant could also directly adjudicate cases. On one hand, the governor could always review the rulings of the council, which they did a few times when they believed that a denial of justice had occurred. On the other hand, being responsible for the administration of justice in the colony, the intendant could adjudicate on cases raising the application of their own ordinances in respect to police and financial affairs and their rulings could only be appealed to the King's Council. The intendant could also rule on alleged crimes against the safety of the state, review decisions taken by all judicial bodies, and even decide to hear cases already brought before courts of competent jurisdiction. This has led two commentators to describe the intendant's judicial competence as follows:

[TRANSLATION] Relying on contemporary criteria presently applied in respect of the administration of justice, one could say that he [the Intendant] was vested with exclusive jurisdiction over the review of administrative action, could act as a "small claims" judge, in addition to which he had concurrent jurisdiction to hear cases that ordinary courts were competent to hear.

See Jacques-Yvan Morin, "L'évolution constitutionnelle du Canada et du Québec de 1534 à 1867" ["The Constitutional Evolution of Canada and Quebec from 1534 to 1867"] in Jacques-Yvan Morin & José Woehrling, eds, Les Constitutions du Canada et du Québec: du régime français à nos jours [The Constitutions of Canada and Quebec: From the French Regime to the Present Day], vol 1, Études (Montreal: Thémis, 1994) at 19. The above discussion summarizes Morin, above, at 9-27; see also Gustave Lanctôt, L'administration de la Nouvelle-France [The Administration of New France] (Montreal: Éditions du Jour, 1971).

As the colonists eventually adapted their way of life to the difficult conditions of New France, most notably through interaction with Indigenous peoples, their identity began to change. They started to define themselves as "Canadiens," as opposed to "Français." They were the first people in the Canadian territory to define themselves as "Canadians." This self-definition as unhyphenated "Canadians" lasted long after the birth of Canada as a federation in 1867, since it took some time for the population of British descent to define themselves as "Canadians." When they did, the ancient "Canadiens" increasingly became known as "French Canadians."

IV. FROM ACADIA TO NOVA SCOTIA: THE GENESIS OF THE MARITIMES

It was in Acadia that the clash between the French and the British North American empires first entailed major legal consequences. As early as 1689, sporadic conflicts had plagued relations between the two empires in Europe and in North America. The year of 1710 saw the fall of Port Royal (now Annapolis Royal) to an expedition of New Englanders. Three years later, this victory was confirmed in the Treaty of Utrecht, under which France yielded Acadia and Newfoundland to Great Britain but maintained its control over Cape Breton (then called "Isle Royale"), where it founded Louisbourg in 1720, Prince Edward Island (then called "Isle Saint-Jean"), and other islands in the Gulf of St Lawrence. It also kept the St Lawrence Valley.

For the French population of Acadia and its Indigenous allies, the Treaty of Utrecht heralded a period of significant change. Given their cultural ties and geographical proximity with the remaining French North American colonies, the inhabitants of the new British colony of Nova Scotia were required in 1713 to take an oath of allegiance, which they did on the condition that they would not have to bear arms against France. British authorities accepted that condition. The Acadians then came to be referred to as the "French neutrals." Despite the establishment of a military government in Nova Scotia and immigration from Great Britain, British authorities were still faced, in mid-18th century, with a problem in their Maritime colony—most of its inhabitants were not of British origin, and their population was expanding. By then, the Acadians considered themselves a people distinct from both the French and the English. The Acadians had carved for themselves a relatively comfortable niche within the British colony of Nova Scotia, and their society felt secure enough to envisage the future with confidence. This was to last until the late 1740s, when conflict between the two empires resumed.

Fearing that the Acadians, despite their oath, could be tempted to support France in this new conflict, British authorities decided to strengthen their hold on Nova Scotia by promoting the settlement of the colony with migrants whose loyalty could not be questioned—that is, with British and non-British Protestants. Despite meetings with colonial authorities, and even the agreement of some Acadian communities to take an unqualified oath, British authorities ultimately decided to deport the Acadians. That decision was implemented in the last months of 1755:

The reality, even if it had been fully expected, would have been psychologically stunning. Settlements burnt, cattle driven off, lives now entirely at the command of the soldiery; within days the Acadians were turned from a free and flourishing people into a crowd of refugees.

See Naomi ES Griffiths, The Contexts of Acadian History, 1686-1784 (Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press, 1992) at 91.

The deportation, which would continue until 1762, saw between 12,000 and 18,000 Acadians uprooted from what are now Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island. Thousands died due to diseases contracted on board ships, or because the vessels they were on sank. This led France to accuse England of having committed genocide. Eventually, the Acadians who wanted to return home were permitted to do so in 1764, only to realize that their former lands were now occupied by British settlers. As for the Mi'kmaq, even though they had most often sided with the French, they "had never stopped considering themselves the rightful tenants of the land": Griffiths, above at 82, and entered into discussions with the British that eventually culminated in the signing of treaties: for a judicial interpretation of these treaties, see R v Marshall, [1999] 3 SCR 456, 1999 CanLII 665, excerpted in Chapter 14.

Interpretations abound as to the reasons for the deportation. For example, an early commentator, Édouard Richard, was of the view that "the deportation, in the minds of its chief authors, was neither a justifiable act nor a deed of cruelty pure and simple, but a means of acquiring wealth by despoiling the Acadians of their cattle and lands": see Édouard Richard, Acadia: Missing Links of a Lost Chapter in American History, vol 1 (Montreal: John Lovell & Son, 1895) at 264. One thing is certain: the deportation of the Acadians was not an isolated incident, but rather the result of a public policy carried out as a part of Great Britain's plan to build its North American empire:

The policy in this case was followed systematically for years, and it would be a gross error to see in the expulsion the result of a sudden excess of violence—a monstrous fit of bad temper on the part of Lawrence and his colleagues, and foreign to the British government. No—the dispersal continued into 1762 and was neither incidental nor accidental.

See Guy Frégault, Canada: The War of the Conquest, translated by Margaret M Cameron (Toronto: Oxford University Press, 1969) at 186. Legal and political events before and after the deportation reveal that empire-building lay at the heart of the decision. In August 1754, Lieutenant Governor Charles Lawrence had informed the Board of Trade and Plantations in London—the authority responsible for overseeing the colonies—that the Acadians' loyalty was more dubious than ever and that he was of the view that they either had to take an unconditional oath or leave the colony.

This raised the question of the legal status of the Acadians in the colony. As described by Frégault, above, at 174:

The fact was ... that after the Treaty of Utrecht the Acadians could continue to live in the province only on condition that they become subjects of Great Britain, and in order to acquire this status, they must take the oaths required by the British authorities. It was therefore most important to consider to what extent they could be treated as British subjects if they refused to take the oaths, and whether refusal to do so would not cancel their titles to their property. ...

The Lords of Trade were unwilling to commit themselves, but their statements sufficed to authorize the principle of massive deportation: if the Acadians had not the status of British subjects they had no right to the land they were cultivating, for it was British land; and if they had no right to the land, it would not be illegal to dislodge them from it. It would require only the decision of a colonial magistrate to give this reasoning the force of law.

That colonial magistrate would be Jonathan Belcher, Chief Justice of Nova Scotia, who was asked by Lawrence to clarify the Acadians' legal status and the nature of their title, if any, to their lands. On July 28, 1755, the same day that the final decision to deport the Acadians was taken, Belcher released an opinion in which he relied on legal technicalities to conclude that the law not only authorized but required the deportation. He reasoned that because Cornwallis, then lieutenant governor of the colony, had been instructed by London to request once again that the Acadians take an unqualified oath to the British Crown, a demand to which they responded negatively in 1749, the Acadians had impliedly declared their intention not to become British subjects. The instruction to Cornwallis also stated that the persons refusing to take the oath would not be eligible to retake it should they wish to, because such a profession of faith would not be reliable. Belcher concluded that, given the Acadians' prior refusal to take the oath, the government of the colony had lost the legal power to reoffer them the opportunity to take it. In his view, their deportation and the taking of their lands was therefore required by law.

Belcher added that to illegally allow the Acadians to take the oath would also threaten the survival of Nova Scotia, both at the military and socio-economic levels. According to Belcher, the Acadians had been un-submissive since the Treaty of Utrecht and, with the help of the Mi'kmaq who were allied with the French, had consistently plotted against the British Crown. Having acted with "perfidy and treacheries" in the past, the chief justice argued they could only act in the same way in the future. Moreover, not deporting them would mean refusing to take advantage of the fall of Beauséjour, these advantages being the weakening of the "Sauvages" power and of the repression of the insolence of the French inhabitants. To this military threat was coupled a socio-economic one. Belcher considered that the "surplus" of French inhabitants in the colony (5,000 more Acadians than settlers of British descent) would compromise the effective settlement of the colony. For him, the overall threat that the Acadians represented forced the British inhabitants to live in fortified burghs, thereby preventing them from cultivating land and earning their living—thus supporting Édouard Richard's economic interpretation of the deportation referred to above.

After giving the law's formal sanction to the deportation of the Acadians in his capacity as chief justice of Nova Scotia, Jonathan Belcher was later appointed lieutenant governor of Nova Scotia and dutifully carried out the last segments of the deportation policy up to 1762. However, Chief Justice Belcher's opinion did not end the law's role, or his own, in the deportation. Despite his legal opinion and assurances received from colonial authorities, the new British owners of the lands confiscated from the Acadians legitimately feared what would happen if the former Acadian owners of their lands were to return to Nova Scotia and challenge their successors' title to these lands. To alleviate these fears, Belcher, acting as a member of the legislative assembly of Nova Scotia, tabled a bill entitled An Act for the quieting of Possessions to the Protestant Grantees of the Lands formerly occupied by the French Inhabitants, and for preventing vexatious Actions relating to the same, which was eventually adopted as SNS 1758-1759, 30 Geo II, c 3. The Bill affirmed (at para 1) that the Province of Nova Scotia or Acadie, and the property thereof, did always of right belong to the Crown of England, both by priority of discovery and ancient possession, and that no grant of property to any of the lands or territories belonging thereto, is of any validity, or can give the possessor thereof any legal right or title to any part thereof, unless derived from thence. [Emphasis added.]

The preamble was followed by a narrative of the reasons for the deportation, its justification, and the subsequent grant by the Crown of Great Britain of lands formerly "occupied" by Acadians to "settlers" who came to Nova Scotia from New England.

Practically speaking, the Act purported (at para 5) to bar any lawsuit for the recovery of any of the lands, ... by virtue of any former right, title, claim, interest, or possession of any of the former French inhabitants, or by virtue of any right, title, claim, or interest, holden under or derived from them, by grant, deed, will, or in any other manner whatsoever.

The Act literally rewrote the history of Nova Scotia, rendering it uninhabited territory "discovered" by the British, and therefore a colony of settlement and not of conquest. A French presence of 151 years (1604-1755) was symbolically erased by the law—not to mention the Act's attitude toward the Mi'kmaq nation, whose members it refers to as "Indian Savages." This legal rewriting of history was judicially reiterated in the case of The King v McLaughlin (1830), 1 NBR 218. Once Great Britain extended its rule over the entire region after 1763, the territory of Nova Scotia was divided in three different colonies—Nova Scotia; Prince Edward Island, created in 1769; and New Brunswick, created in 1784 after the influx of Loyalists fleeing the American Revolution.

How would you characterize the law's role in the deportation of Acadians? What is or ought to be the present constitutional status of the Acadians in Canada? Was the deportation an "act of war" justifiable in the context in which it took place? How would the deportation be characterized by today's standards?

V. THE EXPANSION AND CONSOLIDATION OF BRITISH NORTH AMERICA: FROM THE CONQUEST OF NEW FRANCE TO THE CONSTITUTIONAL ACT, 1791

In September of 1759, an event of extraordinary historical importance took place in the capital of New France, Quebec. That event, which lasted only a few minutes, was a battle that opposed British and French troops in a field known as the Plains of Abraham. The outcome of that battle changed Canada forever, as the British forces prevailed over the French. The following year, the city of Montreal also capitulated to the British. The days of New France were over.

The 1759 Articles of Capitulation of Quebec provided that "the inhabitants shall be preserved in the possession of their houses, goods, effects and privileges" (art II), and that "the free exercise of the roman religion is granted, likewise safeguards to all religious persons" (art VI). The 1760 Articles of Capitulation of Montreal granted the continued operation of local French law: "The French and Canadians shall continue to be governed according to the custom of Paris, and the laws and usages established for this country" (art XLII). As regards Indigenous nations who may have joined with the French against the English, the 1760 Articles provided that "The Savages of Indian allies of his Most Christian Majesty, shall be maintained in the lands they inhabit, if they chuse to remain there; they shall not be molested on any pretence whatsoever, for having carried arms, and served his most Christian Majesty; they shall have, as well as the French, liberty of religion, and shall have their missionaries" (art XL): Adam Shortt & Arthur G Doughty, eds, Documents Relating to the Constitutional History of Canada, 1759-1791, 2nd rev ed, part I (Ottawa: King's Printer, 1918) at 5-6, 33-34.

This state of affairs was confirmed in 1763 with the Treaty of Paris, which ended the seven-year war between Great Britain and France. Article IV of the Treaty of Paris similarly provided:

"His Britannick Majesty, on his side, agrees to grant the liberty of the Catholick religion to the inhabitants of Canada: he will, in consequence, give the most precise and effectual orders, that his new Roman Catholick subjects may profess the worship of their religion according to the rites of the Romish church, as far as the laws of Great Britain permit". Shortt & Doughty, above at 115. However, at that time, British laws severely restricted the rights of Roman Catholics, who were prohibited from participating in government.

A few months after the Treaty of Paris, King George III of Great Britain issued a proclamation establishing a government for the newly conquered colony. It is in that Royal Proclamation of 3 October 1763 (reprinted in RSC 1985, Appendix II, No 1) that the entity called "Quebec" makes its first appearance in a constitutional instrument. Two elements of that Proclamation are worth mentioning here. First, the Proclamation contained a pledge to create a legislative assembly in the province that, together with the governor and his council, could make laws, statutes, and ordinances for "the Public Peace, Welfare and good Government of our said Colonies." By making the pledge to establish a general assembly, the king lost the prerogative to legislate for the colony by means of proclamation, that prerogative being divested to Parliament: Campbell v Hall (1774), Lofft 655, 98 ER 848. Second, British imperial law provided that the laws of a conquered colony were to continue until altered by the conqueror. This was reflected in the Articles of Capitulation of 1759 and 1760, above. The Proclamation overrode this rule and imposed on the colony the laws of England in civil and criminal cases.

The Proclamation also contained a number of provisions concerning Indigenous peoples, some of which are still relevant today: see, for example, s 25 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Among other things, the Proclamation provided that "Nations or Tribes of Indians with whom We are connected, and who live under our Protection, should not be molested or disturbed in the Possession of such Parts of our Dominions and Territories as, not having been ceded or purchased by Us, are reserved to them, or any of them, as their Hunting Grounds," and that "lands and territories not included within the limits of [the governments created under the Royal Proclamation, including that of Quebec], or within the limits of the territory granted to the Hudson's Bay Company" be reserved under the king's protection and dominion for the use of the Indians. Not only were these lands reserved, but they could not be purchased or settled, or taken by British subjects, without the Crown's consent and prior issuance of a licence. Practically, that meant that the Crown alone possessed the initial right to acquire these lands.

With respect to Quebec, the Proclamation introduced the British "Test Oath," which forced Roman Catholics to abjure central tenets of their faith if they wanted to participate in government. As well, the king imposed English laws in all matters. The imposition of laws unknown to the inhabitants of the colony soon proved to be counterproductive, especially in civil and commercial matters. Here is what Governor Guy Carleton had to say about that issue in 1767:

[L]aws, ill adapted to the Genius of the Canadians, to the situation of the Province, and to the Interests of Great Britain, unknown, and unpublished were introduced to their Stead; A Sort of Severity, if I remember right, never before practiced by any Conqueror, even where the People, without Capitulation, submitted to His Will and Discretion. How far this Change of Laws, which Deprives such Numbers of their Honors, Privileges, Profits, and Property, is conformable to the Capitulation of Montreal, and Treaty of Paris; How far this Ordinance, which affects the Life, Limb, Liberty, and Property of the Subject, is within the Limits of the Power His Majesty has been pleased to Grant to the Governor and Council; How far this Ordinance, which in a Summary Way, Declares the Supreme Court of Judicature shall Judge all Cases Civil and Criminal by Laws unknown and unpublished to the People, is agreeable to the natural Rights of Mankind, I humbly submit; This much is certain, that it cannot long remain in Force, without a General Confusion and Discontent.

"Letter by Guy Carleton to Lord Shelburne" in Shortt & Doughty, above at 289–90. In the same letter, Carleton noted that French law remained resilient despite its subordination to another legal system: "The people notwithstanding continue to regulate their Transactions by Their Ancient Laws, tho' unknown and unauthorised in the Supreme Court, where most of these Transactions would be declared Invalid": above.

The Proclamation's prohibition of the taking of Indian lands angered American settlers because it was perceived as unjustly inhibiting the expansion of these colonies. Some have argued that the prohibition played a role in fuelling revolutionary sentiments. Resentment increased after the enactment in 1774 of the Quebec Act, 14 Geo III c 83, which extended the territory of Quebec well beyond the St Lawrence Valley—that is, down to the Ohio Valley. As a result, the American colonies became effectively surrounded, which their settlers saw as an affront.

The Quebec Act also restored French laws, referred to as the "Laws of Canada," in "all Matters of Controversy, relative to Property and Civil Rights." Citing "Certainty and Lenity," and "Benefits and Advantages" from the use of the "Criminal Law of England," the Act provided for its continuation in the province. The pleadings of Guy Carleton, supported by petitions from the "Canadiens," had prevailed over British merchants based in Canada and the Quebec attorney general who opposed restoration of French civil law. While the Act heralded the return of the civilian tradition in Canada, it repealed the requirement that all persons appointed to the council of the colony abjure by oath the Catholic dogma of transubstantiation. In practice, that requirement, based on imperial public law introduced in the colony, had prevented all Catholics and, consequently, most of the French inhabitants, from taking part in the administration of the colony.

The Quebec Act constitutes one of the most important moments in Canada's constitutional history. It was significant both for what it achieved and what it provoked. First, as noted earlier, it may have contributed to the American Revolution. This, in turn, led to the exodus of numerous loyalists to Nova Scotia and Quebec, forever changing the visage of these colonies. Previously a colony with an essentially French Catholic population ruled by an English Protestant minority, the colony of Quebec became a locus of religious, ethnic, and linguistic competition. Second, and despite the pledge made by the king in 1763, the Quebec Act did not provide for the creation of a legislative assembly. This became a major concern after the emigration of American loyalists to Canada in the aftermath of the revolution. Indeed, all the British colonies from which they had emigrated had legislative assemblies at the end of the 17th century. The absence of such was cruelly resented from the moment they arrived in Canada.

Socio-demographic changes, as well as pressures for the creation of a legislative assembly, thus paved the way for a major constitutional change, which came about with the Constitutional Act, 1791, reprinted in RSC 1985, Appendix II, No 3. Its two main features were the division of Quebec into two distinct provinces, and the creation of legislative assemblies for both. Quebec was divided into Upper Canada, located west of the Ottawa River and north of Lake Ontario, where most of the Anglo-Protestant Loyalists had settled, and Lower Canada, where the huge majority of the population remained Franco-Catholic. The members of their respective legislative assemblies were to be elected by the eligible population; a legislative council would be comprised of appointed members. Twenty-eight years after the pledge made by the king in the Royal Proclamation of 1763, there began an era marked by a quest for self-government.

VI. TROUBLES IN THE COLONIES: THE QUEST FOR SELF-GOVERNMENT, THE REBELLIONS, AND THE UNION ACT OF 1840

Soon after the enactment of the Constitutional Act, 1791, conflicts between the legislative assemblies and the legislative councils erupted in both Canadas. The legislative councils opposed laws voted for by the legislative assemblies, spent moneys appropriated for certain purposes by the assemblies on other things, and constantly placed themselves in conflicts of interest. In sum, the executive branch of the state was completely unaccountable to the legislative branch. As well, there was no meaningful separation between the judiciary and the executive branches of government.

The problems were roughly the same in both Canadas. But the specific linguistic and religious fabric of Lower Canada increased the acrimony between the legislative council, essentially composed of English Protestants, and the legislative assembly, where the majority of members were French Catholics. The quest for self- and responsible government, and the particular problem that was posed by a French-speaking majority that perceived itself as forming a "Canadian nation," led some members of the British colonial elite to entertain ideas about the union of the Canadas. According to them, such a union would reinforce the power of the executive; strengthen London's grip over the colony; ease the defence of the colonies (which were potential military targets for the United States); eliminate the inconvenience of having to deal with an assembly controlled by a majority of French speakers; and, ultimately, facilitate the assimilation of the French population of Lower Canada. Although such projects, proposed in the early decades of the 19th century, did not immediately materialize, petitions in favour of responsible government emanating from both Canadas remained ignored by London. This led to a radicalization in the two colonies of the democrats, who were already influenced by republican ideas coming from the United States and, to a lesser extent, from France. London's insensitivity to their demands eventually led to armed rebellions in 1837-38, which were crushed, with particular ferocity in Lower Canada, by the British army.

Even though republican ideas enjoyed some popularity in both Canadas, they never appealed to a large enough segment of the population to significantly put in question British rule. The situation was once again more complex in Lower Canada, where the Catholic clergy, well aware of the anti-clerical tone of republicanism in France, took every possible step to ensure that the French population became immunized against the "corruption of liberalism" and submitted to the British Crown. That the overall population lent little concrete support to the rebellion movements led by Mackenzie in Upper Canada and by Papineau in Lower Canada seems to be evidence of a relatively weak penetration of the republican creed beyond a certain intellectual elite. This is not to say, however, that the larger population in both colonies did not support the principle of responsible government.

In the aftermath of the rebellions, Lord Durham was sent to Canada to examine the situation and to report to the Colonial Office and the Imperial Parliament. After five months in Canada, he tabled a report in which he proposed the legislative union of the two Canadas and the institution of responsible government. Durham acknowledged the existence of a Canadian nationality at the core of which were the French language and the Catholic religion. But he also saw in it the source of an irresolvable clash of "races" as well as an obstacle to the progress of a truly British colony. Given Anglo-Saxons' "superior knowledge, energy, enterprise and wealth," it was a "vain endeavour to preserve a French-Canadian nationality in the midst of Anglo-American colonies and states": The Report of the Earl of Durham (London: Methuen, 1902) at 169. Having characterized the French inhabitants of Lower Canada as members of an inferior race, he recommended the erasure of their nationality, not only through informal means such as an increased British immigration, but also through formal means such as a legislative union where the British citizens would eventually form the majority.

This new majority would be largely unfettered. "The colonists may not always know what laws are best for them, or which of their countrymen are the fittest for conducting their affairs; but at least they have a greater interest in coming to a right judgment on these points, and will take greater pains to do so." Durham therefore recommended that "internal government of the colony" be placed "in the hands of the colonists themselves" save for the money bills, which would originate with the executive council, and a few other matters that "affect their relations with the mother country": Durham Report, above at 169 and 181. On the political and constitutional theory underlying Durham's report, see Janet Ajzenstat, The Political Thought of Lord Durham (Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press, 1988).

Responding, in part, to Durham's suggestions, in 1840 the Imperial Parliament passed the Union Act (reprinted in RSC 1985, Appendix II, No 4), which united Lower and Upper Canada into a new entity called United Canada. Going beyond what Lord Durham had asked for, the Union Act, 1840 provided that the parliamentary representation of Upper Canada (now Canada-West) and Lower Canada (now Canada-East) would be equal, in violation of the democratic principle of representation by population. (In 1840, the population of Canada-East was still higher than that of Canada-West.) Moreover, the Union Act merged the public debts of the former Upper and Lower Canadas, despite the fact that the debt of the former was much higher than that of the latter. The Act also declared English as the sole language of the legislative assembly, a provision that soon proved to be practically unenforceable. However, the civil law tradition continued to prevail in Canada-East, at least in matters of private law. Furthermore, the legislative council of the new province of Canada remained unelected and, contrary to what Durham had proposed, responsible government was not instituted. It was granted only in 1846. Fiercely opposed in Lower Canada, the unitary regime instituted by the Union Act soon proved to be extremely difficult to administer, as ethnic and religious disputes were reinforced by economic rivalries between Canada-East and Canada-West.

VII. CONFEDERATION

The failure of the Union Act, 1840 was only one of the many complex factors that led to the proposal that the British North American colonies form a confederation, a proposal that became a reality with the enactment of the British North America Act, 1867 (BNA Act). The first excerpt below describes the circumstances leading up to Confederation, as well as some of the strategic and economic factors at play. The next reading examines the reactions of French Canadians to the proposed confederation.

Garth Stevenson, Unfulfilled Union: Canadian Federalism and National Unity

(Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press, 1992) at 21-33
(footnotes omitted)

The event we call "Confederation" arose from a convergence of internal and external circumstances, and probably no single factor can explain it. Its complexity is enhanced by the fact that it simultaneously did three things, none of which would have been possible without the others. It reorganized the internal government of "Canada" in the pre-Confederation sense of Ontario and Quebec; it united this entity with New Brunswick and Nova Scotia; and it provided for the expansion of the federalized state westward to the Pacific. In the process of doing so it paved the way for economic development, and ended a potentially dangerous power vacuum in the northern part of North America.

The Internal Difficulties of the Province of Canada

On the recommendation of Lord Durham's report, the Province of Canada was established in 1841 by uniting the two colonies of Lower and Upper Canada. The distinction between the civil law of the lower province and the common law of the upper one was retained. Also, despite a brief attempt to impose unilingualism (one of Durham's recommendations), the status of the French language was eventually recognized. At about the same time, the principle was established that the government was dependent on the confidence and support of the elected lower house of the legislature.

In spite of these developments, the governing of both English-speaking and French-speaking Canadians within a unitary or at least a quasi-unitary state proved difficult, and discontent increased on both sides. ...

Each section of the province harboured the belief that it was being constrained and dictated to by the other. Since they were of roughly equal size and had equal representation in Parliament, such a belief was equally plausible on both sides. Once the western half became the more populous, its residents found the equal representation of the two sections to be an intolerable affront to liberal principles, although the injustice of it had somehow managed to escape their notice when they were a minority.

Ethnic and religious antagonisms were exacerbated by many of the issues which came before the legislature, and were reinforced by divergences of economic interest between the sections. Farmers and businessmen in the western part of the province, like their counterparts in the larger western hinterland of a later date, resented the commercial hegemony of Montreal and the measures that were taken with the aim of funneling their commerce through that city.

For all of these reasons it became increasingly difficult to construct governments that could retain the confidence of the lower house. By about 1857 things were widely believed to be approaching an impasse, and the territorial expansion of Canada began to be viewed as a possible means of escape from its difficulties, although this probably would not have been considered had not economic motives (which will be considered subsequently) pointed in the same direction. Expansion might be either eastward, to include the other British colonies on the Atlantic seaboard, or westward, to absorb the inland fur-trading empire of the Hudson's Bay Company, with each half of the Province of Canada tending to prefer the alternative that corresponded to its own point of the compass. Expansion in both directions at once might satisfy both sections, permit federalism (a separate government for each section with a central government over both) while avoiding the dangers of a double-headed monstrosity, and enable French-speaking Canadians to accept representation by population in the lower house at the same time as the more onerous conventions of the existing system could be safely eliminated.

Strategic and Economic Motives

The change that took place in the new decade was the emergence of an external threat to the security of British North America. ...

The threat, of course, came from the United States. British relations with the government in Washington had deteriorated during the American Civil War, a situation for which the British were more to blame than the Americans (and for which the Canadians bore little if any responsibility), but which exposed Canada to the threat of an American invasion in the event of war. By 1864 it was apparent that the industrial North would win the war and incorporate the southern states back into the union, presenting the British Empire with a very powerful and unfriendly opponent. Another source of danger inherent in the outcome of the Civil War was the removal of the controversy over slavery from the agenda of American politics. Previously that controversy had prevented the United States from expanding northward, since to do so would have upset the delicate balance between slave states and free states. This obstacle to the annexation of Canada had now disappeared. Although the British government had discouraged efforts toward Confederation until 1864, it reversed itself in that year for reasons of military defence and security. A united British North America, especially one tied together by railways, would be more defensible and could bear a larger share of the costs of its own defence. In particular, the port of Halifax with its British naval base could be used to send British troops to Canada even when the St. Lawrence was frozen, and without the necessity of crossing American soil.

The American threat also made the need for Confederation more apparent to the colonists themselves, or at least to those who were exposed to it. ...

All historians of Confederation have emphasized, and with good reason, the decisive role of capitalist entrepreneurs and their interests in bringing about Confederation. There were few countervailing interests at a time when the working class was largely disenfranchised, the salaried middle class hardly existed, and prominent politicians were directly involved in railways, banks, and insurance companies to an extent that would seem scandalous today. Confederation was no different from contemporaneous nation-building ventures elsewhere or from the formation of the United States a century before with respect to the decisive role played by the entrepreneurial class. ...

Montreal had been the chief Canadian stronghold of merchant capital in the heyday of British mercantilism before 1849, and it was still the largest city and leading economic centre, as it remained for some time. The Bank of Montreal was the dominant financial institution and included the government of the Province of Canada among its customers. The Montreal bourgeoisie, and their political spokesmen, like Galt and Cartier, were particularly interested in uniting with the Maritimes and building the Intercolonial Railway, which would funnel more trade through their city.

Toronto, although then much smaller than Montreal, was rising rapidly as an economic centre. Its importance in the Confederation movement has been emphasized by J.M.S. Careless in his biography of George Brown. A number of Toronto businessmen, including Brown, had recently organized the Bank of Commerce as a counterweight to the Bank of Montreal. Manufacturing was also developing in and around the city and the production of railway locomotives in Toronto had begun as early as 1853, long before it began in most European countries. Toronto businessmen had little interest in the Maritimes, but looked with increasing enthusiasm toward the West, which they viewed as potentially a vast extension of Toronto's agricultural hinterland in Upper Canada. ...

This complex of interests was tied together by the Great Coalition of 1864. George Brown, the spokesman for Toronto business, joined forces with John A. Macdonald, whose political allies included Cartier and Galt, the spokesmen for Montreal business. Brown accepted expansion to the east, Cartier accepted expansion to the west, and Macdonald accepted federalism, despite serious reservations (even though he had been a long-time supporter of uniting the colonies). Macdonald's preference for a unitary state, which he called a "legislative union," was consistent with his relative detachment from specifically regional interests, part of the secret of his political success. However, a federal union was the only kind that could possibly be acceptable to French Canadians or Maritimers, and Brown shrewdly understood that a federal state would be "capable of gradual and efficient expansion in future years." The United States had convincingly demonstrated that federalism was ideally suited to facilitate the westward course of empire. ...

An additional economic motive for Confederation, which the Maritimes shared with the Province of Canada, was provided by the expectation that the United States would terminate its reciprocal trade agreement with the colonies, as it actually did in 1866. This forced all the colonies to reorient their trade on an east-west rather than a north-south basis. It threatened to end the arrangements by which Canada had used American seaports for its trade with Britain during the winter months. It also meant that Maritime fishermen could no longer fish in American waters, and would need help to defend their own waters from American encroachments. ...

The Terms of Union

The terms of what became Canada's constitution reflected both the diversity of interests and motives behind Confederation and the ideological preferences of the colonial politicians who attended the conferences at Quebec in 1865 and London in 1866. Prominent among these motives were enthusiasm for "a Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom," a phrase which appears in the preamble to the British North America Act, and a desire to avoid what were considered the undesirable aspects of the American constitution. John A. Macdonald in particular was obsessed with the belief, a somewhat superficial one for a man so shrewd in other respects, that the American Civil War might have been avoided if the American constitution had granted only limited and specified powers to the individual states, rather than leaving them with all powers not granted to the federal government. He acknowledged that the political circumstances in 1787 had probably left the Americans with no alternative, but he was determined to avoid the same mistake himself.

Fortunately for Macdonald, circumstances were more propitious for him than they had been for Alexander Hamilton, whose views on federalism and on other political subjects had been very similar to his own. The forces of agrarian radicalism were much weaker in British North America than they had been in the thirteen colonies, and their political representatives, being on the opposition benches, were excluded from the conferences that drafted Canada's constitution. Canada also lacked any equivalent of the southern plantation owners, who had opposed the centralization desired by the Federalist merchants. In addition, there were no vested interests attached to provincial autonomy in what became Ontario and Quebec, since the governments of those provinces did not exist between 1841 and 1867. It was both easy and logical to give specifically defined powers to those governments which were to be established, while leaving the general, unspecified, or "residual" power with the government that already existed, that of Canada.

Only in the Maritimes did Macdonald have to deal with already existing governments that would have to be enticed into accepting a completely new level of government superior to themselves. Even there he was aided by discreet pressure from London and the fact that some of the Maritimers, like Charles Tupper, shared his preference for a centralized regime. The chief concerns of the Maritime delegates at the conferences were provincial revenues and representation in the Senate, rather than the division of legislative powers. The demands for provincial legislative powers came mainly from the French Canadians, for whom the establishment of a Quebec legislature was the major attraction of Confederation. The powers which they demanded for that legislature were mainly related to social institutions, education, the family, and the legal system. Even the celebrated provincial jurisdiction over "property and civil rights," expressly designed to protect Quebec's legal system by repeating a phrase first used in the Quebec Act of 1774, at first included the qualifying phrase "excepting portions thereof assigned to the General Parliament." These words were removed at the last moment by the British Colonial Office.

The stated preference for "a Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom" combined a widely shared sentiment with more pragmatic and mundane considerations. Access to British capital and markets was essential to the economic objectives of Confederation, and British assistance would be needed to defend Canada against the United States. A firm assertion of loyalty to British principles might encourage pro-Canadian sentiments in the United Kingdom, where they were not particularly strong. Many influential people in the United Kingdom believed that the colonies were economically worthless and a source of friction with the United States, and that they should be encouraged to sever their connection with Britain.

British principles also had certain implications for the constitution itself. Monarchy, which is based on the principle that political authority flows from the top downward, had never before been combined with federalism, and in a sense they were logically incompatible. However, it suited the kind of union that Macdonald and most of his colleagues wanted to create. Ottawa would be subordinate to London and the provinces would be subordinate to Ottawa, with a British governor general in Ottawa and a federally appointed lieutenant-governor in each province, each of whom would have the power to "reserve" legislation for the final decision of the government that had appointed him. Both London and Ottawa could disallow the acts of the level of government immediately below them, even though such acts had received the assent of the governor general or lieutenant-governor. The judicial system revealed similar hierarchical notions. Ottawa would appoint the judges of the provincial courts, and it was understood, although not stated, that the final court of appeal would be the Judicial Committee of the (Imperial) Privy Council, which already exercised that function for all of the colonies.

The heart of any federal constitution is the division of legislative powers. In the Quebec and London resolutions, and in the BNA Act (which followed their provisions quite closely), powers were allocated so that the central government could carry out the major objectives of Confederation. For reasons already referred to, Parliament was given all legislative powers not specifically assigned to the provincial legislatures. The Quebec Resolutions described this as a power to make laws for "the peace, welfare, and good government of Canada," consciously or unconsciously recalling the "general welfare" clause of the United States constitution. Regrettably, the Colonial Office later changed this to "Peace, Order, and good Government," contributing to a lasting myth that the Fathers of Confederation were less "liberal," whatever that may mean, than their American counterparts.

The federal government was given unlimited power to tax and borrow, the latter being particularly important at a time when colonial governments depended on the London bond market. Tariff and commercial policy would also be under its control, as would the banking system and the currency, the postal service, weights and measures, and patents and copyrights. Jurisdiction over agriculture (and immigration) was shared with the provinces, while, at the London Conference, fisheries were placed under federal jurisdiction, for reasons already discussed. For the sake of uniformity the criminal law was placed under federal control, a departure from American practice that perhaps reflected Macdonald's experience as a defence counsel in criminal cases.

The provisions for transportation, an essential part of the economics of Confederation, were complex. The federal government was given jurisdiction over navigation and shipping, and was also required to begin building the Intercolonial Railway within six months of the union and to complete it as quickly as possible. Macdonald originally proposed to list all the means of interprovincial communication that were placed under federal authority, but roads and bridges were excluded at the suggestion of Leonard Tilley, the Premier of New Brunswick. This still left the federal government with steamships, railways, canals, telegraphs, and other works and undertakings connecting two or more provinces, and with steamships connecting Canada with other countries. Parliament could also assume jurisdiction over "works" entirely within one province by declaring them to be for the general advantage of Canada. In the legislative debates on the Quebec Resolutions, Macdonald cited the Welland Canal between Lake Erie and Lake Ontario as an example of the "works" that would fall under this provision.

The provinces were given responsibility for the administration of justice, apart from criminal procedure, and the organization of the courts. They would also be responsible for municipal institutions, which were well developed in the Province of Canada although not in the Maritimes. The enumerated provincial responsibilities included those matters which were then viewed as defining the distinctiveness of French Canada: education, the family, social institutions, and the law relating to "property and civil rights." The prospect of provincial control over such matters was welcomed by the French Canadian clergy, who undoubtedly foresaw that they would be able to exercise considerable influence over Quebec's provincial legislature. Religious minorities whose rights to separate educational systems were already assured "by law," would be protected from provincial interference with those rights. This provision protected the Protestant anglophones of Quebec and the Roman Catholics—mainly Irish at that time—of Ontario. Its applicability elsewhere was less clear; a few years after Confederation, New Brunswick succeeded in abolishing its Roman Catholic separate school system on the grounds that the latter existed only by custom, and not by law.

The provincial governments were given certain powers over economic matters, which proved important later on. They shared jurisdiction over agriculture with the federal government, could borrow on their own credit, could incorporate companies "for provincial objects," and controlled roads, bridges, and whatever other "works" were not under federal jurisdiction.

The provinces were also given ownership of natural resources and the power to legislate concerning the public lands and the timber on those lands. With hindsight these provisions would appear to have been seriously mistaken, if the intention was to ensure the preponderance of the federal government. However, mineral resources, apart from Nova Scotia's coal, were then of little importance, and the timber trade, which had dominated British America for fifty years, was declining by the 1860s, the victim both of its own failure to conserve the resource on which it was based and of British and American actions that restricted its access to markets.

The fact that provincial powers and revenues were, by design, so closely associated with this declining industry may explain Macdonald's confident belief that the provincial level of government would also decline in importance. The future apparently belonged to agriculture, commerce, manufacturing, and the opening of the West, all of which would be mainly or exclusively under federal jurisdiction. ...

The terms of union clearly embodied a very centralist concept of federalism, which was perpetuated after 1867 when most of the politicians who had drafted the terms pursued their careers at the federal level, where they dominated Canadian politics for some time. The chief among them, of course, was John A. Macdonald, the principal author of the Quebec Resolutions and the BNA Act. As Prime Minister from 1867 until 1873, and again from 1878 until his death in 1891, Macdonald continued to expound the views that had inspired his constitutional draftsmanship, while at the same time he attempted to put them into practice. The Macdonaldian version of federalism, although it was increasingly challenged in the last years of Macdonald's life, thus enjoyed a more or less official status at the outset.

Macdonald was well aware, as was every other knowledgeable observer of Canadian life, that the new Dominion was a fragile and artificial creation whose impressive constitutional facade contrasted with a very limited degree of social and economic integration. He did not, however, consider the diversity of Canadian society and the persistence of local attachments to be an argument in favour of political decentralization. On the contrary, it was precisely these circumstances that made a strong central government essential. As a Hamiltonian conservative, Macdonald believed that the state could and should play an autonomous and creative role, rather than merely reflecting the social diversity that lay beneath it.

NOTE

As the author alludes to, there is a persistent trope that the United States' constitution is characterized by a commitment to "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness," while Canada's is limited to a desire for "peace, order and good government" (POGG). This is simply inaccurate. As you will see, POGG (discussed most closely in Chapter 9, Peace, Order, and Good Government) is a discrete power of the federal order of government. It has never defined Canada's constitution, whether in 1867, 1982 or, indeed, today.

Arthur I Silver, The French Canadian Idea of Confederation, 1864-1900

(Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1982) at 33-50 (footnotes omitted)

When French Lower Canadians were called on to judge the proposed confederation of British North American provinces, the first thing they wanted to know was what effect it would have on their own nationality. Before deciding whether or not they approved, they wanted to hear "what guarantees will be offered for the future of the French-Canadian nationality, to which we are attached above all else." ... [C]oncern for the French-Canadian nationality had geographical implications, ... Canadians in the 1860s generally considered French Canada and Lower Canada to be equivalent. When French Canadians spoke of their patrie, their homeland, they were invariably referring to Quebec. Even the word Canada, as they used it, usually referred to the lower province, or, even more specifically, to the valley of the St. Lawrence, that ancient home of French civilization in America, whose special status went back to the seventeenth century. ...

Throughout the discussion of Confederation, between 1864 and 1867, there ran the assumption that French Canada was a geographical as well as an ethnic entity, forming, as the Revue Canadienne pointed out optimistically, "the most considerable, the most homogeneous, and the most regularly constituted population group" in the whole Confederation. ...

It followed from this question that provincial autonomy was to be sought in the proposed constitution as a key safeguard of the interests of French Canada. "We must never forget," asserted the Gazette de Sorel, "that French Canadians need more reassurance than the other provinces for their civil and religious immunities. ..." But since French Canada was a province, its immunities were to be protected by provincial autonomy; hence, "this point is important above all for Lower Canada. ..."

On this key issue, French Canadians felt themselves to have different interests from those of other British North Americans. Thus, Cartier's organ [Cartier's newspaper, La Minerve]:

The English ... have nothing to fear from the central government, and their first concern is to ensure its proper functioning. This is what they base their hopes upon, and the need for strong local governments only takes second place in their minds.

The French press, on the contrary, feels that guarantees for the particular autonomy of our nationality must come before all else in the federal constitution. It sees the whole system as based on these very guarantees. ...

A confederation would be a fine thing, but only "if it limited as much as possible the rights of the federal government, to general matters, and left complete independence to the local governments." ...

While most papers did not go so far as to support the provincial sovereignty which that last implied, they did opt for co-ordinate sovereignty:

The federal power will be sovereign, no doubt, but it will have power only over certain general questions clearly defined by the constitution.

This is the only plan of confederation which Lower Canada can accept. ... The two levels of government must both be sovereign, each within its jurisdiction as clearly defined by the constitution.

What, after all, could be simpler than that each power, federal or provincial, should have complete control of its own field?

Isn't that perfectly possible without having the local legislatures derive their powers from the central legislature or vice versa? Isn't it possible for each of these bodies to have perfect independence within the scope of its own jurisdiction, neither one being able to invade the jurisdiction of the other?

To be sure, the fathers of Confederation were aware that French Canadians would reject complete centralization. John A. Macdonald told the Assembly that though he would have preferred a legislative union, he realized it would be unacceptable to French Canadians. Nevertheless, he felt the Quebec Resolutions did not provide for a real federalism, but would "give to the General Government the strength of a legislative and administrative union." They represented "the happy medium" between a legislative and a federal union, which, while providing guarantees for those who feared the former, would also give "us the strength of a Legislative union." In short, he appeared to understand the Quebec scheme to provide for the closest thing possible to a legislative union, saving certain guarantees for the French Canadians' "language, nationality and religion."

This interpretation was hotly rejected by French Canadians of both parties, including those who spoke for Macdonald's partner, Cartier:

Whatever guarantees may be offered here, Lower Canada will never consent to allowing its particular interests to be regulated by the inhabitants of the other provinces. ... We want a solid constitution ... but we demand above all perfect freedom and authority for the provinces to run their own internal affairs.

Let there be no mistake about it: anything close to a legislative union "cannot and will not be accepted by the French-Canadian population." A centralized union would be fatal to the French-Canadian nationality. The Courrier de St-Hyacinthe, in fact, summed up the whole French-Canadian position when it said:

But whatever guarantees they decide to offer us, we cannot accept any union other than a federal union based on the well-understood principles of confederations.

There was agreement between Bleus and Rouges [the major political groups] that the autonomy of a French-Canadian Lower Canada was the chief thing to be sought in any new constitution. Accordingly, the Confederation discussion revolved around whether or not the Quebec plan achieved that aim. As far as the opposition was concerned, it did not. The Rouges maintained that this was an "anglicizing bill," the latest in a line of attempts to bring about the "annihilation of the French race in Canada," and thus realize Lord Durham's wicked plans. And it would achieve this goal because it was not really a confederation at all, but a legislative union in disguise, a mere extension of the Union of 1840. "It is in vain," cried C.-S. Cherrier at a Rouge-sponsored rally, "that they try to disguise it under the name of confederation. ... This quasi legislative union is just a step toward a complete and absolute legislative union."

In answering all [the] opposition arguments, the Bleus certainly did not attempt to defend the notion of a strong or dominant central government. But, they maintained, that was not at all what British North America was going to get. Lower Canada, liberated from the forced Union of 1840, would become a distinct and autonomous province in a loose and decentralized Confederation—that was the real truth of the matter.

The defenders of Confederation refuted the opposition's arguments one after another. Did the Rouges speak of Rep by Pop? Why, any schoolboy ought to see the difference between Rep by Pop, which the Bleus had opposed as long as the legislative union remained, and a "confederation which would give us, first of all, local legislatures for the protection of our sectional interests, and then a federal legislature in which the most populous province would have a majority only in the lower house." As long as there was only a single legislature for the two Canadas, Rep by Pop would have put "our civil law and religious institutions at the mercy of the fanatics." But Confederation would eliminate that danger by creating a separate province of Quebec with its own distinct government:

We have a system of government which puts under the exclusive control of Lower Canada those questions which we did not want the fanatical partisans of Mr. Brown to deal with.

Since we have this guarantee, what difference does it make to us whether or not Upper Canada has more representatives than we in the Commons? Since the Commons will be concerned only with general questions of interest to all provinces and not at all with the particular affairs of Lower Canada, it's all the same to us, as a nationality, whether or not Upper Canada has more representation.

This was central to the Bleu picture of Confederation: all questions affecting the French-Canadian nationality as such would be dealt with at Quebec City, and Ottawa would be "powerless, if it should want to invade the territory reserved for the administration of the local governments." As for the questions to be dealt with at Ottawa, they might divide men as Liberals and Conservatives, but not as French and English Canadians. "In the [federal] Parliament," said Hector Langevin, "there will be no questions of race, nationality, religion or locality, as this Legislature will only be charged with the settlement of the great general questions which will interest alike the whole Confederacy and not one locality only." Cartier made the same point when he said that "in the questions which will be submitted to the Federal parliament, there will be no more danger to the rights and privileges of the French Canadians than to those of the Scotch, English or Irish." Or, as his organ, La Minerve, put it, Ottawa would have jurisdiction only over those matters "in which the interests of everyone, French Canadians, English, or Scotch, are identical." For the rest—for everything which concerned the French Canadians as French Canadians—for the protection and promotion of their national interests and institutions, they would have their own province with their own parliament and their own government.

[I]n the federal alliance thus formed, Quebec was to be the French-Canadian country, working together with the others on common projects, but always autonomous in the promotion and embodiment of the French-Canadian nationality. "Our ambitions," wrote a Bleu editor, "will not centre on the federal government, but will have their natural focus in our local legislature; this we regard as fundamental for ourselves." This was, no doubt, an exaggerated position, like the statement of de Niverville in the Canadian legislature, but what it exaggerated was the general tendency of the Confederationist propaganda. It underlined the Quebec-centredness of French Canada's approach to Confederation, and the degree to which French Quebec's separateness and autonomy were central to French-Canadian acceptance of the new régime. [Emphasis in original.]

Though much of the Constitution Act, 1867 was the product of negotiations between Canadian and Maritime political leadership, once the principal negotiators headed to London to finalize the draft resolutions, the text was altered under the influence of the British Colonial Office. The following extract traces the salient changes to the distribution of legislative power from the initial draft to the final text.

John T Saywell, The Lawmakers: Judicial Power and the Shaping of Canadian Federalism

(Toronto: Osgoode Society for Canadian Legal History and University of Toronto Press, 2002) at 4-12 (footnotes omitted)

Although the political reconstruction of the colonies had long been discussed, by 1864 "such was the opposition between the two sections of the province, such was the danger of impending anarchy," said John A. Macdonald, that some solution was imperative. When the ninth ministry in a decade tottered to its fall in the spring of 1864, ancient animosities were set aside as George Brown agreed to a coalition with Macdonald and George-Étienne Cartier, whose purpose was to seek a federal union of all British North America or, that failing, a federal union of the Canadas.

By the end of August the federal scheme was sufficiently well developed to be placed before the Maritime delegations who coincidentally had gathered at Charlottetown to discuss Maritime union. Press reports suggest that the proposed distribution of legislative powers anticipated the enumerations that would emerge in the Quebec Resolutions. The Canadians were also emphatic that the federal government would possess the residual power. When E.B. Chandler of New Brunswick proposed the reverse at Quebec, Charles Tupper interjected:

I have heard Mr. Chandler's argument with surprise. Powers undefined must rest somewhere. Those who were at Charlottetown will remember that it was fully specified that all the powers not given to the Local should be reserved to the Federal Government. This was stated as being a prominent feature of the Canadian scheme, and it was said then that it was desirable to have a plan contrary to that adopted by the United States. It was a fundamental principle laid down by Canada and the basis of our deliberations.

Publicly, Macdonald stated in a speech at Halifax after the conference that all the dangers inherent in the American system would be avoided "if we can agree upon forming a strong central government—a great central legislature—a constitution for a Union which will have all the rights of sovereignty except those given to the local governments."

The Maritimers were at least sufficiently intrigued to give further consideration to the Canadian proposal for a broader federal union. For two weeks in October 1864, delegates from the four colonies put the finishing touches on what was essentially a Canadian agreement. Apart from some debate over the location of the residual authority, even the wisdom of adding the enumerations to the federal residual authority, there was surprisingly little discussion about the distribution of legislative jurisdiction. There seemed to be general agreement with the principles Macdonald outlined when the conference opened that the "primary error" in the American constitution must be reversed "by strengthening the General Government and conferring on the provincial bodies only such powers as may be required for local purposes. All sectional prejudices and interests can be legislated by local legislatures" while the minority would be protected "by having a powerful central government." But "great caution" was necessary for "the people of every section must feel they are protected, and by no overstraining of central authority should such guarantees be overridden." The constitution would be based on an imperial act, and "any question as to overriding sectional matters determined by 'is it legal or not?'" The judicial tribunals of Great Britain would settle any such difficulties should they occur."

What became the first version of sections 91 and 92 of the 1867 constitution emerged in the Quebec Resolutions as follows:

29. The General Parliament shall have power to make Laws for the peace, welfare and good Government of the Federated Provinces (saving the Sovereignty of England), and especially Laws respecting the following subjects:

[Then followed a list of subjects, numbered 1 through 36, much like those in s 91 and including what became s 94.]

37. And Generally respecting all matters of a general character, not specially and exclusively reserved for the Local Governments and Legislatures.

• • •

43. The Local Legislatures shall have power to make Laws respecting the following subjects [then followed a list similar to that in s 92 and including the following subjects]:

15. Property and civil rights, excepting those portions thereof assigned to the General Parliament.

18. And generally all matters of a private or local nature, not assigned to the General Parliament.

The heads of the two sections are distinct, with the federal government's enumerations unqualified and prefaced by the word "especially" but the tails are identical in providing a home for matters either general or local not otherwise captured by the preceding enumerations and not to be found among those reserved for the other jurisdiction. (The so-called "sovereignty" of the central government apparently was to be found in the head with the traditional enacting clause in which the imperial government had conveyed legislative power to colonial legislatures, although Macdonald seemed to find it in the tail or more generally in the breadth and importance of federal jurisdiction.)

The debate on the Quebec Resolutions in the Canadian Legislative Assembly in 1865 casts less light than shadow on precisely what had been accomplished, perhaps because amendments were prohibited: it was all or nothing. Macdonald maintained that the federal government had "all the great subjects of legislation. We have conferred on them, not only specifically and in detail, all the powers which are incident to sovereignty, but we have expressly declared that all subjects of general interest not distinctly and exclusively conferred upon the local governments and local legislatures, shall be conferred upon the General Government and Legislature." The 37th subsection, he added, "confers on the General Legislature the general mass of sovereign legislation ... This is precisely the provision which is wanting in the Constitution of the United States."

It remained for Joseph Cauchon to lecture ... Macdonald ... on the nature of sovereignty in the new federation. If sovereignty existed, "it must be in the Constitution. If it is not to be found there, it is because it does not exist." In the proposed federation "there will be no absolute sovereign power, each legislature having its distinct and independent attributes, not proceeding from one to the other by delegation, either from above or from below. The Federal Parliament will have legislative sovereign power in all questions submitted to its control in the Constitution. So also the local legislatures will be sovereign in all matters which are specially assigned to them." And, as in the United States, disputes between them would be settled by the courts.

After six weeks of partisan debate in February and March 1865, the Quebec Resolutions were approved by a vote of forty-five to fifteen in the Legislative Council and ninety-one to thirty-three in the Assembly. It was not until December 1866, however, that the delegates from Canada, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia were able to meet in London to draft the final resolutions for submission to the imperial government. On Boxing Day 1866, after three weeks of work and play, but with the Quebec Resolutions virtually unchanged, Macdonald sent the London Resolutions to Lord Carnarvon ... to be embodied in an act creating the Canadian federation.

... As discussion on the drafts began late in January 1867, Cartier and Hector Langevin were summoned to a meeting to face Lord Carnarvon, the new colonial secretary, Lord Monck, the governor general, and senior officials of the Colonial Office in a futile attempt to get them to agree to some special guarantees for their distinct society, presumably in return for some weakening of provincial jurisdiction over property and civil rights (or conceivably even its removal from the provincial enumerations). ...

Shortly after receiving the Quebec Resolutions, [the colonial secretary, Edward] Cardwell had set Sir Francis Reilly, "our best draughtsman," to work on a bill. Reilly was instructed to "get rid of some of the ambiguities" and was unquestionably made aware that Cardwell and the cabinet wanted "the Local Legislatures to dwindle down towards the Municipal as much as possible." Lord Carnarvon, who succeeded Cardwell in the summer of 1866, informed Cardwell (and certainly Reilly) that "my foremost object wd. be to strengthen, as far as is practicable, the central govt. against the exclusive power or encroachments of the local administration." Reilly had completed most of his first draft before the London Conference began in December 1866.

Reilly radically altered the structure of what became section 91. At its head he placed the now familiar enacting clause, an unambiguous assertion of residual legislative jurisdiction:

It shall be lawful for Her Majesty, Her Heirs and Successors, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Houses of Parliament of the United Colony, to make laws for the Peace, Order and good Government of the United Colony and of the several Provinces, in relation to all Matters not coming within the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to Provincial Legislation.

He followed this with a declaratory clause:

and for greater Certainty, but not so as to restrict the Generality of the foregoing Terms of this Section, it is hereby declared that the Legislative Authority of the Parliament of the United Colony extends to all Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say ...

The federal enumerations remained largely as they were in the resolutions. However, Reilly made two significant changes in the provincial enumerations. He removed the limitation on "property and civil rights"—"excepting those portions thereof assigned to the General Parliament" (which had been in the resolutions)—and completely eliminated the enumeration "matters of a local or private nature." Obviously well aware of the enormous potential of the breadth of property and civil rights with the qualification removed, Reilly added a very emphatic deeming clause at the end of what became section 91:

And any Matter coming within any of the Classes of Subjects enumerated in this Section shall not be deemed to come within the Subject of Property and Civil Rights comprised in the enumeration of the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to Provincial Legislation.

After receiving the London Resolutions, Reilly touched up his draft and sent it to Carnarvon on 17 January 1867.

For two weeks, draft followed draft. "The difficulties, the suggestions, the amendments during the last week have been endless," Carnarvon informed the prime minister on 6 February. Three days later, the draughtsmen, Reilly and the colonial attorneys general, finished what Sir Joseph Pope called the "final draft." The enacting and declaratory clauses remained as in Reilly's draft; the deeming clause, which had been in and out, was in to protect against an interpretation of property and civil rights which could encroach on the federal enumerations; and matters "local and private," which had been in and out, was out. However, it was not until six o'clock on 12 February, when Carnarvon moved first reading in the House of Lords, that the real final draft was completed. . . .

In the three days after 9 February, three unquestionably interrelated changes were made to sections 91 and 92. Provincial jurisdiction over "generally matters of a merely local and private nature" had reappeared without the qualification in the Quebec and London resolutions but with the addition of the word "merely." Provincial jurisdiction over property and civil rights was listed without qualification. There were, however, two critically important additions and alterations in section 91. The exclusivity and paramountcy of the federal enumerations had been reinforced in the declaratory clause by the addition of italicized words:

... and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the Generality of the foregoing Terms of this Section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this Act)

the exclusive Legislative Authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated ...

The second was an alteration in the application of the deeming clause, which had previously been used to protect against property and civil rights. The draftsmen obviously believed that the reinforced declaratory clause adequately protected all federal enumerations against all provincial enumerations, including property and civil rights. Although it may not have been necessary, they used the deeming clause as an additional safeguard—with the singular “Class” and the words “comprised in” unchanged—to refer explicitly to “Class of Matters of a local or private Nature comprised in the Enumerations of the Classes of Subjects assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces.” No other plausible conclusions about the purpose and the interrelationship of the new provisions of the act can be reached on the basis of the drafting history and the language used.

The drafting in London had provided a structural coherence, or logic, to the relationship between sections 91 and 92. Moreover, Reilly had also created a sequential approach to determining the appropriate home for federal or provincial legislation. The Quebec Resolutions had given each jurisdiction power to make laws “respecting subjects” at the head of their respective sections and also “generally respecting all matters” of either a general or local nature at the tail. In his first draft Reilly had empowered governments to make laws “in relation to matters,” not subjects, “coming within” the enumerated powers which he categorized as “Classes of Subjects.” The sequence was first to identify the matter and then determine the “class of subjects” within which it came. Only at that stage might the relationship of sections 91 and 92 be critical in the allocation of jurisdiction.

Reilly and his Canadian associates in London had also made the exclusivity of the legislative jurisdiction of both levels of government much clearer than in the Quebec Resolutions. Within their allocated sphere, however they might be determined, both were autonomous and supreme. Jurisdictionally, coordinate or classical federalism was written into the constitution. The provision, based on the imperial model but with an undefined purpose, that the federal government could disallow provincial legislation qualified that legislative autonomy, but it could be exercised only at the discretion of the executive and was thus a matter of politics or policy, not of law, and its use was not justiciable. It would be the function of the courts to police the boundaries separating provincial and federal legislative jurisdiction.

NOTES

1. Was the Canada created by the BNA Act a true federal state? That depends, of course, on the attributes that a country must possess in order for it to qualify for that designation. What those attributes are, or should be, is a matter that scholars of federalism have debated for a long time. One view is that they include the following: (1) a division of legislative powers between two independent orders of government of coordinate (or equal) status, one national and the other regional; (2) which division of powers cannot be altered by the unilateral action of either order; and (3) which division of powers is protected and enforced by an impartial and independent arbiter. Assuming for the sake of argument that those are the appropriate attributes, did the Canada of 1867 possess them? If not, in what respects did it fall short?

2. When you have finished reading the remaining chapters of Part Two, Federalism in this casebook, ask yourself whether the Canada of today is any closer to being a true federal state (as defined in note 1) than the Canada of 1867.

3. Paul Romney emphasizes that "general" residual authority was allocated to both levels of government in the Quebec Resolutions. Only after the text went through several drafts was local residuary authority restored to the provinces in s 92(16). Without this history in mind, the final text left the impression that the federal government alone had residual authority. This was not the intention of the framers, Romney maintains, although, as you will see in the chapters that follow, the place where residual authority resides becomes a matter of some controversy: see Paul Romney, Getting It Wrong: How Canadians Forgot Their Past and Imperilled Confederation (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1999) at 100-2.

A NOTE ON QUEBEC'S CIVIL CODE

Recall that in the 1760 Articles of Capitulation of Montreal, above, local laws and customs were preserved "according to the custom of Paris." The Coutume de Paris has been described as Quebec's first civil code:

Although no more than the body of customary law applicable to Paris and its environs, it had in fact attained in France, by the end of the sixteenth century, the status of the preeminent French custom. It was, in effect, a "common law" (droit commun coutumier) of Northern France and, as such, a logical choice for extension to a colony, even though the majority of the population in Canada came from areas other than Paris itself. In its final written redaction of 1580, however, it was far from providing a complete body of law.

See Martin Boodman, JEC Brierly & Roderick A Macdonald, eds, Quebec Civil Law: An Introduction to Quebec Private Law (Toronto: Emond Montgomery, 1993) at 8.

The Royal Proclamation of 1763 imposed British civil and criminal law in the new colony of Quebec. To the extent that it was intended to displace Canadian laws and customs, it was described as "impossible [to do], as it would be injurious": see William Paul McClure Kennedy & Gustave Lanctôt, eds, Reports on the Law of Quebec 1767-1770 (Ottawa: FA Acland, 1931) at 64. The Quebec Act of 1774 restored what were then called the "Laws of Canada" in "all Matters of Controversy, relative to Property and Civil Rights." As it evolved over the years, the diversity of sources associated with civil law in Quebec gave rise to what Durham called a patch-work of the results of the interference, at different times, of different legislative powers, each proceeding on utterly different and generally incomplete views, and each utterly regardless of the other. The law itself is a mass of incoherent and conflicting laws, part French, part English, and with the line between each very confusedly drawn.

See The Report of the Earl of Durham (London: Methuen, 1902) at 81.

It was this mélange of laws and customs, with its diversity of influences, that was codified in the first Civil Code of Lower Canada of 1866, 29 Vict, ch 4. The Civil Code encapsulates the legal principles to be accorded to persons, property, and civil obligations, subjects that in English-speaking Canada are ordinarily associated with the "private law" or "common law."

That codification of Lower Canada's civil law came about alongside the push toward Confederation is not entirely coincidental. George-Étienne Cartier, attorney general for Canada East and one of the fathers of Confederation, is credited with having spearheaded the effort. By the time the Code was adopted, the general outlines of the Confederation scheme were sufficiently well known that the drafters steered clear of some obvious federal subjects. As Thomas McCord noted in the first English-language edition of the Code:

In view of a union of the British American provinces, the codification of our laws is perhaps better calculated than any other available means to secure to Lower Canada an advantage which the proposed plan of confederation appears to have already contemplated, that of being the standard of assimilation and unity, and of entering into new political relations without undergoing disturbing alterations in her laws or institutions.

See Thomas McCord, The Civil Code of Lower Canada Together with a Synopsis of the Changes in the Law Effected by the Civil Code of Lower Canada, 2nd ed (Montreal: Dawson, 1880) at i-ii.

Mere months before Confederation, codification thus "imposed a simple, written, organized, revised, unified and universal civil law across what in 1867 became the province of Quebec": Brian Young, The Politics of Codification: The Lower Canadian Civil Code of 1866 (Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press, 1994) at 178. This process crystallized, practically and symbolically, Quebec's status as a mixed legal jurisdiction and Canada's status as a bijural federation. For an examination of the legal and cultural challenges facing bijuralism and mixity in Canada and the role of law as an identification marker, see Jean-François Gaudreault-DesBiens, Les solitudes du bijuridisme au Canada: Essai sur les rapports de pouvoir entre les traditions juridiques et la résilience des atavismes identitaires [The Solitudes of Bijuralism in Canada: An Essay on the Power Relations Between Legal Traditions and the Resilience of Identity Atavisms] (Montreal: Éditions Thémis, 2007). Whatever the motivations for codification, it was a prescient exercise and its significance in future constitutional confrontations is immeasurable.

As you read the cases that follow, consider to what degree the Civil Code represents a convenient compendium of laws typically falling within the provincial enumeration called "property and civil rights." Do the subjects covered by Quebec's Civil Code serve as a proxy for jurisdiction for all provinces over such private law matters? Might they also have been intended to serve as a model for "the standard of assimilation and unity" represented by Confederation and embodied in the promise of s 94, which provides for the federal uniformity of laws respecting property and civil rights for those provinces outside Quebec that provide their consent?

CHAPTER FOUR

THE LATE NINETEENTH CENTURY: THE COURTS SET AN INITIAL COURSE

I. Introduction	73
II. The Manitoba Schools Question	97
III. Federalism and Indigenous Peoples and Lands: The St Catharines Milling Case ...	102

I. INTRODUCTION

This chapter deals with the period from Confederation to about 1900. During this period, Canada experienced a dramatic expansion to the east, west, and north. In 1870, two British territories to the west and north of Ontario and Quebec, Rupert's Land and the North-Western Territory, were admitted to Canada and, as territories, were made subject to the jurisdiction of Parliament. In the same year, the province of Manitoba was established by Parliament out of part of Rupert's Land, and the remainder of that territory and the North-Western Territory was renamed the Northwest Territories. British Columbia joined Confederation the following year, and Prince Edward Island joined Confederation in 1873.

Also during this period, for the first time, judges and scholars faced the task of interpreting the British North America Act (BNA Act). In retrospect, the decisions they had to make involved two large and overlapping topics: (1) the general nature of Canadian federalism, especially decisions about the nature of the provincial legislatures and executives; and (2) the division of legislative powers. Both are included here, although the second is our primary concern and the first appears only briefly, in the middle of the chapter. The chapter concludes with a description of the establishment of Manitoba in the aftermath of a rebellion by the Métis people, and a subsequent constitutional dispute over religious education in the province.

One element of the context needs to be described. Within a few years after Confederation, a struggle for power began between the Dominion, led throughout most of this period by Sir John A Macdonald and the Conservatives, and the provinces, led by Ontario and its Liberal premier, Oliver Mowat. This story has come to be known as the story of "provincial rights." The name is a wonderful example of the effective use of words: the provinces appropriated powerful constitutional words, evoking the glories of centuries of British constitutional history by claiming to be fighting for their "liberty" or their "rights": on the discourse of rights in the late 19th century, see Richard Risk & Robert C Vipond, "Rights Talk in Canada: 'The Good Sense and Right Feeling of the People'" (1996) 14:1 L & Hist Rev at 1.

The reasons for the struggle are debatable. Some historians, perhaps most, explain it as a product of political opportunism by the provinces and inconsistent with the agreement at Confederation; others, understanding Confederation differently, see it as a continuation of a long tradition of local autonomy. Whatever the reasons, a wide range of issues were involved, including the financial terms of Confederation, the location of the boundary between Ontario and Manitoba, the nature of the provincial legislatures, the powers of the provincial executives, the use of the disallowance power, and the division of legislative powers. The contest took place on a wide range of battlegrounds, including newspapers, election platforms, legislatures, and courts. By 1900, Ontario and Mowat had triumphed. The results in the courts were a measure of that triumph—the provinces won most of the cases, by far.

The Canadian courts began to hear challenges to statutes on division-of-powers grounds in the late 1860s, and the legitimacy of their function was soon challenged in a New Brunswick case, R v Chandler (1868), 1 Hannay 556, 12 NBR 556. If legislative supremacy was a fundamental constitutional principle, how could courts review statutes and declare them to be void? WJ Ritchie, Chief Justice of New Brunswick, responded at 556-57:

We must recognize the undoubted legislative control of the British Parliament, and give full force and effect to the statute of the Supreme Legislature, and ignore the Act of the subordinate, when ... they are repugnant and in conflict. ... The constitution of the Dominion and the Provinces is now, to a great extent, a written one, and where under the terms of the Union Act the power to legislate is granted to be exercised exclusively by one body, the subject so exclusively assigned is as completely taken from the others, as if they had been expressly forbidden to act on it; and if they do legislate beyond their powers, or in defiance of the restrictions placed on them, their enactments are no more binding than rules or regulations promulgated by any other unauthorized body.

That is, courts would interpret the BNA Act to determine whether it gave the power to enact the statute. That courts would have the final say about the scope of constitutional authority seems, in hindsight, inevitable and inescapable. Yet some politicians and judges took issue with this judicial role, particularly in New Brunswick in the early 1870s, believing that judicial review under the BNA Act was inconsistent with the notion of legislative supremacy enshrined in the Act. Instead, some thoughtful voices believed that the power of disallowance was the only means of controlling legislative activity beyond the jurisdiction of the provinces: see below, "Note: The Power of Disallowance." These debates in New Brunswick suggest that judicial review in Canada was not inevitable. Chief Justice Ritchie's views, however, quickly took hold in the Canadian legal imagination, and thereafter judicial review was so firmly established that it needed little or no explanation or justification. This history is discussed in Gordon Bale, "Judicial Review and Confederation" in Chief Justice William Johnstone Ritchie: Responsible Government and Judicial Review (Ottawa: Carleton University Press, 1991) ch 10.

The decisions of provincial courts of appeal could be appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada, which was established in 1875, and from provincial courts of appeal or from the Supreme Court to the Privy Council. Eventually, and no later than 1900, the Privy Council came to be dominant, not only in the sense that it was the final Court of Appeal, but, as well, in the sense that it determined the outcomes and doctrine with little or no restraint or respect for the Canadian courts. It became the oracle to which Canadian lawyers and courts deferred for more than half a century.

Citizens Insurance Co of Canada v Parsons

(1881), 7 App Cas 96, [1881-5] All ER Rep 1179 (UKJCPC), rev'g Citizens' and The Queen Insurance Cos v Parsons, 4 SCR 215, 1880 CanLII 6

[In 1876, Ontario enacted legislation about fire insurance policies that specified a set of standard conditions, which were "deemed to be a part of every policy of fire insurance" made in the province and which were to be "printed on every such policy with the heading 'Statutory Conditions.'" An insurer could vary or omit any of these conditions if it added the variations or omissions to the policy "in conspicuous type and in ink of a different colour."

Parsons brought an action on two fire insurance policies, written by two different insurers, to recover compensation for losses caused by a fire in his hardware store. Several issues were raised, but the central one was whether the Ontario legislation was valid. The insurers claimed that Parsons had failed to disclose information required by conditions in the policies. Parsons claimed that the conditions were void because they did not comply with the legislation, and the insurers argued that the legislation was ultra vires.

This dispute was between private parties, Parsons and the insurance companies, but nonetheless Premier Mowat participated by arguing Ontario's position at the Supreme Court and by preparing a thorough analysis for the benefit of Parsons' counsel in the Privy Council. He participated in this sort of way in other cases throughout this period, and this effort may have been one of the reasons for his success.

In the trial Court and the Ontario Court of Appeal, the plaintiff's claim succeeded. The Supreme Court of Canada dismissed the insurers' appeal by a majority of four to two. Because the companies appealed again, to the Privy Council, the decision of the Supreme Court was of little or no use as a precedent in arguing subsequent cases and it did not become part, even a small part, of the fabric of the doctrine. Nonetheless, we have included some parts of its judgments here, and we have done the same throughout this part for other judgments of Canadian courts that suffered the same fate. Note that Ritchie CJ is the very same WJ Ritchie, former Chief Justice of New Brunswick, quoted earlier.]

RITCHIE CJ:

Is, then, such legislation as this with respect to the contract of insurance beyond the power of local legislation? I think at the outset I may affirm with confidence that the B.N.A. Act recognizes in the Dominion constitution and in the provincial constitutions a legislative sovereignty, if that is a proper expression to use, as independent and as exclusive in the one as in the other over the matters respectively confided to them, and the power of each must be equally respected by the other, or ultra vires legislation will necessarily be the result.

I think the power of the Dominion parliament to regulate trade and commerce ought not to be held to be necessarily inconsistent with those of the local legislatures to regulate property and civil rights in respect to all matters of a merely local and private nature, ... unless, indeed, the laws of the provincial legislatures should conflict with those of the Dominion parliament passed for the general regulation of trade and commerce. I do not think the local legislatures are to be deprived of all power to deal with property and civil rights, because parliament, in the plenary exercise of its power to regulate trade and commerce, may possibly pass laws inconsistent with the exercise by the local legislatures of their powers—the exercise of the powers of the local legislatures being in such a case subject to such regulations as the Dominion may lawfully prescribe.

The Act now under consideration is not, in my opinion, a regulation of trade and commerce; it deals with the contract of fire insurance, as between the insurer and the insured. That contract is simply a contract of indemnity against loss or damage by fire, whereby one party, in consideration of an immediate fixed payment, undertakes to pay or make good to the other any loss or damage by fire, which may happen during a fixed period to specified property, not exceeding the sum named as the limit of insurance.

I scarcely know how one could better illustrate the exercise of the power of the local legislatures to legislate with reference to property and civil rights, and matters of a merely local and private nature, than by a local Act of incorporation, whereby a right to hold or deal with real or personal property in a province is granted, and whereby the civil right to contract and sue and to be sued as an individual in reference thereto is also granted. If a legislature possesses this power, ... it must have the right to limit and control the manner in which the property may be so dealt with, and as to the [terms and conditions of the] contracts in reference thereto

• • •

I am happy to say I can foresee, and I fear, no evil effects whatever, as has been suggested, as likely to result to the Dominion from this view of the case. On the contrary, I believe that while this decision recognizes and sustains the legislative control of the Dominion parliament over all matters confided to its legislative jurisdiction, it, at the same time, preserves to the local legislatures those rights and powers conferred on them by the B.N.A. Act, and which a contrary decision would, in my opinion, in effect, substantially, or, to a very large extent, sweep away.

GWYNNE J (dissenting):

... [I]t seems to me to be difficult to conceive what greater assertion of jurisdiction to regulate trade and commerce there could be, than is involved in the assumption and exercise of the right to prescribe ... by what form of contract only, by what persons only, and subject to what conditions only, particular trades ... may be carried on If this may be done in one trade, obviously it may be done in every trade As to the Act under consideration, if it be open to the construction put upon it by the courts below, it seems to me to be impossible to conceive any stronger instance of the assertion of supreme sovereign legislative power to regulate and control the trade of fire insurance and of fire insurance companies, if the business of those companies be a trade. [None of] the items enumerated in s. 92 ... indicates the slightest intention of conferring upon the local legislatures the power to interfere in any matter relating to trade or commerce, or in any matter which in any manner affects any commercial business of any kind

Within this Dominion the right of exercise of National Sovereignty is vested solely in Her Majesty ... and in the Parliament of which Her Majesty is an integral part; these powers are, within this Dominion, the sole administrators and guardians of the Comity of Nations. To prevent all possibility of the local legislatures ... presuming to interfere in any matter affecting trade and commerce, and by so doing violating, it might be, the Comity of Nations, all matters coming within those subjects are placed under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Dominion parliament; that the Act in question does usurp the jurisdiction of the Dominion parliament, I must say I entertain no doubt. The logical result of a contrary decision would afford just grounds to despair of the stability of the Dominion. The object of the B.N.A. Act was to lay in the Dominion Constitution the foundations of a nation, and not to give to provinces carved out of, and subordinated to, the Dominion, anything of the nature of a national or quasi national existence. ...

[Henry J, with whom Strong J concurred, and Fournier J wrote similar judgments; Taschereau J dissented. Throughout this period, Gwynne J was the member of the Court most sympathetic to the Dominion and Sir John A Macdonald's vision of Confederation.]

The insurer appealed to the Privy Council.]

SIR MONTAGUE SMITH:

The scheme of this legislation, as expressed in the first branch of s. 91, is to give to the dominion parliament authority to make laws for the good government of Canada in all matters not coming within the classes of subjects assigned exclusively to the provincial legislature. If s. 91 had stopped here, and if the classes of subjects enumerated in s. 92 had been altogether distinct and different from those in s. 91, no conflict of legislative authority could have arisen. The provincial legislatures would have had exclusive legislative power over the sixteen classes of subjects assigned to them, and the dominion parliament exclusive power over all other matters relating to the good government of Canada. But it must have been foreseen that this sharp and definite distinction had not been and could not be attained, and that some of the classes of subjects assigned to the provincial legislatures unavoidably ran into and were embraced by some of the enumerated classes of subjects in s. 91; hence an endeavour appears to have been made to provide for cases of apparent conflict; and it would seem that with this object it was declared in the second branch of the s. 91, "for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section" that (notwithstanding anything in the Act) the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada should extend to all matters coming within the classes of subjects enumerated in that section. ...

Notwithstanding this endeavour to give pre-eminence to the dominion parliament in cases of a conflict of powers, it is obvious that in some cases where this apparent conflict exists, the legislature could not have intended that the powers exclusively assigned to the provincial legislature should be absorbed in those given to the dominion parliament. Take as one instance the subject "marriage and divorce," contained in the enumeration of subjects in s. 91; it is evident that solemnization of marriage would come within this general description; yet "solemnization of marriage in the province" is enumerated among the classes of subjects in s. 92, and no one can doubt, notwithstanding the general language of s. 91, that this subject is still within the exclusive authority of the legislatures of the provinces. So "the raising of money by any mode or system of taxation" is enumerated among the classes of subjects in s. 91; but, though the description is sufficiently large and general to include "direct taxation within the province, in order to the raising of a revenue for provincial purposes," assigned to the provincial legislatures by s. 92, it obviously could not have been intended that, in this instance also, the general power should override the particular one. With regard to certain classes of subjects, therefore, generally described in s. 91, legislative power may reside as to some matters falling within the general description of these subjects in the legislatures of the provinces. In these cases it is the duty of the Courts, however difficult it may be, to ascertain in what degree, and to what extent, authority to deal with matters falling within these classes of subjects exists in each legislature, and to define in the particular case before them the limits of their respective powers. It could not have been the intention that a conflict should exist; and, in order to prevent such a result, the two sections must be read together, and the language of one interpreted, and, where necessary, modified, by that of the other. In this way it may, in most cases, be found possible to arrive at a reasonable and practical construction of the language of the sections, so as to reconcile the respective powers they contain, and give effect to all of them. In performing this difficult duty, it will be a wise course for those on whom it is thrown, to decide each case which arises as best they can, without entering more largely upon an interpretation of the statute than is necessary for the decision of the particular question in hand.

The first question to be decided is, whether the Act ... falls within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in s. 92, ... for if it does not, it can be of no validity It is only when an Act of the provincial legislature prima facie falls within one of these classes of subjects that the further questions arise, viz., whether, notwithstanding this is so, the subject of the Act does not also fall within one of the enumerated classes of subjects in s. 91, and whether the power of the provincial legislature is or is not thereby overborne.

The main contention on the part of the respondent was that the Ontario Act in question had relation to matters coming within the class of subjects described in s. 92(13), viz., "Property and civil rights in the province." The Act deals with policies of insurance ... for insuring property situate [in Ontario] against fire, and prescribes certain conditions which are to form part of such contracts. These contracts, and the rights arising from them, it was argued, came legitimately within the class of subject, "Property and civil rights." The appellants, on the other hand, contended that civil rights meant only such rights as flowed from the law, and gave as an instance the status of persons. Their Lordships cannot think that the latter construction is the correct one. They find no sufficient reason in the language itself, nor in the other parts of the Act, for giving so narrow an interpretation to the words "civil rights." The words are sufficiently large to embrace, in their fair and ordinary meaning, rights arising from contract, and such rights are not included in express terms in any of the enumerated classes of subjects in s. 91.

It becomes obvious, as soon as an attempt is made to construe the general terms in which the classes of subjects of ss. 91 and 92 are described, that both sections and the other parts of the Act must be looked at to ascertain whether language of a general nature must not by necessary implication or reasonable intendment be modified and limited. In looking at s. 91, it will be found not only that there is no class including, generally, contracts and the rights arising from them, but that one class of contracts is mentioned and enumerated, viz., "18, bills of exchange and promissory notes," which it would have been unnecessary to specify if authority over all contracts and the rights arising from them had belonged to the dominion parliament.

The provision found in s. 94 of the British North America Act, which is one of the sections relating to the distribution of legislative powers, was referred to by the learned counsel on both sides By that section the parliament of Canada is empowered to make provision for the uniformity of any laws relative to "property and civil rights" in Ontario, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick ... if the provincial legislatures choose to adopt the provision so made. The province of Quebec is omitted from this section for the obvious reason that the law which governs property and civil rights in Quebec is in the main the French law ... and not the English law which prevails in the other provinces. The words "property and civil rights" are, obviously, used in the same sense in this section as in s. 92(13), and there seems no reason for presuming that contracts and the rights arising from them were not intended to be included in this provision for uniformity. If, however, the narrow construction of the words "civil rights," contended for by the appellants were to prevail, the dominion parliament could, under its general power, legislate in regard to contracts in all and each of the provinces and as a consequence of this the province of Quebec, though now governed by its own Civil Code ... as regards contracts and their incidents, would be subject to have its law on that subject altered by the dominion legislature, and brought into uniformity with the English law prevailing in the other three provinces, notwithstanding that Quebec has been carefully left out of the uniformity section of the Act.

It is to be observed that the same words, "civil rights," are employed in ... [the Quebec Act of 1774] which made provision for the Government of the province of Quebec. Sect. 8 of that Act enacted that His Majesty's Canadian subjects within the province of Quebec should enjoy their property, usages, and other civil rights, as they had before done, and that in all matters of controversy relative to property and civil rights resort should be had to the laws of Canada, and be determined agreeably to the said laws. In this statute the words "property" and "civil rights" are plainly used in their largest sense; and there is no reason for holding that in the statute under discussion they are used in a different and narrower one.

The next question for consideration is whether, assuming the Ontario Act to relate to the subject of property and civil rights, its enactments and provisions come within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in s. 91. The only one which the Appellants suggested as expressly including the subject of the Ontario Act is s. 91(2), "the regulation of trade and commerce."

A question was raised which led to much discussion in the Courts below and this bar, viz., whether the business of insuring buildings against fire was a trade. This business, when carried on for the sake of profit, may, no doubt, in some sense of the word, be called a trade. But contracts of indemnity made by insurers can scarcely be considered trading contracts, nor were insurers who made them held to be "traders" under the English bankruptcy laws; they have been made subject to those laws by special description. Whether the business of fire insurance properly falls within the description of a "trade" must, in their Lordships' view, depend upon the sense in which that word is used in the particular statute to be construed; but in the present case their Lordships do not find it necessary to rest their decision on the narrow ground that the business of insurance is not a trade.

The words "regulation of trade and commerce," in their unlimited sense are sufficiently wide, if uncontrolled by the context and other parts of the Act, to include every regulation of trade ranging from political arrangements in regard to trade with foreign governments, requiring the sanction of parliament, down to minute rules for regulating particular trades. But a consideration of the Act shews that the words were not used in this unlimited sense. In the first place the collocation of s. 91(2) with classes of subjects of national and general concern affords an indication that regulations relating to general trade and commerce were in the mind of the legislature, when conferring this power on the dominion parliament. If the words had been intended to have the full scope of which in their literal meaning they are susceptible, the specific mention of several of the other classes of subjects enumerated in s. 91 would have been unnecessary; as, s. 91(15), banking; s. 91(17), weights and measures; s. 91(18), bills of exchange and promissory notes; s. 91(19), interest; and even s. 91(21), bankruptcy and insolvency.

"Regulation of trade and commerce" may have been used in some such sense as the words "regulations of trade" in the Act of Union between England and Scotland (6 Anne, c. 11), and as these words have been used in Acts of State relating to trade and commerce. Article V of the Act of Union enacted that all the subjects of the United Kingdom should have "full freedom and intercourse of trade and navigation" to and from all places in the United Kingdom and the Colonies; and Article VI enacted that all parts of the United Kingdom from and after the Union should be under the same "prohibitions, restrictions, and regulations of trade." Parliament has at various times since the Union passed laws affecting and regulating specific trades in one part of the United Kingdom only, without its being supposed that it thereby infringed the Articles of Union. Thus the Acts for regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors notoriously vary in the two kingdoms. So with regard to Acts relating to bankruptcy, and various other matters.

Construing therefore the words "regulation of trade and commerce" by the[se] various [interpretative] aids ... they would include political arrangements in regard to trade requiring the sanction of parliament, regulation of trade in matters of inter-provincial concern, and it may be that they would include general regulation of trade affecting the whole dominion. Their Lordships abstain on the present occasion from any attempt to define the limits of the authority of the dominion parliament in this direction. It is enough for the decision of the present case to say that, in their view, its authority to legislate for the regulation of trade and commerce does not comprehend the power to regulate by legislation the contracts of a particular business or trade, such as the business of fire insurance in a single province, and therefore that its legislative authority does not in the present case conflict or compete with the power over property and civil rights assigned to the legislature of Ontario by s. 92(13).

Having taken this view of the present case, it becomes unnecessary to consider the question how far the general power to make regulations of trade and commerce, when competently exercised by the dominion parliament, might legally modify or affect property and civil rights in the provinces, or the legislative power of the provincial legislatures in relation to those subjects

On the best consideration they have been able to give to the arguments addressed to them and to the judgments of the learned judges in Canada, their Lordships have come to the conclusion that the Act in question is valid. ...

Appeal dismissed.

Much of the remaining material in this chapter is about challenges to legislation about liquor. In the late 19th century, people drank, debated drinking, and regulated drinking. Local governments had regulated taverns for decades before Confederation, and had powers to impose temperance measures, such as limitations on the numbers of taverns. Fees for tavern licences and taxes on the import and manufacture of liquor were important sources of government revenue, and tavern licences were a major source of patronage and political loyalty, especially for Mowat's government. After the late 1860s, campaigns for temperance and prohibition became one of the most powerful and divisive social and political movements of the late 19th and early 20th centuries. All of this concern and conflict produced a multitude of challenges to statutes, thereby providing the other meaning of our ambiguous subtitle.

The parts of the story that concern us here begin in the 1870s, when pressure from temperance groups mounted. Two statutes were enacted that made the political stakes much higher than they had been before. The first was the Liquor Licence Act, SO 1876, c 26, known commonly as the Crooks Act, which was enacted by Ontario in 1876 and is described later in this chapter. The second was the Canada Temperance Act, SC 1878, c 16, enacted in 1878 by the Dominion, which enabled local option across the nation. A majority of voters in any city or county could opt to prohibit retail sales of liquor. More precisely, the effect of a vote for local option was to prohibit sales, except for sales of quantities over specified minimums by brewers, distillers, and wholesale traders, as long as they had "good reason to believe" that the liquor would be taken "forthwith" from the city or county. Anyone who sold liquor in violation of this prohibition was liable, on summary conviction, to a fine of $50 for the first offence and $100 for the second. In Russell v The Queen (1882), 7 App Cas 829, 51 LJPC 77 (UKJCPC), a private citizen began a criminal prosecution under the Act against Russell, a tavern owner in Fredericton, for selling liquor in violation of its terms. Russell argued that the Temperance Act was ultra vires Parliament.

Russell v The Queen

(1882), 7 App Cas 829, 51 LJPC 77 (UKJCPC)

SIR MONTAGUE SMITH:

The general scheme of the British North America Act with regard to the distribution of legislative powers, and the general scope and effect of ss. 91 and 92, and their relation to each other, were fully considered and commented on by this Board in the case of the Citizens Insurance Company v. Parsons [4 SCR 215, 1880 CanLII 6]. According to the principle of construction there pointed out, the first question to be determined is, whether the Act now in question falls within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in s. 92, and assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces. If it does, then the further question would arise, viz., whether the subject of the Act does not also fall within one of the enumerated classes of subjects in s. 91, and so does not still belong to the Dominion Parliament. But if the Act does not fall within any of the classes of subjects in s. 92, no further question will remain, for it cannot be contended, and indeed was not contended at their Lordships' bar, that, if the Act does not come within one of the classes of subjects assigned to the Provincial Legislatures, the Parliament of Canada had not, by its general power "to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada," full legislative authority to pass it.

Three classes of subjects enumerated in s. 92 were referred to, under each of which, it was contended by the appellant's counsel, the present legislation fell. These were:

9. Shop, saloon, tavern, auctioneer, and other licenses in order to the raising of a revenue for provincial, local, or municipal purposes.
13. Property and civil rights in the province.
16. Generally all matters of a merely local or private nature in the province.

With regard to the first of these classes, s. 92(9), it is to be observed that the power of granting licenses is not assigned to the Provincial Legislatures for the purpose of regulating trade, but "in order to the raising of a revenue for provincial, local, or municipal purposes."

The Act in question is not a fiscal law; it is not a law for raising revenue; on the contrary, the effect of it may be to destroy or diminish revenue; indeed it was a main objection to the Act that in the city of Fredericton it did in point of fact diminish the sources of municipal revenue. It is evident, therefore, that the matter of the Act is not within the class of subject No. 9, and consequently that it could not have been passed by the Provincial Legislature by virtue of any authority conferred upon it by that sub-section. ...

Next, their Lordships cannot think that the Temperance Act in question properly belongs to the class of subjects, "Property and Civil Rights." It has in its legal aspect an obvious and close similarity to laws which place restrictions on the sale or custody of poisonous drugs, or of dangerously explosive substances. These things, as well as intoxicating liquors, can, of course, be held as property, but a law placing restrictions on their sale ... on the ground that the free sale or use of them is dangerous to public safety, and making it a criminal offence ... to violate these restrictions, cannot properly be deemed a law in relation to property in the sense in which those words are used in s. 92. What Parliament is dealing with in legislation of this kind is not a matter in relation to property and its rights, but one relating to public order and safety. That is the primary matter dealt with, and though incidentally the free use of ... property is interfered with, that incidental interference does not alter the character of the law. Upon the same considerations, the Act in question cannot be regarded as legislation in relation to civil rights. In however large a sense these words are used, it could not have been intended to prevent the Parliament of Canada from declaring and enacting certain uses of property, and certain acts in relation to property, to be criminal and wrongful. Laws which make it a criminal offence for a man wilfully to set fire to his own house on the ground that such an act endangers the public safety, or to overwork his horse on the ground of cruelty to the animal, though affecting in some sense property and the right of a man to do as he pleases with his own, cannot properly be regarded as legislation in relation to property or to civil rights. Nor could a law which prohibited or restricted the sale or exposure of cattle having a contagious disease be so regarded. Laws of this nature designed for the promotion of public order, safety, or morals, and which subject those who contravene them to criminal procedure and punishment, belong to the subject of public wrongs rather than to that of civil rights. They are of a nature which fall within the general authority of Parliament to make laws for the order and good government of Canada, and have direct relation to criminal law, which is one of the enumerated classes of subjects assigned exclusively to the Parliament of Canada. It was said ... in the case of the Citizens Insurance Company of Canada v. Parsons, that the two sections (91 and 92) must be read together, and the language of one interpreted, and, where necessary, modified by that of the other. Few, if any, laws could be made by Parliament for the peace, order, and good government of Canada which did not in some incidental way affect property and civil rights; and it could not have been intended, when assuring to the provinces exclusive legislative authority on the subjects of property and civil rights, to exclude the Parliament from the exercise of this general power whenever any such incidental interference would result from it. The true nature and character of the legislation in the particular instance under discussion must always be determined, in order to ascertain the class of subject to which it really belongs. In the present case it appears to their Lordships, for the reasons already given, that the matter of the Act in question does not properly belong to the class of subjects "Property and Civil Rights" within the meaning of ss. 92(13). ...

It was lastly contended that this Act fell within s. 92(16)—"Generally all matters of a merely local or personal nature in the province."

It was not, of course, contended for the appellant that the Legislature of New Brunswick could have passed the Act in question, which embraces in its enactments all the provinces; nor was it denied, with respect to this last contention, that the Parliament of Canada might have passed an Act of the nature of that under discussion to take effect at the same time throughout the whole Dominion. Their Lordships understand the contention to be that, at least in the absence of a general law of the Parliament of Canada, the provinces might have passed a local law of a like kind ..., and that, as the prohibitory and penal parts of the Act in question were to come into force in those counties and cities only in which it was adopted in the manner prescribed, or, as it was said, "by local option," the legislation was in effect, and on its face, upon a matter of a merely local nature. ...

Their Lordships cannot concur in this view. The declared object of Parliament in passing the Act is that there should be uniform legislation in all the provinces respecting the traffic in intoxicating liquors, with a view to promote temperance in the Dominion. Parliament does not treat the promotion of temperance as desirable in one province more than in another, but as desirable everywhere throughout the Dominion. The Act as soon as it was passed became a law for the whole Dominion, and the enactments of the first part, relating to the machinery for bringing the second part into force, took effect and might be put in motion at once and everywhere within it. It is true that the prohibitory and penal parts of the Act are only to come into force in any county or city upon the adoption of a petition to that effect by a majority of electors, but this conditional application of these parts of the Act does not convert the Act itself into legislation in relation to a merely local matter. The objects and scope of the legislation are still general, viz., to promote temperance by means of a uniform law throughout the Dominion.

The manner of bringing the prohibitions and penalties of the Act into force, which Parliament has thought fit to adopt, does not alter its general and uniform character. Parliament deals with the subject as one of general concern to the Dominion, upon which uniformity of legislation is desirable, and the Parliament alone can so deal with it. There is no ground or pretence for saying that the evil or vice struck at by the Act in question is local or exists only in one province, and that Parliament, under colour of general legislation, is dealing with a provincial matter only. It is therefore unnecessary to discuss the considerations which a state of circumstances of this kind might present. The present legislation is clearly meant to apply a remedy to an evil which is assumed to exist throughout the Dominion, and the local option, as it is called, no more localises the subject and scope of the Act than a provision in an Act for the prevention of contagious diseases in cattle that a public officer should proclaim in what districts it should come in effect, would make the statute itself a mere local law for each of these districts. In statutes of this kind the legislation is general, and the provision for the special application of it to particular places does not alter its character.

Their Lordships having come to the conclusion that the Act in question does not fall within any of the classes of subjects assigned exclusively to the Provincial Legislatures, it becomes unnecessary to discuss the further question whether its provisions also fall within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in s. 91. In abstaining from this discussion, they must not be understood as intimating any dissent from the opinion of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada and the other Judges, who held that the Act, as a general regulation of the traffic in intoxicating liquors throughout the Dominion, fell within the class of subject, "the regulation of trade and commerce," enumerated in that section, and was, on that ground, a valid exercise of the legislative power of the Parliament of Canada.

In the result, their Lordships will humbly recommend Her Majesty to affirm the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, and with costs.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

The next major case was Hodge v The Queen (1883), 53 LJPC 1, 9 AC 117 (UKJCPC), which was decided by the Privy Council about a year and a half after Russell. It was a challenge to Ontario's Crooks Act, mentioned, briefly above. The Act transferred the powers over liquor licensing from the municipalities to newly created boards of licence commissioners, appointed and controlled by the provincial government, and added powers to enable the boards to limit the numbers of licences. The control over the commissioners greatly increased the government's patronage powers, which Mowat used openly and shrewdly to encourage loyalty to the provincial Liberal Party.

Hodge v The Queen

(1883), 53 LJPC 1, 9 AC 117 (UKJCPC), aff'g (1882), 7 OAR 246, rev'g (1881),
46 UCQB 141 (Ont H Ct J)

[Hodge, a tavern keeper, was charged with permitting billiards to be played in his tavern, contrary to the regulations made by the licence commissioners for Toronto. He challenged the Act on two grounds: first, it conflicted with the Dominion power over trade and commerce; and, second, the provincial legislature could not delegate law-making powers to the boards of commissioners. This second argument was based on the fact that the Canadian legislatures were created by the British Parliament. They were therefore delegates and not sovereign legislatures, and they were therefore limited by the common law maxim delegatus non potest delegare. Translated, this phrase means "a delegate may not delegate." It presumes that an individual (or institution) who is given responsibility to do something may not transfer the responsibility to another individual (or institution) unless there is something in the grant of power or the context that permits the transfer.

Another tavern keeper, Frawley, was charged with operating his tavern without any licence at all. He was convicted and, because it was his second offence, sentenced to imprisonment with hard labour. He challenged this sentence and raised a third ground: the province could not impose imprisonment with hard labour as a punishment because s 92(15) of the BNA Act, which gave the provinces power to impose punishment for enforcing their laws, spoke only of imprisonment. These two cases were consolidated and have become known by Hodge's name alone.

The trial judge was persuaded by the argument about delegation, but the Court of Appeal and the Privy Council dismissed all three grounds. The second and third grounds are not directly relevant to our major topic, the division of powers, but they prompted important responses about the nature of the provincial legislatures and about interpretation.

The Court of Appeal gave its decision a week before Russell was decided and said that the argument about regulation of trade and commerce was hopeless. About the delegation argument, Burton J said that the British Parliament was sovereign, but its sovereignty was "a power existing in name only, and one which it would never attempt to exercise." The provincial legislatures had "plenary powers of legislation within their respective spheres as large and ample as those of the Imperial Parliament itself," and their authority was "the same character as that of the Imperial Parliament" (at 278 OAR). Considering the third argument, about hard labour, Spragge J called for a liberal interpretation, and said at 271 OAR:

an instrument conferring a constitution should not by interpretation lose its character as the fundamental organic law of a Government and be brought to the level of an ordinary private statute, to be expounded with the technical and literal precision which would be appropriate to a penal code.

Hodge appealed, and argued that Russell gave the Dominion comprehensive control over liquor.]

LORD FITZGERALD:

The appellants contended that the legislature of Ontario had no power to pass any Act to regulate the liquor traffic; that the whole power to pass such an Act was conferred on the Dominion Parliament, and consequently taken from the provincial legislature, by s. 91 of the British North America Act, 1867; and that it did not come within any of the classes of subjects assigned exclusively to the provincial legislatures by s. 92. The class in s. 91 which the Liquor License Act, 1877, was said to infringe was s. 91(2), "The Regulation of Trade and Commerce," and it was urged that the decision of this Board in Russell v. The Queen (1882), 7 AC 829 (UKJCPC) was conclusive that the whole subject of the liquor traffic was given to the Dominion Parliament, and consequently taken away from the provincial legislature. It appears to their Lordships, however, that the decision of this tribunal in that case has not the effect supposed, and that, when properly considered, it should be taken rather as an authority in support of the judgment of the Court of Appeal.

The sole question there was, whether it was competent to the Dominion Parliament, under its general powers to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Dominion, to pass the Canada Temperance Act, 1878, which was intended to be applicable to the several Provinces of the Dominion, or to such parts of the Provinces as should locally adopt it. It was not doubted that the Dominion Parliament had such authority, under s. 91 unless the subject fell within some one or more of the classes of subjects, which by s. 92 were assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the Provinces. ...

It appears to their Lordships that Russell v. The Queen, when properly understood, is not an authority in support of the appellant's contention, and their Lordships do not intend to vary or depart from the reasons expressed for their judgment in that case. The principle which that case and the case of the Citizens Insurance Company illustrate is, that subjects which in one aspect and for one purpose fall within s. 92, may in another aspect and for another purpose fall within s. 91.

Their Lordships proceed now to consider the subject matter and legislative character of ss. 4 and 5 of the Liquor License Act of 1877. That Act is so far confined in its operation to municipalities in the province of Ontario, and is entirely local in its character and operation. It authorizes the appointment of License Commissioners to act in each municipality, and empowers them to pass, under the name of resolutions, what we know as by-laws, or rules to define the conditions ... for obtaining tavern or shop licenses for sale ... [of] liquors within the municipality; for limiting the number of licenses; ... for defining the duties and powers of license inspectors, and to impose penalties for infraction of their resolutions. These seem to be all matters of a merely local nature in the Province, and to be similar to, though not identical in all respects with, the powers then belonging to municipal institutions under the previously existing laws passed by the local parliaments.

Their Lordships consider that the powers intended to be conferred by the Act in question, when properly understood, are to make regulations in the nature of police or municipal regulations of a merely local character for the good government of taverns, &c., licensed for the sale of liquors by retail, and such as are calculated to preserve, in the municipality, peace and public decency, and repress drunkenness and disorderly and riotous conduct. As such they cannot be said to interfere with the general regulation of trade and commerce which belongs to the Dominion Parliament, and do not conflict with the provisions of the Canada Temperance Act, which does not appear to have as yet been locally adopted. ...

Their Lordships are, therefore, of opinion that, in relation to ss. 4 and 5 of the Act in question, the legislature of Ontario acted within [ss. 92(8), (15), and (16) of] the Imperial Act of 1867, and that in this respect there is no conflict with the powers of the Dominion Parliament.

... [I]t was further contended that the Imperial Parliament had conferred no authority on the local legislature to delegate those powers to the License Commissioners, or any other persons. In other words, that the power conferred by the Imperial Parliament on the local legislature should be exercised in full by that body, and by that body alone. The maxim delegatus non potest delegare was relied on.

It appears to their Lordships, however, that the objection thus raised by the appellants is founded on an entire misconception of the true character and position of the provincial legislatures. They are in no sense delegates of or acting under any mandate from the Imperial Parliament. When the British North America Act enacted that there should be a legislature for Ontario, and that its legislative assembly should have exclusive authority to make laws for the Province and for provincial purposes in relation to the matters enumerated in s. 92, it conferred powers not in any sense to be exercised by delegation from or as agents of the Imperial Parliament, but authority as plenary and as ample within the limits prescribed by s. 92 as the Imperial Parliament in the plenitude of its power possessed and could bestow. Within these limits of subjects and area the local legislature is supreme, and has the same authority as the Imperial Parliament, or the Parliament of the Dominion, would have had under like circumstances to confide to a municipal institution or body of its own creation authority to make by-laws or resolutions as to subjects specified in the enactment, and with the object of carrying the enactment into operation and effect.

If, as their Lordships have decided, the subjects of legislation come within the powers of the provincial legislature, then s. 92(15) of the British North America Act, which provides for "the imposition of punishment by fine, penalty, or imprisonment, for enforcing any law of the Province made in relation to any matter coming within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in this section," is applicable to the case before us, and is not in conflict with s. 91(27); under these very general terms, "the imposition of punishment by imprisonment for enforcing any law," it seems to their Lordships that there is imported an authority to add to the confinement or restraint in prison that which is generally incident to it—"hard labour"; in other words, that "imprisonment" there means restraint by confinement in a prison, with or without its usual accompaniment, "hard labour" ...

Their Lordships do not think it necessary or useful to advert to some minor points of discussion, and are, on the whole, of opinion that the decision of the Court of Appeal of Ontario should be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed, with costs, and will so humbly advise Her Majesty.

Appeal dismissed.

The holdings about the second and the third arguments in Hodge need comment. The second argument was, ultimately, about the nature of the provincial legislatures and its outcome was one of the most important decisions about the nature of Canadian federalism. Because it is now so well established, what the Privy Council said may seem to be no more than an elegant statement of the obvious, but in the late 1870s and early 1880s the topic was passionately debated and one of the battlegrounds of the contest about provincial rights. Even entire books were devoted to the question whether the provincial legislatures were parliaments, like the British Parliament, or merely bodies created by the BNA Act, with no more powers than it specifically gave them, more like municipal governments than parliaments, and severed from their own histories and from the majesty of the British Parliament. At stake were the inherent privileges of a parliament, such as a power to punish for contempt, and the power of a glorious name.

The arguments invoked basic constitutional law and the terms of the BNA Act. One of the fundamental principles of the Constitution was the sovereignty of Parliament, and the dominant legal theory held that in each nation there must be one sovereign and only one. How then could both the Dominion and the provinces be sovereign, and how could law-making power be divided within one nation? In part, this question was answered by avoiding it: neither could be the sovereign of Canada, because Canada was a colony; the British Parliament was the sovereign, and it had enacted the BNA Act. The terms of the BNA Act were far from clear. It used the word "Parliament" for the Dominion and the word "legislatures" for the provinces; was there a difference? It gave the Dominion a power to disallow provincial legislation, and how could provinces be said to be made in the model of the British Parliament if their statutes could be made nullities by the will of the Dominion? As well, arguably, it gave the residue of legislative power to the Dominion, which seemed to mark a difference from the United States and the claims the states had made to sovereignty.

The crux of the resolution in Hodge was that the Dominion and the provinces were equal in kind, and each supreme within their spheres. (Note the use of the word "supreme" and not "sovereign," which acknowledged sovereignty of the British Parliament and denoted a relative power; the Dominion and the provinces were, legally, supreme over other institutions within their jurisdiction.) It was a major triumph for Mowat, who had argued for it in the Ontario Court of Appeal. Not only were the Dominion and the provinces supreme within their spheres of jurisdiction, the jurisdictional lines between them could be easily discerned. This mode of argument—that social and political life could be legally classified and categorized—was common to the legal thought of the 19th century.

Next, we turn to the fate of the third argument in Hodge. The Privy Council ignored Spragge J's plea in the Ontario Court of Appeal for a liberal interpretation and, a few years later, it made a more express contrary statement in Bank of Toronto v Lambe, [1887] UKPC 29, 12 AC 575 (UKJCPC). The issue was whether taxes imposed by Quebec on specified kinds of commercial corporations were direct taxes and therefore valid under s 92(2) (direct taxation within the province). Lord Hobhouse said at 579: "Questions of this class have been left for the decision of the ordinary Courts of Law which must treat the provisions of the Act in question [the BNA Act] by the same methods of construction and exposition which they apply to other statutes." These "methods of construction and exposition"—that is, the prevailing attitudes toward statutory interpretation—are well illustrated by the first paragraph of the leading English text in the late 19th century:

Statute law is the will of the Legislature; and the object of all judicial interpretation of it is to determine what intention is either expressly or by implication conveyed by the language used, ... When the intention is expressed, the task is one simply of verbal construction; but when, as occasionally happens, the statute expresses no intention on a question to which it gives rise, and on which some intention must necessarily be imputed to the Legislature, the interpreter has to determine it by inference grounded on legal principles.

See Sir Peter Benson Maxwell, On the Interpretation of Statutes (London: William Maxwell & Son, 1875) at 1.

The "legal principles" to which Maxwell referred were largely derived from the common law and, whatever else they included, they did not permit consideration of the history of a country, the beliefs of its peoples, or its apparent needs.

NOTE ON THE MCCARTHY ACT REFERENCE

Lawyers had a lot of trouble reconciling Russell and Hodge, and the result in the McCarthy Act Reference didn't help. Understanding the McCarthy Act Reference requires returning to June 1882, a few weeks before Russell was decided and a Dominion election campaign was underway. Macdonald was outraged that Mowat had a stranglehold on patronage and, when asked in Yorkville about Ontario's Crooks Act (the Act that was upheld in Hodge late in the following year), he said it was not worth the paper it was written on ... If he carried the country, as he would [do], he would tell Mr. Mowat, that little tyrant, who had attempted to control public opinion by taking hold of every office, from that of a Division Court bailiff to a tavern-keeper, that he would get a Bill passed at Ottawa returning to the municipalities the power taken away from them by the Licence Act.

Quoted in RCB Risk, "Canadian Courts Under the Influence" (1990) 40 UTLJ 687 at 715.

When Russell was decided, Macdonald concluded that it gave the Dominion exclusive power over liquor licensing. The speech from the throne at the opening of Parliament in February 1883 promised that legislation would be introduced "in order to prevent the unrestrained sale of intoxicating liquors, and to regulate the granting of shop, saloon and tavern licenses." When pressed by Edward Blake, who was the leader of the opposition, an eminent lawyer, and a champion of provincial rights, Macdonald spoke confidently about Russell:

It is quite clear to every lawyer, and any man who is not a lawyer, who reads that judgment, that the very reasons on which the Privy Council decided ... are the reasons showing that the Provincial legislature had not a right to deal with that subject under the Crooks Act, except as a matter of revenue. [Risk, above at 715.]

A month later, when Macdonald asked for a special committee to investigate and to prepare legislation, Blake gave Macdonald a long lecture about reading Russell and provincial rights. He pointed out that s 92(8), which had been the major ground for provincial arguments about the police power and local matters, had not been considered in Russell, and argued that the history of the distinctive cultures of the colonies and the pre-Confederation legislation should be considered when interpreting the BNA Act. He also claimed that there was a crucial difference between prohibition and regulation, and pointed to recent decisions, especially the Ontario Court of Appeal's decision in Hodge.

Blake's lecture had no effect on Macdonald, and in May, Parliament enacted the McCarthy Act. Whatever benevolent impulses Macdonald might have felt toward Ontario's municipalities had disappeared. The Act established licensing requirements for hotel, saloon, shop, vessel, and wholesale sales to be administered by the Dominion and the Conservative Party. It was quickly referred to the Supreme Court, which decided in early 1885 that it was ultra vires, except for wholesale sales and sales on vessels. On appeal, the Privy Council held that it was ultra vires entirely. Like the result in Hodge, the result in the McCarthy Act Reference was hardly startling—the Dominion could hardly have been permitted to regulate bedding and stables in hotels. Unfortunately, in accordance with the prevailing practice about references, no written reasons were given, leaving many lawyers in a state of confusion, unable to square Russell with Hodge.

Some decisions of the Canadian courts on related issues compounded the confusion. The most difficult issue, and also the most pressing politically, was the division of powers to prohibit liquor. Russell remained a secure authority permitting Dominion prohibition. The provinces had equally secure and exclusive authority to regulate taverns for police purposes. A distinction between prohibition and regulation may now seem to be implicit in these propositions, and it had been expressly made by Hodge in terms of purposes, but this kind of analysis was not widely understood and accepted at the time. The most difficult and pressing question was whether the provinces had power to prohibit. Was the power given by Russell exclusive? Any prediction would have been precarious, and a confident one would have been foolhardy. Russell's language and the general structure of spheres of exclusive power seemed to some lawyers to say that it was, but the claim of the provinces to govern their own social and moral lives was strong. The Supreme Court had said little—and much of what it had said was vague, at best—and the provincial courts were divided.

Mowat resolved to confront federal power in 1890 by enacting a statute (SO 1890, c 56) that, by s 18, gave municipalities power to impose prohibition in the same terms that had existed at Confederation—which was a power to prohibit only retail sales. In 1893, when the opposition in Ontario introduced a bill calling for total prohibition, Mowat responded with an amendment that called for a plebiscite on New Year's Day, 1894. The result was a large majority for prohibition, but Mowat then claimed that the jurisdictional uncertainties must be resolved before the government could act. By agreement with the Dominion government, seven questions were referred to the Supreme Court; the first six were abstract questions about the powers to prohibit sales, manufacturing, and import, and the seventh asked whether the 1890 Act was valid.

A majority of the Supreme Court held that the provinces had no power at all to impose prohibition. The judges who denied the power relied on s 91(2), and here Gwynne J made his last stand. He began by describing the understandings at Confederation in detail, quoting extensively from speeches and presenting a vision of a powerful Dominion that might have been written by Sir John A Macdonald, and concluded with a warning that to give control of trade to the local legislatures would deny the intent of the framers and imperil Confederation. An appeal was taken to the Privy Council.

Lord Watson delivered the decision of the Privy Council. As the following excerpt makes clear, not a lot is known about him, although his impact on Canadian constitutional law was formidable:

Born in 1827 in Covington, County of Lanark, Scotland, Watson received his education at the Universities of Edinburgh and Glasgow and was admitted to the bar as advocate in 1851. For the first ten years of his career, he "was practically one of the unemployed" at the Scottish bar, his career "practically a failure." Throughout his adult life Watson was a staunch Tory, and there seems to be little doubt that his rise to the highest ranks of the judiciary was facilitated by his conservative connections. There were few Scottish lawyers in the Conservative Party in 1874, according to the author of Watson's obituary in The Times. Thus "it was probably more the accident of his politics than knowledge of his merits which led to his appointment" that year as Solicitor General of Scotland. By then "altogether exceptional at the Scottish bar," reports the Dictionary of National Biography, Disraeli was warranted in "rewarding [Watson for] his conservatism." Watson went on to serve as Lord Advocate (the chief law officer of Scotland) and Dean of the Faculty of Advocates (head of the Scottish Bar) while representing the constituency of the Universities of Glasgow and Aberdeen for an undistinguished four years. At the age of fifty-two, Watson was appointed Lord of Appeal in Ordinary, entitling him to a life peerage (as Baron Watson of Thankerton), a seat in the House of Lords, and another on the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. It was in this last capacity that he earned the title of judicial overseer of the empire. In the words of Richard Burdon (later Viscount) Haldane, Watson "was an imperial judge of the very first order ... one of the greatest lawyers that ever sat upon the British Bench."

By the time of his death in 1899, Watson had distinguished himself not only as a great judge of Scots law but also of the English common law and, for our purposes, of the law of the colonies of the British Empire. According to The Times, "it may be doubtful whether in the Victorian era any one has contributed in equal degree to the sum total of British and Imperial jurisprudence." His judicial temperament was described as simple, plain spoken, and inquisitive: "He never wrote a judgement without the greatest consideration, or without consulting every source of information open to him." His one fault (if he had one) was his habit of interrupting counsel too often during argument. Of the particular details of Watson's life, we know little. As was said of him in tribute: "Lives spent in keen intellectual activity are often devoid of outward incident." [Emphasis in original.]

Ontario (AG) v Canada (AG)

[1896] UKPC 20, [1896] AC 348 [The Local Prohibition Reference], rev'd In re Prohibitory Liquor Laws, 24 SCR 170, 1895 CanLII 95

LORD WATSON:

The seventh question raises the issue, whether, in the circumstances which have just been detailed, the provincial legislature had authority to enact s. 18. In order to determine that issue, it becomes necessary to consider, in the first place, whether the Parliament of Canada had jurisdiction to enact the Canada Temperance Act [of 1886]; and, if so, to consider in the second place, whether, after that Act became the law of each province of the Dominion, there yet remained power with the Legislature of Ontario to enact the provisions of s. 18.

The authority of the Dominion Parliament to make laws for the suppression of liquor traffic in the provinces is maintained, in the first place, upon the ground that such legislation deals with matters affecting "the peace, order, and good government of Canada," within the meaning of the introductory and general enactments of s. 91 of the British North America Act; and, in the second place, upon the ground that it concerns "the regulation of trade and commerce," being No. 2 of the enumerated classes of subjects which are placed under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal Parliament by that section. These sources of jurisdictions are in themselves distinct, and are to be found in different enactments.

It was apparently contemplated by the framers of the Imperial Act of 1867 that the due exercise of the enumerated powers conferred upon the Parliament of Canada by s. 91 might, occasionally and incidentally, involve legislation upon matters which are prima facie committed exclusively to the provincial legislatures by s. 92. In order to provide against that contingency, the concluding part of s. 91 enacts that "any matter coming within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in this section shall not be deemed to come within the class of matters of a local or private nature comprised in the enumeration of the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces." It was observed by this Board in Citizens' Insurance Co. of Canada v. Parsons [4 SCR 215, 1880 CanLII 6] that the paragraph just quoted "applies in its grammatical construction only to s. 92(16)." The observation was not material to the question arising in that case, and it does not appear to their Lordships to be strictly accurate. It appears to them that the language of the exception in s. 91 was meant to include and correctly describes all the matters enumerated in the sixteen heads of s. 92, as being, from a provincial point of view, of a local or private nature. It also appears to their Lordships that the exception was not meant to derogate from the legislative authority given to provincial legislatures by these sixteen sub-sections, save to the extent of enabling the Parliament of Canada to deal with matters local or private in those cases where such legislation is necessarily incidental to the exercise of the powers conferred upon it by the enumerative heads of clause 91. That view was stated and illustrated by Sir Montague Smith in Citizens' Insurance v. Parsons and [several other cases].

The general authority given to the Canadian Parliament by the introductory enactments of s. 91 is "to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces"; and it is declared, but not so as to restrict the generality of these words, that the exclusive authority of the Canadian Parliament extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects which are enumerated in the clause. There may, therefore, be matters not included in the enumeration, upon which the Parliament of Canada has power to legislate, because they concern the peace, order, and good government of the Dominion. But to those matters which are not specified among the enumerated subjects of legislation, the exception from s. 92, which is enacted by the concluding words of s. 91, has no application: and, in legislating with regard to such matters, the Dominion Parliament has no authority to encroach upon any class of subjects which is exclusively assigned to provincial legislatures by s. 92. These enactments appear to their Lordships to indicate that the exercise of legislative power by the Parliament of Canada, in regard to all matters not enumerated in s. 91, ought to be strictly confined to such matters as are unquestionably of Canadian interest and importance, and ought not to trench upon provincial legislation with respect to any of the classes of subjects enumerated in s. 92. To attach any other construction to the general power which, in supplement of its enumerated powers, is conferred upon the Parliament of Canada by s. 91, would, in their Lordships' opinion, not only be contrary to the intention of the Act, but would practically destroy the autonomy of the provinces. If it were once conceded that the Parliament of Canada has authority to make laws applicable to the whole Dominion, in relation to matters which in each province are substantially of local or private interest, upon the assumption that these matters also concern the peace, order, and good government of the Dominion, there is hardly a subject enumerated in s. 92 upon which it might not legislate, to the exclusion of the provincial legislatures.

In construing the introductory enactments of s. 91, ... which concern the peace, order, and good government of Canada, it must be kept in view that s. 94, which empowers the Parliament of Canada to make provision for the uniformity of the laws relative to property and civil rights in Ontario, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick does not extend to the province of Quebec; and also that the Dominion legislation thereby authorized is expressly declared to be of no effect unless and until it has been adopted and enacted by the provincial legislature. These enactments would be idle and abortive, if it were held that the Parliament of Canada derives jurisdiction from the introductory provisions of s. 91, to deal with any matter which is in substance local or provincial, and does not truly affect the interest of the Dominion as a whole. Their Lordships do not doubt that some matters, in their origin local and provincial, might attain such dimensions as to affect the body politic of the Dominion, and to justify the Canadian Parliament in passing laws ... in the interest of the Dominion. But great caution must be observed in distinguishing between that which is local and provincial, and therefore within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures, and that which has ceased to be merely local or provincial, and has become matter of national concern, in such sense as to bring it within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada. An Act restricting the right to carry weapons of offence, or their sale to young persons, within the province would be within the authority of the provincial legislature. But traffic in arms, or the possession of them under such circumstances as to raise a suspicion that they were to be used for seditious purposes, or against a foreign State, are matters which, their Lordships conceive, might be competently dealt with by the Parliament of the Dominion.

The judgment of this Board in Russell v. The Queen (1882), 7 AC 829 (UKJCPC) has relieved their Lordships from the difficult duty of considering whether the Canada Temperance Act of 1886 relates to the peace, order, and good government of Canada, in such sense as to bring its provisions within the competency of the Canadian Parliament. In that case the controversy related to the validity of the Canada Temperance Act of 1878; and neither the Dominion nor the Provinces were represented in the argument. It arose between a private prosecutor and a person who had been convicted ... of violating the provisions of the Canadian Act [in] New Brunswick, in which the prohibitory clauses of the Act had been adopted. But the provisions of the Act of 1878 were in all material respects the same with those which are now embodied in the Canada Temperance Act of 1886; and the reasons which were assigned for sustaining the validity of the earlier, are, in their Lordships' opinion, equally applicable to the later Act. It therefore appears to them that the decision in Russell v. The Queen must be accepted as an authority to the extent to which it goes, namely, that the restrictive provisions of the Act of 1886, when they have been duly brought into operation in any provincial area within the Dominion, must receive effect as valid enactments relating to the peace, order, and good government of Canada.

That point being settled by decision, it becomes necessary to consider whether the Parliament of Canada had authority to pass the Canada Temperance Act of 1886 as being an Act for the "regulation of trade and commerce" within the meaning of s. 91(2). If it were so, the Parliament of Canada would ... be at liberty to exercise its legislative authority, although in so doing it should interfere with the jurisdiction of the provinces. ... [I]n Citizens' Insurance Co. v. Parsons, ... it was decided that, in the absence of legislation upon the subject by the Canadian Parliament, the Legislature of Ontario had authority to impose conditions, as being matters of civil right, upon the business of fire insurance, which was admitted to be a trade, so long as those conditions only affected provincial trade. Their Lordships do not find it necessary to reopen that discussion The object of the Canada Temperance Act of 1886 is, not to regulate retail transactions between those who trade in liquor and their customers, but to abolish all such transactions within every provincial area in which its enactments have been adopted by a majority of the local electors. A power to regulate, naturally, if not necessarily, assumes, ... the conservation of the thing which is to be made the subject of regulation. In that view, their Lordships are unable to regard the prohibitive enactments of the Canadian statute of 1886 as regulations of trade and commerce. ...

The authority of the Legislature of Ontario to enact s. 18 of [the 1890 Act] was asserted by the appellant on various grounds. The first of these, which was very strongly insisted on, was to the effect that the power given to each province by s. 92(8) to create municipal institutions ... necessarily implies the right to endow these institutions with all the administrative functions which had been ordinarily possessed and exercised by them before the time of the Union. Their Lordships can find nothing to support that contention in the language of s. 92(8), which ... simply gives provincial legislatures the right to create a legal body for the management of municipal affairs. Until confederation, the Legislature of each province as then constituted could, if it chose, and did in some cases, entrust to a municipality the execution of powers which now belong exclusively to the Parliament of Canada. Since its date a provincial Legislature cannot delegate any power which it does not possess; and the extent and nature of the functions which it can commit to a municipal body of its own creation must depend upon the legislative authority which it derives from the provisions of s. 92 other than s. 92(8).

Their Lordships are likewise of opinion that s. 92(9) does not give provincial legislatures any right to make laws for the abolition of the liquor traffic. It assigns to them "shop, saloon, tavern, auctioneer and other licences, in order to the raising of a revenue for provincial, local or municipal purposes." It was held by this Board in Hodge v. The Queen (1883), 9 AC 117 (UKJCPC) to include the right to impose reasonable conditions upon the licencees which are in the nature of regulation; but it cannot, with any show of reason, be construed as authorizing the abolition of the sources from which revenue is to be raised.

The only enactments of s. 92 which appear to their Lordships to have any relation to ... the suppression of the liquor traffic are ... ss. 92(13) and (16), which assign to their exclusive jurisdiction, (1.) "property and civil rights in the province," and (2.) "generally all matters of a merely local or private nature in the province." A law which prohibits retail transactions and restricts the consumption of liquor within the ambit of the province, and does not affect transactions in liquor between persons in the province and persons in other provinces or in foreign countries, concerns property in the province which would be the subject-matter of the transactions if they were not prohibited, and also the civil rights of persons in the province. It is not impossible that the vice of intemperance may prevail in particular localities within a province to such an extent as to constitute its cure by restricting or prohibiting the sale of liquor a matter of a merely local or private nature, and therefore falling prima facie within s. 92(16). In that state of matters, it is conceded that the Parliament of Canada could not imperatively enact a prohibitory law adapted and confined to the requirements of localities within the province where prohibition was urgently needed. ...

It is not necessary for the purposes of the present appeal to determine whether provincial legislation for the suppression of the liquor traffic, confined to matters which are provincial or local within the meaning of ss. 92(13) and (16), is authorized by the one or by the other of these heads. It cannot, in their Lordships' opinion, be logically held to fall within both of them. In s. 92, ss. (16) appears to them to have the same office which the general enactment with respect to matters concerning the peace, order, and good government of Canada, so far as supplementary of the enumerated subjects, fulfils in s. 91. It assigns to the provincial legislature all matters in a provincial sense local or private which have been omitted from the preceding enumeration, and, although its terms are wide enough to cover, they were obviously not meant to include, ... the classes of subjects already enumerated.

In the able and elaborate argument addressed to their Lordships on behalf of the respondents it was practically conceded that a provincial legislature must have power to deal with the restriction of the liquor traffic from a local and provincial point of view, unless it be held that the whole subject of restriction or abolition is exclusively ... within the regulation of trade and commerce. In that case the subject ... would, by virtue of the concluding enactment of s. 91, be excepted from the matters committed to provincial legislatures by s. 92. Upon the assumption that s. 91(2) does not embrace the right to suppress a trade, Mr. Blake maintained that ... the Parliament of Canada has, by enacting the Canada Temperance Act of 1886, occupied the whole possible field of legislation in either aspect, so as completely to exclude legislation by a province. That appears to their Lordships to be the real point of controversy [at present]

The prohibitions of the Dominion Act have in some respects an effect which may extend beyond the limits of a province, and they are all of a very stringent character. ...

On the other hand, the prohibitions which s. 18 authorizes municipalities to impose within their respective limits do not appear to their Lordships to affect any transactions in liquor which have not their beginning and their end within the province of Ontario.

It thus appears that, in their local application within the province of Ontario, there would be considerable difference between the two laws; but it is obvious that their provisions could not be in force within the same district or province at one and the same time. In the opinion of their Lordships the question of conflict between their provisions which arises in this case [depends] upon a feature which is common to both. Neither statute is imperative, their prohibitions being of no force or effect until they have been voluntarily adopted and applied by the vote of a majority of the electors in a district or municipality.

If the prohibitions of the Canada Temperance Act had been made imperative throughout the Dominion, their Lordships might have been constrained by previous authority to hold that the jurisdiction of the Legislature of Ontario ... had been superseded. ... But their Lordships can discover no adequate grounds for holding that there exists repugnancy between the two laws in districts of the province of Ontario where the prohibitions of the Canadian Act are not and may never be in force. ...

Their Lordships, for these reasons, ... are of opinion that the Ontario Legislature had jurisdiction to enact s. 18, subject to this necessary qualification, that its provisions are or will become inoperative in any district of the province which has already adopted, or may subsequently adopt, the second part of the Canada Temperance Act of 1886.

[Lord Watson went on to hold that, in the absence of conflicting federal legislation, a province possesses the jurisdiction to prohibit the manufacture of liquor within the province if the manufacture was carried on in such a way as to make its prohibition a merely local matter in the province, but that it lacks the jurisdiction to prohibit the importation of liquor.]

Appeal allowed.

NOTE: THE NATURE OF FEDERALISM

What did lawyers understand about the basic nature of federalism in the late 19th century? We begin with an excerpt from the leading English text, which we use because it was the dominant statement of the constitutional faiths of English and Canadian lawyers during the late 19th century.

A federal state is a political contrivance intended to reconcile national unity and power with the maintenance of "state rights." The end aimed at fixes the essential character of federalism. For the method by which federalism attempts to reconcile the apparently inconsistent claims of national sovereignty and of state sovereignty consists of the formation of a constitution under which the ordinary powers of sovereignty are elaborately divided between the common or national government and the separate states. The details of this division vary under every different federal constitution, but the general principle on which it should rest is obvious. Whatever concerns the nation as a whole should be placed under the control of the national government. All matters which are not primarily of common interest should remain in the hands of the several States.

From the notion that national unity can be reconciled with state independence by a division of powers under a common constitution between the nation on the one hand and the individual States on the other, flow the three leading characteristics of completely developed federalism—the supremacy of the constitution—the distribution among bodies with limited and co-ordinate authority of the different powers of government—the authority of the Courts to act as interpreters of the constitution.

See Albert Venn Dicey, Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution (London: Macmillan, 1885) at 131, 132, 161-62.

After a lengthy analysis of these three characteristics, Dicey made some general comments, "of more than merely legal interest," about federalism, including this observation about "legalism":

Federalism, lastly, means legalism—the predominance of the judiciary in the constitution—the prevalence of a spirit of legality among the people.

That in a confederation like the United States the Courts become the pivot on which the constitutional arrangements of the country turn is obvious. Sovereignty is lodged in a body which rarely exerts its authority and has (so to speak) only a potential existence; no legislature throughout the land is more than a subordinate law-making body capable in strictness of enacting nothing but by-laws; the powers of the executive are again limited by the constitution; the interpreters of the constitution are the judges. The Bench therefore can and must determine the limits to the authority both of the government and of the legislature; its decision is without appeal; the consequence follows that the Bench of judges is not only the guardian but also at a given moment the master of the constitution.

Doubtless, Canadians shared the essence of these beliefs. They may, though, have differed in emphasis. Consider the following paragraph:

A federal union then means two perfectly independent co-ordinate powers in the same state. The powers of each are equally sovereign and neither are derived from the other. The state governments are not subordinate to the general government, nor the general government to the state governments. They are co-ordinate governments standing on the same level and deriving their powers from the same sovereign authority. In their respective spheres neither yields to the other. Each is independent in its own work; incomplete and dependent on the other for the complete work of government.

See Dennis Ambrose O'Sullivan, Government in Canada: The Principles and Institutions of Our Federal and Provincial Constitutions (Scarborough, Ont: Carswell, 1887) at 7-8.

Arguably, O'Sullivan's beliefs are, in contrast to Dicey's, marked by an emphasis on the autonomy of the provinces and the federal government: they are mutually exclusive spheres of power, separated by sharp boundaries. If this perception is correct, perhaps a large part of the reason is that visions of federalism were a fighting ground in the struggle for power between the provinces and the federal government. O'Sullivan's model is aggressive, and it expresses the eventual triumph of the provinces.

NOTE: THE COMPACT THEORY

Next, we turn to the compact theory. Its foundation was its claim about the way the Dominion had been created: the colonies had made a compact, ratified by the British Parliament, creating the Dominion and conferring powers and property, and, after Confederation, they continued to exist as the new provinces. One of the first sustained expressions of this theory was by Thomas Jean Jacques Loranger, a Quebec judge, in a series of pamphlets that were published as a book early in 1883: Letters Upon the Interpretation of the Federal Constitution (Quebec: "Morning Chronicle" Office, 1884). He began by declaring that the French nation in Quebec was threatened by centralizing tendencies in the early judgments of the Supreme Court about the BNA Act:

During the past century of British rule, the French race in Canada has been through many political crises and has fought many political battles. It has, however, come out triumphant, and averted the dangers which threatened it.

The antagonism resulting from different institutions, traditions, languages and religious beliefs—irresistible when people of various origins dwell in the same territory—which influences them sometimes without their knowledge and often against their will, has made the position of this race an exceptional one in the midst of the Anglo-Saxon population of the Confederation.

The rivalry of races is the same as that which existed under former regimes, but is on a larger scale. ...

French-Canadians should, under the new regime as they did under the old, see with jealous care to the maintenance of their national rights, the preservation of their political autonomy, combat and prevent any aggression that may disturb these guarantees.

Loranger then set out the elements of the "federal compact":

1. In constituting themselves into a confederation, the provinces did not intend to renounce, and in fact never did renounce their autonomy. This autonomy with their rights, powers and prerogatives they expressly preserved for all that concerns their internal government; by forming themselves into a federal association, under political and legislative aspects, they formed a central government, only for interprovincial objects, and, far from having created the provincial powers, it is from these provincial powers that has arisen the federal government, to which the provinces have ceded a portion of their rights, property and revenues.

2. At the time of Confederation, all legislative and executive power, legal attributes, public property and revenues that are now the appanagé of the central government and of the provinces, belonged to the latter. The federal compact did not create a single new power. The part now belonging to the federal government was taken from the jurisdiction of the provinces.

In the early 1880s, the provincial rights advocates began to use the compact as support for a wide range of their claims. Although Loranger used it to defend the French Canadians, it was also embraced by politicians and common law lawyers (and many of the central individuals were both). One claim, which during the 20th century has become the best known, was that the BNA Act could not be amended without the consent of each of the parties—the provinces. Other claims, though, loomed larger in the 1880s, all of them directed at interpretation of the BNA Act. For example, the provinces were entitled to government property not clearly allocated to the Dominion and to all legislative powers not specifically granted to the Dominion—the residue of legislative power. As well, their lieutenant governors had the stature and powers they possessed before Confederation.

In Quebec, the compact has continued to be a powerful part of constitutional beliefs, but its hold among common law lawyers began to fade in the late 1880s. Although it has been resurrected several times since, including, as we will see in Chapter 6, The 1930s: The Depression and the New Deal, it has had little direct influence on the law. One major reason is that, so far as it is an account of what happened at Confederation, it was vulnerable to the simple claim that it was fundamentally inaccurate. More interesting is another possible reason, one based on beliefs about interpretation. The compact was derived from the history of making the BNA Act, but the prevailing beliefs about interpretation (demonstrated, for example, by the Privy Council in Hodge) were at odds with considering history of this kind.

This incompatibility is demonstrated in the leading constitutional text, AHF Lefroy, The Law of Legislative Power in Canada (Toronto: Law Book and Publishing, 1897-1898) at 1. Lefroy's first proposition declared that the BNA Act was the "sole charter" for determining the rights of the Dominion and the provinces. Given the basic understandings of sovereignty, constitutions, and interpretation, this principle was both basic and inescapable, but it was an assertion about both the origins of the nation and the interpretation of its constitution that excluded any consideration of a compact. The second proposition was that the BNA Act, because it was founded on the Quebec resolutions, "must be accepted as a treaty of union between the provinces" but, once enacted, it became a "wholly new point of departure." The contrast between the two branches seemed to acknowledge a compact, but only as an historical event, irrelevant to interpretation. In this light, the compact foundered because it was at odds with the dominant common law thought.

NOTE: THE POWER OF DISALLOWANCE

The power of disallowance did not sit well with the compact theory of federalism or a conception of legislative supremacy within exclusive spheres of jurisdiction. The power, as expressed in ss 56 and 90 of the Constitution Act, 1867, entitles the governor general, acting on the advice of the federal Cabinet, to disallow (or veto) any enactment of the provincial legislatures. A similar power is exercisable as between the British Crown and the Canadian Parliament, but this is not the focus of discussion here. The subordination of provincial power to federal did not fit well with an understanding of Canadian federalism premised on equality of federal and provincial authority.

The following excerpt from William Paul McClure Kennedy illustrates the uses to which the power was put in the years immediately after Confederation:

We can well understand a principle of disallowance where a constitutional question arises, or where dominion or imperial interests are threatened by a provincial Act; but it would be safer if the decision in such cases were left to the courts as in the United States, since in a federation differences on Constitutional law must frequently arise. The resolution of the problem of intra vires or ultra vires ought not to be left to the minister of justice. This tends to make him too supreme, and to detract from the character of the supreme court of Canada or of the privy council. For many years, however, after 1867 the dominion government considered it was justified in disallowing provincial Acts which appeared unjust or oppressive—through, for example, interference with vested rights without compensation, or through the impairing of contractual obligations. Provincial Acts were disallowed under these principles.

It appears early to have been a working convention of the Canadian constitution that, as the courts would deal with legislation ultra vires of the provinces, the power of disallowance was intended to cover cases outside legal review. In other words, the power of disallowance was inserted in the British North America Act to cover, in general terms, unjust, confiscatory, or ex post facto legislation, against which there are express safeguards in the constitution of the United States. ...

Whatever other motives—if any—which may have been at work during that period, it is clear that there is a certain consistency of purpose in dealing with provincial legislation which appeared to hurt private property, to invalidate contracts, or to be contrary to what were known as “sound principles of legislation.” It lies outside the discussion to search for or to examine motives which political writers have suggested. All that can be said here is that the constitutional power of disallowance was consistently used during these years to protect those spheres of provincial civil life which are protected explicitly or by implication in the constitution of the United States.

See WPM Kennedy, The Constitution of Canada: An Introduction to Its Development and Law (London: Oxford University Press, 1922) at 415-21.

By the mid-20th century, the federal power of disallowance fell into disuse. The federal government offered it up for negotiation in the rounds of constitutional reform in 1987 (Meech Lake) and again in 1992 (Charlottetown). The legal text of the Charlottetown Accord proposed that this federal power be repealed. Though the constitutional proposals failed, Canadians likely will see the power return as a subject in whatever future constitutional negotiations may be conducted.

II. THE MANITOBA SCHOOLS QUESTION

The province of Manitoba entered Canada in 1870 on terms intended to guarantee denominational education rights to Roman Catholics. Population growth in the years following made the province overwhelmingly Protestant and English speaking. This enabled the Protestant majority to sweep away all denominational control and impose a non-sectarian public school system (or what were called the old Protestant schools “thinly disguised”). The Roman Catholic minority were forced to choose between sending their children to Protestant schools or bearing the burden of paying for both public and separate schools.

The context that gave rise to this controversy is set out in the following excerpt.

Gordon Bale, "Law, Politics and the Manitoba School Question: Supreme Court and Privy Council"

(1985) 63:3 Can Bar Rev 461 at 466-73

Confederation of 1867 stretched only from the Atlantic to Lake Superior, but the vision of a transcontinental nation was clearly enunciated in section 146 of the Constitution Act, 1867 in its provision for the admission of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, British Columbia, Rupert's Land and the North-western Territory into the union. The dream of a dominion stretching from sea to sea was threatened by the westward expansion of the United States and its purchase of Alaska from Russia in 1867, and Sir John A. Macdonald appreciated that continuing to haggle with the Hudson's Bay Company jeopardized the Canadian transcontinental dream. In 1869, George-Etienne Cartier and William McDougall, dispatched to London, purchased Rupert's Land for one and a half million dollars and gave a guarantee that five per cent of the land in the fertile belt would continue to belong to the Hudson's Bay Company.

The Canadian government failed to assure the local inhabitants that their rights would be respected. When surveyors sent to the Red River appeared to disregard completely the riverstrip holding of the Metis, Riel and a party of armed horsemen broke up the survey party. Riel then organized the Metis, prevented Lieutenant-Governor-designate William McDougall from entering, seized Fort Garry and put down an attempted overthrow by Dr. John Schultz, the leader of the Canadians in the Red River. On December 29, 1869, Riel assumed the presidency of the provisional government. In February 1870 another bungled effort was made to unseat Riel, and Thomas Scott was captured. Scott was tried before a court-martial presided over by Ambrose Lepine, adjutant general in the provisional government, and a jury of six Metis; he was found guilty, and on March 4, 1870 was taken outside the walls of Fort Garry and shot by a firing squad. The execution of this Orangeman fuelled anti-Catholic feeling in Ontario.

Macdonald was appalled by the events because they revealed Canadian impotence to both Americans and Metis. The formal transfer of Rupert's Land to Canada was to have occurred on December 1, 1869; Macdonald now had the date postponed. As he was reluctant to seek permission to send troops through the United States, he had no alternative but to negotiate with Riel and await the spring. Donald A. Smith, the Hudson's Bay Commissioner in Montreal, travelled to the Red River in the winter of 1869-70. Smith persuaded Riel to state the demands of his provisional government and to choose delegates to send to Ottawa. Many of the Metis demands were agreed to by Macdonald and Cartier and were incorporated in the Manitoba Act. On July 15, 1870, the transfer of the whole northwest to Canada occurred and simultaneously Manitoba became a new province. On that day the new Lieutenant-Governor, Adams G. Archibald, left Port Arthur, accompanied by a force of 1,200 British and Canadian soldiers under Colonel Garnet Wolseley, who navigated the old voyageur route to Fort Garry. Canada's introduction to the West was thus marred by its association with military force.

A census taken in 1871 revealed that there were 5,720 French-speaking Half-breeds or Metis, 4,080 English-speaking Half-breeds or "country-born" and only 1,600 White settlers. Two provisions of the Manitoba Act reflect the approximately equal balance between French-speaking Roman Catholics and English-peaking Protestants. Section 22 of the Manitoba Act provided that the legislature might exclusively enact laws relating to education, subject to three provisions, of which the first was:

Nothing in any Law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to Denominational Schools which any class of persons have by Law or practice in the Province at the Union.

Section 23 provided that either English or French could be used in the legislature or in any courts, and Acts of the legislature were to be printed and published in both languages. The religious compromise, in the form of the denominational educational guarantee upon which Canada was founded, was thus projected westward. It should, however, be emphasized that Manitoba was to be a province like Quebec, not one like Ontario, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. The language guarantee of section 23 of the Manitoba Act was virtually identical to that contained in section 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Section 133 accorded equal status to English and French in Parliament and the federal courts, but then provided that such equal status would prevail only in Quebec and not in the other original provinces. ...

The linguistic and religious guarantees of the Manitoba Act were appropriate for a province which was almost equally balanced between Francophones and Anglophones and between Roman Catholics and Protestants. The subsequent demographic changes in Manitoba in the 1870s and 1880s were enormous. The population increased almost fourteen fold in twenty years. There had been a large influx of Protestant and English-speaking settlers, particularly from Ontario. The Manitoba of 1890 was therefore strikingly different in composition from the Manitoba of 1870. The census of 1891 revealed that Manitoba had a population of 152,500, of which only 20,571 or thirteen per cent were Roman Catholics, and only 9,949 or seven per cent were French Canadians. ...

In 1890, the Department of Education Act was passed by the Manitoba Legislature. Section 18 provided that the existing Board of Education and Superintendents of Education were to cease to hold office and were to "deliver over to the Provincial Secretary all records, books, papers, documents and property of every kind belonging to said Boards." The Catholic section of the Board ceased to exist and its property was compulsorily acquired without compensation. The Public Schools Act then provided for free non-sectarian education to be paid for by an assessment of all ratepayers, Protestant and Catholic, in each municipality. The Manitoba legislature at the same session also passed the Official Language Act, which, in spite of section 23 of the Manitoba Act, 1890, made English the sole official language. ...

In Barrett v the City of Winnipeg, 19 SCR 374, 1891 CanLII 61, Barrett challenged the levy issued by the City of Winnipeg on the assessed value of his property in order to support the new public school system. Barrett argued that this prejudicially affected denominational school rights of Roman Catholics by requiring them to contribute twice—to free public schools, to which they could not in good conscience send children; and to Roman Catholic Schools. In the lower courts, the judges of the Trial Division and Manitoba Court of Queen's Bench split along denominational lines. On appeal, the Supreme Court of Canada reversed these decisions and eschewed the appearance of sectarian allegiance among the judges. The Court held the Public Schools Act, [1868] 31 & 32 Vict c 118 ultra vires. Chief Justice Ritchie wrote:

Does it not prejudicially, that is to say injuriously ... affect them when they are taxed to support schools of the benefit of which, by their religious belief and the rules and principles of their church, they cannot conscientiously avail themselves, and at the same time by compelling them to find means to support schools to which they can conscientiously send their children, or in the event of their not being able to find sufficient means to do both to be compelled to allow their children to go without either religious or secular instruction? In other words, I think the Catholics were directly prejudicially affected by such legislation, but whether directly or indirectly the local legislature was powerless to affect them prejudicially in the matter of denominational schools which they certainly did by practically depriving them of their denominational schools and compelling them to support schools the benefit of which Protestants alone can enjoy.

On appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the case was joined to that of Logan, who mischievously sought similar relief on behalf of Anglicans in Winnipeg as was accorded to Roman Catholics. In City of Winnipeg v Barrett; City of Winnipeg v Logan, 10 CRAC 193, [1892] AC 445 (UKJCPC), the board reversed the decision of the Supreme Court. According to Lord Macnaghten at 457-58:

Roman Catholics and members of every other religious body in Manitoba are free to establish schools throughout the province; they are free to maintain their schools by school fees or voluntary subscriptions; they are free to conduct their schools according to their own religious tenets without molestation or interference. No child is compelled to attend a public school. No special advantage other than the advantage of a free education in schools conducted under public management is held out to those who do attend. But then it is said that it is impossible for Roman Catholics, or for members of the Church of England (if their views are correctly represented by the Bishop of Rupert's Land, who has given evidence in Logan's case), to send their children to public schools where the education is not superintended and directed by the authorities of their Church, and that therefore Roman Catholics and members of the Church of England who are taxed for public schools, and at the same time feel themselves compelled to support their own schools, are in a less favourable position than those who can take advantage of the free education provided by the Act of 1890. That may be so. But what right or privilege is violated or prejudicially affected by the law? It is not the law that is in fault. It is owing to religious convictions which everybody must respect, and to the teaching of their Church, that Roman Catholics and members of the Church of England find themselves unable to partake of advantages which the law offers to all alike.

After the Privy Council's decision, the federal Cabinet chose to refer six questions to the Supreme Court of Canada. The questions, in sum, asked whether the Roman Catholic minority could appeal to the federal Cabinet because a right or privilege in relation to education had been affected by the 1890 Act. In In Re Statutes of Manitoba relating to Education, 22 SCR 577, 1894 CanLII 80, the Supreme Court of Canada, following the lead of the Privy Council in Barrett, split three to two, ruling against the Roman Catholic minority. Chief Justice Strong, writing for the majority, held that the governor-general in council (the federal Cabinet) had no remedial authority it could exercise in this case. It could not be suggested that the province of Manitoba did not have the right to repeal rights and privileges conferred under statute (at 654-56):

[T]here is, it seems to me, much force in the consideration, that whilst it was reasonable that the organic law should preserve vested rights existing at the union ... , yet every presumption must be made in favour of the constitutional right of a legislative body to repeal the laws which it has itself enacted. No doubt this right may be controlled by a written constitution A notable instance of this is, as my brother King has pointed out, afforded by the constitution of the United States, according to the construction which the Supreme Court in the well known "Dartmouth College case" put upon the provision [against] impairing the obligation of contracts. It was there held ... that a legislature which had created a private corporation could not repeal its own enactment granting the franchise, [since] the grant of the franchise of a corporation was a contract. This has in practice been got over by inserting in such acts an express reservation of the right of the legislature to repeal its own act. But, as it is a prima facie presumption that every legislative enactment is subject to repeal ... , every statute may be said to contain an implied provision that it may be revoked ... , unless the right of repeal is taken away by ... the overriding constitution which has created the legislature itself. ... [Here Chief Justice Stong endorsed] a canon of constitutional construction that such an inherent right to repeal its own acts cannot be deemed to be withheld from a legislative body having its origin in a written constitution, unless the constitution itself, by express words, takes away the right. I am of opinion that in construing the Manitoba Act we ought to proceed upon this principle and hold the legislature of that province to have absolute powers over its own legislation, untrammelled by any appeal to federal authority, unless we find some restriction of its rights in this respect in express terms in the constitutional act.

In a startling reversal in tone from the Logan and Barrett decisions, the Privy Council in Brophy v AG of Manitoba, 11 CRAC 56, [1895] AC 202 (UKJCPC), found that the rights and privileges of Roman Catholics existing before 1890 had been affected. According to Lord Herschell (at 226-27):

Contrast the position of the Roman Catholics prior and subsequent to the Acts from which they appeal. Before these passed into law there existed denominational schools, of which the control and management were in the hands of Roman Catholics, who could select the books to be used and determine the character of the religious teaching. These schools received their proportionate share of the money contributed for school purposes out of the general taxation of the province, and the money raised for these purposes by local assessment was, so far as it fell upon Catholics, applied only towards the support of Catholic schools. What is the position of the Roman Catholic minority under the Acts of 1890? Schools of their own denomination, conducted according to their views, will receive no aid from the State. They must depend entirely for their support upon the contributions of the Roman Catholic community, while the taxes ... fall alike on Catholics and Protestants. Moreover, while the Catholic inhabitants remain liable to local assessment for school purposes, the proceeds of that assessment are no longer destined to any extent for the support of Catholic schools

In view of this comparison it does not seem possible to say that the rights and privileges of the Roman Catholic minority in relation to education which existed prior to 1890 have not been affected.

Before the federal government could enact remedial legislation under s 22(3), the federal election of 1896 intervened. The Liberal leader, Wilfrid Laurier, had maintained that a strategy of "conciliation" rather than one of confrontation with the province was the only approach that could restore any measure of rights to the minority. Voluntary concessions, he maintained, would better secure the minority's interests than interfere with provincial rights. In his famous speech on second reading of the remedial bill in the House of Commons, Laurier declared that if it were to become law, "while it would afford no protection whatever to the suffering minority in Manitoba, it would be a most violent wrench of the principles upon which our constitution is based." This remedy of interfering in local legislation, Laurier observed, "has never been applied and probably never can be applied without friction, disturbance and discontent." In the ensuing election campaign, the church threw its support behind the Conservatives, led by Sir Charles Tupper. Laurier, nevertheless, carried the election, even in the Catholic province of Quebec.

Once in office, Laurier reached his negotiated settlement with the province of Manitoba. Religious teaching could be carried on at the end of the school day; at least one Roman Catholic teacher would be employed in urban and rural schools, where the average attendance exceeded a certain number; and where ten pupils spoke the French language "or any language other than English, as their native language, the teaching of such pupils shall be conducted in French, or such other language, and English upon a bilingual system." According to Laurier's biographer, Oscar Douglas Skelton, in essence, the agreement left the system of public schools intact, but secured for the minority distinct religious teaching, and, where numbers warranted, teachers of their own faith and the maintenance of the French tongue. The language clause was framed in general terms by the provincial authorities in order to make it apply to the German Mennonites as well as to the French Catholics.

III. FEDERALISM AND INDIGENOUS PEOPLES AND LANDS: THE ST CATHARINES MILLING CASE

This chapter began with the statement that, during the period from Confederation to about 1900, Canada experienced a dramatic expansion to the east, west, and north. What did Indigenous peoples experience during this period? Part of that story will be told in Part Four, Indigenous Peoples. This section deals with the ways in which Indigenous peoples and lands were viewed from the perspective of Canadian courts in the final decades of the 19th century.

Sébastien Grammond provides a reminder of some of the relevant context in terms of Indigenous rights and treaties, with particular emphasis on land.

Sébastien Grammond, "Treaties as Constitutional Agreements" in Peter Oliver, Patrick Macklem & Nathalie Des Rosiers, eds, The Oxford Handbook of the Canadian Constitution (New York: Oxford University Press, 2017), 305 at 308-10 (footnotes omitted)

Private purchases of land from the Indigenous peoples have taken place from the earliest stages of British presence in North America. For a number of reasons, colonial authorities sought to forbid this practice and to centralize in their hands the dealings with the Indigenous peoples. Those actions gave rise to the idea that the Indigenous peoples owned the land until such lands were purchased in the name of the Crown. That fundamental rule was enshrined in the Royal Proclamation of 1763 that was issued by the British King upon the conquest of New France. Although it is better known for the initial political organization of the new British colonies and the purported repeal of French law in Quebec, the crucial character of its Indigenous provisions, which have never been repealed, has earned the Proclamation the nickname of "Indian Bill of Rights." In the summer of 1764, William Johnson, the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, called a meeting of several Indigenous nations at Niagara, where he presented the Proclamation. Some authors have thus argued that the Proclamation itself became a treaty.

The preamble to the Proclamation stated that lands "not having been ceded to, or purchased by Us, are reserved to" the Indigenous peoples. In its operative part, the Proclamation also stated that all purchases of Indigenous land would be made in the name of the Crown only, at a public assembly of the Indigenous peoples concerned. There was found the mandate to conclude land treaties in those parts of North America remaining under British rule.

Nevertheless the Proclamation also signalled the Crown's assertion of sovereignty over Indigenous lands, whether or not ceded by treaty. The King speaks of "Our Dominions and Territories" and considers that the Indigenous peoples are living "under Our Protection." In the British minds, the treaties envisioned by the Proclamation were not international treaties. They were instruments of domestic law, or perhaps colonial law, always subject to the overriding power of the Imperial Parliament. Indeed, throughout the nineteenth century, colonial authorities pursued a policy of treaty-making while taking an increasingly reductionist view of the legal status and capacity of the Indigenous peoples.

The use of treaties to acquire land switched to high gear after Confederation. To prepare the settlement of the newly-acquired Prairies, the federal government made treaties, over a period of about 50 years, with the Indigenous people of what is now Northeastern British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, and Northern Ontario, as well as parts of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. These treaties were assigned numbers, from 1 to 11, and became known collectively as the "numbered treaties."

The acquisition of lands via treaties raised federalism-related issues. Did the acquired lands become the property of the federal Crown, or did they form part of provincial Crown lands? Section 91(24) indicated that Parliament could legislate regarding "Indians, and Lands reserved for Indians"; however, s 109 of the Constitution Act, 1867 provided that "All Lands, Mines, Minerals, and Royalties belonging to the several Provinces ... shall belong to the several Provinces ... in which the same are situate, subject to any Trusts existing in respect thereof, and to any Interest other than that of the Province in the same."

The answer to the question regarding the property of the lands acquired via treaties was connected to the answer to a further question: what sort of property interest did Indigenous people have in the land prior to dealing with it by way of treaty? That question in turn exposed further important questions, such as whether the property interest was based in an Indigenous or a Euro-Canadian understanding, and whether Indigenous people could be said to have had their own legal system and system of governance? If the answer to the last question was affirmative, how would the recognition of Indigenous legal systems and governance influence the subject matter of this part, Federalism?

We will see that some of the answers to the questions identified above have elicited different answers since the enactment of the Constitution Act, 1982 (notably s 35), and others have yet to be answered. We will see in this chapter that the initial answers to these important questions by the Supreme Court of Canada and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council were hardly respectful of Indigenous rights, interests, laws and governance.

The case of St Catharines Milling and Lumber Co v R, [1888] UKPC 70, 14 App Cas 46 involved an action by Her Majesty the Queen in right of Ontario on the information of the Attorney General of Ontario against the St Catharines Milling and Lumber Company to prevent the latter from cutting and carrying away timber on lands in Ontario. The lands in question (south of Wabigoon Lake in the District of Algoma) formed part of lands that were the subject of Treaty 3 of 1873. The Attorney General of Ontario claimed that the lands in question were public lands of the province of Ontario, and that the defendants were trespassers and wrongdoers in cutting the timber. The defendants claimed that they had a licence from the federal government, that government having acquired full title to the lands in question.

The province was successful at trial and before the Ontario Court of Appeal. The defendants appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada. A sample of extracts from counsels' arguments and the various judgments in the case provide a sense of the range of attitudes at the time regarding the division of powers, Indigenous peoples and lands, and Indigenous governance. Note that no Indigenous party appeared before the Court at any level in this case. The full story of the case, including a range of flawed assumptions, has been set out by Kent McNeil, Flawed Precedent: The St Catherine's Case and Aboriginal Title (Vancouver: UBC Press, 2019).

The flawed factual assumptions were those made at the trial of the action by Chancellor Boyd in R v St Catharines Milling & Lumber Co (1885), 10 OR 196 (Ch). Boyd was of the view that the British Crown had acquired those lands from the French king as a consequence of the 1763 Treaty of Paris: "The legal and constitutional effect of the conquest of Quebec and the cession of Canada was to vest the soil and ownership of the public land in the Crown" (St Catharines Milling, above at 204). If, by the law of nations at that time, a European Crown gained sovereignty by conquering lands and people, this would not necessarily confer title. Indeed, at common law, the conquest of others did not eviscerate local title or local laws (Campbell v Hall, [1774] Lofft 655, 98 ER 848). Moreover, there was no evidence regarding French law led at trial to support this contention (McNeil, above at 110). Even if correct in international law (that is, as between two European nations, Britain and France), Boyd's decision is premised upon a racist and flawed understanding of "Indians" as uncivilized, disorganized, and without their own laws and governance. It is, in short, premised upon Eurocentric stereotyping. Chancellor Boyd relied on racialized tropes in describing Europeans encountering "heathens and barbarians" (St Catharines Milling, above at 206) with no "proprietary title to the soil" (St Catharines Milling, above at 226). He repeatedly disparaged Indigenous North Americans as "wild," "primitive," "rude," and the Saulteaux as an unusually "degraded Indian type" (St Catharines Milling, above at 227). Nor was there any reference to Saulteaux land law or custom. According to McNeil, in Boyd's eyes, "because Indian people's way of life was inferior, its destruction was of no consequence" (above at 61).

Having been conquered (Chancellor Boyd continued), Indians "have no claim except upon the bounty and benevolence of the Crown" (St Catharines Milling, above at 230). Once reserves are established, Indians "become invested with a legally recognized tenure of defined lands; in which they have a present right as to the exclusive and absolute usufruct, and a potential right of becoming individual owners in fee after enfranchisement" (St Catharines Milling, above at 230). There were, otherwise, no rights worthy of recognition other than those conferred by the Crown. Boyd's Chancery Court judgment was upheld at the Ontario Court of Appeal, while the Supreme Court of Canada split 3–2 in favour of provincial title.

W CASSELLS and MILLS (for the respondent):

To maintain their position the appellants must assume that the Indians have a regular form of government, whereas nothing is more clear than that they have no government and no organization, and cannot be regarded as a nation capable of holding lands.

It is also contended that the crown had never recognized the aboriginal inhabitants of a country who were without any settled government as the proprietors of the soil. This was not only the rule uniformly acted upon by the Sovereigns of England, but it was a part of the common law of Europe.

SIR WJ RITCHIE CJ:

I am of opinion that all ungranted lands in the province of Ontario belong to the crown as part of the public domain, subject to the Indian right of occupancy in cases in which the same has not been lawfully extinguished, and when such right of occupancy has been lawfully extinguished absolutely to the crown, and as a consequence to the province of Ontario. I think the crown owns the soil of all the unpatented lands, the Indians possessing only the right of occupancy, and the crown possessing the legal title subject to that occupancy, with the absolute exclusive right to extinguish the Indian title either by conquest or by purchase . . .

I am therefore of opinion, that when the Dominion Government, in 1873 extinguished the Indian claim or title, its effect was, so far as the question now before us is concerned, simply to relieve the legal ownership of the land belonging to the Province from the burden, incumbrance, or however it might be designated, of the Indian title. It therefore follows that the claim of the Dominion to authorize the cutting of timber on these lands cannot be supported . . .

STRONG J (dissenting):

In order to ascertain whether it was the intention of Parliament by the use of these words "lands reserved for the Indians" to describe comprehensively all lands in which the Indians retained any interest, and so as to include unsurrendered lands generally, or whether it was intended to use the term in its restricted sense . . . as indicating only lands which had been expressly granted and appropriated by the crown to the use of Indians, or excepted or reserved by them for their own use out of some large tract surrendered by them to the crown, we must refer to historical accounts of the policy . . . followed by the crown in dealings with the Indians in respect of their lands.

... It may be summarily stated as consisting in the recognition by the crown of a usufructuary title in the Indians to all unsurrendered lands. This title, though not perhaps susceptible of any accurate legal definition in exact legal terms, was one which nevertheless sufficed to protect the Indians in the absolute use and enjoyment of their lands, whilst at the same time they were incapacitated from making any valid alienation otherwise than to the crown itself, in whom the ultimate title was, in accordance with the English law of real property, considered as vested.

It . . . appears, that in the United States a traditional policy, derived from colonial times, relative to the Indians and their lands has ripened into well established rules of law, and that the result is that the lands in the possession of the Indians are, until surrendered, treated as their rightful though inalienable property, so far as the possession and enjoyment are concerned; in other words, that the dominium utile is recognized as belonging to or reserved for the Indians, though the dominium directum is considered to be in the United States.

TASCHEREAU J:

While the different nations of Europe respected the rights (I would say the claims) of the natives as occupants, they all asserted the ultimate dominion and title to the soil to be in themselves . . .

That such was the case with the French Government in Canada, during its occupancy thereof, is an incontrovertible fact. The King was vested with the ownership of all the ungranted lands in the colony as part of the crown domain, and a royal grant conveyed the full estate and entitled the grantee to possession.

It was further argued . . . that the principles which have always guided the crown since the cession in its dealing with the Indians amount to a recognition of their title to a beneficiary interest in the soil. There is, in my opinion, no foundation for this contention. For obvious political reasons, and motives of humanity and benevolence, it has, no doubt been the general policy of the crown, as it had been at the times of the French authorities, to respect the claims of the Indians. But this, though it unquestionably gives them a title to the favorable consideration of the Government, does not give them any title in law, any title that a court of justice can recognize as against the crown. If the numerous quotations on the subject furnished to us by the appellants from philosophers, publicists, economists and historians, and from official reports and despatches, must be interpreted as recognizing a legal Indian title as against the crown, all I can say of these opinions is, that a careful consideration of the question has led me to a different conclusion.

The necessary deduction from such a doctrine would be, that all progress of civilization and development in this country is and always has been at the mercy of the Indian race. Some writers cited by the appellants, influenced by sentiment and philanthropic considerations, do not hesitate to go as far. But legal and constitutional principles are in direct antagonism with their theories.

St Catharines Milling and Lumber Company v The Queen

[1888] UKPC 70, 14 App Cas 46

LORD WATSON:

The territory in dispute has been in Indian occupation from the date of the Proclamation until 1873. During that interval of time Indian affairs have been administered successively by the Crown, by the Provincial Governments, and (since the passing of the British North America Act, 1867) by the Government of the Dominion. ... It was suggested, in the course of the argument for the Dominion, that inasmuch as the proclamation recites that the territories thereby reserved for Indians had never been "ceded to or purchased by" the Crown, the entire property of the land remained with them. The inference is, however, at variance with the terms of the instrument, which show that the tenure of the Indians was a personal and usufructuary right, dependent upon the good will of the sovereign. ... There was a great deal of learned discussion at the bar with respect to the precise quality of the Indian right, but their Lordships do not consider it necessary to express any opinion on that point. It appears to them sufficient for the purposes of this case, that there has been all along vested in the Crown a substantial and paramount estate, underlying the Indian title, which became a plenum dominium whenever that title was surrendered or otherwise extinguished.

The Crown has all along had a present proprietary estate in the land, upon which the Indian title was a mere burden. The ceded territory was at the time of the union, land vested in the Crown, subject to "an interest other than that of the province in the same," within the meaning of Sect. 109; and must now belong to Ontario in terms of that clause, unless its rights have been taken away by some provision of the Act of 1867 other than those already noticed.

In the course of the argument, the claim of the Dominion to the ceded territory was rested upon the provisions of Sect. 91 (24) It was urged that the exclusive power of legislation and administration carried with it, by necessary implication, any patrimonial interest which the Crown might have had in the reserved lands. In reply to that reasoning, Counsel for Ontario referred us to a series of provincial statutes prior in date to the Act of 1867, for the purpose of showing that the expression "Indian reserves" was used in legislative language to designate certain lands which the Indians had, after the Royal Proclamation of 1763, acquired a special interest, by treaty or otherwise, and did not apply to land occupied by them in virtue of the Proclamation. The argument might have deserved consideration if the expression had been adopted by the British Parliament in 1867, but it does not occur in Sect. 91 (24), and the words actually used are, according to their natural meaning, sufficient to include all lands reserved, upon any terms of conditions, for Indian occupation. It appears to be the plain policy of the Act that, in order to ensure uniformity of administration, all such lands, and Indian affairs generally, shall be under the legislative control of one central authority.

Their Lordships are, however, unable to assent to the argument for the Dominion founded on Sect. 91 (24). There can be no a priori probability that the British Legislature, in a branch of the statute which professes to deal only with the distribution of legislative power, intended to deprive the provinces of rights which are expressly given them in that branch of it which relates to the distribution of revenues and assets. The fact that the power of legislating for Indians, and for lands which are reserved to their use, has been entrusted to the Parliament of the Dominion is not in the least degree inconsistent with the right of the provinces to a beneficial interest in these lands, available to them as a source of revenue whenever the estate of the Crown is disencumbered of the Indian title.

Lord Watson's judgment for the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council affirmed Chancellor Boyd's initial decision without Boyd's overt racism. Lord Watson announced that, despite the "great deal of learned discussion at the Bar with respect to the precise quality of the Indian right," the Board did "not consider it necessary to express any opinion on the point." Is it fair to conclude that his judgment is bereft of that underlying racism?

Would Lord Watson have decided the case in favour of the province in any event, irrespective of Chancellor Boyd's reasons, given Watson's preference, as expressed in Local Prohibition, for limiting the federal power over the provinces?

Recall that in Local Prohibition, Lord Watson made no mention of the double aspect rule that was initially articulated in Hodge. Nevertheless, could Lord Watson have found in St Catharines Milling that there were federal and provincial aspects to the subject matter that would have authorized each level of government to act? Or would those two aspects, conferring timber rights to log on surrendered land, have been identical? How would this be different from federal and provincial laws prohibiting retail liquor sales? As you move through Chapter 8, Interpreting the Division of Powers, you might want to revisit this chapter and consider the following question: if there was a double aspect, what would be the implications of federal paramountcy for provincial authority?

The law, as stated by Lord Watson, has significantly evolved as a consequence of changing judicial attitudes and the entrenchment of Indigenous rights in s 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. As you move through Chapter 14, Indigenous Peoples and the Constitution, consider whether St Catharines Milling remains relevant. Does the ruling articulate assumptions the Supreme Court of Canada continues to rely upon to rationalize doctrines addressing Indigenous legal interests? Even if the law has changed in the intervening years, have the assumptions that support it remained in the background of contemporary doctrinal approaches to Indigenous rights and legal systems?

CHAPTER FIVE

THE EARLY TWENTIETH CENTURY: BEGINNINGS OF ECONOMIC REGULATION

This chapter continues the story of federalism into the early 20th century. In 1898, the Yukon Territory was carved out of the western corner of the Northwest Territories and, in 1905, Alberta and Saskatchewan were created out of the Northwest Territories' southern expanse. During this period, regulation of the economy expanded, and this is the subject of most of the cases in this chapter. The dominant personality is Lord Richard Burdon Haldane. Because it is unclear whether his decisions in the 1920s were his own contribution or a faithful elaboration of the earlier doctrine, especially the decisions of Lord Watson, an excerpt from his assessment of Lord Watson, written in 1899, is an appropriate beginning.

Lord Richard Burdon Haldane, "Lord Watson"

He was an Imperial judge of the very first order. The function of such a judge, sitting in the supreme tribunal of the Empire, is to do more than decide what abstract and familiar legal conceptions should be applied to particular cases. His function is to be a statesman as well as a jurist, to fill in the gaps which Parliament has deliberately left in the skeleton constitutions and laws that it has provided for the British Colonies. The Imperial legislature has taken the view that these constitutions and laws must, if they are to be acceptable, be in a large measure unwritten, elastic, and capable of being silently developed and even altered as the Colony develops and alters. This imposes a task of immense importance and difficulty upon the Privy Council judges, and it was this task which Lord Watson had to face when some fifteen years ago he found himself face to face with what threatened to be a critical period in the history of Canada. Lord Carnarvon's Confederation Act of 1867, which had given separate legislatures and executives to the Provinces, had by no means completely defined the relations of these legislatures and their Lieutenant-Governors to the Parliament and Governor-General of the Dominion. Two views were being contended for. The one was that, excepting in such cases as were specially provided for, a general principle ought to be recognised which would tend to make the Government of Ottawa paramount, and the Governments of the Provinces subordinate. The other was that of federalism through and through, in executive as well as legislative concerns, whenever the contrary had not been expressly said by the Imperial Parliament. The Provincial Governments naturally pressed this latter view very strongly. The Supreme Court of Canada, however, which had been established under the Confederation Act, and was originally intended by all parties to be the practically final Court of Appeal for Canada, took the other view. Great unrest was the result, followed by a series of appeals to the Privy Council, ... I happened to be engaged in a number of these cases, and had to give assistance as I could to the various Prime Ministers of the Provinces who came over to argue in person. Lord Watson made the business of laying down the new law that was necessary his own. He completely altered the tendency of the decisions of the Supreme Court, and established in the first place the sovereignty (subject to the power to interfere of the Imperial Parliament alone) of the legislatures of Ontario, Quebec and the other Provinces. He then worked out as a principle the direct relation, in point of exercise of the prerogative, of the Lieutenant-Governors to the Crown. In a series of masterly judgments he expounded and established the real constitution of Canada. The liquor laws, the Indian reserve lands, the title to regalia, including the precious metals, were brought before a Judicial Committee, in which he took the leading part, for consideration as to which of the rival claims to legislate ought to prevail. Nowhere is his memory likely to be more gratefully preserved than in those distant Canadian Provinces whose rights of self-government he placed on a basis that was both intelligible and firm.

The major cases in this section were decided in the 1920s, but a short look at two earlier ones gives some perspective for assessing the degree of continuity. The first, City of Montreal v Montreal Street Railway Company, 1912 CanLII 352, [\[1912\] AC 333 \(UKJCPC\)](#) involved a challenge to a section of the Dominion Railway Act, 3 Edw VII ch 58 that regulated continuing traffic on all provincial railways that crossed Dominion railways. In the Privy Council, Lord Atkinson expressed concern about provincial autonomy at 686-87:

[I]f the Parliament of Canada had power to make laws applicable to the whole Dominion in relation to matters which in each province are substantially of local or private interest, upon the assumption that these matters also concern the peace, order, and good government of the dominion, there is hardly a subject upon which it might not legislate to the exclusion of provincial legislation. The same considerations appear to their Lordships to apply to two of the matters enumerated in s. 91, namely the regulation of trade and commerce.

The second case, Canada (AG) v Alberta (AG), 1916 CanLII 424, [\[1916\] 1 AC 588 \(UKJCPC\)](#) [The Insurance Reference], aff'g Insurance Companies (Re), 48 SCR 260, 1913 CanLII 646, considered the Dominion Insurance Act, which sought to regulate large insurance companies carrying on business across the country. Section 4 prohibited any person or corporation from undertaking the business of insurance without a licence, although this prohibition did not include a corporation incorporated by a province and carrying on business wholly within the province that created it.

In the Supreme Court, a majority of four to two held the Act ultra vires. In the Privy Council, Lord Haldane agreed. He said that the Act "deprives private individuals of their liberty to carry on the business of insurance" (at 595). As regards the federal authority to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada, Haldane considered Russell v The Queen (1882), 7 App Cas 829, 51 LJPC 77 (UKJCPC) as having illustrated the principle, "now well established, but [which] nonetheless ought to be applied with great caution, that subjects which in one aspect and for one purpose fall within the jurisdiction of the provincial Legislatures may in another aspect and for another purpose fall within Dominion legislative jurisdiction." He considered Russell and Hodge v The Queen (1883), 53 LJPC 1, 9 AC 117 (UKJCPC), and said at 596:

Their Lordships think that as the result of these decisions it must now be taken that the authority to legislate for the regulation of trade and commerce does not extend to the regulation by a licensing system of a particular trade in which Canadians would otherwise be free to engage in the provinces.

Undoubtedly, Lord Haldane admitted at 596, "the business of insurance is a very important one, which has attained to great dimensions in Canada. But this is equally true of other highly important and extensive forms of business in Canada which are to-day freely transacted under provincial authority."

In the context of his discussion of the federal peace, order, and good government power, Lord Haldane held that a potential new aspect arises when a matter has attained "great dimensions," but called for "great caution" before finding that a matter has this kind of double aspect. Was Lord Haldane reading Hodge too narrowly? Was Lord FitzGerald in that case articulating a double-aspect doctrine only in the context of peace, order, and good government, or was he contemplating its application to federal enumerations more generally? Recall from Chapter 4, The Late Nineteenth Century: The Courts Set an Initial Course, that Lord FitzGerald referred to both Russell v The Queen (1882), 7 AC 829 (UKJCPC) and Citizens' and The Queen Insurance Cos v Parsons, 4 SCR 215, 1880 CanLII 6 as illustrating this rule.

The background of the next case, Re the Board of Commerce Act, 1919 and the Combines and Fair Prices Act of 1919, 60 SCR 456, 1920 CanLII 471, aff'd Canada (AG) v Alberta (AG), [1921 CanLII 399, \[1922\] 1 AC 191 \(UKJCPC\)](#) [Reference re the Board of Commerce Act 1919], is described in the excerpt immediately below.

Bernard J Hibbits, "A Bridle for Leviathan: The Supreme Court and the Board of Commerce"

(1989) 21:1 Ottawa L Rev 65 at 67-72

The Great War [The First World War] had been like no other conflict in history. The struggle had been one not merely of armies, but of entire nations harnessed to the single goal of victory. Governments had been forced to make unprecedented military and economic commitments to sustain their strategies and, indeed, themselves. When the guns finally fell silent it was discovered that along with millions of men, women and children had perished an entire world.

Canada had been spared the ravages of the fighting, but it nonetheless emerged in 1918 profoundly changed. Among the more obvious and important consequences of the war had been a phenomenal expansion of government and a concomitant increase in the extent of governmental intervention in the daily economic life of the citizenry. This is not to suggest that prior to 1914 the Canadian state or economy could have been adequately described in terms of laissez-faire; on the contrary, Canada had been remarkable for the tendency of governments throughout its history to direct the course of economic and national development from above and to control or indeed displace private enterprise in the public interest. Traditional Canadian conceptions of the state had nonetheless proven inadequate to meet the challenges posed by a total war in the twentieth century. Within a few months of the outbreak of hostilities the Borden Government had moved to mobilize the capacity of the nation in a more efficient manner.

... McGill's Stephen Leacock voiced the thoughts of many when he wrote in 1917:

The war has brought with it a new conception of society ... It has shown us in concrete form, in the shape of the war machine itself, a vast economic organization drawn to a scale never before imagined. The co-ordination of resources rendered necessary by the war, the united efforts made in production, manufacture and transport, suggest boundless possibilities for a time of peace. ...

By this point it was already apparent that it would be peace, not the war, that would ultimately pose the greater danger to Canadian prosperity and economic well-being. The scale of the existing conflict presaged the extent of the disruption that would follow an armistice. Hundreds of thousands of men would return from the Front looking for work. Entire industries which had grown up during the conflict and which had fueled the economic growth of the period—munitions being an obvious example—would atrophy or collapse almost overnight. Consumer demand patterns would change as the expectations and desires of the populace returned to what they had been in peacetime. Canadian trade abroad stood to suffer to the extent that foreign buyers would no longer need to depend as heavily on Canadian supplies of both raw materials and manufactured goods; at the same time it was feared that Canadian concerns would be exposed to competition from foreign—including, ironically, German—cartels.

In this context organization and co-operation became business bywords. Only through efficient combinations of plant and capital and/or co-ordination of marketing strategies did the country's commercial leaders believe that Canada's prosperity could be preserved.

... [M]any businessmen desired the creation of a forum in which they could work out their own disputes in an expeditious and effective manner. ... [T]he court system was perceived to be inadequate—litigation (assuming that commercial grievances represented valid causes of action in the first place) was expensive and, as noted above, businessmen were not convinced that judges had the commercial sensitivity required in the circumstances. In this context, business looked to the state to provide it with an institution which could, by its decisions, not only mute public criticism of its co-ordinative efforts, but could also facilitate post-war commerce by resolving the differences that created friction and disruption within the business community itself. In addition, many small businessmen hoped that such a tribunal would protect them from discrimination and other so-called unfair practices engaged in by the monopolistic "big interests" against which their own trade associations could be but a partial defence.

Such problems became more pressing as businessmen and consumers alike found themselves swept along by a rapidly rising cost of living. Wholesale and retail prices had skyrocketed during the war.

... In the face of this inflation, embittered members of the public accused businessmen of having conspired to suppress competition that would have kept prices down, and of having made undue profits in the process. In an atmosphere of increasing urgency exacerbated by widespread labour unrest (in particular the Winnipeg General Strike), the Government decided in May 1919 to appoint a special Parliamentary committee to look into the problem and report as soon as possible. This committee, chaired by Conservative MP George Nicholson, sat through the month of June, hearing witnesses from government, business, labour and consumer groups. Reporting on July 5, it suggested that the allegations of profiteering were generally without foundation: "[i]ndividual cases of high profits have been discovered, but these are probably no more numerous or excessive than during ordinary times of peace." Prices were high, but reasons for the wartime increases were to be found less in unfair or exploitative business practices than in consumers' wasteful buying and the general industrial expansion due to munitions making. Recognizing the need to act or at least be seen to act, a majority of the Committee nonetheless suggested that the Government establish a Board of Commerce which would continue and extend the investigative work of the Committee. ... Casting about for policy alternatives and becoming increasingly desperate in the last days of the Parliamentary session, the Government embraced the Committee recommendation and introduced implementing legislation even before the Committee's final report had been officially released. Not coincidentally, one suspects, the proposals appeared to offer a means by which the Government could satisfy the expressed needs of consumers and businessmen alike. The former would get a commission which in appropriate circumstances could act to limit profits and to a certain extent fix prices so as to stabilize and perhaps even reduce the cost of living; the latter would get their businessman's court which could legitimize business associations and co-ordinative practices while providing a forum for dispute settlement. Two Bills were in fact brought into the House: the first, the Board of Commerce Bill, setting up the Board of Commerce more or less along the lines proposed, and the second, the Combines and Fair Prices Bill, essentially setting out its powers.

Canada (AG) v Alberta (AG)

1921 CanLII 399, [1922] 1 AC 191 (UKJCPC) [Reference Re the Board Commerce Act 1919], aff'g The Board of Commerce Act (Re), 60 SCR 456, 1920 CanLII 471

[The Board of Commerce Act, 1919, 9 & 10 Geo 5, Dom, c 37 and the Combines and Fair Prices Act, 1919, 9 & 10 Geo 5, Dom, c 45 were enacted in July 1919. The general objective was to restrict two sorts of perceived abuses: first, combines, monopolies, and mergers; and, second, taking unfair profits, or hoarding "necessaries of life," including food and clothing, for the purpose of unfairly increasing prices. The Board had extensive powers to investigate and to make orders, including orders to cease formation or operation of combines and orders to repay unfair profits. A violation of an order of the Board was an indictable offence, for which the penalty was a fine not exceeding $1,000 for each day of the offence or imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years.

The Board began to work with great enthusiasm, making investigations and orders about prices, but almost immediately it encountered resistance. An order about profit margins for retail sales of clothing led to protests by irate merchants, and the Board reacted by arranging a reference to the Supreme Court to determine whether it had constitutional authority to make orders of this kind. Some preliminary procedural wrangling followed, caused largely by the Court's dissatisfaction with the abstract form of the questions in the reference. Eventually the questions were reformulated, and the Court was asked whether the Board had power to make a specific order setting profit margins for clothing prices in Ottawa. This depended on the validity of the Combines and Fair Prices Act, which gave the Board its powers.

The Supreme Court divided equally, three to three. (At the time, the Court was composed of only six members.) Anglin J, writing for himself and Fitzpatrick and Mignault JJ, would have upheld the statute, relying primarily on s 91(2):

Effective control and regulation of prices so as to meet and overcome in any one province what is generally recognized to be an evil—"profiteering"—an evil so prevalent and so insidious that in the opinion of many persons it threatens to-day the moral and social well-being of the Dominion—may thus necessitate investigation, inquiry and control in other Provinces. It may be necessary to deal with the prices and the profits of the growers or other producers of raw material, the manufacturers, the middlemen and the retailers. No one Provincial Legislature could legislate so as to cope effectively with such a matter and concurrent legislation of all the Provinces interested is fraught with so many difficulties in its enactment, and in its administration and enforcement that to deal with the situation at all adequately by that means is, in my opinion, quite impracticable [The Board of Commerce Act (Re) at 362].

He did, though, say that the statute could also be upheld under the peace, order, and good government of Canada (POGG). Although it dealt with property and civil rights, it did so "in an aspect" (at 362) that was not local or private. As well, he would have upheld the provisions about hoarding necessities under s 91(27) (the criminal law power).

Opposed to Anglin were Idington, Duff, and Brodeur JJ. Idington J began his discussion of s 91(2) by speaking of "the old forlorn hope, so many times tried, unsuccessfully" (at 377). Regulation of prices in a "tailor shop, or the corner grocery" (at 377) came within s 92(13) and, if the statute were valid (at The Board of Commerce Act (Re) at 377-8):

Is there any sumptuary law or socialistic conception of organised society which could not be made to fall within the power of Parliament by the same process of reasoning . . . Our Confederation Act was not intended to be a mere sham, but an instrument of government intended to assign to the Provincial Legislatures some absolute rights, and of these none were supposed to be more precious than those over property and civil rights.

Turning to POGG, he spoke of "the remarkable legislation now in question" (The Board of Commerce Act (Re) at 379), and said it could not include a power to affect "property and civil rights . . . save in the extreme necessity begotten of war conditions, or in manifold ways that do not touch provincial rights" (The Board of Commerce Act (Re) at 379). Duff J began by considering s 91(2), and separated the Board's powers about hoarding and unfair profits. The powers about hoarding were too broad because they extended to hoarding by anyone, not only traders: "For example, it applies to accumulations by the house holder of articles of food produced by the householder himself, the small farmer's pork and butter, as well as to his cordwood" (The Board of Commerce Act (Re) at 386). The powers about unfair profits did not fail in the same way, but they did not come within the general principles specified by the cases (The Board of Commerce Act (Re) at 387-8):

I have indicated the principle which in my opinion is deducible from Parsons' case . . . namely that sec. 91, sub-sec. 2 does not authorise an enactment by the Dominion Parliament regulating in each of the Provinces the terms of the contracts of a particular business or trade, for the reason (put very broadly) that such legislation involves an interposition in . . . the sphere of "Property and Civil Rights and local undertakings" . . . I cannot discover any principle consistent with these conclusions, upon which an enactment delegating to a commission the authority to regulate the terms of particular contracts . . . according to the views of the Board as to what may be fair . . . , can be sustained as an exercise of that power; and if such legislation could not be supported when the subject dealt with is a single commodity, or the trade is a single commodity, or a single group of commodities, how can jurisdiction be acquired so to legislate by extending the scope of the legislation and bringing a large number of specified trades or commodities within its sweep?

Duff J then considered POGG, and said (The Board of Commerce Act (Re) at 392):

[W]here a subject matter is from a provincial point of view comprehended within the class of subjects falling under "property and civil rights," properly construed . . . it is incompetent to the Dominion in exercise of the authority given by the introductory clause to legislate upon that matter either alone or together with subjects over which the Dominion has undoubted jurisdiction as falling neither within sec. 92 nor within the enumerated heads of sec. 91; and legislation which in effect has this operation cannot be legitimised by framing it in comprehensive terms embracing matters over which the Dominion has jurisdiction as well as matters in which the jurisdiction is committed exclusively to the Provinces.

Nor do I think it matters in the least that the legislation is enacted with the view of providing a remedy uniformly applicable to the whole of Canada in relation to a situation of general importance to the Dominion. The ultimate social, economic or political aims of the legislator cannot I think determine the category into which the matters dealt with fall in order to determine the question whether the jurisdiction to enact it is given by sec. 91 or sec. 92. The immediate operation and effect of the legislation, or the effect the legislation is calculated immediately to produce must alone, I think, be considered.

Both Idington and Duff JJ also rejected the arguments based on s 91(27). The Dominion appealed to the Privy Council.]

VISCOUNT HALDANE:

The first question to be answered is whether the Dominion Parliament could validly enact such a law. Their Lordships observe that the law is not one enacted to meet special conditions in war time [i.e., an emergency]. It was passed in 1919, after peace had been declared, and it is not confined to any temporary purpose, but is to continue without limit in time, and to apply throughout Canada. No doubt the initial words of sec. 91 of the B.N.A. Act, confer on the Parliament of Canada power to deal with subjects which concern the Dominion generally, provided that they are not withheld from the powers of that Parliament to legislate, by any of the express heads in sec. 92, untrammelled by the enumeration of special heads in sec. 91. It may well be that the subjects of undue combination and hoarding are matters in which the Dominion has a great practical interest. In special circumstances, such as those of a great war, such an interest might conceivably become of such paramount and overriding importance as to amount to what lies outside the heads in sec. 92, and is not covered by them. The decision in Russell v. The Queen (1882) ... appears to recognise this as constitutionally possible, even in time of peace; but it is quite another matter to say that under normal circumstances general Canadian policy can justify interference, on such a scale as the statutes in controversy involve, with the property and civil rights of the inhabitants of the Provinces. It is to the Legislatures of the Provinces that the regulation and restriction of their civil rights have in general been exclusively confided, and as to these the Provincial Legislatures possess quasi-sovereign authority. It can, therefore, be only under necessity in highly exceptional circumstances, such as cannot be assumed to exist in the present case, that the liberty of the inhabitants of the Provinces may be restricted by the Parliament of Canada, and that the Dominion can intervene in the interests of Canada as a whole in questions such as the present one. For, normally, the subject-matter to be dealt with in the case would be one falling within sec. 92. Nor do the words in sec. 91, the Regulation of Trade and Commerce, if taken by themselves, assist the present Dominion contention. It may well be, if the Parliament of Canada had, by reason of an altogether exceptional situation, capacity to interfere, that these words would apply so as to enable that Parliament to oust the exclusive character of the Provincial powers under sec. 92. In the case of Dominion companies their Lordships in deciding the case of John Deere Plow Co. v. Wharton [1914 CanLII 603, [1915] AC 330 (UKJCPC)], expressed the opinion that the language of sec. 91(2) could have the effect of aiding Dominion powers conferred by the general language of sec. 91. But that was because the regulation of the trading of Dominion companies was sought to be invoked only in furtherance of a general power which the Dominion Parliament possessed independently of it. Where there was no such power in that Parliament, as in the case of the Dominion Insurance Act, it was held otherwise, and that the authority of the Dominion Parliament to legislate for the regulation of trade and commerce did not, by itself, enable interference with particular trades in which Canadians would, apart from any right of interference conferred by these words above, be free to engage in the Provinces. This result was the outcome of a series of well-known decisions of earlier dates, which are now so familiar that they need not be cited.

For analogous reasons the words of head 27 of sec. 91 do not assist the argument for the Dominion. It is one thing to construe the words "the Criminal Law, except the constitution of courts of Criminal Jurisdiction, but including the procedure in criminal matters," as enabling the Dominion Parliament to exercise exclusive legislative power where the subject matter is one which by its very nature belongs to the domain of criminal jurisprudence. A general law, to take an example, making incest a crime, belongs to this class. It is quite another thing, first to attempt to interfere with a class of subject committed exclusively to the Provincial Legislature, and then to justify this by enacting ancillary provisions, designated as new phases of Dominion Criminal law which require a title to so interfere as basis of their application. ...

As their Lordships have already indicated, the jurisdiction attempted to be conferred on the new Board of Commerce appears to them to be ultra vires for the reasons now discussed. It implies a claim of title, in the cases of non-traders as well as of traders, to make orders prohibiting the accumulation of certain articles required for everyday life, and the withholding of such articles from sale at prices to be defined by the Board, whenever they exceed the amount of the material which appears to the Board to be required for domestic purposes or for the ordinary purposes of business. The Board is also given jurisdiction to regulate profits and dealings which may give rise to profit. The power sought to be given to the Board applies to articles produced for his own use by the householder himself, as well as to articles accumulated, not for the market but for the purposes of their own processes of manufacture by manufacturers. The Board is empowered to inquire into individual cases and to deal with them individually, and not merely as the result of applying principles to be laid down as of general application. This would cover such instances as those of coal mines and of local Provincial undertakings for meeting Provincial requirements of social life.

Legislation setting up a Board of Commerce with such powers appears to their Lordships to be beyond the powers conferred by sec. 91. They find confirmation of this view in sec. 41 of the Board of Commerce Act, which enables the Dominion Executive to review and alter the decisions of the Board. It has already been observed that circumstances are conceivable, such as those of war or famine, when the peace, order and good Government of the Dominion might be imperilled [such] that they require legislation of a character in reality beyond anything provided for by the enumerated heads in either sec. 92 or sec. 91 itself. Such a case, if it were to arise would have to be considered closely before [concluding] that it was one which could not be treated as falling under any of the heads enumerated. Still it is a conceivable case; and although great caution is required in referring to it, even in general terms, it ought not, in the view their Lordships take of the B.N.A. Act, read as a whole, to be excluded from what is possible. For throughout the provisions of that Act there is apparent the recognition that subjects which would normally belong exclusively to a specifically assigned class of subject may, under different circumstances and in another aspect, assume a further significance. Such an aspect may conceivably become of paramount importance, and of dimensions that give rise to other aspects. This is a principle which, although recognised in earlier decisions, ... has always been applied with reluctance, and its recognition as relevant can be justified only after scrutiny sufficient to render it clear that the circumstances are abnormal. In the case before them, however important [the policy] may seem to the Parliament of Canada ... , their Lordships do not find any evidence that the standard of necessity referred to has been reached, or that the attainment of the end sought is practicable ... without the co-operation of the Provincial Legislatures. It may well be that it is within the power of the Dominion Parliament to call, for example, for statistical and other information which may be valuable for guidance in questions affecting Canada as a whole. Such information may be required before any power to regulate trade and commerce can be properly exercised, even where such power is construed in a fashion much narrower than that in which it was sought to interpret it in the argument at the Bar for the Attorney-General for Canada. But even this consideration affords no justification for interpreting the words of sec. 91(2), in a fashion which would, as was said in the argument on the other side, make them confer capacity to regulate particular trades and businesses.

For the reasons now given their Lordships are of opinion that the first of the questions brought before them must be answered in the negative. As a consequence the second question does not arise. ...

Appeal dismissed.

A revised measure regulating anti-competitive conduct was upheld in Proprietary Articles Trade Association v Canada (AG), [1931 CanLII 385, \[1931\] AC 310 \(UKJCPC\)](#), reproduced in Chapter 6, The 1930s: The Depression and the New Deal.

Fort Frances Pulp and Paper Co v Manitoba Free Press Co [1923 CanLII 429, \[1923\] AC 695 \(UKJCPC\)](#)

[This case dealt with regulation of prices for newsprint. It shared the social and economic background of the Board of Commerce case but involved different legislation. In 1914, the Dominion enacted the War Measures Act, 5 Geo 5, c 2, which gave the government power to do whatever it considered "necessary or advisable for the security, defense, peace, order and welfare of Canada." This power was limited to the existence of "real or apprehended war, invasion, insurrection" and a proclamation by the government was to be conclusive evidence that these conditions existed. Under the War Measures Act, the government regulated prices of newsprint in a series of different administrative arrangements. Most important was the creation, in 1917, of the paper controller, who made the initial decisions, and the Paper Control Tribunal, which heard appeals. On December 24, 1919, the controller made an order about prices up to December 31 and ordered the Fort Frances Company to repay whatever it had received from the Manitoba Free Press in excess of these prices. The Tribunal confirmed this order on July 8, 1920. When Fort Frances refused to pay, the Manitoba Free Press brought an action in Ontario. A trial judgment allowing the claim was affirmed by the Ontario Court of Appeal and the defendant appealed directly to the Privy Council.]

VISCOUNT HALDANE:

It is clear that in normal circumstances the Dominion Parliament could not have so legislated as to set up the machinery of control over the paper manufacturers which is now in question. The recent decision of the Judicial Committee in the Board of Commerce Case [[1921] CanLII 399, [1922] 1 AC 191 (UKJCPC)] as well as earlier decisions, shew that as the Dominion Parliament cannot ordinarily legislate so as to interfere with property and civil rights in the Provinces, it could not have done what the two statutes under consideration purport to do had the situation been normal. But it does not follow that in a very different case, such as that of sudden danger to social order arising from the outbreak of a great war, the Parliament of the Dominion cannot act under other powers which may well be implied in the constitution. The reasons given in the Board of Commerce Case recognize exceptional cases where such a power may be implied.

In the event of war, when the national life may require for its preservation the employment of very exceptional means, the provision of peace, order and good government for the country as a whole may involve effort on behalf of the whole nation, in which the interests of individuals may have to be subordinated to that of the community in a fashion which requires sec. 91 to be interpreted as providing for such an emergency. The general control of property and civil rights for normal purposes remains with the Provincial Legislatures. But questions may arise by reason of the special circumstances of the national emergency which concern nothing short of the peace, order and good government of Canada as a whole.

The overriding powers enumerated in sec. 91, as well as the general words at the commencement of the section, may then become applicable to new and special aspects which they cover of subjects assigned otherwise exclusively to the Provinces. It may be, for example, impossible to deal adequately with the new questions which arise without the imposition of special regulations on trade and commerce of a kind that only the situation created by the emergency places within the competency of the Dominion Parliament. It is proprietary and civil rights in new relations, which they do not present in normal times, that have to be dealt with; and these relations, which affect Canada as an entirety, fall within sec. 91, because in their fullness they extend beyond what sec. 92 can really cover. The kind of power adequate for dealing with them is only to be found in that part of the constitution which establishes power in the State as a whole. For it is not one that can be reliably provided for by depending on collective action of the Legislatures of the individual Provinces agreeing for the purpose. That the basic instrument on which the character of the entire constitution depends should be construed as providing for such centralised power in an emergency situation follows from the manifestation in the language of the Act of the principle that the instrument has among its purposes to provide for the State regarded as a whole, and for the expression and influence of its public opinion as such. This principle of a power so implied has received effect also in countries with a written and apparently rigid constitution such as the United States, where the strictly federal character of the national basic agreement has retained the residuary powers not expressly conferred on the Federal Government for the component States. The operation of the scheme of interpretation is all the more to be looked for in a constitution such as that established by the B.N.A. Act, where the residuary powers are given to the Dominion Central Government, and the preamble of the statute declares the intention to be that the Dominion should have a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom.

Their Lordships, therefore, entertain no doubt that [while], as a general principle, the Dominion Parliament is to be excluded from trenching on property and civil rights in the Provinces of Canada, yet in a sufficiently great emergency such as that arising out of war, there is implied the power to deal adequately with that emergency for the safety of the Dominion as a whole. The enumeration in sec. 92 is not in any way repealed in the event of such an occurrence, but a new aspect of the business of Government is recognized as emerging, an aspect which is not covered or precluded by the general words in which powers are assigned to the Legislatures of the Provinces as individual units. Where an exact line of demarcation will lie in such cases it may not be easy to lay down a priori, nor is it necessary. For in the solution of the problem regard must be had to the broadened field covered, in case of exceptional necessity, by the language of sec. 91, in which the interests of the Dominion generally are protected. As to these interests the Dominion Government, which in its Parliament represents the people as a whole, must be deemed to be left with considerable freedom to judge.

The other point which arises is whether such exceptional necessity as must be taken to have existed when the war broke out, and almost of necessity for some period subsequent to its outbreak, continued through the whole of the time within which the questions in the present case arose.

When war has broken out it may be requisite to make special provision to ensure the maintenance of law and order in a country, even when it is in no immediate danger of invasion. Public opinion may become excitable, and one of the causes of this may conceivably be want of uninterrupted information in newspapers. Steps may have to be taken to ensure supplies of these and to avoid shortage, and the effect of the economic and other disturbance occasioned originally by the war may thus continue for some time after it is terminated. The question of the extent to which provision for circumstances such as these may have to be maintained is one on which a Court of law is loath to enter. No authority other than the central government is in a position to deal with a problem which is essentially one of statesmanship. It may be that it has become clear that the crisis which arose is wholly at an end and that there is no justification for the continued exercise of an exceptional interference which becomes ultra vires when it is no longer called for. In such a case the law as laid down for distribution of powers in the ruling instrument would have to be invoked. But very clear evidence that the crisis had wholly passed away would be required to justify the judiciary, even when the question raised was one of ultra vires which it had to decide, in overruling the decision of the Government that exceptional measures were still requisite. In saying what is almost obvious, their Lordships observe themselves to be in accord with the view taken under analogous circumstances by the Supreme Court of the United States, and expressed in such decisions as that in October, 1919, in Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries (1919), 251 U.S. Rep. 146.

When then, in the present instance, can it be said that the necessity altogether ceased for maintaining the exceptional measure of control over the newspaper print industry introduced while the war was at its height? At what date did the disturbed state of Canada which the war had produced so entirely pass away that the legislative measures relied on in the present case became ultra vires? It is enough to say that there is no clear and unmistakable evidence [of this] at the dates on which the action in question was taken by the Paper Control Tribunal. No doubt late in 1919 statements were made to the effect that the war itself was at an end. For example, in the Order in Council made at Ottawa on December 20, 1919, it is stated that it must "be realised that although no proclamation has been issued declaring that the war no longer exists, actual war conditions have in fact long ago ceased to exist, and consequently existence of war can no longer be urged as a reason in fact for maintaining these extraordinary regulations as necessary or advisable for the security of Canada."

The Order in Council then goes on to say that in consequence of the armistice of November, 1918, the Expeditionary Force had since been withdrawn and demobilised, and the country generally is devoting its energies to re-establishment in the ordinary avocations of peace. In these circumstances, it states, the Minister of Justice considers that the time has arrived when the emergency Government legislation should cease to operate. (This was in December, 1919.) The order then goes on to declare repealed all orders and regulations of the Governor in Council which depend for their sanction upon sec. 6 of the War Measures Act, 1914, and repeals them as from January 1, 1920. But from this repeal it expressly excepts, among other orders and regulations specified, those relating to paper control, which are to remain in force until the end of another session of Parliament.

It will be observed that this Order in Council deals only with the results following from the cessation of actual war conditions. It excepts from repeal certain measures concerned with consequential conditions arising out of war, which may obviously continue to produce effects remaining in operation after war itself is over.

Their Lordships find themselves unable to say that the Dominion Government had no good reason for thus temporarily continuing the paper control after actual war had ceased, but while the effects of war conditions might still be operative.

Appeal dismissed.

NOTE

The Board of Commerce was also entangled in the regulation of the price of newsprint, although later and in a different way. Early in 1920, as part of the dismantling of wartime controls, the Dominion assigned the Board of Commerce the functions of the paper controller, and it inherited a quarrel with Price Brothers, one of the large pulp and paper firms. Shortly afterward, the Board declared newsprint to be a necessity and set a maximum price that was well below the market price in the United States. Price Brothers refused to comply, and the Board sought to enforce its order. This quarrel led to another case, In re Price Bros and The Board of Commerce of Canada, 60 SCR 265, 1920 CanLII 89, in which two issues of interpretation were raised. The first involved the War Measures Act, and here the question was whether it authorized the appointment of the paper controller even though armistice had been declared three months before the appointment. The second of these two issues involved the phrase "necessary of life" in the Combines and Fair Prices Act: was newsprint a "necessary"? A majority of the Supreme Court decided both issues against the Board, and no appeal was taken.

See Bernard J Hibbitts, "A Bridle for Leviathan: The Supreme Court and the Board of Commerce" (1989) 21:1 Ottawa L Rev 65, where Hibbitts argues that the case is a watershed in the attitudes of Canadian judges toward economic regulation. His argument (at 97-102) may be useful in considering explanations of the cases throughout the 1920s and 1930s:

The outright split in the Reference and the variations in approach which had been evident in Price Brothers reflected philosophical and conceptual differences among members of the Supreme Court going far beyond the level of disagreements as to the vires of particular legislation or the jurisdiction of a particular board. Beneath the veneer afforded by the circumstances of the cases, the Court was divided on such fundamental issues as the appropriate functions of the state, the rights of the individual, the nature of Canadian federalism, the role of the courts and the task of law. The divisions, granted, were not always hard and fast and sometimes individuals appeared inconsistent. The Board of Commerce decisions nonetheless made it clear that the Judges of the Court were not altogether of one mind. Regarded in a broader context, the decisions further suggested that far from being a static institution, the Court in this period was in the process—albeit by now in the last stages—of a transformation which was having an important impact on its behaviour, and in particular on its relationship with government.

Ultimately, the differences among the members of the Court were differences about values—in particular, the respective worths of Man (the individual) and the state (the community). Idington, Duff and Brodeur JJ, for instance, were very much animated by faith in the capacity of individuals to advance and benefit themselves and society and by a concomitant concern for their rights. In the Board of Commerce Reference, these things had revealed themselves directly as an aversion to compulsion of the individual by the state and a willingness to confine the power and discretion of state instrumentalities so as to limit the potential extent of that compulsion. Similar considerations had encouraged the same men to deny federal authority over such undertakings in favour of provincial jurisdiction. ...

Justices Anglin, Davies and Mignault had been rather less concerned with such rights and provincial autonomy. Their judgments contained no paeans to the state, but they had nonetheless been prepared to allow the legislature and its instrumentalities a greater degree of “interference” in the lives and business of the citizenry. In sum, they seemed less convinced of the individual’s social omnipotence and omnicompetence, more concerned with the efficient solution of important social problems and more prepared to defer to authority purporting to be engaged in such solution. ...

It may be argued that the inconsistencies in approach manifest among members of the Supreme Court in the Board of Commerce cases reflected a confrontation within the Court between two competing visions of law; one newly dominant, the other in decline. The dominant vision—that shared by Idington, Duff and Brodeur JJ—had been imported to Canada from late nineteenth century England, and was the more modern of the two. The other view of law—arguably apparent in the judgments of Anglin, Davies and Mignault JJ, but even in them somewhat qualified by aspects of the dominant vision—was more traditional, being principally a philosophic holdover from the colonial past.

Toronto Electric Commissioners v Snider

1925 CanLII 331, [1925] AC 396 (UKJCPC), rev’g Toronto Electric Commission v Snider, 1924 CanLII 429, 55 OLR 454 (CA)

[Here the Privy Council considered the validity of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, enacted by the Dominion in 1907. It applied to mining, transportation, and communications undertakings, as well as public service utilities, and it was limited to those with more than ten employees. It enabled an employee or an employer in a dispute about the conditions of work to apply to the Minister of Labour for the appointment of a Board of Conciliation and Investigation. If a board was appointed, a strike or lockout was prohibited, and the function of this board was to inquire into the dispute and to attempt to effect a settlement. If a settlement was reached, it had the effect of an order of a court; if no settlement was reached, the board was to report to the Minister, who was to make the report public. In 1914, Ontario enacted a similar statute.

A board was appointed to inquire into a dispute between the Toronto Electric commissioners and some of its employees, and the commissioners sought an injunction, alleging that the Act was ultra vires. The Ontario Court of Appeal, reversing the trial court, dismissed the claim. Ferguson JA, with whom Mulock CJO and Magee and Smith JJA concurred, wrote the judgment for the majority. He avoided relying on POGG, because he felt that its limits were not clearly settled. The Act, though, was valid under s 91(2) and s 91(27). About s 91(2), Ferguson JA said (Snider [1924] at 785-86):

It cannot be disputed that to deprive the City of Toronto of electric power on which it depends for light, heat and power is to disturb and hinder the national trade and commerce and to endanger public peace, order and safety.

Industrial disputes are not now regarded as matters concerning only a disputing employer and his employees. It is common knowledge that such disputes are matters of public interest and concern, and frequently of national and international importance.

Hodgins JA dissented. For POGG, he saw two distinct grounds, emergency and "matters of 'general Canadian interest and importance,'" (Snider [1924] at 764) an expression borrowed from Lord Watson. The Act was not a response to an emergency. Instead, it dealt with the normal working of industrial relations, which often require time and patience and some restraint, to afford protection against dislocation or disturbance in the usual conduct of business as between employer and employees. It [was] essentially a sedative measure, and not in any way designed to meet a serious emergency [Snider [1924] at 764].

He held that the other branch of POGG could not support the Act, because it "plainly invades the specified domain of provincial legislation" (Snider [1924] at 769), even though the subject of labour relations was one that should, "in the interest of the whole community ... be dealt with by some national measure" (Snider [1924] at 769). In conclusion, he said that s 91(27) did not support the Act, because it was "substantially in relation to property and civil rights" (Snider [1924] at 778). The commissioners appealed to the Privy Council.]

LORD HALDANE:

[A description of the legislation and the dispute is omitted. Lord Haldane's description was inaccurate in one respect—it asserted that the legislation applied to "industrial disputes between any employer in Canada and any one or more of his employees" (Snider [1924] at 766). In fact, the legislation was limited to certain industries and applied only to employers with more than ten employees.]

• • •

Their Lordships are of opinion that, on authority as well as on principle, they are to-day precluded from accepting the arguments that the Dominion Act in controversy can be justified as being an exercise of the Dominion power under s. 91 in relation to criminal law. What the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act ... aimed at accomplishing was to enable the Dominion Government to appoint anywhere in Canada a Board of Conciliation and Investigation to which the dispute between an employer and his employees might be referred. The Board was to have power to enforce the attendance of witnesses and to compel the production of documents. It could under the Act enter premises, interrogate the persons there, and inspect the work. It rendered it unlawful for an employer to lock-out or for a workman to strike, on account of the dispute, prior to or during the reference, and imposed an obligation on employees and employers to give 30 days' notice of any intended change affecting wages or hours. ... It is obvious that these provisions dealt with civil rights, and it was not within the power of the Dominion Parliament to make this otherwise by imposing merely ancillary penalties. The penalties for breach of the restrictions did not [lessen] the statute['s] ... interference with civil rights in its pith and substance. The Act is not one which aims at making striking generally a new crime. Moreover, the employer retains under the general common law a right to lock-out, only slightly interfered with by the penalty. In this connection their Lordships are therefore of opinion that the validity of the Act cannot be sustained.

Nor does the invocation of the specific power in s. 91 to regulate trade and commerce assist the Dominion contention.

[A discussion of cases, especially Parsons, is omitted.]

It is, in their Lordships' opinion, now clear that, excepting so far as the power can be invoked in aid of capacity conferred independently under other words in s. 91, the power to regulate trade and commerce cannot be relied on as enabling the Dominion Parliament to regulate civil rights in the Provinces.

A more difficult question arises with reference to the initial words of s. 91, which enable the Parliament of Canada to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada in matters falling outside the Provincial powers specifically conferred by s. 92. ...

It appears to their Lordships that it is not now open to them to treat Russell v. The Queen as having established the general principle that the mere fact that Dominion legislation is for the general advantage of Canada, or is such that it will meet a mere want which is felt throughout the Dominion, renders it competent if it cannot be brought within the heads enumerated specifically in s. 91. Unless this is so, if the subject matter falls within any of the enumerated heads in s. 92, such legislation belongs exclusively to provincial competency. No doubt there may be cases arising out of some extraordinary peril to the national life of Canada, as a whole, such as the cases arising out of a war, where legislation is required of an order that passes beyond the heads of exclusive provincial competency. Such cases may be dealt with under the words at the commencement of s. 91, conferring general powers in relation to peace, order and good government, simply because such cases are not otherwise provided for. But instances of this, as was pointed out in the judgment in Fort Frances Pulp and Power Co. v. Manitoba Free Press [1923] CanLII 429, [1923] AC 695 (UKJCPC), are highly exceptional. Their Lordships think that the decision in Russell v. The Queen can only be supported to-day, not on the footing of having laid down an interpretation, such as has sometimes been invoked of the general words at the beginning of s. 91, but on the assumption of the Board, apparently made at the time of deciding the case of Russell v. The Queen, that the evil of intemperance at that time amounted in Canada to one so great and so general that at least for the period it was a menace to the national life of Canada so serious and pressing that the National Parliament was called on to intervene to protect the nation from disaster. An epidemic of pestilence might conceivably have been regarded as analogous. It is plain from the decision in the Board of Commerce case [1921] CanLII 399, [1922] 1 AC 191 (UKJCPC), that the evil of profiteering could not have been so invoked, for provincial powers, if exercised, were adequate to it. Their Lordships find it difficult to explain the decision in Russell v. The Queen as more than a decision of this order upon facts, considered to have been established at its date rather than upon general law.

• • •

As the result of consideration, their Lordships have come to the conclusion that they ought humbly to advise the Sovereign that the appeal should be allowed, and that judgment should be entered for the appellants for the declaration and injunction claimed.

Appeal allowed.

The Board's decision to strike down the federal Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, RSC 1952, c 152 came as no great surprise to some commentators, even though the Act had been in continuous operation for the previous 19 years. The following excerpt helps to explain why Lord Haldane saw labour relations as more appropriately the subject of provincial regulation:

Labour at first opposed the scheme [in the Snider litigation]. It came around to support the Act, submitted counsel for Snider, Mr. Duncan, in oral argument, because labour saw the "justice" in supporting a national scheme that dealt with the subject satisfactorily "from a Labour point of view." The same could not be expected of the provinces acting severally. Federal authority was justified, argued Duncan, not only because social conditions had changed so dramatically that regulation of industrial relations was a national priority, but also because of the fear that collective action by labour could "be very quickly turned into an attack on the State"—always an imminent [sic] emergency.

Lord Haldane could find no authority for the Act in the federal trade and commerce power because it was not invoked in aid of another power conferred independently of section 91(2); nor could he find support under the federal criminal law power. As for pog, Haldane resisted the conclusion that the Act arose out of some "extraordinary peril to the national life of Canada, as a whole." As in the case of the evil of "profiteering," which was the target of federal legislation in Board of Commerce, provincial powers "if exercised, were adequate" to the task of regulating labour relations.

Not only did the structure and interpretation of the 1867 Act compel the conclusion that the provinces had this authority, but Haldane made clear during oral argument that he preferred that authority rest with the provinces, for reasons having to do with the ethical superiority of local government: "In all those labour disputes the stopping of a strike depends a good deal on whether the Minister can get alongside the men, and whether he knows them, and can talk as familiar friends; you have a better chance of that if you are all local men than if you are spread over a huge Dominion." Haldane went so far as to describe each province as "a country by itself," as an "independent State, ... cut into expressly by the enumerations of section 91." ... Perhaps the better interpretation of Haldane's understanding of Canadian constitutional law is this: citizenship in a federal polity is advanced by favouring autonomous local government over centralized state authority, save for those rare instances when the polity itself is under threat.

See David Schneiderman, "Harold Laski, Viscount Haldane, and the Law of the Canadian Constitution in the Early Twentieth Century" (1998) 48:4 UTLJ 521 at 558-59.

NOTE: LORD HALDANE AND THE TRADE AND COMMERCE POWER

The Parsons case excerpted in Chapter 4 had suggested a narrow reading of the scope of the federal trade and commerce power. In the series of decisions discussed in this chapter, Lord Haldane further reduced this power to one available only "in aid of" another federal enumeration. The federal trade and commerce power alone had no independent authority; it could only be used to tip the balance in favour of the federal government under some other independent enumeration. Yet in Parsons, Sir Montague Smith admitted that the federal power under s 91(2) extended to international and interprovincial trade. Could it have been that Lord Haldane intended to deny even this authority to the federal government? Professor Alexander Smith suggests that it was a "Procrustean adjustment" to proscribe the power relating to the "general regulation of trade" to a subsidiary role. "If it was intended to apply to all components of the commerce clause, including international and interprovincial trade," Smith wrote, "then it is remarkable indeed": see Alexander Smith, The Commerce Power in Canada and the United States (Toronto: Butterworths, 1963) at 115. In the following case, Justice Anglin expresses a similar concern. Justice Duff, for the majority, seems to acknowledge that the federal government continues to have authority to regulate foreign trade, but holds that it does not have authority to intermingle regulation of foreign trade with trade taking place entirely within provincial boundaries.

The King v Eastern Terminal Elevator Co

[Early in the 20th century, exports of grain grown on the prairies became a major element of Canada's economy. Typically, the grain was delivered by farmers to local elevators and, from them, transported by rail to elevators in Winnipeg. From Winnipeg, it went, again by rail, to elevators in Port Arthur or Fort William (now Thunder Bay) and then to markets in Canada and abroad. The entire industry was governed by the Canada Grain Act, 1912, 9-10 Geo 5, c 40, which created the Board of Grain Commissioners and gave it extensive regulatory powers.

One of the purposes of the Act was to facilitate commercial transactions, especially international transactions, by requiring all prairie grain shipped through elevators to be cleaned, weighed, and graded, and by providing certificates of weights and grades on which buyers could rely. The railway cars were inspected at Winnipeg to determine the kind of grain, its grade and weight, and the percentage of "dockage"—extraneous grain and foreign matter. When the grain arrived in Port Arthur or Fort William, the elevators issued certificates of weight and grade, which were used in commercial transactions; and warehouse receipts, which were traded on the Winnipeg Grain Exchange.

This case involved a quarrel between farmers and terminal grain elevators in Port Arthur and Fort William. The quarrel was about the arrangements established by the Act for compensating the terminal elevators for storing and cleaning the grain. These arrangements were complex. If the dockage was over three percent of the weight of the grain delivered, it was returned to the shipper (with a small deduction for waste), and the shipper paid a fee for storage and cleaning. If it was under three percent, it was a "surplus," and was retained by the elevator in lieu of a separate fee. The elevators screened this surplus and sold the marketable grain it contained.

In 1919, in response to complaints that the terminal elevators were making unfair profits from the surpluses, s 95(7) was added. It provided that each elevator could retain only a limited amount of the surplus—one-quarter percent of the total grain it received. The remainder was to be sold, and the proceeds paid to the Board and used for administrative costs.

The Board brought this action against the Eastern Terminal Company, one of the terminal elevators, after it refused to pay, and the company claimed that s 95(7) was ultra vires. The trial judge, Maclean J, agreed. Even though the Act as a whole might be valid because "the export of Canadian grain was a matter of national concern" and "a primary industry of great magnitude" (at 455), s 95(7) was not necessarily incidental. Considering the legislative history, especially the concern for unfair profits, the limitation to terminal elevators, and the fact that the Board had a power to impose fees to pay its expenses, it was "an attempt to regulate profits" (at 455), and not an imposition of a tax. The Board appealed.]

ANGLIN CJ (dissenting):

Assuming that the Canada Grain Act as a whole is intra vires of Parliament, s.s. 7 of s. 95 seems to me to be defensible as an incidental enactment designed to promote the attainment of the purposes of the Act. It not only provides for the obtaining of revenue from persons and corporations instrumental and beneficially interested in the carrying out of the scheme which it sanctions, and to be applied towards the cost of working it, but it furnishes, perhaps, the best possible security that one of the main operations for which the Act provides, namely, the cleaning of the grain so that it will actually conform to the grade and quality called for by the Government certificate based on its prior inspection, will be honestly and efficiently carried out

The object of Parliament in enacting the Canada Grain Act was, in my opinion, to provide for the economical expeditious and profitable export and marketing abroad of what is to-day the most valuable product of Canada—the most important subject of its trade and commerce—its greatest source of wealth. The scheme of the Act is the constitution and regulation of machinery to effectuate that purpose. It provides, as only the Dominion Parliament can, for the control and handling of the grain from the moment it leaves the hands of the grower—practically always in one of the Western Provinces—until its shipment in Ontario or one of the eastern provinces for the foreign market accompanied by a government certificate of its grade and quality, upon the acceptance of which in that market the Canadian shipper can depend. No single province could legislate to cover this field. Concurrent legislation by all the provinces interested, if practicable (which I doubt), would be ineffectual to accomplish the purpose. Dominion legislation is required. Apart from the fact that a provincial certificate would not carry the weight and authority attaching to a certificate issued under Dominion sanction, the necessary control over transit and handling in different provinces and ultimate shipment could not be exercised under provincial legislation.

I regard the subject matter of the Canada Grain Act, therefore, as lying outside the scope of the powers entrusted to the legislatures by the sixteen heads of provincial legislative jurisdiction contained in s. 92.

[Anglin CJ discussed the Privy Council decisions and, when he came to Lord Haldane's description of Russell in Snider, he said: "I should indeed be surprised if a body so well informed as their Lordships had countenanced such an aspersion on the fair fame of Canada, even though some hard driven advocate had ventured to insinuate it in argument" (at 438). He continued the discussion of the cases and came to Lord Haldane's account of trade and commerce, again in Snider, and said:]

With the utmost respect, I fail to appreciate the reasoning on which this view is based. If neither the power conferred by the general language of s. 91, nor the power ... to regulate trade and commerce ... warrants Dominion legislation which trenches on the provincial field, ... I find rather elusive and difficult to understand the foundation for the view that legislation authorized only by the [general clause] may be so helped out by the [trade and commerce clause] that invasion of the provincial domain may thus be justified. But the decisive authority of the judgments which have so determined cannot now be questioned in this court. I defer to it.

But for their Lordships' emphatic and reiterated allocation of "the regulation of trade and commerce" to this subordinate and wholly auxiliary function, my inclination would have been to accord to it some independent operation, [and] to treat it as appropriating exclusively to the Dominion Parliament an enumerated subject of legislative jurisdiction with consequences similar to ... the other twenty-eight [in] s. 91. It is incontrovertible and readily apprehended that the subject matter of head No. 2 must be restricted as was indicated in Parsons' Case [and] frequently recognized in later decisions of the Judicial Committee. But that it should be denied all efficacy as an independent enumerative head of Dominion legislative jurisdiction—that it must be excluded from the operation of the concluding paragraph of s. 91, except for the subsidiary and auxiliary purposes indicated in recent decisions—these are propositions to which I find it difficult to accede. ...

But apart from any assistance afforded by head No. 2 of 91, I would uphold the Canada Grain Act as a statute of which the subject matter lies outside all of ... s. 92, in which case, said Lord Haldane in the Insurance Reference [1916 CanLII 424, [1916] 1 AC 588 (UKJCPC)], "the Dominion Parliament can legislate effectively as regards a province." ...

In my view not only is the grain trade of Canada a matter of national concern and of such dimensions as to affect the body politic of the Dominion, but the provisions of the Canada Grain Act, with some possible exceptions, deal with matters which, as envisaged by that legislation, do not come within that class of matters of a local or private nature ... assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces.

As to most of them there is, therefore, no encroachment on the provincial domain. ...

So regarded the Canada Grain Act may, I think, be supported without having recourse to the existence of abnormal conditions involving some extraordinary peril to the national life of Canada, recently indicated as a justification ... when legislating under the general power conferred by s. 91. But if ... it should therefore be deemed necessary to meet this test of their validity, I know of nothing more likely to create a national emergency in Canada than a judicial determination that the Dominion Parliament lacks the power to legislate for the regulation of the export grain trade of the country. It cannot be that Parliament must defer legislative action until a national emergency with attendant disaster has developed. To protect the national interest it assuredly may anticipate and ward off such an evil. There is an emergency connected with the movement of the grain crop at the end of each season incontrovertibly greater than any which can be supposed to have existed in 1878 with regard to the liquor traffic

DUFF J:

... The Act is an attempt to regulate, directly and through the instrumentality of Grain Commissioners, the occupations mentioned. It is also an attempt to regulate generally elevators as warehouses for grain, and the business of operating them; and it seems, ex facie, to come within the decision of the Judicial Committee, Attorney General for Canada v. Attorney General for Alberta, [1916] 1 AG 588 (UKJCPC), condemning the Insurance Act of 1910 as ultra vires.

Mr. Symington, in a very able argument, attempted to support the Act on the ground that the trade in grain is largely an external trade (between seventy and eighty per cent, apparently, of the grain produced in the country is exported); and that the provisions of the Act are, on the whole, an attempt to regulate a branch of external trade, the provisions dealing with local matters being, as a rule, subsidiary and reasonably ancillary to the main purpose of the Act.

It is undeniable that one principal object of this Act is to protect the external trade in grain ... and the beneficent effect and the value of the system provided by the legislation as a whole is not at all disputed by anybody. I do not think it is fairly disputable, either, that the Dominion possesses legislative powers, in respect of transport (by its authority over Dominion railways, over lines of ships connecting this country with foreign countries, over navigation and shipping); in respect of weight and measures; in respect of trade and commerce, interpreted as that phrase has been interpreted; which would enable it effectively, by properly framed legislation, to regulate this branch of external trade for the purpose of protecting it ... It does not follow that it is within the power of Parliament to accomplish this object by assuming, as this legislation does, the regulation in the provinces of particular occupations, as such, by a licensing system and otherwise, and of local works and undertakings, as such, however important and beneficial the ultimate purpose of the legislation may be. There are, no doubt, many provisions of this statute which, as they stand, can be sustained; with them we are not concerned at this moment. The particular provision which is sought to be enforced is one of a series of provisions which are designed to regulate elevators and the occupations of those who make it their business to operate elevators. The particular provision, if it stood alone, might, perhaps, be sustained as a tax, but it cannot be separated from its context; it is only one part of a scheme for the regulation of elevators. There is one way in which the Dominion may acquire authority to regulate a local work such as an elevator; and that is, by a declaration properly framed under section 92(10) of the B.N.A. Act ...

There are two lurking fallacies in the argument advanced on behalf of the Crown; first, that, because in large part the grain trade is an export trade, you can regulate it locally in order to give effect to your policy in relation to the regulation of that part of it which is export. Obviously that is not a principle the application of which can be ruled by percentages. If it is operative when the export trade is seventy per cent of the whole, it must be equally operative when that percentage is only thirty; and such a principle in truth must postulate authority in the Dominion to assume the regulation of almost any trade in the country ... and regulation of trade, according to ... this legislation, includes the regulation in the provinces of the occupations of those engaged in the trade, and of the local establishments in which it is carried on. Precisely the same thing was attempted in the Insurance Act of 1910, unsuccessfully. The other fallacy is (the two are, perhaps, different forms of the same error) that the Dominion has such power because no single province, nor, indeed, all the provinces acting together, could put into effect such a sweeping scheme. The authority arises, it is said, under the residuary clause because of the necessary limits of the provincial authority. This is precisely the view which was advanced in the Board of Commerce Case [1921 CanLII 399, [1922] 1 AC 191 (UKJCPC)] and, indeed, is the view which was unsuccessfully put forward in the Montreal Street Railway Case [1912 CanLII 352, [1912] AC 333 (UKJCPC)], where it was pointed out that in a system involving a division of powers such as that set up by the British North America Act, it may often be that subsidiary legislation by the provinces or by the Dominion is required to give full effect to some beneficial and necessary scheme of legislation not entirely within the powers of either.

In one respect there is a close analogy between this case and the Montreal Street Railway Case. The expedient which their Lordships there pointed out as the appropriate one ... is precisely that by which the Dominion could invest itself with the authority [here]; that is to say, by resorting, as already suggested, to the power conferred by section 92(10) to assume, through the procedure there laid down, jurisdiction in respect of "local works."

Fortunately, however, to repeat what has been said above, the control possessed by the Dominion over the subject matters mentioned, and especially over transport (both land transport and water transport) and over external trade, would really appear to be amply sufficient to enable the Dominion, by appropriately framed legislation, effectively to secure the essential objects of this statute.

[Mignault J held the Act invalid, for reasons similar to those of Duff J. Rinfret J concurred with Duff J and Idington J agreed with the trial judge, Maclean J.]

Appeal dismissed.

After The King v Eastern Terminal Elevator Co, the Dominion adopted the technique suggested by Duff J and acquired regulatory authority by declaring grain elevators to be works for the general advantage of Canada, pursuant to s 92(10)(c) of the British North America Act (BNA Act).

Before 1925, scholars expressed little concern about the general course of the decisions by the Privy Council. For example, the leading Canadian constitutional scholar in the later 19th century, AHF Lefroy, was, generally, utterly respectful and, in 1913, when he did dare to criticize one of its decisions, he said that he had never before "seen the smallest loophole for criticism or for doubt as to the correctness of any one of them before this last judgment": see Augustus Henry Frazer Lefroy, "The Alberta and Great Waterways Railway Case" (1913) 29 Law Q Rev 285 at 288. Shortly after Snider, misgivings began to appear, together with a new attitude toward legal thought and scholarship. The following article was the first substantial mark of these changes. We will see later in this part that the rule against quoting from the proceedings of Parliament, referred to by Smith in this extract, has since been relaxed.

HA Smith, "The Residue of Power in Canada"

[T]he difficulties of interpretation begin when words are not unambiguous, and it is at this point that our practice has drawn an arbitrary distinction between statutes and all other legal documents. In interpreting an obscure clause in a contract the court will take into consideration the whole of the previous correspondence between the parties and any words or conduct which may throw light upon their intentions. So again, if the words of a will are capable of two or more meanings, evidence is freely admitted to show what was passing in the testator's mind when he wrote those words. In all these cases our law is in accordance with common sense and with the ordinary practice of historical and literary criticism in other branches of learning.

If the application of this rule were extended to the interpretation of statutes it would follow that obscure clauses could be elucidated by studying the debates in Parliament and the considered public utterances of statesmen responsible for the introduction of the new law. ...

Unfortunately an arbitrary rule of English practice has cut off from the judge the light which is available for the historian, and it is now settled law that counsel are not permitted to quote from the proceedings of Parliament in order to explain the meaning of a statute. The same rule operates to exclude the speeches of statesmen outside Parliament, and probably extends to other forms of contemporanea expositio. In other words the courts are forbidden to adopt historical methods in solving a historical problem.

The immediate purpose of this rather lengthy introduction is to explain how an arbitrary and unreasonable rule of interpretation has produced the very serious result of giving Canada a constitution substantially different from that which her founders intended that she should have. A study of the available historical evidence gives us a clear and definite idea of what the fathers of Canadian confederation sought to achieve. By excluding this historical evidence and considering the British North America Act without any regard to its historical setting the courts have recently imposed upon us a constitution which is different, not only in detail but also in principle, from that designed at Charlottetown and Quebec.

The latest and leading authority upon the meaning of the "peace, order and good government" clause in the Canadian constitution is now the case of Toronto Electric Commissioners v. Snider, where the validity of the "Lemieux Act" dealing with compulsory industrial arbitration was in question. The judgment delivered by Lord Haldane in this case is now too well-known to need detailed analysis here. Its importance lies in the fact that it definitely relegated the words "peace, order and good government" to the position of a reserve power to be used only in cases of war or similar national emergencies. The real residuary power of legislation in normal times is now held to be contained in the words "property and civil rights," with regard to which the legislative power of the provinces is exclusive. The specific powers enunciated in section 91 are to be treated as exceptions to the general jurisdiction of the provinces to legislate upon property and civil rights. ...

I do not think that it is going too far to say that this result is the precise opposite of that which our fathers hoped and endeavoured to attain. ...

Upon reading the [Confederation] debates as a whole two points strike the attention. In the first place, no speaker, whether an advocate or an opponent of confederation, seems to have doubted that the Dominion was endowed with a general power to pass all legislation that it might deem to be for the general interest of Canada. Broadly speaking, the distinction between section 91 and section 92 was the distinction between those things that were of general and those that were of merely local importance. The true balance of the constitution is to be found in the opposition between the words "laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada," in section 91 and the concluding words of section 92—"Generally, all matters of a merely local or private nature in the Province." The detailed enumerations were really intended to be explanatory of these two main principles, subject to the proviso that nothing specifically mentioned in section 91 should be deemed to be of a local or private nature. ...

The second point that will strike the student of these debates is that nobody even thought of the modern idea that the words "peace, order, and good government" were intended to provide a kind of reserve power to be used only in the event of war, pestilence, or similar national calamities. So far as I am aware, this doctrine begins with the judgment in Re the Board of Commerce Act. The encroachment upon the sound and lucid doctrine of Russell v. The Queen began much earlier, but it did not at first amount to a denial of the main principle of Confederation.

In these words we have a clear recognition of the true test of jurisdiction, as laid down by the statesmen of 1867.

Canadian historians, political scientists, and lawyers have spilled a lot of ink trying to explain the decisions of the Privy Council, especially the judgments of Lords Watson and Haldane. Two of the best-known efforts follow.

What is the explanation of [the Board of Commerce case] and the trend of interpretation which it represents? Lord Haldane's reasoning, although elaborate, is not always easy to follow. An important element in the arguments appears to be the repeated view that the Act in question represented something altogether abnormal, and outside the range and scope of the functions of government as properly conceived. There are two aspects of the judgment which support this explanation.

The first arises from the nature of the agency itself, as is evident from the above quotation. The board, which is an agency enjoying rather wide discretionary powers and considerable independence of Parliament, is a very common device in Canada, particularly for dealing with problems of administration where the matter is technical in character, or where political pressure in the execution of policy is unlikely to serve any useful purpose. The independent administrative agency has been unpopular in England because it has tended to usurp functions of both Parliament and the judiciary. At no time was it in greater disrepute in legal circles than in the period which followed the dismantling of much of the war-created machinery of government in the early twenties. The fact that the decisions of the Board of Commerce were subject to review and alteration by the executive, rather than by Parliament, created in the English mind the illusion of concentrated state power of an emergency character. Thus the independent board, controlled only by the executive, appeared in the light of contemporary anxiety to transcend the words of sections 91 and 92 altogether.

The second explanation of Lord Haldane's judgment reinforces the first. Throughout the judgment there is the clear assumption that the eradication of hoarding and undue combination was scarcely an activity which should commend itself to the sense of propriety of a national parliament. Such matters, indeed, might be causes of local annoyance, and perhaps occasionally might be dealt with by local governments, but to pretend in ordinary times that hoarding and market-rigging were the proper subject for the attention of a national government suggested that they must be a cloak for some unwarranted extension of the proper sphere of the state.

Lord Haldane's decision in the Snider case is of the same order. There he took the almost incredible step of finding that a statute, which had been in force for nineteen years without serious question, was ultra vires the Parliament of Canada. In fact, his judgments follow a consistent pattern of nineteenth-century liberalism. This is, admittedly, not easy to explain since his philosophical outlook was scarcely Benthamite and his political sympathies were openly with the British Labour party. But the judgments, with their painstaking inability to be sympathetic to the intention of the legislature and their disastrous effect on novel functions and novel methods of government, remain. ...

Increasingly, constitutional case-law had become a reflection of conflict over the major issues of economic and social policy. If they are looked at in this way, one-half of the important leading cases in Canadian constitutional law involved an attempt by the state to interfere with the free disposal by individuals of their property. The results of this constant litigious pressure against limitation of the freedom of action of the individual are imposing. In one-half of the cases the plea of ultra vires was successful in defeating the intention of the legislature. It is impossible to avoid the conclusion that the resulting spheres of authority of the Dominion and the provinces are the incidental outcome of a clash between individualism and collectivism.

Thus, only on the surface has this struggle been a conflict between two conceptions of federalism. Basically it has been a dialectic of two sets of ideas. These ideas in turn, as we have seen, have been set in conflict by two forces. One force has been the current of world opinion over the last half century. The other has been the change in the nature of the Canadian economy. The assumptions of laissez-faire and individual self-help fitted the facts of frontier life. With greater diversification, a growth of scale in enterprise, an increase in urbanization, and an increase in economic interdependence which was accompanied by a growth of group consciousness, collective wants became more important and individual freedom of action so limited as to destroy the validity of the old individualistic assumptions.

The extension of the franchise, the granting of provincial stature to the prairies, and the opening up of new areas and new kinds of economic activity gave a measure of political power to groups which did not benefit directly from the old national policy. The clash in interest and in ideas took place through the party system in elections and in the legislatures, and resulted in legislation which was a concession to the newly emerged interests. The struggle was continued in the courts where the interests which felt themselves inconvenienced by these restrictions on their freedom of action were able to enlist the aid of a judicial theory of interpretation and legislative propriety which found ways of nullifying the effect of undesirable legislation. Alan C Cairns, "The Judicial Committee and Its Critics"

(1971) 4 Can J Political Science 301 (footnotes omitted)

[After quoting from Lord Haldane's praise of Lord Watson, Cairns argued that "there can be no doubt that Watson and Haldane consciously fostered the provinces in Canadian federalism, and by so doing helped to transform the highly centralist structure originally created in 1867" (at 313). Later, in making a defence or justification of the Privy Council, he said:

The most elementary justification of the Privy Council rests on the broad sociological ground that the provincial bias which pervaded so many of its decisions was in fundamental harmony with the regional pluralism of Canada. ... From the vantage point of a century of constitutional evolution the centralist emphasis of the Confederation appears increasingly unrealistic.]

[After Confederation the] provinces, which had initially been endowed with functions of lesser significance, found that their control of natural resources gave them important sources of wealth and power, and extensive managerial responsibilities. By the decade of the twenties, highways, hydro-electric power, a host of welfare functions, and mushrooming educational responsibilities gave them tasks and burdens far beyond those anticipated in 1867. By this time the centralizing effect of the building of the railways and the settlement of the west was ended by the virtual completion of these great national purposes.

As the newer provinces west of the great lakes entered the union, or were created by federal legislation, they quickly developed their own identities and distinct public purposes. Their populations grew. Their economies expanded. Their separate histories lengthened. Their governmental functions proliferated, and their administrative and political competence developed. They quickly acquired feelings of individuality and a sense of power which contributed to the attenuation of federal dominance in the political system.

Only in special, unique, and temporary circumstances—typically of an emergency nature—has the federal system been oriented in a centralist direction. The focus of so many Canadian academic nationalists on the central government reflected their primary concern with winning autonomy from the United Kingdom. An additional and less visible process was also taking place. Canadian political evolution has been characterized not only by nation-building, but by province-building. Further, it is too readily overlooked that with the passing of time Canada became more federal. In 1867 there were only four provinces in a geographically much more compact area than the nine provinces which had emerged by 1905, and the ten by 1949. If a province is regarded as an institutionalized particularism the historical development of Canada has been characterized by expansion which has made the country more heterogeneous than hitherto.

In response to this increasingly federal society the various centralizing features of the BNA Act fell into disuse, not because their meaning was distorted by the courts, but because they were incompatible with developments in the country as a whole. In numerous areas, decentralizing developments occurred entirely on Canadian initiative, with no intervention by the Judicial Committee. The powers of reservation and disallowance were not eroded by the stupidity or malevolence of British judges but by concrete Canadian political facts. The failure to employ section 94 of the BNA Act to render uniform the laws relating to property and civil rights in the common law provinces was not due to the prejudice of Lords Watson and Haldane, but to the utopian nature of the assumptions which inspired it, and the consequent failure of Canadians to exploit its centralizing possibilities.

The preceding analysis of Canadian federalism makes it evident that the provincial bias of the Privy Council was generally harmonious with Canadian developments. A more detailed investigation provides added support for this thesis.

At the time when Privy Council decisions commenced to undermine the centralism of Macdonald there was a strong growth of regional feeling. During the long premiership of Oliver Mowat, 1872-96, Ontario was involved in almost constant struggle with Ottawa. The status of the lieutenant governor, the boundary dispute with Manitoba and the central government, and bitter controversies over the federal use of the power of disallowance constituted recurrent points of friction between Ottawa and Ontario. Friction was intensified by the fact that with the exception of the brief Liberal interlude from 1873 to 1878 the governing parties at the two levels were of opposed partisan complexion, and by the fact that Mowat and Macdonald were personally hostile to each other. The interprovincial conference of 1887, at which Mowat played a prominent part, indicated the general reassertion of provincialism. The "strength and diversity of provincial interests shown by the conference," in the words of the Rowell-Sirois Report, "indicated that, under the conditions of the late nineteenth century, the working constitution of the Dominion must provide for a large sphere of provincial freedom." Nationalism had become a strong political force in Quebec in reaction to the hanging of Riel and the failure of the newly opened west to develop along bicultural and bilingual lines. Nova Scotia was agitated by a secession movement. The maritime provinces generally were hostile to the tariff aspects of the National Policy. Manitoba was struggling against federal railway policies. British Columbia was only slowly being drawn into the national party system after the belated completion of the CPR in 1885. It was entering a long period of struggle with the Dominion over Oriental immigration. In addition, the late eighties and early nineties constituted one of the lowest points of national self-confidence in Canadian history. It was a period in which the very survival of Canada was questioned. By the late 1890s, when economic conditions had markedly improved, a new Liberal government, with provincial sympathies, was in office. The year of the much criticized Local Prohibition decision was the same year in which Laurier assumed power and commenced to wield federal authority with much looser reins than had his Conservative predecessors. "The only means of maintaining Confederation," he had declared in 1889, "is to recognize that, within its sphere assigned to it by the constitution, each province is as independent of control by the federal Parliament as the latter is from control by the provincial legislatures."

The Privy Council clearly responded to these trends in a series of landmark decisions in the eighties and nineties.

Cairns's sociological explanation accords well with Pierre Elliott Trudeau's observations (at the time Cairns was writing, Trudeau was a law professor at the Université de Montréal) that the Privy Council rulings had the effect of forestalling the separation of Quebec from Canada: "[I]t should perhaps be considered that if the law lords had not leaned in that [provincial] direction, Quebec separatism might not be a threat today; it might be an accomplished fact": see Pierre Elliott Trudeau, Federalism and the French Canadians (Toronto: Macmillan, 1968) at 198. The literature offers many other explanations, including the Privy Council's concern about the preservation of the British Empire; its reluctance to make a vague phrase such as POGG a major power; its attitudes toward home rule for Ireland (which was one of the searing domestic political issues in England) and its desire to preserve its own power; Lord Haldane's affection for Hegelian philosophy (he was an amateur philosopher of some substance); and the possibility that the Privy Council interpreted the BNA Act correctly, after all.

Another candidate is the power of ideas about federalism in lawyers' and judges' minds. Recall the passage from Dicey in Chapter 4 in "Note: The Nature of Federalism." According to Dicey, federalism gives rise to a spirit of legalism in which "no legislature throughout the land is more than a subordinate law-making body capable in strictness of enacting nothing but by-laws." (AV Dicey, An Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution, 10th ed (London: Macmillan, 1979) at 175) Might this model have contributed to the reasoning and results of the courts in the late 19th century? Another version of federalism may have been at work in the Haldane era. It is described in the following excerpt.

David Schneiderman, "Harold Laski, Viscount Haldane, and the Law of the Canadian Constitution in the Early Twentieth Century"

"Federalistic feeling" was described as "curiously widespread" in Britain in the early part of the twentieth century. ... [The theory of political pluralism] merged these economic and political streams, attacking the all-absorptive state and promoting the inherent worthiness of group associations. ... [Political scientist Harold Laski was one of the leading figures of the British political pluralist movement.] Laski believed that citizens derived meaning and identity from the plurality of groups with which they were associated. The individual was portrayed as a complex of multiple loyalties and belongings with many forms of association competing for his or her allegiance. He described the individual as "a point towards which a thousand associations converge." Whether we will it or not, he wrote, we are all a "bundle of hyphens." ...

If the state had no privileged existence over group life, it could not legitimately attempt to absorb or control the diverse allegiances of its citizens. Each of these associations—"the club, trade-union, church, society, town, country, university"—has a "group-life, a group-will, to enrich the imagination." English law treated organized groups largely as incapable of having an existence independent of the state—group life was contingent upon, rather than independent of, state recognition. ...

The modern state was in need of more, not less, decentralization. To consider Ottawa or Washington as reserves of nascent power capable of resolving conflict by simple generalizable solutions was to risk local stagnation. Centralized government, wrote Laski, "cannot grasp ... the genius of place: ... To multiply the centres of authority is to multiply the channels of discussion and so promote the diffusion of healthy and independent opinion." In contrast, the vices of centralized government for Laski were numerous:

It is so baffled by the very vastness of its business as necessarily to be narrow and despotic and over-formal in character. It tends to substitute for a real effort to grapple with special problems an attempt to apply wide generalisations that are in fact irrelevant. It involves the decay of local energy by taking real power from its hands. It puts real responsibility in a situation where, from its very flavour of generality, an unreal experiment is postulated. It prevents the saving grace of experiment. It invites the congestion of business.

For the pluralists, then, self-government was exercised preferably at local levels where the implications of social policy choices could be felt and better understood. The object of the pluralist state was to partition power along these lines so that the diversity of group life could be given expression. Functional devolution along territorial and non-territorial lines not only facilitated the expression of individual moral development through participation in associational life, it also created a "corporate sense of responsibility" or "training in self-government." Like Hegel (and Mill), Laski believed that local self-government was "educative in perhaps a higher degree, at least contingently, than any other part of government." This training in self-government would lead, ultimately, to connections being made between associational life and "the general background of social life." ...

In a highly decentralized society, what role remained for the national state? On this, Laski moved from a position of radical polyarchy in 1915 to one of centralized authority for the performance of key public functions in 1925. For just as associations had social functions to fulfil, so did the state. "The state exists as the most adequate means we have yet invented for the promotion of an end we deem good," admitted Laski. ...

[Lord Haldane befriended Laski and wrote, in his review of Laski's 1922 book The Foundation of Sovereignty and Other Essays, that Laski] had "achieved a remarkable success" with this book. Regarding the personality of associations, Laski had "no difficulty in showing that the reluctance of our jurisprudence to treat an association as a person that can be made responsible in law has given rise to many obscurities and difficulties." Haldane contrasted the monistic with the pluralistic view of the state and concluded that the doctrine of political pluralism "is an ethical ideal" greatly superior to the monistic state. It is those "institutions which have genuine popular power expressed in them that become organs of ethical ideals and of true citizenship, and so the superiority of the pluralistic State becomes evident," wrote Haldane. Decentralization, therefore, was "essential." Haldane also could agree with Laski's desire to remodel government from time to time, not only in the direction of devolution, but also in the other direction: "In wartime, a highly centralized control may be essential. In peacetime it may be politically and ethically very undesirable." ...

The true nature of state sovereignty, then, was not revealed in the arguments of either the monists or the pluralists. The "real source of sovereignty," according to Haldane, was "general opinion," which lay behind the institutional apparatus of state and society. Acknowledging merit in the monist case, Haldane argued that the minds that constitute the general will cohere into a "unitary and monistic" form represented by the state, though this is not the exclusive vehicle of public opinion. Its "forms of expression may be diverse," Haldane conceded to the pluralists. The true source of sovereignty, though, was constituted neither wholly in the state nor in group life; rather, it could be found in "public opinion," which he equated with the general will. ...

The distribution of sovereignty to organizational groups did not exclude the general will "which may manifest itself as supreme, and may arm Govt. with extended authority on occasion." The general will, as an expression of homogeneous opinion, could emerge to supersede the heterogeneity of sovereignty in such extreme circumstances. Ernest Barker, in his modified defence of the pluralists, agreed: "If it comes to a pinch, we shall forget that we are anything but citizens."

CHAPTER SIX

THE 1930S: THE DEPRESSION AND THE NEW DEAL

Early in the 1930s, the Privy Council decided three cases that seemed to signal a shift in both results and manner of reasoning. Recall that in the Persons case, decided in 1928 and reproduced in Chapter 2, Judicial Review and Constitutional Interpretation, Lord Sankey spoke of a “living tree” and the need for a “large and liberal interpretation,” even though he also took pains to point out that the issue there was not the division of powers.

Proprietary Articles Trade Association v Canada (AG)

[\[1929\] SCR 409, 1929 CanLII 90](#)

[A reference was initiated to determine whether the Combines Investigation Act, RSC 1927, c 26 and s 498 of the Criminal Code, RSC 1985, c C-46 were valid. Section 498 of the Code prohibited participation in an agreement to restrain competition. The Combines Investigation Act made it a criminal offence to participate in a combine and defined a “combine” as an agreement or merger that limited competition or increased prices to the detriment of the public. It also created a commission to administer the Act, with powers to investigate, and it gave the government power to reduce tariffs that protected a combine. The Proprietary Articles Trade Association was permitted to participate in the reference, presumably because the commission had found that it had participated in a combine.

Both the Supreme Court and the Privy Council held that both statutes were valid. In the Supreme Court, Duff J, writing for himself and Rinfret and Smith JJ, discussed the Dominion’s criminal law power. He began by quoting from the judgment of the Privy Council in AG (Ont) v Hamilton Street Railway, 1903 CanLII 121, [1903] AC 524, where Lord Halsbury said that s 91(27) gave the Dominion power over “the criminal law in its widest sense” (Reference re Validity at 411). Duff J quickly added the reservation that some limitation was needed to respect the “constitutional autonomy of the provinces” (Reference re Validity at 412). Then, turning to s 498, he said that the law “aims at suppressing certain practices calculated, in the view of Parliament, to limit competition and produce the evil of high prices. [The prohibited conduct is] dealt with from that point of view and that point of view only” (Reference re Validity at 415). In response to an argument that s 91(27) extended only to offences that were offences at Confederation or offences that were criminal “in their very nature” (and here the reference was obviously to Lord Haldane’s judgment in the The Board of Commerce Act (Re), 60 SCR 456, 1920 CanLII 471), he said (Reference re Validity at 415):

It is difficult to understand upon what justification the Dominion Parliament can be denied the power under s. 91 to declare any act to be a crime which, in its opinion, is such a violation of generally accepted standards of conduct as to deserve chastisement as a crime. The views of the community as to what deserves punishment change from generation to generation. Practices calculated to imperil health and safety, or to prejudice the moral standards of the community may become, in the course of a few years, so widely prevalent as to create a general demand for the abatement and prevention of them by State action in the sphere of the Criminal Law. Other acts, once within the scope of the Criminal Law, may, in the course of time, come to be regarded as outside the proper domain of State interference. It is difficult to understand on what principle the court is to review the decisions of Parliament in seeking to adapt the Criminal Law to successive phases of public opinion in such matters.

The primary parts of the Combines Investigation Act were valid on the same ground. Newcombe J, writing for himself and Mignault and Lamont JJ, reasoned in much the same way.]

LORD ATKIN:

"Criminal law" means "the criminal law in its widest sense": (A.-G. Ont. v. Hamilton Street Railway (1903), 7 Can. C.C. 326). It certainly is not confined to what was criminal by the law of England or of any Province of 1867. The power must extend to legislation to make new crimes. Criminal law connotes only the quality of such acts or omissions as are prohibited under appropriate penal provisions by authority of the State. The criminal quality of an act [depends on a single standard]: Is the act prohibited with penal consequences? Morality and criminality are far from co-extensive; nor is the sphere of criminality necessarily part of a more extensive field covered by morality—unless the moral code necessarily disapproves all acts prohibited by the State, in which case the argument moves in a circle. It appears to their Lordships to be of little value to seek to confine crimes to a category of acts which by their very nature belong to the domain of "criminal jurisprudence"; for the domain of criminal jurisprudence can only be ascertained by examining what acts at any particular period are declared by the State to be crimes . . . Their Lordships agree . . . that the passage [alluded to] in the judgment of the Board in the Board of Commerce case [1921 CanLII 399, [1922] 1 AC 191 (UKJCPC)] at 198-199 was not intended as a definition.

In that case their Lordships appear to have been contrasting two matters—one obviously within the line, the other obviously outside it. For this purpose it was clearly legitimate to point to matters which are such serious breaches of any accepted code of morality as to be obviously crimes when they are prohibited under penalties. The contrast is with matters which are merely attempts to interfere with Provincial rights, and are sought to be justified under the head of "criminal law" colourably and merely in aid of what is in substance an encroachment. . . .

The view that their Lordships have expressed makes it unnecessary to discuss . . . the power to legislate under s. 91(2), for "The Regulation of Trade and Commerce." Their Lordships merely propose to disassociate themselves from the [alleged contention in the Board of Commerce case] that the power to regulate trade and commerce could be invoked only in furtherance of a general power which Parliament possessed independently of it. No such restriction is properly to be inferred from that judgment. The words of the statute must receive their proper construction where they stand as giving an independent authority to Parliament over the particular subject matter. . . .

• • •

Their Lordships are of opinion that the Supreme Court of Canada were right in answering both questions in the negative, and that this appeal should be dismissed, and they will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

Appeal dismissed.

Canada (AG) v Ontario (AG)

1931 CanLII 466, [1932] AC 54 (UKJCPC) [Aeronautics Reference], rev'g Reference Re Legislative Powers as to Regulation and Control of Aeronautics in Canada, [1930] SCR 663, 1930 CanLII 79

[After the First World War, a convention about aeronautics was made by the peace conference, and ratified by Canada and by the king on behalf of the British Empire. The Canadian Parliament enacted legislation and regulations implementing this convention and regulating aeronautics in a comprehensive way, including licensing of pilots, aircraft, and commercial services and regulations for navigation and safety. A reference was made to the Supreme Court to determine the validity of this legislation. It held, in a series of divided judgments, that the subject of aeronautics was, generally, one for the provinces but that the Dominion had paramount, although not exclusive, authority to implement the convention under s 132.]

LORD SANKEY LC:

Before discussing the several questions individually, it is desirable to make some general observations upon ss. 91 and 92, and 132.

Under our system, decided cases effectively construe the words of an Act of Parliament and establish principles and rules whereby its scope and effect may be interpreted. But there is always a danger that in the course of this process the terms of the statute may come to be unduly extended and attention may be diverted from what has been enacted to what has been judicially said about the enactment.

To borrow an analogy; there may be a range of sixty colours, each of which is so little different from its neighbour that it is difficult to make any distinction between the two, and yet at the one end of the range the colour may be white and at the other end of the range black. Great care must therefore be taken to consider each decision in the light of the circumstances of the case in view of which it was pronounced, especially in the interpretation of an Act such as the B.N.A. Act, which was a great constitutional charter, and not to allow general phrases to obscure the underlying object of the Act, which was to establish a system of government upon essentially federal principles. Useful as decided cases are, it is always advisable to get back to the words of the Act itself and to remember the object with which it was passed.

Inasmuch as the Act embodies a compromise under which the original Provinces agreed to federate, it is important to keep in mind that the preservation of the rights of minorities was a condition on which such minorities entered into the federation, and the foundation upon which the whole structure was subsequently erected. The process of interpretation as the years go on ought not to be allowed to dim or to whittle down the provisions of the original contract ... , nor is it legitimate that any judicial construction of ... ss. 91 and 92 should impose a new and different contract upon the federating bodies.

But while the Courts should be jealous in upholding the charter of the Provinces as enacted in s. 92 it must no less be borne in mind that the real object of the Act was to give the central Government those high functions and almost sovereign powers ...

on all questions which were of common concern to all the Provinces as members of a constituent whole.

It is obvious, therefore, that there may be cases of emergency where the Dominion is empowered to act for the whole. There may also be cases where the Dominion is entitled to speak for the whole, and this not because of any judicial interpretation of ss. 91 and 92, but by reason of the plain terms of s. 132, where Canada as a whole, having undertaken an obligation, is given the power necessary and proper for performing that obligation.

During the course of the argument, learned counsel on either side endeavoured respectively to bring the subject of aeronautics within s. 91 or s. 92. Thus, the appellant referred to s. 91(2) The Regulation of Trade and Commerce; s. 91(5) Postal Services; s. 91(9) Beacons; s. 91(10) Navigation and Shipping. Their Lordships do not think that aeronautics can be brought within the subject Navigation and Shipping, although undoubtedly to a large extent, and in some respects, it might be brought under the Regulation of Trade and Commerce, or the Postal Services. On the other hand, the respondents contended that aeronautics as a class of subject came within s. 92(13) Property and Civil rights in the Provinces or s. 92(16) Generally all Matters of a merely local and private Nature in the Provinces. Their Lordships do not think that aeronautics is a class of subject within Property and Civil rights in the Provinces, although here again, ingenious arguments may show that some small part of it might be so included.

In their Lordships' view, transport as a subject is dealt with in certain branches both of s. 91 and of s. 92, but neither of those sections deals specially with that branch of transport which is concerned with aeronautics.

Their Lordships are of opinion that it is proper to take a broader view of the matter rather than to rely on forced analogies or piecemeal analysis. They consider the governing section to be s. 132, which gives to the Parliament and Government of Canada all powers necessary or proper for performing the obligations towards foreign countries arising under treaties between the Empire and such foreign countries. As far as s. 132 is concerned, their Lordships are not aware of any decided case which is of assistance. ... [H]owever, from the very definite words of the section, ... it is the Parliament and Government of Canada who are to have all powers necessary or proper for performing the obligations of Canada, or any Province thereof. ... [Therefore] any Convention of the character under discussion necessitates Dominion legislation in order that it may be carried out. ...

... [W]e think that the Dominion Parliament not only has the right, but also the obligation, to provide by statute and by regulation that the terms of the Convention shall be duly carried out. With regard to some of them, no doubt, it would appear to be clear that the Dominion has power to legislate, for example, under s. 91(2), for the regulation of Trade and Commerce, and under s. 91(5) for the Postal Services, but it is not necessary for the Dominion to piece together its powers under s. 91 in an endeavour to render them co-extensive with its duty under the Convention when s. 132 confers upon it full power to do all that is legislatively necessary for the purpose.

To sum up, having regard (a) to the terms of s. 132; (b) to the terms of the Convention which covers almost every conceivable matter relating to aerial navigation; and (c) to the fact that further legislative powers in relation to aerial navigation reside in the Parliament of Canada by virtue of s. 91(2), (5), and (7), it would appear that substantially the whole field of legislation in regard to aerial navigation belongs to the Dominion. There may be a small portion of the field which is not by virtue of specific words in the B.N.A. Act vested in the Dominion; but neither is it vested by specific words in the Provinces. As to such small portion it appears to the Board that it must necessarily belong to the Dominion under its power to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada [the introductory clause of s 91 known as "POGG"]. Further, their Lordships are influenced by the facts that the subject of aerial navigation and the fulfilment of Canadian obligations under s. 132 are matters of national interest and importance; and that aerial navigation is a class of subject which has attained such dimensions as to affect the body politic of the Dominion.

For these reasons their Lordships have come to the conclusion that it was competent for the Parliament of Canada to pass the Act and authorize the Regulations in question, and that Qq 1, 3 and 4, which alone they are asked to answer, should be answered in the affirmative.

Appeal allowed.

Regulation & Control of Radio Communication in Canada, Re

1932 CanLII 354, [1932] AC 304 (UKJCPC) [Radio Reference], aff'g
Reference re Regulation and Control of Radio Communication,
[1931] SCR 541, 1931 CanLII 83

[In the late 1920s, the Dominion government entered into a series of international agreements about radio, the major one created in 1927 in Washington. After enacting legislation to implement these agreements, the government made a reference asking, generally, whether it had the power to regulate radio. In the Supreme Court, the conventions and s 132 were barely mentioned and a majority of three to two held that the Dominion had power under POGG.]

VISCOUNT DUNEDIN:

The learned Chief Justice and Rinfret J., expressed their regret that at the time of delivering judgment they had not had the advantage of knowing what was the conclusion reached by this Board on the [Aeronautics Reference, 1931 CanLII 466, [1932] AC 54 (UKJCPC)]. ... [W]e know now that the judgment of this Board (A-G Can. V. A.G. Ont., delivered on October 22, 1931; [1932] 1 D.L.R. 58, 39 C.R.C. 108) settled that the regulation of aviation was a matter for the Dominion. It would certainly only have confirmed the [Supreme Court] majority in their opinions. And as to the minority, ... it is doubtful whether that fact would have altered their opinion. ...

... [I]t is said with truth that, while as regards aviation there was a treaty, the Convention here is not a treaty between the Empire as such and foreign countries, for Great Britain ... only confirms the assent which had been signified by the Colonies and Dominions who were separately represented at the meetings which drafted the Convention. But while this is so, the aviation case in their Lordships' judgment cannot be put on one side. ...

This idea of Canada as a Dominion being bound by a convention equivalent to a treaty with foreign powers was quite unthought of in 1867. It is the outcome of the gradual development of the position of Canada vis-à-vis to the mother country, Great Britain, which is found in these later days expressed in the Statute of Westminster

(1921 (Can.) p. v.). It is not therefore to be expected that such a matter should be dealt with in explicit words in either s. 91 or s. 92. The only class of treaty which would bind Canada was thought of as a treaty by Great Britain, and that was provided for by s. 132. Being therefore not mentioned explicitly in either s. 91 or s. 92, such legislation falls within the general words at the opening of s. 91 which assign to the Government of the Dominion the power to make laws "for the Peace Order and good Government of Canada, in relation to all Matters not coming within the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces."

In fine, though agreeing that the Convention was not such a treaty as is defined in s. 132, their Lordships think that it comes to the same thing. ... The result is in their Lordships' opinion clear. It is Canada as a whole which is amenable to the other powers for the proper carrying out of the Convention; and to prevent individuals in Canada infringing the stipulations of the Convention it is necessary that the Dominion should pass legislation which should apply to all the dwellers in Canada.

At the same time, while this view is destructive of the view urged by the Province as to how the observance of the International Convention should be secured, it does not they say dispose of the whole of the question. They say it does not touch the consideration of interprovincial broadcasting. Now, much the same might have been said as to aeronautics. It is quite possible to fly without going outside the Province, yet that was not thought to disturb the general view, and once you come to the conclusion that the convention is binding on Canada as a Dominion, there are various sentences of the Board's judgment in the Aviation case which might be literally transcribed to this. The idea pervading that judgment is that the whole subject of aeronautics is so completely covered by the treaty ratifying the convention between the nations, that there is not enough left to give a separate field to the Provinces as regards the subject. The same might at least very easily be said on this subject, but even supposing that it were possible to draw a rigid line between interprovincial and Dominion broadcasting, there is something more to be said.

It will be found that the argument for the Provinces really depends on a complete difference being established between the operations of the transmitting and the receiving instruments. ...

[A discussion of s 92(10)(a) is omitted.]

• • •

The argument of the Province really depends on making, as already said, a sharp distinction between the transmitting and the receiving instrument. In their Lordships' opinion this cannot be done. Once it is conceded, as it must be, ... that the transmitting instrument must be so to speak under the control of the Dominion, it follows in their Lordships' opinion that the receiving instrument must share its fate. Broadcasting as a system cannot exist without both a transmitter and a receiver. The receiver is indeed useless without a transmitter and can be reduced to a nonentity if the transmitter closes. The system cannot be divided into two parts, each independent of the other.

As their Lordships' views are based on what may be called the pre-eminent claims of s. 91, it is unnecessary to discuss ... whether, if there had been no pre-eminent claims as such, broadcasting could have been held to fall either within "Property and Civil Rights," or within "matters of a merely local or private nature."

Upon the whole matter therefore their Lordships have no hesitation in holding that the judgment of the majority of the Supreme Court was right, and their Lordships will therefore humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed. ...

Appeal dismissed.

The Great Depression devastated Canada, and the rest of the capitalist world, between the late 1920s and the late 1930s. Some measure of its impact can be suggested by numbers: in 1933, the worst year of the Depression, 33 percent of non-agricultural workers were unemployed and, taking 1929 as a base, national output had fallen 30 percent, personal incomes had fallen almost 50 percent, and prices had fallen 18 percent—and far further in export markets. On the prairies, drought and crop failure compounded the economic decline; crop yield fell from 23.5 bushels of wheat per acre in 1928 to 6.4 bushels in 1937, and farm income fell from $450 million to $100 million in 1931. In the cities, thousands sought “dole” after prospects for work disappeared. For the governments, the cost of providing assistance fell most heavily on the municipalities and provinces, which were the least able to bear it, and by 1934, in the metropolitan Toronto area, every municipality except Forest Hill and Swansea was bankrupt.

When the Depression began, the Liberals and William Lyon Mackenzie King were in power in Ottawa. In 1930, the Conservatives, led by Richard Bedford Bennett, swept to power, aided somewhat by King’s pronouncement in Parliament that he would not give any Conservative provincial government “a five-cent piece” for relief. Bennett, like King, offered little more than traditional measures: manipulation of the tariff, a balanced budget, and hard work. The Unemployment Relief Act, SC 1930, c 1, enacted first in 1930, provided a modest amount for public works and for direct relief—the dole—but in 1932, the aid for public works was terminated in an effort to balance the budget. Bennett had little comprehension, let alone sympathy, for the radical proposals for increased public spending made by JM Keynes in the Atlantic Monthly in 1932. In 1932, as well, the Department of National Defence began a program of work camps for single men and, by 1935, there were 200 of these camps through which 170,000 men had passed.

In 1934, Bennett’s government enacted the Farmers’ Creditors Arrangements Act, SC 1934, c 53 to protect farmers from their creditors, and the Natural Products Marketing Act, SC 1934, c 57 to regulate the marketing of agricultural products. (As well, legislation created the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission Act, SC 1932, c 51 and the Bank of Canada, but neither were at stake in the constitutional conflict that followed.)

The Depression continued, apparently unabated. The Conservatives were threatened with losses in provincial general elections and federal by-elections and a divisive and theatrical inquiry into commercial abuses—the “Price Spreads” inquiry. Late in 1934, Bennett, who had been a powerful and autocratic leader, seemed to be faltering, but in January 1935 he reappeared and, with little warning to his Cabinet, let alone consultation, he dramatically promised a “new deal” in a series of radio broadcasts. (The phrase “new deal” was taken from President Roosevelt’s “fireside chats” in the United States; Bennett did not use the phrase, but it has become the common label.) Bennett likely did not have a comprehensive and concrete program in mind when he spoke, although he promised regulation of hours of work, wages, and working conditions; social insurance against sickness, industrial accidents, and unemployment; expansion of the regulation of agricultural products; and an agricultural credit program.

Shortly afterward, six statutes were enacted, all of which fell far short of Bennett’s promises. The Limitation of Hours Work Act, SC 1935, c 63; the Weekly Rest in Industrial Undertakings Act, SC 1935, c 4; and the Minimum Wages Act, SC 1935, c 44 were all explicitly based on International Labour Organization conventions and enacted to fulfill treaty obligations. They established, respectively, maximum hours of work, a weekly day of rest, and administrative arrangements for specifying a minimum wage, although the scope of each was sharply limited. The Employment and Social Insurance Act, SC 1935, c 38 established unemployment insurance for industrial workers; an amendment to the Criminal Code, SC 1935, c 56 prohibited specified commercial practices; and the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act, SC 1935, c 59 established a commission to regulate competition and a federal trademark—the Canada Standard.

As the following excerpt suggests, neither the Bennett nor the subsequent King government substantially improved the conditions of working and unemployed individuals.

Aside from substantial increases in federal transfers, "charity" to which the provinces had no legal claim and which could not be expected to last beyond the economic emergency, the Bennett government did remarkably little in the early depression years. Increased subsidies were made to the railways and the coal industry, and a variety of price support schemes were undertaken for wheat producers, but Bennett launched no dramatic policy initiatives like those in Roosevelt's America.

Prime Minister Bennett's reticence cannot plausibly be traced to a keen sense of provincial rights, or of the sociological realities underlying the legal doctrine. When, in 1935, he finally decided that a major departure from conventional economic policies was necessary, he did not bother to consult his own cabinet ministers, much less the provincial governments. Nor was Prime Minister Bennett one for worrying about the details of the constitutional division of powers. He seems to have been confident that constitutional grounds for his "New Deal" legislation could be found within the BNA Act.

The principal reason for the relative lack of federal initiative in the early years of the Depression seems to have been that Bennett believed the crisis could be remedied by the policies he campaigned for in 1930: the restoration of access to foreign markets for Canadian goods through Imperial preferences and the use of Canadian tariffs. Nor did provincial governments press forcefully for the federal government to undertake more radical programs in these early years. They were focussing on the immediate task of meeting their burgeoning relief commitments and their principal interest in the federal government was increased tax room, larger grants, or both. This focus on fiscal arrangements meant that in the first phase of the Depression there was relatively little intergovernmental discussion of fundamental reform to the federal constitution. As in 1927, so in 1931, the Dominion-Provincial Conference discussed the amending formula only because the issue had to be dealt with as part of the Statute of Westminster.

By 1935 the situation had greatly changed. Prime Minister Bennett's radio speeches of that spring had proclaimed the necessity of major changes in national economic and social institutions. These changes, his legislative program implied, had to be brought about primarily by the federal government. This entailed a clear challenge to the existing federal order. Bennett's defeat in the 1935 federal election left King with the dilemma of what to do with the Bennett New Deal. Unlike Bennett, King was highly sensitive to provincial objections (especially from Quebec and Ontario) that the legislation constituted a major encroachment on provincial jurisdiction. One of King's first acts upon being restored to power was to refer all of Bennett's proposed legislation to the Supreme Court of Canada.

King then sought to determine whether a consensus on constitutional reform could be found at the Dominion-Provincial Conference of December 1935. He was open to proposals to extend federal authority to regulate wages, working conditions and combines in restraint of trade, but advocated no specific amendments. King preferred to concentrate on the preliminary problem of securing agreement to an amendment formula.

A committee of the conference was assigned the task of exploring the latter issue. Premier Taschereau, who had opposed any discussion of an amendment formula in 1927, now proved receptive to the idea in the twilight hours of his regime. Still, the participants were a long way from agreement on a concrete formula at the end of the conference and it was agreed that federal and provincial officials should immediately begin to meet with a view to developing such a formula.

The conference of 1935 was remarkably conciliatory considering the economic stress facing both orders of government, and there was considerable optimism that an amending formula would soon be found. By February 1936 federal Minister of Justice Ernest Lapointe and the provincial Attorneys-General had, with the exception of New Brunswick, reached agreement on a formula: unanimous consent of all legislatures would be required for amendments touching on such crucial areas of the constitution as the educational rights of religious minorities. For other areas, such as social policy, the consent of parliament and two thirds of the legislatures, representing at least 55 percent of the Canadian population, would be sufficient. It was a major advance, but New Brunswick could not be induced to agree to it. King refused to act without unanimous consent, and the recommendations were shelved. Soon federal-provincial conflict began to escalate. The moment for constitutional reform based on unanimous provincial consent had passed.

The King government did take some initiatives. It negotiated a formal trade agreement with the United States within weeks of taking office. The Bank of Canada, which Bennett had established in 1934 as a "banker's bank," was nationalized, but the federal control thus acquired was not used to go beyond the easy money policy already established under its first Governor, Graham Towers. A National Employment Commission was created with the aim of coordinating the administration of relief expenditures and recommending measures to create employment opportunities. But when the Commission took up the views of Keynes in 1937 and urged the federal government to run a major budget deficit, King balked.

During the 1930s, the three major Canadian constitutional scholars were Vincent Macdonald, dean of the Faculty of Law at Dalhousie University; William Paul McClure Kennedy, chair of the Honour School of Law at the University of Toronto; and Frank R Scott, a member of the Faculty of Law at McGill University and, as well, a major Canadian poet, a founder of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation (CCF), and a crusader for civil liberties. These scholars shared beliefs about Canada, its Constitution, and legal reasoning. In their view, Canada had become an independent nation, its economy and social structure had changed fundamentally, and only a strong Dominion government could respond adequately to the Depression. They were passionately critical of the decisions of the Privy Council, and they feared that the British North America Act (BNA Act) was becoming more and more inadequate, despite the hopes suggested by the cases in the early 1930s.

Their beliefs about interpretation of the BNA Act were an expression of new approaches to legal reasoning and scholarship, which had arisen around the turn of the 20th century in the United States, under the banners of "sociological jurisprudence" and "realism." The function of the courts was to determine the intent, or purpose, of the legislature, but the words of a text, especially a constitutional text, often did not express this intent and, therefore, sometimes history and current social needs were necessary sources for determining meaning. These scholars read the BNA Act as making the federal government dominant and giving it power to legislate about matters of general importance. The Act gave the provinces specific powers to legislate about local matters; the remaining powers went to the Dominion. The POGG clause was the sole grant of power in s 91, and the enumerations were examples. Beginning in the late 1920s, the three scholars berated the Privy Council for betraying this design, for its "literal" approach (its belief that interpretation should be limited to the words alone), and for its failure to respect both the text and evidence of the understandings of Confederation. The article by HA Smith, "The Residue of Power in Canada" (1926) 4 Can Bar Rev 432, excerpted near the end of Chapter 5, is representative of much of their writing in the early 1930s. Some excerpts from articles by Kennedy and Macdonald, written a few years later as their despair mounted, follow.

WPM Kennedy, "Our Constitution in the Melting Pot"

(1934) SA L Times 156 at 158-59.

Before the depression, the federal government, with the "generous" permission and approval of the provinces, had already undertaken to assist in old age pensions. The subject-matter is purely and solely provincial; but "What's the constitution," said the provinces, "when will the Dominion pay?" The example and procedure were unfortunate perhaps; but, as the issues may show, perhaps creative. Then came the crash. Unemployment—a purely provincial subject-matter—increased by leaps and bounds. There was no work; firm after firm went down; economic life was atrophied. Unemployment insurance—a purely provincial subject-matter—though suggested time after time by the "traitors," etc., was now too late. Then the whole problem of industrial control came to the front in a manner never before experienced—fair competition, hours of labour, rates of wages, minimum wages for men, marketing organizations, the capitalisation of companies, mass-production—all provincial subject-matters, but now erected, before the impelling forces of a world agony, into questions of vital national importance. Once again the Dominion stepped beyond its field to spend millions upon millions on unemployment—a provincial subject-matter. Nor was this the end. Province after province, especially in the west, faced bankruptcy, a repudiation of its obligations. Once again the Dominion stepped in with vast funds to prevent the crash. The Prime Minister, however, began to scent dangers, such as financial aid to the provinces without financial control of the federal money given to their aid. A Dominion provincial conference suggested constitutional changes. ... The provinces stood firm on their "rights," but next day they came hat in hand to almost demand the continuance of the federal relief. ...

It will no longer be possible to look on the British North America Act as a sacred instrument. The persistent forces of national tragedy—poverty, hunger, employment, possible bankruptcies, contracting trade, lower wages, miserable market prices, narrowed credit, lowering value of money—have all combined to rob "1867" of the glamour of romance. We do not dispute the creative work of that year any more than we dispute the creative work of Noah; but we see it at long last in its proper and just setting. ... We are now face to face with this issue: Shall we continue as a loose league of "sovereign" provinces, which the unfortunate judgments of the Privy Council had almost made us, surviving legally in order to break culturally and economically. Or shall we boldly face the problem that a nation of vast potential wealth and possibilities and of many remarkable achievements shall not be sacrificed at a constitutional altar erected in a far-off pioneer past, itself creatively barren by judicial obscurantism?

Vincent C Macdonald, "Judicial Interpretation of the Canadian Constitution"

The constitution of to-day, as it exists in enactment and construction, it is generally agreed, is ill-adapted in many important respects to our new status within the empire, to our present social and economic organization and needs, and to prevailing political theories which indicate the propriety or necessity of a greater degree of national control over, and governmental intervention in, matters of social welfare and business activity. New political facts, such as our greater autonomy in intra-empire matters, new legal facts, such as our increased legislative capacity under the Statute of Westminster, 1931, emergent conditions arising out of the present economic depression, and a new philosophy of government—all these make up a background vastly different from that against which the act was projected in 1867, or that which conditioned the decisions of the past.

Much has been written and spoken elsewhere of the inability of the Canadian constitution to meet the social, economic, and political needs of to-day and of the necessity for its revision. However, it is not necessary to traverse this familiar ground, for the point at the moment is that great problems affecting the social and economic life of the country demand legislative capacity and solution. The second great fact at the moment is that effective solution of these contemporary problems is, in part, handicapped, and, in part, rendered impossible by (a) the terms of the act of 1867, and (b) previous decisions thereon, which, together, withhold jurisdiction where it is necessary that jurisdiction should be, divide jurisdiction where unity of jurisdiction is essential, and, in other cases, paralyse action because of doubt as to jurisdiction where certainty of jurisdiction is vital. Thus, it is not inaccurate to say that the constitutionality of many of the statutes which constituted the effort of the Dominion administration of the day (1934-5) to put through a great programme of social and economic reform is shrouded in doubt

And so, born of the knowledge that new and unusual conditions demanded, in some matters, a unity of action, and, in others, a certainty of jurisdiction denied by the terms of the act or by its judicial interpretation, there came into being among the Canadian people the strong conviction, ... that the constitution must be revised. ...

Whether amended or not, the Canadian constitution will continue to be a written instrument requiring interpretation by a supreme judicial authority. When the task of revising the constitution is approached, the question as to the identity of the body which will be charged with its interpretation in the years to come must bulk large. Up to now this has been the judicial committee of the privy council, and, inevitably, the question must arise as to whether it shall continue to be entrusted with the ultimate power of interpretation.

The New Deal did not save Bennett, and, as described by Simeon and Robinson, excerpted above, King and the Liberals came to power in the general election of 1935. King quickly referred all six statutes to the Supreme Court, together with the Farmers' Creditors Arrangements Act and the Natural Products Marketing Act. Six members of the Supreme Court heard arguments in the reference on Bennett's New Deal legislation early in 1936 and gave their decision on June 17. The results were complicated—the Court unanimously upheld two of the statutes, the Farmers' Creditors Arrangements Act and the Criminal Code amendments. They were also unanimous in declaring both the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act and the Natural Products Marketing Act ultra vires, and they declared the Employment and Social Insurance Act ultra vires by a margin of four to two. Last, they divided three to three on the three International Labour Organization statutes—the Limitation of Hours Work Act, the Weekly Rest in Industrial Undertakings Act, and the Minimum Wages Act. On appeal, the Privy Council declared all the statutes ultra vires, except the Farmers' Creditors Arrangements Act, the amendments to the Criminal Code, and the Canada Standard provisions of the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act.

Canada (AG) v Ontario (AG)

1937 CanLII 362, [1937] AC 326 (UKJCPC) [Labour Conventions], on appeal from References re the Weekly Rest in Industrial Undertakings Act, The Minimum Wages Act, And The Limitation of Hours of Work Act,

[This was a reference about the validity of the Limitation of Hours Work Act, which set 8 hours a day and 48 hours a week as maximum hours of work; the Weekly Rest in Industrial Undertakings Act, which required a rest period of at least 24 consecutive hours for industrial workers; and the Minimum Wages Act, which gave the governor in council power to establish minimum wages. In 1919, Canada signed the Treaty of Peace as a member of the British Empire to secure humane conditions for workers. In 1930, the International Labour Organization of the League of Nations adopted conventions about hours of work, minimum wages, and days of rest. In March and April 1935, the federal government ratified these conventions and, in June, enacted these three statutes expressly to implement its treaty obligations.

In argument before the Supreme Court, Canada relied primarily on s 132 (the treaty power). The provinces, fearing a threat to their autonomy, all opposed use of this power to permit the Dominion to legislate about subjects that would normally be within s 92. Only Ontario stressed the possibility that, in the depression, POGG could support the legislation, but its invitation went largely unanswered by the Dominion.

The six-member court split equally and, in all the judgments, the treaty power was the dominant issue. Duff CJ, writing for himself and Davis and Kerwin JJ, would have upheld the statutes. He began by demonstrating that the rapid development of Canada's independence gave the Dominion power to enter into international obligations. Then, relying greatly on the Radio and Aeronautics references, he held that the treaty came within s 132, which gave the Dominion exclusive power to implement its terms even though the subject matter might otherwise come within s 92. As well, he asserted that POGG gave the Dominion the same power to implement treaties that did not come within s 132. The other three court members, Rinfret, Crocket, and Cannon JJ, held that, because the conventions had been adopted by Canada on its own behalf, they did not come within s 132 and, distinguishing the Radio and Aeronautics references, they held that POGG did not give the Dominion power. Rinfret J agreed about s 132, but then shifted to a different ground and held that provincial consent was necessary for the validity of a treaty if its subject came under s 92. All three were sensitive to the threat to provincial autonomy represented by an exclusive Dominion power to make and implement treaties—for example, Cannon J said (References re the Weekly Rest at 521):

The framers of our constitution, and the Privy Council by their recent judgments in the Radio and Aeronautics cases never intended to plant in its bosom the seeds of its own destruction. If such interference with provincial rights by way of international agreements is admitted as intra vires of the central government, we may as well say that we have in Canada a confederation in name, but a legislative union in fact. Uniformity is not in the spirit of our constitution. We have not a single community in this country. We have nine commonwealths, several different communities. This is the fact embodied in the law. It may be wise or unwise, according to the preferences and predilection of every one, but this is the basis of our constitution. Diversity is the basis of our constitution. The federative system was adopted in order to give to the Provinces their autonomy and to secure, specially in Quebec, the rights to their own customs as crystallized in their civil law.]

LORD ATKIN:

Their Lordships, having stated the circumstances leading up to the reference in this case, are now in a position to discuss the contentions of the parties which were summarized earlier in this judgment. It will be essential to keep in mind the distinction between (1) the formation, and (2) the performance, of the obligations constituted by a treaty, using that word as comprising any agreement between two or more sovereign States. Within the British Empire there is a well-established rule that the making of a treaty is an executive act, while the performance of its obligations, if they entail alteration of the existing domestic law, requires legislative action. Unlike some other countries, the stipulations of a treaty duly ratified do not ... by virtue of the treaty alone, have the force of law. If the national executive ... decide to incur the obligations of a treaty which involve alteration of law they have to run the risk of obtaining the assent of Parliament to the necessary statute or statutes. ... [T]he creation of the obligations undertaken in treaties and the assent to their form and quality are the function of the executive alone. Once they are created, while they bind the state as against the other contracting parties, Parliament may refuse to perform them and so leave the state in default. In a unitary state whose Legislature possesses unlimited powers the problem is simple. Parliament will either fulfil or not treaty obligations imposed upon the state by its executive. The nature of the obligations does not affect the complete authority of the Legislature to make them law if it so chooses. But ... in a federal state where legislative authority is limited by a constitutional document, or is divided up between different Legislatures ... , the problem is complex. The obligations imposed by treaty may have to be performed, if at all, by several Legislatures; and the executive have the task of obtaining the legislative assent not of the one Parliament to whom they may be responsible, but possibly of several Parliaments to whom they stand in no direct relation. The question is not how is the obligation formed, that is the function of the executive: but how is the obligation to be performed and that depends upon the authority of the competent Legislature or Legislatures.

The first ground upon which counsel for the Dominion sought to base the validity of the legislation was s. 132. So far as it is sought to apply this section to the conventions when ratified the answer is plain. The obligations ... do not arise under a treaty between the British Empire and foreign countries. This was clearly established by the decision in the Radio case [1932 CanLII 354, [1932] AC 304 (UKJCPC)], and their Lordships do not think that the proposition admits of any doubt. ... While it is true, as was pointed out in the Radio case, that it was not contemplated in 1867 that the Dominion would possess treaty-making powers, it is impossible to strain the section so as to cover the unanticipated event.

A further attempt to apply the section was made by the suggestion that while it does not apply to the conventions, yet it clearly applies to the Treaty of Versailles itself, and the obligations to perform the conventions arise "under" that treaty because of the stipulations in Part XIII. It is impossible to accept this view. No obligation to legislate in respect of any of the matters in question arose until the Canadian executive, left with an unfettered discretion, of their own volition acceded to the conventions For the purposes of this legislation the obligation arose under the conventions alone. It appears that all the members of the Supreme Court rejected the contention based on s. 132, and their Lordships are in full agreement with them.

If, therefore, s. 132 is out of the way, the validity of the legislation can only depend upon ss. 91 and 92. Now it had to be admitted that normally this legislation came within ... Property and Civil rights in the Province. This was in fact expressly decided in respect of these same conventions by the Supreme Court in 1925. How then can the legislation be within the legislative powers given by s. 91 to the Dominion Parliament? It is not within the enumerated classes of subjects in s. 91: and it appears to be expressly excluded from the general powers given by the first words of the section. It appears highly probable that none of the members of the Supreme Court would have [ruled in favour of federal jurisdiction under s 91] had it not been for the opinion of the Chief Justice that the judgments of the Judicial Committee in the Aeronautics case [1931 CanLII 466, [1932] AC 54 (UKJCPC)] and the Radio case ... constrained them to hold that jurisdiction to legislate for the purpose of performing the obligation of a treaty resides exclusively in the Parliament of Canada. Their Lordships cannot take this view of those decisions.

The Aeronautics case ... concerned legislation to perform obligations imposed by a treaty between the Empire and foreign countries. Section 132, therefore, clearly applied

The judgment in the Radio case ... appears to present more difficulty. But when that case is examined it will be found that the true ground of the decision was that the convention in that case dealt with classes of matters which did not fall within the enumerated classes of subjects in s. 92 or even within the enumerated classes in s. 91. ... Their Lordships are satisfied that neither case affords a warrant for holding that legislation to perform a Canadian treaty is exclusively within the Dominion legislative power.

For the purposes of ss. 91 and 92, i.e., the distribution of legislative powers between the Dominion and the Provinces, there is no such thing as treaty legislation as such. The distribution is based on classes of subjects; and as a treaty deals with a particular class of subjects so will the legislative power of performing it be ascertained. No one can doubt that this distribution is one of the most essential conditions, probably the most essential condition, in the inter-provincial compact to which the B.N.A. Act gives effect. If the position of Lower Canada, now Quebec, alone were considered, the existence of her separate jurisprudence as to both property and civil rights might be said to depend upon loyal adherence to her constitutional right to the exclusive competence of her own Legislature in these matters. Nor is it of less importance for the other Provinces ... to preserve their own right to legislate for themselves in respect of local conditions which may vary by as great a distance as separate the Atlantic from the Pacific. It would be remarkable that while the Dominion could not initiate legislation however desirable which affected civil rights in the Provinces, yet its Government not responsible to the Provinces nor controlled by provincial Parliaments need only agree with a foreign country to enact such legislation, and its Parliament would be forthwith clothed with authority to affect Provincial rights to the full extent of such agreement. Such a result would appear to undermine the constitutional safeguards of provincial constitutional autonomy.

It follows from what has been said that no further legislative competence is obtained by the Dominion from its accession to international status, and the consequent increase in the scope of its executive functions. It is true, as pointed out in the judgment of the Chief Justice, that as the executive is now clothed with the powers of making treaties so the Parliament of Canada, to which the executive is responsible, has imposed upon it responsibilities in connection with such treaties, for if it were to disapprove of them they would either not be made or the Ministers would meet their constitutional fate. But this is true of all executive functions in their relation to Parliament. There is no existing constitutional ground for stretching the competence of the Dominion Parliament so that it becomes enlarged to keep pace with enlarged functions of the Dominion executive. If the new functions affect the classes of subjects enumerated in s. 92 legislation to support the new functions is in the competence of the Provincial Legislatures only. If they do not, the competence of the Dominion Legislature is declared by s. 91 and existed ab origine. In other words, the Dominion cannot, merely by making promises to foreign countries, clothe itself with legislative authority inconsistent with the constitution which gave it birth.

[The] validity of the legislation under the general words of s. 91 was sought to be established ... also as being concerned with matters of such general importance as to have attained "such dimensions as to affect the body politic," and to have "ceased to be merely local or provincial," and to have "become matter of national concern." It is interesting to notice how often the words used by Lord Watson in A-G Ont v. A-G Can. (Local Prohibition Case), [1896] A.C. 348, have unsuccessfully been used in attempts to support encroachments on the Provincial legislative powers given by s. 92. They laid down no principle of constitutional law, and were cautious words intended to safeguard possible eventualities The law of Canada on this branch of constitutional law has been stated with such force and clarity by the Chief Justice in his judgment in the reference concerning the Natural Products Marketing Act ... and dealing with the six Acts there referred to, that their Lordships abstain from stating it afresh. The Chief Justice, naturally from his point of view, excepted legislation to fulfil treaties. On this their Lordships have expressed their opinion. But subject to this they agree with and adopt what was there said. ... It is only necessary to call attention to the phrases in the various cases, "abnormal circumstances," "exceptional conditions," "standard of necessity" (Board of Commerce case, [1921 CanLII 399, [1922] 1 AC 191 (UKJCPC)]) "some extraordinary peril to the national life of Canada," "highly exceptional," "epidemic of pestilence" (Snider's case, [1925 CanLII 331, [1925] AC 396 (UKJCPC)]), to show how far the present case is from the conditions which may override the normal distribution of powers in ss. 91 and 92. The few pages of the Chief Justice's judgment will, it is to be hoped, form the locus classicus of the law on this point, and preclude further disputes.

It must not be thought that the result of this decision is that Canada is incompetent to legislate in performance of treaty obligations. In totality of legislative powers, Dominion and provincial together, she is fully equipped. But the legislative powers remain distributed, and if in the exercise of her new functions ... [Canada] incurs obligations they must, so far as legislation be concerned, when they deal with provincial classes of subjects, be dealt with by the totality of powers, in other words by co-operation between the Dominion and the Provinces. While the ship of state now sails on larger ventures and into foreign waters she still retains the watertight compartments which are an essential part of her original structure. The Supreme Court ... was equally divided and therefore the formal judgment could only state the opinions of the three Judges on either side. Their Lordships are of opinion that the answer to the three questions should be that the Act in each case is ultra vires of the Parliament of Canada, and they will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

Reference re legislative jurisdiction of Parliament of Canada to enact the Employment and Social Insurance Act (1935, c 48)

[1936] SCR 427, 1936 CanLII 30 [Unemployment Insurance Reference], aff'd Canada (AG) v Ontario (AG), 1937 CanLII 363, [1937] AC 355 (UKJCPC)
[The Employment and Social Insurance Reference]

[From a fund created by the joint contributions of workers and employers, the federal Employment and Social Insurance Act provided for compulsory insurance against unemployment for workers. The subject of unemployment insurance had also been included in the International Labour Organization conventions, but, although these conventions were described in the preamble, Prime Minister Bennett chose not to make the Act an explicit implementation of the international obligation, perhaps because he did not want to present opponents with the temptation to remind Canadians that relief assistance was closely associated with unemployment insurance in the Conventions.

The Supreme Court, by a majority of four to two, held the Act invalid. The majority, Rinfret, Cannon, Crocket, and Kerwin JJ, shared substantially the same grounds—the Act dealt with property and civil rights, because it dealt with insurance, which Rinfret said had always been a provincial matter, and because it regulated contracts and employment. It was therefore in its "pith and substance" (at 687), within s 92 and it was not a response to an emergency that might be justified by POGG. Duff CJ, with whom Davis J concurred, dissented, essentially because he characterized the Act differently—it was in essence a taxation measure, justified under s 91(3). Part of his reasoning was the proposition that there was no constitutional restriction against the Dominion spending public money for the benefit of individuals.]

LORD ATKIN:

A strong appeal, however, was made on the ground of the special importance of unemployment insurance in Canada at the time of and for some time previous to the passing of the Act. On this point it ... is sufficient to say that the present Act does not purport to deal with any special emergency. It finds itself in the preamble on general world-wide conditions referred to in the Treaty of Peace: it is an Act whose operation is intended to be permanent: and there is agreement between all the members of the Supreme Court that it could not be supported upon the suggested existence of any special emergency. Their Lordships find themselves unable to differ from this view.

It only remains to deal with the argument ... that the legislation can be supported under the enumerated heads, 1 and 3 of s. 91 of the B.N.A. Act, 1867: (1) The public debt and property [and] (3) The raising of money by any mode or system of taxation. Shortly stated the argument is that the obligation imposed upon employers and persons employed is a mode of taxation: that the money so raised becomes public property and that the Dominion have then complete legislative authority to direct that the money so raised, together with assistance from money raised by general taxation, shall be applied in forming an insurance fund and generally in accordance with the provisions of the Act.

That the Dominion may impose taxation for the purpose of creating a fund for special purposes and may apply that fund for making contributions in the public interest to individuals, corporations or public authorities, could not as a general proposition be denied. Whether ... the present compulsion applied to an employed person to make a contribution to an insurance fund out of which he will receive benefit for a period proportionate to the number of his contributions is in fact taxation it is not necessary ... to decide. It might seem difficult to discern how it differs from a form of compulsory insurance, or what the difference is between a statutory obligation to pay insurance premiums to the state, or to an insurance company. But assuming that the Dominion has collected by means of taxation a fund, it by no means follows that any legislation which disposes of it is necessarily within Dominion competence.

It may still be legislation affecting the classes of subjects enumerated in s. 92, and, if so, would be ultra vires. In other words, Dominion legislation, even though it deals with Dominion property, may yet be so framed as to invade civil rights within the Province: or encroach upon the classes of subjects which are reserved to provincial competence. It is not necessary that it should be a colourable device, or a pretence. If on the true view of the legislation it is found that in reality in pith and substance the legislation invades civil rights within the Province, or in respect of other classes of subjects otherwise encroaches upon the provincial field, the legislation will be invalid. To hold otherwise would afford the Dominion an easy passage into the provincial domain. ... It follows that the whole Act must be pronounced ultra vires, and in accordance with the view of the majority of the Supreme Court their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

British Columbia (AG) v Canada (AG), Reference re the Natural Products Marketing Act, 1934

1937 CanLII 364, [1937] AC 377 (UKJCPC), aff'g Reference Re Legislative Jurisdiction of Parliament of Canada to Enact the Natural Products Marketing Act, 1934, and the Natural Products Marketing Act Amendment Act, 1935, [1936] SCR 398, 1936 CanLII 21

[The purpose of the Natural Products Marketing Act was to establish regulation of natural products for the benefit of producers and, especially, to establish effective marketing arrangements and to impose pooling to equalize prices in particular products and areas. The Act was limited to products for which the principal market was outside the province of production and products that were, in some part, exported.

In the Supreme Court, the Act was unanimously declared invalid. Duff CJ, writing for the Court, considered s 91(2) and POGG separately and, for each, he discussed the Privy Council decisions at length, on the assumption that his contribution was to summarize them and announce their consequences. About s 91(2), after discussing Edwards v Canada (AG), 1929 CanLII 438, 1929 UKPC 86 (UKJCPC) [the Persons case], AG Canada v AG Alberta, [1916] 1 AC 589 (UKJCPC), [1916] UKPC 12, and City of Montreal v Montreal Street Railway Company, 1912 CanLII 352, [1912] AC 333 (UKJCPC), he said (Reference Re Legislative Jurisdiction at 410):

It would appear to result from these decisions that the regulation of trade and commerce does not comprise, in the sense in which it is used in section 91, the regulation of particular trades or occupations or of a particular kind of business such as the insurance business in the provinces, or the regulation of trade in particular commodities or classes of commodities in so far as it is local in the provincial sense; while, on the other hand, it does embrace the regulation of external trade and the regulation of inter-provincial trade and such ancillary legislation as may be necessarily incidental to the exercise of such powers.

After discussing other cases, including Hodge v the Queen, 53 LJPC 1, 9 AC 117 (UKJCPC) and the Local Prohibition Reference, [1896] UKPC 20, [1896] AC 348 (UKJCPC), he said (Reference Re Legislative Jurisdiction at 412):

The enactments in question, therefore, in so far as they relate to matters which are in substance local and provincial are beyond the jurisdiction of Parliament. Parliament cannot acquire jurisdiction to deal in the sweeping way in which these enactments operate with such local and provincial matters by legislating at the same time respecting external and interprovincial trade and committing the regulation of external and interprovincial trade and the regulation of trade which is exclusively local and of traders and producers engaged in trade which is exclusively local to the same authority (King v Eastern Terminal Elevators ...).

It should also be observed that these enactments operate by way of the regulation of dealings in particular commodities and classes of commodities. The regulations contemplated are not general regulations of trade as a whole or regulations of general trade and commerce within the sense of the judgment in Parson's [sic] case.

Then, after discussing Board of Commerce and Toronto Electric Commission v Snider, 1925 CanLII 331, [1925] AC 396 (UKJCPC), rev'g Toronto Electric Commission v Snider, 1924 CanLII 429, 55 OLR 454, and distinguishing the Radio and Aeronautics references, he concluded (Reference Re Legislative Jurisdiction at 414):

There is one further observation which, perhaps, ought not to be omitted although it may be a mere corollary of what has already been said. Legislation necessarily incidental to the exercise of the undoubted powers of the Dominion in respect of the regulations of trade and commerce is competent although such legislation may trench upon subjects reserved to the provinces by section 92, but it cannot, we think, be seriously contended that sweeping regulation in respect of local trade, such as we find in this enactment, is, in the proper sense, necessarily incidental to the regulation of external trade or interprovincial trade or both combined.

For POGG, he began (Reference Re Legislative Jurisdiction at 416):

The initial clause of section 91 has been many times considered. There is no dispute now that the exception which excludes from the ambit of the general power all matters assigned to the exclusive authority of the legislatures must be given its full effect. Nevertheless, it has been laid down that matters normally comprised within the subjects enumerated in section 92 may, in extraordinary circumstances, acquire aspects of such paramount significance as to take them outside the sphere of that section.

Next, after pointing out that his reference was to the Local Prohibition Reference, he added (Reference Re Legislative Jurisdiction at 417-18, 419-20):

It seems to us right, if these two sentences are to be properly understood, that they should be read with the preceding sentences; and experience seems to shew that there has been a disposition not to attend to the limits implied in the carefully guarded language in which the Board expressed itself.

As we have said, Lord Watson's language is carefully guarded. He does not say that every matter which attains such dimensions as to effect the body politic of the Dominion falls thereby within the introductory matter of section 91. But he said that "some matters" may attain such dimensions as to affect the body politic of the Dominion and, as we think the sentence ought to be read having regard to the context, in such manner and degree as may "justify the Canadian Parliament in passing laws for their regulation or abolition. ..." So, in the second sentence, he is not dealing with all matters of "national concern" in the broadest sense of those words, but only those which are matter of national concern "in such sense" as to bring them within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada.

The application of the principle implicit in this passage must always be a delicate and difficult task. ...

A discussion of Russell (1882), 7 App Cas 829, 51 LJPC 77 (UKJCPC); Board of Commerce; Fort Frances; and Snider followed, after which he asserted that the Radio and Aeronautics references were not a "new point of departure" (Reference Re Legislative Jurisdiction at 425). He concluded, "consistently with these decisions, we do not see how it is possible that the argument now under discussion can receive effect" (Reference Re Legislative Jurisdiction at 426).]

LORD ATKIN:

There can be no doubt that the provisions of the Act cover transactions in any natural product which are completed within the Province, and have no connection with interprovincial or export trade. It is therefore plain that the Act purports to affect Property and Civil Rights in the Province . . . It was sought to bring the Act within the class (2) of s. 91—namely, "The Regulation of Trade and Commerce." Emphasis was laid upon those parts of the Act which deal with interprovincial and export trade. But the regulation of trade and commerce does not permit the regulation of individual forms of trade or commerce confined to the Province. In his judgment the Chief Justice says [1936] SCR 412: "... Parliament cannot acquire jurisdiction to deal in the sweeping way in which these enactments operate with such local and provincial matters by legislating at the same time respecting external and interprovincial trade and committing the regulation of external and interprovincial trade and the regulation of trade which is exclusively local and of traders and producers engaged in trade which is exclusively local to the same authority: (The King v. Eastern Terminal Elevator Co., [1925] SCR 434, 1925 CanLII 82.)

Their Lordships agree with this, and find it unnecessary to add anything. There was a further attempt to support the Act upon the general powers to legislate for the Peace, Order and Good Government of Canada. Their Lordships have already dealt with this matter in their previous judgments in this series and need not repeat what is there said. The judgment of the Chief Justice in this case is conclusive against the claim for validity on this ground. . . .

The Board were given to understand that some of the Provinces attach much importance to the existence of marketing schemes such as might be set up under this legislation; and their attention was called to the existence of provincial legislation setting up provincial schemes for various provincial products. It was said that as the Provinces and the Dominion between them possess a totality of complete legislative authority, it must be possible to combine Dominion and provincial legislation so that each within its own sphere could in co-operation with the other achieve the complete power of regulation which is desired. Their Lordships appreciate the importance of the desired aim. Unless and until a change is made in the respective legislative functions of Dominion and Province it may well be that satisfactory results for both can only be obtained by co-operation. But the legislation will have to be carefully framed, and will not be achieved by either party leaving its own sphere and encroaching upon that of the other. In the present case their Lordships are unable to support the Dominion legislation as it stands. They will therefore humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

The remaining New Deal cases can be dealt with briefly. We deal first with British Columbia (AG) v Canada (AG), [\[1937\] CanLII 365, \[1937\] AC 368 \(UKJCPC\)](#) [Criminal Code Reference], var'g Reference Re Legislative Jurisdiction of Parliament of Canada to Enact Section 498A of the Criminal Code, [\[1936\] SCR 363, 1936 CanLII 45](#). The amendments to the Criminal Code prohibited two kinds of conduct: (1) selling goods at prices that discriminated among competitors, and (2) selling goods at prices designed to eliminate competitors. In the Supreme Court, a majority of four held both provisions valid. Duff CJ, writing for himself and Rinfret, Davis, and Kerwin JJ, said (at 365–66):

We see no good reason for denying the authority of Parliament, under subdivision 27 of s. 91 of the B.N.A. Act, to pass these enactments.

... Whatever doubt may have previously existed, none can remain since the decision of the Judicial Committee in Proprietary Articles Trade Association. v. Attorney-General for Canada [[1931 CanLII 385, \[1931\] AC 310 \(UKJCPC\)](#)] that, in enacting laws in relation to matters falling within the subject of the criminal law, as these words are used in section 91, Parliament is not restricted by any rule limiting the acts declared to be criminal acts to such as would appear to a court of law to be "in their own nature" criminal. The jurisdiction in relation to the criminal law is plenary; and enactments passed within the scope of that jurisdiction are not subject to review by the courts.

He added that some limits were needed to avoid permitting the Dominion to exclude the provinces entirely, but these limits were not relevant here. The dissenters, Crocket and Cannon JJ, believed that the first prohibition was invalid because it was not, in its nature, a prohibition of criminal conduct. According to Cannon J, what it prohibited was a private wrong and not a "danger to the community" (at 369). The Privy Council affirmed the Supreme Court's decision. Lord Atkin said (at 375):

Their Lordships agree that this case is covered by the decision of the Judicial Committee in the Proprietary Articles case The only limitation on the plenary power of the Dominion to determine what shall or shall not be criminal is the condition that Parliament shall not in the guise of enacting criminal legislation in truth and substance encroach on any of the classes of subjects enumerated in s. 92. It is no objection that it does in fact affect them. ...

Next, we come to the fate of the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act, which was decided in Ontario (AG) v Canada (AG), [\[1937\] CanLII 366, \[1937\] AC 405 \(UKJCPC\)](#) [Canada Standard Case], var'g Reference re legislative jurisdiction of Parliament of Canada to enact the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act, 1935, [\[1936\] SCR 379, 1936 CanLII 51](#). The Act included two major parts: (1) it authorized administrative approval for agreements among businesses to restrict undue competition; and (2) it established a national trademark, "Canada Standard," to be used to identify products that complied with standards to be set by the Dominion. The Supreme Court unanimously found both parts invalid and, again, Duff CJ wrote the judgment. For the first part, he relied on his judgment in the Natural Products Marketing Reference. For the second, his reasoning was that the standard was not a trademark, but a "civil right of an entirely novel character. ... Generally speaking, ... Parliament possesses no competence to create a civil right of a new kind ..." (at 382–83). The Privy Council agreed about the first part, but not the second. Lord Atkin declared (at 704–5) that it could be upheld under s 91(2):

There could hardly be a more appropriate form of the exercise of this power than the creation and regulation of a uniform law of trade marks. But if the Dominion has power to create trade mark rights for individual traders, it is difficult to see why the power should not extend to that which is now a usual feature of national and international commerce—a national mark.

It is perfectly true as is said by the Chief Justice that the method adopted in s. 18 is to create a civil right of a novel character. ... But there seems no reason why the legislative competence of the Dominion Parliament should not extend to the creation of juristic rights in novel fields, if they can be brought fairly within the classes of subjects confided to Parliament by the constitution.

Last of all, we can dispose of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangements Act briefly—it established administrative boards with powers to impose compromises or extensions of farmers' obligations to their debtors, and, in British Columbia (AG) v Canada (AG), [1937 CanLII 357, \[1937\] AC 391 \(UKJCPC\)](#) [Farmers' Creditors' Arrangement Reference], aff'g Reference re legislative jurisdiction of Parliament of Canada to enact the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934, as amended by the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act Amendment Act, 1935 [[1936\] SCR 384, 1936 CanLII 35](#), both the Supreme Court and the Privy Council upheld it under s 91(21), the Dominion's power to legislate about bankruptcy and insolvency. King saw the "New Deal" cases as an excuse for further federal inactivity, as discussed in the following excerpt.

Richard Simeon & Ian Robinson, State, Society, and the Development of Canadian Federalism

The effect of the Privy Council's decisions, in Mallory's opinion, was "practically to paralyse the Dominion as an agency for regulating economic activity ... the Dominion had practically no jurisdiction over labour, prices, production, and marketing except in wartime." King was now able to blame the constitution for federal inaction. Many accepted this explanation and there was much argument among reformers such as Scott concerning the conservative politics of the old men on the Privy Council.

Yet, ... King had other options, including constitutional reform and court-packing. Moreover, if he had supported the Bennett legislation, he could have implemented it, awaiting such private challenges to its constitutional status as might arise. If these measures had improved the national economy, or were believed to have done so, the public outcry against their abolition by a foreign court would have backed his demands for constitutional change. This was the strategy being followed at this time by the Social Credit government in Alberta, with growing popular support despite its constitutional defeats. But King did none of these things; instead, he immediately referred the Bennett legislation to the courts. As Mallory observes: "Under such circumstances, it is unlikely that the Court would be led to believe that the government was strongly attached to the legislation."

Why was King against the federal government playing the sort of extended economic and social role implied by Bennett's legislation? It was not because King was an inflexible fiscal conservative. By 1938, albeit with some misgivings, he had been persuaded to undertake a moderately expansionary budget on the Keynesian grounds advocated by the National Employment Commission and his Minister of Labour, Norman Rogers. Nor can King plausibly be portrayed as a libertarian intent upon maintaining a minimal state. In the same year that King accepted the desirability of running a deficit, he refused to utilize the federal power of disallowance to strike down Duplessis' "Padlock Law."

The best explanation for the King government's relative inactivity during the Depression, and his willingness to expand federal social and economic policy thereafter, is not to be found either in the federal constitution or in King's ideas of economics or justice. It is that the first priority of King and his Liberals, for both ideological and party self-interest reasons, was national unity. As long as there was no clear English-speaking majority position on the appropriate role of the state, electoral politics left King with room to manoeuvre. In this context, King preferred to avoid the kind of economic and social policy initiatives that Taschereau denounced in 1935. To his conscience and his diary King justified his refusal to disallow or refer the Padlock Law to the courts, in spite of his personal opposition to it, by arguing that "in the last resort, the unity of Canada was the test by which we would meet all these things."

King's inclinations were reinforced by the election of a Quebec government, less than a year after his own re-election in 1935, which was a more militant, if still conservative, defender of provincial rights than its Liberal predecessors. But King's strategy of minimal federal activity, informed by his conviction that the principal threat to national unity lay in French-English conflict, was much less effective under conditions of economic crisis than it had been in the 1920s. For while federal inaction minimized the potential for new federal-provincial conflicts related to language, it provoked increasing criticism from those who saw the nation primarily through the lenses of region and class.

These elements argued that only the federal government possessed the fiscal resources and technical expertise to implement progressive social and economic policies. These policies involved redistribution between individuals and regions which could only be achieved in accordance with national conceptions of collective welfare and fairness. Provincial governments, given their accountability to sub-national political communities, could not be expected to take a national perspective on such issues. Poorer provinces, whatever their progressive aims, were hampered by inadequate resources and limited ability to assert claims on the rich, given the mobility of capital. Accordingly, it was deemed essential that the federal government expand its jurisdiction.

Even before the 1937 decisions by the Privy Council, a growing number of English Canadian intellectuals had begun to attack the federal system as a major impediment to the adoption of progressive policies. Foremost among them had been Norman Rogers, who had first argued that federalism had become a "dead hand" in 1931. Upon entering national politics, Rogers carried his views into King's cabinet. Leading figures within the League for Social Reconstruction and the CCF echoed this conclusion, although there was considerable difference of opinion as to who should be blamed for the constitutional failure. F.R. Scott stressed the culpability of the Privy Council, while Frank Underhill argued that the deeper source of stalemate was class-based opposition to "the substitution of government power in place of private wealth." Still, all agreed that the solution to both economic and constitutional crisis lay in a centralization of federal powers. Harold Laski, reflecting widely-held views among the Social Democratic left, went further, declaring that federalism was obsolete, a luxury which could no longer be afforded because it denied governments effective control over the forces of "giant capitalism."

We now return to the constitutional scholars. When the Privy Council decisions were announced, their criticisms turned to despair. Two such examples are manifestos written by Kennedy and Scott for a symposium in the Canadian Bar Review. Following is part of Kennedy's reaction:

We must no longer live in the vain world of delusion that the Judicial Committee will do for the Act what the Supreme Court of the United States has been able to do, in a wide manner, since the days of John Marshall, for perhaps the most rigid formal constitution in the world. ... As we read the recent judgments we must be convinced that the Judicial Committee has no intention whatever, in any substantial or fundamental matter, of acting as a constituent assembly for Canada. We would have faced this issue long ago had we not too largely believed that constitutional and legal wisdom never really crossed the Atlantic.

For, I submit, we must now face issues. The federal "general power" is gone with the winds. It can be relied on at the best when the nation is intoxicated with alcohol, at worst when the nation is intoxicated with war; but in times of sober poverty, sober financial chaos, sober unemployment, sober exploitation, it cannot be used, for these, though in fact national in the totality of their incidents, must not be allowed to leave their legal water-tight provincial compartments; the social lines must not obliterate the legal lines of jurisdiction—at least this is the law, and it killeth. ...

The time has come to abandon tinkering with or twisting the British North America Act—a curiosity belonging to an older age. At long last we can criticize it, as the stern demands of economic pressure have bitten into the bastard loyalty which gave to it the doubtful devotion of primitive ancestor worship. We must seek machinery to do in Canada certain things: (i) to repeal the BNA Act in toto; (ii) to rewrite completely the constitution; (iii) to provide reasonable and sane and workable constituent machinery; (iv) to abolish all appeals to the Judicial Committee. I submit that every one of these things is necessary; and above all we must get rid of all the past decisions of the Judicial Committee, for they will hang round the necks of the judiciary, if appeals are abolished, in that uncanny stranglehold with which stare decisis seems doomed to rob the law of creative vitality.

See WPM Kennedy, "The British North America Act: Past and Future" (1937) 15 Can Bar Rev 393 at 398–99.

Frank R Scott was equally passionate, and his article concluded as follows:

Turning from the legal to the economic consequences of the decisions, it is obvious that they leave this country even more helpless than she was in 1929 to deal with the problems created by a changing economic system. The depression came, revealing gross injustices and inefficiencies in the body economic; the Stevens Committee and the Royal Commission on Price Spreads disclosed evils crying out for remedy; a considerable attempt was made to provide a system of controls and palliatives on a national scale. This attempt has failed because the constitution could not, in the hands of the judiciary at the moment interpreting it, adapt itself to the new requirements. ...

If the whole trend of world developments is wrong and all government interference in economic matters is an obstacle to progress, then Canada will benefit from her constitutional impasse, but should the reverse be true, should the need of the hour be increasingly to bring an intelligent and conscious direction to economic affairs, then Canada has suffered a national set-back of grievous proportions. A federal government that cannot concern itself with questions of wages and hours and unemployment in industry, whose attempts at the regulation of trade and commerce are consistently thwarted, which has no power to join its sister nations in the establishment of world living standards, and which cannot even feel on sure ground when by some political miracle it is supported in a legislative scheme by all the provinces, is a government wholly unable to direct and to control our economic development.

The history of recent cases dealing with the control of trade and commerce in Canada shows a fairly consistent attitude in the courts against control, an attitude which overrides any feeling for or against provincial autonomy. ...

It would seem that even without special mention in the British North America Act, the doctrines of laissez-faire are in practice receiving ample protection from the courts. ...

One lesson, it is to be hoped, will be learned again from these decisions. The Privy Council is our final court of appeal. Its interpretations of the Canadian constitution vitally affect the political, social and economic destinies of eleven million Canadians. Such a court should be staffed with men fully qualified to understand the spirit which infuses the British North America Act, and the environment in which it must be made to work. Unfortunately it is only too evident that judges of this type rarely sit upon the Judicial Committee. ...

To imagine that we shall ever get consistent and reasonable judgments from such a casually selected and untrained court is merely silly. To continue using it under the circumstances is costly sentimentality. ... No alterations to the British North America Act will ever achieve what Canadians want them to achieve if their interpretation is left to a non-Canadian judiciary.

See Frank R Scott, "The Consequences of the Privy Council Decisions" (1937) 15 Can Bar Rev 485 at 491-94.

Scott was particularly concerned that there had been complete cooperation between the federal government and the provinces in the implementation of the Natural Products Marketing Act (at 489-91):

Another important consequence of these holdings is the doubt they cast upon the possibility of Dominion-Provincial co-operation as an escape from constitutional difficulties. Hitherto it has been thought that whatever problem there might be with regard to legislative jurisdiction, the difficulty could be overcome by joint action by all the legislatures. If the Dominion added all its powers to those already possessed by the provinces, surely, it seemed, anything and everything might be accomplished. On several occasions the Privy Council and the Supreme Court of Canada have suggested that this is a proper method of procedure. In the very decisions under review Duff CJ, discussing the Natural Products Market Act, quoted from the judgment in the Board of Commerce Case and said that such a scheme of regulation as set up by the Marketing Boards was not practicable "without the co-operation of the provincial legislatures"; while the Privy Council tempered their destruction of the Dominion treat-making power with the helpful reminder that "It must not be thought that the result of this decision is that Canada is incompetent to legislate in performance of treaty obligations. In totality of legislative powers, Dominion and Provincial together, she is fully equipped."

Nevertheless, in the judgment on the Marketing Act in the Supreme Court there was no consideration whatever of the fact that every province in Canada had co-operated with the Dominion in setting up Marketing Boards, and had enacted special legislation to provide for this co-operation. Ten legislatures in Canada had acted to attain an end unanimously desired, yet the key-statute was declared ultra vires and the whole structure destroyed. The Dominion Act by section 12 provided that if any parts of the Act were ultra vires, none of the other provisions should be inoperative on that account, but should be considered as separate enactments; and the provincial statutes were intended to supply any legislative power lacking in the Dominion. In the Privy Council Lord Atkin, after repeating the empty formula that "satisfactory results" for both Dominion and Provinces "can only be obtained by co-operation," went on to warn that "the legislation will have to be very carefully framed, and will not be achieved by either party leaving its own sphere and encroaching upon that of the other. In the present case their Lordships are unable to support the Dominion legislation as it stands. They will therefore humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed."

Thus the courts take the view that even where there is complete co-operation between all Canadian legislatures, each one contributing its share of legislative capacity, still the scheme thus established will be destroyed, if, perchance, one legislature has made a slip in the wording of its contributory statute and has in fact included some subject matter beyond its jurisdiction. Instead of considering that this mistake is rectified by the other supporting statutes, it may be looked upon as fatal. So co-operation between the Dominion and the provinces, as in the case of the marketing legislation, may be of no use whatever in the way of overcoming constitutional difficulties, and leaves the courts as free as before to set aside legislation of which they disapprove. This legalistic straining at technicalities will do little to enhance the prestige of the courts. The Dominion Marketing Act was not an isolated statute, but was part of a national scheme and should have been interpreted as such.

Another example of the dismay among Canadian lawyers is a document that has come to be known as the O'Connor Report: see William F O'Connor, Report Pursuant to Resolution of the Senate to the Honourable the Speaker by the Parliamentary Counsel, Relating to the Enactment of the British North America Act, 1867, any Lack of Consonance Between its Terms and Judicial Construction of Them and Cognate Matters (Ottawa: JO Patenaude, ISO, printer to the King, 1939). In 1938, O'Connor, counsel to the Senate, was directed to examine Confederation, the BNA Act, and the Act's interpretation by the Privy Council. His report, submitted in 1939, is long and does not lend itself easily to being represented by quotations and, therefore, a summary must suffice, even though it cannot capture the tone of anger and frustration that O'Connor sustained throughout almost 150 pages.

O'Connor analyzed ss 91 and 92 and the Privy Council decisions at great length, presenting a comprehensive account of their structure. After quoting extensively from the debates at Confederation, he claimed that the BNA Act made "two grand divisions" of legislative powers: general and local. The first 15 subsections of s 92 granted powers over specified local subjects to the provinces and s 92(16) was a grant of power over residual local subjects. Section 91 assigned the residue of legislative power to the Dominion; its opening words were the sole grant and they gave the Dominion exclusive and paramount power. The effect of the "notwithstanding clause" (beginning "and for greater certainty") was to extend the exclusivity given by the opening words to the enumerations, which were simply examples, and the effect of the deeming clause (beginning, "And any matter") was to exclude from s 92(16) any local element of the enumerated subjects.

O'Connor claimed that this design had been "repealed by judicial legislation," particularly by Lords Watson and Haldane. The Privy Council had been guilty of "demonstrable error" and "serious and persistent deviation." The path of error began in Citizens' and The Queen Insurance Cos v Parsons, 4 SCR 215, 1880 CanLII 6, in its reading of the closing words of s 91. Russell represented a proper understanding of the structure and a sensible determination of aspects, but the path of error was resumed in Tennant v Union Bank of Canada, [1893] JCJ No 1 (QL), [1894] AC 31 (UKJCPC), where Lord Watson said: "[Section] 91 expressly declares that 'notwithstanding anything in this Act,' the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada shall extend to all matters coming within the enumerated classes, which plainly indicates that the legislation of that Parliament, so long as it strictly relates to these matters, is to be of paramount authority." O'Connor argued that this reading divided the enumerated subjects in s 91 from the opening grant of power and gave them both independent stature and priority.

This misreading was continued in Lord Watson's "extraordinary" decision in The Local Prohibition Reference, which struck s 91 "the deadliest blow it has received." The opening grant of power in s 91, its sole grant of power, was limited to "extraordinary circumstances only, and without exclusiveness or paramountcy." This interpretation "paralysed many essential law-making activities of the Dominion" and the result was "an undeniable partial breakdown of the general scheme of Confederation." During the 20th century, Lord Haldane's decisions "exceeded those of Lord Watson in their emasculatory effect upon the Dominion's authority." "If only this fatal error in construction could be undone, nothing much need be done in order to restore the BNA Act to that state of reasonable satisfactoriness in which it was before the fatal error was committed." Lords Watson and Haldane were the villains of Canadian federalism.

O'Connor's intensive, detailed analysis of the structure of ss 91 and 92 was a substantially new kind of undertaking. Prior to his report, the furthest scholars had gone in this direction had been to make claims of the kind that Smith had made in 1926 in the excerpt that appears near the end of Chapter 5: the POGG power had been diminished and supplanted by s 92(13). O'Connor's analysis quickly became authoritative and set the terms for discussion for about 30 years. For example, Kennedy used an elegant summary in an article in 1943: see WPM Kennedy, "The Interpretation of the British North America Act" (1943) 8:2 Cambridge LJ 146, and future Chief Justice of Canada Bora Laskin took the analysis as settled in a comprehensive and fierce attack on the Privy Council in 1947: Bora Laskin, "Peace, Order and Good Government Re-examined" (1947) 25 Can Bar Rev 1054.

Competing assessments of the Privy Council began to appear in the 1950s, expressing different visions of Canadian federalism and representing different parts of the country. The first came from Quebec. In 1951, Louis-Philippe Pigeon, later to become a member of the Supreme Court, wrote about provincial autonomy: Louis-Philippe Pigeon, "The Meaning of Provincial Autonomy" (1951) 29 Can Bar Rev 1126, beginning with the claim that provincial autonomy had been an important element of the debates and the agreements preceding Confederation, and had been established in the terms of the BNA Act, especially in the opening words of s 91, which excluded the subjects assigned to the provinces from the grant of power to the Dominion. He concluded (at 1133, 1134, 1135):

Just as freedom means for the individual the right of choosing his own objective so long as it is not illegal, autonomy means for a province the privilege of defining its own policies

... [T]he courts have consistently refused to allow any particular clause of the BNA Act to be construed in a way that would enable the federal Parliament to invade the provincial sphere of action outside of emergencies

A great volume of criticism has been heaped upon the Privy Council and the Supreme Court on the ground that their decisions rest on a narrow and technical construction of the BNA Act. This contention is ill-founded. The decisions on the whole proceed from a much higher view [T]hey recognize the implicit fluidity of any constitution by allowing for emergencies and by resting distinctions on questions of degree. At the same time they firmly uphold the fundamental principle of provincial autonomy: they staunchly refuse to let our federal constitution be changed gradually, by one device or another, to a legislative union. In doing so, they are preserving the essential condition of the Canadian confederation.

Another perspective was given by William Lederman, from Queen's University, who had grown up in the West. In a series of articles beginning in 1965, he argued that at the heart of Canada was a balanced federalism—a balance between unity and diversity and between a strong Dominion and autonomous provinces. The "equilibrium points" of this balanced federalism had been made by courts, especially the Privy Council, and Lord Watson was "the greatest of the Privy Council judges concerned with the Canadian constitution": see William Lederman, "Unity and Diversity in Canadian Federalism: Ideals and Methods of Moderation" (1975) 53 Can Bar Rev 597, as reprinted in William Lederman, Continuing Canadian Constitutional Dilemmas (Toronto: Butterworths, 1981) 285 at 291, 294. A villain of the 1930s had become a hero.

Perhaps the most appropriate way to end this discussion of the New Deal cases is the following poem, written by Frank R Scott in 1950.

Frank R Scott, "Some Privy Counsel"

(1950) 28 Can Bar Rev 780

"Emergency, emergency," I cried, "give us emergency,
This shall be the doctrine of our salvation.
Are we not surrounded by emergencies?
The rent of a house, the cost of food, pensions and health, the unemployed,
These are lasting emergencies, tragic for me"
Yet ever the answer was property and civil rights,
And my peace-time troubles were counted as nothing.
"At least you have an unoccupied field," I urged,
"Or something ancillary for a man with four children?
Surely my insecurity and want affect the body politic?"
But back came the echo of property and civil rights.
I was told to wrap my sorrows in water-tight compartments.

"Please, please," I entreated, "look at my problem.
I and my brothers, regardless of race, are afflicted.
Our welfare hangs on remote policies, distant decisions,
Planning of trade, guaranteed prices, high employment—
Can provincial fractions deal with this complex whole?
Surely such questions are now supra-national!"
But the judges fidgeted over their digests and blew me away with the canons of construction.
"This is intolerable," I shouted, "this is one country;
Two flourishing cultures, but joined in one nation.
I demand peace, order and good government.
This you must admit is the aim of Confederation!"
But firmly and sternly I was pushed to a corner
And covered with the wet blanket of provincial autonomy.
Stifling under the burden I raised my hands to Heaven
And called out with my last and expiring breath
"At least you cannot deny I have a new aspect?
I cite in my aid the fresh approach of Lord Simon!"
But all I could hear was the old sing-song, this time in Latin, muttering stare decisis.

A CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT REGARDING UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

One important result of the Depression and the New Deal was the agreement by all provinces and the federal government to add "Unemployment Insurance" to the list of exclusive federal powers under s 91. We have already seen how the Privy Council struck down a previous federal attempt to provide for compulsory unemployment insurance in Unemployment Insurance Reference. In the late 1930s, the King government sought to remove this constitutional obstacle by proposing a constitutional amendment adding unemployment insurance to the list of federal heads of power in s 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

As noted in the extract from Simeon and Robinson set out earlier in this chapter, attempts to agree on a domestic amending formula had begun in 1927 in the wake of the Balfour Declaration and in anticipation of the enactment of the Statute of Westminster, 1931. In the absence of an agreed formula, the old amendment machinery would have to be used again: that is, an Act of the United Kingdom Parliament at the request of the Canadian Parliament. According to emerging constitutional conventions, where provincial interests were concerned, as was the case here, the consent of the provinces would also be required, though the level of that consent had yet to be determined (and would only be definitively worked out in 1981-82).

As it happened, the 1930s saw a brief revival of the compact theory referred to in Chapter 4, The Late Nineteenth Century: The Courts Set an Initial Course. This revival was prompted in large measure by the discussions regarding a new domestic amending formula. Some premiers, led by Ontario's Howard Ferguson, argued that "the Confederation of the provinces was brought about by the action of the provinces ... [and] that this agreement should not be altered without the consent of the parties to it": see Paul Gérin-Lajoie, Constitutional Amendment in Canada (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1950) at 204. Premier Taschereau of Quebec seconded Premier Ferguson's view in a letter to then Prime Minister Bennett: [TRANSLATION] "Confederation is a contract that had been signed by the different Canadian provinces after long discussions, on conditions acceptable to all the contracting parties. I ask myself how such a contract could be amended without the agreement of all the parties": see

Robert Rumilly, L'autonomie provinciale (Montreal: Fides, 1948) at 171. Such assertions were firmly discredited by constitutional commentators such as Norman Rogers of Queen's University, who attempted by means of systematic scholarly argument to "remove the barbed-wire that has been set in our path by the proponents of the compact theory of Confederation": see Norman McL Rogers, "The Compact Theory of Confederation" (1931) 9:6 Can Bar Rev 395 at 417. Rogers subsequently carried his views into federal politics and the King government.

Meanwhile, the compact theory had found a most forceful spokesman in Maurice Duplessis, successor to Taschereau as Premier of Quebec. Upon coming to power in 1936, Duplessis replaced Howard Ferguson of Ontario as principal proponent of the compact theory, and his party began to apply the idea rigorously in government and opposition. Quebec's view was expressed to the Rowell-Sirois commissioners in Quebec City in 1938 through the chief counsel of the Union Nationale, L'Emery Beaulieu, who said, "[T]he federative pact cannot be amended or modified without the assent of all the parties, that is to say, all of the provinces. It does not belong to the majority of the provinces, even less to the federal government to change it. ... [A]ny modification [without unanimous consent] ... continues to assault on the respect due to contracts": see Conrad Black, Duplessis (McClelland & Stewart, 1977) at 80. Duplessis was relegated to the position of Leader of the Opposition from 1939 to 1944, which meant that he was unable to express effectively his disapproval of the unemployment insurance amendment of 1940. His replacement, Premier Adelard Godbout, assented to the amendment, as did all his provincial counterparts.

Prime Minister King subsequently celebrated the political and constitutional achievement while taking pains to distance himself from the compact theory:

We have avoided the raising of a very critical constitutional question, namely, whether or not in amending the British North America Act it is absolutely necessary to secure the consent of all the provinces, or whether the consent of a certain number of provinces would be sufficient. The question may come up, but not in reference to unemployment insurance, at some time later on.

See Canada, House of Commons, Debates (1940) at 1117. King's words were those of a careful politician and clairvoyant, as can be seen in Chapter 26, Amending the Constitution.

The compact theory faded in importance after 1940, both for lack of a spokesperson among the premiers outside Quebec, and because Quebec increasingly focused its arguments not on the need for the unanimous consent of all provinces to constitutional amendments affecting provincial interests, but on the need for Quebec's assent. Quebec was not limited to the compact theory to justify its claim to a constitutional veto. On his return to power, Duplessis would argue that, in addition to being a signatory to the confederal pact, Quebec was also guardian of the French language in Canada. The claim for a distinctive role for the province found its most convincing expression in the Tremblay Report, Quebec's response to the federally inspired Rowell-Sirois Commission. The Tremblay Report stated famously that "Quebec is not a province like the others" for with regard to "French-Canadian culture," the province "assumes alone the responsibilities which the other provinces jointly assume with regard to Anglo-Canadian culture": see Quebec, Report of the Royal Commission of Inquiry on Constitutional Problems (Quebec: Éditeur officiel, 1956) (Chair: T Tremblay) (cited to D Kwavnick, ed, The Tremblay Report (Toronto: McClelland & Stewart, 1973) at 290).

CHAPTER SEVEN

FEDERALISM AND THE MODERN CANADIAN STATE

With this chapter, we move into the world of modern federalism, where we examine the judicial interpretation of some of the major heads of federal and provincial power since the end of appeals to the Privy Council in 1949. Chapter 7 begins with some background materials, which pick up the story from Chapter 6, The 1930s: The Depression and the New Deal, and set the political context for modern federalism disputes. Chapter 8, Interpreting the Division of Powers, discusses the modern principles that govern interpretation of the division of powers. We continue with an examination of the three major federal powers—peace, order, and good government (Chapter 9, Peace, Order, and Good Government); trade and commerce (Chapter 10, Federalism and the Economy); and criminal law (Chapter 11, Criminal Law and Procedure)—and their interaction with provincial powers over property and civil rights powers. Chapter 12, Instruments of Flexibility in the Federal System, shifts the focus away from the courts to examine a number of policy instruments that Canadian governments have used to avoid some rigidities of the formal division of powers in the Constitution and to alter, in practice, the actual distribution of functions and policy responsibilities of each level of government in many areas.

From the early 1970s, the Supreme Court of Canada played an increasingly active role in adjudication of disputes between the federal and provincial governments, although constitutional cases of this type were never a large part of the Court's docket. Katherine Swinton states that the Court decided 158 cases raising distribution of powers issues between 1970 and 1989. The Court was especially active in the period from 1976 through 1983, reaching a "high" of 14 cases in 1976-77: see Katherine E Swinton, The Supreme Court and Canadian Federalism: The Laskin-Dickson Years (Toronto: Carswell, 1990) at 8.

This activity occurred in a period in which federal–provincial relations were often acrimonious as a result of disputes about constitutional reform and natural resource policy as well as disagreements over such matters as the administration of justice and broadcasting. Some of the cases began as references generated by governments; others were the result of corporate or individual challenges to legislative action.

In recent years, the Court's involvement in federalism disputes has decreased, in part because many federal and provincial disputes have arisen in response to fiscal arrangements and harmonization of functions, which are being worked out in political, rather than judicial, arenas.

Before we turn to the cases in the chapters that follow, the excerpt below gives the political context within which modern federalism disputes have been decided.

Evolution of the Division of Powers

A reborn Father of Confederation might have great difficulty recognizing his handiwork if he tried to get a grasp on the role that the different orders of government play today. He would, perhaps, be struck most by the expansion in the activities of both orders of government, each now operating across a vastly broader range of economic, social, and cultural life than was imagined in 1867. Many of the responsibilities he had assigned to the provinces were, at the time, primarily carried out by private religious and charitable institutions. Today, now they are the domain of governments, and often the federal government as much as (or even more than) the provincial governments. He would also be struck by how much the bulkheads he had built to separate federal and provincial powers into watertight compartments had been broken down. He would find few areas indeed in which both levels of government were not active; and he would, of course, find governments doing things that he and his colleagues had not even contemplated. All these new activities have, however, been fitted into the capacious, elastic pockets of the original BNA Act.

The most striking development is in the increase in shared, overlapping jurisdiction. A vast range of governmental functions are now concurrent, de facto if not de jure. This is a result of four distinct processes. First is the projection of federal concerns and interests into areas once reserved primarily for the provinces, largely, but not entirely, through the device of the spending power. The most obvious are the fields of social security and social policy, generally beginning with a few small shared-cost programs in the early years of the century, followed by old-age pensions in 1927, then extended during the depression era and after. They increased to a flood after World War II. The federal government has become primarily responsible for both defining and financing the Canadian welfare state in the name of national standards, national citizenship, and redistribution across regions and individuals. Some programs, such as family allowances, were undertaken directly by the federal government. Others, such as unemployment insurance and pensions, were transferred to it through constitutional amendment. In others, notably health care and education, the chief device has been transfers between levels of government. Federal and provincial programs in social policy now intersect each other at virtually every point.

The federal government has also projected itself into other areas that were previously predominantly provincial, notably economic development, with such joint projects as the Trans-Canada Highway and later with the massive range of programs to promote regional development. To a somewhat lesser extent, the provinces have projected themselves into areas thought to be of predominantly federal concern. For example, if part of the rationale of Confederation was that Ottawa would be the main economic actor, with the provinces reserved mainly to cultural and social matters, today provinces engage in a wide range of economic policies to promote their development, including, on occasion, engaging in explicit provincial fiscal policies or demand management policies. Provinces have also become involved in many international activities. These include provincial representation abroad and a host of trade promotion activities. As international trade policy becomes increasingly focussed on the reduction of non-tariff barriers, provinces are becoming increasingly involved, partly because many of the practices at issue are within provincial jurisdiction, and partly because constitutional interpretation has meant that the federal power to implement treaties does not extend into provincial jurisdiction. Again, the examples can be multiplied. ...

... [O]verlapping has increased massively in the field of revenue-raising. In the early years of Confederation, the revenue fields cultivated by the federal government and the provinces overlapped little, the provinces relying on direct taxing, and the federal government relying primarily on the tariff, which was not available to the provinces. Today, both levels rely heavily on the same fields, especially the corporate and personal income tax. ...

... [C]oncurrency has been encouraged by the growth of new policy areas that fall outside any of the categories that were set out in the BNA Act. Many of these emerging problems could fall equally plausibly into a number of clauses of ss. 91 and 92, virtually inviting each level of government in. In some cases, it was possible for courts to find an existing power into which to fit the new responsibility; in others, the advantage tended to fall to whichever level of government first occupied the field and defined its terms. Such new areas are frequently subjects of intense federal–provincial conflict, a kind of competitive expansionism, which subsides as a rough division of labour is worked out among them. Numerous new fields cut across jurisdictional lines: the environment, consumer protection, manpower training, and many others. As Stevenson [Garth Stevenson, "The Division of Powers in Canada: Evolution and Structure" in R Simeon, ed, Division of Powers and Public Policy, vol 61 (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1985) 71] notes, between 1959 and 1984, both the Alberta cabinet and the federal cabinet nearly doubled in size, and many of the new portfolios that each added, such as environment and manpower, overlapped directly.

For all these reasons, concurrency, overlapping, and shared responsibilities are fundamental features of Canadian federalism as in all other federations. A second broad development, which is both cause and consequence of increased concurrency, is the breakdown of a clear rationale, or set of criteria, for determining how responsibilities should be allocated. Two such rationales were built into the BNA Act. On one hand was a broad distinction between "local" and "national," the former to be provincial and the latter federal. But society and economy are now so interwoven that such a distinction cannot carry us very far. If we can agree that, to use Stevenson's example, defence is a national responsibility and garbage collection a local one, we can find exceptions even here. Defence may be a national concern, but the location of defence facilities or of plants to build equipment are decidedly local. Garbage collection may be local, but its larger effects, such as pollution, may well be interprovincial, national, and even international.

In other less extreme examples, the distinction is impossible to make. Education is the classic example. While in many respects it is, as the Constitution suggests, undeniably local, in other respects it is undeniably national—intimately related to the quality and character of the workforce and to the development of pan-Canadian attitudes and values. The same is true for many federal responsibilities. Transportation again is a classic example. It is certainly national, but in a country as vast and diverse as ours, its local manifestations and impacts are critical. Hence, a case could be made both for federal involvement in education (which has happened in post-secondary education funding, funding of research activities, and support for minority-language education programs) and for provincial involvement in transportation (which has been done through provincial ownership of railways in British Columbia and Ontario, through provincial administration of interprovincial trucking, and through provincial involvement in highways, to name but a few).

Another way to think of the weakness of the national/local distinction is to use the economist's terms of spillovers and externalities. A host of provincial actions can have effects on citizens and governments outside a province's borders. A host of federal programs—taxing, spending and regulations—can spill over to affect provincial programs and priorities. Similarly, competing views of community can lead to widely varying conceptions of what is appropriately national or provincial. Thus, an expansive view of the supremacy of the national community, and of the federal government as its essential instrument, can lead to a virtually open-ended assertion of the national significance of local-level activities and hence of an essentially unlimited scope for the potential exercise of federal power. Conversely, a strongly held provincialist view justifies an equally unlimited projection of provincial interests into national affairs. Quebec nationalism, of course, erodes the distinction by seeing the nation as Quebec, again justifying an almost unlimited claim to jurisdiction.

A second distinction of government roles found in the BNA Act is between economic matters on one hand and sociocultural matters on the other, with the former primarily federal and the latter primarily provincial—though, as we have seen, the federal government was from the start allocated important powers here too. This distinction has also broken down. On one hand, the concern with the national community and with increasing Canada's international autonomy has not only led the federal government to be the architect of the welfare state, as discussed above, but has also led it into many areas of cultural and symbolic importance: multiculturalism, the CBC, the Canada Council, and others. By the same token, provinces have recognized that preservation of a distinct society and culture is impossible without the maintenance of a strong economy, and thus they have become much more interested in economic matters.

No other broad-brush simple rationale appears to offer any better guide to deciding what should legitimately be federal and what should be provincial. The complexity of the modern division of powers mirrors this lack of consensus on the fundamental federal and provincial roles. One can, however, push this argument too far. Chaotic and complex as it may be, the Constitution does provide broad boundaries to the abilities of each level of government to act in an entirely unrestrained way. Supreme Court decisions frequently draw such lines, and they have important effects on subsequent developments. Moreover, some broad agreement on general roles does seem to exist, as [Richard Johnston, Public Opinion and Public Policy in Canada (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1986)] shows in his Commission monograph. Few would disagree that defence and foreign affairs are overwhelmingly federal responsibilities. Few would deny that while the provinces are indeed important economic actors, the federal government is primarily responsible for broad macroeconomic management: for fiscal policy, monetary policy, and the like. Few would deny an overarching federal responsibility for the major redistributive programs, both for individuals and for regions, nor would they challenge the federal government's responsibility for interregional trade and commerce or for transportation. Indeed, in these areas the call seems to be generally not for increased provincial jurisdiction but for a greater degree of regional sensitivity, whether through consultation with provincial governments or in the internal operations of the national government. A similar listing for provincial government roles might be more controversial, but it would probably include education, social services, and most of the detailed regulation of individual and commercial life encompassed in "property and civil rights."

What accounts for these changes in the operating division of powers? The proximate causes lie in the changing roles that governments play in advanced industrial societies such as Canada. Especially in the postwar period, federal institutions were required to adapt to new roles for the state and to new relationships between the state and society. The story of the evolution of the division of powers is essentially the story of how this was done, within the context of the institutions we had inherited and the ways in which the courts had understood them. However, these changes in the role of government were themselves the product of other forces, which also therefore must be understood as “causes” of shifts in the division of powers. These include such broad trends as the increasing and changing importance of international influences in shaping the Canadian society and economy, the increased politicization of society, and the changing expectations and demands of citizens.

Moreover, to say that the division of powers had to respond to changing roles for the state does not necessarily explain how it did so. In particular, it does not explain how these new responsibilities would be allocated among governments, whether they would fall primarily to provincial governments or to the national government, or whether they would be shared. In order to answer this question, we shall return to the larger perspectives of functional federalism, democracy, and community that we outlined in Part I. All three are required to understand the Canadian pattern.

That pattern has been distinctive in some important ways. While increased overlapping and concurrency has been common to all federal states as they respond to the same pressures for the growth of government, in most cases the result has been a considerable degree of centralization. The major new responsibilities fell to the central governments, even though they were often delivered through complex mechanisms of intergovernmental transfers. Canadian commentators (at least virtually all English-speaking ones) on the events of the 1930s, in which federal institutions were seen so clearly and tragically to have failed, argued that decentralized federalism was inherently incapable of undertaking the responsibilities that economic and social developments were forcing on the modern state. The “dead hand” of the Constitution (aided and abetted by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council) had to be removed. The division of powers had to be reworked to reflect the new responsibilities of government.

Events during and immediately after World War II seemed to indicate that this was precisely what was happening. The Rowell-Sirois Commission reported in 1940, recommending federal jurisdiction over pensions and unemployment insurance and full federal jurisdiction over personal and corporate income taxes. All provinces agreed to a 1940 amendment transferring responsibility for unemployment insurance to the federal government. During the war, the fiscal and bureaucratic capacities of the federal government increased tremendously, and this dominance extended into the years following. Toward the end of the war, the government’s white paper on incomes and employment embraced both freer trade and a responsibility for managing the entire economy, a role that would fall to Ottawa. At the end of the war, the government also released its proposals for postwar federalism, the so-called Green Book proposals, which were discussed with the provinces at a series of Reconstruction Conferences. They, too, envisioned a greatly enhanced role for the federal government, including extension of welfare state policies and control over the income tax system.

The larger, wealthier provinces rejected the Green Book proposals. However, most of the elements of the proposals were achieved over the next two decades in a piecemeal series of federal–provincial agreements: tax rental agreements, grants for health care, culminating in the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, 1957 and the Medical Care Act, 1966; grants for post-secondary education, leading to federal assumption of half the operating costs of all post-secondary institutions in 1967; grants to assist the provinces in social welfare, culminating in the Canada Assistance Plan, 1968; and developments in pensions, including the establishment of the federal old-age security pension in 1951, the Canada and Quebec pension plans in 1964, the guaranteed income supplement, and so on.

Equally remarkable was the persistence and vitality of federalism. In only a few cases were responsibilities formally transferred to the federal level. In most cases, the federal government was to achieve its goals through shared-cost programs, with the provinces retaining a major role in program design and delivery. The fiscal centralization of the immediate postwar period was steadily relaxed. The provincial shares of taxing, spending, and government employment rose at a considerably faster rate than federal spending throughout most of this period. The strength and self-confidence of provincial governments increased, along with their budgets. Thus, predictions that the provinces would wither away, to become little more than municipalities, able merely to weave minor variations on national themes, were proved to be decidedly premature. All this was reflected in the shifting division of powers.

As the state adopted new roles, expectations of federalism pulled in somewhat different directions. Most thinking in the postwar period held that the efficiency and effectiveness of public policy implied the need for increased centralization, or federal authority. There are a number of strands to this argument. The new Keynesian economics stressed the need for the state to manipulate overall levels of taxing and spending in order to smooth out aggregate demand in the economy. Many assumed that this would be more feasible if one single authority was able to determine aggregate levels of taxation, borrowing, and expenditure, rather than if independent actions of 11 governments had to be coordinated. Most provinces were clearly too small to operate their own fiscal policy; any provincial effort was likely to be dissipated in spillovers to other jurisdictions. Without control over their money supply, the provinces' capacity to engage in stabilization policy was further limited. The Canadian commitment to freer international trade in the post-War era also increased the importance of international economic relations in domestic policy-making, a development that was also assumed by many to require wider federal authority. More generally, it was felt that the private economic actors with which governments would have to interact, and which they would have to regulate, were increasingly transcending provincial boundaries. National and international corporations and unions were felt to be beyond the reach of most provincial governments. If the economy itself was becoming organized on a national basis, then the political system should be organized more nationally as well.

Similar reasoning applied to the development of the welfare state. Individual provinces, it was felt, lacked the resources to put the new policies in place, though often they had acted as the pioneers, as Saskatchewan had done with public health care. It was also difficult for the provinces to pursue progressive redistributive policies, since in a society with mobile capital and labour, the wealthy could easily move to areas of low spending and low taxes, and the less well-off could do the reverse. Provincial provision of services such as post-secondary education would probably be less than was desirable for national purposes, since provinces would fear that graduates trained at their expense might move elsewhere on graduation. The more integrated and tight-knit the society, the more inhibiting such interdependencies could be and, as the Saskatchewan health care example shows, the more each level of government would require the assistance of the other to meet its goals. The expansion was therefore complementary as often as competitive.

There thus was a powerful functionally based rationale for a broader federal role; or, if not, for a high degree of federal involvement in provincial policy. By the 1970s, such functional arguments had attenuated somewhat. Perhaps the chief reason was that with the fundamental economic management policies well established, it was possible to turn more attention to the virtues of decentralization in terms of policy experiment, innovation, and the like. By the 1970s there was also growing disquiet about the efficacy and desirability of some of the postwar policies; they were now less able to command broad support. In particular, the limitations of such policies, especially for some regions, had become more apparent. Keynesian economics had indeed appeared to promote national growth, but it was not clear that it had done much to alleviate underlying regional disparities. Thus, a new set of issues was arising for which, at least for some interests, centralization was not the obvious solution.

If the logic of functionalism was broadly centralizing, the logic of democracy was more complicated. The postwar period was characterized by increased citizen expectations and demands on governments, and by the proliferation of interest groups. Both phenomena were simultaneously cause and consequence of the growth of governments. As [Hugh G Thorburn, Interest Groups in the Canadian Federal System (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1985) at 59–66] has demonstrated in his study of interest groups, the organization and strategies of such groups was greatly influenced by the federal political structure and by the division of powers. Groups tended to organize around those governments which had the prime responsibility for matters of greatest concern to them. For example, provincial ownership of oil and gas resources led companies in these fields to orient themselves primarily toward the provincial governments. However, federalism also required many groups, such as labour, to orient themselves to both levels, often stretching their resources very thin and rendering it difficult for groups to develop coherent national policies.

At the same time, the groups also helped shape the evolution of federalism. They greatly stimulated the development of jurisdictional overlap and policy interdependence, for neither interest groups nor citizens were likely to consult ss. 91 and 92 before articulating their demands. The call was for action by government generally, and both orders of government were often anxious to respond, especially in the newly emerging areas of public concern.

Finally, community concerns also pulled in both directions. It was widely felt in the postwar period that the searing collective experiences of the depression and the war had greatly strengthened the sense of a Canadian national community. Shared sacrifice and the increased linkages among citizens was [sic] producing a stronger national consciousness, one that was focussed on the federal government, for it had been the prime instrument of the war effort and alone seemed capable of putting in place the new public agenda. The commitment to the welfare state embodied an idea of social rights and national standards which should apply to citizens wherever they lived. A stronger national consciousness legitimized federal policies that were designed to foster it. No longer did it seem justified that we should tolerate large differences in the level and quality of public services simply because of the province of residence. It was widely thought that the processes of economic development in an advanced industrial society were likely to erode the importance of identities rooted in territory and culture, and to strengthen those related to one's status in the economic system, for example as worker, manager, or farmer. This, too, was predicted to undermine the salience of provincial identities and to strengthen those at the national level.

Nevertheless, the support for regional communities had by no means disappeared, especially in Quebec. In their response to the Rowell-Sirois Report (which itself had restrained its recommendations out of a recognition of the value of provincial diversity) and to the federal Green Book proposals, dissenting provinces were able to make strong appeals to values such as provincial autonomy. In the 1950s, Quebec's Tremblay Commission was able to articulate a province-centred view of federalism which attacked the essentials of the thrust for postwar centralization. The strength of such feelings ensured that in the assumption of new roles, the answer would not simply be a wholesale transfers of responsibilities from the provinces to the federal government, however logical this might seem on functional grounds. Instead, many of these functions would be carried out by the provinces. In other cases, ways would be found to introduce them in a manner consistent with the maintenance of federalism and of provincial responsibility, primarily through the development of the techniques that came to be known as cooperative federalism.

As we shall discuss later at greater length, by the 1970s federal and provincial governments were articulating highly divergent and competing views of the character of the Canadian communities and their relations to the two orders of government. This competitive state-building also promoted increased overlap and de facto concurrency, since each of the competing visions tended to be predicated not on a functional division of powers, as suggested by ss. 91 and 92, but on a global view of the dominance of one or other level of community. In the pursuit of such visions, it was legitimate to deploy the full range of public policy—economic, social, and cultural. From this perspective, nothing was easily excluded from the purview of any government; no easy dividing line could be drawn. So in Quebec, for example, by the 1960s the issue was not whether there should be a welfare state but under whose auspices it should be organized. Thus, while in the postwar period the muting of regional consciousness had limited fundamental debate over the division of powers in favour of a search for cooperative mechanisms, by the 1960s the division of powers was at the heart of federal–provincial conflict, as each government explored the limits of its “jurisdictional potential.”

As the preceding comment suggests, changes in the division of powers were not automatic reflections of a changing society and economy. They were developed and articulated by and through the governments in the federal system, each utilizing the resources allocated to it by the Constitution. Thus, we must also understand change in the operating division of powers through the internal dynamics of governments themselves. As they sought to master their own environments, and respond to electoral and other incentives, they were increasingly led to intervene in areas occupied by other governments and to use policy instruments that had previously been largely monopolized by the others. As we have seen, the terms of the BNA Act were permissive: a government could almost always find a legitimate constitutional peg on which to hang its desired programs. This was made possible both by the fact that many new areas did not fall neatly into any one category and by the presence of open-ended authority in areas such as the spending or the taxing power. [Emphasis in original.]

NOTE

With increasing levels of activity by federal and provincial governments and the resulting interdependency, executive federalism became an important institution of Canadian political life. The term “executive federalism” describes the relationships between elected and appointed officials representing federal and provincial governments. Through consultation and negotiations in a wide variety of policy areas, these actors have often reshaped the allocation of functions under the Constitution’s distribution of powers, as interpreted by the courts. Further discussion of the intergovernmental relations that characterize modern federalism is found in Garth Stevenson, “Federalism and Intergovernmental Relations” in Michael S Whittington & Glen Williams, eds, Canadian Politics in the 21st Century, 7th ed (Toronto: Nelson Thomson Learning, 2008) 85. Intergovernmental agreements are dealt with further in Chapter 12.

I. INTRODUCTION

This chapter contains an overview of the general principles and doctrines relied on in the judicial interpretation of the division of powers between Parliament and the provincial legislatures. The structure of the chapter follows the three kinds of arguments that can be used to challenge legislation on division of powers grounds.

The first kind of argument involves a challenge to the validity of legislation. The argument in such cases is that the legislation was enacted in relation to a “matter” beyond the enacting level of government’s jurisdiction and thus within the exclusive jurisdiction of the other level of government. Challenges to the validity of legislation can generally be made equally against either federal or provincial legislation and are resolved on the basis of three doctrines that the courts have fashioned over time to help them work their way through the different kinds of legal issues that such challenges can pose: the pith and substance doctrine, the double aspect doctrine, and the ancillary powers doctrine.

The second kind of argument seeks to limit the operability of provincial statutes. Even if a provincial law is valid, provisions in that law will be rendered inoperative if they conflict with provisions forming part of valid federal legislation that also apply to the same facts. This doctrine, known as the federal paramountcy rule, works against the operation of provisions in provincial statutes to protect the primacy of federal policies embodied in valid federal legislation. It may help to understand the difference between invalidity and inoperability if you keep in mind that, whereas invalid provisions always remain invalid, when paramount federal legislation is repealed, formerly inoperative provincial provisions become operative once again.

The third kind of argument seeks to limit the applicability of valid legislation. Even if legislation is within the jurisdiction of the enacting level of government, it may have to be limited in its application (or “read down”) so as not to impair matters that lie at what is referred to as the “core” of one of the other level of government’s areas of exclusive jurisdiction. This doctrine, known as interjurisdictional immunity, has been used far more often by the courts to limit the applicability of provincial statutes to protect the exclusivity of federal heads of power than to limit the applicability of federal statutes to protect the exclusivity of provincial heads of power; in fact, instances of the latter are exceedingly rare. The Supreme Court of Canada has affirmed that the logic underlying the doctrine means that it can be used to protect the core areas of jurisdiction of both orders of government. However, the Court has also stated that the interjurisdictional immunity doctrine runs against the dominant tide of modern, flexible Canadian federalism. We will see the various ways in which the Court has downgraded the importance of this doctrine. Where interjurisdictional immunity is relevant, the Court may choose to consider applicability ahead of operability. The rationale for treating applicability ahead of operability in the narrower range of cases where it can still be invoked is that the reading down that is the effective result of treating a provision as inapplicable may eliminate what might otherwise have been conflict leading to inoperability. However, as we shall see, it is now just as, or even more, likely that interjurisdictional immunity issues will not be raised at all—hence the change in the order of presentation in this chapter since the last edition.

Given that it has been 150 years since the bulk of ss 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 came into force, you might assume that the Supreme Court of Canada would be called on relatively rarely nowadays to resolve issues relating to those provisions. You might have thought that, by now, both the meaning of all the significant heads of power would have been determined and the content of the various doctrines that the courts employ to assist in the resolution of such issues would have become both stable and clear. As you will soon come to appreciate, however, disputes can still arise about the proper scope to be given to particular heads of power, and the content of some of the doctrines remains neither stable nor clear. One of your main challenges as you progress through the readings in this chapter will be to keep track of the different ways in which these doctrines have been understood and applied over time. Another will be to gain a sense of why it is that these different ways of understanding and applying these doctrines have developed.

Another reason for the continuing involvement of the courts in this area is the fact that Parliament and the provincial legislatures, either on their own initiative or in response to public pressure, have in recent years been enacting legislation of a kind that the drafters of ss 91 and 92 would never have contemplated—for example, federal legislation that addresses a range of issues arising out of the development of assisted human reproduction techniques and genetic testing; provincial legislation that authorizes the government to claim forfeiture of both the tools and the proceeds of illegal activity; and federal and provincial legislation seeking to protect the environment in multiple ways, ranging from environmental assessment to regulation of greenhouse gases. How such legislation should best be understood to fit within the division of powers framework established many decades ago in a very different world is often far from clear and can pose serious challenges to the courts that are called on to provide the answers.

Yet another reason for the continuing involvement of the courts is the Supreme Court of Canada's tendency in the past few decades to allow both levels of government to legislate in the same areas. Although this has made it more difficult to bring successful challenges to the validity of legislation, it has led to an increase in the number of challenges to both the operability and the applicability of legislation (primarily provincial legislation). As you will see from the readings in Sections IV and V, the Supreme Court is being called on with some frequency these days to resolve both types of challenges.

As important as both the text of ss 91 and 92 and the above-noted doctrines are to the resolution of division of powers disputes, they are not the only tools the courts employ. One of the more striking features of the recent federalism jurisprudence has been the Supreme Court's tendency to invoke a number of broad, overarching principles in support of the approach it takes to division of powers issues. Prominent among these principles is the principle of flexible or cooperative federalism. The Supreme Court has invoked that principle in a number of its recent federalism decisions, particularly those in which it has rendered a judgment that allows for both federal and provincial legislation to exist and operate in the same area. That use of the principle of cooperative federalism to that end is especially evident in several recent decisions in which the Court has declined to apply the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity (the subject of Section V of this chapter) and the federal paramountcy doctrine (the subject of Section IV). The Court has only recently begun to expand on what it understands "cooperative federalism" to mean. For example, in Reference re Pan-Canadian Securities Regulation, 2018 SCC 48, the Court stated the following:

[18] Cooperative federalism is often applied "to facilitate interlocking federal and provincial legislative schemes and to avoid unnecessary constraints on provincial legislative action" (Quebec (Attorney General) v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 14, [2015] 3 S.C.R. 693, at paras. 17-19). Broadly speaking, it "accommodates overlapping jurisdiction and encourages intergovernmental cooperation," and therefore discourages courts from interfering with cooperative regulatory schemes so long as they are not incompatible with the boundaries dictated by the Constitution Act, 1867 (Reference re Securities Act, at para. 57, citing OPSEU v. Ontario (Attorney General), [1987] 2 S.C.R. 2, at p. 18; Canada (Attorney General) v. PHS Community Services Society, 2011 SCC 44, [2011] 3 S.C.R. 134, at para. 63; Reference re Securities Act, at paras. 61-62). We stress that cooperative federalism may be used neither to "override nor [to] modify the division of powers itself" (Rogers Communications Inc. v. Chateauguay (City), at para. 39), nor to impose "limits on the otherwise valid exercise of legislative competence" (Quebec (Attorney General) v. Canada (Attorney General), at para. 19; Reference re Securities Act, at paras. 61-62). It cannot, therefore, be used to make ultra vires legislation intra vires. By fostering cooperation between Parliament and the legislatures within the existing constitutional boundaries, however, cooperative federalism works to support, rather than supplant, the division of legislative powers (see: Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 3, at para. 22).

[19] This modern view of federalism sees Part VI of the Constitution Act, 1867 as a set of boundaries within which provinces and the federal government are free to give full effect to "Canadian federalism's constitutional creativity and cooperative flexibility" (Fédération des producteurs de volailles du Québec v. Pelland, 2005 SCC 20, [2005] 1 S.C.R. 292, at para. 15). In short, cooperative federalism allows "different levels of government [to] work together on the ground to leverage their unique constitutional powers in tandem to establish a regulatory regime that may be ultra vires the jurisdiction of one legislature on its own" (Comeau, at para. 87).

For further reading, see J Poirier, "The Pan-Canadian Securities Regulation Reference: Dualist Federalism to the Rescue of Cooperative Federalism" (2020) 94 SCLR (2d) 85.

The value of such an approach lies in the fact that the cumulative effect of (1) more flexible application of doctrines such as pith and substance, double aspect, and ancillary powers and (2) newly restrained versions of paramountcy and interjurisdictional immunity is that the federal and provincial levels of government will often find themselves regulating the same areas of activity in Canadian society. Rather than attempt to avoid overlapping jurisdiction by means of active judicial policing, federal and provincial actors are left to work out their jurisdictional disputes themselves and, where appropriate, find ways to resolve those disputes through some form of cooperative action. It is a principle that, at least to this point, has been understood to favour both jurisdictional flexibility and judicial restraint. (An interesting case to examine when considering the principle of cooperative federalism is Quebec (AG) v Canada (AG), 2015 SCC 14, in which the government of Quebec relied in argument on the principle of cooperative federalism not as a reason to allow both levels of government to legislate in the same area but as a reason to prevent one level of government from enacting legislation in an area of shared interest. That case is excerpted in Chapter 11, Criminal Law and Procedure.)

Other general principles in recent jurisprudence include an understanding of federalism as a mechanism for balancing regional diversity with national unity; the importance of interpreting ss 91 and 92 in a "progressive" manner—that is, ensuring that the meaning given to the heads of power reflects the changes that have taken place in Canadian society since 1867; the need for predictability—that is, that both governments and citizens should be able to predict the outcome of federalism disputes with some confidence; the importance of promoting democratic participation and governmental cooperation for the common good; and the principle of subsidiarity, which means that, wherever possible, governmental power should be devolved to the local level.

For a good example of the Supreme Court invoking a number of these principles at once, on this occasion as a prelude to its discussion of several of the doctrines we referred to above, consider the following passage from the reasons of Binnie and LeBel JJ, writing for the majority, in Canadian Western Bank v Alberta, 2007 SCC 22, excerpted more fully in Section V:

[21] The disposition of this case requires the consideration and application of important constitutional doctrines governing the operation of Canadian federalism. Despite the doubts sometimes expressed about the nature of Canadian federalism, it is beyond question that federalism has been a "fundamental guiding principle" of our constitutional order since the time of Confederation, as our Court emphasized in the Reference re Secession of Quebec, [1998] 2 S.C.R. 217, at para. 55.

[22] As the Court noted in that decision, federalism was the legal response of the framers of the Constitution to the political and cultural realities that existed at Confederation. It thus represented a legal recognition of the diversity of the original members. The division of powers, one of the basic components of federalism, was designed to uphold this diversity within a single nation. Broad powers were conferred on provincial legislatures, while at the same time Canada's unity was ensured by reserving to Parliament powers better exercised in relation to the country as a whole. (Each head of power was assigned to the level of government best placed to exercise the power. The fundamental objectives of federalism were, and still are, to reconcile unity with diversity, promote democratic participation by reserving meaningful powers to the local or regional level and to foster co-operation among governments and legislatures for the common good.)

[23] To attain these objectives, a certain degree of predictability with regard to the division of powers between Parliament and the provincial legislatures is essential. For this reason, the powers of each of these levels of government were enumerated in ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 or provided for elsewhere in that Act. As is true of any other part of our Constitution—this "living tree" as it is described in the famous image from Edwards v. Attorney-General for Canada, [1930] A.C. 124 (P.C.), at p. 136—the interpretation of these powers and of how they interrelate must evolve and must be tailored to the changing political and cultural realities of Canadian society. It is also important to note that the fundamental principles of our constitutional order, which include federalism, continue to guide the definition and application of the powers as well as their interplay. Thus, the very functioning of Canada's federal system must continually be reassessed in light of the fundamental values it was designed to serve.

[24] As the final arbiters of the division of powers, the courts have developed certain constitutional doctrines, which, like the interpretations of the powers to which they apply, are based on the guiding principles of our constitutional order. The constitutional doctrines permit an appropriate balance to be struck in the recognition and management of the inevitable overlaps in rules made at the two levels of legislative power, while recognizing the need to preserve sufficient predictability in the operation of the division of powers. The doctrines must also be designed to reconcile the legitimate diversity of regional experimentation with the need for national unity. Finally, they must include a recognition that the task of maintaining the balance of powers in practice falls primarily to governments, and constitutional doctrine must facilitate, not undermine what this Court has called "co-operative federalism" . . . We will now turn to the issue of how, in our view, the main constitutional doctrines and the interplay between them should be construed so as to facilitate the achievement of the objectives of Canada's federal structure.

Canadian Western Bank is in many ways a complete course on the division of powers and bears rereading for that reason alone.

Before turning to an examination of the manner in which the courts deal with arguments attacking the validity, operability, and applicability of legislation, the chapter begins with an excerpt from an article by Richard Simeon discussing the fundamental values—community, functional efficiency, and democracy—that shape and animate debates about the federal form of government. The interpretation of the division of powers is an exercise that in some, if not many, cases can be deeply influenced by judicial conceptions of the appropriate weight to be given to the values Simeon discusses. For example, a judge's conception of the relative importance of national and local communities can influence their choice of either a broad or narrow approach to the scope and meaning of competing federal and provincial heads of power. The weight judges attach to a concern about functional efficiency may influence the degree to which they are willing to tolerate overlapping schemes of federal and provincial regulation. An appreciation of the underlying values discussed by Simeon is necessary to grasp the normative dynamics that drive debates about the proper interpretation of the division of powers.

II. VALUES INFORMING THE INTERPRETATION OF THE DIVISION OF POWERS

Richard E Simeon, "Criteria for Choice in Federal Systems"

[F]ederalism is not an end in itself, not something which can be inherently "balanced" or "unbalanced." Federalism (and its many variations in the view taken here) is valued or criticized because it is felt to promote (or constrain) other important values, and is believed to have certain kinds of effects.

Federalism, as a doctrine, is thus often associated with a number of other political values, such as liberty or pluralism; federalism as a set of institutions is felt to enhance the likelihood of approximating these values in practice. Moreover, if this is true, then it should also be true that proposals for change in a federal system like Canada's can be judged by whether they serve or block these wider values, and perhaps even that if we had clear normative criteria in mind we should be able to deduce proposals for reform from them. ...

In this paper, we will examine the links between federalism and three distinct bodies of theory, each of which provides a different vantage point for assessing a federal system.

Federalism can be evaluated first from the perspective of community. Here the question is: what implications do different forms of federalism have for different images of the ideal or preferred community with which people identify and to which they feel loyalty? Linguistic dualism and regional diversity have made this perspective the overwhelming focus of both practitioners and students of Canadian federalism, especially since the 1960s. Second, federalism can be evaluated from the perspective of democratic theory: does federalism promote democracy; do different conceptions of democracy generate different images of the good federal system? ...

Third, federalism can be assessed from the vantage point of functional effectiveness: does it enhance or frustrate the capacity of government institutions to generate effective policy and respond to citizen needs?

Debates about federalism take place both within and between each perspective. Proponents of each standpoint ask very different questions and have quite different criteria for judgement. Indeed the debate is often confused simply because the combatants talk past each other. But there is also vigorous debate within each of these traditions: between localists and universalists in community terms; between majoritarians and protectors of minority rights in democratic terms; between proponents of economies of scale and of the pathologies of size among the functionalists.

The relative emphasis among the three perspectives tends to vary considerably from country to country and time to time. Thus, if Canadians have been preoccupied with accommodating rival conceptions of community, Americans have—with the major exception of the Civil War period—debated federalism overwhelmingly in terms of its implications for democracy. Australians and Germans have emphasized the functional dimension—though the establishment of the Bonn republic sought the restoration of federalism as one means to diffuse power and thus inhibit the reemergence of totalitarianism. In Canada, while community has been central, English-Canadian academics of the thirties concentrated largely on federalism and effective government, rather than federalism and community. The economic crisis of the present and the (at least temporary) setting aside of the constitutional debate, suggests that attention is turning back to the preoccupations characteristic of the thirties. ...

[P]olitical values are nested in institutional forms. Constitutional doctrines have important educative values. They privilege some concepts of sovereignty, legitimacy, representation and the like over others and thus make them easier to defend or harder to attack. At a more empirical level, they entrench some kinds of interests over others, and structure the incentives within which political actors work. ...

Conceptions of Community

The first set of criteria asks what conception of the political community is to be embodied in political arrangements. Federalism is thus assessed largely in terms of its ability to defend and maintain a balance between regional and national political communities. Conflict arises out of competing models of community: between a vision of a single pan-Canadian community, a vision of a union of ten provincial communities and a vision of two distinct national communities, each with full sovereignty. Within the perspective of community, moreover, is the controversy about whether the communities in Canada are to be defined largely in political terms, or in terms of the relationship of linguistic and ethnic communities. In the present context, the competing images of community can be summarized in terms of a conflict between three drives: country-building, province-building, and two-nation or Quebec nation-building. Federalism itself represents, from this point of view, a dynamic balance between regional and national communities, reflected in the relationship between federal and provincial governments. The tension threatens the federal system itself when residents of different parts of the country hold fundamentally clashing conceptions of the balance; or when residents of one or more regions develop a conception of community in which their identification or links with other regions and the central government become weak.

The criterion of community asks concerning which set of people do we assert a common citizenship, maintain a common loyalty, maintain a common set of obligations one to another, or maximize values such as equity, growth or wealth? Who is entitled to share, as of right, in the resources of the group? What set of people do we regard as "us"? When an Albertan or a New Brunswicker says "we," whom does he include? What is "the appropriate space dimension for the resolution of value conflict?"

In this sense everyone belongs to multiple communities, ranging from family, to city, to province, to country, to humanity in general. And most of the time these identities are not incompatible. ... Indeed federalism is predicated on just this sort of division in the minds of citizens.

Nor, of course, need communities be territorial or geographic—they can equally be communities such as religious groups or classes. Here however, we are concerned primarily with territorially defined communities Moreover, we are concerned with provincially-bounded communities, even though communities defined intra- and supra-provincially exist in many parts of Canada. We focus on nation and province because it is these communities which have been institutionalized, and which have governments with the capacity to define and articulate community interests. ... For this reason, arguments about political community in Canada tend to focus on the relative role and power of federal and provincial authorities. More than most other successful federations, Canadian history has turned on such questions and on shifts in the political strength of each conception. ...

The Functional Perspective

The second set of criteria may be labelled functional. Here the focus is not on regions, communities or rival national and provincial states. Rather, federal and provincial governments are seen to be different elements within a single system. Together—either through independent action, or through various forms of cooperation—they are responsible for governing the country and for satisfying the needs of citizens. Powers are allocated, at least in principle, not according to what different communities need to express and protect themselves but rather according to a division of labour criterion: which level can most efficiently and effectively carry out any given responsibility of contemporary government? The system as a whole is evaluated in terms of its ability to respond to the needs of citizens And citizen interests in terms of economic and social goals—as consumers, workers, businessmen, homeowners, etc.—are held to be more important to them than their interests as members of territorially-defined communities. Does the federal system facilitate or frustrate governmental responsiveness, does it promote or block desires for more effective economic planning, control over foreign ownership, environmental protection, a fair welfare system, or any other set of objectives? Does it impose unacceptably high delays or uncertainties in decision-making, or impose heavy organizational and decision costs?

If the community perspective is the domain of sociologists, the functional perspective is that of the economists and public administrators. If the primary orientation of community theorists is collectivist, the functionalist perspective tends to be individualist. And if advocates of each model of community often take for granted or ignore the policy or efficiency implications of different proposals, functional theorists equally tend to leave unexamined the scope of the community across which values like equity, redistribution, growth or welfare are to be maximized. Most writers in this perspective tend to reject debate in terms of community as illegitimate ... As Pierre Trudeau and his colleagues said in a 1964 manifesto, "An Appeal for Realism in Politics":

To use nationalism (English or French-Canadian) as a yardstick deciding politics and priorities is both sterile and retrograde. Overflowing nationalism distorts one's vision of reality, prevents one from seeing problems in their true perspective, falsifies solutions and constitutes a classic diversionary tactic for politicians caught by the facts. ...

The constitutional problem, then, is to allocate powers and erect machinery that maximizes the capacity of governments collectively to satisfy citizen needs. And the question is whether there exists a body of theory which can provide criteria to suggest how this can be done.

Arguments about the functional ineffectiveness of the federal system abound. Some argue the system is ineffective because it is too decentralized. For example, it is suggested that the Canadian common market—and hence the rational allocation of resources—has been substantially eroded by a wide variety of provincial actions. Businessmen argue that they are hampered by differing provincial regulations in such areas as consumer protection. It is often argued that the proportion of taxing and spending power in the hands of the provinces vitiates the federal capacity to manage the economy, or to develop effective national planning. ...

But there are also functionally derived arguments that the system is too centralized. They include the view that no remote central government can adequately take into account the interests of all sectors and regions. The federal decision-making apparatus is overloaded and hence ineffective.

Finally, many functionalist arguments focus on the costs of the sharing and overlapping of responsibilities among governments. Such sharing, it is suggested, imposes unacceptably high decision costs ... in the form of delay, uncertainty, and the difficulty of knowing who is responsible or to whom to direct demands. ... The sharing of powers and the process of federal-provincial bargaining, it is argued, freezes out interest groups and contributes to the "overgovernment" of Canadian society. Functionalist critiques thus come from all parts of the ideological spectrum. They can lead either to centralization or to decentralization, and they usually embody an implicit conception of community. ...

One of the most important lessons of the functional perspective is that not all interests are defined in territorial terms; [other] interests may be neglected in a political regime predicated on the centrality of territory or region. Here, abstract criteria are of little help. What is necessary is assessment of the underlying nature of political, economic and cultural cleavages, and the territorial distribution of interests. ... "Who benefits" from greater centralization or greater decentralization is not a question that can be answered in the abstract; nor are benefits and costs distributed equally across all groups. It is a much more political question

Functionalist theorists have tended to discuss the allocation of powers in terms of watertight compartments; overlapping ... is [generally] held to be inefficient, costly, and perverse. Yet overlapping jurisdictions characterize all federations, and theorists must take into account the political forces which have led to this situation. Most issues have both local and national dimensions, so their assignment to one or other level will inevitably result in inefficiencies. As Dafflon says, "For multi-level problems, single level problem solving structures are unlikely to be optimal." ...

The Democratic Perspective

The third perspective is that of democratic theory. It asks: what are the consequences of alternative federal arrangements for different conceptions of democracy—for participation, responsiveness, liberty and equality? There are several strands to such arguments. The first approach is primarily concerned with protecting citizens from governments The classic defence of federalism as it emerged in the United States suggests that its fundamental purpose is to minimize the possibility of tyranny, especially majority tyranny, by ensuring that power would be fragmented among competing governmental authorities. In this view federalism is a device to place limits on government, in part by ensuring that "ambition" will be checked by ambition, and in part by ensuring that diverse jurisdictions will offer different packages of services from which mobile individuals can choose. This approach tends to argue for considerable decentralization and makes a virtue out of divided jurisdiction and competing governments. A minority tyrannized over by a local majority can seek redress at another level, as blacks faced with discriminatory state policies were able to do by turning to Washington or, to some extent, as French-Canadians were able to do by turning to the provincial government. ...

There are several problems with this approach. It places an excessive faith in the capacity of institutions to prevent tyranny. And if the goal of federalism is more limited government overall, many contemporary critics conversely suggest it is associated with too much government. Finally, the reverse of protection of minorities is the frustration of majorities. Federalism does not resolve the classic problem of majority versus minority rights.

A second strand of democratic theorizing stresses the advantages of smaller units in terms of governmental responsiveness and citizen participation. In Montesquieu's view:

In a large republic, the common good is subject to a thousand considerations; it is subordinated to various exceptions; it depends on accidents. In a small republic, the public good is more strongly felt, better known and closer to each citizen; abuses are less extensive, and consequently less protected.

Smaller units are likely to be more homogeneous, so a clear majority interest is more likely to emerge. The political weight of an individual citizen is greater if he is one of a small rather than a large number. Political leaders are more sensitive to public opinion with small constituencies. The advantage of a decentralized federal system, then, is that it maximizes opportunities for effective citizen participation.

Again, there are difficulties. In order for communities to be homogeneous, or for individuals to have a real chance of exercising influence, the units probably need to be a great deal smaller than provinces The opportunity to participate in a small unit may also pose a difficult dilemma: one may be able to achieve influence, but that may be negated by the inability of the unit itself to achieve one's goal because it lacks the resources: system responsiveness and system capacity are inversely related. This is a strong argument for a multi-level system of government, such as federalism.

Thus, "democratic" views of federalism support both a high degree of decentralization and of overlapping between governments. But democratic theory also produces important critiques of federalism. Most prominent recently in Canada is the argument that the Canadian pattern of "executive federalism" in which relations between governments are conducted primarily through the negotiations of political executives limits citizen participation and effectiveness in many ways. Confusion about which level of government is responsible for what makes rational intervention difficult. The mixing of responsibilities reduces accountability and allows governments to pass the buck. The secrecy of the process has similar effects and freezes out interest groups. The dominance of executives strengthens the role of bureaucrats as against politicians, and cabinets as against legislatures and opposition parties. Citizens' interests, it is argued, get lost in governmental competition for status and power. ...

The second critique of federalism is that it frustrates majority rule; indeed, it does so almost by definition. It does so by denying a level of government the jurisdiction or resources to achieve certain ends, or by providing inadequate mechanisms for joint decision-making. This concern, of course, is quite different from those advanced by Madisonian liberals. The difference is well-illustrated by those who oppose an entrenched Bill of Rights on the grounds that it infringes on legislative sovereignty. Again, the critical prior question is: which majorities? ... [I]t has often been argued that federalism has frustrated national majorities. ...

A related argument, advanced by Porter and others, is that the federal structure, by fragmenting groups and institutionalizing the territorial dimension of politics, has inhibited the emergence of national majorities or of majorities and minorities based on non-regional cleavages, such as class. Both these views argue for more centralization.

But on the other hand, one can argue that federalism has frustrated provincial majorities. ... This is a central argument of the PQ: Quebec cannot achieve its goals in economic, social or cultural policy so long as Ottawa controls so many of the levels of policy-making. More generally, majority rule in Canada as a whole implies inevitably that Central Canada outweighs the East and West, and that English-Canadians predominate over French-Canadians. If regional and ethnic identities are the most salient divisions, and if political issues divide the country on these lines, then the doctrine of majority rule is a major threat to national unity. ...

Thus arguments from majority rule depend crucially on prior conceptions of community. They also depend on the territorial distribution of political cleavages. If most interests are distributed evenly across the whole country, dividing it horizontally rather than vertically, then the argument for aggregation at the national level is strong. If, on the other hand, opinions are sharply divided by region, which implies that a majority in each region is likely to have a different preference, then a strong argument can be made for provincial responsibility. Indeed the "democratic" version of containing spillovers is the idea that political boundaries should be aligned with the distribution of preferences, so that each region is as homogeneous as possible: each unit could then enact its preferences without either imposing them on others or being vetoed by others. This is a fundamental justification of federalism. It is, however, hard to make operational, and does not deal with the problem of the distribution of rewards across units, "conflicts of claim."

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In Starr v Houlden, [1990] 1 SCR 1366, 1990 CanLII 112, Lamer J (as he then was) said that one of the relevant considerations in characterizing legislation for division of powers purposes—that is, deciding the “matter” or “pith and substance” of the legislation—is “what Professor Hogg refers to (at p. 323 [Peter W Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada, 2nd ed (Toronto: Carswell, 1985)]) as a ‘concept of federalism’ comprised of the enduring values in the allocation of power between the two levels of government.” The “enduring values” to which Hogg referred are those discussed by Simeon, excerpted above.

2. For examples of cases in which judges have openly acknowledged the influence of a particular value in resolving a federalism issue, see the reasons for judgment of Ritchie J in Nova Scotia Board of Censors v McNeil, [1978] 2 SCR 662, 1978 CanLII 6 (excerpted in Chapter 11) (community); Estey J in Dominion Stores Ltd v R, [1980] 1 SCR 844, 1979 CanLII 57 (the subject of a note in Chapter 10, Federalism and the Economy) (functional efficiency); and Lamer J (as he then was) in Starr v Houlden (democracy). In other cases, judges may not identify a particular value, yet we may be convinced nonetheless that some such value is at work. Try to identify such cases (and values) as you work through the balance of this chapter and subsequent chapters.

3. Note that the decision to select one of Simeon’s three criteria of choice as most appropriate for a particular kind of federalism dispute does not mean that that dispute is going to be resolved in a particular manner—that is, in favour of either the provincial or the federal level of government. It merely tends to define the terms of the debate. For example, if community is selected as the preferred criterion, the debate will probably be about which conception of community—the local/provincial or the national/federal—should take precedence in the context of that kind of dispute. Similarly, if functional efficiency is selected as the preferred criterion, the debate may well be about whether economies of scale (favouring the federal government) or the pathologies of size (favouring the provincial governments) should be given greater weight in the context in question.

4. Is it possible to generalize about the appropriateness of using one criterion rather than another in certain kinds of cases? Could we argue, for example, that community should be preferred when the impugned legislation relates to the social sphere, functional efficiency when the impugned legislation relates to the economic sphere, and democracy when the impugned legislation relates to the political sphere? Is it even possible to categorize legislation in such a manner?

5. For an analysis of the impact that the nature of a particular head of power in ss 91 and 92 can have on the preference shown by a court for one of Simeon’s criteria of choice over another (as well as on the use of the double aspect and necessarily incidental doctrines considered below), see Jean Leclair, “L’impact de la nature d’une compétence législative sur l’étendue du pouvoir conféré dans le cadre de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867” (“The Impact of the Nature of a Legislative Power on the Scope of Power Conferred Under the Constitution Act, 1867”) (1994) 24 RJT 661. See also Jean Leclair, “The Supreme Court’s Understanding of Federalism: Efficiency at the Expense of Diversity” (2003) 28 Queen’s LJ 411, for another examination of federalism’s normative dimensions.

6. Indigenous communities are notably absent from Simeon’s account. What is the consequence of including Indigenous communities in an account of federalism, especially where, as we shall see, Indigenous peoples are presently listed as a head of federal power under s 91? How might contemporary debates around s 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982, specifically around Indigenous self-government, inform this question? Do Indigenous peoples need constitutionally entrenched powers of self-government, or can Indigenous peoples and communities thrive within the present federal structure?

7. Municipalities are also a head of power (under s 92). Can federalism only serve communities that possess legislative jurisdiction (such as provinces), or can federalism also serve communities that derive their power from federal (as in the case of territories) or provincial legislation (municipalities)? Cities such as Montreal, Toronto, and Vancouver are economic powerhouses and the place where the vast majority of Canadians live, yet these cities have no formal place in the Canadian constitutional order, their powers being derived from provincial legislation. Should Canadian federalism include powers for cities?

III. VALIDITY: CHARACTERIZATION OF LAWS

The courts have developed a number of doctrines based on the division of powers between Parliament and the provincial legislatures to help them deal with challenges to the validity of legislation. By far the most important, and most frequently used, is the pith and substance doctrine, and we begin our survey with it. The other two main doctrines are the double aspect doctrine and the ancillary powers doctrine (or, as it is sometimes called, the necessarily incidental doctrine).

A. PITH AND SUBSTANCE

The pith and substance doctrine evolved out of the fact that ss 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 grant legislative jurisdiction to Parliament and the provincial legislatures in terms of the power to legislate "in relation to matters coming within ... [a prescribed set of] classes of subjects." "Classes of subjects" refers to the spheres of jurisdiction over which each level has been assigned control—for example, "the Regulation of Trade and Commerce" (given to Parliament by s 91(2)) and "Property and Civil Rights in the Province" (given to the provincial legislatures by s 92(13)). Although these spheres of jurisdiction play a critically important role in the resolution of questions of validity, the focus of the pith and substance doctrine as an analytical tool is less on them than it is on the phrase "in relation to matters" In simple terms, the function of this doctrine is to assist courts in determining what the true "matter" of the impugned legislation should be understood to be. That assistance comes in the form of a direction to judges to attend not to everything that that legislation does, appears to do, or might do but to its pith and substance—its dominant characteristic or, in common parlance, what the legislation is really all about. Once they have determined the matter—the pith and substance—of the legislation (a process the courts often refer to as the characterization process), judges can then turn their minds to which of the competing federal and provincial classes of subjects that matter can be said to come within (often referred to as "classification").

We introduce our look at the pith and substance doctrine with excerpts from discussions of the manner in which Canadian courts deal with challenges to the validity of legislation on federalism grounds by two of Canada's leading scholars of Canadian federalism, Katherine Swinton and William Lederman. As you read through these excerpts, you will see that the approaches taken by these two scholars differ in a number of important respects. Perhaps most important, Swinton accepts the dominant role played by the pith and substance doctrine in this area and seeks primarily to explain what it is that courts do when they apply it, whereas Lederman is troubled by several aspects of the pith and substance doctrine as it had come to be applied by the time he wrote and proffers an alternative method of analysis in its place. As you read the excerpt from Lederman's article and the cases that follow, ask yourself whose approach to the pith and substance doctrine you prefer.

The Anatomy of Constitutional Interpretation

Sections 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867

To understand the nature of [constitutional] argument ... it is necessary to begin with sections 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867, for any legal argument must be grounded in the constitutional document. Every federal system requires a distribution of legislative powers between the national and regional governments, and sections 91 and 92 perform that function in Canada. Section 91 sets out a list of 30 classes of subjects which are said to fall exclusively within federal legislative competence. The federal classes of subjects cover a wide range, from "sea coast and inland fisheries," ... to the more frequently litigated "regulation of trade and commerce" in section 91(2) and "the criminal law" in section 91(27). The provinces similarly have "exclusive" jurisdiction over classes of subjects, 15 in number, among which the most important is "property and civil rights in the Province" in section 92(13).

There has been longstanding academic controversy over the status of the federal classes of subjects because of the opening words of section 91, referred to as the "peace, order and good government" or p.o.g.g. power. Some commentators have argued that the federal classes are illustrative only, with the federal government's legislative power "general" in scope, unlimited by anything except the list of provincial powers. Others assert that the classes are an independent source of federal power, and the opening words serve only to give the federal government a residuary power to deal with matters not expressly assigned to provincial or federal jurisdiction. Bora Laskin, as a professor, took the first position—that section 91 was a grant of general power to the federal Parliament—while others, such as Professors Lysyk and Lederman, have maintained that the federal classes of subjects are express grants of power which have primary interpretive force. In fact, the courts do give primary effect to the enumerated powers, using the opening words of section 91 only in limited circumstances.

The classes in sections 91 and 92, while numerous, are not exhaustive of the scope of governmental activity. The terms chosen to describe the grants of power were thought to cover the major areas of governmental activity in 1867, but over time, government has inevitably engaged in new areas of regulation, as the changing society and economy presented problems for public policy not contemplated over one hundred years ago. As a result, when a court is presented with a constitutional challenge to legislation, it will decide whether the impugned legislation falls within the provincial or federal sphere through consideration of the enumerated classes and, as well, the power contained in the opening words of section 91, which comes into play when a legislative matter is not covered by the enumerated powers. For example, aeronautics has been held to be a federal matter under the p.o.g.g. power, as it is a matter that was not allocated by the original distribution of powers (for obvious technological reasons).

In deciding the validity of a law, a court engages in a process of classification to determine whether the law comes within a federal or provincial class of powers. Generally, the argument is framed in terms of competing federal and provincial classifications. ...

Choosing Between Competing Classifications

How does the court choose between these competing classifications? The process is far from mechanistic, for it requires considerations both about the impugned legislation and the meaning of the constitution's language. It can, however, be broken down into three steps [citing A Abel, Laskin's Canadian Constitutional Law, 4th ed, rev (Scarborough, Ont: Carswell, 1975) at 97] ... : identification of the "matter" of the statute, delineation of the scope of the competing classes, and then a determination of the class into which the challenged statute falls. While Abel criticized the tendency ... to collapse this process by describing the matter of the statute in the terms of the classes, such action is inevitable, for the exercise of determining the "matter" or predominant feature of the statute is affected by the ultimate objective of linking the statute to the classes of subjects in the constitution. Nevertheless, Abel's exercise is useful to illustrate the type of questions which a judge, consciously or subconsciously, works through in characterizing legislation in Canadian constitutional law.

In determining the meaning or matter of legislation (Abel's first step), a court looks to a variety of aids. Obviously, the starting place is the statutory context. ...

In addition to the statutory context, a court may look to the purpose of the legislation, as illustrated by its legislative history or by government reports identifying a problem which triggered the legislation. The effects of the legislation may also be relevant. ...

The ultimate decision as to the meaning or matter of the legislation is not uncontroversial, for some judges give greater weight to effects, others to purpose, in deciding meaning, and there has been little discussion of when they will adopt one approach as opposed to the other. The dominant form of inquiry is into purpose—that is, to the problem underlying the legislation which the legislature is trying to address. Inevitably, the focus on purpose or effects turns, in part, on judicial attitudes of deference to legislatures and concerns about the balance of powers in the federal system. Deference to the legislature's avowed purpose, without attention to the effects of the legislation on the other level of government, permits governments to expand their areas of responsibility.

If one turns to the second stage of Abel's inquiry, the scope of the classes of legislative subjects, one finds that, once again, the judges have discretion. Despite the reference to the "exclusivity" of the classes in sections 91 and 92, there is opportunity for extensive overlapping regulation, because the constitution confers jurisdiction to make laws regarding certain classes of subjects, rather than jurisdiction over facts, persons or activities. Similar laws may fit within both federal and provincial heads of power. For example, the federal Parliament can make misleading advertising a crime under its criminal law power, but the provinces may give a civil remedy for the same conduct or even penalize it under their jurisdiction over property and civil rights in section 92(13) of the constitution. The courts often uphold such legislation using the "double aspect doctrine," whereby they acknowledge that some laws may have both federal and provincial purposes. While the Fathers of Confederation may have wished for exclusivity of legislative powers or "watertight compartments" between federal and provincial governments, it became clear early in the interpretation of the constitution that there must be some overlap or entanglement between federal and provincial regulation, for provincial and federal governments often have good reasons, that can be supported by their distinct heads of legislative power, for dealing with the same activity. Even if the courts of an earlier era might have preferred a classical federal system with watertight compartments, they could never ignore the aspect doctrine and, as governments became increasingly interventionist in the second half of the twentieth century, there was a need for more frequent resort to this doctrine, as the opportunities for overlap between the regulation of the two levels of government expanded.

The court's discretion in defining the scope of classes is not unlimited, for precedent plays an important role in constitutional adjudication. ...

History, as well, may play a part in the definition of class boundaries, for some judges look to the meaning of words or practices in 1867 to guide them in interpreting the scope of the classes today.

Precedent and history may assist the courts in defining the classes of powers, but they do not fix the boundaries of classes nor show whether a law should come within one class rather than another. Often, the court's ultimate decision about boundaries and the matters within them is guided by federalism concerns—by beliefs about the optimal balance of power between the federal and provincial governments. In Professor Lederman's words [in "Classification of Laws and the British North America Act," excerpted later in this chapter], the courts should reach their decisions by weighing the values of uniformity and diversity and by following "widely prevailing beliefs." Absent such beliefs, he says that judges should do the following:

In the making of these very difficult relative-value decisions, all that can rightly be required of judges is straight thinking, industry, good faith, and a capacity to discount their own prejudices. No doubt it is also fair to ask that they be men of high attainment, and that they be representative in their thinking of the better standards of their times and their countrymen.

Many would challenge Lederman's premise that there are widely held beliefs on the proper allocation of power in a federal system. Indeed, the constitutional reform debates of the 1960s and 1970s are strong evidence to support the conclusion that there is no one predominant view of the proper allocation of powers in a federal system; rather, there are competing perspectives of the ideal system, with views about the proper distribution of legislative powers shaped by the individual's belief in other values promoted or protected by federalism, such as a stronger national or regional community responsive to the country's needs or loyalties, or increased economic efficiency.

William R Lederman, "Classification of Laws and the British North America Act"

in Continuing Canadian Constitutional Dilemmas (Toronto: Butterworths, 1981) at 236-43 (footnotes omitted)

In the BNA Act [the classification of laws is] found primarily in the well-known sections 91 and 92. These contain respectively enumerations of federal and provincial law-making powers. It is important to realize that these enumerated "subjects" or "matters" are classes of laws, not classes of facts. It is impossible for instance to look at a set of economic facts and say that the activity is trade and commerce within section 91(2) and therefore any law concerning it must be federal law. Rather, one must take a specific law (either actual or proposed) which is relevant to those facts and then ask if that rule is classifiable as a trade or commercial law. The Act very wisely recognizes this necessity in the wording of section 91(2). It does not say just "trade and commerce," it says rather "the regulation of trade and commerce," meaning of course "laws regulating trade and commerce."

The same can be said of all the enumerated classes in both sections 91 and 92. Some of them are obviously classes of laws on their face for they speak of rights, institutions, relations, or operations which have necessarily to be created or provided for by appropriate laws, e.g. taxation, legal tender, patents of invention and discovery, copyrights, marriage and divorce, criminal law, incorporation, municipal institutions, solemnization of marriage, and property and civil rights. The wording used for certain other classes makes them seem classes of fact, but these they cannot be. They must be read as the "trade and commerce" clause is worded: thus "seacoast and inland fisheries" truly means "laws regulating seacoast and inland fisheries." Similarly with such classes or categories as postal service, defence, banking, insolvency, and local works and undertakings. The late Chief Justice Harvey of Alberta seems to have put his finger on the point here being made when he said, in a recent case concerned with "banking" in section 91(15): "The word is used as the Statute [the BNA Act] says as describing a subject for legislation, not a definite object." We do not look just for banking as a matter of economic fact, we must look for regulation of banking as a matter of law.

II. The Application of Sections 91 and 92 of the BNA Act

Certain of the essential principles for the interpretation of the BNA Act now require consideration in detail in light of the foregoing analysis. In the first place the categories of laws enumerated in sections 91 and 92 are not in the logical sense mutually exclusive; they overlap or encroach upon one another in many more respects than is usually realized. To put it another way, many rules of law have one feature that renders them relevant to a provincial class of laws and another feature which renders them equally relevant logically to a federal class of laws. It is inherent in the nature of classification as a process that this should be so, and hence the concluding words of section 91 represent aspiration for the unattainable. It will be recalled that they read as follows: "And any Matter coming within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in this Section shall not be deemed to come within the Class of Matters of a local or private Nature comprised in the Enumeration of the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces." Over eighty years of judicial interpretation have demonstrated conclusively the impossibility of such mutual exclusion.

[Determining] the several features of a law [in order that] it may be classified ... takes us back to the question of the true meaning of the challenged law. In many of the cases we are told that it all depends on what is determined to be the "subject-matter" of the rule. Presumably this phraseology coupling "subject" and "matter" comes from the wording of the opening parts of sections 91 and 92, which speak of "exclusive Legislative Authority" extending "to all Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated" (s. 91), and "Laws in relation to Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated" (s. 92). As has been pointed out, what is really being dealt with is power to enact laws coming within the classes of laws next hereinafter enumerated

This suggests the main thesis of this essay: That a rule of law for purposes of the distribution of legislative powers is to be classified by that feature of its meaning which is judged the most important one in that respect. The thesis so stated points to the heart of the problem of interpretation, i.e. whence come the criteria of relative importance necessary for such a decision? In this inquiry, the judges are beyond the aid of logic, because logic merely displays the many possible classifications, it does not assist in a choice between them. If we assume that the purpose of the constitution is to promote the well-being of the people, then some of the necessary criteria will start to emerge. When a particular rule has features of meaning relevant to both federal and provincial classes of laws, then the question must be asked, Is it better for the people that this thing be done on a national level, or on a provincial level? In other words is the feature of the challenged law which falls within the federal class more important to the well-being of the country than that which falls within the provincial class of laws? Such considerations as the relative value of uniformity and regional diversity, the relative merits of local versus central administration, and the justice of minority claims, would have to be weighed. Inevitably, widely prevailing beliefs in the country about these issues will be influential and presumably the judges should strive to implement such beliefs. Inevitably there will be some tendency for them to identify their own convictions as those which generally prevail or which at least are the right ones. On some matters there will not be an ascertainable general belief anyway. In the making of these very difficult relative-value decisions, all that can rightly be required of judges is straight thinking, industry, good faith, and a capacity to discount their own prejudices. No doubt it is also fair to ask that they be men of high professional attainment, and that they be representative in their thinking of the better standards of their times and their countrymen.

Furthermore, our judges need all the assistance they can be afforded by the provision of data relevant for their constitutional decisions. ... [It is true that] Canadian judges do not have to consider the substantive merit of a challenged law ... ; indeed they are accustomed to labour the point that they are not concerned with whether such a law is good or bad, necessary or unnecessary.

They say in effect that the malady and its proper cure are not their concern, rather that they have to ask only, Who is to be the physician? Yet does not the choice of physician depend to an important degree on the nature of the malady and of the proposed remedy? Admittedly if the challenged law is logically classifiable in only one way there is no problem, but the main thesis here is that such a situation will be rare, and that often so far as logic is concerned the challenged law will have features of meaning relevant to both federal and provincial classes of laws. Then our judges cannot be content simply to ask, Who is to be the physician? They must rather ask, Who is the better physician to prescribe in this way for this malady? ...

Lest a false impression of complete uncertainty and fluidity be conveyed by the foregoing, the importance of the rules of precedent that obtain in our courts should be remembered. However open logically the classification of a given type of law may have been when first it was considered by the highest court, that decision will in all probability foreclose the question of the correct classification should the same type of law come up again. ...

[F]requently there will be new laws ... which the precedents on classification will not touch decisively [Thus, w]ithin the limits set by the terms of particular laws being challenged before them from time to time, the judges frequently confront this question just as starkly as did the original constitution-makers themselves. Further, as conditions change with the years, the relative importance of various classifiable features of particular laws may change as well. For instance the motor vehicle has brought to highway traffic today an interprovincial and international character undreamed of forty years ago; hence regulation of highway-using enterprises is now to be regarded to some extent in a new light. Another way to put this point is to say that changed economic and social conditions and a different moral climate will give to present or proposed laws new features of meaning by which they may be classified and may also alter judgments on the relative importance of their several classifiable features. ... The authority of appropriate precedents then will remove much of the uncertainty just described as implicit in the process of classification but inevitably much unpredictability will remain. The principles of stare decisis are important in our courts, but the degree of certainty and predictability their operation can provide is often much overestimated or misconceived.

The Supreme Court of Canada's general approach to questions of validity in the federalism context was summarized recently by Wagner CJ writing for a majority of the Court in References re Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act, [2021 SCC 11 \[GGPPA References\]](#):

[51] At the first stage of the division of powers analysis, a court must consider the purpose and effects of the challenged statute or provision in order to identify its "pith and substance," or true subject matter: 2018 Securities Reference, at para. 86; Reference re Genetic Non-Discrimination Act, 2020 SCC 17, at paras. 28 and 166. The court does so with a view to identifying the statute's or provision's main thrust, or dominant or most important characteristic: Desgagnés Transport Inc. v. Wärtsilä Canada Inc., 2019 SCC 58, at para. 31. To determine the purpose of the challenged statute or provision, the court can consider both intrinsic evidence, such as the legislation's preamble or purpose clauses, and extrinsic evidence, such as Hansard or minutes of parliamentary committees: Kitkatla Band v. British Columbia (Minister of Small Business, Tourism and Culture), 2002 SCC 31, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 146, at para. 53; Canadian Western Bank, at para. 27. In considering the effects of the challenged legislation, the court can consider both the legal effects, those that flow directly from the provisions of the statute itself, and the practical effects, the "side" effects that flow from the application of the statute: Kitkatla, at para. 54; R. v. Morgentaler, 1993 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 463, at p. 480. The characterization process is not technical or formalistic. A court can look at the background and circumstances of a statute's enactment as well as at the words used in it: Ward v. Canada (AG), 2002 SCC 17, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 569, at para. 18.

[52] Three further points with respect to the identification of the pith and substance are important here. First, the pith and substance of a challenged statute or provision must be described as precisely as possible. A vague or general description is unhelpful, as it can result in the law being superficially assigned to both federal and provincial heads of powers or may exaggerate the extent to which the law extends into the other level of government's sphere of jurisdiction: Desgagnés Transport, at para. 35; Reference re Assisted Human Reproduction Act, 2010 SCC 61, [2010] 3 S.C.R. 457 ("Assisted Human Reproduction Act"), at para. 190. However, precision should not be confused with narrowness. Instead, the pith and substance of a challenged statute or provision should capture the law's essential character in terms that are as precise as the law will allow: Genetic Non-Discrimination, at para. 32. It is only in this manner that a court can determine what the law is in fact "all about": Desgagnés Transport, at para. 35, quoting A. S. Abel, "The Neglected Logic of 91 and 92" (1969), 19 U.T.L.J. 487, at p. 490.

[53] Second, it is permissible in some circumstances for a court to include the legislative choice of means in the definition of a statute's pith and substance, as long as it does not lose sight of the fact that the goal of the analysis is to identify the true subject matter of the challenged statute or provision. In the courts below, a central issue was the permissibility of including the means of the statute in the definition of the subject matter of the GGPPA. In Ward and other cases, this Court cautioned against "confus[ing] the purpose of the legislation with the means used to carry out that purpose": Ward, at para. 25; see also Quebec (Attorney General) v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 14, [2015] 1 S.C.R. 693, at para. 29; Goodwin v. British Columbia (Superintendent of Motor Vehicles), 2015 SCC 46, [2015] 3 S.C.R. 250, at para. 24. However, those cases did not establish a blanket prohibition on considering the means in characterizing the pith and substance of a law. Rather, they stand for the basic proposition that Parliament's or a provincial legislature's choice of means is not determinative of the legislation's true subject matter, although it may sometimes be permissible to consider the choice of means in defining a statute's purpose. This Court has in fact frequently included references to legislative means when defining the pith and substance of laws: Ward, at para. 28; Reference re Firearms Act (Can.), 2000 SCC 31, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 783 ("Firearms"), at paras. 4 and 19; Reference re Employment Insurance Act (Can.), ss. 22 and 23, 2005 SCC 56, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 669, at para. 34; 2011 Securities Reference, at para. 106. And there may be cases in which an impugned statute's dominant characteristic or main thrust is so closely tied to its means that treating the means as irrelevant to the identification of the pith and substance would make it difficult to define the matter of a statute or a provision precisely. In such a case, a broad pith and substance that does not include the means would be the very type of vague and general characterization, like "health" or "the environment," that this Court described as unhelpful in Desgagnés Transport, at paras. 35 and 167 (citing Assisted Human Reproduction Act, at para. 190).

[56] Third, the characterization and classification stages of the division of powers analysis are and must be kept distinct. In other words, the pith and substance of a statute or a provision must be identified without regard to the heads of legislative competence. As Binne J. noted in Chatterjee v. Ontario (Attorney General), 2009 SCC 19, [2009] 1 S.C.R. 624, at para. 16, a failure to keep these two stages of the analysis distinct would create "a danger that the whole exercise will become blurred and overly oriented towards results." The characterization exercise must ultimately be rooted in the purpose and the effects of the impugned statute or provision.

The Morgentaler case, excerpted below, was decided by the Supreme Court of Canada 30 or so years ago. As indicated by the fact that it is cited by Wagner CJ in the extract just quoted, it continues to illustrate the kinds of factors a court can take into account in determining the matter or the pith and substance of a law.

R v Morgentaler

SOPINKA J (Lamer CJ and La Forest, L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin, Iacobucci, and Major JJ concurring):

The question in this appeal is whether the Nova Scotia Medical Services Act, RSNS 1989, c. 281, and the regulation made under the Act, NS Reg. 152/89, are ultra vires the province of Nova Scotia on the ground that they are in pith and substance criminal law. The Act and regulation make it an offence to perform an abortion outside a hospital.

Facts and Legislation

In January 1988, this Court ruled that the Criminal Code provisions relating to abortion were unconstitutional because they violated women's Charter guarantee of security of the person: R v. Morgentaler, [1988] 1 SCR 30 (Morgentaler (1988)). At the same time the Court reaffirmed its earlier decision that the provisions were a valid exercise of the federal criminal law power, Morgentaler v. The Queen, [1976] 1 SCR 616 (Morgentaler (1975)). ... It was no longer an offence to obtain or perform an abortion in a clinic such as those run by the respondent. A year later, in January 1989, [the respondent confirmed an intention to establish] a free-standing abortion clinic in Halifax. ...

On March 16, 1989, the ... Nova Scotia government ... approved two identical regulations ... which prohibited the performance of an abortion anywhere other than in a place approved as a hospital under the Hospitals Act. At the same time it made a regulation ... denying medical services insurance coverage for abortions performed outside a hospital. These regulations are referred to collectively as the "March regulations." ...

... [A] court challenge to the March regulations was still outstanding on June 6, 1989, when the Minister of Health and Fitness introduced the Medical Services Act for first reading. The Act ... received third reading and Royal Assent on June 15, the last day of the legislative session. The relevant portions of the Act are as follows:

2. The purpose of this Act is to prohibit the privatization of the provision of certain medical services in order to maintain a single high-quality health-care delivery system for all Nova Scotians.

3. In this Act,

(a) "designated medical service" means a medical service designated pursuant to the regulations

4. No person shall perform or assist in the performance of a designated medical service other than in a hospital approved as a hospital pursuant to the Hospitals Act.

5. Notwithstanding the Health Services and Insurance Act, a person who performs or for whom is performed a medical service contrary to this Act is not entitled to reimbursement pursuant to that Act.

6(1) Every person who contravenes this Act is guilty of an offence and liable upon summary conviction to a fine of not less than ten thousand dollars nor more than fifty thousand dollars

7. Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, where designated medical services are being performed contrary to this Act, the Minister may, at any time, apply to a judge of the Supreme Court for an injunction, and the judge may make any order that in the opinion of the judge the case requires.

8(1) The Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister, may make regulations

(a) after consultation by the Minister with the Medical Society of Nova Scotia, designating a medical service for the purpose of this Act

The Medical Society was consulted after the passage of the Act, and a list of medical services was finalized. On July 20, 1989, the Medical Services Designation Regulation, NS Reg. 152/89, was made, designating the following medical services for the purposes of the Act:

(a) Arthroscopy

(b) Colonoscopy (which, for greater certainty, does not include flexible sigmoidoscopy)

(c) Upper Gastro-Intestinal Endoscopy

(d) Abortion, including a therapeutic abortion, but not including emergency services related to a spontaneous abortion or related to complications arising from a previously performed abortion

(e) Lithotripsy

(f) Liposuction

(g) Nuclear Medicine

(h) Installation or Removal of Intraocular Lenses

(i) Electromyography, including Nerve Conduction Studies

The March regulations were revoked on the same day Item (d) of the new regulation continued the March regulations' prohibition of the performance of abortions outside hospitals. Section 5 of the Act continued the denial of health insurance coverage for abortions performed in violation of the prohibition.

Despite these actions, Dr. Morgentaler opened his clinic in Halifax as predicted. ... He was charged with 14 counts of unlawfully performing a designated medical service ... contrary to s. 6 of the Medical Services Act. ...

... Dr. Morgentaler did not dispute that he had performed the abortions as alleged. He argued, instead, that the Act and the regulation were inconsistent with the Constitution of Canada [as, inter alia] ... an unlawful encroachment on the federal Parliament's exclusive criminal law jurisdiction. He also argued that the regulation was an abuse of discretion by the provincial cabinet and therefore in excess of its jurisdiction. ...

Analysis

A. General

The appellant argued that the Medical Services Act and the regulation are valid provincial legislation It relies particularly on heads (7), (13), and (16) of s. 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867, which give the province exclusive legislative authority over [hospitals, property and civil rights, and generally all matters of a merely local or private nature]

The ground on which the legislation is challenged is head (27) of s. 91, which reserves "The Criminal Law ..." to Parliament. On the basis of the analysis that follows I conclude that the Medical Services Act and Medical Services Designation Regulation are criminal law in pith and substance and consequently ultra vires the province of Nova Scotia. The appeal must therefore be dismissed. ...

B. Classification of Laws

(1) "What's the 'Matter'?"

Classification of a law for purposes of federalism involves first identifying the "matter" of the law and then assigning it to one of the "classes of subjects" in respect to which the federal and provincial governments have legislative authority under ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867. ...

A law's "matter" is its leading feature or true character, often described as its pith and substance. Union Colliery Co. of British Columbia v. Bryden, [1899] AC 580 (PC), at p. 587; see also Whitbread v. Walley, [1990] 3 SCR 1273, at p. 1286. There is no single test for a law's pith and substance. The approach must be flexible and a technical, formalistic approach is to be avoided ... While both the purpose and effect of the law are relevant considerations in the process of characterization ... , it is often the case that the legislation's dominant purpose or aim is the key to constitutional validity. ...

(2) Purpose and Effect

(a) "Legal Effect" or Strict Legal Operation

Evidence of the "effect" of legislation can be relevant in two ways: to establish "legal effect" and to establish "practical effect." The analysis of pith and substance necessarily starts with looking at the legislation itself, in order to determine its legal effect. "Legal effect" or "strict legal operation" refers to how the legislation as a whole affects the rights and liabilities of those subject to its terms, and is determined from the terms of the legislation itself. ... Legal effect is often a good indicator of the purpose of the legislation ... , but is relevant in constitutional characterization even when it is not fully intended or appreciated by the enacting body. ...

The analysis of pith and substance is not, however, restricted to the four corners of the legislation (see, e.g., Reference re Anti-Inflation Act, [1976] 2 SCR 373, at pp. 388-89). Thus the court "will look beyond the direct legal effects to inquire into the social or economic purposes which the statute was enacted to achieve," its background and the circumstances surrounding its enactment ... and, in appropriate cases, will consider evidence of the second form of "effect," the actual or predicted practical effect of the legislation in operation The ultimate long-term, practical effect of the legislation will in some cases be irrelevant ...

(b) The Use of Extrinsic Materials

In determining the background, context and purpose of challenged legislation, the court is entitled to refer to extrinsic evidence of various kinds provided it is relevant and not inherently unreliable. Reference re Residential Tenancies Act, 1979, [1981] 1 SCR 714, at p. 723, per Dickson J. This clearly includes related legislation ... , and evidence of the "mischief" at which the legislation is directed: Alberta Bank Taxation Reference, [Reference re Alberta Legislation; AG Alberta v AG Can, [1939] AC 117 (PC)], at pp. 130-33. It also includes legislative history ... ; as Ritchie J, concurring in Reference re Anti-Inflation Act, supra, wrote at p. 437, it is "not only permissible but essential" to consider the material the legislature had before it when the statute was enacted.

... [U]ntil recently the courts have balked at admitting evidence of legislative debates and speeches. Such evidence was described by Dickson J in Reference re Residential Tenancies Act, 1979, supra, at p. 721 as "inadmissible as having little evidential weight," and was excluded in Reference re Upper Churchill Water Rights Reversion Act, ... [[1984] 1 SCR 297, 1984 CanLII 17], at p. 319, and Attorney General of Canada v. Reader's Digest Association (Canada) Ltd., [1961] SCR 775. The main criticism of such evidence has been that it cannot represent the "intent" of the legislature, an incorporeal body, but that is equally true of other forms of legislative history. Provided that the court remains mindful of the limited reliability and weight of Hansard evidence, it should be admitted as relevant to both the background and the purpose of legislation. Indeed, its admissibility in constitutional cases to aid in determining the background and purpose of legislation now appears well established. ...

I would therefore hold ... that the excerpts from Hansard were properly admitted by the trial judge in this case. In a nutshell, this evidence demonstrates that members of all parties in the House understood the central feature of the proposed law to be prohibition of Dr. Morgentaler's proposed clinic on the basis of a common and almost unanimous opposition to abortion clinics per se. ...

(3) Scope of the Applicable Heads of Power

(a) The Criminal Law

Section 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867 gives the federal Parliament exclusive legislative jurisdiction over criminal law in the widest sense of the term. ...

[Justice Sopinka's discussion of the criminal law cases is omitted. Criminal law is defined, for the purposes of the division of powers, as any law that has as its dominant characteristic the prohibition of an activity, subject to penal sanctions, for a public purpose such as peace, order, security, health, or morality.]

(b) Provincial Health Jurisdiction

The provinces have general legislative jurisdiction over hospitals by virtue of s. 92(7) of the Constitution Act, 1867, and over the medical profession and the practice of medicine by virtue of ss. 92(13) and (16). Section 92(16) also gives them general jurisdiction over health matters within the province. ...

In addition, there is no dispute that the heads of s. 92 invoked by the appellant confer on the provinces jurisdiction over health care in the province generally

(c) The Regulation of Abortion

In the UK and Canada, the prohibition of abortion with penal consequences has long been considered a subject for the criminal law. ... As Dickson J (as he then was) said in Morgentaler (1975), supra, at p. 672, "since Confederation, and indeed before, the law of Canada has regarded as criminal, interference with pregnancy, however early it may take place."

The two Morgentaler decisions focus attention on the purpose or concern of abortion legislation to determine if it is truly criminal law: Is the performance or procurement of abortion prohibited as socially undesirable conduct? Is protecting the state interest in the foetus or balancing the interests of the foetus against those of women seeking abortions a primary objective of the legislation? Is the protection of the woman's health only an ancillary concern? And are other provincial concerns such as the establishment of hospitals or the regulation of the medical profession or the practice thereof merely incidental?

... [A]ny provincial jurisdiction to regulate the delivery of abortion services must be solidly anchored in ... [the province's] jurisdiction to legislate in relation to such matters as health, hospitals, the practice of medicine and health care policy.

C. Application of the Principles to the Case at Bar

An examination of the terms and legal effect of the Medical Services Act and the Medical Services Designation Regulation, their history and purpose and the circumstances surrounding their enactment leads to the conclusion that the legislation's central purpose and dominant characteristic is the restriction of abortion as a socially undesirable practice which should be suppressed or punished. Although the evidence of the legislation's practical effect is equivocal, it is not necessary to establish that its immediate or future practical impact will actually be to restrict access to abortions in order to sustain this conclusion.

(1) Legal Effect: The Four Corners of the Legislation

Starting with the terms of the legislation, the Medical Services Act makes it an offence subject to significant fines (s. 6) to perform abortions or other services designated by the Medical Services Designation Regulation outside a hospital approved as such under the Hospitals Act (s. 4). It is impossible to tell from the legislation itself whether this amounts to a total prohibition of abortion (which all parties concede would be ultra vires the province), since extrinsic evidence is necessary to establish that abortions are available in Nova Scotia hospitals. The Act also denies public health insurance coverage for the performer and recipient of such services (s. 5), and provides for injunctive relief against violations of its terms (s. 7). It is entitled "An Act to Restrict the Privatization of Medical Services," and its purpose is expressed to be the prohibition of the privatization of certain medical services in order to maintain a single high-quality health care delivery system in the province (s. 2) ...

The majority in the Court of Appeal conceded that the province had the legislative authority to pass a law in the present form. I acknowledge that the legislation has the legal effect of preventing privatization by prohibiting the private (i.e., outside a hospital) provision of the designated services. But the legislation expressly prohibits the performance of abortions in certain circumstances with penal consequences, a subject, as I have said, traditionally regarded as part of the criminal law. ... The present legislation, prohibiting traditionally criminal conduct, is therefore of questionable validity on its face

(2) Beyond the Four Corners

(a) Duplication of Criminal Code Provisions

Once the legal effect of legislation is ascertained, it can be compared with that of any relevant legislation passed by the other level of government ... Provincial legislation has been held invalid when it employs language "virtually indistinguishable" from that found in the Criminal Code The duplication of Criminal Code language may raise an inference that the province has stepped into the realm of the criminal law; the more exact the reproduction, the stronger the inference

The guiding principle is that the provinces may not invade the criminal field by attempting to stiffen, supplement or replace the criminal law ... or to fill perceived defects or gaps therein The legal effect of s. 251 and the present legislation, each taken as a whole, is quite different: among other things, s. 251 made it an offence for a woman to obtain an abortion ... ; and the present legislation prohibits other services besides abortion and directly concerns public health insurance coverage. ... [H]owever, ... in so far as it prohibits abortion clinics the legal effect of the medical services legislation is completely embraced by s. 251 and, had the latter provision not been struck down, the present legislation would have been redundant in that respect

In my opinion the overlap of legal effects between the now defunct criminal provision and the Nova Scotia legislation is capable of supporting an inference that the legislation was designed to serve a criminal law purpose. It is a piece in the puzzle which along with the other evidence may demonstrate the true purpose of the legislation.

(b) Background and Surrounding Circumstances

The events leading up to and including the enactment of the Act and regulation do not support the appellant's assertions that the pith and substance of the legislation relate to provincial jurisdiction over health. On the contrary, they strengthen the inference that the impugned Act and regulation were designed to serve a criminal law purpose.

(i) The Course of Events

It is clear that the catalyst for government action was the rumour and later announcement of Dr. Morgentaler's intention to open his clinic. The Crown concedes this. The respondent was clearly, as the trial judge concluded, a "mischief" against which the legislation was directed. The government knew of Dr. Morgentaler's intention to open a clinic by some time in January 1989. It responded with the March regulations, which prohibited abortions outside hospitals and "de-insured" such services. ... The March regulations were the first response to Dr. Morgentaler's announcement, and the subsequent legislation was the continuation and consolidation of that response. Together they constituted a hastily devised plan aimed directly at ridding the province of Dr. Morgentaler and his proposed clinic. The course of events suggests that this purpose was the principal purpose of the legislation and contributes to the impression that privatization and quality assurance were only incidental concerns at best.

(ii) Hansard

I have reviewed the evidence of the legislative debates on the Medical Services Act, and have concluded that they give a clear picture of what the members of the House, both government and opposition, saw as being in issue. ...

The Hansard evidence demonstrates both that the prohibition of Dr. Morgentaler's clinic was the central concern of the members of the legislature who spoke, and that there was a common and emphatically expressed opposition to free-standing abortion clinics per se. The Morgentaler clinic was viewed, it appears, as a public evil which should be eliminated. The concerns to which the appellant submits the legislation is primarily directed—privatization, cost and quality of health care, and a policy of preventing a two-tier system of access to medical services—were conspicuously absent throughout most of the legislative proceedings. ...

The appellant argues that even if the object of the legislation was to suppress free-standing abortion clinics on grounds of public morals, this is not fatal to provincial jurisdiction. Although there has been some recognition of a provincial "morality" power, it is clear that the exercise of such a power must be firmly anchored in an independent provincial head of power.

While legislation which authorizes the establishment and enforcement of a local standard of morality does not ipso facto "invade the field of criminal law" (see Nova Scotia Board of Censors v. McNeil, [[1978] 2 SCR 662, 1978 CanLII 6], at pp. 691-92 [SCR]), it cannot be denied that interdiction of conduct in the interest of public morals was and remains one of the classic ends of the criminal law.

In view of the foregoing, there is a strong inference that the purpose of the legislation and its true nature relate to a matter within the federal head of power in respect of criminal law. In order to determine whether this is its dominant purpose or characteristic, it is necessary to compare the above indicia of federal subject matter with indications of provincial objectives.

(iii) Searching for Provincial Objectives

At trial the appellant presented evidence that the Act's objectives were to prevent privatization and the consequent development of a two-tier system of medical service delivery, to ensure the delivery of high-quality health care, and to rationalize the delivery of medical services so as to avoid duplication and reduce public costs. [T]his evidence was not established at trial to have been the basis for the impugned legislation. Indeed, Kennedy Prov. Ct. J considered the evidence and found that any privatization concerns were "incidental to the paramount purpose of the legislation."

First, ... there is no evidence in the record to indicate that abortions performed in clinics like Dr. Morgentaler's pose any danger to the health of women. Counsel conceded that the quality of medical service in free-standing abortion clinics is comparable to that available in hospitals.

Second, the government did not express concerns about privatization in relation to this legislation or the March regulations until the Act was moved for second reading.

Third, it is significant that there is no evidence of any prior study or consultation regarding the cost-effectiveness or quality of medical services delivered in private clinics.

The lack of prior study or consultation is not raised to show that the province acted indiscreetly or ineffectually in pursuing provincial objectives, but rather to indicate that the evidence simply does not support the submission that these provincial objectives were the basis for the legislative action in question.

Another factor I consider relevant is that the "cost-effectiveness" rationale appears to be divorced from reality. Dr. Morgentaler's clinic will not represent a direct increase in the cost to the province of the provision of health care services.

A fifth consideration is the list of designated medical services itself. There is no apparent link between the different services. The only common denominator suggested by the appellant is that the government anticipated that these services might be attractive to private facilities. The appellant argued at trial and maintained before us, however, that the government's policy was to oppose the performance of any and all surgical procedures outside hospital. If that were the case, one might wonder why the Act did not prohibit the performance of surgical procedures generally outside a hospital. Designating nine apparently unrelated procedures does not accomplish this purpose.

If the means employed by a legislature to achieve its purported objectives do not logically advance those objectives, this may indicate that the purported purpose masks the legislation's true purpose. In Westendorp v. The Queen, [[1983] 1 SCR 43, 1983 CanLII 1], Laskin CJ held that it was specious to regard a by-law which prohibited street prostitution as relating to control of the streets, since if that were its true purpose, "it would have dealt with congregation of persons on the streets or with obstruction, unrelated to what the congregating or obstructing persons say or otherwise do" (at p. 51). Here, one would expect that if the province's policy were to prohibit the performance of any surgical procedures outside hospitals, the legislation would have simply done so.

Finally, although I put little weight on this factor, I agree with both courts below that the relatively severe penalties provided for by the Act are relevant to its constitutional characterization. Section 6(1) of the Act prescribes fines of $10,000 to $50,000 for each infraction of the Act. Kennedy Prov. Ct. J and Freeman JA considered the relative severity of the fines as one indication that the fines were not simply measures to enforce a regulatory scheme, but penalties to punish abortion clinics as inherently wrong. Of course, s. 92(15) of the Constitution Act, 1867 allows the provinces to impose punishment to enforce valid provincial law, and the mere addition of penal sanctions to an otherwise valid provincial legislative scheme does not make the legislation criminal law . . . However, the unusual severity of penalties may be taken into account in characterizing legislation . . .

D. Conclusion

(1) Pith and Substance

This legislation deals, by its terms, with a subject historically considered to be part of the criminal law—the prohibition of the performance of abortions with penal consequences. It is thus suspect on its face. Its legal effect partially reproduces that of the now defunct s. 251 of the Criminal Code . . . Its legislative history, the course of events leading up to the Act's passage and the making of NS Reg. 152/89, the Hansard excerpts and the absence of evidence that privatization and the cost and quality of health care services were anything more than incidental concerns, lead to the conclusion that the Medical Services Act and the Medical Services Designation Regulation were aimed primarily at suppressing the perceived public harm or evil of abortion clinics. . . The primary objective of the legislation was to prohibit abortions outside hospitals as socially undesirable conduct, and any concern with the safety and security of pregnant women or with health care policy, hospitals or the regulation of the medical profession was merely ancillary. This legislation involves the regulation of the place where an abortion may be obtained, not from the viewpoint of health care policy, but from the viewpoint of public wrongs or crimes . . .

... I find unpersuasive the argument that this legislation is solidly anchored in s. 92(7), (13) or (16) of the Constitution Act, 1867. There is nothing on the surface of the legislation or in the background facts leading up to its enactment to convince me that it is designed to protect the integrity of Nova Scotia's health care system by preventing the emergence of a two-tiered system of delivery, to ensure the delivery of high-quality health care, or to rationalize the delivery of medical services so as to avoid duplication and reduce public health care costs. Any such objectives are clearly incidental to the central feature of the legislation, which is the prohibition of abortions outside hospitals as socially undesirable conduct subject to punishment. ...

Appeal dismissed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The characterization of a law's pith and substance is a crucial step in the determination of its constitutional validity. Yet, as Swinton noted above, the choice between competing characterizations of a law is not a "mechanistic" exercise. Lederman also emphasized that logic cannot be determinative: it "merely displays the many possible classifications, it does not assist in a choice between them." The choice between competing characterizations will inevitably be influenced by background understandings of federalism and the values described by Simeon that ought to be furthered by a federal constitutional design. What values do you think influenced Sopinka J's characterization of the Medical Services Act, RSNS 1989, c 281, as invalid criminal law rather than a valid law in relation to medical services? Were these values ones that ought to influence the interpretation of the division of powers?

2. If the province had evidence that the medical procedures listed in the Act posed greater dangers when performed outside hospitals, would the result have been different? If not, what other sorts of evidence do you think would have been necessary to ground the Act in provincial jurisdiction?

3. Justice Sopinka declared the Medical Services Act ultra vires the Nova Scotia legislature even though, on its face, the Act appeared to deal exclusively with a matter within provincial legislative competence: the delivery of medical services. In fact, s 2 of the Act contained a provision explicitly stating that "[t]he purpose of this Act is to prohibit the privatization of certain medical services in order to maintain a single high-quality health-care delivery system for all Nova Scotians." In essence, Sopinka J determined that the title of the Act, its stated purpose, and its terms masked its real purpose: punishing the provision of abortion services as a public evil. When the courts determine that legislation on its face addresses matters that are within its jurisdiction, but in pith and substance it is directed at matters outside its jurisdiction, they normally say the legislation is "colourable." In its decision in Reference re Firearms Act (Can), 2000 SCC 31, the Supreme Court of Canada provided the following description of the colourability doctrine in the context of a broader discussion of the way in which a law's effects are taken into account in the characterization process:

[18] Determining the legal effects of a law involves considering how the law will operate and how it will affect Canadians. ... Within its constitutional sphere, Parliament is the judge of whether a measure is likely to achieve its intended purposes; efficaciousness is not relevant to the Court's division of powers analysis Rather, the inquiry is directed to how the law sets out to achieve its purpose in order to better understand its "total meaning" In some cases, the effects of the law may suggest a purpose other than that which is stated in the law In other words, a law may say that it intends to do one thing and actually do something else. Where the effects of the law diverge substantially from the stated aim, it is sometimes said to be "colourable."

In a puzzling portion of the Morgentaler judgment not reproduced above, Sopinka J stated that the colourability doctrine was not relevant to his analysis. Arguably, his judgment is a classic example of a court not allowing a legislature to covertly regulate a matter through colourable legislation when it lacks jurisdiction to regulate that matter openly. Why would he not have thought it appropriate to apply the colourability doctrine?

4. Justice Sopinka canvassed a wide range of evidence in reaching his conclusion that the dominant characteristic of the Medical Services Act was the criminal suppression of the provision of abortion services. He considered the text of the legislation, the events leading up to its enactment, the related policy documents prepared by the government, statements made in the legislature, the law's effects, and the plausibility of its stated purpose. The law with respect to the evidence that can be brought to bear in characterizing legislation has recently been summarized by Karakatsanis J in Reference re Genetic Non-Discrimination Act, 2020 SCC 17:

[34] To determine a law's purpose, a court looks to both intrinsic and extrinsic evidence. Intrinsic evidence includes the text of the law, and provisions that expressly set out the law's purpose, as well as the law's title and structure. Extrinsic evidence includes statements made during parliamentary proceedings and drawn from government publications: Firearms Reference, at para. 17.

5. Morgentaler exemplifies two common features of division of powers litigation in which the validity of legislation is called into question. One is the tendency of the opposing lawyers to present to the court two very different characterizations of the impugned legislation, one of which will provide the court with a basis on which to strike it down and the other of which will provide the court with a basis on which to uphold it. The second is a willingness on the part of courts to accept that their job is simply to choose between those two opposing characterizations. In the earlier case, Dr Morgentaler's lawyer argued that the appropriate characterization of the Medical Services Act was "[prohibiting] the performance of abortions outside hospitals with a view to suppressing or punishing what it perceives to be the socially undesirable conduct of abortion" (at 488), whereas the government's lawyer argued that it was "[regulating] the place for delivery of a medical service with a view to controlling the quality and nature of its health care delivery system" (at 488), and Sopinka J defined the issue as being which of the two characterizations the Court should accept. Although it may be inevitable that the opposing lawyers would approach such cases in this way, it is not inevitable that the courts should understand their role in terms of simply choosing between the two options presented to them. It is clearly open to them to come up with their own characterization. Assuming that it is not inevitable, do you think it is advisable for the courts to understand their role in such limited terms?

In Reference re Genetic Non-Discrimination Act, three sets of reasons apply essentially the same approach to characterization and yet arrive at three distinct renditions of the pith and substance of the relevant legislation. How do we account for this? Does Lederman's approach, set out above, assist?

6. On occasion, precedent will play an overriding role in the characterization process. A good example of this having occurred is the Supreme Court of Canada's decision in Reference re Securities Act, 2011 SCC 66, a case excerpted in Chapter 10.

Given the passage of time since the Constitution Act, 1867 was enacted, it is rare nowadays for there to be any serious dispute about the scope and meaning of the competing heads of power in federalism cases in which the validity of legislation is called into question. Most such cases therefore turn on which characterization of the impugned legislation—which pith and substance or matter—the court accepts. However, courts are still on occasion asked to define the scope and meaning of one of the heads of power in s 91 or 92. That occurred in a reference by the Quebec government to the Quebec Court of Appeal that ended up in the Supreme Court of Canada, Reference re Employment Insurance Act (Can), ss 22 and 23, 2005 SCC 56, excerpted below. The specific head of power at issue in that case was s 91(2A), which grants jurisdiction to Parliament over unemployment insurance. As noted in Chapter 6, s 91(2A) was added to the list of heads of power in s 91 in 1940 after the Privy Council struck down the Employment and Social Insurance Act, SC 1935, c 38, a federal statute enacted in 1934 as part of Canada's "New Deal" that represented the first attempt to provide unemployment insurance to Canadian workers. The Privy Council held that the statute invaded provincial jurisdiction over "Property and Civil Rights" in s 92(13). (This decision, Canada (AG) v Ontario (AG), [1937 CanLII 363, \[1937\] AC 355 \(UKJCPC\)](#), is excerpted in Chapter 6, The 1930s: The Depression and the New Deal.)

As you will see from the excerpted passages below, the primary interpretive question raised by the 2005 reference was whether the courts should be bound, as the government of Quebec argued, to give effect to the particular conception of unemployment insurance that the federal and provincial politicians responsible for adding s 91(2A) to the federal catalogue of powers in 1940 had in mind. The Quebec Court of Appeal had answered that question in the affirmative, and the relatively narrow interpretation of s 91(2A) to which that answer led effectively resolved the case for that court in favour of the provincial government and resulted in the impugned provisions being struck down. The fact that the Quebec Court of Appeal had accepted the government of Quebec's argument was noteworthy given the limited weight that arguments based on the intent of the drafters—known as originalism in the United States, where it has a great deal of support among judges and scholars alike—have traditionally been accorded by Canadian courts. The appeal of that judgment gave the Supreme Court of Canada an opportunity to consider the appropriateness of this change in approach to arguments based on the drafter's intent in the context of Canada's Constitution.

Reference re Employment Insurance Act (Can), SS 22 and 23 2005 SCC 56

[At issue in this case was the validity of the maternity and parental benefit provisions of the Employment Insurance Act, SC 1996, c 23, enacted in 1971 and 1984, respectively. The position of the Quebec government was that these provisions were directed at supporting families with children and therefore fell within s 92(13), "Property and Civil Rights," or s 92(16), "Generally All Matters of a Merely Local or Private Nature in the Province." The position of the federal government was that the provisions were directed at providing replacement income for working mothers and parents when their employment is interrupted as a result of the birth or adoption of a child and fell within "Unemployment Insurance" in s 91(2A). As noted above, the Quebec Court of Appeal accepted the argument of the Quebec government and struck down the impugned provisions, and the federal government appealed.]

Justice Deschamps, writing for a unanimous panel of seven members of the Supreme Court, allowed the federal government's appeal and upheld the impugned provisions. She began her analysis by characterizing the provisions as being "in pith and substance [mechanisms] for providing replacement income when an interruption of employment occurs as a result of the birth or arrival of a child" (at para 75). She then addressed the question of whether s 91(2A) could be understood broadly enough to support provisions so characterized.]

DESCHAMPS J (McLachlin CJ and Binnie, LeBel, Fish, Abella, and Charron JJ concurring):

2.1 Principles of Interpretation

[9] ... [I]n order to identify the head of power, the Court takes a progressive approach to ensure that Confederation can be adapted to new social realities. The Court has on numerous occasions cited the "living tree" metaphor, and we need not revisit it here: Reference re Same-Sex Marriage [2004 SCC 79, [2004] 3 SCR 698], at para. 29. While the debates or correspondence relating to the constitutional amendment are relevant to the analysis as regards the context, they are not conclusive as to the precise scope of the legislative competence. They reflect, to a large extent, the society of the day, whereas the competence is essentially dynamic ... In giving them predominant weight, the Quebec Court of Appeal adopted an original intent approach to interpreting the Constitution rather than the progressive approach the Court has taken for a number of years.

[10] A progressive interpretation cannot, however, be used to justify Parliament in encroaching on a field of provincial jurisdiction. To derive the evolution of constitutional powers from the structure of Canada is delicate, as what that structure is will often depend on a given court's view of what federalism is. What are regarded as the characteristic features of federalism may vary from one judge to another, and will be based on political rather than legal notions. The task of maintaining the balance between federal and provincial powers falls primarily to governments. If an issue comes before a court, the court must refer to the framers' description of the power in order to identify its essential components, and must be guided by the way in which courts have interpreted the power in the past. In this area, the meaning of the words used may be adapted to modern-day realities, in a manner consistent with the separation of powers of the executive, legislative and judicial branches.

[11] Some heads that set forth narrow powers leave little room for interpretation. Other, broader, heads result in legislation that can have several aspects.

2.3.1 Background

[37] When the Privy Council declared the Employment and Social Insurance Act to be unconstitutional, there was no doubt that, prima facie, measures relating to insurance, and in particular measures relating to contracts of employment, were in relation to property and civil rights and were within the exclusive competence of the provincial legislatures Because the UIA [Unemployment Insurance Act], 1940 essentially reiterated the provisions of the Employment and Social Insurance Act, it cannot be denied that it affected contracts of employment or insurance relating to those contracts. This means that when the Constitution was amended, a portion of the jurisdiction over property and civil rights was detached so that the aspects relating to unemployment insurance could be assigned to Parliament.

[38] There can be no doubt that a public unemployment insurance plan, in addition to the fact that it concerns insurance relating to contracts of employment, is also a social measure. Characterizing it in this way does not mean, however, that it can be associated exclusively with any one head of power. The term "social measure" has a number of aspects that may be associated just as validly with property and civil rights as with unemployment insurance. ... The question that must be asked in order to determine the head of power to which maternity benefits relate is whether the provision, in pith and substance, falls within the jurisdiction assigned by the constitutional amendment.

[39] The Attorney General of Quebec submits that the jurisdiction over unemployment insurance is limited by the parameters defined in the early legislation. Under those Acts, to be entitled to benefits, insured persons had to have lost their employment involuntarily, and had to be capable of and available for work. In so arguing, the Attorney General of Quebec equates the field of jurisdiction assigned by s. 91(2A) of the Constitution Act, 1867 to the initial exercise of the federal power. This approach is inappropriate in more than one respect, the most obvious being that the eligibility requirements established in the scheme of the UIA, 1940 may be modified, provided that the scheme still represents a valid exercise of the jurisdiction over unemployment insurance. Thus, no one would think of questioning the right to modify the eligibility requirements to calculate insurable periods in hours rather than weeks. Such a modification would plainly make the scheme more accessible to part-time workers, but it would in no way change the fundamental nature of unemployment insurance. The question is therefore not the way in which Parliament initially exercised its jurisdiction, but the scope of its jurisdiction over unemployment insurance.

[40] While the views of the framers are not conclusive where constitutional interpretation is concerned, the context in which the amendment was made is nonetheless relevant. If the objectives of the framers are taken as a starting point, it will be easier to determine the scope of the jurisdiction that was transferred, and then to determine how it may be adapted to contemporary realities.

2.3.2 Circumstances of the Transfer of Jurisdiction

[43] In essence, the purpose of the transfer of jurisdiction was to equip Canada with the tools it needed to mitigate the effects of anticipated unemployment by providing certain classes of unemployed persons with benefits and by setting up job search centres. The transfer of jurisdiction was to be a tool for internal organization involving both short-term relief measures, namely benefits, and medium-term measures, namely job placement services for the unemployed.

[44] ... The nature of unemployment has changed as prevailing conditions in Canada, and the needs of Canadians, have changed. Parliament must adapt its actions to new circumstances, in a manner consistent with the limits resulting from the constitutional division of powers. In a case such as this, where a specific power has been detached from a more general power, the specific power cannot be evaluated in relation to the general power, because any evolution would then be regarded as an encroachment. Rather, it is necessary to consider the essential elements of the power and to ascertain whether the impugned measure is consistent with the natural evolution of that power.

2.3.3 Essential Elements of Unemployment Insurance

[45] On the one hand, no constitutional head of power is static. On the other hand, the evolution of society cannot justify changing the nature of a power assigned by the Constitution to either level of government. ...

[46] In constitutional interpretation, the essential elements of a power are determined by adopting a generous reading of the words used, taken in their strictly legal context. The interpretation may also be expanded by having regard to relevant historical elements.

[47] The jurisdiction over unemployment insurance must be interpreted progressively and generously. It must be considered in the context of a measure that applies throughout Canada and the purpose of which, according to the intention of the framers of the constitutional amendment, is to curb the destitution caused by unemployment and provide a framework for workers' re-entry into the labour market.

[66] The extent of the protection required by Canadian society changes with the needs of the labour force. A growing portion of the labour force is made up of women, and women have particular needs that are of concern to society as a whole. An interruption of employment due to maternity can no longer be regarded as a matter of individual responsibility. Women's connection to the labour market is well established, and their inclusion in the expression "unemployed persons" is as natural an extension as the extension involving other classes of insured persons who lose their employment income. To limit a public unemployment insurance plan, from a constitutional perspective, to cases in which contributors are actively seeking employment or are available for employment would amount to denying its social function. The social nature of unemployment insurance requires that Parliament be able to adapt the plan to the new realities of the workplace. Some eligibility requirements derive from the essence of the unemployment concept, while other requirements are, rather, mechanisms that reflect a social policy choice linked to the implementation of the plan.

2.3.6 Conclusion with Respect to the Identification of the Head of Power [67] The Attorney General of Quebec submits that the social program under which maternity benefits are paid is, in pith and substance, a measure to assist families. While that is an undeniable effect, it is not the pith and substance of the program. The EIA [Employment Insurance Act, SC 1996, c. 23] governs the entitlement to benefits: it entitles pregnant women to receive benefits when they sustain an interruption of earnings. However, not all the various aspects of interruptions of work associated with maternity relate to unemployment insurance. Maternity leave is not governed by the EIA. Parliament does not grant female workers either maternity leave or job security. Because the provinces have a general power in relation to civil rights, it is the provinces that are responsible for establishing most of the rules that are needed to protect the jobs of pregnant women. Those rules are provided for in provincial statutes, and are often incorporated into individual contracts of employment and collective labour agreements. ...

[68] In pith and substance, maternity benefits are a mechanism for providing replacement income during an interruption of work. This is consistent with the essence of the federal jurisdiction over unemployment insurance, namely the establishment of a public insurance program the purpose of which is to preserve workers' economic security and ensure their re-entry into the labour market by paying income replacement benefits in the event of an interruption of employment.

[Justice Deschamps then went on to hold that parental benefits could be supported by s 91(2A).]

- Was Deschamps J correct to use the original conception of unemployment insurance invoked by the government of Quebec as merely the starting point for her analysis of the scope of s 91(2A) instead of as a binding constraint? Does it make sense for judges to say that the original intent of the drafters is an appropriate source of guidance in the interpretation of a constitutional provision but then give it such little weight? Is your answer different if the original intent is unclear?

2. The Supreme Court of Canada had occasion to consider the constitutionality of several other provisions of the Employment Insurance Act in Confédération des syndicats nationaux v Canada (AG), 2008 SCC 68. The provisions under attack dealt with a broad range of issues, including the addition of new benefits (wage subsidies; earnings supplements; self-employment assistance; job-creation partnerships; and skills, loans, and grants); rate-setting mechanisms; the accumulation of surpluses; and the allocation of surpluses to the federal government's Consolidated Revenue Fund. All but one of the provisions were upheld (the one exception was a rate-setting mechanism that was held to offend s 53 of the Constitution Act, 1867, which prescribes a special process for the levying of taxes). In his analysis of the constitutionality of the provisions creating the new benefits, LeBel J, writing for a unanimous Court, invoked the judgment in the Employment Insurance Act Reference in support of the following propositions:

[30] In [the] analysis of the content of legislative powers, changes in the way such powers are exercised and in the interplay of the powers assigned to the two levels of government often raise difficult problems. The solutions that must be applied when exercising powers change where new problems must be addressed. However, the evolution of society cannot serve as a pretext for changing the nature of the division of powers, which is a fundamental component of the Canadian federal system. The power in question must be interpreted generously, but in a manner consistent with its legal context, having regard to relevant historical elements (Reference, at paras. 45-46; H. Brun, G. Tremblay and E. Brouillet, Droit constitutionnel, 5th ed. (2008), at 201-2).

3. For another example of a case in which the meaning and scope of a head of power was at issue, see Reference re Same-Sex Marriage, 2004 SCC 79. One of the four questions put to the Supreme Court of Canada in that case required the Court to decide whether the term "marriage" in s 91(26), which grants jurisdiction over "Marriage and Divorce" to Parliament, had to be understood today as it would have been in 1867 and as therefore meaning the union of a man and a woman. The Court, invoking the image of Canada's Constitution as a "living tree," unanimously rejected such an interpretive approach and held that it was open to Parliament today to redefine marriage to include unions between people of the same sex. The Court made the following statement about "progressive" interpretation of the heads of power in ss 91 and 92:

[23] A large and liberal, or progressive, interpretation ensures the continued relevance and, indeed, legitimacy of Canada's constituting document. By way of progressive interpretation our Constitution succeeds in its ambitious enterprise, that of structuring the exercise of power by the organs of the state in times vastly different from those in which it was crafted. For instance, Parliament's legislative competence in respect of telephones was recognized on the basis of its authority over interprovincial "undertakings" in s. 92(10)(a) even though the telephone had yet to be invented in 1867: Toronto (City) v. Bell Telephone Co. (1904), [1905] A.C. 52 ((P.C.). Likewise, Parliament is not limited to the range of criminal offences recognized by the law of England in 1867 in the exercise of its criminal law power in s. 91(27): Proprietary Articles Trade Association v. Attorney General for Canada, [1931] A.C. 310 (P.C.), at p. 324.

4. The Supreme Court of Canada recently summarized the modern approach with regard to interpretation of constitutional provisions in R v Comeau, 2018 SCC 15:

[52] The modern approach to statutory interpretation provides our guide for determining how [the relevant constitutional provision] should be interpreted. The text of the provision must be read harmoniously with the context and purpose of the statute: R. Sullivan, Sullivan on the Construction of Statutes (6th ed. 2014), at §2.6. Constitutional provisions must be "placed in [their] proper linguistic, philosophic and historical contexts": Big M Drug Mart, at

p. 344. Constitutional texts must be interpreted in a broad and purposive manner: Hunter, at pp. 155–56; Big M Drug Mart, at p. 344; Reference re Supreme Court Act, at para. 19. Constitutional texts must also be interpreted in a manner that is sensitive to evolving circumstances because they “must continually adapt to cover new realities”: Reference re Same-Sex Marriage, at para. 30; see also Reference re Employment Insurance Act, at para. 9. This is the living tree doctrine: Edwards, at pp. 106–7. Finally, the underlying organizational principles of the constitutional texts, like federalism, may be relevant to their interpretation: Reference re Secession of Quebec, [1998] 2 S.C.R. 217, at para. 32; Reference re Senate Reform, 2014 SCC 32, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 704, at para. 25; Reference re Manitoba Language Rights, Marriage, at para. 30; see also Reference re Employment Insurance Act, at para. 9. This is the living tree doctrine: Edwards, at pp. 106–7. Finally, the underlying organizational principles of the constitutional texts, like federalism, may be relevant to their interpretation: Reference re Secession of Quebec, [1998] 2 S.C.R. 217, at para. 32; Reference re Senate Reform, 2014 SCC 32, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 704, at para. 25; Reference re Manitoba Language Rights, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 721.

5. In your view, what role, if any, should the original intent of the drafters play in assisting courts to determine the scope and meaning of the heads of power in ss 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867?

B. DOUBLE ASPECT DOCTRINE

The double aspect doctrine, although frequently invoked, is somewhat difficult to explain with precision. The courts have, over time, understood and applied the doctrine with different emphasis, even if the core meaning has remained much the same. As we will see, at least four different understandings, each with different emphasis, have emerged over time. The doctrine has its origins in Hodge v The Queen (1883), 9 AC 117 (PC), excerpted in Chapter 4, The Late Nineteenth Century: The Courts Set an Initial Course. At issue in that case was the validity of a comprehensive licensing regime enacted by the Ontario legislature to regulate the retail trade in liquor in that province. In support of its contention that the legislation was ultra vires, the federal government argued that, given that Parliament's temperance legislation had been upheld by the Privy Council a year earlier in Russell v The Queen (1882), 7 AC 829 (PC), the retail trade in liquor had effectively been assigned in its entirety to federal jurisdiction—hence, the provincial legislatures had no power to legislate in relation to it. Lord Fitzgerald rejected that argument, saying that “subjects [here, the liquor trade] which in one aspect and for one purpose fall within sect. 92, may in another aspect and for another purpose fall within sect. 91” (at 130). The mere fact that the Privy Council had upheld federal legislation that took a prohibitory approach to the liquor trade did not therefore preclude the provincial legislatures from taking a regulatory approach to it. Lord Fitzgerald went on to uphold the provincial regulatory regime under a combination of ss 92(8), (10), and (15).

As applied in Hodge, the nascent double aspect doctrine served a limited purpose. It simply eliminated from the viable bases for challenge to the vires of the provincial legislation the argument that, because federal legislation directed at the area in question—the liquor trade—had been upheld as valid, that area was completely off limits to the provincial legislatures. Application of the doctrine did not itself result in that provincial legislation being upheld; to reach that conclusion, the Privy Council had to go through a characterization process in relation to the province's regulatory regime and decide—as it did—that it could be anchored in the three heads of power just noted. In effect, this original understanding of the double aspect doctrine does no more than open the door to the possibility that both levels of government might be able to legislate in the same area. Whether that possibility is realized in a given context depends on the manner in which the legislation at issue is characterized.

With the passage of time, the courts, in particular the Supreme Court of Canada, came to accord a much more important role to the double aspect doctrine than the limited one it played in Hodge. Instead of viewing it simply as a "door opener," the courts came to view it as capturing the notion that not only is it possible in some circumstances for both levels of government to legislate in the same area, it is often inevitable and sometimes (if not usually) a good thing that they should be able to do so. Applying the double aspect doctrine understood in this second way came to mean accepting that the area in question was one in which both Parliament and the provincial legislatures have the authority to legislate. This richer understanding of the doctrine eventually led to courts invoking it to justify upholding federal and provincial legislation touching the same areas that overlapped to a significant degree. Typically, such use of the doctrine would include a statement—in the nature of a conclusion rather than a particular form of analysis—to the effect that "this is an appropriate case for the application of the double aspect doctrine."

Areas in which such overlapping has been permitted—which are now numerous and include highway driving, the regulation of films and videos, nude entertainment, gaming, support and custody in matrimonial disputes, interest rates, and insolvency—have become known as areas of de facto (or functional) legislative concurrency. (The term "de facto" here serves to distinguish this form of jurisdictional concurrency from the de jure form spelled out in the text of the Constitution Act, 1867 in provisions such as s 95, which in express terms grants concurrent legislative jurisdiction over agriculture and immigration to Parliament and the provincial legislatures.)

As the examples of highway driving, films and videos, nude entertainment, and gaming suggest, the double aspect doctrine has frequently been invoked in relation to laws regulating public order, safety, and morality. For a relatively recent example of this tendency, consider Chatterjee v Ontario (AG), 2009 SCC 19, discussed in Chapter 11, in which the Supreme Court of Canada unanimously upheld as valid provincial legislation providing for the forfeiture to the Crown of both the tools and the proceeds of unlawful activity, in spite of the close association of the legislation with the criminal law. The result has been that "legislative power is concurrent ... over much of the field which may loosely be thought of as criminal law": Peter W Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada, 5th ed (Toronto: Carswell, 2007) (loose-leaf) at 18–35.

Note that this account of the development of the double aspect doctrine comes with two important caveats. The first is that, in spite of the judiciary's growing fondness for the doctrine over time, there are a few areas in which it has never been applied. These are areas in which, for reasons left largely unexplained, the courts have decided that the exclusivity of legislative jurisdiction as between Parliament and the provincial legislatures as provided for by the terms of ss 91 and 92 should be preserved. They include, most notably, the regulation of trade (with Parliament being restricted to international and interprovincial trade and the provincial legislatures to intraprovincial trade: see Chapter 10) and labour relations (with Parliament being limited to labour relations within federally regulated undertakings and the provincial legislatures to labour relations within local undertakings: see Bell Canada v Quebec (Commission de la Santé et de la Sécurité du Travail), [\[1988\] 1 SCR 749, 1988 CanLII 81](#) [Bell No 2], excerpted below). For examples of this unwillingness to apply the double aspect doctrine in a particular area, see Quebec (AG) v Lacombe, 2010 SCC 38, and, more recently, Rogers Communications Inc v Châteauguay (City), 2016 SCC 23, in which a majority of the Supreme Court of Canada declined to apply it to save a municipal measure regulating the choice of the location of radio-communication infrastructure in spite of the acknowledged provincial power over the health and well-being of citizens and the development of a city's territories. The minority judge, Gascon J, was of the view that the case was an appropriate one in which to apply the doctrine and was critical of the majority's refusal to make use of it.

The second caveat is that some members of the Canadian judiciary have expressed serious reservations about the broader view of the double aspect doctrine, most notably Beetz J, who served on the Supreme Court of Canada in the 1970s and 1980s. A strong supporter of provincial autonomy throughout his distinguished judicial career, he was deeply troubled by the implications for the provinces of opening up too many areas to both federal and provincial legislation. He articulated his cautious view of the double aspect doctrine in Bell No 2, excerpted at some length below in Section V:

It follows from this theory that two relatively similar rules or sets of rules may validly be found, one in legislation within exclusive federal jurisdiction, and the other in legislation within exclusive provincial jurisdiction, because they are enacted for different purposes and in different legislative contexts which give them distinct constitutional characterizations.

However, in Attorney-General for Canada v. Attorney-General for Alberta, [1916] 1 AC 588, Viscount Haldane issued a warning about the double aspect theory. This is what he said about this theory, at p. 596:

... [it] is now well established, but none the less ought to be applied only with great caution ...

The reason for this caution is the extremely broad wording of the exclusive legislative powers listed in ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 and the risk that these two fields of exclusive powers will be combined into a single more or less concurrent field of powers governed solely by the rule of paramountcy of federal legislation. Nothing could be more directly contrary to the principle of federalism underlying the Canadian Constitution: see Laskin's Canadian Constitutional Law (5th ed. 1986), vol. 1, at p. 525.

The double aspect theory is neither an exception nor even a qualification to the rule of exclusive legislative jurisdiction. Its effect must not be to create concurrent fields of jurisdiction ... in which Parliament and the legislatures may legislate on the same aspect [emphasis in original]. On the contrary, the double aspect theory can only be invoked when it gives effect to the rule of exclusive fields of jurisdiction. As its name indicates, it can only be applied in clear cases where the multiplicity of aspects is real and not merely nominal.

The primary reason for Beetz J's concern was, as this passage suggests, almost certainly the federal paramountcy doctrine, under which valid provincial legislation that conflicts with valid federal legislation must be held inoperative to the extent of the conflict. Expanding the double aspect doctrine would produce more conflict and inoperability at the cost of provincial autonomy. We will see below that the modern version of the paramountcy doctrine significantly reduces the chance of provincial measures being declared inoperative, and presumably this reality must be factored into considerations of the availability of the double aspect doctrine.

It is apparent from some of the double aspect jurisprudence, however, that there are further understandings that now affect the way in which the double aspect doctrine is applied. A third understanding emerged from the approach to division of powers questions advocated by William Lederman, "Classification of Laws and the British North America Act," excerpted below. That approach called for courts to ask (1) whether legislation being challenged on division of powers grounds had a federal aspect—that is, whether it could plausibly be connected to one or more of the heads of power in s 91; (2) whether it also had a provincial aspect—that is, whether it could plausibly be connected to one or more provincial heads of power in s 92; and (3) if the legislation was held to have both federal and provincial aspects, which of those aspects could be said to be the more important (in the special sense in which Lederman understood "importance" in this context). In the following passage from that same article, Lederman explained how, using his preferred approach, the double aspect doctrine comes into play. We have referred to this as a third understanding where double aspect is concerned, and historically speaking that is true, but in more practical terms one could say that Lederman was finally providing a detailed account of a doctrine that was first recognized in Hodge and later given even wider sway.

in William R Lederman, Continuing Canadian Constitutional Dilemmas (Toronto: Butterworths, 1981) at 243-45 (footnotes omitted)

Having explored the main problem of interpretation regarding our constitutional division of legislative powers, we may now attend in detail to the particular doctrines developed by the judges to facilitate the making of the necessary decisions. In [some] case[s] ... , the overlapping of federal and provincial categories of laws logically relevant is inevitable The courts have dealt with this overlapping in a number of ways. For one thing, they have limited the generality of the classes of laws in sections 91 and 92 by the so-called principle of "mutual modification," and have thus eliminated some of the encroachment of one upon the other. [Here Lederman gave as an example "trade and commerce" and "property and civil rights."] ... By [this technique,] the overlapping of the literal words of the statute is reduced and some additional degree of exclusiveness is imparted to federal and provincial classes of laws. The reading of sections 91 and 92 as a whole certainly makes it clear that some of this rewording is necessary.

Nevertheless, in spite of all that can or should be done by mutual modification, some overlapping inevitably remains. Where this occurs, either one of two things has then been done. First, the nature of the challenged law relevant to a provincial class of powers has been completely ignored as only an "incidental affectation" of the provincial sphere, and the law concerned has been classed only by that feature of it relevant to a federal class of laws. Thus, in spite of the logical overlap the decision is made that only the federal Parliament has power to enact the challenged law. Obviously this decision involves a judgment that the provincial feature of the law is quite unimportant relative to its federal feature. On the other hand if the federal feature be deemed quite unimportant relative to the provincial feature, then the converse decision would be made.

But if the contrast between the relative importance of the two features is not so sharp, what then? Here we come upon the double aspect theory of interpretation, which constitutes the second way in which the courts have dealt with inevitable overlapping categories. When the court considers that the federal and provincial features of the challenged rule are of roughly equivalent importance so that neither should be ignored respecting the division of legislative powers, the decision is made that the challenged rule could be enacted by either the federal Parliament or a provincial legislature. ... Clearly this decision raises some further problems. Under such principles of interpretation there may well be both a valid federal law and a valid provincial law directed to the same persons concerning the same things, but requiring from them different courses of conduct and thus having certain differing effects. ... [I]f the two rules call for inconsistent behaviour from the same people, they are in conflict or collision and both cannot be obeyed. In these circumstances the courts have laid [down] ... the doctrine of "Dominion paramountcy." Thus, it is a principle of our constitution that in the event of collision between a federal law and a provincial law each valid under the double aspect theory, the federal features of the former law are considered in the last analysis more important than the provincial features of the latter. At this ultimate point of conflict, presumably the federal classes and features relevant to them are deemed the more important simply because they have a national as opposed to a sectional reference. At any rate, "Dominion paramountcy" is said to be called for by the concluding words of section 91, quoted earlier.

In the following excerpt from Multiple Access Ltd v McCutcheon, Dickson J (as he then was) relies on Lederman's understanding of the operation of the double aspect doctrine to find a double aspect over regulation of insider trading in the securities of federally incorporated companies even in circumstances where the federal Act essentially duplicated valid provincial provisions.

Multiple Access Ltd v McCutcheon

[The Ontario Securities Act, RSO 1970, c 426 prohibited insider trading in shares trading on the Toronto Stock Exchange. The Canada Corporations Act, RSC 1970, c C-32 had almost identical provisions, applicable to corporations incorporated under federal law.

Insider trading is the purchase or sale of corporate securities by someone who has information about the value of the shares not available to other shareholders or members of the general public. Insider-trading prohibitions protect such shareholders by regulating the marketplace in shares and by enabling them to initiate proceedings against alleged insider traders. Such a shareholder action was initiated against insiders of Multiple Access Inc, a federally incorporated company, with respect to trades on the Toronto Stock Exchange.

A shareholder initiated the proceeding under the Ontario Securities Act, and the Ontario Securities Commission took carriage of the case. The respondents, the alleged insider traders, argued that the regulation of the trading in shares of federally incorporated companies falls within exclusive federal jurisdiction. In the alternative, they relied on the doctrine of paramountcy to assert that the Ontario provisions were rendered inoperative by the provisions of the Canada Corporations Act that deal with the issue.

The Supreme Court's approach to the paramountcy issue is discussed below, in Section IV. Before reaching the paramountcy issue, the Court had to find that the relevant provisions of the Canada Corporations Act and the Ontario Securities Act were both valid and that both applied to trading in Ontario in the shares of a federally incorporated company. The Court's analysis relies heavily on the double aspect doctrine, reproduced below. The majority held that both statutes were valid and applicable on the facts. Three judges, Estey, Beetz, and Chouinard JJ, decided that the federal provisions were invalid. The dissenters characterized the legislation as the regulation of securities transactions falling within provincial jurisdiction over property and civil rights rather than as regulation of the functional aspects of a federally incorporated company.]

DICKSON J (Laskin CJ and Martland, Ritchie, McIntyre, and Lamer JJ concurring):

I should like to turn now to the first constitutional question, namely, are ss. 100.4 and 100.5 of the Canada Corporations Act ultra vires the Parliament of Canada in whole or in part? ...

... [T]here may be a temptation to regard the insider trading provisions of the Canada Corporations Act as redundant having regard to the almost identical provisions found in the Ontario legislation applicable to federal companies as well as Ontario companies. Any such temptation should be resisted. The validity of the federal legislation must be determined without heed to the Ontario legislation.

Further, a number of the provinces have not yet enacted insider trading legislation. Striking down the federal legislation would leave federal companies, having head offices in those provinces, and their shareholders, without the double protection, which Ontario shareholders now enjoy. A declaration of invalidity of the federal act would create a potential gap in the present regulatory schemes that might be exploited by the unprincipled.

I turn now to the main question. Does the "matter" (or pith and substance) of the insider trading provisions of the federal act fall within a "class of subject" (or head of power) allocated to Parliament? ... Sections 100.4 and 100.5 put teeth into s. 100 of the Act. Viewed in isolation it can no doubt be argued that their matter is the trading in securities. Viewed in context, however, they are, in my opinion, company law. They fit properly and comfortably into Part I of the Canada Corporations Act. The provisions deal with obligations attached to the ownership of shares in a federal company, which extend to shareholders, officers and employees of such companies, a subject matter that is not within the exclusive jurisdiction of provincial legislatures. The provisions are also directed to the relationship between management and shareholders of federal companies. Their enactment by Parliament is in the discharge of its company law power.

It has been well established ever since John Deere Plow Co. v. Wharton, [1915] AC 330 (PC) that the power of legislating with reference to the incorporation of companies with other than provincial objects belonged exclusively to the Dominion Parliament as a matter covered by the expression "the peace, order and good government of Canada." ... The power of Parliament in relation to the incorporation of companies with other than provincial objects has not been narrowly defined. The authorities are clear that it goes well beyond mere incorporation. It extends to such matters as the maintenance of the company, the protection of creditors of the company and the safeguarding of the interests of the shareholders. It is all part of the internal ordering as distinguished from the commercial activities Insider malfeasance affects, directly and adversely, corporate powers, organization, internal management. It affects also financing because shareholders and potential shareholders must be assured the company's affairs will be scrupulously and fairly conducted; otherwise the raising of capital, clearly an element of company law, will be inhibited

Because "[t]he language of [ss 91 and 92] and of the various heads which they contain obviously cannot be construed as having been intended to embody the exact disjunctions of a perfect logical scheme" (John Deere Plow Co. v. Wharton, supra, at p. 338 per Viscount Haldane), a statute may fall under several heads of either s. 91 or s. 92. For example, a provincial statute will often fall under both s. 92(13), property and civil rights and s. 92(16), a purely local matter, given the broad generality of the language. There is, of course, no constitutional difficulty in this. The constitutional difficulty arises, however, when a statute may be characterized, as often happens, as coming within a federal as well as a provincial head of power. "To put the same point in another way, our community life—social, economic, political, and cultural—is very complex and will not fit neatly into any scheme of categories or classes without considerable overlap and ambiguity occurring. There are inevitable difficulties arising from this that we must live with so long as we have a federal constitution" (Lederman, "The Concurrent Operation of Federal and Provincial Laws in Canada" (1963), 9 McGill LJ 185). As Professor Ziegel has stated "[s]ecurities legislation clearly has a double character" ("Constitutional Aspects of Canadian Companies" in Canadian Company Law (1967), Chapter 5, at p. 167) and, "there is no simple dichotomy between legislation of a company law character and legislation affecting property and civil rights in the province. Viewed in its proper social and economic context the legislation may well have a double character" (at pp. 192-93).

I incline to the view that the impugned insider trading provisions have both a securities law and a companies law aspect and would adopt as the test for applying the double aspect doctrine to validate both sets of legislative provisions, that formulated by Professor Lederman

[Justice Dickson then quoted from Lederman, "Classification of Laws and the British North America Act," excerpted above.]

The double aspect doctrine is applicable, as Professor Lederman says, when the contrast between the relative importance of the two features is not so sharp. When, as here, the corporate-security federal and provincial characteristics of the insider trading legislation are roughly equal in importance there would seem little reason, when considering validity, to kill one and let the other live.

Although the application of the double aspect doctrine has been most prevalent in the highway traffic field there is ample precedent for its use in the field of provincial securities regulations. ... Concurrent matters or fields have been recognized, among others, in the realms of temperance, insolvency, highways, trading stamps and aspects of Sunday observance. ...

Justice Dickson went on to discuss whether the provisions of the Ontario Securities Act were rendered inapplicable to insider trading in the securities of federally incorporated companies under the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity or inoperative by the overlapping provisions of the Canada Corporations Act under the federal paramountcy doctrine. He held that neither doctrine applied. The latter portion of his judgment is reproduced below in Section V.]

A fourth type of understanding of the double aspect doctrine focuses less on the particular measure being challenged and more on the areas, facts, persons, or activities to which both federal and provincial legislative measures may apply. As the Supreme Court of Canada recently stated in the GGPPA References at para 125: "If a fact situation can be regulated from different federal and provincial perspectives and each level of government has a compelling interest in enacting legal rules in relation to that situation, the double aspect doctrine may apply." As the Court stated, the doctrine may apply. This is because, whatever the past history regarding regulation of a particular area of activity (fact situation, group of persons), each new legislative measure must satisfy the requirements of characterization and classification set out earlier in this chapter.

Public servants and other constitutional advisors, not to mention comparative constitutional lawyers, are often asked to identify areas of activity in Canadian society where federal and provincial legislators share an ability to legislate. Whereas it would be wrong, after the GGPPA References, to claim that there is a double aspect with respect to "establishing minimum national standards of [greenhouse gas (GHG)] price stringency to reduce GHG emissions" (at para 207), this being the specific new federal power recognized in that decision, it is entirely justifiable to speak more generally of a double aspect with regard to "the regulation of greenhouse gases," the provinces anchoring their measures under s 92(13), for example, and Parliament anchoring its measures under peace, order, and good government or other heads of federal power. Similarly, one can speak of a double aspect with respect to highway driving given that the provinces can properly legislate under s 92(16) and Parliament under the criminal law power, s 92(27). But using "double aspect" in this way cannot be understood as determinative of the validity of provincial or federal provincial legislation. Each measure must be validated by means of the characterization and classification process. There is a risk, for example, in saying that there is a double aspect with respect to "health" if one understands that statement to mean that federal legislation, for example, has an automatic place in that regulatory space, with the federal paramountcy that ensues. If, on the other hand, one keeps in mind that such double aspect as there might be with respect to "health" is first and foremost a function of whether federal and provincial legislation regulating health can be validly anchored under, respectively, federal and provincial heads of power, then the risk to the federal equilibrium can be controlled.

The double aspect doctrine was the subject of discussion in Reference re Assisted Human Reproduction Act, 2010 SCC 61, found in Chapter 11, which involved a challenge to all but a small handful of the provisions of that recently enacted federal statute. Of particular interest to us here is the manner in which LeBel and Deschamps JJ analyzed what they termed the three "levels" at which the doctrine could be viewed. This they did in the following paragraph:

[268] The double aspect doctrine can be viewed at three different levels: (1) that of the facts themselves regardless of their legal characterization; (2) that of the legal perspectives represented by the legislative rules; and (3) that of the power in the context of the constitutional division of powers. The double aspect relates primarily to the second level, that is, to the different normative perspectives that make it possible to understand certain corresponding facts at the first level. When the doctrine applies, these rules at the second level are connected, on the basis of their pith and substance, with different powers at the third level, one of which may come under federal authority while the other comes under provincial authority.

After setting out this framework, LeBel and Deschamps JJ went on to find that the double aspect doctrine could be applied to some of the provisions in the Act—that is, the provisions that prohibited certain activities outright in the belief that they cause "social evil" (at para 269) because those activities "could be viewed from two different perspectives: ... that of the suppression of evil [federal] and ... that of the regulation of the practice of medicine and the delivery of health care [provincial]" (at para 270). However, they concluded that the doctrine could not be applied to other provisions—for example, the provisions governing those activities "that are already found in medical practice and research and that, as a whole, form part of a health service" (at para 269). The reason they gave for not applying the doctrine to the latter set of provisions was that those provisions could only be viewed from one perspective, the regulation of health care (provincial).

As LeBel and Deschamps JJ noted, the double aspect doctrine relates primarily to the second level that they identified, "that of the legal perspectives represented by the legislative rules" (at para 268). The focus on the legislative text explains why we consider double aspect at the level of characterization and pith and substance. As noted, however, there is some not infrequent broadening of the meaning of the term "double aspect" when it is used to describe the reality of federal and provincial regulatory presence at the level of the "the facts themselves," the first level in LeBel and Deschamps JJ's framework. In Desgagnés Transport Inc v Wärtsilä Canada Inc, 2019 SCC 58, for example, the Supreme Court of Canada discussed the double aspect doctrine with apparent emphasis on the factual context—that is, the first level: "the double aspect doctrine recognizes that the same fact situations can be regulated from different perspectives, one of which may relate to a provincial power and the other to a federal power" (at para 84). This understanding of double aspect was approved in the GGPPA References, as we have just seen.

1. It is important to remember that not every case in which a court is asked to consider the double aspect doctrine is analyzed in the manner in which Lederman proposed. In fact, in most cases, application of the doctrine simply entails the court evidencing a willingness to apply the pith and substance doctrine flexibly and to characterize similar federal and provincial enactments in such a manner as to permit the court to uphold both enactments as valid. However, Multiple Access is not the only case in which the Supreme Court of Canada has adopted Lederman's approach to the application of the doctrine. Law Society of British Columbia v Mangat, 2001 SCC 67, is another. At issue in Mangat was a provision of the federal Immigration Act, RSC 1985, c I-2, that permitted non-lawyers to represent clients in proceedings before the Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) and a provision of the BC Legal Profession Act, SBC 1987, c 25, that prohibited non-lawyers from engaging in the practice of law. After quoting from Lederman, Gonthier J, writing for the Court, stated, at para 50, that

[b]oth the federal and provincial features of the challenged provisions are of equivalent importance, and so neither should be ignored in the analysis of the division of powers. Parliament must be allowed to determine who may appear before tribunals it has created, and the provinces must be allowed to regulate the practice of law as they have always done.

The double aspect doctrine applied because there were roughly equivalent federal and provincial aspects to the regulation of legal representation in immigration matters.

2. In the GGPPA References, Wagner CJ found that the double aspect doctrine applies to "cases in which the federal government has jurisdiction on the basis of the national concern doctrine" (at para 126). He went on to say that "[t]his approach fosters coherence in the law, because the double aspect doctrine can apply to every enumerated federal and provincial head of power" (at para 126). This statement would appear to confirm that we have travelled considerable distance from Hodge and the first "exceptional" understanding of the double aspect doctrine. It was noted earlier in this section, however, that there are certain areas—regulation of trade and labour relations—where the doctrine has not been applied. There are also cases, involving federally regulated undertakings, for example, where the Court has shown a distinct reluctance to invoke the double aspect doctrine (see, for example, Lacombe and Rogers Communications). Given the Supreme Court's recent assertion regarding the applicability of the double aspect doctrine to every head of power, how should we understand the non-application of the doctrine in these cases? Is it possible that the double aspect doctrine was available in principle but that Lacombe, Rogers, and other cases are instances where the pith and substance of the measure in question could not be anchored under a relevant head of power, regardless of the theoretical availability of the doctrine? (See also Reference re Environmental Management Act (British Columbia), 2019 BCCA 181 and Reference re Environmental Management Act, 2020 SCC 1.)

3. We have noted four different understandings of double aspect over the history of the division of powers in Canada, each with different emphasis. How many of these understandings are still relevant in the 21st century? How should we read the following statement by Wagner CJ in the GGPPA References?

[128] [T]he fact that the double aspect doctrine can apply does not mean that it will apply in a given case. It should be applied cautiously so as to avoid eroding the importance attached to provincial autonomy in this Court's jurisprudence. [Emphasis in original.]

C. ANCILLARY POWERS

The pith and substance doctrine results in a law being upheld if its dominant characteristic falls within the classes of subject matter allocated to the jurisdiction of the level of government that enacted the law. This means that a law may have an impact on matters outside the enacting legislature's jurisdiction as long as these effects remain secondary or incidental features of the legislation rather than its most important feature. For example, the former abortion provision of the Criminal Code was a valid exercise of the federal criminal law power even though the provision had a range of important effects on provincial matters such as hospitals, health, and the medical profession. These effects were considered incidental to the provision's dominant characteristic: the punishment of abortion on moral grounds. This principle is sometimes referred to as the incidental effects rule. (See the Carnation case discussed in Chapter 10 for a further helpful example.)

An extension of the idea of incidental effects is the ancillary powers doctrine (sometimes, and more often in the past, called the "necessarily incidental" doctrine). The ancillary powers doctrine is used in cases where the challenge is to a part of a larger scheme of legislation rather than to the entire scheme. When the impugned part is examined in isolation, it appears to intrude or overflow into the jurisdiction of the other level of government. However, if the larger scheme of which the impugned provision forms part is constitutionally valid, the impugned provision may also be found valid because of its relationship to the larger scheme. This will depend on the extent of the intrusion or overflow and how well the offending part is integrated into the valid legislative scheme. If it is not closely enough related, it will be declared invalid and severed. If it is closely enough related, it will be deemed "ancillary" or "necessarily incidental" to the valid scheme, and both the part and the rest of the scheme will be upheld. In this way, the ancillary powers doctrine, like the pith and substance doctrine, permits the federal and provincial governments to intrude, sometimes quite substantially, on the other level of government's jurisdiction as long as the most important features of their laws remain within their jurisdiction.

An early attempt to use this doctrine, albeit unsuccessfully, is found in The King v Eastern Terminal Elevator Co, [1925] SCR 434, 1925 CanLII 82, excerpted in Chapter 5, The Early Twentieth Century: The Beginnings of Economic Regulation, in which the federal government attempted to have the validity of certain provisions in the Canada Grain Act, RSC 1985, c G-10 regulating grain elevators (which prima facie fall within provincial legislative jurisdiction under s 92(10) or (13)) upheld by arguing that such regulation was necessarily incidental to larger purposes of the Act as a whole—that is, the regulation of the interprovincial and international trade in grain.

An extensive modern analysis of the ancillary powers doctrine, which recognizes the balancing exercise involved in applying it, is found in the judgment of Dickson CJ in General Motors of Canada Ltd v City National Leasing, [1989] 1 SCR 641, 1989 CanLII 133, immediately below.

General Motors of Canada Ltd v City National Leasing

[City National Leasing (CNL) brought a civil action against General Motors (GM), alleging that it suffered losses as a result of a discriminatory pricing policy that constituted a kind of anti-competitive behaviour prohibited by the Combines Investigation Act, RSC 1970, c C-23. The civil action was authorized by s 33.1 of the Act. GM argued that s 33.1 was beyond the jurisdiction of Parliament because the creation of civil causes of action falls within provincial jurisdiction in relation to "Property and Civil Rights."

The General Motors ruling is notable for its holding that the Combines Investigation Act (now the Competition Act, RSC 1985, c C-34) is a valid exercise of the federal power over the "general regulation of trade"; see Chapter 10. It is also notable for setting out the general approach to the necessarily incidental doctrine. When the constitutional challenge is focused on a single provision of a larger legislative scheme, how is the constitutional validity of the challenged provision to be determined? The excerpts below address this issue.]

DICKSON CJ (Beetz, McIntyre, Lamer, La Forest, and L'Heureux-Dubé JJ concurring):

[I]n circumstances such as exist in the case at bar, it will normally be necessary to consider both the impugned provision and the Act as a whole (or a significant part of it) when undertaking a constitutional analysis. ... The first step should be to consider whether and to what extent the impugned provision can be characterized as intruding into provincial powers. If it cannot be characterized as intruding at all, i.e., if in its pith and substance the provision is federal law, and if the act to which it is attached is constitutionally valid (or if the provision is severable or if it is attached to a severable and constitutionally valid part of the act) then the investigation need go no further. In that situation both the provision and the act are constitutionally unimpeachable. If, as may occur in some instances, the impugned provision is found to be constitutionally unimpeachable while the act containing it is not, then the act must be assessed on its [sic] own. In these instances, it is clear that the claim of invalidity should originally have been made against the act and not against the particular provision. In most cases like the present, however, it will be concluded that the impugned provision can be characterized, prima facie, as intruding to some extent on provincial powers: the question is to what extent. I emphasize that in answering this initial question the court is considering the provision on its own and not assessing the act; thus the answer it reaches does not provide a conclusion with respect to the ultimate constitutional validity of the provision. The purpose is merely to ascertain the degree to which the provision could be said to intrude on provincial powers, so that this intrusion can be weighed in light of the possible justification for the section.

Such a justification will result from the impugned provision's relationship to valid legislation. Thus the next step in the process is to ascertain the existence of valid legislation. . . .

The final question is whether the provision can be constitutionally justified by reason of its connection with valid legislation. As Laskin CJ remarked in Vapor Canada, ... [[1977] 2 SCR 134, 1976 CanLII 181], inclusion of an invalid provision in a valid statute does not necessarily stamp the provision with validity. Here the court must focus on the relationship between the valid legislation and the impugned provision. Answering the question first requires deciding what test of "fit" is appropriate for such a determination. By "fit" I refer to how well the provision is integrated into the scheme of the legislation and how important it is for the efficacy of the legislation. The same test will not be appropriate in all circumstances. In arriving at the correct standard the court must consider the degree to which the provision intrudes on provincial powers. The case law, to which I turn below, shows that in certain circumstances a stricter requirement is in order, while in others, a looser test is acceptable. For example, if the impugned provision only encroaches marginally on provincial powers, then a "functional" relationship may be sufficient to justify the provision. Alternatively, if the impugned provision is highly intrusive vis-à-vis provincial powers then a stricter test is appropriate. A careful case by case assessment of the proper test is the best approach.

In determining the proper test it should be remembered that in a federal system it is inevitable that, in pursuing valid objectives, the legislation of each level of government will impact occasionally on the sphere of power of the other level of government; overlap of legislation is to be expected and accommodated in a federal state. Thus a certain degree of judicial restraint in proposing strict tests which will result in striking down such legislation is appropriate. I reiterate what I said on this general theme (although in a slightly different context) in OPSEU v. Ontario (Attorney General), [1987] 2 SCR 2, at p. 18:

The history of Canadian constitutional law has been to allow for a fair amount of interplay and indeed overlap between federal and provincial powers. It is true that doctrines like interjurisdictional and Crown immunity and concepts like "watertight compartments" qualify the extent of that interplay. But it must be recognized that these doctrines and concepts have not been the dominant tide of constitutional doctrines: rather they have been an undertow against the strong pull of pith and substance, the aspect doctrine and, in recent years, a very restrained approach to concurrency and paramountcy issues.

The above comments also emphasize that the question in this appeal of how far federal legislation may validly impinge on provincial powers is one part of the general notion of the "pith and substance" of legislation; i.e., the doctrine that a law which is federal in its true nature will be upheld even if it affects matters which appear to be a proper subject for provincial legislation (and vice versa). On p. 334 of his book Constitutional Law of Canada (2nd ed. 1985), Professor Hogg explains this in the following way:

The pith and substance doctrine enables a law that is classified as "in relation to" a matter within the competence of the enacting body to have incidental or ancillary effects on matters outside the competence of the enacting body.

I emphasize that these comments should not be seen as altering the balance of constitutional powers. Both provincial and federal governments have equal ability to legislate in ways that may incidentally affect the other government's sphere of power. I quote from Professor Hogg again, where at p. 336 he states: "I think it is plain both on principle and on authority that the provincial enumerated powers have exactly the same capacity as the federal enumerated powers to affect matters allocated to the other level of government."

In the present appeal, the appellant focuses its attack on a particular section of the Act. The issue is not whether the Act as a whole is rendered ultra vires because it reaches too far, but whether a particular provision is sufficiently integrated into the Act to sustain its constitutionality. In numerous cases courts have considered the nature of the relationship which is required, between a provision which encroaches on provincial jurisdiction and a valid statute, for the provision to be upheld. In different contexts courts have set down slightly different requirements, viz: "rational and functional connection" in Papp v. Papp, [1970] 1 OR 331, R v. Zelenksy, [1978] 2 SCR 940, and Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon, [1982] 2 SCR 161; "ancillary," "necessarily incidental" and "truly necessary" in the Regional Municipality of Peel v. MacKenzie (1982), 139 DLR (3d) 14; "intimate connection," "an integral part" and "necessarily incidental" in Northern Telecom Ltd. v. Communications Workers of Canada, [1980] 1 SCR 115; "integral part" in Clark v. Canadian National Railway Co., [1988] 2 SCR 680; "a valid constitutional cast by the context and association in which it is fixed as a complementary provision" in Vapor Canada, supra; and "truly necessary" in R v. Thomas Fuller Construction Co. (1958) Ltd., [1980] 1 SCR 695. I believe the approach I have outlined is consistent with the results of this jurisprudence. These cases are best understood as setting out the proper test for the particular context in issue, rather than attempting to articulate a test of general application with reference to all contexts. Thus the tests they set out are not identical. As the seriousness of the encroachment on provincial powers varies, so does the test required to ensure that an appropriate constitutional balance is maintained. In surveying past jurisprudence it is to be expected that some example of patterns between the appropriate test of fit, and the head of power under which the federal legislation is valid, will be found. Such patterns exist not only because of a possible degree of similarity between the federal legislation which falls under any one head of power, but also for the reason that certain federal heads of power, for example, s. 92(10), are narrow and distinct powers which relate to particular works and undertakings and are thus quite susceptible to having provisions "tacked-on" to legislation which is validated under them, while other federal heads of power, for example, trade and commerce, are broad and therefore less likely to give rise to highly intrusive provisions.

The steps in the analysis may be summarized as follows: First, the court must determine whether the impugned provision can be viewed as intruding on provincial powers, and if so to what extent (if it does not intrude, then the only possible issue is the validity of the act). Second, the court must establish whether the act (or a severable part of it) is valid. ... If the scheme is not valid, that is the end of the inquiry. If the scheme of regulation is declared valid, the court must then determine whether the impugned provision is sufficiently integrated with the scheme that it can be upheld by virtue of that relationship. This requires considering the seriousness of the encroachment on provincial powers, in order to decide on the proper standard for such a relationship. ... I note that in certain cases it may be possible to dispense with some of the aforementioned steps if a clear answer to one of them will be dispositive of the issue. For example, if the provision in question has no relation to the regulatory scheme then the question of its validity may be quickly answered on that ground alone. The approach taken in a number of past cases is more easily understood if this possibility is recognized.

Does Section 31.1 Encroach on Provincial Powers?

The first step, therefore, ... is to determine whether the impugned provision can be seen as encroaching on provincial powers, and if so, to what extent. As s. 31.1 creates a civil right of action it is not difficult to conclude that the provision does, on its face, appear to encroach on provincial power to some extent. The creation of civil actions is generally a matter within provincial jurisdiction under s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867. This provincial power over civil rights is a significant power and one that is not lightly encroached upon. In assessing the seriousness of this encroachment, however, three facts must be taken into consideration. The first is that s. 31.1 is only a remedial provision; its purpose is to help enforce the substantive aspects of the Act, but it is not in itself a substantive part of the Act. By their nature, remedial provisions are typically less intrusive vis-à-vis provincial powers. The second important fact is the limited scope of the action. Section 31.1 does not create a general cause of action; its application is carefully limited by the provisions of the Act. The third relevant fact is that it is well-established that the federal government is not constitutionally precluded from creating rights of civil action where such measures may be shown to be warranted. This Court has sustained federally-created civil actions in a variety of contexts

In sum, the impugned provision encroaches on an important provincial power; however, the provision is a remedial one; federal encroachment in this manner is not unprecedented and, in this case; encroachment has been limited by the restrictions of the Act.

[Chief Justice Dickson turned to the second stage of the analysis and concluded that the Combines Investigation Act constituted a scheme of regulation validly enacted by Parliament pursuant to its power to enact laws in relation to trade and commerce; see the portion of the judgment found in Chapter 10.]

The Validity of Section 31.1 of the Combines Investigation Act

Having found that the Combines Investigation Act contains a regulatory scheme, valid under s. 91(2) of the Constitution, the only issue remaining to be addressed is the constitutional validity of s. 31.1. As I have already noted, mere inclusion in a valid legislative scheme does not ipso facto confer constitutional validity upon a particular provision. The provision must be sufficiently related to that scheme for it to be constitutionally justified. The degree of relationship that is required is a function of the extent of the provision's intrusion into provincial powers. I have already discussed this issue and concluded that s. 31.1 intrudes, though in a limited way, on the important provincial power over civil rights. In this light, I do not think that a strict test, such as "truly necessary" or "integral," is appropriate. On the other hand, it is not enough that the section be merely "tacked on" to admittedly valid legislation. The correct approach in this case is to ask whether the provision is functionally related to the general objective of the legislation, and to the structure and the content of the scheme. A similar test has been applied in other cases, as I have noted, and I think it is also the proper test for the circumstances of this appeal.

I am of the opinion that the necessary link between s. 31.1 and the Act exists. Section 31.1 is an integral, well-conceived component of the economic regulation strategy found in the Combines Investigation Act. Even if a much stricter test of fit were applied—for instance, one of "necessarily incidental"—s. 31.1 would still pass the test. Under the test of "functionally related" the section is clearly valid.

[Chief Justice Dickson noted that s 31.1 is a remedy bounded by the parameters of the Act; it does not create an open-ended private right of action. He also relied on the fact that s 31.1 is integrated into the purpose and underlying philosophy of the Act; privately initiated and conducted proceedings can help fulfill the objectives of the legislation.]

For these reasons, I conclude that s. 31.1 is an integral part of the Combines Investigation Act scheme regulating anti-competitive conduct. The relationship between the section and the Act easily meets the test for the section to be upheld. This finding should not be interpreted as authority for upholding all provisions creating private civil action that are attached to a valid trade and commerce regulatory scheme or any other particular type of scheme. Section 31.1 is carefully constructed and restricted by the terms of the Combines Investigation Act.

Appeal dismissed.

NOTES

1. The approach to the ancillary powers doctrine outlined by Dickson CJ is equally applicable when a provision of a provincial law that is part of a larger scheme of regulation is challenged on the ground that it encroaches on a federal area of jurisdiction. For example, in Global Securities Corp v British Columbia (Securities Commission), 2000 SCC 21, the Supreme Court upheld s 141(1)(b) of the British Columbia Securities Act, RSBC 1996, c 418, a provision that empowers the BC Securities Commission (BCSC) to make orders requiring brokers registered in the province to produce records in their control "to assist in the administration of the securities laws of another jurisdiction." The BCSC entered into an agreement with the US

Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) to provide each other with mutual assistance in investigating violations of their respective jurisdictions' securities laws. Pursuant to a request from the SEC, which was investigating possible violations of US law, the BCSC ordered Global Securities to produce records in its possession. The company refused to produce some of the requested records and sought a declaration that s 141(1)(b) was in pith and substance in relation to the enforcement of foreign laws and was thus ultra vires. The Court disagreed, finding that the impugned provision was in pith and substance part of a reciprocal arrangement in relation to the uncovering of violations of local securities laws and thus within provincial jurisdiction over "property and civil rights."

In reaching this conclusion, Iacobucci J, writing for the Court, identified two dominant purposes of the impugned provision: obtaining reciprocal cooperation from other securities regulators and uncovering violations of foreign law by brokers registered in British Columbia. He went on to note that had the provision been found to lie outside provincial jurisdiction on the ground that it was primarily concerned with assisting in the enforcement of foreign law, it would have been saved by the ancillary powers or necessarily incidental doctrine articulated by the Court in General Motors. The impugned section, he said, "is a part of a valid legislative scheme, namely, the Securities Act. Moreover, even assuming that the most rigorous version of the ancillary doctrine applies, I believe that s. 141(1)(b) is 'necessarily incidental' to the Securities Act and would therefore also uphold it under the ancillary doctrine" (at para 45). See also Kitkatla Band v British Columbia (Minister of Small Business, Tourism and Culture), 2002 SCC 31, in which the Court upheld a provision of BC's Heritage Conservation Act, RSBC 1996, c 187, that specifically referred to "aboriginal" artifacts.

2. In a more recent application of the ancillary powers doctrine by the Supreme Court of Canada in the Assisted Human Reproduction Reference, excerpted in Chapter 11, four of the nine members of the Court were of the view that, because the challenge was to a large number of the provisions of the legislation at issue rather than just one or two, it was appropriate to reverse the order of the first two of the three questions that Dickson CJ set out above in General Motors and consider the validity of the statute as a whole first. Chief Justice McLachlin, who wrote for this group of four judges, explained this reordering in the following terms:

[17] ... In this case, the Attorney General of Quebec is challenging the bulk of the Assisted Human Reproduction Act. While it concedes that ss. 5 to 7 of the Act are valid, it challenges almost all of the remaining operative provisions. Under these circumstances, it is impossible to meaningfully consider the provisions at issue without first considering the nature of the whole scheme.

This reordering of the questions was criticized, however, by four other members of the Court, writing through LeBel and Deschamps JJ. They argued that "[s]ince the purposes and effects of a statute's many provisions can be different, it is important to consider the impugned provisions separately before considering their connection with other provisions of the statute" (at para 194). The ninth member of the Court, Cromwell J, who wrote separately, made no comment on the appropriateness of the reordering. In your view, which of the two groups of four judges had the better of this debate?

3. The position taken by LeBel and Deschamps JJ in the Assisted Human Reproduction Reference on the proper ordering of the three questions included a reference to this statement by Dickson CJ in General Motors (at 667): "[I]n answering this initial question the court is considering the provision on its own and not assessing the act." Did Dickson CJ, when he came to apply his three-part analytical framework to s 31.1 of the Combines Investigation Act in that case, remain true to that admonition? Did he really "consider [that] provision on its own"? Or did he consider it within the broader context of the statute as a whole? (Look carefully at the first two of the three reasons he gave for concluding that the encroachment by s 31.1 was not serious.)

Does it even make sense to consider the impugned provision(s) on their own? Robin Elliot has argued that the General Motors analytical framework is flawed ... because it is based on the erroneous assumption that one can engage in a meaningful analysis ... of the impugned part without first considering the nature of the relationship, if any, between that part and the larger whole with which it is allegedly associated.

He then proceeds to propose a new framework for the application of the ancillary powers doctrine, which entails asking first "whether there is a functional connection between the impugned part and that larger whole." If that question is answered in the negative, the ancillary powers doctrine has no further role to play, but if the answer is in the affirmative, then one asks, second, "is the larger whole valid?" On the assumption that it is, then the court should, third, "conduct a full-fledged pith and substance analysis of the impugned part ... [taking] into account not just the existence, but the nature and degree, of the connection between part and whole. In other words, the tighter the court finds that connection to be, the more willing it should be to find the part valid, and the looser it finds that connection to be, the less willing it should be to find the part valid": see Robin Elliot, "Quebec (AG) v Lacombe and Quebec (AG) v COPA: Ancillary Powers, Interjurisdictional Immunity and 'The Local Interest in Land Use Planning Against the National Interest in a Unified System of Aviation Navigation'" (2011) 55 SCLR (2d) 403 at 424-25. Do you think that this alternative framework would be preferable to the General Motors framework? In what way or ways?

4. Although the approach to the ancillary powers doctrine outlined by Dickson J in General Motors suggests that that doctrine is to be applied whenever the validity of a single part of a larger whole is called into question, the Court has not always applied the doctrine in such circumstances and has instead applied a standard pith and substance analysis, without any reference to the three-step framework prescribed in General Motors. For example, the doctrine was not applied in either the Employment Insurance Reference or Multiple Access, both excerpted above, even though the challenge in both cases was to small components of large statutes. The Court has not explained why it has not been consistent in this regard. Can you think of any reasons why the Court has not been consistent?

We turn now to a relatively recent application of the ancillary powers doctrine in which the Supreme Court of Canada added a refinement to the third step of the test set forth in General Motors.

Quebec (AG) v Lacombe

[At issue in this case was the validity of a by-law enacted in 1995 by a municipality in the province of Quebec (referred to as By-law No 260 in the reasons for judgment excerpted below). That by-law had been enacted after a vigorous lobbying campaign by the owners of summer homes and other users of a recreational lake called Gobeil Lake who objected to the operation of a private aerodrome on the lake by a company that provided float plane sightseeing services. By its terms, By-law No 260 explicitly prohibited the construction and use of aerodromes within a particular part of the municipality that included the lake.]

Chief Justice McLachlin, writing for a seven-member majority of the Court, was of the view that, because the impugned by-law had taken the form of an amendment to the municipality's general zoning by-law, the outcome of the challenge turned on the application of the ancillary powers doctrine, which she applied in accordance with the analytical framework established in General Motors. She held that, viewed on its own, the by-law amounted to an unconstitutional trenching on federal jurisdiction over aeronautics. She accepted that the general zoning by-law was valid provincial legislation under s 92(13) and then proceeded to address the question of whether the impugned by-law could be upheld because of its relationship with the general zoning by-law. We reproduce here both her general discussion of the ancillary powers doctrine and her analysis of that final question.]

(1) The Ancillary Powers Doctrine

[35] The ancillary powers doctrine permits one level of government to trench on the jurisdiction of the other in order to enact a comprehensive regulatory scheme. In pith and substance, provisions enacted pursuant to the ancillary powers doctrine fall outside the enumerated powers of their enacting body: General Motors [v City National Leasing, [1989] 1 SCR 641], at pp. 667-70. Consequently, the invocation of ancillary powers runs contrary to the notion that Parliament and the legislatures have sole authority to legislate within the jurisdiction allocated to them by the Constitution Act, 1867. Because of this, the availability of ancillary powers is limited to situations in which the intrusion on the powers of the other level of government is justified by the important role that the extrajurisdictional provision plays in a valid legislative scheme. The relation cannot be insubstantial

[36] The ancillary powers doctrine is not to be confused with the incidental effects rule. The ancillary powers doctrine applies where, as here, a provision is, in pith and substance, outside the competence of its enacting body. The potentially invalid provision will be saved where it is an important part of a broader legislative scheme that is within the competence of the enacting body. The incidental effects rule, by contrast, applies when a provision, in pith and substance, lies within the competence of the enacting body but touches on a subject assigned to the other level of government. It holds that such a provision will not be invalid merely because it has an incidental effect on a legislative competence that falls beyond the jurisdiction of its enacting body. Mere incidental effects will not warrant the invocation of ancillary powers.

[37] Nor is the ancillary powers doctrine to be confused with the double aspect doctrine. In Canadian Western Bank [v Alberta, 2007 SCC 22] at para. 30, Binnie and LeBel JJ. explained that the double aspect doctrine recognizes the overlapping jurisdiction of the two levels of government. ... By contrast, ancillary powers apply only where a legislative provision does not come within those heads of power assigned to its enacting body under the Constitution Act, 1867.

[38] In summary, only the ancillary powers doctrine concerns legislation that, in pith and substance, falls outside the jurisdiction of its enacting body. Laws raising a double aspect come within the jurisdiction of their enacting body, but intrude on the jurisdiction of the other level of government because of the overlap in the constitutional division of powers. Similarly, the incidental effects rule applies where the main thrust of the law comes within the jurisdiction of its enacting body, but the law has subsidiary effects that cannot come within the jurisdiction of that body.

[Chief Justice McLachlin discussed some of the early jurisprudence on the ancillary powers doctrine and summarized the test proposed by Dickson CJ in General Motors, which, she noted, "has been applied, mutatis mutandis, in all subsequent decisions of this Court in which the possibility of ancillary jurisdiction was canvassed" (at para 42). She then proceeded to acknowledge that that test has been criticized on a number of grounds, including the concern "that it involves a difficult distinction between serious and less serious intrusions (one's view of the seriousness of an intrusion may vary depending on whether one is intruding or being intruded upon, for example)," and the fact "that in applying the combined test, this Court has always backed away from a test of strict necessity, almost always applying the more flexible rational functional test" (at para 43). However, she decided that it was "unnecessary to decide the merits of these criticisms in the present appeal because the legislation here at issue does not constitute a serious intrusion on federal jurisdiction. In my view, the rational functional test is applicable to this case" (at para 44). She continued:]

[45] Under the rational functional test used by Laskin J.A. in Papp v Papp, [1970 1 OR 331], and repeatedly affirmed in the jurisprudence of this Court, ancillary powers will only save a provision that is rationally and functionally connected to the purpose of the legislative scheme that it purportedly furthers. It is not enough that the measure supplement the legislative scheme; it must actively further it.

(2) Application of the Ancillary Powers Doctrine

[47] The question is whether the amendments brought by by-law No. 260, which in pith and substance lie outside the provincial power, are nevertheless valid because they are ancillary to valid provincial provisions—in other words, whether the amendments are rationally and functionally connected to valid provincial zoning objectives in the sense described in the preceding section.

[48] As is illustrated by the above cited examples from the jurisprudence, the application of ancillary powers to habilitate prima facie invalid legislation requires that the impugned provision, both rationally and in its function, further the purposes of the valid legislative scheme of which it is said to be part. ... [T]he basic purpose of this inquiry is to determine whether the impugned measure not only supplements, but complements, the legislative scheme; it is not enough that the measure be merely supplemental: Papp.

[49] This brings us to the inquiry at hand. The starting point is the purpose of the legislative scheme that by-law No. 260 is alleged to further. This scheme is found in ... the broader zoning framework of the municipality of Sacré-Cœur. By-law No. 210 is generally valid legislation in relation to land use planning The question is whether the general ban on aerodromes in zone 33-RF introduced by by-law No. 260 is rationally and functionally connected to by-law No. 210, such that it should be sustained as a functional part of the whole—notwithstanding its prima facie constitutional invalidity. In my view, the answer to this question is no.

[50] Zoning legislation ... has as its purpose the regulation of land use, having regard to the underlying characteristics and uses of the land in question It functions by establishing zones, or regions, where particular activities may be conducted, having regard to the nature of the territory and related factors. It thus seeks to establish a rational and fair basis upon which land users may predicate their behaviour. It generally seeks to treat similar areas similarly, and avoids stand-alone one-off prohibitions. The underlying purpose of zoning legislation ... is to rationalize land use for the benefit of the general populace.

[51] A close examination of the purposes and effects of by-law No. 260 reveals that it does not further the objectives of zoning law generally, or by-law No. 210 in particular.

[52] ... [T]he Province asserts that by-law No. 260 was passed to protect the use of Gobeil Lake and similar areas by vacationers. However, by-law No. 260 does not confine its ban on aerodromes to vacation areas. Rather, it bans aerodromes throughout the municipality, which spans a variety of land uses.

[53] The lack of connection between by-law No. 260 and the general zoning purposes of by-law No. 210 is evidenced by the lack of correlation between the nature of the areas affected and the ban on aerodromes.

[54] By-law No. 260 treats similar parcels of land differently by expressly permitting aerodromes in zone 61-RF, but not in the adjacent zone 33-RF. These two zones are identical in essentially banning all but a few land uses. The only difference between the zoning of 33-RF and 61-RF is that the latter permits aerodromes. If the purpose of the broader zoning scheme in zone 33-RF—to protect use by vacationers—is established by these land use restrictions, then the same must hold for zone 61-RF. Yet it does not.

[55] Conversely, by-law No. 260 treats different parcels the same by broadly banning water aerodromes throughout the municipality, not only in areas used by vacationers. Again, this broad prohibition does not correlate with the land uses in the area covered.

[56] ... [B]y-law No. 260 purports to regulate the location of aerodromes without reference to the underlying land use regime. It does not function as zoning legislation, but rather, is a stand-alone prohibition. It treats similar parcels differently, and different parcels the same, belying the first principle of zoning legislation.

[57] At the end of the day, what is missing is evidence of any purpose for by-law No. 260 other than the prohibition of certain aeronautical activities in a significant portion of the municipality. There is no evidence of a gap in by-law No. 210 that by-law No. 260 fills. There is no evidence of a feature of by-law No. 210 that by-law No. 260 enhances; no evidence of an inconsistency or uncertainty that it removes from by-law No. 210's operation. There is no evidence that by-law No. 260 is an integrated feature of the zoning scheme, viewed as a whole. Indeed, it is difficult to say that by-law No. 260 is even supplemental to the zoning scheme, given its arbitrary focus on banning aeronautics without regard to underlying land use, and in any event supplementation would not be enough to save it: Papp. In sum, there simply is not the kind of connection one finds in the cases where invalid legislation has been resuscitated through the ancillary powers doctrine.

[58] I conclude that the amendments brought by by-law No. 260 do not meet the rational functional connection test in General Motors.

[Justice Deschamps dissented in this case, essentially on the basis that a municipality has the power under s 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867 to regulate land use in what it considers to be the best interests of its residents, even when such regulation is directed at the establishment of private aerodromes. In support of that holding, she relied on the double aspect doctrine. Justice LeBel agreed with Deschamps J in relation to that holding but aligned himself with the majority in the result because he was of the view that the fact that the owner of the float plane sightseeing business had been given an operator's permit under the federal Aeronautics Act, RSC 1985, c A-2, meant that the doctrine of federal paramountcy applied and the municipality's by-law had to be held inoperative.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

- Chief Justice McLachlin decided that "[By-law No 260] does not constitute a serious intrusion on federal jurisdiction" (at para 44) and therefore held that the more relaxed "rational and functional connection" standard was the appropriate standard to apply when she came to apply the third and final part of the General Motors test. Curiously, she provided no reasoning in support of that decision. What reasons do you suppose she would have had? Whatever those reasons might have been, do you think that decision was the right one? (You might want to revisit the latter question after reading her judgment in Quebec (AG) v Canadian Owners and Pilots Association, 2010 SCC 39 [COPA], excerpted below in Section IV, in which she held that jurisdiction over the siting of private aerodromes falls within the core of federal jurisdiction over aeronautics. Can it plausibly be said that provincial legislation that encroaches on a core area of federal jurisdiction does not represent a serious intrusion on that jurisdiction?

2. Justice McLachlin said that, in order for an otherwise ultra vires provision to be sustained on the basis of the rational-and-functional connection standard, “[i]t is not enough that the measure supplement the legislative scheme; it must actively further it” (at para 45). Is the distinction that she draws between “supplementing” and “actively furthering” a legislative scheme a meaningful one? Could it not be said of s 31.1 of the Combines Investigation Act (the provision upheld on the basis of this standard in General Motors) that it “supplemented” the main body of the Act by providing a new civil enforcement mechanism?

3. It is clear that the majority’s unwillingness to uphold By-law No 260 under the ancillary powers doctrine turned to a significant degree on the manner in which McLachlin CJ characterized the defining elements of “true” zoning legislation, in particular her statement to the effect that such legislation “generally seeks to treat similar areas similarly and avoids stand-alone one-off prohibitions” (at para 50). Do you think that McLachlin CJ provided adequate support for that characterization of zoning legislation?

4. How would you analyze Lacombe through the lens of Simeon’s three criteria of choice? Which of those criteria would you see being most relevant: community, functional efficiency, or democracy? What impact would each of the three criteria have on your thinking about the appropriate outcome?

IV. OPERABILITY: THE PARAMOUNTCY DOCTRINE

Federal systems require a mechanism for dealing with the possibility of conflict between valid national and regional laws. In some federal constitutions, the rules for dealing with such conflicts are provided expressly by the constitutional document. In Canada, however, the Constitution is silent on the issue, with three very specific, narrowly defined exceptions. Section 95 of the Constitution Act, 1867 recognizes agriculture and immigration as areas of concurrent jurisdiction and provides that provincial laws shall have effect only to the extent that they are not “repugnant” to any Act of Parliament. Similarly, s 92A, added by constitutional amendment in 1982, confers on provincial legislatures a concurrent power to enact laws in relation to the export of natural resources to other provinces, subject to the paramountcy of federal legislation in the case of conflict. Section 94A, added by constitutional amendments in 1951 and 1964, provides for concurrency in relation to old-age pensions and supplementary benefits (including survivors’ and disability benefits) but provides a form of provincial paramountcy by stating that no federal law “shall affect the operation of any law present or future of a provincial legislature in relation to any such matter.” But for most subjects of legislation, including all of those listed in ss 91 and 92, no paramountcy rule is specified in the Constitution.

The absence in the Constitution of a general set of rules for dealing with conflict between federal and provincial laws may be explained by the belief of the drafters, in 1867, that overlap would not occur given the exclusivity of the spheres of legislative jurisdiction set out in ss 91 and 92 or perhaps that any problems of conflict that did arise between federal and provincial laws would be solved in the political arena through the federal Parliament’s exercise of the declaratory power in s 92(10)(c) or the powers of reservation and disallowance granted to the governor general in s 90. In any event, a judicially created rule filled the gap: the doctrine of federal paramountcy, modelled on the rule found in s 95. It provides that in cases of conflict between federal and provincial laws, the federal law is paramount and the provincial law is inoperative to the extent of the conflict.

Note that if a conflict is found to exist by virtue of the application of the paramountcy rule, the provincial law is not declared invalid. Its operation is merely suspended to the extent that, and for as long as, it conflicts with federal legislation. If the federal legislation is repealed, the conflict disappears, and the provincial law may once again be applied.

The key issue in cases in which the federal paramountcy doctrine is invoked is whether a real conflict exists between federal and provincial laws. The answer to that question depends on what the term "conflict" is understood to mean for this purpose. As you will see, the Supreme Court of Canada has been asked to consider a broad range of different meanings of that term, and your main challenge as you read through the case excerpts that follow will be to determine, as best you can, which of these meanings have been accepted and which have been rejected. Before we run through the various meanings that have been proposed to the Court, it is important to note that the choice between a narrow and a broad conception of "conflict" has profound implications for the balance of power between the federal and provincial levels of government in Canada. A narrow conception—one that results in a conflict being found in only the rarest of circumstances—leaves much greater room for provincial legislation to operate in areas in which federal legislation is also applicable than does a broad conception—one that results in a conflict being found in many more circumstances. Be sensitive to the importance of this choice for Canadian federalism as you assess the reasoning process that the Court uses when it is called on to make it.

The different meanings of, or tests for, "conflict" to which you will see the Supreme Court making reference, either on its own initiative or on the initiative of one of the parties, in the cases that follow can usefully be summarized as follows:

1. Impossibility of dual compliance (also known as "express contradiction" and "operational conflict"). This asks whether it is impossible for the people who are subject to the federal and provincial enactments in question to comply with both.
2. Duplication. This asks whether the provincial legislation duplicates the federal legislation.
3. Impossibility of giving dual effect (usually placed under the rubric of impossibility of dual compliance, but arguably better understood as a distinct understanding in its own right). This asks whether a judge or other government decision-maker before whom both enactments are relied on by contesting parties can give effect to both.
4. Frustration of federal purpose. This asks whether permitting the provincial enactment to operate in the circumstances in question would serve to frustrate the purpose underlying the federal enactment.
5. Federal intention to cover the field (also known as "negative implication" or "occupying the field"). This asks whether Parliament, by legislating in a particular area, has enacted a code that was intended to be complete and thus by implication was intended to oust the operation of any provincial laws.

Note that, by listing all five of these different understandings, or tests, of conflict here, we are not implying that they have all been accepted as appropriate definitions by the Supreme Court. They have been included on the list because they have all been proposed to or considered by the Supreme Court at various times. It is also important to note that these tests are not mutually exclusive—that is, accepting one does not mean rejecting others; it would not be impossible, at least in theory, for the Court to accept all five.

Note also that the language we have used to describe the third understanding of conflict—that is, the impossibility of giving dual effect—has hardly ever been used by the Supreme Court. (See, by way of rare example, Binnie and LeBel JJ in British Columbia (AG) v Lafarge Canada Inc, 2007 SCC 23 at para 82.) We use it here because we think that it is important to give it the status of a distinct understanding rather than leave it, as the Court has tended to do, as an unacknowledged branch of the impossibility of dual compliance understanding. What distinguishes this understanding from the impossibility of dual compliance understanding is not just that it focuses on a different legal entity—the state decision-maker instead of the person subject to the federal and provincial legislation at issue—and asks a different question. It also allows for the paramountcy doctrine to have much broader reach than that understanding. Take, for example, a situation in which the federal legislation in question creates a legally enforceable right for someone's benefit that the provincial legislation makes it illegal to exercise. Under a strict interpretation of the impossibility of dual compliance understanding, that test is not met because the individual who has been given the legally enforceable right can comply with both enactments simply by not exercising that right. By contrast, a court before whom that individual invokes that federally granted right in defence to a charge under the provincial legislation cannot both give effect to the right (and acquit the individual) and the provincially created offence (which, assuming that the necessary facts are established by the Crown, would lead to a conviction). Acceptance of this understanding, therefore, has significant implications for the balance of federal and provincial authority.

The cases excerpted below are all of relatively recent origin, the oldest having been decided in the mid-1970s. The jurisprudence that predated these cases was far from consistent. During the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (JCPC) era, considerable support was shown for the occupying the field test. When the Supreme Court assumed the status of court of last resort, that test was rejected, and a much narrower one took its place. That narrower approach, which left a great deal of room for the concurrent operation of federal and provincial statutes, was exemplified by a series of cases dealing with highway traffic offences decided in the 1960s and 1970s, in which the Court declined to hold inoperative provincial statutes that imposed different—and almost always stricter—standards for driving offences than those set out in the Criminal Code. We begin with a case that deals not with highway traffic offences as such but with the consequences flowing from having been convicted of such an offence, in this instance an offence created by the Criminal Code.

Ross v Registrar of Motor Vehicles

[In 1972, under s 234 of the Criminal Code, Ross was convicted of driving while impaired. At the time, s 238(1) of the Code allowed a trial judge to make, in addition to any other punishment, "an order prohibiting the accused from driving a motor vehicle in Canada, at all times or at such times and places as may be specified in the order ... during any period not exceeding three years." (Section 238(1) had recently been amended; the previous version had only allowed for an order for a single, continuous period.) Section 238(2) provided that a copy of any order made under s 238(1) was to be sent to the registrar of motor vehicles for the province that had issued the accused's driver's licence. The judge sentencing Ross ordered that "[t]he accused shall be prohibited from driving for a period of six months except Monday to Friday, 8:00 a.m. to 5:45 p.m. in the course of employment and going to and from work" (at 7). The order further provided that Ross's driver's licence was not to be suspended and that the registrar of motor vehicles be advised of the order.

Despite the order, the registrar of motor vehicles in the province of Ontario, where Ross resided, suspended Ross's licence for three months in accordance with s 21 of the Ontario Highway Traffic Act, RSO 1990, c H.8. That section provided that the licence of any person convicted of an offence under any of several sections of the Criminal Code, including s 234, was thereupon suspended for a period of three months for the first offence and six months where personal injury, death, or damage to property occurred in connection with the offence.

Ross sought a declaration that s 21 of the Highway Traffic Act was inoperative because of its conflict with s 238 of the Criminal Code. The registrar of motor vehicles and the provincial attorney general responded by requesting a declaration that s 238(1) of the Criminal Code was ultra vires. The Supreme Court was required to deal with three issues: (1) was the provincial legislation—that is, s 21 of the Highway Traffic Act—valid; (2) was the federal legislation—that is, s 238(1) of the Criminal Code—valid; and (3) if both pieces of legislation were valid, was there a conflict between the two provisions, requiring the application of the rule of federal paramountcy, with the result that the provincial legislation would be inoperative.]

PIGEON J (Abbott, Martland, Ritchie, and Dickson JJ concurring):

[Justice Pigeon began by addressing the challenges to the validity of the federal and provincial enactments at issue. He rejected those challenges and therefore held that both laws had been validly enacted. With respect to the provincial legislation, he found that it dealt with licensing for the purpose of regulating highway traffic, primary responsibility for which rests with the provinces, and was not in its true character an attempt to prescribe further penalties for criminal offences. He found no basis for a claim that the federal legislation invaded provincial jurisdiction. He then proceeded to address the question of whether there was a conflict between the two enactments.]

The direction that Ross's operator's licence was not to be suspended shows that the judge who made the prohibitory order considered not only that the prohibition may be limited as to time and place, but also that the person to whom the order is directed should enjoy the right to drive at a specified time and place, irrespective of provincial legislation concerning the suspension of driving privileges. In terms, the Criminal Code merely provides for the making of prohibitory orders limited as to time and place. If such an order is made in respect of a period of time during which a provincial licence suspension is in effect, there is, strictly speaking, no repugnancy. Both legislations can fully operate simultaneously. It is true that this means that as long as the provincial licence suspension is in effect, the person concerned gets no benefit from the indulgence granted under the federal legislation. But is the situation any different in law from that which was considered in the Egan case [Provincial Secretary of Prince Edward Island v Egan, [1941] SCR 396], namely, that due to the provincial legislation, the right to drive was lost by reason of the conviction, although the convicting magistrate had made no prohibitory order whatsoever?

Reference was made in this case to s. 5(1) of the Criminal Code which reads:

- 5(1) Where an enactment creates an offence and authorizes a punishment to be imposed in respect thereof,
 - (a) a person shall be deemed not to be guilty of that offence until he is convicted thereof; and
 - (b) a person who is convicted of that offence is not liable to any punishment in respect thereof other than the punishment prescribed by this Act or by the enactment that creates the offence.

It should now be taken as settled that civil consequences of a criminal act are not to be considered as "punishment" so as to bring the matter within the exclusive jurisdiction of Parliament ...

In O'Grady v. Sparling, [1960] SCR 804, the question of repugnancy between Criminal Code provisions and provincial motor vehicle legislation was considered by the full Court. The problem was whether provincial legislation making it an offence to drive "without due care and attention" was repugnant to s. 221(1) (now

s. 233(1) of the Criminal Code). It was determined that the federal enactment did not make a crime of inadvertent negligence and [the provincial negligence offence] was valid. Only the two dissenting judges considered that "by necessary implication," the Criminal Code [also said what kinds or degrees of negligence shall (not) be punishable] In other words, the majority decided that Parliament did not implicitly permit conduct which did not come within the description of the Criminal Code offence. Therefore, the legislation could validly prohibit such conduct under penalty as long as this was done for a proper provincial purpose. ...

In my view, it should be said in the present case that Parliament did not ... purport to deal generally with the right to drive a motor vehicle after a conviction for certain offences. The only change effected was that a larger area of discretion was given to the convicting magistrate. Instead of being authorized only to make an order prohibiting driving for a definite length of time not exceeding the period stated, the magistrate was empowered to issue an order limited as to time and place. No authorization was given to make an order such as made in the present case, directing that the licence of the person convicted be not suspended. It seems clear to me that this order was made by an inferior Court completely without jurisdiction and is to be ignored.

It may be of some interest to observe that under the Australian constitution, a principle was developed to determine whether a field of legislation is to be considered as occupied by federal legislation so as to exclude or make inoperative State legislation. The rule was stated by Dixon J, in Ex p. McLean (1930), 43 CLR 472 at p. 483, in the following statement that was subsequently approved by the Privy Council (O'Sullivan v. Noarlunga Ltd., [1957] AC 1 at p. 28):

The inconsistency does not lie in the mere co-existence of two laws which are susceptible of simultaneous obedience. It depends upon the intention of the paramount legislature to express by its enactment, completely, exhaustively, or exclusively, what shall be the law governing the particular conduct or matter to which its attention is directed. When a Federal statute discloses such an intention, it is inconsistent with it for the law of a State to govern the same conduct or matter.

Of course, if we were to apply that rule, it would have to be said that Parliament did not purport to state exhaustively the law respecting motor driving licences, or the suspension or cancellation for driving offences. Therefore, the question whether this could validly be done by Parliament does not arise.

For those reasons, I would answer the questions of law stated in the order of the Supreme Court of Ontario by stating that s. 21 of the Highway Traffic Act is valid and operative legislation, and that s. 238 of the Criminal Code (as amended), is also valid. I would make no order as to costs as none were demanded.

JUDSON J (dissenting in part):

Turning now to the questions submitted, I am not in any doubt ... [that] s. 21 of the Highway Traffic Act is valid provincial legislation, and s. 238(1) of the Criminal Code, either in its original form or as amended in 1972, is within the powers of the Parliament of Canada. This was clearly decided in Provincial Secretary of Prince Edward Island v. Egan. The difficulty arises with respect to ... whether s. 21 of the Highway Traffic Act is rendered inoperative by s. 238(1) of the Criminal Code....

In the Ross case, the Criminal Code, as applied, and the provincial statute, s. 21 of the Highway Traffic Act, are in direct conflict and the federal legislation must prevail. This situation did not arise in the Egan case, where there was no order for the suspension of the licence made by the convicting magistrate. The power of the Province to impose an automatic suspension must give way to an order for punishment validly made under the Criminal Code and to that extent the provincial suspension is inoperative. ...

SPENCE J (dissenting in part):

... I have come to the conclusion that I agree with the views expressed by Mr. Justice Judson. ...

By the enactment of s. 238(1) in its amended form in 1972, Parliament has stipulated the penalties attached to the offence of, inter alia, impaired driving, and therefore the matters specified are excluded from provincial jurisdiction.

For the reasons outlined by my brother Judson, after the enactment of s. 238(1) in its present form and when that section is used by the Court ..., the subject-matter of the order made by that Court within its jurisdiction cannot be affected by the provision of the provincial statute dealing with suspension of licences and particularly s. 21 of the Highway Traffic Act. ...

I would therefore dispose of the Ross appeal in the fashion proposed by my brother Judson.

Judgment accordingly.

The narrower approach to paramountcy that emerged in the highway traffic cases in the 1960s and 1970s was confirmed by the Supreme Court of Canada in 1982 in Multiple Access Ltd v McCutcheon, immediately below, which is regarded as the foundational case on the modern approach to paramountcy. However, you will see from the cases that have succeeded Multiple Access that this remains an uncertain area of law as the Court has tried to respond to some of the limitations of a strict impossibility of dual compliance test while striving to adhere to the principle of leaving ample legislative space to the provinces.

Multiple Access Ltd v McCutcheon

[The facts of this case are set out in more detail in the excerpt dealing with the double aspect doctrine in Section III.B. Briefly, the case involved federal and Ontario statutes regulating insider trading in securities. The Ontario Securities Act, RSO 1970, c 426, prohibited insider trading in any and all shares trading on the Toronto Stock Exchange. The Canada Corporations Act, RSC 1970, c C-32, had almost identical provisions, but applicable only to trading of shares in corporations incorporated under federal law. A shareholder action was initiated against insiders of Multiple Access Inc, a federally incorporated company, with respect to trades on the Toronto Stock Exchange. The shareholder initiated the proceeding under the Ontario Securities Act, and the Ontario Securities Commission took carriage of the case. The respondents, the alleged insider traders, argued on the basis of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity that the Ontario statute could not validly apply to their case because the regulation of the trading in shares of federally incorporated companies falls within a core area of exclusive federal jurisdiction. In the alternative, they relied on the doctrine of federal paramountcy to assert that, in the case of a federally incorporated company, the Ontario provisions were rendered inoperative by the provisions of the Canada Corporations Act that deal with the issue. This latter argument was advantageous to the alleged insider traders because the limitation period for initiating an action under the federal statute had already elapsed.

The trial judge ruled that the federal and provincial laws could operate concurrently, but both the Divisional Court and the Court of Appeal took the view that the provincial law was inoperative by virtue of the doctrine of paramountcy. In the case extract reproduced in Section III, a majority of the Supreme Court relied on the double aspect doctrine to hold that both enactments were valid. That majority also held that the provincial legislation could constitutionally be applied to the trading in Ontario of the shares of federally incorporated companies. The majority then turned to the paramountcy issue: was the Ontario legislation rendered inoperative to the extent that it overlapped with the virtually identical provisions of the federal Act? Three dissenting judges decided that the federal provisions were invalid and thus did not reach the paramountcy issue.

The paramountcy issue usually requires judges to determine the degree of overlap or conflict between federal and provincial statutes that differ in at least some aspects. This case is distinctive in that the two pieces of legislation regulated insider trading in virtually identical ways. The question, therefore, was whether duplicate legislation could operate at both the federal and provincial levels, or was duplication itself a kind of conflict that should give rise to federal paramountcy? As you consider the issue, bear in mind the criteria outlined by Simeon at the outset of this chapter that are likely to influence judicial interpretation of the division of powers. What values could be invoked in favour of letting both laws stand? What values could be invoked in favour of using paramountcy to eliminate duplication and overlap?]

DICKSON J (Laskin CJ and Martland, Ritchie, McIntyre, and Lamer JJ concurring):

Having found ss. 100.4 and 100.5 of the Canada Corporations Act to be intra vires the Parliament of Canada, and ss. 113 and 114 of the Ontario Securities Act to be intra vires the Legislature of Ontario, there remains but to respond to the third and final question. [Are ss. 113 and 114 of the Ontario Act suspended and rendered inoperative in respect of corporations incorporated under the laws of Canada? ...

Although the appellant argues, weakly, that there are minor differences in the legislation, Henry J found an identity of purpose, conduct and remedy. Does mere duplication constitute "the conflict" required by the paramountcy doctrine in order to render a provincial statutory provision inoperative? This is the issue upon which Mr. Justice Henry at trial and Mr. Justice Morden in the Divisional Court parted ways. The same difference of opinion is reflected by the commentators.

Mr. Justice Henry chose a more narrow and if I may say so, more modern, test of conflict with the concomitant result of leaving to the provinces ample legislative room. He adopted the test propounded by Mr. Justice Martland in Smith v. The Queen, [1960] SCR 776 at 800:

It may happen that some acts might be punishable under both provisions and in this sense that these provisions overlap. However, even in such cases, there is no conflict in the sense that compliance with one law involves breach of the other. It would appear, therefore, that they can operate concurrently.

• • •

On the basis of the "overwhelming weight of recent authority" Mr. Justice Henry found that the two sets of statutory provisions could "live together and operate concurrently." Any "diseconomies" resulting from the proliferation of laws and administration were inherent in the federal system. Double liability would be avoided by "cooperation between administrators and the ordinary supervision of the courts over duplication of proceedings before them."

Mr. Justice Henry and Professor Hogg are of one mind. Professor Hogg writes:

There is no reason why duplication should be a case of inconsistency once the negative implication or covering the field test is rejected. On the contrary, duplication is "the ultimate in harmony." The argument that it is untidy, wasteful and confusing to have two laws when only one is needed reflects a value which in a federal system often has to be subordinated to that of provincial autonomy. Nor does the latter value disappear when provincial law merely duplicates federal law, because the suspension of a provincial law may create a gap in a provincial scheme of regulation which would have to be filled by federal law—a situation as productive of untidiness, waste and confusion as duplication.

[PW Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (Toronto: Carswell, 1977) at 110.]

Morden J adopts the older and more prevalent view of the commentators that "The authorities establish one of the implications of Dominion paramountcy to be that provincial duplicative legislation is suspended and inoperative. Simple duplication by a province is not permitted": Lederman, "The Concurrent Operation of Federal and Provincial Laws in Canada" (1963), 9 McGill LJ 185 at p. 195; see also B. Laskin, Laskin's Canadian Constitutional Law (Scarborough, ON: Carswell, 1975), at p. 117: "If member and federal measures are substantial duplicates, every situation covered by one is likewise covered by the other and there is no provincial room left, given full operation of the federal law." Morden J finds that "Resort to one statute, from a practical point of view, precludes the other from having any application."

The conflict between the reasons of Mr. Justice Henry and the reasons of Mr. Justice Morden lies in large measure upon the opinion of the latter that the paramountcy doctrine became applicable because a plaintiff could resort to one set of provisions only and, having done so, there would be no scope for the other to have operational effect. That ... is not, in my view, conclusive. The provincial legislation merely duplicates the federal; it does not contradict it. The fact that a plaintiff may have a choice of remedies does not mean that the provisions of both levels of government cannot "live together" and operate concurrently. ...

... [T]here is no true repugnancy in the case of merely duplicative provisions since it does not matter which statute is applied; the legislative purpose of Parliament will be fulfilled regardless of which statute is invoked by a remedy-seeker; application of the provincial law does not displace the legislative purpose of Parliament.

The respondents strenuously support Mr. Justice Morden's reasons in this court. Counsel for the respondent McCutcheon argues: "Where two actions are brought under the federal and provincial legislation against the insider, either concurrently or seriatum, the Court will not permit both to proceed to judgment. Both pieces of legislation cannot operate concurrently in that resort to one precludes resort to the other. In such case, the two statutes meet and are in conflict." I am not of that opinion.

With Mr. Justice Henry I would say that duplication is, to borrow Professor Lederman's phrase, "the ultimate in harmony." ... Mere duplication without actual conflict or contradiction is not sufficient to invoke the doctrine of paramountcy and render otherwise valid provincial legislation inoperative.

The following passage from Professor Lederman's article "The Concurrent Operation of Federal and Provincial Laws in Canada," supra, at p. 199 (fn. 39), is apposite:

[O]ur country is increasingly moving away from the older classical federalism of "watertight compartments" with provincial legislatures and federal parliament carefully keeping clear of one another. We seem to be moving towards a co-operative federalism. ... The multiplication of concurrent fields is one of the facets of this trend.

In principle, there would seem to be no good reason to speak of paramountcy and preclusion except where there is actual conflict in operation as where one enactment says "yes" and the other says "no"; "the same citizens are being told to do inconsistent things"; compliance with one is defiance of the other. The courts are well able to prevent double recovery in the theoretical and unlikely event of plaintiffs trying to obtain relief under both sets of provisions. The fact that a court must authorize proceedings under the Ontario Act provides a safeguard No court would permit double recovery.

I find that ss. 113 and 114 of the Securities Act of Ontario are not suspended or rendered inoperative in respect of corporations incorporated under the laws of Canada by ss. 100.4 and 100.5 of the Canada Corporations Act.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. What are we to make of Dickson CJ's statement that "[t]he courts are well able to prevent double recovery in the theoretical and unlikely event of plaintiffs trying to obtain relief under both sets of provisions"? Can this statement, which focuses on the position of a court seized of a dispute to which both enactments could be applied, be interpreted as lending support to the notion that the Court sees merit in the "impossibility of giving dual effect" understanding of conflict, either as a branch of the impossibility of dual compliance understanding or as a distinct understanding in its own right?

2. M & D Farm Ltd v Manitoba Agricultural Credit Corp, [1999] 2 SCR 961, 1999 CanLII 648 (cited with approval in Lafarge at para 82), concerned an alleged conflict between federal and provincial farm debt legislation. A stay of proceedings was issued under federal law at the same time as an order authorizing foreclosure proceedings pursuant to provincial legislation. A particular creditor could comply with both laws if they held off on foreclosure until the stay was lifted. Once the creditor sought to initiate foreclosure proceedings, however, a court could not also give effect to the federally imposed stay. On that basis, the Supreme Court of Canada held that there was "express contradiction" within the extended meaning of the relevant jurisprudence" (at para 42), and therefore the doctrine of federal paramountcy was triggered. Does M & D Farm support the inclusion of the impossibility of giving dual effect understanding of conflict in the list of accepted understandings? Why or why not?

3. The fact situation in Multiple Access involved duplicative legislation where there was no policy conflict between the federal and provincial schemes. Are the reasons adopted by the Court for favouring an "express contradiction" test compelling in situations where the overlapping federal and provincial laws differ in their objectives? Does Multiple Access mean that even in cases where the federal and provincial laws differ in that respect the courts are not to consider policy conflict in determining paramountcy but are only to ask whether a citizen can comply with both? See Bank of Montreal v Hall, [1990] 1 SCR 121, 1990 CanLII 157, which follows.

4. How should the courts deal with overlapping penal legislation? For example, how should the courts deal with a case where an individual could be prosecuted for an offence under both the federal Criminal Code and provincial regulatory legislation? This might happen in the case of a death in a workplace accident. Should the court consider principles of criminal law, such as double jeopardy? What is the effect of s 11(h) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms? See R v Wigglesworth, [1987] 2 SCR 541, 1987 CanLII 41.

Bank of Montreal v Hall

[In return for a bank loan, Hall, a farmer, granted the bank a security interest on a piece of farm machinery pursuant to what was then s 178 of the federal Bank Act, RSC 1985, c B-1 (now s 427 of the Bank Act, 1991, c 46). Hall defaulted on his loan, and the bank, pursuant to the provisions of the Bank Act, seized the piece of machinery and brought an action to enforce its real property mortgage loan agreement. The bank did not follow the procedures established in the provincial Limitation of Civil Rights Act, RSS 1978, c L-16. Under s 27 of that Act, failure to give the requisite notice of intention to seize resulted in the termination of the security interest and the release of the debtor from further obligations. The Court of Queen's Bench of Saskatchewan decided that the bank was not required to comply with the Limitation of Civil Rights Act in enforcing a security interest under the Bank Act. The Saskatchewan Court of Appeal reversed. On further appeal, the Supreme Court of Canada considered the validity of the relevant provisions of both Acts, as well as whether the security interest created under the Bank Act could be subjected to the provincial procedures for enforcement of security interests.

The judgment of the court was delivered by La Forest J. He held that ss 19 to 36 of the Limitation of Civil Rights Act came within property and civil rights under s 92(13) and were thus intra vires. He then concluded that ss 178 and 179 of the Bank Act were also intra vires the federal government under s 91(15). The banking power was found to empower Parliament not only to create the security interest but also to define the methods for realization and enforcement of that security interest. Reviewing the history of the s 178 security interest, which showed that its creation was predicated on the pressing need to provide, on a nationwide basis, for a uniform security mechanism, La Forest J reasoned that the definition of the precise manner in which a bank is permitted to realize on its s 178 security interest was not a mere appendage or gloss but actually inseparable from the legislative scheme.

In concluding that there was a conflict, La Forest J appears to depart somewhat from the narrow understanding of conflict articulated in Multiple Access. What values does La Forest J invoke, or what values could be invoked, in favour of his approach? What values could have been invoked in favour of an approach to paramountcy that would have upheld the Saskatchewan legislature's attempt to provide greater financial security to farmers?]

La FOREST J (Wilson, L'Heureux-Dubé, Sopinka, and Cory JJ concurring):

Do sections 178 and 179 of the Bank Act conflict with ss. 19 to 36 of the Limitation of Civil Rights Act so as to render inoperative ss. 19 to 36 in respect of security taken pursuant to s. 178 by a chartered bank?

The decision of this Court in Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon, [1982] 2 SCR 161, 138 DLR (3d) 1, has delimited the circumstances that will justify application of the doctrine of paramountcy, whereby otherwise validly enacted provincial legislation will be held to be inoperative to the extent that it conflicts with federal legislation. In a widely quoted passage, Dickson J, as he then was, espoused the view that the doctrine of paramountcy would only need to be invoked in instances where it is impossible to comply with both legislative enactments. ...

Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon was a case involving duplicative federal and provincial legislation. This Court rejected the view that such enactments could not operate concurrently simply because resort to the one would preclude resort to the other. . . . In the following excerpt Dickson J provides a cogent and succinct rationale for this view, at pp. 189-90 SCR:

... there is no true repugnancy in the case of merely duplicative provisions since it does not matter which statute is applied; the legislative purpose of Parliament will be fulfilled regardless of which statute is invoked by a remedy-seeker; application of the provincial law does not displace the legislative purpose of Parliament. [Emphasis added.]

On the basis of these principles, the question before me is thus reducible to asking whether there is an "actual conflict in operation" ... in the sense that the legislative purpose of Parliament stands to be displaced in the event that the appellant bank is required to defer to the provincial legislation in order to realize on its security. This calls for an examination of the provincial legislation. [Justice La Forest's detailed examination is omitted.]

On a comparison of the two enactments, can it be said that there is an "actual conflict in operation" between them, giving that phrase the meaning above described? I am led inescapably to the conclusion that there is. The Bank Act provides that a lender may, on the default of his borrower, seize his security, whereas The Limitation of Civil Rights Act forbids a creditor from immediately repossessing the secured article on pain of determination of the security interest. There could be no clearer instance of a case where compliance with the federal statute necessarily entails defiance of its provincial counterpart. The necessary corollary to this conclusion is that to require the bank to defer to the provincial legislation is to displace the legislative intent of Parliament. As the dissenting judge, Wakeling J, put it in the Court of Appeal, at pp. 34-35:

The provincial legislation obviously intends that the unqualified right of seizure granted to the bank is to be restricted. It does so by saying a bank may exercise the right of seizure given by s. 178(3) but only by leave of a judge, who will apply criteria formulated by the Province as to when and under what circumstances seizure can take place.

I do not think it is open to a provincial legislature to qualify in this way a right given and defined in a federal statute; see Attorney-General for Alberta and Winstanley v. Atlas Lumber Co., [1941] SCR 87, per Duff CJ, at p. 95.

I am not, with respect, dissuaded from this conclusion by the reasoning of the majority in the Court of Appeal to the effect that requiring a bank to defer to the provisions of the Limitation of Civil Rights Act would, in any given instance, have, in all likelihood, the sole effect of delaying the bank's ability to take possession of its security. ...

The reasoning of the majority ... rests on a misinterpretation of what was said in Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon. For, as we have seen, dual compliance will be impossible when application of the provincial statute can fairly be said to frustrate Parliament's legislative purpose. In this instance ... Parliament's legislative purpose in defining the unique security interest created by ss. 178 and 179 of the Bank Act was manifestly that of creating a security interest susceptible of uniform enforcement by the banks nationwide, that is to say a lending regime sui generis in which [citing Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce v. R (1984), 52 CBR 145, at p. 159], the "bank obtains and may assert its right to the goods and their proceeds against the world, except as only Parliament itself may reduce or modify those rights" (emphasis added). This, of course, is merely another way of saying that Parliament, in its wisdom, wished to guard against creating a lending regime whereby the rights of the banks would be made to depend solely on provincial legislation governing the realization and enforcement of security interests.

I can only conclude that it was Parliament's manifest legislative purpose that the sole realization scheme applicable to the s. 178 security interest be that contained in the Bank Act itself. ... [T]he security interest and realization procedure must, in essence, be viewed as a single whole in that both components of the legislation are fully integral to Parliament's legislative purpose in creating this form of financing. In other words, a s. 178 security interest would no longer be cognizable as such the moment provincial legislation might operate to superadd conditions governing realization over and above those found within the confines of the Bank Act. To allow this would be to set at naught the very purpose behind the creation of the s. 178 security interest.

Accordingly, the determination that there is no repugnancy cannot ... rest on the [fact] that, at the end of the day, the bank might very well be able to realize on its security if it defers to the provisions of the provincial legislation. ... That conclusion, in my view, would simply beg the question. The focus of the inquiry, rather, must be on the broader question whether operation of the provincial Act is compatible with the federal legislative purpose. Absent this compatibility, dual compliance is impossible. Such is the case here. ...

... At the end of the day, ... this is simply a case where Parliament, under its power to regulate banking, has enacted a complete code that at once defines and provides for the realization of a security interest. There is no room left for the operation of the provincial legislation and that legislation should, accordingly, be construed as inapplicable to the extent that it trenches on valid federal banking legislation.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The decision in Hall is difficult to reconcile with a number of earlier cases that upheld as operative provincial laws requiring compliance with more stringent standards than their federal counterparts. For example, in Ross, excerpted above, the Court held that drivers who were convicted of a serious driving offence under the federal Criminal Code, but then permitted by the sentencing judge to continue driving to and from work, could comply with the more severe licence suspension, which provincial legislation imposed as a result of the conviction, by simply not driving at all. Similarly, as Professor Hogg has pointed out, it was possible for a bank to comply with both laws in Hall: "If the bank had served the notice required by the provincial law, the bank would not have been in breach of the federal law. The sole effect of compliance with the provincial law would be to delay the bank in realizing its security": Peter W Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada, 5th ed (Toronto: Carswell, 2007) (looseleaf) at 16-8. After Hall, it appeared that the "conflict in operation" referred to in Multiple Access that is necessary to give rise to federal paramountcy can be satisfied by either an impossibility of dual compliance or an incompatibility of legislative purposes.

2. Justice La Forest attached considerable importance in his reasoning process to the finding that, in his view, "it was Parliament's manifest legislative purpose that the sole realization scheme applicable to the s. 178 security interest be that contained in the Bank Act itself." Are we to take from this recognition of the "federal intention to cover the field" as a distinct basis on which to apply the federal paramountcy doctrine, or does it merely suggest that such a federal intention is a relevant consideration in applying the "frustration of federal purpose" test?

3. Do you believe that the federal intention to cover the field understanding of conflict should be a distinct basis on which to apply the paramountcy doctrine? Should it be open to Parliament to trigger the application of the doctrine simply by including language in federal legislation to the effect that "Parliament intends that this legislation apply even if it means that valid provincial legislation directed to the same area will have to be held inoperative"? For an argument that it should not be open to Parliament to do that, see Robin Elliot, "Safeguarding Provincial Autonomy from the Supreme Court's New Federal Paramountcy Doctrine: A Constructive Role for the Intention to Cover the Field Test?" (2007) 38 SCLR (2d) 629.

4. At the end of his judgment in Bell No 2, found below in Section V, Beetz J inserted an obiter dictum suggesting that "a practical and functional incompatibility" between two legal regimes should be sufficient to give rise to federal paramountcy. Justice Beetz held that the interjurisdictional immunity doctrine (see Section V below) prevented the application of Quebec health and safety legislation to federal undertakings. Therefore, a paramountcy issue did not arise. If it had arisen, however, he would have held the provincial law inoperative. As he explained (at para 332), a procedural conflict may suffice to render the provincial act inoperative if the conflict is irreconcilable or if, as the majority held, it leads to a deadlock. The mere duplication of two enactments certainly does not make the Act inoperative: Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon However, in view of the difference between the mechanisms resulting in re-assignment in both statutes, between the rights conferred on workers under the two schemes, between the types of danger which give rise to the right, between the procedures and the avenues of appeal, I am inclined to think as did the majority on the Court of Appeal that there is a practical and functional incompatibility between the two groups of provisions.

5. What values influence the choice between the broader test of paramountcy favoured by La Forest J in Hall and Beetz J in Bell No 2 and the narrower approach favoured by Dickson J in Multiple Access? Which of the "criteria of choice" identified by Simeon at the outset of this chapter would you invoke in favour of each approach?

6. The Hall incompatibility of legislative purposes approach to paramountcy was followed in Mangat. The case involved a conflict between a provision of the BC Legal Profession Act that prohibited non-lawyers from appearing as counsel for a fee and provisions of the federal Immigration Act that permitted non-lawyers to appear as counsel before the IRB. (The federal legislation made provision for regulations to be made concerning the appearance of persons other than members of a provincial bar before immigration tribunals, but no such regulations had been promulgated.) Justice Gonthier, writing for the Court, found that both laws were valid; the regulation of legal representation in immigration proceedings had a double aspect. Turning to the paramountcy issue, Gonthier J concluded as follows:

[72] In this case, there is an operational conflict as the provincial legislation prohibits non-lawyers to appear for a fee before a tribunal but the federal legislation authorizes non-lawyers to appear as counsel for a fee. At a superficial level, a person who seeks to comply with both enactments can succeed either by becoming a member in good standing of the Law Society of British Columbia or by not charging a fee. Complying with the stricter statute necessarily involves complying with the other statute. However, following the expanded interpretation given in cases like M & D Farm and Bank of Montreal ... , dual compliance is impossible. To require "other counsel" to be a member in good standing of the bar of the province or to refuse the payment of a fee would go contrary to Parliament's purpose in enacting ss. 30 and 69(1) of the Immigration Act. In those provisions, Parliament provided that aliens could be represented by non-lawyers acting for a fee, and in this respect it was pursuing the legitimate objective of establishing an informal, accessible (in financial, cultural, and linguistic terms), and expeditious process, peculiar to administrative tribunals. Where there is an enabling federal law, the provincial law cannot be contrary to Parliament's purpose. Finally, it would be impossible for a judge or an official of the IRB to comply with both acts.

Note that Gonthier J applied more than the frustration of federal purpose understanding of conflict in this passage. Which other understandings did he also apply?

7. The Hall approach was also applied in 114957 Canada Ltée (Spraytech, Société d'arrosage) v Hudson (Town), 2001 SCC 40. At issue was a municipal by-law that restricted the use of pesticides to specified locations for specified purposes. The Court ruled that the by-law was not rendered inoperative by the federal Pest Control Products Act, SC 2002, c 28. The federal Act regulated which pesticides could be registered for manufacture or use in Canada. Justice L'Heureux-Dubé, writing the principal judgment for four members of the Court, characterized the federal law as permissive legislation that did not purport to exhaustively regulate pesticides. In those circumstances, she ruled, there was no conflict that gave rise to federal paramountcy. There was no impossibility of dual compliance, L'Heureux-Dubé J wrote, nor did the by-law displace or frustrate the purpose of the federal legislation.

Rothmans, Benson & Hedges Inc v Saskatchewan

MAJOR J (McLachlin CJ and Major, Bastarache, Binnie, LeBel, Deschamps, Fish, Abella, and Charron JJ concurring):

[1] The question on this appeal is whether Saskatchewan legislation, and in particular s. 6 of The Tobacco Control Act, SS 2001, c. T-14.1, is sufficiently inconsistent with s. 30 of the federal Tobacco Act, SC 1997, c. 13, so as to be rendered inoperative pursuant to the doctrine of federal legislative paramountcy. At the end of the hearing, the Court concluded that that question should be answered in the negative and allowed the appeal, with reasons to follow.

I. Facts

[2] In 1997, Parliament enacted the Tobacco Act. Section 4 of the statute speaks to its purpose as follows:

4. The purpose of this Act is to provide a legislative response to a national public health problem of substantial and pressing concern and, in particular,
 - (a) to protect the health of Canadians in light of conclusive evidence implicating tobacco use in the incidence of numerous debilitating and fatal diseases;
 - (b) to protect young persons and others from inducements to use tobacco products and the consequent dependence on them;
 - (c) to protect the health of young persons by restricting access to tobacco products; and
 - (d) to enhance public awareness of the health hazards of using tobacco products.

[3] Section 19 of the Tobacco Act prohibits the promotion of tobacco products and tobacco product-related brand elements, except as authorized elsewhere in the Tobacco Act or its regulations. Section 18 of the Tobacco Act defines "promotion" as:

... a representation about a product or service by any means, whether directly or indirectly, including any communication of information about a product or service and its price and distribution, that is likely to influence and shape attitudes, beliefs and behaviours about the product or service.

[4] The provisions that follow s. 19 both prohibit specific types of tobacco product promotion, and permit other types of promotion that s. 19 would otherwise prohibit. Among those provisions, s. 30(1) provides that, "[s]ubject to the regulations, any person may display, at retail, a tobacco product or an accessory that displays a tobacco product-related brand element." Section 30(2) further provides that retailers may post signs indicating the availability and price of tobacco products.

[5] On March 11, 2002, The Tobacco Control Act came into force in Saskatchewan. Section 6 of that Act bans all advertising, display and promotion of tobacco or tobacco-related products in any premises in which persons under 18 years of age are permitted.

[6] The respondent sued the appellant in the Saskatchewan Court of Queen's Bench, seeking two forms of relief: a declaration that s. 6 of The Tobacco Control Act is inoperative in light of s. 30 of the Tobacco Act, and a declaration that ss. 6 and 7 of The Tobacco Control Act are of no force and effect in light of s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The respondent applied ... for a summary determination by the court as to whether s. 6 of The Tobacco Control Act is inoperative in light of s. 30 of the Tobacco Act by virtue of the doctrine of federal legislative paramountcy.

III. Analysis

[11] The doctrine of federal legislative paramountcy dictates that where there is an inconsistency between validly enacted but overlapping provincial and federal legislation, the provincial legislation is inoperative to the extent of the inconsistency. Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon, [1982] 2 SCR 161, is often cited for the proposition that there is an inconsistency for the purposes of the doctrine if it is impossible to comply simultaneously with both provincial and federal enactments. Dickson J (as he then was) wrote, at p. 191:

In principle, there would seem to be no good reasons to speak of paramountcy and preclusion except where there is actual conflict in operation as where one enactment says "yes" and the other says "no"; "the same citizens are being told to do inconsistent things"; compliance with one is defiance of the other. ...

[12] However, subsequent cases indicate that impossibility of dual compliance is not the sole mark of inconsistency. Provincial legislation that displaces or frustrates Parliament's legislative purpose is also inconsistent for the purposes of the doctrine. In Bank of Montreal v. Hall, [1990] 1 SCR 121, at p. 155, La Forest J wrote:

A showing that conflict can be avoided if a provincial Act is followed to the exclusion of a federal Act can hardly be determinative of the question whether the provincial and federal acts are in conflict, and, hence, repugnant. That conclusion, in my view, would simply beg the question. The focus of the inquiry, rather, must be on the broader question whether operation of the provincial Act is compatible with the federal legislative purpose.

[Reference was also made to Spraytech and Mangat, both discussed above.]

[13] This concern about frustration of Parliament's legislative purpose may find its roots in McCutcheon, in which Dickson J stated, at p. 190:

... [T]here is no true repugnancy in the case of merely duplicative provisions since it does not matter which statute is applied; the legislative purpose of Parliament will be fulfilled regardless of which statute is invoked by a remedy-seeker; application of the provincial law does not displace the legislative purpose of Parliament. [Emphasis added.]

[14] In my view, the overarching principle to be derived from McCutcheon and later cases is that a provincial enactment must not frustrate the purpose of a federal enactment, whether by making it impossible to comply with the latter or by some other means. In this way, impossibility of dual compliance is sufficient but not the only test for inconsistency.

[15] It follows that in determining whether s. 6 of The Tobacco Control Act is sufficiently inconsistent with s. 30 of the Tobacco Act so as to be rendered inoperative through the paramountcy doctrine, two questions arise. First, can a person simultaneously comply with s. 6 of The Tobacco Control Act and s. 30 of the Tobacco Act? Second, does s. 6 of The Tobacco Control Act frustrate Parliament's purpose in enacting s. 30 of the Tobacco Act?

[16] Before answering those questions, it is necessary to examine the character of s. 30 of the Tobacco Act.

[17] Read in the context of the Tobacco Act as a whole, it is clear that the purpose and effect of s. 30 is to define with greater precision the prohibition on the promotion of tobacco products contained in s. 19. Specifically, it serves to exclude from the wide net of s. 19 promotion by way of retail display. In this way, it is like ss. 22(2), 26(1) and 28(1) of the Tobacco Act, which also exclude from the s. 19 prohibition certain types of tobacco product promotion that it might otherwise capture. This demarcation of the s. 19 prohibition represents a measured approach to protecting "young persons and others from inducements to use tobacco products," one of the purposes of the Tobacco Act set out in s. 4.

[18] However, in demarcating the scope of the s. 19 prohibition through s. 30, Parliament did not grant, and could not have granted, retailers a positive entitlement to display tobacco products. That is so for two reasons.

[19] First, ... the Tobacco Act is directed at a public health evil and contains prohibitions accompanied by penal sanctions. Accordingly, ... it falls within the scope of Parliament's criminal law power contained in s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867. ... As the criminal law power is essentially prohibitory in character, provisions enacted pursuant to it, ... do not ordinarily create freestanding rights that limit the ability of the provinces to legislate in the area more strictly than Parliament. This limited reach of s. 91(27) is well understood: see, for example, O'Grady v. Sparling, [1960] SCR 804; Ross v. Registrar of Motor Vehicles, [1975] 1 SCR 5; and Spraytech.

[20] Second, it is difficult to imagine how granting retailers a freestanding right to display tobacco products would assist Parliament in providing "a legislative response to a national public health problem of substantial and pressing concern" (Tobacco Act, s. 4). To put it slightly differently, an interpretation of s. 30 as granting retailers an entitlement to display tobacco products is unsupported by, and perhaps even contrary to, the stated purposes of the Tobacco Act.

[21] I do not accept the respondent's argument that Parliament, in enacting s. 30, intended to make the retail display of tobacco products subject only to its own regulations. In my view, to impute to Parliament such an intention to "occup[y] the field" in the absence of very clear statutory language to that effect would be to stray from the path of judicial restraint in questions of paramountcy that this Court has taken since at least O'Grady (p. 820).

A. Impossibility of Dual Compliance

[22] It is plain that dual compliance is possible in this case. A retailer can easily comply with both s. 30 of the Tobacco Act and s. 6 of The Tobacco Control Act in one of two ways: by admitting no one under 18 years of age on to the premises or by not displaying tobacco or tobacco-related products.

[23] Similarly, a judge called upon to apply one of the statutes does not face any difficulty in doing so occasioned by the existence of the other. The judge, like this Court, can proceed on the understanding that The Tobacco Control Act simply prohibits what Parliament has opted not to prohibit in its own legislation and regulations.

[24] For an impossibility of dual compliance to exist, s. 30 of the Tobacco Act would have to require retailers to do what s. 6 of The Tobacco Control Act prohibits—i.e., to display tobacco or tobacco-related products to young persons.

B. Frustration of Legislative Purpose

[25] Section 6 of The Tobacco Control Act does not frustrate the legislative purpose underlying s. 30 of the Tobacco Act. Both the general purpose of the Tobacco Act (to address a national public health problem) and the specific purpose of s. 30 (to circumscribe the Tobacco Act's general prohibition on promotion of tobacco products set out in s. 19) remain fulfilled. Indeed, s. 6 of The Tobacco Control Act appears to further at least two of the stated purposes of the Tobacco Act, namely, "to protect young persons and others from inducements to use tobacco products" (s. 4(b)) and "to protect the health of young persons by restricting access to tobacco products" (s. 4(c)).

[26] The conclusion that s. 6 of The Tobacco Control Act does not frustrate the purpose of s. 30 of the Tobacco Act is consistent with the position of the Attorney General of Canada, who intervened in this appeal to submit that the Tobacco Act and The Tobacco Control Act were enacted for the same health-related purposes and that there is no inconsistency between the two provisions at issue. While the submissions of the federal government are obviously not determinative of the legal question of inconsistency, there is precedent from this Court for bearing in mind the other level of government's position in resolving federalism issues

IV. Conclusion

[27] There is no inconsistency between s. 6 of The Tobacco Control Act and s. 30 of the Tobacco Act that would render the former inoperative pursuant to the doctrine of federal legislative paramountcy. ...

Appeal allowed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Justice Major considered, but rejected, the argument made by the tobacco company in this case that s 6 of the provincial statute should be held inoperative because Parliament, in enacting s 30 of the federal statute, intended "to make the retail display of tobacco products subject only to its own regulations" (at para 21). In your view, did he reject that argument because he refused to accept that the federal intention to cover the field understanding of conflict can be used as a distinct basis for applying the doctrine of federal paramountcy, or did he reject it because he was unwilling to find on the evidence available that Parliament had such an intention when it enacted s 30? Why is that an important question to ask?

2. Does para 23 of this decision, in which Major J said that "a judge called upon to apply one of the statutes does not face any difficulty in doing so occasioned by the existence of the other," lend support to the recognition of the impossibility of giving dual effect understanding of conflict as a distinct basis on which to apply the doctrine of federal paramountcy?

3. In Canadian Western Bank, excerpted in Section V below, the Supreme Court of Canada, after rejecting the application of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity on the facts of the case, was unanimous in rejecting a claim that the Alberta legislation regulating the promotion of insurance was rendered inoperative in relation to banks under the doctrine of federal paramountcy. The banks had argued that "the federal Bank Act authorizes the banks to promote insurance, subject to enumerated restrictions, and that these enactments are comprehensive and paramount over those of the province" (at para 98). Justices Binnie and LeBel for the majority, and Bastarache J writing separately, held that neither the impossibility of dual compliance test nor the frustration of federal purpose test was satisfied in the circumstances of that case. The reasoning of Binnie and Lebel JJ in relation to the paramountcy issue included the following passages:

[37] The "dominant tide" [of constitutional interpretation] finds its principled underpinning in the concern that a court should favour, where possible, the ordinary operation of statutes enacted by both levels of government. In the absence of conflicting enactments of the other level of government, the Court should avoid blocking the application of measures which are taken to be enacted in furtherance of the public interest. Professor Paul Weiler wrote over 30 years ago that the court should refuse to try to protect alleged, but as yet unoccupied, enclaves of governmental power against the intrusions of another representative legislature which has ventured into the area. Instead, the court should try to restrict itself to the lesser but still important role of interpreting statutes of different jurisdictions in the same area, in order to avoid conflict, and applying a doctrine of paramountcy in the few situations which are left.

[74] ... [C]are must be taken not to give too broad a scope to Hall, Mangat and Rothmans. The Court has never given any indication that it intended, in those cases, to reverse its previous decisions and adopt the "occupied field" test it had clearly rejected in O'Grady in 1960. The fact that Parliament has legislated in respect of a matter does not lead to the presumption that in so doing it intended to rule out any possible provincial action in respect of that subject. As this Court recently stated, "to impute to Parliament such an intention to 'occupy[] the field' in the absence of very clear statutory language to that effect would be to stray from the path of judicial restraint in questions of paramountcy that this Court has taken since at least O'Grady" (Rothmans, at para. 21).

[75] An incompatible federal legislative intent must be established by the party relying on it, and the courts must never lose sight of the fundamental rule of constitutional interpretation that, "[w]hen a federal statute can be properly interpreted so as not to interfere with a provincial statute, such an interpretation is to be applied in preference to another applicable construction which would bring about a conflict between the two statutes" (Attorney General of Canada v. Law Society of British Columbia [[1982] 2 SCR 307], at p. 356). To sum up, the onus is on the party relying on the doctrine of federal paramountcy to demonstrate that the federal and provincial laws are in fact incompatible by establishing either that it is impossible to comply with both laws or that to apply the provincial law would frustrate the purpose of the federal law.

4. By contrast, in Lafarge, Binnie and LeBel JJ, writing for a majority of six, held that the provincial legislation there at issue—a municipal zoning and development by-law—conflicted with and was thus rendered inoperative by the provisions of the Canada Marine Act, which authorized the Vancouver Port Authority to regulate land use on property it owned. In their view, both tests for finding a conflict were satisfied. The impossibility of dual compliance test was said to be satisfied because "[i]f the Ratepayers had succeeded in persuading the City to seek an injunction to stop the Lafarge project from going ahead without a city permit, the judge could not have given effect both to the federal law (which would have led to a dismissal of the application) and the municipal law (which would have led to the granting of an injunction)" (at para 82). The frustration of federal purpose test was said to be satisfied because "the [Canada Marine Act] has authorized the [Vancouver Port Authority] to make its decision about the project and has enabled Lafarge to proceed on the basis of that authorization" (at para 84). Do you agree with the majority's application of these tests in that case? In relation to the first, is the majority using the impossibility to give dual effect test? In relation to the second, has the majority not substituted the intention to cover the field test for the frustration of the federal purpose test? (For an argument that the paramountcy doctrine was misapplied, see Carissima Mathen & Michael Plaxton, "Developments in Constitutional Law: The 2006-2007 Term" (2007) 38 SCLR (2d) 111 at 134-36.)

5. In COPA, excerpted in Section V below, the majority, speaking through McLachlin CJ, held that the provincial land-use legislation at issue was inapplicable to the location of a private aerodrome on the basis of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity. Although it was therefore unnecessary to address the paramountcy issue that had been raised by the challengers as an alternative line of argument in their attempt to avoid the reach of the provincial legislation, the majority nonetheless did go on to address it. The challengers' argument on that issue was essentially that the absence of any meaningful federal restrictions on the location of private aerodromes should be understood to mean that Parliament wanted to encourage people to establish such facilities wherever and whenever it wished to and that giving effect to the provincial legislation's prohibition against using land designated agricultural for any other purpose would frustrate that purpose. Chief Justice McLachlin rejected that argument on the basis that there was insufficient evidence in the record to prove that Parliament "deliberately adopted minimal requirements for the construction and licensing of aerodromes in order to encourage the spread of aerodromes" (at para 68). Before reaching that conclusion, McLachlin CJ said the following regarding the burden that rests on a party seeking to invoke the doctrine of federal paramountcy:

[66] ... That party must prove that the impugned legislation frustrates the purpose of a federal enactment. To do so, it must first establish the purpose of the relevant federal statute, and then prove that the provincial legislation is incompatible with this purpose. The standard for invalidating provincial legislation on the basis of frustration of federal purpose is high; permissive federal legislation, without more, will not establish that a federal purpose is frustrated when provincial legislation restricts the scope of the federal permission.

6. For another example of a case in which the Court adopted a restrained approach to the application of the federal paramountcy doctrine, see Saskatchewan (AG) v Lemare Lake Logging Ltd, 2015 SCC 53. The dispute in that case arose when Lemare Lake Logging Ltd (Lemare) brought an application under s 243(1) of the federal Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, RSC 1985, c B-3 (BIA), for the appointment of a receiver over most of the assets of another company, called 3L Company Ltd. That company, which owed Lemare a considerable amount of money and in respect of which Lemare was a secured creditor, was involved in the farming business, which brought it under the protection of the Saskatchewan Farm Security Act, SS 1988-89, c S-17.1. That statute stipulated that no civil actions could be commenced with respect to farm land in that province unless and until a number of preliminary steps had been taken. Lemare had not taken any of those steps. In spite of the similarities between this case and Hall, Abella and Gascon JJ, writing for the majority, held that the relevant provisions of the provincial statute did not conflict with s 243(1) of the BIA. In their view, the purpose of the latter provision was the narrow one of allowing secured creditors to apply for the appointment of a single, national receiver instead of having to apply for separate receivers in several provinces. It could therefore not be said that the provincial legislation frustrated the federal purpose. In the course of their reasoning, they invoked the principle of cooperative federalism and said that "harmonious interpretations of federal and provincial legislation should be favoured over interpretations that result in incompatibility" (at para 21).

Alberta (AG) v Moloney

[The Supreme Court of Canada was unanimous in this case, on the basis of the frustration of federal purpose test, that the provincial legislation at issue conflicted with, and therefore had to be held inoperative in the face of, the federal legislation at issue. However, there was a sharp disagreement between two sets of judges about the content or meaning of the impossibility of dual compliance test. Two members of the Court, writing through Côté J, argued for a strict interpretation of that test, whereas the other seven members, writing through Gascon J, adopted a more flexible interpretation. We reproduce here passages from each of the two judgments that bring this disagreement to light. As you read through these passages, ask yourself which of the two approaches you find more appealing and why.]

GASCON J (Abella, Rothstein, Cromwell, Moldaver, Karakatsanis, and Wagner JJ concurring):

[2] The alleged conflict in this case concerns, on the one hand, the federal Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("BIA"), and on the other hand, Alberta's Traffic Safety Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. T-6 ("TSA"). It stems from a car accident caused by the respondent while he was uninsured, contrary to s. 54 of the TSA. The province of Alberta compensated the individual injured in the accident and sought to recover the amount of the compensation from the respondent. The latter, however, made an assignment in bankruptcy and was eventually discharged. The BIA governs bankruptcy and provides that, upon discharge, the respondent is released from all debts that are claims provable in bankruptcy. The TSA governs the activity of driving, including vehicle permits and driver's licences, and allows the province to suspend the respondent's licence and permits until he pays the amount of the compensation.

[3] As a result of his bankruptcy and subsequent discharge, the respondent did not pay the amount of the compensation in full; because of this failure to pay, Alberta suspended his vehicle permits and driver's licence. The respondent contested this suspension, arguing that the TSA conflicted with the BIA, in that it frustrated the purposes of bankruptcy. The province replied that there was no conflict since the TSA was regulatory in nature and did not purport to enforce a discharged debt.

[18] A conflict is said to arise in one of two situations, which form the two branches of the paramountcy test: (1) there is an operational conflict because it is impossible to comply with both laws, or (2) although it is possible to comply with both laws, the operation of the provincial law frustrates the purpose of the federal enactment.

[Justice Gascon reviewed the Court's prior jurisprudence, starting with Multiple Access, and reached the following conclusions:

[22] ... An express contradiction is nothing more than a clear, direct or definite conflict in operation, as opposed to an indirect or imprecise one. It is not an additional condition for a finding of actual conflict in operation.

[23] ... I find no indication in the Court's decisions pertaining to this first branch that the assessment of an actual conflict in operation is limited to the actual words or to the literal meaning of the words of the provisions at issue; quite the contrary.

[26] That said, the case law assists in identifying typical situations where overlapping legislation will not lead to a conflict. For instance, duplicative federal and provincial provisions will generally not conflict . . . Nor will a conflict arise where a provincial law is more restrictive than a federal law . . . The application of a more restrictive provincial law may, however, frustrate the federal purpose if the federal law, instead of being merely permissive, provides for a positive entitlement . . .

[27] Be it under the first or the second branch, the burden of proof rests on the party alleging the conflict. Discharging that burden is not an easy task, and the standard is always high. In keeping with co-operative federalism, the doctrine of paramountcy is applied with restraint. It is presumed that Parliament intends its laws to co-exist with provincial laws. Absent a genuine inconsistency, courts will favour an interpretation of the federal legislation that allows the concurrent operation of both laws . . . Conflict must be defined narrowly, so that each level of government may act as freely as possible within its respective sphere of authority . . .

[28] This is not to say, however, that courts must refrain from applying the doctrine where the two laws are genuinely inconsistent. In the assessment of such inconsistency for the purposes of paramountcy, a provincial intention to interfere with the federal jurisdiction is neither necessary nor sufficient. In fact, an intention to intrude may call into question the independent validity of the provincial law . . . The focus of the paramountcy analysis is instead on the effect of the provincial law, rather than its purpose . . . Assessing the effect of the provincial law requires looking at the substance of the law, rather than its form. The province cannot do indirectly what it is precluded from doing directly . . .

[Justice Gascon then proceeded to apply his understanding of the impossibility of the dual compliance test to the overlapping legislation at issue in that case. He began this part of his reasons for judgment with a detailed description of the federal and provincial legislation at issue.]

[60] ... In a case like this one, the test for operational conflict cannot be limited to asking whether the respondent can comply with both laws by renouncing the protection afforded to him or her under the federal law or the privilege he or she is otherwise entitled to under the provincial law. In that regard, the debtor's response to the suspension of his or her driving privileges is not determinative. In analyzing the operational conflict at issue in this case, we cannot disregard the fact that whether the debtor pays or not, the province, as a creditor, is still compelling payment of a provable claim that has been released, which is in direct contradiction with s. 178(2) of the BIA . . . Thus, the laws at issue give inconsistent answers to the question whether there is an enforceable obligation: one law says yes and the other says no.

• • •

[63] One law consequently provides for the release of all claims provable in bankruptcy and prohibits creditors from enforcing them, while the other disregards this release and allows for the use of a debt enforcement mechanism on such a claim by precisely excluding a discharge in bankruptcy. This is a true incompatibility. Both laws cannot operate concurrently . . . "apply concurrently" . . . or "operate side by side without conflict" . . . The facts of this appeal indeed show an actual conflict in operation of the two provisions. This is a case where the provincial law says "yes" ("Alberta can enforce this provable claim"), while the federal law says "no" ("Alberta cannot enforce this provable claim"). The provincial law gives the province a right that the federal law denies, and maintains a liability from which the debtor has been released under the federal law.

[69] Neither can the question under the operational conflict branch of the paramountcy test be whether it is possible to refrain from applying the provincial law in order to avoid the alleged conflict with the federal law. To argue that the province is not required to use s. 102 in the context of bankruptcy, or that it can choose not to withhold the respondent's driving privileges, leads to a superficial application of the operational conflict test. To suggest that a conflict can be avoided by complying with the federal law to the exclusion of the provincial law cannot be a valid answer to the question whether there is "actual conflict in operation," as the majority of the Court put it in Multiple Access To so conclude would render the first branch of the paramountcy test meaningless, since it is virtually always possible to avoid the application of a provincial law so as not to cause a conflict with a federal law. ...

[75] I therefore conclude that s. 102 of the TSA allows the province, or a third party creditor, to enforce a provable claim that has been released. To that extent, it conflicts with s. 178(2) of the BIA. It is impossible for the province to apply s. 102 without contravening s. 178(2) and, as a result, for the respondent to simultaneously be liable to pay the judgment debt under the provincial scheme and be released from that same claim pursuant to s. 178(2) Section 178 is a complete code in that it sets out which debts are released on discharge and which debts survive bankruptcy. In effect, s. 102 creates a new class of exempt debts that is not listed in s. 178(1). Hence, in the words used by my colleague in her reasons ... , "the provincial law allows the very same thing"—the enforcement of a debt released under s. 178(2) of the BIA—that "the federal law prohibits." The result is an operational conflict between the provincial and federal provisions.

[Justice Gascon then proceeded in obiter to apply the frustration of federal purpose test to the facts of this case. He concluded that it too led to a finding that the provincial legislation conflicted with the federal legislation.]

CÔTÉ J (McLachlin CJ concurring):

[91] I agree that what is at the core of this appeal is the frustration of a federal purpose. Therefore, I concur with Gascon J. insofar as he finds that s. 102 of the [TSA] frustrates the purpose of financial rehabilitation that underlies s. 178(2) of the federal [BIA], and that s. 102 is accordingly inoperative to the extent of the conflict by reason of the doctrine of federal paramountcy. However, I do not believe that there is an operational conflict to speak of in this appeal.

[92] There is no doubt in my mind that s. 102 of the TSA allows Alberta to do indirectly what it is implicitly prohibited from doing under s. 178(2) of the BIA, but in light of the indirect nature of the conflict, this issue is properly dealt with on the basis of the second branch of the federal paramountcy test, not the first.

[93] In my respectful view, Gascon J.'s analysis contrasts with the clear standard that has been adopted for the purpose of determining whether an operational conflict exists in the context of the federal paramountcy test: impossibility of dual compliance as a result of an express conflict. My colleague's approach conflates the two branches of the federal paramountcy test, or at a minimum blurs the difference between them and returns the jurisprudence to the state it was at before the second branch was recognized as a separate branch. And it has an additional serious adverse effect: by expanding the definition of conflict in the first branch, it increases the number of situations in which a federal law might be found to pre-empt a provincial law without an in-depth analysis of Parliament's intent.

[95] In the case at bar, it is clear from the provisions themselves that as a result of how the two legislatures decided to exercise their respective powers, dual compliance is not impossible. The provincial and federal provisions at issue do not expressly conflict; they are different in terms of their contents and of the remedies that they provide. One of them does not permit what the other specifically prohibits.

[96] Under s. 178 of the BIA, a bankrupt is discharged from all claims provable in bankruptcy. That section says nothing more. One must be careful, in light of the federal purpose of financial rehabilitation, not to add words to the provision.

[97] Thus, s. 102 of the TSA does not revive an extinguished claim per se; if a debtor chooses not to drive, the province simply cannot enforce its claim. Rather, s. 102 allows the province to suspend a driver's licence, which gives it some leverage to compel payment of the debt if the driver decides to drive [emphasis in original]. The bankrupt is still discharged in the literal sense of the words of s. 178(2) of the BIA. This is not a situation of express conflict in which one law says "yes" while the other says "no." The two statutes answer different questions. In the end, the literal requirement of the federal statute is, strictly speaking, met. It therefore follows that the two acts can operate side by side without conflict. To conclude otherwise would be to disregard the distinct contents of the two provisions and the remedies that they provide.

[98] This is why I am of the view that this appeal must be decided on the basis of the frustration of a federal purpose, an issue in respect of which the applicable standard is higher, and that requires an in-depth analysis of Parliament's intent.

VII. Impossibility of Dual Compliance

[99] In my colleague's discussion of operational conflict, impossibility of dual compliance, instead of being at the forefront of the analysis, seems to be a secondary consideration [emphasis in original]. Yet it is the undisputed standard for determining whether an operational conflict exists, and one that very few cases will meet.

[Justice Côté reviewed at length the paramountcy jurisprudence of the past few decades and concluded that it supports what she terms "a strict standard for operational conflict" (at para 104). She then argued that that strict standard is consistent with the emphasis the Court has placed in its recent federalism jurisprudence on the principle of cooperative federalism, which, she said, "requires that courts accept an overlap 'between the exercise of federal and provincial competencies' as inevitable" (at para 104). She then continued:]

[109] ... [E]ven a superficial possibility of dual compliance will suffice for a court to conclude that there is no operational conflict By the same logic, a duplication of federal and provincial legislation will not on its own amount to operational conflict In addition, where federal legislation is broad and permissive, a restrictive provincial scheme will usually be deemed not to conflict with it, because it will be possible to comply with both of them by conforming to the more restrictive provincial law

[110] If the federal law is prohibitive, as in the case at bar, the question becomes what exactly it prohibits [emphasis in original]. If the provincial law allows the very same thing the federal law prohibits, there is an operational conflict. If it does not do so, the analysis shifts to the second branch.

[124] It is important to note that although operational conflict and frustration of purpose are described as two "branches" of a single test, either one is sufficient to trigger the application of the doctrine of federal paramountcy. Where enactments are found to be in operational conflict, the inquiry can end there without further investigation into the purposes of the enactments. A high standard at the first stage merely means that in most cases, the purpose and effects of the legislation at issue will need to be analyzed at the second stage.

[125] Requiring courts to deal with the issue in the second branch has many advantages. For the frustration of purpose analysis, the federal legislative intent with which the provincial law is alleged to be incompatible must be established by the party relying on it. Clear proof of intent is required. The party must first establish the purpose of the relevant federal statute and then prove that the provincial law is incompatible with or frustrates this purpose

[126] In the second branch, the court can proceed with a careful analysis of Parliament's intent and, if possible, interpret the federal law so as not to interfere with the provincial law Before concluding that the provincial law is inoperative, the court can also consider whether the federal government supports the operation of that law. In Rothmans, this Court emphasized that in resolving federalism issues, a court must bear in mind the position of the government at the other level (para. 26). In that case, the federal government intervened in favour of the provincial law, arguing that it had been enacted for the same health-related purpose as the federal law. The Court found that there was no frustration of purpose.

[127] Considering that the doctrine of federal paramountcy operates at the expense of provincial jurisdiction and reduces legislative overlap, these principles encourage governments at both levels to take the lead in defining the scope of their legislative powers. They facilitate intergovernmental dialogue and serve as safeguards of provincial autonomy. In my view, the approach I suggest is more consistent with the principle of co-operative federalism as applied in Canadian Western Bank. It also sets a clear precedent by reaffirming that a provincial law will rarely be found to be inoperative in the first branch of the analysis.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. It is a striking feature of the reasons for judgment of both Gascon J and Côté J that neither makes any reference to the thinking that underlies the impossibility of giving dual effect understanding of conflict. Neither saw fit, in other words, to ask whether it would be impossible for a judge to give effect to both s 102 of the TSA and s 178(2) of the BIA when being relied on by opposing parties. What are we to take from that omission? Does it mean that the Court no longer considers it relevant or appropriate to ask whether state decision-makers, before whom both the federal and provincial enactments in question are being relied on, would be able to give effect to both? (Recall that the Court based its finding of conflict in M & D Farm on precisely that line of inquiry and that the Court invoked it again in Mangat, Rothmans, and Lafarge.)

2. Is it not the case that, even though he never saw fit to ask the question called for by the impossibility of giving dual effect understanding of conflict, Gascon J would have found it a good deal easier to find the conflict he found if he had asked that question than he did by limiting himself to the impossibility of dual compliance understanding? How could a judge give effect to both s 102 of the TSA (Moloney must pay his debt to the government of Alberta if he wants to keep his driver's licence) and s 178(2) of the BIA (Moloney's debt to the government of Alberta has been discharged) if the former were relied on by the government and the latter by Moloney?

3. Could it be argued that there is no need for the Court to include an impossibility of giving dual effect understanding of conflict now that it has clearly recognized the frustration of federal purpose understanding? Would the latter understanding not capture all of those circumstances in which a state decision-maker would find it impossible to give effect to both enactments?

4. Also missing from these two judgments is any reference to the federal intention to cover the field test, at least as a distinct basis on which to find a conflict. It seems clear, however, that Côté J holds that a relevant consideration in cases in which the paramountcy doctrine is invoked is whether Parliament intended its legislation to operate in the circumstances in which the impugned provincial legislation is being applied. Note the passage in which she says that

[126] ... the court can proceed with a careful analysis of Parliament's intent and, if possible, interpret the federal law so as not to interfere with the provincial law Before concluding that the provincial law is inoperative, the court can also consider whether the federal government supports the operation of that law.

5. In a more recent case, Orphan Well Association v Grant Thornton Ltd, 2019 SCC 5, involving the “untidy intersection” of provincial environmental legislation and federal insolvency legislation” (at para 64), Wagner CJ summarized the state of the law regarding paramountcy as follows:

[65] Over time, two distinct forms of conflict have been recognized. The first is operational conflict, which arises where compliance with both a valid federal law and a valid provincial law is impossible. Operational conflict arises “where one enactment says ‘yes’ and the other says ‘no,’ such that ‘compliance with one is defiance of the other’” (Saskatchewan (Attorney General) v. Lemare Lake Logging Ltd., 2015 SCC 53, [2015] 3 S.C.R. 419, at para. 18, quoting Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 161, at p. 191). The second is frustration of purpose, which occurs where the operation of a valid provincial law is incompatible with a federal legislative purpose. The effect of a provincial law may frustrate the purpose of the federal law, even though it does “not entail a direct violation of the federal law’s provisions” (Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 3, at para. 73). The party relying on frustration of purpose “must first establish the purpose of the relevant federal statute, and then prove that the provincial legislation is incompatible with this purpose” (Lemare, at para. 26, quoting Quebec (Attorney General) v. Canadian Owners and Pilots Association, 2010 SCC 39, [2010] 2 S.C.R. 536, at para. 66).

[66] Under both branches of paramountcy, the burden of proof rests on the party alleging the conflict. This burden is not an easy one to satisfy, as the doctrine of paramountcy is to be applied with restraint. Conflict must be defined narrowly so that each level of government may act as freely as possible within its respective sphere of constitutional authority. “[H]armonious interpretations of federal and provincial legislation should be favoured over an interpretation that results in incompatibility ... [i]n the absence of ‘very clear’ statutory language to the contrary” (Lemare, at paras. 21 and 27). “It is presumed that Parliament intends its laws to co-exist with provincial laws” (Moloney, at para. 27). As this Court found in Lemare, at paras. 22-23, the application of the doctrine of paramountcy should also give due weight to the principle of co-operative federalism. This principle allows for interplay and overlap between federal and provincial legislation. While co-operative federalism does not impose limits on the otherwise valid exercise of legislative power, it does mean that courts should avoid an expansive interpretation of the purpose of federal legislation which will bring it into conflict with provincial legislation.

Is this an accurate summary of the law in your view? (For further reading, see R Lizius, “Developments in Constitutional Law: Cooperative Federalism and the Division of Powers in 2018-19” (2020) 95 SCLR (2d) 1.)

6. At various times in Canadian discussions of constitutional reform, it has been suggested that the allocation of functions between federal and provincial governments be altered by changing the rules of paramountcy. Often the suggestion is to define areas where the provincial laws will be paramount. David Milne, “Equality or Asymmetry: Why Choose?” in Ronald L Watts & Douglas M Brown, eds, Options for a New Canada (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1991) at 285, calls this the “CPP” solution, referring to s 94A of the Constitution Act, 1867 regarding old-age pensions. He advocates this change to achieve asymmetry in the distribution of powers, allowing a province such as Quebec to assert jurisdiction in areas where other provinces are content to have the federal government continue to take the primary role.

Consider the wording of s 94A. Does it give rise to the same doctrine of paramountcy as the Court has developed in the cases that you have read? Contrast the wording with s 95 of the Constitution Act, 1867. If you were a lawyer for the Quebec government, which wording would you prefer and why? Consider which wording is more likely to keep the federal government from giving grants to individuals or institutions in an area of provincial jurisdiction, such as health care.

Hall*" (1991) 70 Can Bar Rev 142; Robin Elliot, "Safeguarding Provincial Autonomy from the Supreme Court's New Federal Paramountcy Doctrine: A Constructive Role for the Intention to Cover the Field Test?" V. APPLICABILITY: THE INTERJURISDICTIONAL IMMUNITY DOCTRINE

This section deals with another of the basic interpretive doctrines employed by the courts in division of powers cases, that of interjurisdictional immunity. This doctrine constitutes a departure from the tendency of the pith and substance, double aspect, and ancillary powers doctrines to create overlapping jurisdiction and is instead a doctrine that emphasizes exclusivity of jurisdiction. It is in that sense a relic of the watertight compartments era of constitutional interpretation. It comes into play in situations where a provincial law of general application is clearly valid, but, due to the general nature of its wording, it arguably overreaches, affecting a matter falling within a core area of the other level of government's jurisdiction. On an application of the normal pith and substance doctrine, one might expect the conclusion in such cases to be that the effect on the other level's jurisdiction is incidental to the valid law and therefore acceptable. However, the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity protects certain core areas of legislative jurisdiction from the impact or interference of otherwise valid laws enacted by the other level. To put it another way, in those circumstances where the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity is engaged, valid laws are not allowed to apply in core areas of jurisdiction assigned to the other level of government.

Although the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity has, to this point, been used only to protect core areas of federal legislative jurisdiction from encroaching provincial legislation, the Supreme Court of Canada has acknowledged that the doctrine can in principle work the other way—that is, to protect core areas of provincial legislative jurisdiction from encroaching federal legislation—and it has recently entertained attempts to use it to that end: see Canada (AG) v PHS Community Services Society, 2011 SCC 44 at paras 57-70 and Carter v Canada (AG), 2015 SCC 5 at paras 49-53, discussed in more detail below. (It is worth noting that cases can be found in which the courts have protected what amount to core areas of provincial legislative jurisdiction from encroaching federal legislation without invoking the doctrine but relying on lines of argument similar to those associated with it. For further discussion, see H Brun, G Tremblay & E Brouillet, Droit constitutionnel, 6e éd [Constitutional Law, 6th ed] (Cowansville, Qc: Éditions Yvon Blais, 2014) VI-2.59.)

When the interjurisdictional immunity doctrine is successfully invoked, the courts will read down the generally worded provincial (or federal) legislation to protect the core areas of exclusive federal (or provincial) powers from encroachment. Reading down, as we mentioned at the start of this chapter, is a technique of interpretation used to save statutes from being struck down; the words of the statute are interpreted to apply only to matters within the jurisdiction of the enacting body.

The accepted wisdom is that the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity originated in cases involving federally incorporated companies and federally regulated undertakings. In John Deere Plow Co Ltd v Wharton, 1914 CanLII 603, 18 DLR 353 (UKJCPC); R v Great West Saddlery Company, 1921 CanLII 408, 58 DLR 1 (UKJCPC); and Manitoba (AG) v Canada (AG), 1928 CanLII 513, [1929] 1 DLR 369 (UKJCPC), the Privy Council held that valid provincial laws would have to be restricted in their application if they would otherwise have the effect of impairing the status or essential powers of a federally incorporated company. And in Toronto v Bell Telephone Co, [1905] AC 52 (UKJCPC), the Privy Council applied similar reasoning in support of its holding that provincial legislation could not impair or sterilize the operations of an interprovincial communications undertaking. (This accepted wisdom has been questioned: see Robin Elliot, "Interjurisdictional Immunity After Canadian Western Bank and Lafarge Canada Inc: The Supreme Court Muddies the Doctrinal Waters—Again" (2008) 43 SCLR (2d) 433.)

Whatever the true origins of the doctrine, it has come to be an accepted—if still contentious—feature of the law of Canadian federalism and, as the cases excerpted and discussed below make clear, has been applied by the Supreme Court of Canada over a long period of time and in a broad range of different areas. It is also clear from the more recent cases, however, that the precise content of the doctrine—the questions it requires courts to answer when it is invoked—remains in a state of some uncertainty.

The doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity has indeed been controversial. Three major concerns have been expressed about it: (1) in its emphasis on exclusivity of jurisdiction, it is at odds with the tendency of modern federalism to allow considerable overlap between federal and provincial powers; (2) it appeared to extend to the federal level of government an exclusivity of jurisdiction not available to the provinces and hence is inconsistent with a balanced approach to Canadian federalism (note that this concern would no longer be valid today, at least at the level of principle, because the Supreme Court of Canada has accepted that the doctrine works both ways); and (3) it is unnecessary because if Parliament wants to protect one of its core areas of legislative jurisdiction from encroaching provincial legislation, it can do so by enacting legislation to cover that area and rely on the federal paramountcy doctrine to oust the provincial legislation.

For most of the 1970s and 1980s, these concerns were limited to constitutional scholars. However, two of them—the first and the third—were explicitly endorsed in obiter dicta by Dickson CJ in his concurring reasons for judgment in Ontario (AG) v OPSEU, [1987] 2 SCR 2 at 17, 1987 CanLII 71, and thereby formed part of the growing body of jurisprudence relating to the doctrine. Chief Justice Dickson phrased his endorsement in these words:

I favour both of these arguments of caution about the scope of the interjurisdictional immunity doctrine. The history of Canadian constitutional law has been to allow for a fair amount of interplay and indeed overlap between federal and provincial powers. It is true that doctrines like interjurisdictional and Crown immunity and concepts like "watertight compartments" qualify the extent of that interplay. But it must be recognized that these doctrines and concepts have not been the dominant tide of constitutional doctrines; rather, they have been an undertow against the strong pull of pith and substance, the double aspect doctrine, and, in recent years, a very restrained approach to concurrency and paramountcy issues.

The doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity remains controversial today among both scholars and members of the judiciary. In the next case we examine, Bell No 2, the Supreme Court of Canada, speaking through Beetz J, clearly rejected Dickson J's concerns regarding the doctrine. However, as you will see, the Court resurrected those same concerns in two later cases, Canadian Western Bank and Lafarge, the first of which is excerpted below.

As you read the cases that follow, note the doctrinal choices that typically face the Court. One option is to allow the provincial law (with one exception, all of the cases we refer to below involve attempts to have the doctrine applied to provincial legislation) to apply to the federal undertaking or other federal matter until Parliament enacts conflicting legislation, which will then have priority by virtue of the doctrine of paramountcy. The other is to grant the requested interjurisdictional immunity to the federal undertaking or other federal matter, with the result that the provincial law is held inapplicable, even if Parliament has not legislated on the matter. Think about the implications of each of these choices. Which of Simeon's values are furthered by each choice?

Note the result of the application of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity. Often, where the provincial law in issue is drafted in general terms and is of broad application, the entire provincial law is not found invalid; it is only found inapplicable to the federal undertaking or other federal matter. Because the provincial laws in issue in these cases usually appear so clearly to fall within provincial jurisdiction in most of their applications, their validity is assumed. Invalidation is not considered an option. Rather, it is the applicability of the law in particular circumstances that is at issue. When the interjurisdictional immunity doctrine is successfully invoked, the courts will interpret, or read down, generally worded provincial statutes so that they do not apply to matters that fall within the core of exclusive federal powers.

[This case was one in a trilogy of cases decided at the same time that dealt with the application of generally worded provincial health and safety laws to federal transportation and communications undertakings. The companion cases were Alltrans Express Ltd v British Columbia (Workers' Compensation Board), [1988] 1 SCR 897, 1988 CanLII 83, which dealt with the applicability of provincial regulations requiring the wearing of safety boots to an interprovincial and international trucking business, and Canadian National Railway Co v Courtois, [1988] 1 SCR 868, 1988 CanLII 82, which dealt with the ability of a provincial inspector to inquire into a railway accident that caused death and serious injury to workers. The case reproduced here dealt with the application to Bell Canada of a Quebec law giving a right to protective reassignment to a pregnant worker. As you read Beetz J's reasons for judgment, pay particular attention to two of its features: (1) his attempt—the first one to have been made by a member of the Court—to articulate a general rule or principle that would explain the many prior decisions in which the doctrine had been applied and (2) his response to the criticisms of the doctrine made by constitutional scholars, in particular Peter Hogg. (Note that Beetz J's general views on federalism are discussed in the Swinton excerpt found in Chapter 9, Peace, Order, and Good Government.)]

BEETZ J (Dickson CJ and Lamer, Wilson, Le Dain, and La Forest JJ concurring):

[Justice Beetz began by setting forth what he took to be two well-established rules (or "propositions," as he labelled them) governing jurisdiction over health and labour relations and working conditions. These he articulated in the following terms:]

General legislative jurisdiction over health belongs to the provinces This jurisdiction has historically been seen as resting with the provinces under s. 92(16) of the Constitution Act, 1867

In principle, labour relations and working conditions fall within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures: these matters fall into the class of subjects mentioned in s. 92(13)

[Justice Beetz then proceeded to articulate a third proposition, which came to play a critical role in his reasoning process:]

Notwithstanding the rule stated in proposition two, Parliament is vested with exclusive legislative jurisdiction over labour relations and working conditions when that jurisdiction is an integral part of its primary and exclusive jurisdiction over another class of subjects, as is the case with labour relations and working conditions in the federal undertakings covered by ss. 91(29) and 92(10)(a), (b) and (c) of the Constitution Act, 1867, that is undertakings such as Alltrans Express Ltd., Canadian National and Bell Canada. It follows that this primary and exclusive jurisdiction precludes the application to those undertakings of provincial statutes relating to labour relations and working conditions, since such matters are an essential part of the very management and operation of such undertakings, as with any commercial or industrial undertaking: ... [list of references, including] Commission du salaire minimum v. Bell Telephone Co. of Canada, [1966] S.C.R. 767 ("Bell Canada 1966"). This third proposition reflects, at least in part, a constitutional theory which commentators who have criticized it have called the theory of "interjurisdictional immunity." I will return to this below.

It should however be noted that the rules stated in this third proposition appear to constitute only one facet of a more general rule: works, such as federal railways, things, such as land reserved for Indians, and persons, such as Indians, who are within the special and exclusive jurisdiction of Parliament, are still subject to provincial statutes that are general in their application, whether municipal legislation, legislation on adoption, hunting or the distribution of family property, provided however that the application of these provincial laws does not bear upon those subjects in what makes them specifically of federal jurisdiction

[Justice Beetz then noted that, in spite of this third proposition, the JCPC had decided that the compensatory scheme established by provincial workers' compensation legislation could be applied to federal undertakings, a decision that he accepted as still good law. He also offered the cautionary thoughts on the double aspect doctrine, quoted above in Section III, Validity: Characterization of Laws, B, Double Aspect Doctrine.]

I think it is quite impossible to distinguish the circumstances of the case at bar from those of Bell Canada 1966. The working conditions and labour relations as well as the management of federal undertakings such as Bell Canada, are matters falling within the classes of subject mentioned in s. 91(29) of the Constitution Act, 1867, and consequently fall within the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada.

Moreover, as I indicated at the start of these reasons, the exclusivity rule approved by Bell Canada 1966 does not apply only to labour relations or to federal undertakings. It is one facet of a more general rule against making works, things or persons under the special and exclusive jurisdiction of Parliament subject to provincial legislation, when such application would bear on the specifically federal nature of the jurisdiction to which such works, things or persons are subject.

2. Criticism of Bell Canada 1966

Bell Canada 1966 has been criticized by certain commentators: ... [including] Constitutional Law of Canada (2nd ed. 1985), by Professor Peter W. Hogg, at pp. 329-32 and 465-66.

These analyses have much in common and I think it will suffice to consider the comments of Professor Hogg, which are in greater detail and more recent.

The first [observation to be made] is that the criticism says nothing of the close study by Martland J in Bell Canada 1966 of the relevant provisions of ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

The second observation is that this analysis does not address the essential question raised and answered by Martland J: the critics refrain from defining the content of the exclusive legislative authority of Parliament over federal undertakings. This is necessary because the effect of s. 91(29) and the exceptions in s. 92(10) is to create exclusive classes of subject, those of federal undertakings, to which a basic, minimum and unassailible content has to be assigned to make up the matters falling within these classes. Martland J considered that the management of these undertakings and their labour relations are matters which are part of this basic and unassailible minimum, as these matters are essential and vital elements of any undertaking. How is it possible to disagree with this? How can the exclusive power to regulate these undertakings not include at least the exclusive power to make laws relating to their management? Additionally, just as the management of the undertaking and working conditions determined by agreement or by operation of law are parts of the same whole in labour law, how can the exclusive power to legislate as to management of an undertaking not include the equally exclusive power to make laws regarding its labour relations? To deny this, as the critics have done, is to strip the exclusive federal power of its primary content and transform it simply into a power to make ancillary laws connected to a primary power with no real independent content, apart from the power to regulate rates and the availability and quality of services such as telephone services or railway services. The latter undoubtedly fall within the exclusive classes of subject represented by such federal undertakings, but there is nothing in the constitutional provisions, rules or precedents to indicate that the exclusive legislative authority of Parliament must or may be confined to so narrow a field. Indeed, rates and the availability and quality of services are inseparable from the wage scale that the undertaking must pay, the availability of its manpower, leave, vacation—in short, working conditions. This is why in Bell Canada 1966 Martland J refers at p. 772 to rates and services in their relation to wages, and it is why he comes back to this at p. 777 in arriving at his conclusions.

Professor Hogg writes that the theory which is the basis of Bell Canada 1966 not only confers a power on Parliament but operates defensively to deny the power of the Legislature. In my view, and I say so with the greatest respect, this theory does not confer on Parliament any power that it does not already have, since it is an integral and vital part of its primary legislative authority over federal undertakings. If this power is exclusive, it is because the Constitution, which could have been different but is not, expressly specifies this to be the case; and it is because this power is exclusive that it pre-empts that of the legislatures both as to their legislation of general and specific application, in so far as such laws affect a vital part of a federal undertaking. The exclusivity rule is absolute and does not allow for any distinction between these two types of statute. However, the pith and substance doctrine does require a distinction to be made between these two types of statute, as well as between laws of general application and their application to particular institutions. General legislation on the management and working conditions of undertakings is legislation on matters falling within the property and civil rights class. But particular legislation on the management of federal undertakings and their working conditions, like that in the Canada Labour Code, is legislation on matters falling within an exclusively federal class of subjects, that of federal undertakings. The particular effect of general provincial laws that would result from their application to federal undertakings would, in the case at bar, constitute an encroachment on the exclusive jurisdiction of Parliament. ...

This principle appears to have been omitted in the criticism of Bell Canada 1966 offered by Professor Hogg. Yet this line of reasoning explains the nature of the exclusive federal power given that working conditions and labour relations cannot be divorced from the management of a federal undertaking.

In one of the foregoing passages, Professor Hogg contrasts exclusive powers with "concurrent" powers. This can only be a way of speaking. Professor Hogg likely intends to refer to the overlapping of federal and provincial legislation which may result from the exercise of an ancillary power by Parliament or the application of the double aspect theory; however, as I said at the start of these reasons, these are not concurrent powers such as the fields of agriculture or immigration.

That leaves the "policy" argument, according to which it would always be open to Parliament to protect federal undertakings against provincial statutes by an exercise of its so-called ancillary power and the application of the paramountcy of federal legislation.

I must say that I find very little merit in such an argument, both in general terms and when invoked in the particular field of occupational health and safety.

It is an argument which relies on a spirit of contradiction between systems of regulation, investigation, inspection and remedial notices which are increasingly complex, specialized and, perhaps inevitably, highly detailed. A division of jurisdiction in this area is likely to be a source of uncertainty and endless disputes in which the courts will be called on to decide whether a conflict exists between the most trivial federal and provincial regulations, such as those specifying the thickness or colour of safety boots or hard hats.

Furthermore, in the case of occupational health and safety, such a twofold jurisdiction is likely to promote the proliferation of preventive measures and controls in which the contradictions or lack of coordination may well threaten the very occupational health and safety which are sought to be protected.

Federalism requires most persons and institutions to serve two masters; however, in my opinion an effort must be made to see that this dual control applies as far as possible in separate areas.

With all due respect for the opposite view, therefore, I think that the decision in Bell Canada 1966 is correct.

[Justice Beetz turned to a consideration of the applicability to this case of the double aspect doctrine, which, in the narrow approach he took to the doctrine, he characterized as permitting Parliament and a province to "enact two relatively similar rules provided they are legislating for different purposes and on the basis of different aspects" (at para 274). After examining the relevant provisions of the Quebec statute and the Canada Labour Code, RSC 1970, c L-2, he concluded that "both legislators are pursuing exactly the same objective by similar techniques and means" (at para 298). Since the "legislators have legislated for the same purpose and in the same aspect" (at para 299) (emphasis in original), the double aspect doctrine did not apply. Labour relations and the management of federal undertakings, he held, fall within the exclusive jurisdiction of Parliament. To allow provincial law to apply concurrently, Beetz J argued, would strip the exclusivity of federal power of any distinct or meaningful content.

He concluded that the provincial law had to be read down so as not to apply to federally regulated undertakings such as Bell Canada. Following the approach in Bell No 1, he stated that "in order for the inapplicability of provincial legislation rule to be given effect, it is sufficient that the provincial statute which purports to apply to the federal undertaking affects a vital or essential part of that undertaking, without necessarily going as far as impairing or paralyzing it" (at para 316). Since the working conditions and management of an undertaking are vital or essential parts of the undertaking, it follows that the Quebec statute could not apply to them.]

Appeal dismissed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In Bell No 2, Beetz J rested his defence of the interjurisdictional immunity doctrine on a strong understanding of the exclusivity of federal powers. Because federal powers are exclusive, Beetz J argued, and because this rule is "absolute," the application of valid provincial laws is pre-empted. Note that the pith and substance, ancillary powers, and double aspect doctrines rest on a weaker view of exclusivity, one that understands exclusivity as the exclusive ability to enact legislation that has as its dominant characteristic the subject matter in question but that has effects on areas and activities that are also often governed by legislation from the other level of legislature.

2. The doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity has not been applied to all areas of exclusive federal power. It has, however, been applied to a broad range of them, including federal elections, telecommunications undertakings, interprovincial railways, and trucking undertakings, as well as to the postal service, banking, aeronautics, navigation and shipping, the military, Indigenous peoples and lands, the RCMP, federal parks, and even criminal procedure.

3. One issue that had remained unresolved after Bell No 2 was whether provincial environmental regulations would be applicable to federal undertakings. Arguably, such regulations could involve matters central to the operation and management of federal undertakings. The issue reached the Supreme Court of Canada in Ontario v Canadian Pacific Ltd, [1995] 2 SCR 1031, 1995 CanLII 112. The case involved a federally regulated railway undertaking that had conducted a controlled burn of dry grass and weeds on its railway right-of-way. A large amount of smoke was produced that created a nuisance for nearby residents, and the railway was charged with unlawful discharge of a contaminant under the Ontario Environmental Protection Act, RSO 1990, c E.19. In brief oral reasons, the Supreme Court found the provincial legislation to be applicable to the railway. The Court simply relied on a 19th-century case, Canadian Pacific Railway Co v Corporation of the Parish of Notre Dame de Bonsecours, [1899] AC 367 (PC), in which the Privy Council had ruled that a federally regulated railway was required to comply with a municipal order requiring it to clear a blocked drainage ditch on its right-of-way that was causing damage to adjacent land. Is the ruling in Canadian Pacific consistent with the rulings in Bell No 2?

The Supreme Court of Canada had occasion to reconsider and re-evaluate the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity in Canadian Western Bank and Lafarge. In both cases, the doctrine was invoked by federally regulated entities, banks in the first and a port authority in the second. In each case, the Court declined to apply the doctrine for essentially the same reason: application of the provincial legislation at issue was held not to encroach on the core of federal legislative jurisdiction. In Canadian Western Bank, promoting "peace of mind" insurance was held not to fall within the core of Parliament's jurisdiction over banking; in Lafarge, permitting a cement batching plant to be built on land owned by the port authority was held not to fall within the core of Parliament's jurisdiction over navigation and shipping. In each case, therefore, there was no bar to applying the provincial legislation at issue—regulating the business of insurance in the first and regulating land use within a particular municipality in the second—to the claimants. (Note, however, that a majority of the judges sitting on Lafarge went on to hold that the provincial legislation at issue there conflicted with the applicable federal legislation and therefore had to be held inoperative under the paramountcy doctrine.)

Although it was not necessary for the Court to make any general or more expansive comments on the doctrine in either of these two cases, it nevertheless chose to do so, and the bulk of those comments were made in Canadian Western Bank, a case in which the Court chose to engage in a broad overview of its general approach to federalism (recall the passage from the case discussing general principles of federalism found at the beginning of this chapter). As you will see from the majority reasons for judgment of Binnie and LeBel JJ, excerpted below, the comments were wide-ranging and varied. Justices Binnie and LeBel affirmed the doctrine's legitimacy and acknowledged that the doctrine works to protect the exclusivity of both provincial and federal jurisdiction—an issue on which there had been some uncertainty. The main thrust of their comments, however, was to erode the status and role of the doctrine; they resurrected and endorsed the critiques of the doctrine made by scholars such as Peter Hogg, added some new critiques, tightened up some aspects of the test that has to be met in order for the doctrine to be applicable (albeit while affirming others), and expressed a preference for relying on the doctrine of federal paramountcy over the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity to resolve federalism disputes once the validity of the impugned legislation has been established. These features of their reasoning are reproduced below.

Canadian Western Bank v Alberta

BINNIE and LeBEL JJ (McLachlin CJ and Fish, Abella, and Charron JJ concurring):

(2) The Doctrine of Interjurisdictional Immunity and Its Sources

[33] Interjurisdictional immunity is a doctrine of limited application, but its existence is supported both textually and by the principles of federalism. The leading modern formulation of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity is found in the judgment of this Court in Bell Canada [v Québec (Commission de la santé et de la sécurité du travail)], [1988] 1 SCR 749], where Beetz J wrote that "classes of subject" in ss. 91 and 92 must be assured a "basic, minimum and unassailable content" (p. 839) immune from the application of legislation enacted by the other level of government. Immunity from such intrusion, Beetz J observed in the context of a federal undertaking, is an integral and vital part of [Parliament's] primary legislative authority over federal undertakings. If this power is exclusive, it is because the Constitution, which could have been different but is not, expressly specifies this to be the case; and it is because this power is exclusive that it pre-empts that of the legislatures both as to their legislation of general and specific application, in so far as such laws affect a vital part of a federal undertaking. [p. 840]

[34] The doctrine is rooted in references to "exclusivity" throughout ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867.... The notion of exclusivity and the reciprocal notion of non-encroachment by one level of legislature on the field of exclusive competence of the other gave rise to Lord Atkin's famous "watertight compartments" metaphor, where he wrote of Canadian federalism that "[w]hile the ship of state now sails on larger ventures and into foreign waters she still retains the watertight compartments which are an essential part of her original structure" (Attorney-General for Canada v. Attorney-General for Ontario, [1937] AC 326 (PC), at p. 354). Its modern application expresses a continuing concern about risk of erosion of provincial as well as federal competences (Bell Canada (1988), at p. 766). At the same time, the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity seeks to avoid, when possible, situations of concurrency of powers . . .

(3) The Dominant Tide of Constitutional Interpretation Does Not Favour Interjurisdictional Immunity

[35] Despite the efforts to find a proper role for the doctrine, the application of interjurisdictional immunity has given rise to concerns by reason of its potential impact on Canadian constitutional arrangements. In theory, the doctrine is reciprocal: it applies both to protect provincial heads of power and provincially regulated undertakings from federal encroachment, and to protect federal heads of power and federally regulated undertakings from provincial encroachment. However, it would appear that the jurisprudential application of the doctrine has produced somewhat "asymmetrical" results. ... In general, ... the doctrine has been invoked in favour of federal immunity at the expense of provincial legislation

[Justices Binnie and LeBel noted Dickson CJ's endorsement of the criticisms of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity in the OPSEU case and quoted the passage in which Dickson CJ said that the doctrine is inconsistent with the "dominant tide" of federalism jurisprudence.]

[37] The "dominant tide" finds its principled underpinning in the concern that a court should favour, where possible, the ordinary operation of statutes enacted by both levels of government. In the absence of conflicting enactments of the other level of government, the Court should avoid blocking the application of measures which are taken to be enacted in furtherance of the public interest. ...

[38] In our view, the sweeping immunity argued for by the banks in this appeal is not acceptable in the Canadian federal structure. The argument exposes the dangers of allowing the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity to exceed its proper (and very restricted) limit and to frustrate the application of the pith and substance analysis and of the double aspect doctrine. The latter have the ability to resolve most problems relating to the validity of the exercise of legislative powers under the heads of power applicable to the activities in question.

[Justices Binnie and LeBel then provided an overview of the early cases involving federally incorporated companies and federally regulated undertakings that are said to have given rise to the doctrine, as well as some of the later cases in which the scope of the doctrine was extended to other areas, including certain "activities" falling within exclusive federal jurisdiction, such as federal elections. They suggested that application of the doctrine to protect federal "activities" from the reach of provincial legislation, as distinct from federal "undertakings, things, or persons," posed special "practical problems" (at para 42).]

[42] While the text and logic of our federal structure justifies the application of interjurisdictional immunity to certain federal "activities," nevertheless, a broad application of the doctrine to "activities" creates practical problems of application much greater than in the case of works or undertakings, things or persons, whose limits are more readily defined. A broad application also appears inconsistent, as stated, with the flexible federalism that the constitutional doctrines of pith and substance, double aspect and federal paramountcy are designed to promote. ... It is these doctrines that have proved to be most consistent with contemporary views of Canadian federalism, which recognize that overlapping powers are unavoidable. Canadian federalism is not simply a matter of legalisms. The Constitution, though a legal document, serves as a framework for life and for political action within a federal state, in which the courts have rightly observed the importance of co-operation among government actors to ensure that federalism operates flexibly.

[43] Excessive reliance on the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity would create serious uncertainty. It is based on the attribution to every legislative head of power of a "core" of indeterminate scope—difficult to define, except over time by means of judicial interpretations triggered serendipitously on a case-by-case basis. The requirement to develop an abstract definition of a "core" is not compatible, generally speaking, with the tradition of Canadian constitutional interpretation, which favours an incremental approach. While it is true that the enumerations of ss. 91 and 92 contain a number of powers that are precise and not really open to discussion, other powers are far less precise, such as those relating to the criminal law, trade and commerce and matters of a local or private nature in a province. Since the time of Confederation, courts have refrained from trying to define the possible scope of such powers in advance and for all time ... For example, while the courts have not eviscerated the federal trade and commerce power, they have, in interpreting it, sought to avoid draining of their content the provincial powers over civil law and matters of a local or private nature. A generalized application of interjurisdictional immunity related to "trade and commerce" would have led to an altogether different and more rigid and centralized form of federalism. It was by proceeding with caution on a case-by-case basis that the courts were gradually able to define the content of the heads of power of Parliament and the legislatures, without denying the unavoidable interplay between them, always having regard to the evolution of the problems for which the division of legislative powers must now provide solutions.

[44] Moreover, as stated, interjurisdictional immunity means that despite the absence of law enacted at one level of government, the laws enacted by the other level cannot have even incidental effects on the so-called "core" of jurisdiction. This increases the risk of creating "legal vacuums" ... Generally speaking, such "vacuums" are not desirable.

[45] Further, a broad use of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity runs the risk of creating an unintentional centralizing tendency in constitutional interpretation. As stated, this doctrine has in the past most often protected federal heads of power from incidental intrusion by provincial legislatures. The "asymmetrical" application of interjurisdictional immunity is incompatible with the flexibility and co-ordination required by contemporary Canadian federalism. Commentators have noted that an extensive application of this doctrine to protect federal heads of power and undertakings is both unnecessary and "undesirable in a federation where so many laws for the protection of workers, consumers and the environment (for example) are enacted and enforced at the provincial level" ([PW Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (loose-leaf)], at p. 15-30). The asymmetrical effect of interjurisdictional immunity can also be seen as undermining the principles of subsidiarity, i.e. that decisions "are often best [made] at a level of government that is not only effective, but also closest to the citizens affected" (114957 Canada Ltée (Spraytech, Société d'arrosage) v. Hudson (Town), [2001] 2 SCR 241, 2001 SCC 40, at para. 3).

[46] Finally, the doctrine would seem as a general rule to be superfluous in that Parliament can always, if it sees fit to do so, make its legislation sufficiently precise to leave those subject to it with no doubt as to the residual or incidental application of provincial legislation. As we shall see, sufficient confirmation of this can be found in the history and operation of the doctrine of federal paramountcy.

[47] For all these reasons, although the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity has a proper part to play in appropriate circumstances, we intend now to make it clear that the Court does not favour an intensive reliance on the doctrine, nor should we accept the invitation of the appellants to turn it into a doctrine of first recourse in a division of powers dispute.

D. A More Restricted Approach to Interjurisdictional Immunity

(1) Impairment Versus Affects

[48] Even in situations where the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity is properly available, we must consider the level of the intrusion on the "core" of the power of the other level of government which would trigger its application. In Bell Canada (1988), Beetz J wrote, at pp. 859-60:

In order for the inapplicability of provincial legislation rule to be given effect, it is sufficient that the provincial statute which purports to apply to the federal undertaking affects a vital or essential part of that undertaking, without necessarily going as far as impairing or paralyzing it. [Emphasis added.]

... We believe that the law as it stood prior to Bell Canada (1988) better reflected our federal scheme. In our opinion, it is not enough for the provincial legislation simply to "affect" that which makes a federal subject or object of rights specifically of federal jurisdiction. The difference between "affects" and "impairs" is that the former does not imply any adverse consequence whereas the latter does. ... It is when the adverse impact of a law adopted by one level of government increases in severity from "affecting" to "impairing" (without necessarily "sterilizing" or "paralyzing") that the "core" competence of the other level of government (or the vital or essential part of an undertaking it duly constitutes) is placed in jeopardy, and not before.

(2) Identification of the "Basic, Minimum and Unassailable" Content of a Legislative Power

[50] One of the important contributions of Bell Canada (1988) was to limit the scope of the doctrine to the "basic, minimum and unassailable content" (p. 839) sometimes referred to as the "core" of the legislative power in question. (By "minimum," we understand that Beetz J meant the minimum content necessary to make the power effective for the purpose for which it was conferred.) This is necessary, according to Beetz J, to give effect to what he called "the principle of federalism underlying the Canadian Constitution" (p. 766). Thus, the success of the appellants' argument in this appeal depended in part on locating the promotion of "peace of mind" insurance at the core of banking. For the reasons already discussed, and particularized below, we do not believe that this aspect of the appellants' argument can be sustained.

(3) The Vital or Essential Part of an Undertaking

[51] In the exercise of their legislative powers, federal and provincial legislators bring into existence "undertakings." The appellant banks are "federal undertakings" constituted pursuant to the s. 91(15) banking power. In Bell Canada (1988), Beetz J spoke of interjurisdictional immunity in relation to "essential and vital elements" of such undertakings (pp. 839 and 859-60). In our view, some text writers and certainly the appellants have been inclined to give too wide a scope to what should be considered "vital or essential" to a federal undertaking. We believe that Beetz J chose his words carefully and intended to use "vital" in its ordinary grammatical sense of "[e]ssential to the existence of something; absolutely indispensable or necessary; extremely important, crucial" (Shorter Oxford English Dictionary (5th ed. 2002), vol. 2, at p. 3548). The word "essential" has a similar meaning, e.g. "[a]bsolutely indispensable or necessary" (vol. 1, at p. 860). The words "vital" and "essential" were not randomly chosen . . . What is “vital” or “essential” is, by definition, not co-extensive with every element of an undertaking incorporated federally or subject to federal regulation. In the case of federal undertakings, Beetz J referred to a “general rule” that there is no interjurisdictional immunity, provided that “the application of [the] provincial laws does not bear upon those [federal] subjects in what makes them specifically of federal jurisdiction” (Bell Canada (1988), at p. 762 (emphasis added)). In the present appeal, for example, the appellants’ argument inflates out of all proportion what could reasonably be considered “vital or essential” to their banking undertaking. The promotion of “peace of mind” insurance can hardly be considered “absolutely indispensable or necessary” to banking activities unless such words are to be emptied of their ordinary meaning.

E. The Interjurisdictional Immunity Case Law Relied on by the Appellants

[Justices Binnie and LeBel reviewed many of the prior cases in which either the Privy Council or the Supreme Court had been asked to apply the doctrine for the purpose of showing that the existing jurisprudence supported their view that what is “vital and essential”—or truly “core” to an area of federal legislative jurisdiction—has to be understood narrowly.]

(7) Conclusion

[67] In our view, the above review of the case law cited by the appellants, the respondent and interveners shows that not only should the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity be applied with restraint, but with rare exceptions it has been so applied [emphasis in original]. Although the doctrine is in principle applicable to all federal and provincial heads of legislative authority, the case law demonstrates that its natural area of operation is in relation to those heads of legislative authority that confer on Parliament power over enumerated federal things, people, works or undertakings. In most cases, a pith and substance analysis and the application of the doctrine of paramountcy have resolved difficulties in a satisfactory manner.

[Justices Binnie and LeBel then discussed the appropriate approach to take to the doctrine of federal paramountcy, which is the subject of the previous section of this chapter. Before they applied this approach, however, they expressed their view on the question of the order in which courts should consider the doctrines of interjurisdictional immunity and federal paramountcy after they have satisfied themselves that the impugned legislation is valid on the basis of the pith and substance doctrine. Prior to this case, it was understood that the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity should always be applied first.]

G. Order of Application of the Constitutional Doctrines

[77] Although our colleague Bastarache J takes a different view on this point, we do not think it appropriate to always begin by considering the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity. To do so could mire the Court in a rather abstract discussion of “cores” and “vital and essential” parts to little practical effect. As we have already noted, interjurisdictional immunity is of limited application and should in general be reserved for situations already covered by precedent. This means, in practice, that it will be largely reserved for those heads of power that deal with federal things, persons or undertakings, or where in the past its application has been considered absolutely indispensable or necessary to enable Parliament or a provincial legislature to achieve the purpose for which exclusive legislative jurisdiction was conferred, as discerned from the constitutional division of powers as a whole, or what is absolutely indispensable or necessary to enable an undertaking to carry out its mandate in what makes it specifically of federal (or provincial) jurisdiction. If a case can be resolved by the application of a pith and substance analysis, and federal paramountcy where necessary, it would be preferable to take that approach, as this Court did in Mangat [Law Society of British Columbia v Mangat, 2000 SCC 67].

[78] In the result, while in theory a consideration of interjurisdictional immunity is apt for consideration after the pith and substance analysis, in practice the absence of prior case law favouring its application to the subject matter at hand will generally justify a court proceeding directly to the consideration of federal paramountcy.

[Justices Binnie and LeBel then proceeded to apply the doctrine of federal paramountcy. They concluded that there was no conflict between the provincial and federal legislation at issue and that the provincial legislation could therefore operate in relation to the banks in Alberta that wished to promote "peace of mind" insurance to their customers. This part of the decision is discussed in the previous section of this chapter, dealing with the doctrine of paramountcy.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Justice Bastarache concurred in the result in Canadian Western Bank but did not agree with the new approach to the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity outlined by Binnie and LeBel JJ. His view of the doctrine, which is a much more positive one that would have left the doctrine more or less in the state it was in prior to these two cases, is developed in his concurring reasons for judgment in Lafarge.

2. A number of scholars commented on the new approach to the doctrine taken by Binnie and LeBel JJ in Canadian Western Bank and Lafarge immediately after the publication of those decisions, not all of them favourably: see Elizabeth Edinger, "Back to the Future with Interjurisdictional Immunity: Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta and British Columbia v. Lafarge Canada Inc" (2008) 66 Advocate 553; Peter W Hogg & Rahat Godil, "Narrowing Interjurisdictional Immunity" (2008) 42 SCLR (2d) 623; John G Furey, "Interjurisdictional Immunity: The Pendulum Has Swung" (2008) 42 SCLR (2d) 597; Robin Elliot, "Interjurisdictional Immunity after Canadian Western Bank and Lafarge Canada Inc: The Supreme Court Muddies the Doctrinal Waters—Again."

3. Do you think it makes sense to change the order in which the doctrines of interjurisdictional immunity and federal paramountcy are applied in those cases in which a party is invoking the former in a "new" area? On the one hand, what would this mean if the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity were invoked in support of a core area of provincial legislative jurisdiction against federal legislation? Why should the Constitution be applied differently depending on when a particular kind of challenge is made? On the other hand, given the radically reduced application of the interjurisdictional immunity doctrine as a result of the judgment in Canadian Western Bank, does it now make more sense to present validity and operability as the two key analytical categories in Canadian federalism, with interjurisdictional immunity inserted into the analysis on the rare occasions when it arises? Previous editions of this chapter discussed applicability before operability. As you can see, operability is now discussed ahead of applicability. Do you agree with this change?

The restrained approach to the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity for which Binnie and LeBel JJ argued in Canadian Western Bank and Lafarge has not had the effect of stemming the flow of cases in which the Court is being asked to apply the doctrine, although the view from the Supreme Court of Canada may be somewhat distorted given that interjurisdictional immunity cases are particularly difficult and therefore more likely to reach the highest level of appeal. Perhaps one of the most important of the more recent cases is COPA, a case that in some respects is similar to Lacombe, which we reviewed in Section III, in the context of our look at the ancillary powers doctrine. In Lacombe, the question was whether a municipal government could restrict by a specially targeted by-law the areas within the municipality in which private aerodromes could be established; in COPA, the question was whether generally worded (and valid) provincial legislation creating agricultural land reserves could constitutionally be applied to—and therefore restrict—the establishment of private aerodromes on such reserves. In both cases, the Court was called on to resolve a conflict that McLachlin CJ characterized (in Lacombe at para 1) as “pitting the local interest in land-use planning against the national interest in a unified system of aviation navigation.” However, because that conflict presented itself in very different legal forms in the two cases—a validity challenge in the former and an applicability challenge in the latter—the Court had to employ a different doctrine in each to resolve them: the ancillary powers doctrine in the former and the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity in the latter.

The importance of COPA lies in large part in the change it introduced to the test to be used when courts are called on to apply the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity. Read the excerpted reasons for judgment of McLachlin CJ, who wrote for a majority of six, with an eye to determining what that change is.

Quebec (AG) v Canadian Owners and Pilots Association

[Two Quebec residents, Laferrière and Gervais, constructed an airstrip on a lot they owned near Shawinigan, Quebec. Under the federal Aeronautics Act, the construction and operation of an airfield for private (as opposed to commercial) aviation is not subject to a requirement of prior permission. Registration of an aerodrome with the federal minister of transport is optional; however, if registered, a private aerodrome becomes subject to federal standards and is available to anyone who needs to land. Laferrière and Gervais registered their airstrip.]

The land on which Laferrière and Gervais constructed their airstrip was within an area designated as an agricultural region under the province’s Act respecting the preservation of agricultural land and agricultural activities (ARPALAA or the Act). Section 26 of the Act prohibits the use of land in a designated agricultural region for any purpose other than agriculture, unless specific authorization from the Commission de protection du territoire agricole du Québec (the Commission) has been granted. No such authorization had been obtained by Laferrière and Gervais, and, in 1999, the Commission ordered them to demolish the airstrip because it was located in a designated agricultural region. They challenged the order on the ground that s 26 of the Act was ultra vires or, alternatively, inapplicable, insofar as it affected the location of aerodromes (by virtue of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity), or inoperative in their case by reason of a conflict with federal law (by virtue of the doctrine of paramountcy). We limit ourselves here to the reasons for judgment relating to the applicability issue.]

McLACHLIN CJ (Binnie, Fish, Abella, Charron, Rothstein, and Cromwell JJ concurring):

[Chief Justice McLachlin had no difficulty concluding that s 26 of the ARPALAA is valid provincial legislation under s 92(13) (property and civil rights), s 92(16) (matters of a merely local or private nature), or s 95 (agriculture) of the Constitution Act, 1867.]

B. Interjurisdictional Immunity

[25] The next question is whether s. 26 of the Act, having been found valid, applies in a situation where it impacts on the federal power over aeronautics [emphasis in original]. The Attorney General of Canada and COPA [the Canadian Owners and Pilots Association] argue that it does not. They rely on the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity, which they submit protects core federal competences from impairment by provincial legislation.

[26] ... Following Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 3, the prevailing view is that the application of interjurisdictional immunity is generally limited to the cores of every legislative head of power already identified in the jurisprudence

[27] The first step is to determine whether the provincial law—s. 26 of the Act—trenches on the protected “core” of a federal competence [emphasis in original]. If it does, the second step is to determine whether the provincial law’s effect on the exercise of the protected federal power is sufficiently serious to invoke the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity [emphasis in original].

(1) Does Section 26 of the Provincial Act Trench on the Protected Core of a Federal Competence?

[28] The jurisprudence establishes that Parliament has power over aeronautics. Because commercial aviation was not foreseen in 1867, aviation is not articulated as a head of power under s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867. However, it has been held to be a matter of national importance and hence supported under the federal POGG [peace, order, and good government] power.

[31] This proposition was most recently affirmed in Air Canada v. Ontario (Liquor Control Board), [1997] 2 S.C.R. 581, at para. 72, per Iacobucci J.: the federal aeronautics jurisdiction “encompasses not only the regulation of the operation of aircraft, but also the regulation of the operation of airports.” Elaborating, Iacobucci J. held that this aspect of federal jurisdiction extends to the location and design of airports.

[32] The Attorney General of British Columbia, intervener, conceded that airports come under the POGG power because of their national dimension, but argued that local aerodromes are excluded from POGG because they are not themselves matters of national importance. In support, he noted that the Aeronautics Act distinguishes between aerodromes and airports, and argued that most interprovincial and international flights pass through airports, rather than aerodromes.

[33] This argument cannot prevail. As Kellock J. noted in Johannesson [v Municipality of West St Paul], [1952] 1 SCR 292, 1951 CanLII 55], the local aspects of aviation come under federal jurisdiction because the subject matter of aerial navigation is “non-severable.” Using the term “airport” interchangeably with “aerodrome,” he held that “just as it is impossible to separate intra-provincial flying from inter-provincial flying, the location and regulation of airports cannot be identified with either or separated from aerial navigation as a whole” (p. 314). This view reflects the reality that Canada's airports and aerodromes constitute a network of landing places that together facilitate air transportation and ensure safety.

[34] It is thus clear that the federal jurisdiction over aeronautics encompasses the power to determine the location of aerodromes. The next question is whether this power lies at the protected core of the federal power.

[35] The test is whether the subject comes within the essential jurisdiction—the "basic, minimum and unassailable content"—of the legislative power in question: Bell Canada [v Québec (Commission de la Santé et de la Sécurité du Travail)], [1988] 1 SCR 749, 1988 CanLII 811, at p. 839; Canadian Western Bank, at para. 50. The core of a federal power is the authority that is absolutely necessary to enable Parliament "to achieve the purpose for which exclusive legislative jurisdiction was conferred": Canadian Western Bank, at para. 77.

[36] In Canadian Western Bank, Binnie and LeBel JJ. explained that the jurisprudence will frequently serve as a useful guide to identify the core of a federal head of power, and they concluded that interjurisdictional immunity should "in general be reserved for situations already covered by precedent" (para. 77).

[37] Here precedent is available and resolves the issue. This Court has repeatedly and consistently held that the location of aerodromes lies within the core of the federal aeronautics power. In Johannesson, which concerned a municipal by-law that prevented the plaintiff from constructing an aerodrome on the outskirts of Winnipeg, the Court held that the location of aerodromes is an essential and indivisible part of aeronautics. As noted above, Estey J. held that aerodromes are "an essential part of aeronautics and aerial navigation" (p. 319). The location of aerodromes attracts the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity because it is essential to the federal power, and hence falls within its core.

[Other cases are discussed.]

[40] I conclude that the location of aerodromes lies at the core of the federal aeronautics power. Long-standing precedent establishes that where aircraft may take off and land is a matter protected by the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity. Since s. 26 of the ARPALAA purports to limit where aerodromes can be located, it follows that it trenches on the core of the federal aeronautics power.

[41] The remaining question is whether the impact of s. 26 on the federal power is sufficiently serious to attract the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity.

(2) Does Section 26 of the Act Unacceptably Interfere with a Federal Competency?

[42] It is not enough that s. 26 of the ARPALAA strikes at the heart of a federal competency; it must be shown that this interference is constitutionally unacceptable. This raises the issue of how serious an interference must be to render a provincial law inapplicable.

[43] After a period of inconsistency, it is now settled that the test is whether the provincial law impairs the federal exercise of the core competence: Canadian Western Bank, per Binnie and LeBel JJ.

[45] "Impairment" ... suggests an impact that not only affects the core federal power, but does so in a way that seriously or significantly trammels the federal power. ...

[46] The question is whether applying s. 26 of the ARPALAA to prohibit aerodromes would impair the exercise of the core of a federal power, in this case Parliament's ability to decide when and where aerodromes should be built.

[47] I conclude that the s. 26 prohibition does impair the federal power to decide when and where aerodromes should be built. It prohibits the building of aerodromes in designated agricultural regions unless prior authorization has been obtained from the Commission. As the facts of this case illustrate, the effect may be to prevent the establishment of a new aerodrome or require the demolition of an existing one. This is not a minor effect on the federal power to determine where aerodromes are built.

[48] Section 26 of the ARPALAA significantly restricts, or impairs, Parliament's power to determine where aerodromes may be constructed. Section 26 of the ARPALAA does not sterilize Parliament's power to legislate on aeronautics; the doctrine of paramountcy would permit Parliament to legislatively override provincial zoning legislation for the purpose of establishing aerodromes [emphasis in original]. But the ARPALAA would nevertheless seriously affect the manner in which the power can be exercised. Instead of the current permissive regime, Parliament would be obliged to legislate for the specific location of particular aerodromes. Such a substantial restriction of Parliament's legislative freedom constitutes an impairment of the federal power. Though the focus of the inquiry must be on the power itself, it is worth noting that the practical effect of the ARPALAA is hardly trivial. It effectively removes 63,000 km², the total area of the designated agricultural regions, from the territory that Parliament has designated for aeronautical uses. This is not an insignificant amount of land, and much of it is strategically located.

[50] ... [T]he Province argues that s. 26 of the ARPALAA does not impair the federal power because Parliament remains free to designate particular locations where airfields should be constructed, overriding the provincial law by the doctrine of federal paramountcy. In essence, this argument asserts that the doctrine of paramountcy suffices to render the intrusion on the core federal power insignificant. With respect, I do not agree.

[52] ... [The Province's argument] impermissibly mingles the distinct doctrines of interjurisdictional immunity and paramountcy, in a way that distorts the former. In those circumstances where interjurisdictional immunity applies, the doctrine asks whether the core of the legislative power has been impaired, not whether or how Parliament has, in fact, chosen to exercise that power.

[53] ... [The argument also] does not answer the fact that the impact of s. 26 is to impair the federal aeronautics power to designate land for the construction of air-fields. If Parliament wished to override s. 26 of the ARPALAA by way of federal paramountcy, it would be forced to establish a legislative conflict with each of the Commission's decisions regarding aerodromes, since the doctrine of paramountcy deals with conflict in the exercise of power in the situation where there is overlapping federal and provincial legislation: Rothmans, Benson & Hedges Inc. v. Saskatchewan, 2005 SCC 13, [2005] 1 S.C.R. 188, at para. 11. Parliament would not be free to introduce broad, permissive legislation, should it so choose (and as it has chosen to do). Acceptance of this argument would narrow Parliament's legislative options and impede the exercise of its core jurisdiction. ... It might also result in rival systems of regulation, which would be a "source of uncertainty and endless disputes" (Bell Canada, at p. 843, per Beetz J.) and a "jurisdictional nightmare" (British Columbia (Attorney General) v. Lafarge Canada Inc., 2007 SCC 23, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 86, at para. 140, per Bastarache J.).

[60] To sum up, the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity is applicable in this case. The location of aerodromes lies at the core of the federal competence over aeronautics. Section 26 of the Act impinges on this core in a way that impairs this federal power. If s. 26 applied, it would force the federal Parliament to choose between accepting that the province can forbid the placement of aerodromes on the one hand, or specifically legislating to override the provincial law on the other hand. This would seriously impair the federal power over aviation, effectively forcing the federal Parliament to adopt a different and more burdensome scheme for establishing aerodromes than it has in fact chosen to do.

[Justice Deschamps wrote dissenting reasons for judgment on the applicability issue, in which LeBel J concurred. She accepted that the siting of private aerodromes falls within the core of federal jurisdiction over aeronautics, but she formulated the "impairment" question to be answered in very different terms than McLachlin CJ. Instead of asking, as McLachlin CJ did, whether application of the provincial legislation would impair the power of Parliament to regulate the establishment of private aerodromes, she asked whether application of that legislation would impair the activity of small-scale aviation. In her view, that way of formulating the question was more consistent with the prior jurisprudence, in particular the manner in which Binnie and LeBel JJ dealt with the impairment issue in Canadian Western Bank. Having chosen to formulate the question in this different manner, she went on to decide that, because "the designated agricultural land represents only about 63,000 km², or about 4 percent of the province's territory" (at para 89), permitting s 26 to apply in the circumstances of this case would not impair the activity of small-scale aviation, and therefore concluded that the requested immunity from it should not be granted.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Do you agree with Deschamps J that the focus of the impairment inquiry in COPA should have been on the activity falling within the core area of the head of power at issue, the activity of small-scale aviation, rather than on the ability of Parliament to exercise its aeronautics power?
2. Do you think that the new two-step test devised and used by McLachlin CJ in this case represents an improvement in the Supreme Court's approach to the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity? Should the party seeking to have the doctrine applied be required to show not only that the impugned legislation trenches on a core area of a head of power assigned to the other order of government but also that it does so to a "sufficiently serious" degree? Is the addition of the latter step simply a reflection of the Court's insistence in Canadian Western Bank that the impugned legislation must be shown to "impair" rather than "affect" the core? Or does the manner in which the majority went about applying that step—asking whether the impugned provincial legislation impaired the ability of Parliament to exercise its power over aerodromes—suggest that it represents more than that?
3. Bruce Ryder has pointed out that the decision of McLachlin CJ in this case appears to convert what Binnie and LeBel JJ in Canadian Western Bank argued was a reason not to apply the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity—the risk of creating what they termed "legal vacuums," which they viewed as "not desirable" (at para 44)—into the very reason why it should be applied in this case. He noted that it was the fact that, if s 26 were held to be applicable to the establishment of private aerodromes on lands designated agricultural, and the federal government objected to the implications thereof for its jurisdiction over that activity, "[i]nstead of the current permissive regime, Parliament would be obliged to legislate for the specific location of particular aerodromes" (at para 48). In other words, it was the absence of any existing federal legislation in relation to the establishment of such aerodromes—a legal vacuum on the federal side—that led her to conclude that s 26 should not be permitted to apply to that activity, thereby preserving that legal vacuum. How seriously should we now take the concern about the undesirability of legal vacuums? See Bruce Ryder, "Equal Autonomy in Canadian Federalism: The Continuing Search for Balance in the Interpretation of the Division of Powers" (2011) 54 SCLR (2d) 565 at 590.

4. How would you analyze COPA through the lens of Simeon's three criteria of choice? Which of those criteria would you see being most relevant: community, functional efficiency, or democracy? And what effect would each of the three criteria have on your thinking about the appropriate outcome?

5. Shortly after COPA was decided, the Supreme Court was asked in PHS Community Services Society (the "Insite" case) to apply the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity to protect a core area of provincial legislative jurisdiction from generally worded, valid federal legislation. The federal legislation, clearly valid under s 91, was the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act, SC 1996, c 19 (CDSA), which creates a number of criminal offences relating to the possession, use, and trafficking of harmful drugs and other like substances. The sphere of provincial jurisdiction that the challengers sought to protect was health care, and the specific area of that jurisdiction that was of concern to them was the ability of a provincial government to take a medical rather than a criminal approach to intravenous drug users by creating supervised injection sites. In effect, what the claimants were asking for was a grant to the medical staff and users in Insite, the facility in the Downtown Eastside area of Vancouver at which this medical approach was being taken, of an immunity from the application of the offence provisions of the CDSA.

The Court had no difficulty with the fact that the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity was being invoked to protect provincial jurisdiction in this case, but it nevertheless rejected the claim. Chief Justice McLachlin, writing for the full Court, affirmed the cautious approach to the doctrine prescribed by Canadian Western Bank and then refused to accept that "the delivery of health care" deserved to be characterized as a core area of provincial jurisdiction over health care, providing four reasons for doing so: (1) such a core had never been recognized before; (2) the proposed area had the potential to be very broad; (3) the proposed area was one in which both levels of government have been permitted to legislate; and (4) recognition of the claimed core had the potential to create legal vacuums. Do you find these reasons persuasive? Do you think the claimants might have improved their chances of success if they had defined the proposed core in narrower terms? How might they have done that?

6. There is a long line of cases in which the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity has been invoked by parties seeking to have it applied to protect core areas of federal jurisdiction over "Indians and Lands Reserved for the Indians," under s 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867, from generally worded, valid provincial legislation. In some of the more recent of these cases, the claim has been grounded in two assertions: first, that the provincial legislation infringed on one or more of the rights protected by s 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982, and, second, that because those rights should be understood to be part of the core of s 91(24), the provincial legislation was encroaching on that core. In Tsilhqot'in Nation v British Columbia, 2014 SCC 44, excerpted in Chapter 14, Indigenous Peoples and the Constitution, McLachlin CJ, writing for a unanimous Court, suggested that the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity should no longer be applied in cases of that nature and that they should instead be dealt with directly under s 35. The implication of this suggestion is that valid provincial legislation that would have been ruled inapplicable if the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity had been available will now be applicable unless it fails the justificatory test that has been established by the Court for infringements of s 35 rights. The Chief Justice justified this change in approach as follows:

[141] The doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity is directed to ensuring that the two levels of government are able to operate without interference in their core areas of exclusive jurisdiction. This goal is not implicated in cases such as this. Aboriginal rights are a limit on both federal and provincial jurisdiction.

Chief Justice McLachlin also justified the change in approach on the basis of the "modern articulation of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity" in Canadian Western Bank and COPA, noting that interjurisdictional immunity, which is "premised on a notion that regulatory environments can be divided into watertight jurisdictional compartments, ... is often at odds with modern reality" (at para 148). Applying the doctrine in such cases would, she said, create "serious practical difficulties" and the potential for legislative vacuums. Do you agree that the doctrine should no longer be applied in cases implicating s 35 rights? Does that not leave open the possibility that more provincial legislation than would have formerly been the case will be applicable to core areas of s 91(24)? (For confirmation that the new approach to interjurisdictional immunity also applies to treaty rights protected under s 35, see Grassy Narrows First Nation v Ontario (Natural Resources), 2014 SCC 48 at para 53.)

We end our look at the manner in which the courts interpret the division of powers with excerpts from articles by constitutional scholars Bruce Ryder, Wade Wright, Johanne Poirier, and Jean-François Gaudreault-Desbiens.

Professor Ryder posited two very different general approaches to the resolution of the question regarding how to interpret the division of powers that he says are reflected in the jurisprudence—classical federalism and modern federalism—and described the features of each.

Bruce Ryder, "The Demise and Rise of the Classical Paradigm in Canadian Federalism: Promoting Autonomy for the Provinces and First Nations"

(1991) 36:2 McGill LJ 309 at 309-14, 380-81 (footnotes omitted)

In [OPSEU] Chief Justice Dickson remarked that "[t]he history of Canadian constitutional law has been to allow for a fair amount of interplay and indeed overlap between federal and provincial powers." This is an accurate description of only part of our constitutional jurisprudence. It may be that, in the post-World War II era, judicial interpretation of the constitution has gradually moved away from a "classical" view of the distribution of powers, that allowed for little overlap and interplay of provincial and federal powers, towards the more flexible "modern" federalism described by the Chief Justice. But this movement, from what I will call the classical paradigm to the modern paradigm in Canadian federalism, has been neither consistent nor steady. Indeed, both approaches have been invoked by the courts at all stages of our history of constitutional judicial review. Nevertheless, the larger trend does emerge from a study of the cases. One can say, at least, that the modern paradigm has replaced the classical paradigm as the dominant approach to the judicial interpretation of the division of powers. . . .

The classical and modern paradigms represent different judicial approaches to defining "exclusivity" of federal and provincial powers, and thus of preserving provincial autonomy. The classical paradigm is premised on a "strong" understanding of exclusivity: there shall be no overlap or interplay between federal and provincial heads of power. The heads of power in the federal and provincial lists should not be interpreted literally, but should be "mutually modified" in light of the subjects accorded to the jurisdiction of the other level of government so as to avoid overlapping responsibilities as much as possible. Each level of government must act within its hermetically sealed boxes of jurisdiction, or “watertight compartments” (“compartiments étanches”). Any spillover effects on the other level of government’s jurisdiction will not be tolerated. Such legislative spillover must be contained, either by ruling such laws ultra vires, or by “reading them down” so that they remain strictly within the enacting legislature’s jurisdiction. ...

The modern paradigm, on the other hand, is premised on a weaker understanding of exclusivity. Instead of seeking to prohibit as much overlap as possible between provincial and federal powers, the modern approach to exclusivity simply prohibits each level of government from enacting laws whose dominant characteristic (“pith and substance”) is the regulation of a subject matter within the other level of government’s jurisdiction. Exclusivity, on this approach, means the exclusive ability to pass laws that deal predominantly with a subject matter within the enacting government’s catalogue of powers. If a law is in pith and substance within the enacting legislature’s jurisdiction, it will be upheld notwithstanding that it might have spillover effects on the other level of government’s jurisdiction. And if a problem of national or international dimensions is functionally beyond the capacity of a province to regulate effectively, it will be allocated to federal jurisdiction. In these ways, the modern paradigm, to borrow Dickson C.J.’s words, allows for a “fair amount of interplay and indeed overlap between federal and provincial powers.”

The weakness of the classical paradigm is that in a complex, interdependent world, social problems do not fit so neatly into jurisdictional boxes. Virtually any piece of legislation can be cut down by a holding of ultra vires if the classical paradigm is invoked in all its vigour. In addition, the watertight compartments metaphor can give rise to a legislative vacuum by hiving off parts of interconnected phenomena, granting jurisdiction over part to the federal government and part to the provinces. In this way, effective regulation of the whole is left to the unpredictable fate of attempts at inter-governmental cooperation. In sum, the classical paradigm is the course of judicial activism, because it puts more stringent constraints on legislation enacted by both levels of government. And, by creating legislative vacuums, it compromises the principle of exhaustiveness.

The modern paradigm is the course of judicial restraint; it avoids the deregulatory tendencies of the classical paradigm by maximizing the ambit of the legislative powers available to the federal and provincial governments alike. However, the weakness of the modern paradigm is that it can be employed in a manner that compromises provincial autonomy. By allowing legislation to have spillover effects on the other government’s areas of jurisdiction, it creates areas of social life subject to overlapping or concurrent powers. Where overlapping federal and provincial laws come into conflict, the rule of federal paramountcy provides that the federal law prevails, rendering the provincial law inoperative to the extent of the conflict. Thus, the modern paradigm, by extending the areas subject to concurrent powers, extends the potential for federal dominance inherent in the paramountcy rule. Carried to its logical extreme, the modern paradigm would make a mockery of provincial autonomy.

An analysis of the case law interpreting the constitutional division of powers indicates that the doctrinal techniques of what I have called the classical and modern paradigms have been utilized by the courts at all stages of our constitutional history. Most scholars have associated the use of these paradigms with particular time periods and courts—the classical paradigm is frequently associated with the pre-World War II Privy Council era, and the modern paradigm with the Supreme Court of Canada's post-war jurisprudence. I have suggested that it is more fruitful to map the use of the two paradigms by reference to differing judicial attitudes to regulation in different areas of social life. The deregulatory bias of the classical paradigm has been applied to legislation that is viewed as interfering with the operation of free markets; the judicial tolerance of the modern paradigm has been applied to legislation perceived to deal with issues of morality or social order . . . These broad tendencies in the doctrinal structure of Canadian federalism can be traced from the early days following Confederation through to the present day.

Most Canadian scholars have been partisans of either the classical or the modern paradigm as the only appropriate approach to defining the meaning of exclusivity in the division of powers. The classical paradigm has been defended by jurists such as Jean Beetz as the best means of preserving an authentic federalism with equally autonomous provincial and federal governments. Others, such as Peter Hogg, have defended the judicial restraint inherent in the modern paradigm as the appropriate interpretive posture of an unaccountable judiciary. I have argued that the task of federal interpretation should not be approached as an either/or choice between the two paradigms. Both the classical and the modern paradigms are legitimate attempts to give real meaning to exclusivity and to the democratic principle of exhaustiveness. Each has an important role to play . . .

More recently, Professor Wade Wright has identified three federalisms:

Wade Wright, "Federalism(s) in the Supreme Court of Canada During the McLachlin Years"

(2018) 86 SCLR (2d) 213 (footnotes omitted)

1. Three Federalisms

(a) Classical Federalism

Let me start with the first paradigm—classical federalism. Its basic features have been described in a large body of scholarship. As its name suggests, it is the “classic” view of the division of powers, and as such, it often serves as the reference point for discussions of the other paradigms.

As a theory of federalism, classical federalism likens the federal and provincial governments to sovereign states, with the exclusive authority to regulate all subjects or “matters” that fall within their jurisdiction under the division of powers. It eschews the overlap or interplay of federal and provincial jurisdiction, unless the text of the Constitution explicitly provides otherwise; rather, it supports confining federal and provincial jurisdiction to what Lord Atkin, writing for the Privy Council, famously called “watertight compartments.” Under the classical federalism paradigm, jurisdiction thus operates both to empower, by enabling one order of government to enact laws in relation to particular subjects, and to disempower, by preventing the other order of government from enacting laws in relation to those same subjects. Jurisdiction is thereby confined to “mutually exclusive and self-contained boxes,” and “each order of government is seen as operating in its own separate sphere, never really overlapping or crossing paths with the other.”

As a theory of federalism, classical federalism takes no position about how jurisdiction is exercised by the two orders of government where it exists. This is left to the political process to decide. If either order of government somehow "strays" beyond its sphere of jurisdiction, exclusive or concurrent, it can and will be "dealt with harshly" by the courts. However, when they operate within their spheres of jurisdiction, the two orders of government can "act with impunity," and need "pay no heed to the harmful consequences of [their] action[s] on [their] neighbours." Thus, "intergovernmental relations [in a classical federal system] are ... 'deliberate' and 'optional,' somewhat along the lines of diplomatic relations between independent states."

What theory of judicial review is associated with classical federalism? The answer is that, under the classical paradigm, the courts are typically cast in the role of "umpires" or "arbiters," and tasked with safeguarding the exclusive jurisdictional allocations emphasized under its associated theory of federalism.

This warrants a bit of unpacking. Take the first point about the role of the courts. Under the classical paradigm, the courts are thought to play an important—indeed essential—role as "umpires" or "arbiters" of the division of powers. At first glimpse, there might appear to be little agreement about what this role entails, but on closer inspection, there are actually key points of agreement. First, as umpires or arbiters, the role of the courts is thought to be to resolve disputes about the division of powers, in the process clarifying and enforcing lines or boundaries defining the scope or limits of federal and provincial jurisdiction. The term division of powers, which is the term that is usually used in discussions of federalism in the legal scholarship in Canada, reflects this basic idea. In addition, as umpires or arbiters, the role that the courts play is central; their word about the scope or limits of federal and provincial jurisdiction is, if not exclusive, then decisive. The political branches may play a role in setting the division of powers, by deciding which initiatives to pursue and how, but in doing so, they must operate within the constitutional constraints that the courts clarify and enforce as umpires or arbiters. Finally, as umpires or arbiters, the courts are expected to ensure that the balance of power between the federal and provincial governments is (relatively) fixed and stable, not (overly) flexible and dynamic. The division of powers (like the rest of the Constitution) may be a "living tree," subject to changes to accommodate new or different circumstances, but it is a living tree with "natural limits."

Take the next point about the theory of federalism that the courts are expected to safeguard as umpires or arbiters. Under the classical paradigm, the central function of the courts, as umpires or arbiters, is unsurprisingly to clarify and enforce the "mutually exclusive spheres of activity" associated with this theory of federalism. This approach manifests, among other ways, in doctrines that privilege jurisdictional exclusivity, like the mutual modification and interjurisdictional immunity doctrines, and a corresponding suspicion of doctrines that allow for jurisdictional overlap, like the double aspect and ancillary powers (or necessarily incidental) doctrines. For the courts, "the classical paradigm is the course of judicial activism, because it puts more stringent constraints on legislation enacted by both [orders] of government."

(b) Modern Federalism

The next paradigm is modern federalism. Its basic features, like classical federalism, have also been outlined in a large body of scholarship. The modern federalism paradigm differs in fundamental ways from the classical federalism paradigm. As a theory of federalism, the core difference is that it tolerates, even celebrates, significant overlap in jurisdiction. As Bruce Ryder notes, "[t]he belief in clear boundaries separating the legitimate spheres of provincial and federal activity is abandoned in favour of a recognition of interdependence and overlap in federal and provincial spheres of activity."

This has important implications for modern federalism's associated theory of judicial review. Because modern federalism tolerates, or celebrates, overlap in jurisdiction, the role of the courts is more attenuated; it is, accordingly, the "way of judicial restraint." This manifests, among other ways, in an embrace by the courts of the overlap-friendly doctrines that classical federalism views with caution, and a cautious approach to the exclusivity-friendly doctrines that classical federalism privileges. This, in turn, leaves the particular mix of federal and provincial policies more to the political process.

And yet, while the classical and modern paradigms differ, in particular over how much they emphasize jurisdictional exclusivity, they are also similar in important respects. As a theory of federalism, modern federalism also allocates both orders of government a realm of exclusive jurisdiction. It simply defines exclusivity in a narrower way, allowing one order of government to pursue policies that have "incidental" effects on subjects allocated to the other, provided they deal "predominantly" with matters that fall within their jurisdiction. In addition, modern federalism also does not take a strong position about how jurisdiction is exercised where it exists. Here again, this is left to the political process to decide. Finally, as a theory of judicial review, modern federalism still casts the courts in the role of umpire or arbiter. The role of the courts is attenuated, as noted. However, the courts are still called upon to clarify and enforce those jurisdictional limits that remain, and where a conflict arises between overlapping federal and provincial laws, the courts also play a role, applying the federal paramountcy doctrine to resolve the conflict.

(c) Cooperative Federalism

Consider finally the third paradigm—cooperative federalism. It has taken on increased importance in recent years in the McLachlin Court's decisions, but it has not received the same depth of treatment by scholars as the first two paradigms. This is not surprising. Cooperative federalism is not new, inside or outside the courts, but, as I argue below, the prominence that it has been given by the courts, as a guide for judicial decision-making, is new.

What does cooperative federalism entail as a theory of federalism? There is no clear consensus about the answer to this question. However, there does appear to be some level of agreement that cooperative federalism refers, at a minimum, to a federal system in which the two orders of government work out their own exercises (and, perhaps allocations) of jurisdiction in particular regulatory contexts, by invoking a vast network of formal and informal mechanisms and relationships for this purpose. William Lederman, for example, suggested "[t]he essence of co-operative federalism is federal-provincial agreement, whether tacit or explicit, about complementary uses of federal and provincial powers and resources." Similarly, Peter Hogg, in a passage that was recently cited with approval by the Supreme Court, claimed "[t]he essence of cooperative federalism is a network of relationships between the ... central and regional governments," which have led to the development of "mechanisms" that, together, "allow a continuous redistribution of powers and resources without recourse to the courts or the amending process."

As a theory of federalism, cooperative federalism, unlike classical federalism and modern federalism, is not agnostic as to how jurisdiction is exercised (and perhaps allocated as well) in the federal system. It expresses (at least) a preference for cooperative intergovernmental efforts—for "agreement, whether tacit or explicit, about complementary uses of federal and provincial powers and resources." To be sure, there is an ongoing debate about whether it entails merely permitting and encouraging intergovernmental cooperation, or to some extent actually requires it as well. Some take the former view, others the latter view. And yet, accounts of cooperative federalism seem united in taking a clear(er) position about how jurisdiction is exercised (and, perhaps allocated, as well), favouring cooperative intergovernmental decision-making.

What does cooperative federalism entail as a theory of judicial review? The focus of cooperative federalism as a theory of judicial review is, unsurprisingly, on cooperative intergovernmental decision-making about the exercise (and, perhaps allocation) of jurisdiction. The courts, at a minimum, work to accommodate, reward and encourage intergovernmental cooperation.

As a theory of judicial review, cooperative federalism differs in important ways from the theories of judicial review associated with both classical federalism and modern federalism. First, under the cooperative federalism paradigm, the courts are cast as facilitators, rather than—or in addition to—umpires or arbiters. As facilitators, the courts act as catalysts for intergovernmental cooperation. Second, and relatedly, as facilitators, the line-drawing role that the courts play as umpires or arbiters is de-emphasized; the courts focus more on accommodating, encouraging and rewarding cooperative intergovernmental efforts. Third, and related again, as facilitators, the courts are not granted the exclusive—or, perhaps even the authoritative—word about the division of powers that the classical and modern paradigms grant them as umpires or arbiters. The courts participate in a dynamic, inter-institutional, three-way dialogue about the division of powers—a dialogue in which the courts and the political branches (legislative and executive, federal and provincial) all play an active role. Finally, under a facilitative approach, the balance of power between the federal and provincial governments is less fixed and stable and more dynamic and negotiated (in practice, and perhaps to some extent legally as well), subject more to the political process over time.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In your view, which taxonomy best serves as a framework within which to consider the use to which the various doctrines that we have just examined have been put over time and in different kinds of cases?

2. For a sophisticated discussion of different conceptions of federalism, drawing in part on comparative constitutional law sources, see J-F Gaudreault-Desbiens & J Poirier, "From Dualism to Cooperative Federalism and Back?: Evolving and Competing Conceptions of Canadian Federalism" in P Oliver, P Macklem & N Des Rosiers, eds, The Oxford Handbook of the Canadian Constitution (New York: Oxford University Press, 2017) 391. The authors draw a distinction between "dualist" and "intergrated/cooperative" federalism (at 394–95, footnotes omitted):

In dualist federal systems, each order of government enjoys legislative and executive—and often judicial—powers. These powers are likely to be distributed on an exclusive basis, to maximize the autonomy and independence of each order of government. Formal legal norms are adopted in a parallel fashion, unilaterally, by each order of government. The official architecture is thus "compartmentalised," or, perhaps, more tellingly, "pillarized,"—that is, built on vertical columns or "pillars." In this type of system, interaction between federal partners is not an integral part of the overall structure or logic. Rather it takes the form of intergovernmental relations that are more "deliberate" and "optional," somewhat along the lines of diplomatic relations between independent states. The American, Australian, Brazilian, or Belgian federations largely follow this dualistic logic, and so does Canada.

The “pillarised” form of federal architecture is to be contrasted with systems in which constitutive units implement most of the legislative acts and programmes adopted by central authorities. Such systems—known in Germany, Switzerland or, by analogy, the European Union, for instance, may be described as “administrative,” “executive,” “cooperative,” or “integrated.” In those regimes, cooperation is more “organic” and structural than voluntary. Constitutive units contribute in a far more direct fashion in the adoption of federal norms which they will then have to implement (alongside their own). This form of “intrastate” federalism is, of course, an integral part of officially “administrative” federal regimes. A lesser degree of legislative autonomy is thus somewhat compensated by greater participation. It is worthy of note that there is no empirical evidence suggesting that these official forms of “integrated” systems lead to more actual cooperation than dualist ones. However, cooperation follows different channels, involves distinct institutions, and tends to rest on contrasting conceptions of the role of law in the life of specific federations. Formally “integrated” regimes have been more influenced by European civil law, and are more likely to integrate constitutional rules and principles, legislative frameworks, and judicial oversight of “inter-federal behaviour” than their counterparts with roots in the English common law.

2. Is the “cooperative federalism” referred to by Wright and by the Supreme Court of Canada the same as the “integrated/cooperative federalism” referred to by Professors Gaudreault-Desbiens and Poirier? Would it be helpful to refer instead to “flexible federalism,” as the Supreme Court of Canada has done on a number of occasions more recently? In a recent article, Julien Boudreault rightly pointed out that the Supreme Court has often used the term “cooperative federalism” in recent cases as an “umbrella term,” capturing the dual notions of flexibility and intergovernmental cooperation in a convenient form. Boudreault’s preference is to refer to the intergovernmental aspect as cooperative federalism stricto sensu, leaving the flexibility to refer to the aspect most relevant to the constitutional division of powers. (See J Boudreault, “Flexible and Cooperative Federalism: Distinguishing the Two Approaches in the Interpretation and Application of the Division of Powers” (2020) 40 NJCL 1 at 9.) Does this solution help avoid confusion?

CHAPTER NINE

PEACE, ORDER, AND GOOD GOVERNMENT

NOTE: THE HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT OF THE POGG POWER

This chapter continues the story of the federal peace, order, and good government (POGG) power after the 1930s (a period covered in Chapter 6, The 1930s: The Depression and the New Deal). POGG is generally viewed as having three branches or doctrines: emergency, "new" matters, and national concern. The distinguishing feature of the modern interpretation of the POGG power has been the re-emergence of the national concern doctrine, first introduced by Lord Watson in the Local Prohibition case, excerpted in Chapter 4, The Late Nineteenth Century, in a form that allows for federal legislation in situations of national concern apart from emergencies.

The national concern doctrine was given its modern formulation by Viscount Simon in Ontario (AG) v Canada Temperance Federation, 1946 CanLII 351, [1946] AC 193 at 5 (UKJCPC):

In their Lordships' opinion, the true test must be found in the real subject-matter of the legislation; if it is such that it goes beyond local or provincial concern or interests and must from its inherent nature be the concern of the Dominion as a whole (as, for example, in the Aeronautics Case and the Radio Case), then it will fall within the competence of the Dominion Parliament as a matter affecting the peace, order and good government of Canada, though it may in another aspect touch upon matters specially reserved to the Provincial Legislatures. War and pestilence, no doubt, are instances; so too may be the drink or drug traffic, or the carrying of arms. In Russell v. The Queen, Sir Montague Smith gave as an instance of valid Dominion legislation a law which prohibited or restricted the sale or exposure of cattle having a contagious disease. Nor is the validity of the legislation, when due to its inherent nature, affected because there may still be room for enactments by a Provincial Legislature dealing with an aspect of the same subject in so far as it specially affects that Province.

In Canada Temperance Federation, the doctrine was used to uphold the federal government's 1927 re-enactment of the Canada Temperance Act. Viscount Simon reaffirmed (at 6) the validity of Russell v The Queen (1882), 7 App Cas 829, 51 LJPC 77 (PC) and also rejected the suggestion that Russell was based on a finding that intemperance constituted a national emergency in 1878:

It is to be noticed that the Board in Snider's case nowhere said that Russell v. The Queen was wrongly decided. What it did was to put forward an explanation of what it considered was the ground of the decision, but in their Lordships' opinion the explanation is too narrowly expressed. True it is that an emergency may be the occasion which calls for the legislation, but it is the nature of the legislation itself, and not the existence of emergency, that must determine whether it is valid or not.

Viscount Simon also expanded the scope of the POGG power by recognizing the power to legislate to prevent an emergency from occurring (at 7):

To legislate for prevention appears to be on the same basis as legislation for cure. A pestilence has been given as an example of a subject so affecting, or which might so affect, the whole Dominion that it would justify legislation by the Parliament of Canada as a matter concerning the order and good government of the Dominion. It would seem to follow that if the Parliament could legislate when there was an actual epidemic it could do so to prevent one occurring and also to prevent it happening again.

The national concern doctrine, as set out in Canada Temperance Federation, was applied to validate federal legislation in two cases decided by the Supreme Court in the 1950s and 1960s. Both suggested an expansive reading of the doctrine.

In Johannesson v Municipality of West St Paul, [1952] 1 SCR 292, 1951 CanLII 55, a case involving a challenge to a municipal by-law controlling the location of airports, the majority of the Court referred to the doctrine as supporting exclusive federal legislative jurisdiction with respect to the whole field of aeronautics. (Recall that in the Canada (AG) v Ontario (AG), 1931 CanLII 466, [1932] AC 54 (UKJCPC) [Aeronautics Reference], discussed in Chapter 6, the justification for federal jurisdiction over aeronautics was the treaty power found in s 132 of the Constitution Act, 1867. That justification was no longer available because the case involved a treaty signed by Canada itself, rather than by Britain on Canada's behalf.) The Supreme Court of Canada rendered five opinions supporting the result, with substantially similar reasoning. Justice Locke (at 326) offered the following reasons to justify exclusive federal jurisdiction over aeronautics:

There has been since the First World War an immense development in the use of aircraft flying between the various provinces of Canada and between Canada and other countries. There is a very large passenger traffic between the provinces and to and from foreign countries, and a very considerable volume of freight traffic not only between the settled portions of the country but between those areas and the northern part of Canada, and planes are extensively used in the carriage of mails. That this traffic will increase greatly in volume and extent is undoubted. While the largest activity ... is in the hands of a government controlled company, private companies carry on large operations, particularly ... [to] the North The maintenance and extension of this traffic ... is essential to the opening up of the country and the development of the resources of the nation. It [is clear] that the field of aeronautics is one which concerns the country as a whole. It is an activity, which [, borrowing from] Attorney General for Ontario v Canada Temperance Federation, must from its inherent nature be a concern of the Dominion as a whole. ... [It] is not, in my opinion, capable of division in any practical way. ... [By way of example,] it would be intolerable that such a national purpose might be defeated by a rural municipality, the Council of which decided that the noise attendant on the operation of airplanes was objectionable.

In Munro v National Capital Commission, [1966] SCR 663, 1966 CanLII 74, the Supreme Court unanimously upheld the National Capital Act, RSC 1985, c N-3, on the basis of POGG. The Act created a National Capital Commission to "prepare plans for and assist in the development, conservation and improvement of the National Capital Region in order that the nature and character of the seat of the Government of Canada may be in accordance with its national significance" (at 668). Munro, whose property in the Township of Gloucester was expropriated under the Act in the course of establishing a green belt outside the City of Ottawa, argued that the federal legislation was a form of planning and zoning legislation similar to that covered by provincial Planning Acts. Justice Cartwright, acknowledging that doctrine adopted by the Court in Johannesson, ruled that the development of the National Capital Region under the Act was a "single matter of national concern" (at 671). Justice Cartwright also highlighted the following conclusions made by the trial judge regarding the legislative history, which anticipate elements of the "provincial inability" test that has become central to the national concern branch of POGG (at 667):

(i) that the making of zoning regulations and the imposition of controls of the use of land situate in any province ... are matters which, generally speaking, come within the classes of subjects assigned to the Legislatures by s. 92 of the British North America Act; (ii) that the legislative history ... indicates that Parliament, up to the time of the passing of that Act, contemplated that the "zoning" of the lands comprised in the National Capital Region should be effected by co-operation between the Commission ... and the municipalities ... ; and (iii) that it was only after prolonged and unsuccessful efforts to achieve the desired result by such co-operation that Parliament decided to confer upon the National Capital Commission the powers necessary to enable it to carry out the zoning contemplated in the Master Plan.

In another case, Jones v AG of New Brunswick, [1975] 2 SCR 182, 1974 CanLII 164, the opening words of s 91 were relied on to uphold a federal law without mention of the national concern doctrine. That implied, as first suggested in the Reference re Regulation and Control of Radio Communications, [1931] SCR 541, 1931 CanLII 83 [Radio Reference] (discussed in Chapter 6) that s 91 can authorize federal legislation in relation to subject matters not explicitly assigned to either level of government. At issue was the constitutionality of the federal Official Languages Act, which provided for the equal status of French and English in federal institutions. Chief Justice Laskin, for a unanimous Court, upheld the legislation on the basis that federal institutions are "clearly beyond provincial reach" (at 189), and, as such, fall within the opening words of s 91 because "of the purely residuary character of the legislative power thereby conferred" (at 189).

Notwithstanding the above cases, the reach of the national concern doctrine remained uncertain. In the reference opinion that follows, Re: Anti-Inflation Act (excerpted below), the Supreme Court was asked about the constitutionality of federal wage and price controls that applied in areas traditionally within provincial jurisdiction. The Act was drafted in a manner that allowed an argument for its validity under either the national dimensions doctrine or the emergency doctrine. Were it to succeed under the former, there would be a substantial enlargement of federal power over economic regulation. Therefore, the case was seen as a potential turning point in constitutional law.

The leading judgments in the case, those of Laskin and Beetz JJ, are informed by their very different views of Canadian federalism and the interpretation of the division of powers articulated in their respective earlier careers as legal academics. The background and prior writings of each are described by Professor Katherine Swinton in the excerpt that follows.

Katherine E Swinton, The Supreme Court and Canadian Federalism: The Laskin-Dickson Years

(Toronto: Carswell, 1990) at 219-25, 240-41, 260-65 (footnotes omitted)

Laskin's Centralist Vision

A study of the approaches to federal–provincial disputes by members of the Supreme Court of Canada in recent years must begin with Bora Laskin. Not only was he a leading academic constitutional lawyer before he joined the judiciary; in his 19 years as a judge, he played a predominant role in decisions on the distribution of powers under the Constitution Act, 1867 ...

It is often difficult to articulate, with any degree of certainty, the views of a particular judge on a range of federalism issues. Laskin, while prolific in his judicial writing, was highly formal in his judicial style in constitutional cases, obscuring the policy aspect of his decisions behind a recitation of cases and consideration of precedent. While this style would obscure the views of some judges, the outcomes in the wide range of cases in which Laskin wrote are revealing, as are some of the statements found in his judgments. ... [As well, from 1941 to 1965, he was a professor at either Osgoode Hall Law School or the University of Toronto, and in that period he wrote several articles and case comments, as well as his casebook on constitutional law, which cast additional light on his attitudes towards federalism as well as his views on judging. Obviously, some of the academic's beliefs were reshaped by his judicial experience, but many of his early views on the constitution remained with him throughout his career. ...]

Safeguarding Federal Jurisdiction

Laskin the academic had firm views on the way in which the then British North America Act should be interpreted, and these beliefs were later applied in his judgements. His approach invited results favouring a strong central government. For example, he believed that the opening words of section 91, the "peace, order and good government" clause, constituted the "general power," while the enumerated powers in section 91 were illustrative only. This approach had not been adopted by the Privy Council, which had given primacy to the enumerated powers and relegated the opening words to a residuary position. While Laskin disliked the Privy Council approach, he felt that its error would not have been that serious if the Court had properly applied the aspect doctrine, which, in his opinion, it did not. Indeed, he was highly critical of the Privy Council's treatment of the aspect doctrine, which focussed on the subject matter of legislation, allocating particular concrete subjects to the federal or provincial governments as "fields" of law-making. In contrast to this "territorial" or boundary driven approach, Laskin felt that a court should focus on the object or purpose of legislation, asking whether the law had a federal or provincial "aspect," with the result that concrete subjects like the wheat trade, for example, might be regulated by both levels of government—albeit from different aspects as permitted by the classes of law-making powers set out in sections 91 and 92 of the constitution. ...

If we turn from the structure of inquiry to its substance, we find that, in Laskin's opinion, the federal government was the logical institution to deal with important problems, and he decried the results of Privy Council jurisprudence for the following reason:

[H]as provincial autonomy been secured? In terms of positive ability to meet economic and social problems of interprovincial scope, the answer is not. A destructive negative autonomy exists, however, which has as a corollary that the citizens of a province are citizens of the Dominion for certain limited purposes only.

Consistent with this confidence in the efficacy of national regulation, Laskin believed that problems once local in nature could take on a federal aspect, as they became more complex or spilled over provincial borders. He believed that the courts should interpret the constitution so as to recognize this evolutionary potential. Thus, in judicial review under the constitution, a court should take a flexible view of the instrument, interpreting it so as to allow effective governmental responses to important problems of public policy. ...

Beetz's Classical Federalism

... While Laskin espoused a view of federalism that favoured the existence of a strong central government and called for flexibility in the interpretation of the constitution, Beetz seemed to search for principles and rules to confine the exercise of judicial discretion. Overall, he was much more protective of provincial rights and, as a consequence, cautious about departing from precedents which provided safeguards for provincial autonomy. It would be misleading, however, to describe Beetz in one-dimensional terms—as the Quebec nationalist constantly on guard for the province's interests. His vision of the constitution was indeed guided by a concern for provincial autonomy, a value which he embedded in Canadian traditions and the language of the constitutional document, but his reading of that document was influenced by a classical vision of the federal system, which demanded respect for the autonomy of the federal, as well as the provincial governments in the areas of jurisdiction which the constitution allocated to each. In contrast to the functional approach to interpretation espoused by Laskin (which seemed to lend itself to the expansion of the central power), Beetz preferred a more conceptual approach to the interpretation of the constitution which would preserve exclusive areas of jurisdiction for both levels of government. ...

Beetz the Academic

Like Laskin, Beetz began his career as a professor of law. Educated at the University of Montreal and Oxford, where he studied as a Rhodes Scholar, he returned to teach law at the University of Montreal His academic expertise in constitutional law was enriched by a period of service at the federal level as Assistant Secretary to the federal cabinet and later as Special Counsel to the Prime Minister of Canada for constitutional matters from 1968 through 1971. Two years later he was appointed to the Quebec Court of Appeal and, in 1974, to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Beetz was not a prolific scholar in his professorial days, [but two of his articles reveal] his views on the constitution

A Québécois Point of View

The first article, dealing with the changing attitudes of Quebec towards the constitution, was written in 1965, when Quebec was in the midst of the turmoil of the Quiet Revolution The article discussed issues of constitutional interpretation, as well as Quebec's political agenda in federal–provincial relations over the years

Beetz began with the historical proposition that the British North America Act was a document designed to protect the French-speaking minority of Quebec from majority domination in certain areas important to the preservation of the Franco-phone culture—specifically religion, language, laws, and education. ... Once these areas of jurisdiction were designated for provincial governments, it became important, from a Québécois point of view, that the constitution be interpreted in a manner sympathetic to provincial competence. Noting that there are various methods of interpreting legislation, depending on the type of statute and the style of drafting, Beetz characterized the British North America Act as a "document paradoxal": its status as a fundamental law, difficult to amend and designed to last indefinitely, suggests the need for a liberal interpretation to allow the document to evolve with changing circumstances, yet the Act was drafted in the technical and detailed manner of a statute to which one would normally give a restrictive interpretation

Beetz felt that the nature and style of the British North America Act had an impact on the subsequent interpretation of the document, fostering competing schools of interpretation of sections 91 and 92—the one supportive of the decisions of the Privy Council, because that body treated the opening words of section 91 as residuary and subordinate and gave primacy only to the federal enumerated powers over the provincial powers; the second critical of that institution because of the reduced role for the federal residuary power (and, thus, the circumscription of federal action).

In an interesting footnote, Beetz expressed his personal opinion that the Privy Council's interpretation was correct, given the contradictions of the text. He explained that the federal enumerated powers must be of primary importance in interpretation in order to limit the reach of the provincial powers. ...

While some critics of Beetz's judicial work have described him as mechanistic and unduly conceptual, the charge is unfair if it implies that he had no conception of the creative nature of judging. Beetz, like Laskin, clearly acknowledged that judges have a considerable amount of discretion in interpreting the distribution of powers in the constitution. ...

While many of the cases brought before the Privy Council could have been differently decided, he noted that it has been in Quebec's interest to emphasize the immutability of the constitution, since the Privy Council jurisprudence was so favourable to minority interests. As a result, the Quebec approach to the constitution has emphasized the importance of stare decisis and has rejected the functional approach of the realist scholars. ... Instead, in Quebec, there has been a preference for analytical jurisprudence, with concentration on the development of concepts, rather than a functional or relativist approach. Thus, there was a distrust of the "national dimensions" approach to the peace, order and good government clause of section 91, because that doctrine would allow matters traditionally within provincial jurisdiction to take on a national importance warranting federal action. A Québécois would prefer the emergency interpretation of the peace, order, and good government power, because it leads only to a temporary suspension of the constitution, rather than a permanent transfer of power to the federal government based on the importance of the problem to be addressed. ...

Along with the national dimensions power, Québécois were also concerned about the increasing tendency to find concurrent powers between federal and provincial governments, for this seemed inconsistent with the constitution's reference to "exclusivity" of legislative powers. Concurrency seems problematic because it gives a wider zone for the supremacy of federal laws, through the operation of the paramountcy doctrine. ...

Beetz went on to examine Quebec's attitude towards state action under the constitution, commenting on the transformation from a fixation on the parts of the constitution which could protect Quebec culturally and linguistically—the powers over education and civil law—to the use of the constitution to advance Quebec economically. The power to legislate over property and civil rights then becomes important not because it permits the preservation of the civil law of Quebec, but because it gives the province jurisdiction over labour relations, industrial development, transportation, and commerce in general within its territory. Quebec's special debt to the Privy Council for the expansion of the property and civil rights power is acknowledged. ...

The spirit of Quebec in the 1960s described by Beetz is quite familiar, capturing Quebec's nationalism and its government's wariness of federal encroachment on provincial jurisdiction. In this newly activist Quebec state, the Canadian constitution was a problematic document. ... While that process may have been slower in Canada than in other federal countries, the language of the Canadian constitution would allow for much greater centralization without any formal amendment. This could occur through the overruling of past decisions or interpretation of heads of power hitherto little explored. Most obviously, the judges could use existing doctrine to expand federal jurisdiction. ...

Re: Anti-Inflation Act[1976] 2 SCR 373, 1976 CanLII 16

[The Anti-Inflation Act, SC 1974-75-76, c 75 established a system of price, profit, and income controls. The Act applied to private sector firms with more than 500 employees, members of designated professions, construction firms with more than 20 employees, and other private sector firms declared to be of strategic importance to the scheme. The Act was also binding on the federal public sector, but applicable to the public sector of each province only if an agreement was made between the federal government and the government of the province.

The long title and preamble of the Act were as follows:

An Act to provide for the restraint of profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation in Canada

WHEREAS the Parliament of Canada recognizes that inflation in Canada at current levels is contrary to the interests of all Canadians and that the containment and reduction of inflation has become a matter of serious national concern;

AND WHEREAS to accomplish such containment and reduction of inflation it is necessary to restrain profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation. ...

The governor in council directed a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada to determine whether the Act was ultra vires and whether the Ontario agreement, purporting to make the Act applicable to the Ontario public sector, was valid. Seven judges (the Chief Justice, Judson, Spence, Dickson, Ritchie, Martland, and Pigeon JJ) held that the Act was supportable under the POGG power as emergency or "crisis" legislation, while two (Beetz and de Grandpré JJ) held it was not. The Court divided differently on the question of whether the existence of an emergency was essential to the Act's validity. Five (Ritchie, Martland, Pigeon, Beetz, and de Grandpré JJ) held that it was, rejecting a national dimensions argument; four (Laskin CJ, Judson, Spence, and Dickson JJ) left open the question of whether the legislation was supportable under the national dimensions test.]

LASKIN CJ (Judson, Spence, and Dickson JJ concurring):

The Attorney-General of Canada, having the carriage of the Reference, included in the case (1) the Order of Reference and the annexes thereto; (2) the federal Government's White Paper [that acted as] a prelude to the introduction of ... [the Act]; and (3) the monthly bulletin of Statistics Canada for October 1975 containing, inter alia, various consumer price indices Leave was given in the order for directions of April 6, 1976, to other interested parties to file additional materials, and the Canadian Labour Congress included ... an untitled study by Professor Richard G. Lipsey Telegrams from a large number of economists supporting the analysis made by Professor Lipsey were also submitted by the Canadian Labour Congress. The Attorney-General of Canada ... filed in answer a transcript of a speech ... by the Governor of the Bank of Canada The Attorney-General of Ontario filed ... a comment, prepared by the Ontario Office of Economic Policy, ... designed to show the need for national action; and it also submitted a critique of Professor Lipsey's study

In order to [assess] the extrinsic material it is necessary to examine the ambit of the legislative power under which the Anti-Inflation Act was enacted. It is my opinion that only in such a context can the Court be urged, whether through a doctrine of judicial notice or through an adaptation to constitutional purposes of the rules in Heydon's Case [that is, the rule that legislation is to be interpreted in light of its [purpose or the mischief at which it was aimed], to consider extrinsic materials as bearing on the validity of challenged legislation. ... Courts have thought it proper to consider the operation and effect of the legislation as providing a key to its purpose, especially where the allegation is that the legislation [is colourable]. ...

[N]o general principle of admissibility or inadmissibility can or ought to be propounded by this Court, and ... [the answer] must depend on the constitutional issues on which it is sought to adduce such evidence.

... There is no issue in this case as to the meaning of the terms of the legislation nor, in my opinion, is there any issue as to the object of the legislation. ... [The arguments] turn substantially on whether the social and economic circumstances upon which Parliament can be said to have proceeded in passing the Act were such as to provide support for the Act in the power of Parliament to legislate for the peace, order and good government of Canada. The extrinsic material proffered in this case was directed to this question and may, hence, be properly considered thereon.

• • •

The Attorney-General of Canada, supported by the Attorney-General of Ontario, ... [contended primarily] that the Act ... concerned a matter which went beyond local or private or provincial concern and was of a nature which engaged vital national interests. ... He urged, in the alternative, that there was an economic crisis amounting to an emergency ... sufficient to warrant federal intervention, and, if not an existing peril, there was a reasonable apprehension of an impending one

... If [the Act] is sustainable as crisis legislation, it becomes unnecessary to consider [whether it relates] to a matter of national concern], and this because, especially in constitutional cases, Courts should not, as a rule, go any farther than is necessary to determine the main issue before them.

The competing arguments on the [emergency] question ... raised four main issues: (1) Did the [form of the] Anti-Inflation Act itself belie the federal contention ... ? (2) Is the federal contention assisted by the preamble to the statute? (3) Does the extrinsic evidence ... and other matters of which the Court can take judicial notice ... show that there was a rational basis for the Act as a crisis measure? (4) Is it a tenable argument that [the legislation rose] beyond local or provincial concerns because Parliament could reasonably take the view that it was a necessary measure to fortify action in other [federal] related areas ... ?

[The first issue is] whether the scope of the compulsory application of the Anti-Inflation Act [indicates] that the Parliament of Canada did not act through any sense of crisis or urgency in enacting it. I note that the federal public service, a very large public service, is governed by the Act and the Guidelines, [as are] private employers of five hundred or more persons ... , [as well as construction companies] who employ twenty or more persons ... and various [other] professions Again, the Act provides for bringing within the Act and Guidelines [by Order in Council certain other] businesses. ... [T]he coverage is comprehensive indeed in its immediately obligatory provisions

I do not regard the provisions respecting the provincial public sector as an indicator that the Government and Parliament of Canada were not seized with urgency Provincial governmental concern about rising inflation and concurrent unemployment was a matter of public record prior to the inauguration of the programme. ... [Given the scope of the sectors included], I see it as a reasonable policy from the standpoint of administration to allow the Provinces to contract into the programme in respect of the provincial public sector under their own administration Since the "contracting in" is envisaged on the basis of the federal Guidelines the national character of the programme is underlined.

... [Counsel opposing the legislation raised the issue of] provincial co-operation, ... the proposition being that inflation was too sweeping a subject to be dealt with by a single authority If this is meant to suggest that Parliament cannot act in relation to inflation even in a crisis situation, I must disagree. ... Co-operative federalism may be consequential upon a lack of federal legislative power, but it is not a ground for denying it.

The Attorney-General of Canada ... emphasized the words [in the preamble] "that the containment and reduction of inflation has become a matter of serious national concern" and as well the following words that "to accomplish such containment and reduction of inflation it is necessary to restrain profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation" (the italicized words were especially emphasized). I do not regard it as telling ... that the very word "emergency" was not used. Forceful language would not carry the day for the Attorney-General of Canada [in the opposite direction]. ... [Note] that ... no preamble at all was included in the legislation challenged in the Board of Commerce case.

The preamble in the present case is sufficiently indicative that Parliament was [responding to what in its view was a serious national condition. ...]

This brings me to the third [issue], namely, ... extrinsic evidence and ... judicial notice. ... In considering [extrinsic] material and assessing its weight, the Court does not look at it in terms of whether it provides proof of the exceptional circumstances as a matter of fact. ... [T]he extrinsic material need go only so far as to persuade the Court that there is a rational basis for the legislation.

There is before this Court material from Statistics Canada, ... which, proceeding from a base of 100 in 1971, shows that the purchasing power of the dollar dropped to 0.78 by September, 1974, and to 0.71 in September, 1975. On the same base, the cost of living index rose to 127.9 by September, 1974, and to 141.5 by September, 1975, with food, taken alone, and weighted at 28 per cent of all the items taken into calculation, showing a rise to 147.3 in September, 1974, and 166.6 in September, 1975. These are figures from the Consumer Price Index monitored by Statistics Canada, and I note that Professor Lipsey in his study states that "the measure [of inflation] that is of most direct relevance to the person in the street is the rate of inflation of the CPI." He defines inflation as "a monetary phenomenon in the sense that a rise in the price level is the same thing as a fall in the value of money (i.e., a fall in its purchasing power)." What the Consumer Price Index shows, and Professor Lipsey himself relies on its figures, is that for the first time in many years Canada had a double digit inflation rate for successive years

There have been inflationary periods before in our history but, again referring to Professor Lipsey's study, "the problem of the coexistence of high unemployment and high inflation rates was not, however, encountered before the late 1960's." These twin conditions continued to the time that the Government and Parliament acted in establishing its prices and incomes policy under the Anti-Inflation Act and Guidelines, and were the prime reason for the policy.

There is another consideration that arises from the opposing submissions [It] is based on Professor Lipsey's ... conclusion that the policy adopted in the Anti-Inflation Act is not one that can ... be expected to reduce the rate of inflation by more than one to two per cent. The answer to this submission is ... that the wisdom or expediency or likely success of a particular policy expressed in legislation is not subject to judicial review. Hence, it is not for the Court to say in this case that because the means ... may not be effectual, [they] are beyond the legislative power of Parliament.

I would not exclude the possibility that the means chosen to deal with an alleged evil may be some indicator of whether that evil exists as a foundation for legislation. Professor Lipsey is candid enough to say in his study that whether "a problem is serious enough to be described as a crisis must be partly a matter of judgment." The general question ... is, to use his words, "could an economist say that the Canadian economy faced an economic crisis, or was in a critical situation, in October 1975?" He answers this question in the negative The Court cannot, however, be concluded by the judgment of [even a distinguished] economist ... on a question of [constitutional] validity

In my opinion, this Court would be unjustified in concluding ... that the Parliament of Canada did not have a rational basis for regarding the Anti-Inflation Act as a measure which, in its judgment, was temporarily necessary to meet a situation of economic crisis imperilling the well-being of the people of Canada as a whole and requiring Parliament's stern intervention in the interests of the country as a whole. That there may have been other periods of crisis in which no similar action was taken is beside the point.

The rationality of the judgment [is] supported by ... the fourth [issue]. The fact that there had been rising inflation at the time federal action was taken, that inflation is regarded as a monetary phenomenon and that monetary policy is admittedly within exclusive federal jurisdiction persuades me that the Parliament of Canada was entitled ... to act as it did from the springboard of its jurisdiction over monetary policy and ... with additional support from its power in relation to the regulation of trade and commerce.

For all the foregoing reasons, I would hold that the Anti-Inflation Act is valid legislation for the peace, order and good government of Canada

BEETZ J (de Grandpré J concurring) (dissenting):

The control and regulation of local trade and of commodity pricing and of profit margins in the provincial sectors have consistently been held to lie, short of a national emergency, within exclusive provincial jurisdiction. ... The same is true generally of the contract of employment, including wages, whether concluded on an individual basis or collectively in the context of labour relations.

The Anti-Inflation Act, therefore, and the Guidelines directly and ostensibly interfere with classes of matters ... within exclusive provincial jurisdiction They do not interfere with provincial jurisdiction in an incidental or ancillary way, but in a frontal way and on a large scale. Prima facie, the Anti-Inflation Act is pro tanto ultra vires of the Parliament of Canada which, under s. 91 of the Constitution, cannot make laws in relation to matters "coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces."

The first submission made by counsel for Canada and for Ontario is that the subject-matter of the Anti-Inflation Act is the containment and the reduction of inflation. This subject-matter, it is argued, goes beyond local provincial concern or interest and is from its inherent nature the concern of Canada as a whole and falls within the competence of Parliament as a matter affecting the peace, order and good government of Canada. It was further submitted that the competence of Parliament over the subject of inflation may be supported by reference to [numerous] heads of s. 91 of the Constitution . . .

If the first submission is to be accepted, then it must be conceded that the Anti-Inflation Act could be compellingly extended to the provincial public sector. Parliament . . . could decide to control and regulate at least the maximum salaries paid to all provincial public servants notwithstanding any provincial appropriations, budgets and laws. Parliament could also regulate wages paid by municipalities, educational institutions, hospitals and other provincial services as well as tuition or other fees charged by some of these institutions for their services. Parliament could occupy the whole field of rent controls. Since in time of inflation there can be a great deal of speculation in certain precious possessions such as land or works of arts, Parliament could move to prevent or control that speculation not only in regulating the trade or the price of those possessions but by any other efficient method reasonably connected with the control of inflation. . . . Parliament could control all inventories in the largest as in the smallest undertakings, industries and trades. Parliament could ration not only food but practically everything else in order to prevent hoarding and unfair profits. One could even go further and argue that since inflation and productivity are greatly interdependent, Parliament could regulate productivity, establish quotas and impose the output of goods or services . . . produce[d] in any given period. Indeed, since practically any activity or lack of activity affects the gross national product, the value of the Canadian dollar and, therefore, inflation, it is difficult to see what would be beyond the reach of Parliament. Furthermore, all those powers would belong to Parliament permanently; only a constitutional amendment could reduce them. Finally, the power to regulate and control inflation as such would belong to Parliament [exclusively].

Such are the constitutional imports of the first submission in terms of the so-called subject matter of inflation.

Its effects on the principles which underlie the distribution of other powers between Parliament and the Legislatures are even more far-reaching assuming there would be much left of the distribution of powers if Parliament has exclusive authority in relation to the "containment and reduction of inflation."

If the first submission is correct, then it could also be said that the promotion of economic growth or the limits to growth or the protection of the environment have become global problems and now constitute subject matters of national concern . . . It is not difficult to speculate as to where this line of reasoning would lead: a fundamental feature of the Constitution, its federal nature, the distribution of powers between Parliament and the provincial Legislatures, would disappear not gradually but rapidly.

This submission is predicated upon the proposition that the subject-matter of the Anti-Inflation Act, its pith and substance, is inflation or the containment and reduction of inflation.

The "containment and reduction of inflation" can be achieved by various means including monetary policies . . . ; and the restraint of profits, prices and wages . . .

I have no reason to doubt that the Anti-Inflation Act is part of a more general programme aimed at inflation . . . I am prepared to accept that inflation was the occasion or the reason for its enactment. But I do not agree that inflation is the subject matter of the Act. In order to characterize an enactment, one must look at its operation, at its effects and at the scale of its effects rather than at its ultimate purpose where the purpose is practically all-embracing. If for instance Parliament is to enact a tax law or a monetary law as a part of an anti-inflation programme no one will think that such laws have ceased to be a tax law or a monetary law They plainly remain and continue to be called a tax law or a monetary law, although they have been enacted by reason of an inflationary situation. ... Similarly, the Anti-Inflation Act is, as its preamble states, clearly a law relating to the control of profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation, that is, with respect to the provincial private sector, a law relating to the regulation of local trade, to contract and to property and civil rights in the Provinces, enacted as part of a programme to combat inflation. Property and civil rights in the Provinces are, for the greater part, the pith and substance or the subject matter of the Anti-Inflation Act. According to the Constitution, Parliament may fight inflation with the powers put at its disposal by the specific heads enumerated in s. 91 or by such powers as are outside of s. 92. But it cannot, apart from a declaration of national emergency or from a constitutional amendment, fight inflation with powers exclusively reserved to the Provinces, such as the power to make laws in relation to property and civil rights. This is what Parliament has in fact attempted to do in enacting the Anti-Inflation Act.

The authorities relied upon by Counsel for Canada and Ontario in support of the first submission are connected with ... the national concern doctrine or national dimension doctrine.

In my view, the incorporation of companies for objects other than provincial, the regulation and control of aeronautics and of radio, the development, conservation and improvement of the National Capital Region are clear instances of distinct subject matters which do not fall within any of the enumerated heads of s. 92 and which, by nature, are of national concern.

[In the authorities just mentioned] ... [the] new matter was not an aggregate but had a degree of unity that made it indivisible, an identity which made it distinct from provincial matters and a sufficient consistence to retain the bounds of form. The scale upon which these new matters enabled Parliament to touch on provincial matters had also to be taken into consideration ... : if an enumerated federal power designated in broad terms such as the trade and commerce power had to be construed so as not to embrace and smother provincial powers (Parson's case) and destroy the equilibrium of the Constitution, the Courts must be all the more careful not to add hitherto unnamed powers of a diffuse nature to the list of federal powers.

The "containment and reduction of inflation" does not pass muster as a new subject matter. It is an aggregate of several subjects some of which form a substantial part of provincial jurisdiction. It is totally lacking in specificity. It is so pervasive that it knows no bounds. Its recognition as a federal head of power would render most provincial powers nugatory.

I should add that inflation is a very ancient phenomenon, several thousand years old, as old probably as the history of currency. The Fathers of Confederation were quite aware of it.

For those reasons, the first submission fails.

II

The second submission made in support of the validity of the Anti-Inflation Act is that the inflationary situation was in October of 1975, and still is such as to constitute a national emergency ... ; that such situation of exceptional necessity justified the enactment of the impugned legislation.

Before I deal with this second submission I should state at the outset that I am prepared to assume the validity of the following propositions:

- the power of Parliament under the national emergency doctrine is not confined to war situations or to situations of transition from war to peace; an emergency of the nature contemplated by the doctrine may arise in peace time;
- inflation may constitute such an emergency;
- Parliament may validly exercise its national emergency powers before an emergency actually occurs; a state of apprehended emergency or crisis suffices to justify Parliament in taking preventive measures including measures to contain and reduce inflation where inflation amounts to state of apprehended crisis.

In order to decide whether the Anti-Inflation Act is valid as a national emergency measure, one must first consider the way in which the emergency doctrine operates in the Canadian Constitution; one must find, in the second place whether the Anti-Inflation Act was in fact enacted on the basis that it was a measure to deal with a national emergency in the constitutional sense.

In referring to the emergency doctrine, the Judicial Committee has sometimes used expressions which would at first appear to indicate that there is no difference between the national dimension or national concern doctrine and the emergency doctrine

I disagree with the proposition that the national concern or national dimension doctrine and the emergency doctrine amount to the same. . . [An] emergency does not give [a] matter the same dimensions as the national concern doctrine The national concern doctrine . . . applies in practice as if certain heads such as aeronautics or the development and conservation of the national capital were added to the [powers] enumerated in s. 91 of the Constitution Whenever the national concern theory is applied, the effect is permanent By contrast, the power of Parliament to make laws in a great crisis knows no limits other than those which are dictated by the nature of the crisis. But one of those limits is the temporary nature of the crisis. . . .

... [Practically speaking, the emergency power] . . . operates so as to give to Parliament . . . concurrent and paramount jurisdiction over matters [normally within] exclusive provincial jurisdiction. To that extent, the exercise of that power amounts to a temporary pro tanto amendment of a federal Constitution by the unilateral action of Parliament. The legitimacy of that power is derived from the Constitution: when the security and the continuation of the Constitution and of the nation are at stake, the kind of power commensurate with the situation "is only to be found in that part of the constitution which establishes power in the state as a whole" (Viscount Haldane in the Fort Frances case, p. 704).

The extraordinary nature and the constitutional features of the emergency power of Parliament dictate the manner and form in which it should be invoked and exercised. It should not be an ordinary manner and form. At the very least, it cannot be a manner and form which admits of the slightest degree of ambiguity . . . Parliament [must give] an unmistakable signal Such a signal is not conclusive to support the legitimacy of the action of Parliament but its absence is fatal. . . . [The Courts] cannot decide that a suspension is legitimate unless the highly exceptional power to suspend it has been expressly invoked by Parliament If there is no such affirmation, the Constitution receives its normal application. Otherwise, it is the Courts which are indirectly called upon to proclaim the state of emergency whereas it is essential that this be done by a politically responsible body.

We have not been referred to a single judicial decision, and I know of none, ratifying the exercise by Parliament of its national emergency power where the constitutional foundation for the exercise of that power had not been given clear utterance to. And, apart from judicial decisions, I know of no precedent where it could be said that Parliament had attempted to exercise such an extraordinary power by way of suggestion or innuendo.

The use of the national emergency power enables Parliament to override provincial laws in potentially every field: it must be explicit.

This is not to say that Parliament is bound to use ritual words. Words such as "emergency" are not necessarily required and they may indeed be used in a non-constitutional sense since Parliament can enact emergency or urgent legislation in fields prima facie coming within its normal authority. ...

... What is required from Parliament ... , is an indication, I would even say a proclamation, in the title, the preamble or the text of the instrument, which cannot possibly leave any doubt The statutes of Canada and the Canada Gazette contain several examples of laws, proclamations and Orders in Council which leave room for no [such] doubt Those dealing with wartime or post-war conditions usually present no difficulty

The Anti-Inflation Act fails in my opinion to pass the test of explicitness required to signal that it has been enacted pursuant to the national emergency power of Parliament.

The preamble has been much relied upon:

WHEREAS the Parliament of Canada recognizes that inflation in Canada at current levels is contrary to the interests of all Canadians and that the containment and reduction of inflation has become a matter of serious national concern;

AND WHEREAS to accomplish such containment and reduction of inflation it is necessary to restrain profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation;

The words "a matter of serious national concern" have been emphasized.
I remain unimpressed.

The death penalty is a matter of national concern. So is abortion. So is the killing or maiming of innumerable people by impaired drivers. So is the traffic in narcotics and drugs. ... I fail to see how the adding of the word "serious" can convey the meaning that Parliament has decided to embark upon an exercise of its extraordinary emergency power.

• • •

There is nothing in the rest of the Act and in the Guidelines to show that they have been passed to deal with a national emergency. There is much, on the other hand, ... which is inconsistent with the nature of a global war launched on inflation considered as a great emergency. It would not be within our province to judge the efficacy and wisdom of the legislation if it were truly enacted to deal with an extraordinary crisis but its lack of comprehensiveness may be indicative of its ordinary character.

[Beetz J reviewed the various exemptions under the Act and the optional application to the provincial public sector by provincial consent.]

It may be argued that those exemptions and options were put into the Act and the Guidelines in order to make their administration lighter and easier or as a matter of federal–provincial comity. Still, a situation of national emergency does not, at first sight, lend itself to opting in and opting out formulae nor to large scale exemptions.

We have been invited to go outside the Act and the Guidelines and consider extrinsic evidence and take judicial notice of facts of public knowledge.

It is a fact for instance that provincial Governments were seriously concerned about rising inflation and that eight of the ten Provinces have entered into agreements with the Government of Canada for the application of the federal guidelines. But I cannot regard that concern and these agreements as a recognition that Parliament was acting under its national emergency power when it enacted the Anti-Inflation Act. Only Parliament, or under a law of Parliament, the Government of Canada, can assume responsibility for declaring a state of national emergency; it would be delicate and probably unwarranted for the Courts to count Provinces and to evaluate the degree of provincial support in such a matter. ...

We were provided with a wealth of extrinsic material [expected to] enable us to make a finding of fact as to whether or not inflation had reached a[n emergency] level or as to whether or not there was a rational basis for Parliament to [so] judge . . . I do not reach that point, of course, since I hold the view that Parliament did not rely upon its extraordinary power. It seems to me, however, . . . [that] it is not improper for us to read Hansard A perusal of the debates reveals that between October 14, 1975, when the policy statement was tabled . . . and the third reading and the passing of the Bill in the Senate on December 10, 1975, the question was raised repeatedly . . . as to what was the constitutional foundation of the Bill and as to whether it was not necessary expressly to declare a state of emergency in order to insure its constitutionality. The replies vary but slightly; their general tenor is to the effect that Parliament has jurisdiction to pass the bill as drafted under the peace, order and good government power—which is rather unrevealing—in addition to other specific federal powers enumerated in s. 91 of the Constitution.

... [Those statements] reinforce my opinion that the Anti-Inflation Act was enacted in this form because it was believed, erroneously, that Parliament had the ordinary power to enact it under the national concern or national dimension doctrine Parliament did not purport to enact it under the [emergency power].

The Anti-Inflation Act is in my opinion ultra vires of Parliament in so far at least as it applies to the provincial private sector; but severability having not been pleaded by counsel for Canada, I would declare the Act ultra vires of Parliament in whole.

[Justice Ritchie, with Martland and Pigeon JJ concurring, agreed with Beetz J that the national concern doctrine could not apply here. He went on to find that the legislation was justified under the national emergency doctrine, relying on the Act's preamble and the government's White Paper to show that Parliament was motivated "by a sense of urgent necessity created by highly exceptional circumstances" (at 439). In his view, the opponents of the legislation had failed to show by "very clear evidence that an emergency had not arisen when the statute was enacted" (at 439).]

NOTE: THE ANTI-INFLATION CASE AND EXTRINSIC EVIDENCE

One significant aspect of the Anti-Inflation case was the introduction and use of extrinsic evidence. Indeed, Peter Hogg has commented:

The Anti-Inflation Reference constitutes a clear precedent for the admission of social-science briefs in constitutional cases where legislative facts are in issue. Despite the court's silence on this aspect of the decision, it may prove in the long run to be the most influential point of the case.

See Peter Hogg, "Proof of Facts in Constitutional Cases" (1976) 26 UTLJ 386 at 404.

The Supreme Court of Canada elaborated on its approach to extrinsic evidence in constitutional cases in Re Residential Tenancies Act, [1981] 1 SCR 714, 1981 CanLII 24. Dickson J, writing for the Court, explained (at 723):

Generally speaking, for the purpose of constitutional characterization of an Act we should not deny ourselves such assistance as Royal Commission reports or Law Reform Commission reports underlying and forming the basis of the legislation under study, may afford. The weight to be given such reports is, of course, an entirely different matter. They may carry great, little, or no weight, but at least they should, in my view, generally be admitted as an aid in determining the social and economic conditions under which the Act was enacted. ... The mischief at which the Act was directed, the background against which the legislation was enacted and institutional framework in which the Act is to operate are all logically relevant.

The remainder of the Residential Tenancies case is found in Chapter 13, The Role of the Judiciary.

In Reference re Upper Churchill Water Rights Reversion Act, [1984] 1 SCR 297, 1984 CanLII 17, the Supreme Court of Canada clarified (at 318) that in constitutional cases, particularly where there are allegations of colourability, extrinsic evidence may be considered to ascertain not only the operation and effect of the impugned legislation but its true object and purpose as well.

In that case, the Supreme Court determined that The Upper Churchill Water Rights Reversion Act, 1980 (Nfld), c 40, had been enacted for an unconstitutional purpose. The Act sought to "provide for the reversion to the province of unencumbered ownership and control in relation to certain water with the province" (s 3). The background to the Act was a long-term contract entered into between Hydro Quebec and the Churchill Falls (Labrador) Corporation Limited (CFLCo) on 15 May 1969 whereby the latter agreed to sell the former nearly all of the power produced at Churchill Falls for a term of 40 years. The contract was renewable at Hydro Quebec's option for an additional 25 years. Newfoundland argued that the Act fell within its jurisdiction under s 92(13) to regulate intraprovincial contracts. The Supreme Court of Canada found that the legislation was ultra vires, on the basis that Hydro Quebec's right to the delivery of power from Churchill Falls was situate in Quebec, and the Act had been enacted for the colourable purpose of interfering with an extra-provincial contractual interest.

In Reference re Upper Churchill Water Rights Reversion Act, the Supreme Court declined to admit as extrinsic evidence speeches made in the Newfoundland Legislative Assembly at the time of the enactment of the impugned law, on the basis that they could not be said to represent the intent of the legislature. However, the restriction on Hansard evidence was lifted by the Supreme Court of Canada in R v Morgentaler, [1993] 3 SCR 463 at 484-85, 1993 CanLII 74:

The main criticism of [legislative debates and speeches] has been that [they] cannot represent the "intent" of the legislature, an incorporeal body, but that is equally true of other forms of legislative history. Provided that the court remains mindful of the limited reliability and weight of Hansard evidence, it should be admitted as relevant to both the background and the purpose of legislation. Indeed, its admissibility in constitutional cases to aid in determining the background and purpose of legislation now appears well established. ... I would adopt the following passage from [Peter W Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada, 3rd ed (Toronto: Carswell, 1992)], as an accurate summary of the state of the law on this point (at pp. 15-14 and 15-15):

In determining the “purpose” of a statute in this special sense, there is no doubt as to the propriety of reference to the state of law before the statute and the defect in the law (the “mischief”) which the statute purports to correct. These may be referred to under ordinary rules of statutory interpretation. ... The relevance of legislative history is obvious: it helps to place the statute in its context, gives some explanation of its provisions, and articulates the policy of the government that proposed it. Legislative history has usually been held inadmissible in Canada under ordinary rules of statutory interpretation. But the interpretation of a particular provision of a statute is an entirely different process from the characterization of the entire statute for purposes of judicial review. There seems to be no good reason why legislative history should not be resorted to for the latter purpose [Footnotes omitted.]

The remainder of the Morgentaler decision, in which the Court relied extensively on evidence from Hansard, is found in Chapter 8, Interpreting the Division of Powers.

Morgentaler referred to the criticism that Hansard evidence could not represent legislative intent. In Westminster parliamentary democracies—such as Canada’s—this concern is arguably mitigated by the conventions of responsible government and cabinet solidarity, and strong norms of party discipline. When governments command the support of legislative majorities and introduce legislation, Hansard evidence on the part of government ministers and members is likely to cohere around the purpose of the legislation.

However, how should courts approach Hansard evidence where the legislation was proposed by a private member and was opposed by the government and where party discipline is relaxed? This is the situation which arose in Reference re Genetic Non-Discrimination Act, 2020 SCC 17, where the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of ss 1-7 of the Genetic Non-Discrimination Act, SC 2017, c 3 (at para 7), pursuant to which individuals and corporations cannot force individuals to take genetic tests or disclose genetic test results and cannot use individuals’ test results without their written consent in the areas of contracting and the provision of goods and services.

The Supreme Court divided on the pith and substance of the legislation, and this disagreement turned on competing views of the Hansard evidence. Justice Karakatsanis (Abella and Martin JJ concurring) held that the Hansard evidence revealed that the purpose of the law was to combat genetic discrimination, which posed a risk to several public interests—autonomy, privacy, equality, and public health—whose protection fell within the scope of the federal criminal law power, s 91(27). Justice Moldaver (Côté J concurring) held, on the contrary, that the Hansard evidence showed that the purpose was to protect health, which fell within federal jurisdiction under s 91(27). Justice Kassier (Wagner CJ, Brown and Rowe JJ concurring) dissented, and held that the Hansard evidence led to the conclusion that pith and substance was to regulate contracts of insurance and employment in order to create incentives to take genetic tests.

There were two unusual features to the legislative process surrounding the enactment of the Genetic Non-Discrimination Act. First, the bill was introduced in the Senate, not the House of Commons. As a consequence, as Karakatsanis J recognized, “the Court does not have the benefit of statements made by or on behalf of the minister sponsoring the bill” (at para 40). Second, the government opposed the bill but did not impose party discipline on its backbenchers, a sufficient number of whom voted for the bill in the House of Commons to adopt it. Indeed, the Attorney General of Canada took the position that the Genetic Non-Discrimination Act was ultra vires Parliament. In these circumstances, should the Supreme Court have taken a different approach to the Hansard evidence?

NOTE: EMERGENCY LEGISLATION AFTER THE ANTI-INFLATION REFERENCE

The federal Parliament enacted new legislation to deal with national emergencies in 1988: see the Emergencies Act, RSC 1985, c 22 (4th Supp), enacted by SC 1988, c 29. The following note contains a brief description of its contents.

The statute defines a "national emergency" as

3. ... an urgent and critical situation of a temporary nature that
 - (a) seriously endangers the lives, health or safety of Canadians and is of such proportions or nature as to exceed the capacity or authority of a province to deal with it, or
 - (b) seriously threatens the ability of the Government of Canada to preserve the sovereignty, security and territorial integrity of Canada and that cannot be effectively dealt with under any other law of Canada.

The law contains provisions dealing with different types of emergencies, including public welfare, public order, international, and war emergencies. Of special interest to us are the public welfare emergencies (including those caused by real or imminent fires, floods, disease, accident, or pollution amounting to a national emergency). While the federal Cabinet (governor in council) can declare an emergency, the declaration must concisely describe the state of affairs constituting the emergency, and it must be confirmed by Parliament. As well, the declaration cannot be made without prior consultation with affected provincial governments and an agreement by the provincial Cabinet that the province is unable to deal with the situation. Thus, the legislation seems to reflect Beetz J's concern about "signals" in Anti-Inflation. For a more detailed review of the legislation, see Peter Rosenthal, "The New Emergencies Act: Four Times the War Measures Act" (1991) 20 Man LJ 563.

After reading this summary, do you think that the courts would interfere with a declaration of a public welfare emergency in relation to a matter within provincial jurisdiction?

The question of whether Parliament should enact new emergency legislation arose in the COVID-19 pandemic. As Carissima Mathen explains (Carissima Mathen, "Resisting the Siren's Call: Emergency Powers, Federalism, and Public Policy" in Colleen M Flood, Vanessa MacDonnell, Sophie Thériault, Sridhar Venkatapuram & Jane Philpott, eds, Vulnerable: The Law, Policy & Ethics of COVID-19 (Ottawa: University of Ottawa Press, 2020) 115 at 119):

The pandemic has profoundly affected all areas of social and economic life; and revealed cracks in the country's health and social welfare systems. Under the division of powers, provinces have exclusive authority over "property and civil rights" and "all matters of a merely local or private nature"—in other words, over those aspects of life most at risk from the virus. But, spurred in part by the different levels of provincial success in combatting COVID-19, the federal government has faced repeated calls to intervene.

Mathen provides three examples of areas of provincial jurisdiction where there were calls for federal legislative intervention in response to COVID-19: the regulation of long-term care homes, which were ravaged by the virus; enacting a moratorium on all residential and commercial evictions and a national regime of rent control and/or temporarily suspending the obligation to pay rent; and creating a national system for testing. However, she urges a careful weighing of the benefits and drawbacks of any new federal emergency legislation (at 123-26):

Benefits: Consistency, Capacity, and Reassurance

There is no question that the COVID-19 pandemic represents a previously unimaginable threat to national well-being. It is not surprising that many would look to the federal government for leadership. To the extent that such leadership was expressed through emergency legislation, it could provide the following benefits.

First, federal emergency laws might bring a welcome measure of consistency. Instituting nationwide policies around COVID-19 testing, for example, would address confusion over the criteria by which persons are able to access it. Such consistency might be especially prized when the need to track the course of a disease is constant among subnational units. The aim would be to scale up to the best practices available. The same can be said about economic security: vulnerable persons ought not to receive varying relief simply because of their province of residence.

Second, to the extent that the federal order has greater capacity, emergency legislation might be a logical tool to wield it. Current levels of need, especially economic, are far beyond the fiscal envelope of most provinces. The sheer cost of such things as reforming long-term care or protecting renters is likely to deter provincial action. While the federal government's resources are not unlimited, it is the country's largest repository of wealth, as well as the greatest generator of revenue.

At the same time, however, it might appear irresponsible for the government to simply transfer funds to the provinces to meet needs as they see fit. Recent programs have been delayed by federal–provincial negotiation over mechanics and details. Passing emergency legislation would provide an immediate framework by which the necessary supports could be supplied.

Finally, an emergency law has an enormous signalling function. In rallying public sentiment or conveying a situation's gravity, such a law has few rivals. When examined closely, the calls for federal intervention can be understood as demands for reassurance. COVID-19 has dealt Canada a profound emotional shock. Emergency legislation could increase public confidence that national institutions are fully seized of the issue and are devoting all possible resources to dealing with it.

Drawbacks: Operational Obstacles and Push-Back

While emergency federal legislation can be beneficial, it does have drawbacks and risks. While they do not apply equally to the laws mooted above, they merit serious consideration.

Intuitively, a uniform response should be more coordinated and, therefore, effective. But the nature of a crisis can pose operational obstacles, at least two of which are relevant here. First, COVID-19 has not had the same effect across the country. That cuts against the kind of top-down approach that the federal order is best suited to impose. Certainly, it would be counterproductive to roll out a public health response independent of provincial and municipal authorities. Arguably, the actors closest to the relevant populations are best able to both assess relevant needs and vulnerability, and deliver the necessary services.

A second obstacle is that the very nature of the division of powers spurs the different orders of government to develop specialized competencies. For example, the ability of the Canada Revenue Agency to design and distribute the CERB to some seven million Canadians in just a few weeks is directly related to the expertise it has developed under the federal taxation power. Conversely, provinces have been delivering health care and ordering private relationships for over a century. It would take considerable time for the federal government to create comparable systems. Indeed, an ongoing emergency may be the worst time to attempt such a transformation.

The differential expertise is compounded by the fact that emergency powers are temporary. Sometimes, that will be sufficient, as with, say, a short-term scheme for rent relief or nationwide testing. Other problems require more durable solutions. The pandemic has highlighted long-standing issues of social inequality and political powerlessness. While seniors, for example, may have more acute needs because of COVID-19, those needs predate and will long outlast the virus. That does not, necessarily, argue against short-term relief. But Parliament cannot address such vulnerabilities on an ongoing basis. Absent a constitutional amendment, as was done for old age pensions, Parliament cannot federalize long-term care homes or their workers. The fact that such control will eventually cede to the provinces is an important factor in assessing the utility of intervention. That factor is only heightened when one considers the second risk of emergency legislation.

That risk is the likelihood of provincial push-back. The federal–provincial relationship rarely runs smoothly. The depth of current regional divisions is evident in the makeup of the current Parliament [in which] the governing Liberal caucus has no elected MPs from Saskatchewan or Alberta.

The emergency branch could inflame existing tensions and create new ones. The early days of the pandemic were marked by striking levels of federal–provincial cooperation. But politics inevitably returns. COVID-19 demands a high degree of collaboration among federal, provincial, and municipal actors. The federal government bears a particular responsibility to ensure a functional relationship with provinces. To be sure, when provincial failures imperil the country, or certain of its citizens, the federal government should intervene. But it cannot afford to appear dismissive or cavalier about provincial jurisdiction. It is no accident that the current Emergencies Act requires extensive consultation with provincial governments. While not a constitutional imperative, it creates a political expectation of cooperation, around which the federal order must tread carefully.

The title of this chapter invokes the siren: a mythological creature with powerful, ceaseless attraction. In The Odyssey, Ulysses bound himself to the mast of his ship to resist her call, even as he was forced to navigate close to it. Even when they must be contemplated, emergency powers demand similar restraint. In the current pandemic, the emergency branch may enable decisive action to mitigate staggering social and personal costs. But absent provincial buy-in, such action risks significant national friction that could threaten the cooperation required to vanquish COVID-19.

NOTE: THE NATIONAL CONCERN DOCTRINE FROM THE ANTI-INFLATION REFERENCE TO THE GREENHOUSE GAS POLLUTION PRICING ACT REFERENCES

The national concern doctrine emerged again in R v Hauser, [1979] 1 SCR 984, 1979 CanLII 13, summarized by Le Dain J in R v Crown Zellberbach Canada Ltd, [1988] 1 SCR 401, 1988 CanLII 63 as follows:

[29] In Hauser, a majority of the Court (Martland, Ritchie, Pigeon and Beetz J.J.) held that the constitutional validity of the Narcotic Control Act rested on the peace, order and good government power of Parliament rather than on its jurisdiction with respect to criminal law. Pigeon J., who delivered the judgment of the majority, said that the principal consideration in support of this view was that the abuse of narcotic drugs, with which the Act dealt, was a new problem which did not exist at the time of Confederation, and that since it did not come within matters of a merely local or private nature in the province it fell within the "general residual power" in the same manner as aeronautics and radio.

The doctrine was also at issue in Schneider v The Queen, [1982] 2 SCR 112, 1982 CanLII 26 and was summarized by Le Dain J in Crown Zellerbach in the following way:

[31] In Schneider, in which the Court unanimously held that the Heroin Treatment Act of British Columbia was intra vires, Dickson J. (as he then was), with whom Martland, Ritchie, Beetz, McIntyre, Chouinard and Lamer JJ. concurred, indicated, with particular reference to the national concern doctrine and what has come to be known as the "provincial inability" test, why he was of the view that the treatment of heroin dependency, as distinct from the traffic in narcotic drugs, was not a matter falling within the federal peace, order and good government power. He referred to the problem of heroin dependency as follows at pp. 131-32 [edited]:

It is largely a local or provincial problem and not one which has become a matter of national concern. ...

There is no material before the Court leading one to conclude that the problem of heroin dependency as distinguished from illegal trade in drugs is a matter of national interest and dimension transcending the power of each province to meet and solve its own way. It is not a problem which "is beyond the power of the provinces to deal with" (Professor Gibson (1976-77), 7 Man. L.J. 15, at p. 33). Failure by one province to provide treatment facilities will not endanger the interests of another province. The subject is not one which "has attained such dimensions as to affect the body politic of the Dominion" (In re Regulation and Control of Aeronautics in Canada, [1932] A.C. 54, at p. 77). It is not something that "goes beyond local provincial concern or interests and must from its inherent nature be the concern of the Dominion as a whole (as, for example, in the Aeronautics case and the Radio case)" per Viscount Simon in Attorney-General for Ontario v. Canada Temperance Federation, [1946] AC 193, at p. 205. ... Nor can it be said, on the record, that heroin addiction has reached a state of emergency as will ground federal competence under residual power.

I do not think the subject of narcotics is so global and indivisible that the legislative domain cannot be divided, illegal trade in narcotics coming within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada and the treatment of addicts under provincial jurisdiction.

Prior to References Re Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act, 2021 SCC 11, the leading modern case on the national concern doctrine was Crown Zellerbach. Justice Le Dain delivered the majority judgment. He set out the facts:

[12] The respondent [i.e., Crown Zellerbach] carries on logging operations on Vancouver Island in connection with its forest products business in British Columbia and maintains a log dump on a water lot leased from the provincial Crown for the purpose of log booming and storage in Beaver Cove, off Johnstone Strait, on the northeast side of Vancouver Island. The waters of Beaver Cove are inter fauces terrae, or as put in the stated case, "Beaver Cove is of such size that a person standing on the shoreline of either side of Beaver Cove can easily and reasonably discern between shore and shore of Beaver Cove." On August 16 and 17, 1980 the respondent, using an 80-foot crane operating from a moored scow, dredged woodwaste from the ocean floor immediately adjacent to the shoreline at the site of its log dump in Beaver Cove and deposited it in the deeper waters of the cove approximately 60 to 80 feet seaward of where the woodwaste had been dredged. The purpose of the dredging and dumping was to allow a new A-frame structure for log dumping to be floated on a barge to the shoreline for installation there and to give clearance for the dumping of bundled logs from the A-frame structure into the waters of the log dump area. The woodwaste consisted of waterlogged logging debris such as bark, wood and slabs. There is no evidence of any dispersal of the woodwaste or any effect on navigation or marine life. At the relevant time the only permit held by the respondent under the Act was one issued on or about July 28, 1980, effective until July 25, 1981, to dump at a site in Johnstone Strait some 2.2 nautical miles from the place where the woodwaste was dumped.

Crown Zellerbach was charged under the Ocean Dumping Control Act, SC 1974-75-76, c 55, which prohibits the dumping of substances at "sea" accept in accordance with the terms and conditions of a permit. The Act defines "sea" to include provincial marine waters—such as Beaver Cove—which falls under provincial jurisdiction. In defence to the charge, Crown Zellerbach challenged the constitutionality of the Act in its application to provincial marine waters, on federalism grounds.

Justice Le Dain delivered the majority judgment and rejected the constitutional challenge. He began by characterizing the purpose of the legislation:

[3] The general purpose of the Ocean Dumping Control Act is to regulate the dumping of substances at sea in order to prevent various kinds of harm to the marine environment. The Act would appear to have been enacted in fulfillment of Canada's obligations under the Convention on the Prevention of Marine Pollution by Dumping of Wastes and other Matter, which was signed by Canada on December 29, 1972. That is not expressly stated in the Act, but there are several references to the Convention in the Act

[4] The concerns of the Act are reflected in the nature of the prohibited and restricted substances in Schedules I and II and in the factors to be taken into account by the Minister of the Environment in granting permits to dump, which are set out in ss. 9 and 10 of the Act and in Schedule III. What these provisions indicate is that the Act is concerned with marine pollution and its effect on marine life, human health and the amenities of the marine environment. There is also reference to the effect of dumping on navigation and shipping and other legitimate uses of the sea.

Justice Le Dain then explained the precise nature of the constitutional issues at stake:

[16] ... The respondent concedes, as it must, that Parliament has jurisdiction to regulate dumping in waters lying outside the territorial limits of any province. It also concedes that Parliament has jurisdiction to ... prevent pollution of those waters that is harmful to fisheries It further concedes, in view of the opinion expressed in this Court in Interprovincial Co-operatives Ltd. v. The Queen, [1976] 1 SCR 477, that Parliament has jurisdiction to regulate the dumping in provincial waters of substances that can be shown to cause pollution in extra-provincial waters. What the respondent challenges is federal jurisdiction to control the dumping in provincial waters of substances that are not shown to have a pollutant effect in extra-provincial waters. ... The respondent submits that in so far as s. 4(1) of the Act can only be read as purporting to apply to such dumping it is ultra vires and, alternatively, that it should be read, if possible, so as not to apply to such dumping. In either case the appeal must fail. The Attorney General of British Columbia, ... and with whom the Attorney General of Quebec agreed, made a similar submission that s. 4(1) should be read down

[17] In this Court ... [the Attorney General of Canada's] principal submission in this court was that the control of dumping in provincial marine waters, for the reasons indicated in the Act, was part of a single matter of national concern or dimension which fell within the federal peace, order and good government power. He characterized this matter as the prevention of ocean or marine pollution.

[18] ... In my opinion, despite this apparent scope, the Act, viewed as a whole, may be properly characterized as directed to the control or regulation of marine pollution, in so far as that may be relevant to the question of legislative jurisdiction. The chosen and perhaps only effective, regulatory model makes it necessary, in order to prevent marine pollution, to prohibit the dumping of any substance without a permit. ... The Act is concerned with the dumping of substances which may be shown or presumed to have an adverse effect on the marine environment. The Minister and not the person proposing to do the dumping must be the judge of this There is no suggestion that the Act purports to authorize the prohibition of dumping without regard to perceived adverse effect or the likelihood of such effect on the marine environment. The nature of the marine environment and its protection from adverse effect from dumping is a complex matter which must be left to expert judgment.

Justice Le Dain then turned to the national concern doctrine, and gave the following summary:

[33] From this survey of the opinion expressed in this Court concerning the national concern doctrine of the federal peace, order and good government power I draw the following conclusions as to what now appears to be firmly established:

1. The national concern doctrine is separate and distinct from the national emergency doctrine of the peace, order and good government power, which is chiefly distinguishable by the fact that it provides a constitutional basis for what is necessarily legislation of a temporary nature;
2. The national concern doctrine applies to both new matters which did not exist at Confederation and to matters which, although originally matters of a local or private nature in a province, have since, in the absence of national emergency, become matters of national concern;
3. For a matter to qualify as a matter of national concern in either sense it must have a singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility that clearly distinguishes it from matters of provincial concern and a scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction that is reconcilable with the fundamental distribution of legislative power under the Constitution;
4. In determining whether a matter has attained the required degree of singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility that clearly distinguishes it from matters of provincial concern it is relevant to consider what would be the effect on extra-provincial interests of a provincial failure to deal effectively with the control or regulation of the intra-provincial aspects of the matter.

Justice Le Dain explained the fourth factor, which he referred to as the "provincial inability" test. He first quoted with approval from an article by Dale Gibson ("Measuring 'National Dimensions'" (1976) 7 Man LJ 15) as providing "the most satisfactory rationale of the cases in which the national concern doctrine of the peace, order and good government power has been applied as a basis of federal jurisdiction":

[34] ... As expounded by Professor Gibson, the test would appear to involve a limited or qualified application of federal jurisdiction. As put by Professor Gibson at pp. 34-35, "By this approach, a national dimension would exist whenever a significant aspect of a problem is beyond provincial reach because it falls within the jurisdiction of another province or of the federal Parliament. It is important to emphasize however that the entire problem would not fall within federal competence in such circumstances. Only that aspect of the problem that is beyond provincial control would do so. Since the [POGG] clause bestows only residual powers, the existence of a national dimension justifies no more federal legislation than is necessary to fill the gap in provincial powers. For example, federal jurisdiction to legislate for pollution of interprovincial waterways or to control "pollution price-wars" would (in the absence of other independent sources of federal competence) extend only to measures to reduce the risk that citizens of one province would be harmed by the non-co-operation of another province or provinces." To similar effect, he said in his conclusion at p. 36: "Having regard to the residual nature of the power, it is the writer's thesis that "national dimensions" are possessed by only those aspects of legislative problems which are beyond the ability of the provincial legislatures to deal because they involve either federal competence or that of another province. Where it would be possible to deal fully with the problem by co-operative action of two or more legislatures, the "national dimension" concerns only the risk of non-co-operation, and justifies only federal legislation addressed to that risk."

Justice Le Dain also relied on Peter Hogg's formulation of the provincial inability test:

[35] As expressed by Professor Hogg in the first and second editions of his Constitutional Law of Canada, the "provincial inability" test would appear to be adopted simply as a reason for finding that a particular matter is one of national concern falling within the peace, order and good government power: that provincial failure to deal effectively with the intra-provincial aspects of the matter could have an adverse effect on extra-provincial interests. In this sense, the "provincial inability" test is one of the indicia for determining whether a matter has that character of singleness or indivisibility required to bring it within the national concern doctrine. It is because of the interrelatedness of the intra-provincial and extra-provincial aspects of the matter that it requires a single or uniform legislative treatment. The "provincial inability" test must not, however, go so far as to provide a rationale for the general notion, hitherto rejected in the cases, that there must be a plenary jurisdiction in one order of government or the other to deal with any legislative problem. In the context of the national concern doctrine of the peace, order and good government power, its utility lies, in my opinion, in assisting in the determination whether a matter has the requisite singleness or indivisibility from a functional as well as a conceptual point of view.

Justice LeDain then applied the national concern doctrine to uphold the application of the Ocean Dumping Control Act to provincial marine waters:

[37] Marine pollution, because of its predominantly extra-provincial as well as international character and implications, is clearly a matter of concern to Canada as whole. The question is whether the control of pollution by the dumping of substances in marine waters, including provincial marine waters, is a single, indivisible matter, distinct from the control of pollution by the dumping of substances in other provincial waters. The Ocean Dumping Control Act reflects a distinction between the pollution of salt water and the pollution of fresh water. The question, as I conceive it, is whether that distinction is sufficient to make the control of marine pollution by the dumping of substances a single, indivisible matter falling within the national concern doctrine of the peace, order and good government power.

[38] Marine pollution by the dumping of substances is clearly treated by the Convention on the Prevention of Marine Pollution by Dumping of Wastes and other Matter as a distinct and separate form of water pollution . . . This impression is reinforced by . . . The Review of the Health of the Oceans (UNESCO 1982) (hereinafter referred to as the "U.N. Report"), which forms part of the materials placed before the Court in the argument. It is to be noted, however, that, unlike the Ocean Dumping Control Act, the Convention does not require regulation of pollution by the dumping of waste in the internal marine waters of a state. Article III, para. 3, of the Convention defines the "sea" as "all marine waters other than the internal waters of the States." . . . The limitation of the undertaking in the Convention, presumably for reasons of state policy, . . . cannot, in my opinion, obscure the obviously close relationship, which is emphasized in the UN Report, between pollution in coastal waters . . . and pollution in the territorial sea. Moreover, there is much force, in my opinion, in the appellant's contention that the difficulty of ascertaining by visual observation the boundary between the territorial sea and the internal marine waters of a state creates an unacceptable degree of uncertainty . . . This, and not simply the possibility or likelihood of the movement of pollutants across that line, is what constitutes the essential indivisibility of the matter of marine pollution by the dumping of substances.

[39] There remains the question whether the pollution of marine waters by the dumping of substances is sufficiently distinguishable from the pollution of fresh waters by such dumping to meet the requirement of singleness or indivisibility. In many cases the pollution of fresh waters will have a pollutant effect in the marine waters into which they flow, and this is noted by the U.N. Report, but that report, as I have suggested, emphasizes that marine pollution, because of the differences in the composition and action of marine waters and fresh waters, has its own characteristics and scientific considerations that distinguish it from fresh water pollution. Moreover, the distinction between salt water and fresh water as limiting the application of the Ocean Dumping Control Act meets the consideration emphasized by a majority of this Court in the Anti-Inflation Act reference—that in order for a matter to qualify as one of national concern falling within the federal peace, order and good government power it must have ascertainable and reasonable limits, in so far as its impact on provincial jurisdiction is concerned.

Justice La Forest wrote a dissenting opinion. In his view, the POGG power could only justify federal legislation to control marine pollution in two circumstances: (1) an emergency (which did not exist), and (2) in relation to marine waters lying outside provincial jurisdiction (which fell under federal jurisdiction under the "gap" branch of POGG—i.e., the federal residual power). He explained:

[59] In legislating under its general power for the control of pollution in areas of the ocean falling outside provincial jurisdiction, the federal Parliament is not confined to regulating activities taking place within those areas. It may take steps to prevent activities in a province ... that pollute or have the potential to pollute the sea outside the province. Indeed, the exercise of such jurisdiction, it would seem to me, is not limited to coastal and internal waters but extends to the control of deposits in fresh water that have the effect of polluting outside a province. Reference may be made here to Interprovincial Co-operatives Ltd. v. The Queen, ... where a majority of this Court upheld the view that the federal Parliament had exclusive legislative jurisdiction to deal with a problem that resulted from the depositing of a pollutant in a river in one province that had injurious effects in another province. This is but an application of the doctrine of national dimensions triggering the operation of the peace, order and good government clause.

[60] It should require no demonstration that water moves in hydrologic cycles and that effective pollution control requires regulating pollution at its source. That source may, in fact, be situated outside the waters themselves. ... Given the way substances seep into the ground and the movement of surface and ground waters into rivers and ultimately into the sea, this can potentially cover a very large area. Indeed, since the pollution of the ocean in an important measure results from aerial pollution rather than from substances deposited in waters, similar regulations could be made in respect of substances that so pollute the air as to cause damage to the ocean or generally outside the provinces. ...

Justice La Forest also explained that s 91(27) was a source of federal jurisdiction in relation to environmental protection (anticipating R v Hydro-Québec, discussed above and in Chapter 11, Criminal Law and Procedure):

[61] The power above described can be complemented by provisions made pursuant to the criminal law power. ... The combination of the criminal law power with its power to control pollution that has extra-provincial dimensions gives the federal Parliament very wide scope to control ocean pollution. ... [A] combination of the general federal legislative power and the criminal power could go a long way towards prohibiting the pollution of internal waters as well as those in territorial waters and the high seas.

Justice La Forest then explained why marine pollution was not, in his view, a matter of national concern:

[64] However widely one interprets the federal power to control ocean pollution along the preceding line of analysis, it will not serve to support the provision impugned here, one that ... is a blanket prohibition against depositing any substance in waters without regard to its nature or amount, and one moreover where there is [no attempt to link the proscribed conduct to actual or potential harm] to what is sought to be protected. ... [T]here is no evidence to indicate that the full range of activities caught by the provision cause the harm sought to be prevented. ... Here, Parliament may undoubtedly prohibit the dumping of anything into federal waters, but unless a more comprehensive theory for applying the national dimensions doctrine can be found, prohibitions against dumping substances into provincial waters must be linked to some federal power. ...

[72] ... I shall ... attempt to look at it in terms of the qualities or attributes that are said to mark the subjects that have been held to fall within the peace, order and good government clause as being matters of national concern. Such a subject, it has been said, must be marked by a singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility that clearly distinguishes it from matters of provincial concern. In my view, ocean pollution fails to meet this test for a variety of reasons. In addition to those applicable to environmental pollution generally, the following specific difficulties may be noted. First of all, marine waters are not wholly bounded by the coast; in many areas, they extend upstream into rivers for many miles. ... Apart from this, the line between salt and fresh water cannot be demarcated clearly In any event, it is not so much the waters, whether fresh or salt, with which we are concerned, but their pollution. And the pollution of marine water is contributed to by the vast amounts of effluents that are poured or seep into fresh waters everywhere Nor is the pollution of the ocean confined to pollution emanating from substances deposited in water. In important respects, the pollution of the sea results from emissions into the air, which are then transported over many miles and deposited into the sea I cannot, therefore, see ocean pollution as a sufficiently discrete subject upon which to found the kind of legislative power sought here. It is an attempt to create a federal pollution control power on unclear geographical grounds and limited to part only of the causes of ocean pollution. Such a power then simply amounts to a truncated federal pollution control power only partially effective to meet its supposed necessary purpose, unless of course one is willing to extend it to pollution emanating from fresh water and the air, when for reasons already given such an extension could completely swallow up provincial power, no link being necessary to establish the federal purpose.

[73] This leads me to another factor ... : [the] impact on provincial legislative power. Here, it must be remembered that ... the [legislative] provision virtually prevents a province from dealing with certain of its own public property without federal consent. A wide variety of activities along the coast or in the adjoining sea involves the deposit of some substances in the sea. In fact, where large cities like Vancouver are situated by the sea, this has substantial relevance to recreational, industrial and municipal concerns of all kinds. As a matter of fact, the most polluted areas of the sea adjoin the coast; see U.N. Report, op. cit., at pp. 3-4. Among the major causes of this are various types of construction, such as hotels and harbours, the development of mineral resources and recreational activities (id., at p. 3). These are matters of immediate concern to the province. They necessarily affect activities over which the provinces have exercised some kind of jurisdiction over the years. Whether or not the "newness" of the subject is a necessary criterion for inventing new areas of jurisdiction under the peace, order and good government clause, it is certainly a relevant consideration if it means removing from the provinces areas of jurisdiction which they previously exercised. As I mentioned, pollution, including coastal pollution, is no new phenomenon, and neither are many of the kinds of activities that result in pollution.

[74] A further relevant matter, it is said, is the effect on extra-provincial interests of a provincial failure to deal effectively with the control of intra-provincial aspects of the matter. I have some difficulty following all the implications of this, but taking it at face value, we are dealing here with a situation where, as we saw earlier, Parliament has extensive powers to deal with conditions that lead to ocean pollution wherever they occur. The difficulty with the impugned provision is that it seeks to deal with activities that cannot be demonstrated either to pollute or to have a reasonable potential of polluting the ocean. The prohibition applies to an inert substance regarding which there is no proof that it either moves or pollutes. The prohibition in fact would apply to the moving of rock from one area of provincial property to another. I cannot accept that the federal Parliament has such wide legislative power over local matters having local import taking place on provincially owned property.

One factor influencing the majority's finding that marine pollution is a matter of national dimension was the presence of international regulation of the problem. Does this suggest an indirect relaxation of the constraints on federal jurisdiction imposed by the Labour Conventions case, discussed in Chapter 6?

Do you agree with Le Dain J's conclusion that marine pollution is sufficiently indivisible to constitute a matter of national concern? Consider the views expressed by Jean Leclair, "The Elusive Quest for the Quintessential 'National Interest'" (2005) 38 UBC L Rev 353 at 360-66 (footnotes omitted):

[A]lthough Justice Le Dain asserts that a matter must be both functionally and conceptually indivisible to be of a national dimension, his own application of the test is limited to an examination of the first dimension of indivisibility. By emphasizing functional indivisibility, he seems to forget that the purpose of the national interest doctrine is not to confer [on] Parliament a property right over a particular matter, but rather a power to regulate in relation to such a matter. In Crown Zellerbach, the Court had to decide whether marine pollution was a matter of national interest. Justice Le Dain concluded that it was, based on the fact that it was difficult to ascertain "by visual observation the boundary between the territorial sea and the internal marine waters of a state," and because marine pollution "... has its own characteristics and scientific considerations that distinguish it from fresh water pollution." Justice Le Dain limited his inquiry to the functional, if not the physical, dimension of the indivisibility criterion. However, as correctly underlined by the dissenting Justice La Forest, "it is not so much the waters, whether fresh or salt, with which we are concerned, but their pollution." Justice La Forest had previously emphasized that "... effective pollution control requires regulating pollution at its source." In other words, a conceptual approach to indivisibility was required, as Parliament had claimed the exclusive power to regulate the sources of marine pollution

Had Justice Le Dain conducted a careful analysis of the legislative means necessary to regulate the wide range of polluting activities, he would have recognized that treating marine pollution as a matter of national interest would greatly affect provincial spheres of enumerated powers. Indeed, the exclusive authority to regulate the sources of marine pollution is a carte blanche to regulate every conceivable activity known to humankind, be they inter- or intra-provincial in nature. ...

However, this interpretation is most erroneous. The conceptual indivisibility test must be applied using the approach of Justice Beetz in Anti-Inflation; that is, to the matter said to be of national interest (tobacco use), and not to the legislative means employed to ensure its regulation (control of advertising). In other words, the conceptual indivisibility of a particular matter should hinge upon whether the totality of legislative means necessary for its overall regulation amounts to an important invasion of provincial spheres of power. Otherwise, the central government could adopt a law said to be confined to a very limited aspect of a particular trade, argue successfully that it was sufficiently indivisible to qualify as a matter of national interest and, after having established its "... exclusive jurisdiction of a plenary nature to legislate in relation to that matter," Parliament could select, this time in all impunity, any other legislative means it would find appropriate to adopt. ...

[In addition,] Justice Le Dain's functional test is extremely obscure. Recall that in order to determine the existence of indivisibility, one must "consider what would be the effect on extra-provincial interests of a provincial failure to deal effectively with the control or regulation of the intra-provincial aspects of the matter." Is Justice Le Dain referring to political incapacity, political unwillingness, or legal inability to deal with a problem? ...

Notwithstanding the problems described above, the most troubling aspect of Justice Le Dain's test is that it gives the impression that Canada's federal system was designed to achieve functional efficiency to the exclusion of other normative concerns. Functional efficiency, though important, has never been the sole normative concern of our federal regime. In reality, Canadian federalism has been much more preoccupied with establishing a just and coherent balance between the legitimate demands of both national and regional communities. ...

Justice Le Dain's functional approach, with its obviously centralist slant, is impervious to this need for diversity. By unduly favouring federal exclusivity to the detriment of federal/provincial concurrency, Justice Le Dain also puts into jeopardy federalism's capacity to promote "... democratic participation by distributing power to the government thought to be most suited to achieving the particular societal objective having regard to th[e] diversity [of the component parts of Confederation]." Moreover, by placing the interests of the national community before those of the regions, Justice Le Dain's centralist approach could very well hamper, in certain circumstances, Quebec's ability to exercise "... the considerable provincial powers conferred by the Constitution Act, 1867 in such a way as to promote [its] language and culture."

Sujit Choudhry, by contrast, defended the provincial inability test and the holding in Crown Zellerbach ("Recasting Social Canada: A Reconsideration of Federal Jurisdiction over Social Policy" (2002) 52:3 UTLJ 163 at 227, 236–38):

[T]he provincial inability test reflects the Dickson court's central contribution, and its major legacy, to the enduring problem of legal federalism. The basic intuition underlying the test is that the federal government can act only in those circumstances in which the provinces are unable to act. Although the Court provided little in the way of theoretical explanation to justify this principle, the test is consistent with at least the following account of the nature of the Canadian political community. Canada consists not of one political community but, rather, of a multiplicity of political communities, which often disagree on questions of public policy but which nevertheless have come together and have created common institutions with the power to act on matters of common interest. To the question of when matters are of common interest, the answer provided by the Dickson court is those subject-matters where the provinces are unable to act alone—that is, when pursuing their self-interest requires them to act together. On this conception, the Canadian federation is imagined as a scheme for mutual advantage. In my view, this is a rather impoverished vision of the Canadian political community; indeed, I have argued elsewhere that Canada is a community of fate, bound together not simply by convenience and self-interest but also through shared accomplishments and history that can sustain rather thick bonds of social solidarity. But, assuming that federalism is a scheme of mutual advantage, the provincial inability test provides a rational way to allocate jurisdiction between the provinces and the federal government.

But what does the provincial inability test mean? ...

"Externality" is a term used by economists to describe situations in which an entity (a person, a corporation) does not bear all of the costs, or receive all of the benefits, of decisions they take. In cases of negative externalities, some or all of the costs of a decision are borne by another entity; in cases of positive externalities, some or all of the benefits of a decision are received by another party. The basic idea behind an externality is that the disjunction between the entity that makes a decision and the entities that bear the costs or receive the benefits of a decision means that that decision is made differently than it would be where the costs and benefits were strictly private. In cases of negative externalities, because costs can be shifted onto other entities, an entity may engage in more of an externality-causing activity than they otherwise would. The opposite is true for positive externalities.

Although externalities are often used to describe the decisions of, and the incentives operating on, private economic actors, they can also be used to examine the decisions of governments. Governments can make decisions that impose costs on other governments. In a federation, a province can externalize the costs of its public policies onto other provinces, or onto the federal government. A case study of the former can be found in Interprovincial Co-Operatives Ltd. v. Dryden Chemicals Ltd. [[1976] 1 SCR 477, 1975 CanLII 212]. In that case, two companies, one operating in Saskatchewan, the other in Ontario, operated chlor-alkali plants close to rivers that flow into Manitoba. The allegation was that both companies discharged mercury into these rivers, which then carried the mercury into Manitoba, where it was ingested by fish. According to the Manitoba government, the mercury ultimately had a negative impact upon the commercial fishery by rendering fish unfit for human consumption.

... Crown Zellerbach ... clearly contemplated that this kind of scenario would count as an example of provincial inability. But, on further reflection, we find that "provincial inability" is a bit of a misnomer. Consider the legal position of Manitoba. Because of the territorial limits on provincial jurisdiction, Manitoba lacked the legal power to regulate mercury discharges in waters outside its borders. Manitoba, therefore, was clearly unable to regulate pollution that harmed interests within the province. As the Court said, it was "impossible to hold that ... Manitoba can ... require the shutting down of plants erected and operated in another province." But no one seriously doubted that Ontario and Saskatchewan possessed jurisdiction to regulate the mercury discharges; the operative assumption throughout the judgment was that mercury discharges were legal under Ontario and Saskatchewan law. At most, we can say that those provinces were not unable but merely unwilling to regulate these discharges.

In sum, the most that can be said is that the affected province, Manitoba, was unable, but not that no province was able, to regulate mercury discharges. There was no provincial inability as such. Nonetheless, in Crown Zellerbach ... the Court considered that this scenario warranted shifting jurisdiction to the federal government. And, indeed, this was the holding of the plurality (per Ritchie J) in Interprovincial Co-operatives. Why did the Court reach this conclusion? One obvious solution would have been a negotiated or cooperative arrangement whereby Saskatchewan and Ontario regulated industries within their borders for Manitoba's benefit. The Court must have reasoned that because of the incentives at play, there were reasons to doubt that bilateral or multilateral bargains to address inter-provincial spillovers would be easy to achieve. If so, federal jurisdiction under the national dimensions doctrine was premised on the risk of inter-provincial non-cooperation. And this is exactly what Gibson said, in passages quoted with approval by Le Dain J in Crown Zellerbach.

During the three decades between Crown Zellerbach and the References re Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act, the Supreme Court did not once uphold federal legislation on the basis of the national concern branch.

In Friends of the Oldman River Society v Canada (Minister of Transport), [1992] 1 SCR 3, 1992 CanLII 110, the Supreme Court held that the environment, and environmental control, lacked the requisite distinctiveness to be matters of national concern. The Court held (SCR at 67-68) that the exercise of legislative power, as it affects ... the environment, must, as with other concerns, be linked to the appropriate head of power, and since the nature of the various heads of power under the Constitution Act, 1867 differ, the extent to which environmental concerns may be taken into account in the exercise of a power may vary from one power to another. For example, a somewhat different environmental role can be played by Parliament in the exercise of its jurisdiction over fisheries than under its powers concerning railways or navigation since the former involves the management of a resource, the others activities. ...

The provinces may similarly act in relation to the environment under any legislative power in s. 92. Legislation in relation to local works or undertakings, for example, will often take into account environmental concerns.

R v Hydro-Québec, [1997] 3 SCR 213, 1997 CanLII 318, involved a challenge to part II of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, RSC 1985, c 16 (4th Supp), which provided for comprehensive "life-cycle" regulation of toxic substances. A majority of the Supreme Court, per La Forest J, upheld the Act as a valid exercise of the federal criminal law power, finding it "unnecessary to deal with the national concern doctrine, which inevitably raises profound issues respecting the federal structure of our Constitution which do not arise with anything like the same intensity in relation to the criminal law power" (at para 110). Chief Justice Lamer and Iacobucci J, dissenting, held that the Act could not be supported under the criminal law power. They added that the Act also failed the test of "singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility" required by Crown Zellerbach because it was not confined to a narrow range of toxic chemical substances such as PCBs that have a severely harmful effect on human health and the environment and whose pollutant effects are diffuse and persist in the environment, but potentially covered a broader range of harmful substances whose effects may be temporary and more local in nature. An extract from Hydro-Québec appears in Chapter 11, Criminal Law and Procedure.

The Supreme Court of Canada revisited the POGG clause in Ontario Hydro v Ontario (Labour Relations Board), [1993] 3 SCR 327, 1993 CanLII 72. At issue was the proper jurisdiction—federal or Ontario—to issue a certificate for collective bargaining for employees at Ontario Hydro's nuclear electrical generating stations. In other words, could the federal government regulate nuclear energy under the POGG power? A majority of the Court (4–3) held that the Canada Labour Code, RSC 1985, c L-2 applied to workers employed on or in connection with those nuclear facilities. The sources of federal jurisdiction were the declaratory power in s 92(10)(c) and the POGG clause.

With respect to POGG, La Forest J (L'Heureux-Dubé and Gonthier JJ concurring) stated (at 379–80):

There can surely be no doubt that the production, use and application of atomic energy constitute a matter of national concern. It is predominantly extraprovincial and international in character and implications, and possesses sufficiently distinct and separate characteristics to make it subject to Parliament's residual power . . . No one seriously disputed this assertion, and my colleagues both agree that this is so. The view of the Attorney-General of Canada is supported by authority in the lower courts [citations omitted]. . . The strategic and security aspects of nuclear power in relation to national defence and the catastrophe and near catastrophe associated with its peaceful use and development at Chernobyl and Two Mile Island, bespeak its national character and uniqueness.

The appellants [argue] that the distinct aspects over which atomic energy rises to the national level are those concerned with health and safety. But this very argument is self-defeating. With the inherent potential dangers associated with nuclear fission, industrial safety—indeed the safety of people hundreds of miles from a nuclear facility—is necessarily dependent on the personnel who operate the facility. A strike, and indeed mere carelessness, could invite disaster. As the Attorney General of Canada put it: "The whole purpose of federal regulation of nuclear electrical generating plants would be frustrated if Parliament could not govern the standards and conditions of employment of the individuals who operate the plant, both for their own safety, and for that of the general public."

In R v Malmo-Levine; R v Caine, 2003 SCC 74, the Court dealt with the issue of the validity of the prohibition of possession of marijuana in what was then the Narcotic Control Act, SC 1960–61, c 35 [NCA]. Recall that in R v Hauser, [1979] 1 SCR 984, 1979 CanLII 13, a majority of the Court upheld the NCA as a valid exercise of the national concern branch of the POGG power. In Malmo-Levine, the Court revisited that issue and concluded that the prohibition on marijuana possession was a valid exercise of the criminal law power, making it unnecessary to consider POGG. Justices Gonthier and Binnie (who attracted the support of all members of the Court on the division of powers issue) wrote:

[71] The Attorney General of Canada contends that the control of narcotics is a legislative subject matter that "goes beyond local or provincial concern and must, from its inherent nature, be the concern of the Dominion as a whole." He puts his position as follows:

The importation, manufacture, distribution, and use of psychoactive substances are matters . . . which can only be dealt with on an integrated national basis. Additionally, the international aspects are such that these matters cannot be effectively addressed at the local level.

[72] We do not exclude the possibility that the NCA might be justifiable under the "national concern" branch on the rationale adopted in R. v. Crown Zellerbach Canada Ltd., [1988] 1 S.C.R. 401, at p. 432, where we held that concerted action amongst provincial and federal entities, each acting within their respective spheres of legislative jurisdiction, was essential to deal with Canada's international obligations regarding the environment. In our view, however, the Court should decline in this case to revisit Parliament's residual authority to deal with drugs in general (or marihuana in particular) under the POGG power. If, as is presently one of the options under consideration, Parliament removes marihuana entirely from the criminal law framework, Parliament's continuing legislative authority to deal with marihuana use on a purely regulatory basis might well be questioned. The Court would undoubtedly have more ample legislative facts and submissions in such a case than we have in this appeal. Our conclusion that the present prohibition against the use of marihuana can be supported under the criminal law power makes it unnecessary to deal with the Attorney General's alternative position under the POGG power, and we leave this question open for another day.

In 2004, Parliament enacted the Assisted Human Reproduction Act, SC 2004, c 2, which asserted federal control over a series of technologies and activities related to assisted reproduction. Although some parts of the Act involving fairly clear prohibitions backed by criminal penalties could be easily sustained under the criminal law power, the bulk of the Act involved extensive regulatory control over many aspects of assisted reproduction, including medical procedures and research. There was speculation that the federal government would have to rely on the national concern branch of the POGG power to uphold the legislation on the basis that uniform national standards were required to govern this area. However, in defending—unsuccessfully—a constitutional challenge to the legislation, the federal government relied on only the criminal law power: see Reference re Assisted Human Reproduction Act, 2010 SCC 61, excerpted in Chapter 11. Why do you think the federal government might have been unwilling even to raise the POGG argument? Was it a hopeless argument?

The major modern case on the national concern doctrine is References re Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act. The Supreme Court heard appeals from three provincial references (Saskatchewan, Ontario, and Alberta) concerning the validity of the federal law. Each provincial court of appeal rendered a split opinion: Saskatchewan and Ontario siding with the federal government, Alberta with the provinces. In the following excerpt, Sujit Choudhry describes the federal legislation and the constitutional politics surrounding this milestone moment.

The Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act

The origins of the Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act (GGPPA) lie in federal-provincial-territorial negotiations over how to meet Canada's obligations under the Paris Agreement, which began almost immediately after the agreement was signed. These negotiations led to the Vancouver Declaration on Clean Growth and Climate Change on March 3, 2016. Canada's First Ministers agreed to "[i]mplement GHG mitigation policies in support of meeting or exceeding Canada's 2030 target of a 30% reduction below 2005 levels of emissions.” The Vancouver Declaration also established the Working Group on Carbon Pricing Mechanisms, which unanimously reported that “putting a price on emissions is an efficient and cost-effective way to create incentives to reduce their production as well as their consumption.”

Relying on the working group’s report, Prime Minister Trudeau announced the Pan-Canadian Approach to Pricing Carbon Pollution in Parliament on October 3, 2016. It introduced the concepts of the benchmark and the backstop. Both the benchmark and the backstop were also included in the Pan-Canadian Framework on Clean Growth and Climate Change, which was signed by the federal government, the territories and eight provinces (not Manitoba and Saskatchewan) on December 9, 2016. Manitoba joined the Pan-Canadian Framework on February 23, 2018. At that stage, Saskatchewan was the only province that had declined to do so.

The GGPPA was introduced in the House of Commons on March 27, 2018, and received royal assent on June 21, 2018. It contains the backstop and the benchmark. The backstop and the benchmark are functionally related: jurisdictions that do not meet the benchmark are subject to the backstop without their consent, by the exercise of discretion under the GGPPA. In addition, jurisdictions may opt into the backstop. The imposition of the backstop is at the heart of the provinces’ constitutional objections.

The backstop has two components: fuel charges and a cap-and-trade system for large industrial emitters. Fuel charges apply to all fuel delivered or used within a province or imported into the province from elsewhere in Canada or abroad. The price per tonne of GHG emissions is set at $20 per tonne for 2019; the GGPPA sets out the specific fuels to which it attaches a price and a unit price for each. Charges are paid by producers, distributors and importers of fuel; it is anticipated they will pass these charges on to consumers. Fuel charges (net of refunds, rebates or remittances) are remitted to the federal government, which returns them to jurisdictions and/or persons or institutions within those jurisdictions. In jurisdictions where the backstop is imposed, the federal government returns 90 percent of the net fuel charges to individuals in the form of the Climate Action Incentive Payment; the remaining 10 percent is transferred to the Climate Action Incentive Fund, to fund GHG reduction investments by institutions in the MUSH sector (municipalities, universities, schools and hospitals), SMEs (small and medium-sized enterprises) and nonprofit organizations.

The GGPPA terms the cap-and-trade scheme the Output-Based Pricing System (OBPS). Regulations for the OBPS component of the backstop enumerate 38 different kinds of industrial activity and 135 industry-specific activities that are subject to the OBPS. The OBPS applies to designated facilities that are not subject to the fuel charge in backstop provinces and operates to set a cap on total emissions for each facility based on a performance level of approximately 80 to 95 percent for most sectors. Facilities that emit below their cap receive a credit; facilities that exceed their limit must pay for their emissions through credits and/or a “charge payment” to the federal government. The GGPPA authorizes the federal government to create a market for these credits. While the federal government has not yet established a trading system, it recently released an options paper for public comment as a first step in doing so. ...

The Political Strategy Behind The Greenhouse Gas Reference

The GGPPA’s constitutionality was challenged by some provincial governments from its inception. Saskatchewan, which declined to sign the Pan-Canadian Framework, launched its constitutional challenge on April 19, 2018—before the GGPPA had even received second reading in the House of Commons. Alberta and Ontario launched their court cases immediately after elections brought to power Conservative governments opposed to the federal carbon pricing scheme. The Conservatives won Ontario's July 2018 election, and the government launched that province's constitutional challenge on August 1, 2018. Alberta followed the same pattern: the Conservatives were elected in April 2019 on a pledge to withdraw Alberta from the Pan-Canadian Framework, and the province launched its constitutional challenge on June 20, 2019.

Alberta, Ontario and Saskatchewan brought their constitutional challenges directly to their respective courts of appeal through a legal procedure known as a reference [also discussed in Chapter 13: The Role of the Judiciary]. In most constitutional cases, private parties raise constitutional challenges when objecting to the law's application to them, on real facts, in trial courts that make findings of fact and law; the losing party can appeal the decision to a higher court and, ultimately, the Supreme Court of Canada. Canadian governments have a second option, which is to refer questions of law to their respective appellate courts: provincial and territorial courts of appeal for the provinces and territories (and in British Columbia, the provincial superior court), and the Supreme Court for the federal government. Unlike a standard constitutional challenge, a reference proceeding is traditionally non-adversarial: the court's ruling is advisory and nonbinding. In practice, reference proceedings function largely like adversarial proceedings, with other governments and entities intervening in the case. Moreover, governments treat reference decisions as binding.

References offer certain attractions for governments. Proceedings before appellate courts are relatively brief compared with lower court proceedings, principally because there is no lengthy fact-finding process; rather, evidence is adduced in the form of a record filed with the court. A case can reach the Supreme Court much more quickly: the federal government can send a reference there directly, and provinces have an automatic right of appeal from their courts of appeal. Governments can craft reference questions carefully to shape the litigation.

For decades, provincial governments of all political stripes have used references to resolve jurisdictional disputes with the federal government, across a wide variety of policy areas. There have been provincial references on constitutional amendment procedures: for example, the Patriation Reference (1980) and the Quebec Veto Reference (1982). A number of provincial references have addressed areas of public policy where there is concurrent jurisdiction or shared responsibility, such as agricultural marketing in Re Agricultural Products Marketing Act (1978), criminal justice in the Firearms Reference (2000), economic policy in the Anti-Inflation Reference (1976), natural resources in the Exported Natural Gas Reference (1982) and taxation in the GST Reference (1992). Provinces have initiated references in areas of public policy where constitutional jurisdiction was unclear, such as the continental shelf in Reference re: Mineral and Other Natural Resources of the Continental Shelf (1994), new reproductive technologies in Reference re Assisted Human Reproduction Act (2010), parental leave in the Employment Insurance Reference (2005) and shared-cost programs in Reference re Canada Assistance Plan (1991).

Provincial governments have also used references in connection with intergovernmental disputes to pursue policy objectives. While the provincial goal is sometimes to veto a federal policy (the Firearms Reference is an example), in other cases it is to drive the federal government back to the negotiating table, with increased provincial leverage from a victory in court. Governments can bargain around allocations of constitutional jurisdiction in order to achieve shared goals.

What are the strategic goals of the provinces challenging the constitutionality of the GGPPA? Alberta, Ontario and Saskatchewan launched constitutional challenges against the GGPPA but have been joined by two more provinces—Manitoba and New Brunswick—in opposing federal carbon pricing. New Brunswick considered launching its own constitutional challenge but decided not to. Instead, it intervened on the side of Ontario and Saskatchewan in their respective references. Alberta, Manitoba, New Brunswick, Ontario and Quebec have intervened on the side of Saskatchewan in its appeal to the Supreme Court ...

It is possible that the constitutional challenges to the GGPPA are part of a larger strategy: namely, the development of a provincial-territorial coalition in favour of the extraction and processing of fossil fuels, the building of infrastructure (such as pipelines) to deliver them and the shipping of these products to foreign markets. In other words, we might be witnessing the rise of a “carbon economy coalition” that is opposed to significantly reducing the role of fossil fuels in the Canadian economy and, by extension, is committed to limiting the reduction of GHG emissions. As part of this larger strategy, the constitutional challenges to the GGPPA might aim to veto federal carbon pricing policy.

However, this coalition of provincial and territorial governments is unstable. The reason is the wide variation among jurisdictions in per capita GHG emissions. As of 2017, Canada's per capita emissions were 19.5 tonnes. Ontario's and New Brunswick's were below this figure; the Northwest Territories had per capita emissions that were 38 percent higher. Alberta and Saskatchewan had significantly higher numbers—indeed, they have among the highest per capita GHG emissions of any jurisdiction in the world.

These sharp divergences reflect different underlying economic realities. The coalition brings together jurisdictions with carbon-intensive economies (Alberta, Saskatchewan, Northwest Territories) with jurisdictions that have less carbon-intensive economies (Manitoba, New Brunswick, Ontario). Consequently, as a matter of politics, their reasons for opposing charges on GHG emissions are different.

For jurisdictions with less carbon-intensive economies, the principal political concern is the possible impact on consumer prices for gasoline, electricity and home heating. For jurisdictions with more carbon-intensive economies, the concern is much more fundamental: carbon pricing poses an enormous challenge to the very structure of their economies, which are closely tied to fossil fuel production—especially Alberta and Saskatchewan.

There is nevertheless evidence that the GGPPA is being implemented asymmetrically in terms of the scope of GHG-emitting activities that is covered, even though the public case for the benchmark is the need for national consistency.

Based on 2015 emissions data, Dobson, Winter and Boyd estimate that the backstop would apply to 78 percent of Canada-wide GHG emissions (approximately 44 percent consisting of the fuel charge and approximately 35 percent, the OBPS) and that the federal benchmark would apply to 72 percent of these emissions. The federal benchmark is therefore lower than the federal backstop. Dobson, Winter and Boyd also compare the application of the backstop with the plan in each approved province and the federal benchmark as applied in each province, ... [and] make three key observations: (a) the benchmark varies by jurisdiction because of variations in the structure of provincial economies; (b) the carbon pricing programs in Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland and Labrador have been approved by the federal government even though they fall short of the benchmark in terms of the scope of GHG-emitting activities covered; and (c) the backstop for those three provinces is equal to or slightly higher than the benchmark, such that the gap between the approved provincial plan and the backstop is even greater than the gap between the plan and the benchmark. The programs in Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland and Labrador likely do not meet the benchmark because of exemptions that narrow their scope: aviation and marine fuels (Nova Scotia) and home heating fuels (Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland and Labrador).

The most likely explanation for why asymmetry has been achieved through variations in scope, but not price, is political economy. Price is visible to the public and relatively easy to benchmark, creating stronger political incentives toward uniform pricing. By contrast, scope can be highly technical and opaque, creating weaker political incentives for uniformity and providing the space for intergovernmental negotiations that may result in asymmetry.

For the less carbon-intensive jurisdictions of Manitoba, New Brunswick and Ontario, their likely goal is the flexible interpretation of the GGPPA, especially since their GHG emissions are below the Canada-wide average, to ease any potential burden on consumers. Their support of constitutional challenges is probably a way to mobilize supporters and to articulate demands against the federal government. Winning would be valuable, but the mere fact of participating in a court challenge has political benefits.

For the producer jurisdictions of Alberta and Saskatchewan, the strategic value of a Supreme Court win would be different. For them, the asymmetric application of the GGPPA through intergovernmental negotiation would be very difficult. Moreover, the imposition of the backstop could require significant structural adjustments. It is likely that Alberta and Saskatchewan's shared goal is a much greater degree of asymmetry than the federal government could accept. The strategic value of a Supreme Court judgment finding that the GGPPA is unconstitutional would be to give these provinces leverage to renegotiate Canada's whole approach to GHG emissions reductions, because the federal government's Plan B—the imposition of a carbon tax—is subject to a provincial immunity that shields Crown property and agencies, including utilities, sharply reducing its effectiveness

WAGNER CJ (Abella, Moldaver, Karakatsanis, Martin and Kasirer JJ concurring):

B. Characterization of the GGPPA

[57] In this case, the judges [and parties] have proposed [three] formulations of the GGPPA's pith and substance ... : (1) a broad formulation [relating to] the regulation of GHG emissions; (2) a national standards-based formulation ... to reduce GHG [i.e., greenhouse gas] emissions; and (3) a national standards pricing-based formulation ... to establish minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions. I would adopt a national standards pricing-based formulation of the pith and substance of the GGPPA. In my view, the true subject matter of the GGPPA is establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency

(a) Intrinsic Evidence

[58] This Court has frequently used a statute's title as a tool for the purposes of characterization ... In the case at bar, the statute is titled "Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act." Its long title is "An Act to mitigate climate change through the pan-Canadian application of pricing mechanisms to a broad set of greenhouse gas emission sources and to make consequential amendments to other Acts." Both of these titles confirm that the purpose of the GGPPA is more precise than the regulation of GHG emissions. As the long title makes clear, the true subject matter of the GGPPA is not just “to mitigate climate change,” but to do so “through the pan-Canadian application of pricing mechanisms” to a broad set of greenhouse gas emission sources.” The short title also makes it clear that the GGPPA is concerned not simply with regulating GHG emissions, but with pricing them, as the statute is titled the “Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act.” ...

[59] Likewise, the preamble of the GGPPA confirms that its subject matter is national GHG pricing. In general, preambles are useful in constitutional litigation in order to illustrate the “mischief” the legislation is designed to cure and the goals Parliament sought to achieve [60] It is clear from reading the preamble as a whole that the focus of the GGPPA is on national GHG pricing. The preamble begins with a review of the contribution of GHG emissions to global climate change, of the impact of climate change on—and the risks it poses to—Canada and Canadians (at paras. 1–5), and of the international commitments made by Canada in the UNFCCC and the Paris Agreement to reduce GHG emissions (paras. 6–8). It then focuses on establishing a minimum national standards GHG pricing scheme. It identifies GHG pricing as “a core element” of the Pan-Canadian Framework (at para. 10), and recognizes that climate change requires immediate collective action to promote behavioural change which leads to increased energy efficiency (paras. 9 and 11). After that, pricing mechanisms are commented on at length (at paras. 12–16): in particular, it is noted that some provinces are developing or have implemented GHG pricing systems (at para. 14), but that the absence of such systems or a lack of stringency in some provincial GHG pricing systems could contribute to significant harm to the environment and to human health (para. 15). The preamble concludes with a statement that a national GHG pricing scheme is accordingly necessary in order to ensure that, taking provincial pricing systems into account, “greenhouse gas emissions pricing applies broadly in Canada”: para. 16.

[61] Furthermore, the “mischief” the GGPPA is intended to address is clearly identified in the preamble: the profound nationwide harm associated with a purely intraprovincial approach to regulating GHG emissions. ... In Parliament’s eyes, the relevant mischief is not GHG emissions generally, but rather the effects of the failure of some provinces to implement GHG pricing systems or to implement sufficiently stringent pricing systems, and the consequential failure to reduce GHG emissions across Canada. To address this mischief, the GGPPA establishes minimum national standards for GHG pricing that apply across Canada, setting a GHG pricing “floor” across the country.

(b) Extrinsic Evidence

[62] ... [T]he extrinsic evidence confirms that the main thrust of the GGPPA is establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions.

[63] First, it can be seen from the events leading up to the enactment of the GGPPA ... that GHG pricing is a distinct portion of the field of governmental responses to climate change. In the Paris Agreement, states made general international commitments to reduce GHG emissions. They are not required to adopt GHG pricing systems; rather, they are free to choose their preferred means. Immediately after the adoption of the Paris Agreement, however, the First Ministers endorsed the Vancouver Declaration, in which they ... committed to adopting “a broad range of domestic measures, including carbon pricing mechanisms” in order to reduce

GHG emissions: at p. 3 (emphasis added). Moreover, the signers of the Vancouver Declaration clearly recognized carbon pricing as a distinct aspect of the field of governmental responses to climate change by establishing a working group on carbon pricing mechanisms

[64] In its final report, the Working Group identified carbon pricing as one of the most efficient policy approaches for reducing GHG emissions and advocated for broad-based carbon pricing mechanisms across Canada that would give each province and territory flexibility on instrument choice. The federal government then endorsed this recommendation

[65] ... [T]he federal government's intention was ... to establish minimum national standards of GHG price stringency for GHG emissions ... without displacing provincial and territorial jurisdiction over the choice and design of pricing instruments. ... [T]he extrinsic evidence of the lead-up to the enactment of the GGPPA reveals a process of federal–provincial–territorial cooperation

[66] ... [I]t can also be seen from the legislative debates leading up to the GGPPA that the focus of the statute was not broadly on regulating GHG emissions or establishing minimum national standards to reduce GHG emissions, but was, rather, on establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency. ...

(c) Legal Effects

[70] ... In my view, the legal effects of the GGPPA confirm that its focus is on national GHG pricing and confirm its essentially backstop nature.

[71] In jurisdictions where Parts 1 and 2 of the GGPPA are applied, the primary legal effect is to create one GHG pricing scheme that prices GHG emissions in a manner that is consistent with what is done in the rest of the Canadian economy. ... Significantly, the GGPPA does not require those to whom it applies to perform or refrain from performing specified GHG-emitting activities. Nor does it tell industries how they are to operate Instead, all the GGPPA does is to require persons to pay for engaging in specified activities that result in the emission of GHGs. ... The GGPPA does not represent an attempt to occupy other areas

[72] Moreover, because the GGPPA operates as a backstop ... the GHG pricing mechanism described in Parts 1 and 2 of the GGPPA will not come into operation at all in a province or territory that already has a sufficiently stringent GHG pricing system. ...

(d) Practical Effects

[78] In my view, the evidence of practical effects in the case at bar is not particularly helpful for characterizing the GGPPA. Given the dearth of such evidence, it would be unwise to attempt to predict the economic consequences of the GGPPA. It is, moreover, not for the Court to assess how effective the GGPPA is at reducing GHG emissions

[79] Nonetheless, it should be noted that the evidence of practical effects to date is consistent with the principle of flexibility and support for provincially designed GHG pricing schemes. Practically speaking, the only thing not permitted by the GGPPA is for a province or a territory not to implement a GHG pricing mechanism, or to implement one that is not sufficiently stringent. The federal backstop GHG pricing regime in Parts 1 and 2 of the GGPPA does not have a legal effect to the extent that there is a provincial system of comparable stringency in place, whatever its design. ...

(e) Conclusion on Pith and Substance

[80] For the foregoing reasons, I conclude that the true subject matter of the GGPPA is establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions. ...

(2) Clarifying the National Concern Doctrine

[111] ... [T]here is significant uncertainty regarding ... the national concern doctrine. ... This case presents an opportunity to clarify these issues.

[113] Throughout my analysis on these issues, I will be relying in part on this Court's trade and commerce jurisprudence, and in particular on 2011 Securities Reference and 2018 Securities Reference. As the Court has observed, the national concern doctrine and the trade and commerce power pose similar challenges to federalism. In both contexts, the Court has interpreted the federal power narrowly to ensure that it does not overwhelm provincial jurisdiction and undermine the federal–provincial division of powers However, my citing these cases should not be taken as an invitation to conflate the two powers. ...

(a) "Matter" of National Concern

[119] Therefore, the matter to consider in this national concern analysis is establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions. I agree with the majority of the Court of Appeal for Saskatchewan that stringency in this context is not limited to the charge per unit of GHG emissions. It encompasses the scope or breadth of application of the charge in the sense of the fuels, operations and activities to which the charge applies and the authority to implement regulatory schemes that are necessary in order to implement such a charge: para. 139.

(b) Exclusive Federal Jurisdiction Based on the National Concern Doctrine

[120] There is no doubt that a finding that a matter is of national concern confers exclusive jurisdiction over that matter on Parliament. ... However, the nature and consequences of this exclusive federal jurisdiction is contested by the parties in this case and requires clarification. Understanding the consequences of the recognition of a new matter of national concern is critical in order to properly undertake the scale of impact analysis at the third step of the national concern test.

[125] A closely related question concerns the applicability of the double aspect doctrine to a matter of national concern. The double aspect doctrine "recognizes that the same fact situations can be regulated from different perspectives, one of which may relate to a provincial power and the other to a federal power If a fact situation can be regulated from different federal and provincial perspectives and each level of government has a compelling interest in enacting legal rules in relation to that situation, the double aspect doctrine may apply

[126] In my view, the double aspect doctrine can apply in cases in which the federal government has jurisdiction on the basis of the national concern doctrine, but whether or not it does apply will vary from case to case. ...

[129] The double aspect doctrine takes on particular significance where, as in the case at bar, Canada asserts jurisdiction over a matter that involves a minimum national standard imposed by legislation that operates as a backstop. The recognition of a matter of national concern such as this will inevitably result in a double aspect situation. This is in fact the very premise of a federal scheme that imposes minimum national standards: Canada and the provinces are both free to legislate in relation to the same fact situation—in this case by imposing GHG pricing—but the federal law is paramount.

[131] Beetz J.'s caution about the double aspect doctrine [in Bell Canada v Quebec (Commission de la santé et de la sécurité du travail), [1988] 1 SCR 749, 1988 CanLII 81] thus applies with particular force where Canada asserts jurisdiction over a matter that involves a minimum national standard. ... The court must be satisfied that Canada in fact has a "compelling interest" in enacting legal rules over the federal aspect of the activity at issue and that the "multiplicity of aspects is real and not merely nominal"

(3) National Concern Test

(a) Threshold Question

[142] Courts must approach ... the national concern doctrine with great caution. The analysis therefore begins by asking, as a threshold question, whether the matter is of sufficient concern to Canada as a whole

[143] ... Although this inquiry was not identified as a distinct step of the analysis in Crown Zellerbach, it ... ensures that the national concern doctrine cannot be invoked too lightly [It] is an appropriate, incremental development in the law to ensure that federal power under the national concern doctrine is properly constrained.

[144] If Canada discharges this burden, the analysis proceeds. This approach does not open the door to the recognition of federal jurisdiction simply on the basis that a legislative field is "important"; it operates to limit the application of the national concern doctrine.

(b) Singleness, Distinctiveness and Indivisibility

[147] ... [T]he proposed federal matter must be specific and readily identifiable, [as well as] qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern. It is clearly not enough for a matter to be quantitatively different from matters of provincial concern—the mere growth or extent of a problem across Canada is insufficient to justify federal jurisdiction

[148] One key consideration ... is whether [the matter] is predominantly extraprovincial and international in character, having regard both to its inherent nature and to its effects. The case law demonstrates that this inquiry is central to the national concern doctrine. The finding that marine pollution is extraprovincial and international ... was critical [in Crown Zellerbach]. ... By contrast, in Hydro-Québec, [it was] concluded that the fact that the statute regulated substances whose effects were entirely intraprovincial and localized was a barrier to its recognition as a matter of national concern. However, they accepted that ... toxic substances that originate in a particular province may nonetheless be predominantly extraprovincial and international in character if the substances in question have serious effects that can cross provincial boundaries . . .

[149] [T]he existence of [international] treaty obligations is not determinative of federal jurisdiction: . . . Parliament's jurisdiction to implement treaties signed by the federal government depends on the ordinary division of powers . . . [However, d]epending on their content, [treaties] may help to show that a matter has an extra-provincial and international character, thereby supporting a finding that it is qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern.

[150] Furthermore, to be qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern, the matter must not be an aggregate of provincial matters . . . The federal legislative role must be distinct from and not duplicative of that of the provinces. Once again, the Court's trade and commerce jurisprudence is helpful in this regard. The Court's opinions with respect to securities regulation show that a regulatory field with an international or extraprovincial dimension can also have local features. While there are aspects of securities regulation that are national in character and have genuine national goals, much of this sphere is primarily focused on local concerns related to investor protection and market fairness: 2011 Securities Reference, at paras. 115 and 124-28; 2018 Securities Reference, at paras. 105-6. As the 2011 Securities Reference and the 2018 Securities Reference confirm, federal legislation will not be qualitatively distinct if it overshoots regulation of a national aspect of the field and instead duplicates provincial regulation or regulates issues that are primarily of local concern.

[152] I will now turn to the second principle[,] . . . provincial inability to deal with the matter. . . . The starting point for this analysis should be the provincial inability test expressed through the fourth and fifth indicia discussed in [the trade and commerce case of] General Motors, at p. 662: (1) the legislation should be of a nature that the provinces jointly or severally would be constitutionally incapable of enacting; and (2) the failure to include one or more provinces or localities in a legislative scheme would jeopardize the successful operation of the scheme in other parts of the country. . . . [B]oth of these factors are required.

[153] But there is a third factor . . . : a province's failure to deal with the matter must have grave extraprovincial consequences. . . .

• • •

[155] The requirement of grave extraprovincial consequences sets a high bar . . . This requirement can be satisfied by actual harm or by a serious risk of harm being sustained in the future. It may include serious harm to human life and health or to the environment, though it is not necessarily limited to such consequences. Mere inefficiency or additional financial costs . . . is clearly insufficient . . . Moreover, as I noted above, the onus is on Canada to establish that provincial inability is made out, and evidence is required, "for the questions of provincial inability and the harm that flows therefrom are both factual in part" . . .

• • •

(c) Scale of Impact

[160] At the final step of the national concern test, Canada must show that the proposed matter has "a scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction that is reconcilable with the fundamental distribution of legislative power under the Constitution" . . .

[161] The purpose of the scale of impact analysis is to prevent federal overreach: S. Choudhry, Constitutional Law and the Politics of Carbon Pricing in Canada (2019), IRPP Study 74, at p. 15; 2011 Securities Reference, at para. 61. . . In accordance with this purpose, at this stage of the analysis, the intrusion upon provincial autonomy that would result from empowering Parliament to act is balanced against the extent of the impact on the interests that would be affected if Parliament were unable to constitutionally address the matter at a national level. Identifying a new matter of national concern will be justified only if the latter outweighs the former.

(4) Application to the GGPPA

(a) Threshold Question

[167] Canada has adduced evidence that clearly shows that establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions is of sufficient concern to Canada as a whole that it warrants consideration in accordance with the national concern doctrine. ... All parties to this proceeding agree that climate change is an existential challenge. It is a threat of the highest order to the country, and indeed to the world

[168] That being said, the matter at issue here is not the regulation of GHG emissions generally, ... [but] whether establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions is a matter of national concern.

[169] The history of efforts to address climate change in Canada reflects the critical role of carbon pricing strategies in policies to reduce GHG emissions. [Here, Wagner CJ revisited the history of federal–provincial cooperation.]

[170] Furthermore, there is a broad [international] consensus ... that carbon pricing is a critical measure for the reduction of GHG emissions. ...

[171] In summary, ... establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions ... readily passes the threshold test and warrants consideration as a possible matter of national concern.

(b) Singleness, Distinctiveness and Indivisibility

[173] Given that the matter at issue is establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHGs, it is important to begin by observing that these gases are a specific and precisely identifiable type of pollutant. The harmful effects of GHGs are known, and the fuel and excess emissions charges are based on the global warming potential of the gases (see Sch. 3 of the GGPPA). Moreover, GHG emissions are predominantly extraprovincial and international in their character and implications. ... GHG emissions are precisely the type of diffuse and persistent substances with serious deleterious extraprovincial effects that the dissent in Hydro-Québec suggested might appropriately be regulated on the basis of the national concern doctrine: para. 76. ...

[174] The international response to GHG emissions over the past three decades confirms this. [The Chief Justice reviews a number of international documents and agreements.]

[175] ... [T]he regulatory mechanism of GHG pricing is a specific, and limited, one. ... GHG pricing does not amount to the regulation of GHG emissions generally. It is also different in kind from regulatory mechanisms that do not involve pricing, such as sector-specific initiatives concerning electricity, buildings, transportation, industry, forestry, agriculture and waste.

[176] Minimum national standards of GHG price stringency, which are implemented in this case by means of the backstop architecture of the GGPPA, relate to a federal role in carbon pricing that is qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern. The 2011 Securities Reference and 2018 Securities Reference illustrate this point. The proposed legislation at issue in the 2011 Securities Reference did not have a distinctly national focus; it ran afoul of the division of powers by replicating existing provincial schemes: para. 116. However, the Court held that “[l]egislation aimed at imposing minimum standards applicable throughout the country and preserving the stability and integrity of Canada’s financial markets might well relate to trade as a whole” and could be a matter of national importance to which the federal general trade and commerce power applies: para. 114. This was the approach the federal government took in the proposed legislation at issue in the 2018 Securities Reference. ... Rather than displacing provincial securities legislation by ensuring the day-to-day regulation of securities trading, it sought to complement provincial legislation by addressing national economic objectives: para. 96.

[177] The backstop approach taken in the GGPPA is analogous to the approach taken in the proposed legislation that was at issue in the 2018 Securities Reference It does so on a distinctly national basis, one that neither represents an aggregate of provincial matters nor duplicates provincial GHG pricing systems.

[179] The GGPPA is tightly focused on this distinctly federal role and does not descend into the detailed regulation of all aspects of GHG pricing. While it is true that the administrative pricing mechanism set out in the GGPPA is detailed, it can apply only to provinces that fail to meet the federal stringency standard. Thus, the GGPPA’s fundamental role is a distinctly federal one Even if the GGPPA were to apply so as to supplement an insufficiently stringent provincial pricing scheme, the prior existence of similar provincial legislation is not, as this Court confirmed in the 2018 Securities Reference, a constitutional bar to federal legislation that pursues a qualitatively different national concern

[181] The second principle ... is that federal jurisdiction should be found to exist only where the evidence establishes provincial inability to deal with the matter. I find that provincial inability is established in this case.

[182] First, the provinces, acting alone or together, are constitutionally incapable of establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions. ... In the instant case, while the provinces could choose to cooperatively establish a uniform carbon pricing scheme, doing so would not assure a sustained approach to minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions: the provinces and territories are constitutionally incapable of establishing a binding outcome-based minimum legal standard—a national GHG pricing floor—that applies in all provinces and territories at all times.

[183] Second, a failure to include one province in the scheme would jeopardize its success in the rest of Canada. It is true that a cooperative scheme might continue to exist if one province withdrew from it, but the issue here is whether it would be successful. The withdrawal of one province from the scheme would clearly threaten its success for two reasons: emissions reductions that are limited to a few provinces would fail to address climate change if they were offset by increased emissions in other Canadian jurisdictions; and any province’s failure to implement a sufficiently stringent GHG pricing mechanism could undermine the efficacy of GHG pricing everywhere in Canada because of the risk of carbon leakage.

[185] ... It is true that their withdrawal from the Pan-Canadian Framework does not mean that Saskatchewan, Ontario and Alberta will necessarily fail to reduce their GHG emissions. But when provinces that are collectively responsible for more than two thirds of Canada’s total GHG emissions opt out of a cooperative scheme, this illustrates the stark limitations of a non-binding cooperative approach.

[186] What is more, any province's refusal to implement a sufficiently stringent GHG pricing mechanism could undermine GHG pricing everywhere in Canada because of the risk of carbon leakage. Carbon leakage is a phenomenon by which businesses in sectors with high levels of carbon emissions relocate to jurisdictions with less stringent carbon pricing policies . . . Thus, provincial cooperation may not result in national emissions reductions, as businesses could simply relocate to non-cooperating provinces, leaving Canada's net emissions unchanged and people across Canada vulnerable to the consequences of those emissions.

[187] Third, a province's failure to act or refusal to cooperate would in this case have grave consequences for extraprovincial interests. . . [E]very province's GHG emissions contribute to climate change, the consequences of which will be borne extraprovincially, across Canada and around the world. And it is well-established that climate change is causing significant environmental, economic and human harm nationally and internationally, with especially high impacts in the Canadian Arctic, in coastal regions and on Indigenous peoples. This includes increases in average temperatures and in the frequency and severity of heat waves, extreme weather events like floods and forest fires, significant reductions in sea ice and sea level rises, the spread of life-threatening diseases like Lyme disease and West Nile virus, and threats to the ability of Indigenous communities to sustain themselves and maintain their traditional ways of life.

[188] Furthermore, I reject the notion that because climate change is "an inherently global problem," each individual province's GHG emissions cause no "measurable harm" or do not have "tangible impacts on other provinces" . . . Each province's emissions are clearly measurable and contribute to climate change. The underlying logic of this argument would apply equally to all individual sources of emissions everywhere, so it must fail.

[190] While each province's emissions do contribute to climate change, there is no denying that climate change is an "inherently global problem" . . . This weighs in favour of a finding of provincial inability. . . [A] provincial failure to act directly threatens Canada as a whole. This is not to say that Parliament has jurisdiction to implement Canada's treaty obligations—it does not—but simply that the inherently global nature of GHG emissions and the problem of climate change supports a finding of provincial inability in this case.

[191] . . . [I]n the absence of a federal law binding the provinces, there is nothing whatsoever to protect individual provinces or the country as a whole from the consequences of one province's decision, in exercising its authority, to take insufficient action to control GHGs, or to take no steps at all. In short, federal action is indispensable, and GHG pricing in particular is an integral aspect of any scheme to reduce GHG emissions.

[194] The analogy between this case and Crown Zellerbach is clear. Le Dain J. emphasized the international character of marine pollution; GHG emissions represent a truly global pollution problem that demands a coordinated international response. Le Dain J. focused on the unique scientific characteristics of marine pollution that distinguish it from fresh water pollution; GHG emissions, like marine pollution, are a precisely identifiable form of pollution that can readily be scientifically distinguished from other atmospheric pollutants.

[195] But the case for finding that the matter is of national concern is even stronger here than in Crown Zellerbach . . . First, in the case at bar, there is uncontested evidence of grave extraprovincial harm as a result of one province's failure to cooperate. . . Second, the proposed federal matter in the instant case relates only to the risk of non-cooperation that gives rise to this threat of grievous extraprovincial harm. In other words, this matter would empower the federal government to do only what the provinces cannot do to protect themselves from this grave harm, and nothing more.

(c) Scale of Impact

[196] I conclude that, while it is true that finding that the federal government has jurisdiction over this matter will have a clear impact on provincial autonomy, the matter's impact on the provinces' freedom to legislate and on areas of provincial life that fall under provincial heads of power will be limited and will ultimately be outweighed by the impact on interests that would be affected if Parliament were unable to constitutionally address this matter at a national level.

[197] I accept that finding that this matter is one of national concern has a clear impact on provincial jurisdiction. It leads to the recognition of a previously unidentified area of double aspect in which the federal law is paramount. Provinces can regulate GHG pricing from a local perspective (e.g., under ss. 92(13) and (16) and 92A), but legislation enacted on the basis of these provincial powers would apply concurrently in a field also occupied by a paramount federal law that establishes minimum standards of GHG price stringency. There is a clear impact on provincial autonomy. Provincial governments and their residents may well wish to pursue GHG pricing standards lower than those set by the federal government in order to protect the vitality of local industries, or may wish to choose policies that do not involve GHG pricing.

[198] However, I am persuaded that there is a real, and not merely nominal, federal perspective on the fact situation of GHG pricing: Canada can regulate GHG pricing from the perspective of addressing the risk of grave extraprovincial and international harm associated with a purely intraprovincial approach to GHG pricing. This is manifestly not the "same aspect of the same matter." On the contrary, the compelling federal interest is in doing precisely—and only—what the provinces cannot do: protect themselves from the risk of grave harm if some provinces were to adopt insufficiently stringent GHG pricing standards. Moreover, the matter's impact on the provinces' freedom to legislate and on areas of provincial life that would fall under provincial heads of power is qualified and limited.

[199] First, the matter's impact on the provinces' freedom to legislate is minimal. It is important to mention that the issue in this case is not the freedom of the provinces and territories to legislate in relation to GHG emissions generally. Here, the matter is limited to GHG pricing of GHG emissions—a narrow and specific regulatory mechanism. Any legislation that related to non-carbon pricing forms of GHG regulation—legislation with respect to roadways, building codes, public transit and home heating, for example—would not fall under the matter of national concern.

[200] Nor is the freedom of the provinces and territories to legislate in relation to all methods of pricing GHG emissions at issue. ... Under the GGPPA, provinces and territories are free to design and legislate any GHG pricing system as long as it meets minimum national standards of price stringency. If a province wants to exceed the federal standards, it is free to do so If a province fails to meet the minimum national standards, the GGPPA imposes a backstop pricing system, but only to the extent necessary to remedy the deficiency The federal matter thus deals with GHG pricing stringency in a way that relates only to the risk of non-cooperation and the attendant risk of grave extraprovincial harm and has the ascertainable and reasonable limits required by Crown Zellerbach so as to ensure that provincial jurisdiction is not eroded more than necessary.

[201] Second, the matter's impact on areas of provincial life that would generally fall under provincial heads of power is also limited. Although the identified matter of national concern could arguably apply to types of fuel and to industries to which the GGPPA does not apply at present, that matter is, crucially, restricted to standards for GHG pricing stringency. ... Indeed, the federal power recognized in this case is significantly less intrusive than the one at issue in Crown Zellerbach, in which, as La Forest J. noted, the effect of finding that the federal government has jurisdiction over ocean pollution caused by the dumping of waste was to "virtually prevent[t] a province from dealing with certain of its own public property without federal consent"

[202] Nor does the federal "supervisory" jurisdiction of the GGPPA increase the matter's scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction. ... The Governor in Council does not have an unfettered discretion to determine whether a provincial GHG pricing system is desirable, but is confined to determining whether it meets results-based standards.

[204] Indeed, the design of the GGPPA to ensure provincial flexibility is consistent with the 2018 Securities Reference. In that case, the proposed law also involved a "supervisory" aspect, given that the federal regulator's intervention was contingent upon there being a risk that "slips through the cracks" of a provincial scheme that posed a threat to the Canadian economy: para. 92. The Court found that this feature weighed in favour of constitutionality, because the statute was a "carefully tailored" response to "this provincial incapacity"

[206] On the whole, I am of the view that the scale of impact of this matter of national concern on provincial jurisdiction is reconcilable with the fundamental distribution of legislative power under the Constitution. ... [I]t is necessary to consider the interests that would be harmed—owing to irreversible consequences for the environment, for human health and safety and for the economy—if Parliament were unable to constitutionally address the matter at a national level. This irreversible harm would be felt across the country and would be borne disproportionately by vulnerable communities and regions, with profound effects on Indigenous peoples, on the Canadian Arctic and on Canada's coastal regions. In my view, the impact on those interests justifies the limited constitutional impact on provincial jurisdiction.

BROWN J (dissenting):

A. Characterization

[322] I observe at the outset that, when Parliament seeks to permanently and exclusively regulate a matter of national concern, one would expect the Attorney General of Canada to have a single, clear, and consistent position about just what he thinks Parliament was doing. More particularly, he should be able to readily—and, again, consistently—identify the narrow and distinct matter that the legislation in question addresses. That has not occurred here. Instead, the Attorney General has offered up a vast array of shifting arguments

[323] To assuage these suspicions, the Attorney General of Canada acknowledges that his approach has "evolved," having been "informed" along the way "by the characterizations of [the] courts below" (R.F., at para. 61). So where has this "evolution" brought him? Before this Court, it has at last brought him to the revelation that the Act's dominant subject matter is "establishing minimum national standards integral to reducing nationwide GHG emissions" (para. 56 (emphasis deleted)).

[326] The principal difficulty with these submissions is the invocation of “minimum national standards.” It adds nothing to the pith and substance of a matter, which is directed not to the fact of a standard, but to the subject matter to which the standard is to be applied. In other words, identifying “minimum national standards” as part of the dominant subject matter begs the very question which the characterization analysis seeks to answer: minimum national standards of what?

[327] “Minimum national standards” is a nothing. It is an artifice—or, as the Attorney General of Alberta puts it, a rhetorical “sleight of hand” ... Only federally enacted standards can be both “national” (in the sense that only federal legislation can apply nationwide, while provincial legislative authority cannot extend beyond its borders) and a “minimum” (since, if a provincial standard is different from a corresponding federal standard, the operation of paramountcy ensures that the federal standard will prevail). In the result, using “minimum” and “national” to describe the Act’s pith and substance is empty and misleading.

[337] The difficulty with many of the submissions ... is that they attempt to characterize the pith and substance of the Act as if Parts 1 and 2 were each doing the same thing in the same way. ... While Part 1 of the Act increases the cost of producing, delivering, using, or importing fuels that produce GHG emissions (which is expected to be passed on to consumers through an increase in the ultimate retail cost of those fuels), Part 2 does something quite different: it increases the cost of certain industrial activities by charging large facilities for producing GHG emissions over prescribed limits based on their particular industry and production processes. Part 2 also alleviates the impact of carbon pricing on some industries, but not all: the OBPS covers only the emissions-intensive trade-exposed industries that carry out an activity that the federal Cabinet chooses to list in the regulations. Picking winners and losers in this way is the stuff of industrial policy, not carbon price stringency.

• • •

[340] It follows from the foregoing that the pith and substance of Parts 1 and 2 of the Act ought to be characterized separately. And it also follows from the foregoing that the pith and substance of Part 1 of the Act is the reduction of GHG emissions by raising the cost of fuel. The pith and substance of Part 2 of the Act is the reduction of GHG emissions by pricing emissions in a manner that distinguishes among industries based on emissions intensity and trade exposure.

B. Classification

(1) Provincial Jurisdiction

[342] It must be remembered that the Act’s entire scheme is premised on the provinces having jurisdiction to do precisely what Parliament has presumed to do in the Act—that is, to impose carbon pricing through a comparable scheme.

[343] ... Indeed, as I have explained, the Act operates as a backstop, operating only where provincial legislative authority is not exercised, or not exercised in a manner acceptable to the federal Cabinet.

[346] Part 2 of the Act, as a deep foray into industrial policy, also falls within matters of provincial legislative authority granted by s. 92(10) over local works and undertakings. Also relevant to Part 2 of the Act—with its emphasis on heavy industrial emitters, trade exposure, and international competitiveness—is s. 92A. This head of power gives the provinces the exclusive jurisdiction to make laws in relation to the exploration, development, conservation, and management of non-renewable natural resources in the province

• • •

(2) The National Concern Branch of POGG

(a) Defining the Matter of National Concern

• • •

[370] ... Defining a matter of national concern that encompasses both the reduction of GHG emissions by raising the cost of fuel (Part 1) and the reduction of GHG emissions by pricing emissions in a manner that distinguishes among industries based on emissions intensity and trade exposure (Part 2) requires broad strokes. The legislative means employed by Parts 1 and 2 are mutually distinct ... sharing only a purpose: the reduction of GHG emissions. This ... [tends] to support the identification of the matter said to be of national concern as the purpose of the Act: the reduction of GHG emissions. The only remaining question, then, is whether the reduction of GHG emissions satisfies the test stated in Crown Zellerbach for a valid national concern.

(b) Singleness, Distinctiveness and Indivisibility

[371] "The reduction of GHG emissions" does not meet the requirements of Crown Zellerbach. This would be so, even if it were appropriate to consider each of the pith and substance of Parts 1 and 2 as proposed matters of national concern, since the reduction of GHG emissions by raising the cost of fuel (Part 1) and by pricing emissions in a manner that distinguishes among industries based on emissions intensity and trade exposure (Part 2) each fail to meet the requirement of distinctiveness. Neither of these matters is distinct from matters falling under provincial jurisdiction under s. 92. ...

(i) The Pith and Substance of Each Part Is Not Distinct

[372] Here again, the backstop model of the Act is of significance. The principal difficulty ... is illustrated by the very quality of the scheme that Parliament has legislated. Through the Act, Parliament encourages provinces to enact substantially the same scheme to serve the same regulatory purpose of altering behaviour. Again, this demonstrates that Parliament has legislated in respect of a matter that falls within provincial legislative authority

[373] Proponents of the Act urge us to find that, even if the Act and provincially legislated GHG pricing schemes address the same matter, they each address different aspects of that matter. This argument rests on the applicability of the double aspect doctrine, whose application here the majority not only accepts but describes as inevitable whenever minimum national standards are employed (Chief Justice's reasons, at paras. 125-31). But the majority is simply wrong—the double aspect doctrine has no application here.

[374] The double aspect doctrine arose because "some matters are by their very nature impossible to categorize under a single head of power: they may have both provincial and federal aspects" (Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 3, at para. 30). ... Whether the doctrine applies to the national concern doctrine of POGG is a question of some controversy, given this Court's statement in Crown Zellerbach that Parliament acquires "exclusive jurisdiction of a plenary nature to legislate in relation to" the matter of national concern (p. 433; see, for instance, Lacombe, at paras. 26-27). Assuming without deciding, however, that the double aspect doctrine may, in some instances, apply to matters of national concern recognized as such under POGG, it has no application here.

[375] As the provinces clearly have jurisdiction to establish standards of GHG price stringency in the province, this leaves as the only difference between the federal aspect and the provincial aspect "minimum national standards." Obviously, adopting "minimum national standards" as part of the matter of national concern allows the majority to invoke the double aspect doctrine, since it has defined the matter in terms of something (enacting "national standards") which, as a practical matter, only Parliament could possibly do. And just as obviously, when the matter is defined in terms of something only Parliament could possibly do, whatever it is that the provinces are doing must be something different. This reasoning, however, could easily be applied to create federal "aspects" of all sorts of matters falling within provincial jurisdiction. Indeed, the majority suggests just that, acknowledging that whenever the device of "minimum national standards" is used, a double aspect "will inevitably result" (para. 129).

[376] The device of minimum national standards, combined with the double aspect doctrine, artificially meets many aspects of the Crown Zellerbach test, as diluted by the majority. ...

[377] It is, however, this simple. While the double aspect doctrine "allows for the concurrent application of both federal and provincial legislation, ... it does not create concurrent jurisdiction" (2011 Securities Reference, at para. 66 (underlining added)). ...

[378] The Attorney General of Quebec offers a particularly compelling and constitutionally sound encapsulation of the problem The Attorney General of Quebec –no stranger to carbon pricing and legislative action to mitigate climate change—says that the proposed matter does not contemplate two aspects of the same matter; rather, it contemplates the same aspect of the same matter. And because the provinces may legislate in this area only where such legislation meets the criteria unilaterally set by the federal government, defining the matter so as to artificially conjure a double aspect effectively amounts to a transfer of jurisdiction from the provinces to the federal government. ...

(ii) "The Reduction of GHG Emissions" Is Not Single or Indivisible

[380] ... While aspects of "the reduction of GHG emissions" may be distinct from matters falling under s. 92, as a matter of national concern it still fails to meet the Crown Zellerbach requirements of singleness and indivisibility. In Crown Zellerbach, it was "not simply the possibility or likelihood of the movement of pollutants across [the boundary between the territorial sea and the internal marine waters of a state]," but "the difficulty of ascertaining by visual observation" that boundary that meant uniform legislative treatment was required for marine pollution (p. 437). This proposition could not be clearer. The matter was indivisible in that case not because pollutants might cross an invisible boundary; rather, the matter was indivisible because of the difficulty of knowing the source and physical location (federal territorial seas vs. provincial inland waters) of the pollution at any given time, and therefore whose regulatory and penal provisions might apply.

[381] Here, however, the territorial jurisdiction from which GHG emissions are emitted is readily identifiable. The matter is divisible, because whenever fuel is purchased, or an industrial activity is undertaken, no question arises as to physical location and, therefore, no difficulty arises in identifying whose jurisdiction might apply. ... The reduction of GHG emissions therefore lacks the degree of unity required to qualify as an indivisible matter of national concern.

[383] Of course, uniform legislative treatment in the area of GHG emissions reduction might be desirable But the desirability of uniform treatment is hardly the marker of a matter of national concern. ... While a provincial failure to deal effectively with the control or regulation of GHG emissions may cause more emissions from that province to cross provincial boundaries, that is precisely what this Court held was insufficient to meet the requirement of indivisibility in Crown Zellerbach....

• • •

[385] Obviously, uniform legislative treatment might be desirable in that it could alleviate concerns about carbon leakage. But, and again as the Court of Appeal of Alberta observed, the evidence on this record of the harms of interprovincial carbon leakage is equivocal at best.

• • •

(c) Scale of Impact

[387] Even were the reduction of GHG emissions a single and indivisible area of jurisdiction, its impact on provincial jurisdiction would be of a scale that is completely irreconcilable with the division of powers.

[388] The power to legislate to reduce GHG emissions effectively authorizes an array of regulations, "the boundaries of [which] are limited only by the imagination" (Sask. C.A. reasons, at para. 128). It extends to the regulation of any activity that requires carbon-based fuel, including manufacturing, mining, agriculture, and transportation. ... As Huscroft J.A. recognized, in dissent, the power to create minimum standards for GHG emissions could potentially authorize minimum standards related to home heating and cooling, public transit, road design and use, fuel efficiency, manufacturing and farming prices (Ont. C.A. reasons, at para. 237).

[389] Unlike previously recognized matters of national concern, ... the power to legislate to reduce GHG emissions has the potential to undo Canada's division of powers. It is in this respect comparable to the broad topics of environmental regulation and inflation, which this Court has expressly refused to recognize as independent legislative subjects.

[390] In an attempt to minimize the scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction, the Attorney General of British Columbia reminds us that the Act does not forbid any activity, but only increases the cost of certain activities.

[391] The majority adopts this line of argument ... (para. 57).

[392] This view ignores two problems. First, "just paying money" is an odd way of describing the impact of a law. The goal of the financial charges—"just paying money"—is to influence behaviour, in this case both consumer and industrial. And that is precisely the point.

[394] The second problem ... is that the Constitution does not require provinces to happily accept a severe intrusion on their jurisdiction under POGG simply because Parliament could have passed a criminal law. Likewise, an intrusion into provincial jurisdiction is no less severe simply because it leaves the provinces with authority to enact more stringent regulatory requirements. This argument misses the point of the division of powers analysis The Constitution Act, 1867 does not permit federal overreach as long as it preserves provincial autonomy to the greatest extent possible. It sets out spheres of exclusive jurisdiction. It divides powers—exclusive powers—between Parliament and the provincial legislatures. And within their sphere of jurisdiction, the provincial legislatures are sovereign, which sovereignty connotes provincial power to act—or not act—as they see fit, not as long as they do so in a manner that finds approval at the federal Cabinet table . . .

[451] But the real problem with my colleagues' scale of impact analysis is their significant understatement of the intrusion into provincial jurisdiction effected by the Act. . . [T]he federal benchmark is not static, and can be set to an increasingly stringent level so as to correspondingly narrow provincial jurisdiction in the field. It is only by ignoring such things that the majority is able to claim that the federal power that it recognizes here is "significantly less intrusive than [that recognized] in Crown Zellerbach" (para. 201).

[452] More fundamentally, . . . the majority puts its thumb heavily on the federal side of the scale—by legitimating as a national concern the device of "minimum national standards" on matters of importance that otherwise fall within provincial jurisdiction, and by insisting that doing so still preserves provincial autonomy (as long as it is exercised in accordance with federal priorities). Parliament now knows how to ensure that the balance will always tip its way, whenever provinces choose to exercise their legislative authority in a way that impedes the federal agenda.

ROWE J. (dissenting):

[457] The national concern doctrine is a residual power of last resort. I have come to this view through a close reading of R. v. Crown Zellerbach Canada Ltd., 1988 CanLII 63 (SCC), [1988] 1 S.C.R. 401, and the cases that preceded it. Faithful adherence to the doctrine leads inexorably to the conclusion that the national concern branch of the "Peace, Order, and good Government" ("POGG") power cannot be the basis for the constitutionality of the [GGPPA].

• • •

III. The National Concern Doctrine

A. Singleness, Distinctiveness, Indivisibility

• • •

[540] Given the residual nature of POGG, the importance of a matter has nothing to do with whether it is a matter of national concern. . . The role of the general residual power is to maintain the exhaustiveness of the division of powers, not to centralize "important" matters that can be legislated upon by the provinces or by both orders of government.

• • •

B. Provincial Inability

(1) Extra-Provincial Effects Are Relevant to, But Not Determinative of, Provincial Inability

[554] . . . "[E]xtra-provincial effects," on their own, are insufficient to satisfy the "provincial inability" test. Rather, the extra-provincial effects must be such that the matter, or part of the matter, is beyond the powers of the provinces to deal with on their own or in tandem.

[556] Clearly, some extra-provincial effects are compatible with provincial jurisdiction, considering that, under the federal structure, provinces can adversely affect extra-provincial interests if they are acting within their sphere of jurisdiction . . . If the pith and substance of provincial legislation comes within the classes of subjects assigned to the provinces, incidental or ancillary extra-provincial effects are irrelevant to its validity . . . Given the potential displacement of provincial authority, courts should have a "strong empirical base" for concluding that the extra-provincial effects are such that the matter is beyond the powers of the provinces to deal with on their own or in tandem . . .

[557] Evidence that provinces are not cooperating, even combined with the presence of extra-provincial effects, is also insufficient to make out provincial inability. Provinces are sovereign within their sphere of jurisdiction and can legitimately choose different policies than other provinces. . . Moreover, since the possibility of one or more provinces not cooperating is always hypothetically present, such lax criteria would be ineffective protection for provincial jurisdiction . . . In certain fields, the Constitution Act, 1867, places diversity and the right to provincial difference above uniformity. This is not a defect of our Constitution, it is a strength.

(2) Provincial Inability Is Relevant to, But Not Determinative of, "Singleness, Distinctiveness and Indivisibility"

[558] Second, the residual role of the national concern doctrine explains why Le Dain J. in Crown Zellerbach indicated that the "provincial inability" test is only a "factor" to evaluate whether a subject matter has the required singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility.

[559] Many matters are "beyond the power of the provinces to deal with" but do not meet the requirements of singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility, and are therefore not matters of national concern. Obviously, matters that fall squarely within federal jurisdiction are one example (i.e. currency and coinage, the postal service, etc.). This is also the case when matters are mere divisible aggregates that span provincial and federal jurisdiction . . . For instance, there is no denying that the containment of inflation is "beyond the power of the provinces to deal with," since it involves measures that fall squarely under federal jurisdiction, such as central banking measures relating to the rate of interest (Anti-Inflation, at p. 452). This does not mean that the containment of inflation has the required singleness and indivisibility to qualify as a matter of national concern since it can be divided and distributed to both orders of government. Since there is no constitutional gap, there is no need for the national concern doctrine to be applied such that the entire matter comes under federal jurisdiction.

[560] Provincial inability is no more than Le Dain J. says it is in Crown Zellerbach: an indicium of "singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility." . . . In line with the residual role of POGG, federal authority over what was formerly within provincial competence is only justified where a matter has become distinct from what the provinces can do, and cannot be shared between orders of government because of its indivisibility. In such a case, reliance on POGG is the only way to maintain the exhaustiveness of the division of powers. Otherwise, there would be a jurisdictional void—if the federal Parliament did not have jurisdiction over such a matter, no one would.

C. Scale of Impact

[561] When determining if a matter can pass muster as a subject matter falling under POGG, the final step is to consider whether it has "a scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction that is reconcilable with the fundamental distribution of legislative power under the Constitution" (Crown Zellerbach, at p. 432). ... This stage of the test should therefore be understood as a "check" or "litmus test," rather than as an independent requirement. The evaluation of the scale of impact on the federal balance illustrates the need for caution when determining whether a new permanent head of exclusive power should, in effect, be added to the federal list of powers (Anti-Inflation, at p. 444).

[562] This prong of the test requires courts to determine whether recognizing the proposed new federal power would be compatible with the federal structure. It does not ask whether the importance of the proposed new federal power outweighs the infringement on provincial jurisdiction. ... Important matters can and should be dealt with by the provinces. Further, assessing importance requires courts to assess the desirability of certain policies, something which is not their role.

[563] Rather, the notion of scale of impact on the fundamental distribution of powers is a manifestation of the principle of federalism.

[566] Although the modern conception of federalism is flexible and accommodates overlapping jurisdiction, courts must be careful not to let the double aspect doctrine undermine the scale of impact inquiry by suggesting that provinces retain ample means to regulate the matter. The double aspect doctrine recognizes that the same fact situation or "matter" may possess both federal and provincial aspects, which means that both orders of government can legislate from their respective perspective . . .

• • •

[569] Moreover, the double aspect doctrine must be applied carefully, since increasing overlap between provincial and federal competence can severely disrupt the federal balance. ... The combined operation of the doctrines of double aspect and federal paramountcy can have profound implications for the federal structure and for provincial autonomy.

[572] The Chief Justice also takes issue with my account of the national concern test. I agree that our understandings of POGG are fundamentally different. Mine is that POGG confers residual authority, by which I mean authority to legislate in relation to only those matters which would otherwise fall into a jurisdictional vacuum. As such, it can only be the basis of jurisdiction for matters that do not come within heads of power listed in ss. 91 and 92, and cannot be divided between them. ...

[573] Therein lies the conceptual difference that the Chief Justice highlights. In his framework, POGG is a primary source of authority conferred on Parliament in relation to "matters of inherent national concern" (para. 139). Moreover, it is a source of authority that can be used to deal with federal "aspects" of matters under enumerated powers within the exclusive jurisdiction of provincial legislatures. Thus, he states at para. 130: "... where Canada is empowered to impose a minimum national standard, a double aspect situation arises: federal and provincial laws apply concurrently, but the federal law is paramount."

[574] By means of "minimum national standards," a federal aspect is generated, and this federal aspect can be used as a basis to supervise provinces in the exercise of their authority. This is not residual authority. It is the antithesis of residual authority, as it would operate to encroach on jurisdiction conferred on the provinces. Most respectfully, I disagree.

[594] In conclusion, ... for the reasons of my colleague Brown J., [I] conclude that Parliament did not have jurisdiction to enact the Act under its general residual power.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Justice Côté wrote dissenting reasons, and would have advised that the Greenhouse Gas Pollution Act, SC 2018, c 12, s 186 [GGPPA] is unconstitutional for delegating excessive power to the Governor in Council:

[224] Although delegation of legislative power is not inherently problematic, as discretion provides flexibility and makes it possible to overcome the practical difficulties associated with amending provisions and enacting regulations at the legislative level, when an Act endows a select few with the power to re-write, and thus reengineer, a law which affects virtually every aspect of individuals' daily lives and provincial industrial, economic, and municipal activities, it goes too far.

The core of her objection was to ss 166(2), 166(4), and 192 of the GGPPA, which confer on the Governor in Council the power to amend parts of the GGPPA. Her decision would introduce a nondelegation doctrine into Canadian constitutional law and prohibit legislatures from delegating the power to amend primary legislation to the executive through what are known in the Commonwealth as Henry VIII clauses. This name derives from the Statute of Proclamations 1539, which granted to the king the power to make proclamations having the force of legislation. Henry VIII clauses have come under harsh criticism in the United Kingdom because they enable the executive to determine the statutory boundaries of its own authority: House of Lords Select Committee on the Constitution, The Legislative Process: The Delegation of Powers (20 November 2018) at 18–20. Justice Côté rooted the nondelegation doctrine, at the federal level, in two sources: s 17 of the Constitution Act, 1867, which confers legislative authority on Parliament, and the unwritten constitutional principles of parliamentary sovereignty, the rule of law, and the separation of powers. Chief Justice Wagner countered that "the constitutionality of Henry VIII clauses is settled law" (at para 87), as a consequence of the decision in Re George Edwin Gray, 57 SCR 150, 1918 CanLII 533.

In Re Gray, the relevant provision read: "The Governor-in-Council shall have power to do and authorize such acts and things and to make from time to time such orders and regulations as he may, by reason of the existence of real or apprehended war, deem necessary or advisable for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada" (at 156). Is this a Henry VIII clause?

2. An important point of disagreement between Wagner CJ, on one hand, and Brown and Rowe JJ, on the other, is whether the double aspect doctrine is applicable to POGG. The majority held that, under certain circumstances, the doctrine does apply to POGG, whereas the dissenting judges disagreed. Do you agree with the concerns that the dissent raises? How does the majority respond to these concerns?

3. An important move in References re Greenhouse Gas Pricing Act is to link the jurisprudence under the general regulation of trade branch of s 91(2) with the national concern branch of POGG, in relation to the provincial inability test. Sujit Choudhry made this proposal in an article that appeared prior to the Supreme Court's hearing ("Constitutional Law and the Politics of Carbon Pricing in Canada" (2019) 74 Institute for Research in Public Policy Study 1 at 19–23). Choudhry also argued that the Supreme Court should determine that GHG emissions pose a "systemic risk," and that the federal government had jurisdiction over systemic risks, whether of an economic or environmental nature:

[In the Interprovincial Cooperatives case, the Supreme Court held that] the national dimensions branch of the POGG power is really about whether provinces should bear the risk that other provinces would be unwilling to make regulatory choices to avoid negative extraprovincial externalities.

The issue is why those circumstances should warrant expanding federal jurisdiction, especially since an obvious alternative would have been a cooperative solution whereby Saskatchewan and Ontario regulated industries in their borders for Manitoba's benefit. In parallel fashion, provincial-territorial or federal–provincial–territorial agreements may be an alternative to the GGPPA. Indeed, the GGPPA itself contemplates a scenario in which every province and territory satisfies the benchmark and the backstop does not apply—in essence, a federal–provincial–territorial agreement. ...

The constitutional question is whether GHG emissions pose a systemic risk—and hence fall under federal jurisdiction. The federal government's argument would have to run as follows. If global temperatures rise beyond a certain level, a tipping point will be reached, leading to an uncontrollable cascade of events. GHGs would be released into the atmosphere at an ever-accelerating rate, which would fuel a self-reinforcing feedback loop that, once commenced, would be impossible for humanity to arrest, and that would make the planet uninhabitable. This is a "domino effect" of the kind referred to by the Supreme Court in Reference re Securities Act.

In Reference re Securities Act, the Court stated that "[b]y definition" systemic "risks can be evasive of provincial boundaries and usual methods of control." In other words, systemic risks transcend jurisdictional boundaries. In that case, the systemic risk was economic, and the boundaries were interprovincial. In the case of GHG emissions and climate change, the systemic risk is environmental, and the boundaries are international.

Should the Supreme Court have adopted the notion of systemic risk in References re Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act? How would the dissent have responded?

For other views published prior to the hearing References re Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act, see Nathalie J Chalifour, Peter Oliver & Taylor Wormington, "Clarifying the Matter: Modernizing Peace, Order, and Good Government in the Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act Appeals" (2020) 40 NJCL 153; Dwight Newman "Federalism, Subsidiarity, and Carbon Taxes" (2019) 82 Sask L Rev 187.

5. Jean Leclair has written extensively on the distribution of legislative authority as it pertains to environmental issues: see Jean Leclair, "L'étendue du pouvoir constitutionnel des provinces et de l'État central en matière d'évaluation des incidences environnementales au Canada" (1995) 21 Queen's LJ 37; Jean Leclair, "Aperçu des virtualités de la compétence fédérale en matière de droit criminel dans le contexte de la protection de l'environnement" (1996) 27 RGD 137; Jean Leclair, "The Supreme Court, the Environment, and the Construction of National Identity" (1998) 4 R études const/Rev Const Stud 372.

6. Some have suggested that the national concern doctrine is similar to the doctrine of subsidiarity in the European Union. According to that doctrine, in federal states, powers should be distributed between the centre and the regions according to the principle that decisions should be made at the lowest level of government that is reasonably possible. More specifically, art 3b of the 1992 Maastricht Treaty, 7 February 1992, 1992 OJ (C191) 1, 31 ILM 253 states that outside its areas of exclusive competence, the Community shall take action in accordance with the principle of subsidiarity, only if and in so far as the objectives of the proposed action cannot be sufficiently achieved by the Member States and can therefore, by reason of the scale or effects of the proposed action, be better achieved by the Community.

Not surprisingly, there is debate as to whether the term "sufficiently achieved" focuses only on the issue of inability on the part of lower levels of government, or includes consideration of the efficacy of action by that level as well. This debate occurs overwhelmingly in the political rather than the judicial sphere.

Many in Europe see subsidiarity as a brake on the process of federalization that preserves the sovereignty of the member states. Is it appropriate to invoke the doctrine of subsidiarity within Canada to guide the interpretation of the national concern doctrine? In several recent decisions, the Supreme Court of Canada has made reference to the principle of subsidiarity, albeit not in the context of the POGG power: see Canadian Western Bank v Alberta, 2007 SCC 22, excerpted in Chapter 8, Interpreting the Division of Powers (in the discussion of interjurisdictional immunity) and Reference re Assisted Human Reproduction Act, 2010 SCC 61, excerpted in Chapter 11 (in the discussion of the criminal law power; see also the discussion of subsidiarity in the notes following this case). 7. It is interesting to contrast Canadian federal power to address matters of international concern with the federal power in Australia. The Australian Constitution gives explicit legislative jurisdiction over "external affairs" to the federal Parliament: see Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act, 1900, s 51 (xxix), and the High Court of Australia has interpreted this aspect of the division of powers expansively. The two leading cases on this issue concern land-use conflicts between, on the one hand, the proposed natural resource projects of state governments and, on the other, the Commonwealth of Australia's commitments to preserve certain lands under the United Nations Convention for the Protection of the World Cultural and Natural Heritage, 1037 UNTS 151 (adopted 16 November 1975, entered into force 17 December 1975). In Commonwealth of Australia v Tasmania (1983), 158 CLR 1, 46 ALR 625 (HCA) (the Tasmanian Dam case), the High Court upheld a federal statute prohibiting the state of Tasmania from constructing a hydroelectric dam that would have threatened lands listed on the United Nations World Heritage List. A majority of the Court held that s 51 (xxix) confers on the federal government the legislative authority to implement any treaty obligation irrespective of whether it possesses a traditionally "international" subject matter.

This decision was followed in Queensland v Commonwealth of Australia (1989), 167 CLR 232, 86 ALR 519 (HCA), in which the state of Queensland challenged a federal proclamation prohibiting forestry operations in a World Heritage rain forest area. Writing for the majority, Mason CJ stated (at 525 ALR):

The existence of Australia's international duty is determined by the inclusion of the property in the World Heritage List consequent on Australia's nomination of the property for inclusion in the List, for the listing of the property determines its status for the international community. There is no suggestion of bad faith either in the nomination or in the listing. As the inclusion of the property in the List is conclusive of its status in the eyes of the international community, it is conclusive of Australia's international duty to protect and conserve it. Its inclusion is therefore conclusive of the constitutional support for the proclamation of 15 December 1988 and of the satisfaction of paras (b), (c) and (d) of s 6(2).

I. INTRODUCTION

This chapter examines federalism and the economy through two main lenses: the legislative powers of the federal and provincial governments to regulate the behaviour of economic actors and the constitutional architecture of the Canadian common market.

During the first half of the 20th century, as we have seen, the division of powers presented an almost insurmountable obstacle to efforts by the federal government to regulate economic activity. Many attempts to enact federal economic legislation foundered, in particular, on the extremely narrow interpretation given by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (JCPC) to s 91(2)—the federal power to regulate trade and commerce. (A number of these cases were discussed in Chapter 4, The Late Nineteenth Century: The Courts Set an Initial Course; Chapter 5, The Early Twentieth Century: Beginnings of Economic Regulation; and Chapter 6, The 1930s: The Depression and the New Deal.) By the end of the JCPC’s tenure, what the legislative jurisdiction under s 91(2) did not include was quite clear (for example, the regulation of particular industries). It was far from clear, by contrast, what the jurisdiction under s 91(2) did include because so few federal laws had been determined to be valid.

In this chapter, we examine how the scope of s 91(2) has evolved under the Supreme Court of Canada. In a nutshell, that Court, while maintaining the JCPC’s settled position that s 91(2) does not permit Parliament to regulate particular lines of business, has upheld federal laws of two types: those which, in pith and substance, regulate interprovincial or international trade and those meeting certain criteria allowing them to be classified as laws for the “general regulation of trade.”

Beyond allocating powers between the federal and provincial governments to intervene in the economy and regulate the behaviour of economic actors, Canada’s constitution also contains certain features of a common market—a form of economic integration in which barriers to trade within an area are eliminated. In this chapter, we shall examine three aspects of the Canadian common market: the interpretation of s 121, which provides that goods produced in a province shall be “admitted free into each of the other Provinces”; the limits on provincial authority to impede the free movement of goods, arising because of the exclusive federal power to regulate trade and commerce under s 91(2); and the constitutional provisions concerning the interprovincial mobility of people.

The chapter ends with readings dealing with the jurisdiction over natural resources in Canada. Long a source of conflict within the Canadian federation, the question of control over natural resources has several constitutional facets, including the Crown’s ownership of the resources and the sources and extent of each level of government’s legislative jurisdiction to regulate resource development.

II. LEGISLATIVE POWERS REGULATE ECONOMIC ACTIVITY

A. OVERVIEW

Economic activity—the production, distribution, and consumption of goods and services—takes place within a framework of laws. These laws recognize property rights and enable individuals and businesses to acquire and dispose of those rights through, among other things, contractual relations with others. The legal framework of economic activity also includes regulatory laws; these laws may impose affirmative or negative requirements on an activity or even subject an activity to licensing, for a variety of aims, including harm prevention, fairness, and the reduction of transaction costs. The laws at issue in Citizens Insurance Co of Canada v Parsons (1881), 7 App Cas 96, [1881-5] All ER Rep 1179 (UKJCPC); Canada (AG) v Alberta (AG), 1921 CanLII 399, [\[1922\] 1 AC 191 \(UKJCPC\)](#) [Reference re the Board of Commerce Act]; and Canada (AG) v Ontario (AG), 1937 CanLII 362, [\[1937\] AC 326 \(UKJCPC\)](#) [Labour Conventions], are examples of regulatory laws that we encountered during our study of the Judicial Committee’s case law. From these and other cases, we can see that, as a basic principle, the provinces’ legislative jurisdiction over “property and civil rights in the Province” (s 92(13)) provides them with the authority to regulate economic activity, including transactions, taking place within the province.

Several federal heads of jurisdiction are, of course, also relevant to the regulation of the economy, most obviously the power to legislate in relation to the regulation of trade and commerce (s 91(2)). The modern approach to s 91(2) can be traced back to Citizens Insurance. While the outcome of the case turned on the Judicial Committee’s holding that the federal trade and commerce power does not include the power to regulate “particular trades,” Sir Montague Smith observed, in obiter dicta, that the scope of the power would include “political arrangements in regard to trade requiring the sanction of Parliament, regulation of trade in matters of inter-provincial concern, and it may be that [it] would include general regulation of trade affecting the whole Dominion” (at 1186). Today, in line with Smith’s suggestion, it is understood that s 91(2) authorizes Parliament to enact laws which, in pith and substance, regulate international or interprovincial trade; or which meet certain criteria allowing them to be characterized as laws for the “general regulation of trade.”

Although our focus in discussing modern federalism doctrine relating to the economy is on s 91(2) (and, more specifically, the relationship between ss 91(2) and 92(13)), it is important to remember that several other heads of power are also relevant to the regulation of the economy. For example, the criminal law power (s 91(27)), discussed in Chapter 11, Criminal Law and Procedure, can be used to regulate the behaviour of economic actors. In addition, the federal government has authority over monetary policy through its jurisdiction over (among other things) banking, currency, interest, and legal tender (ss 91(14), (15), (19), (20)).

Section 91 also includes some classes of subjects that appear to be carveouts from the broader concept of "property and civil rights," conferring upon Parliament the authority to regulate a specific industry (e.g., banking, s 91(15)) or a specific area of commercial law (e.g., bankruptcy and insolvency, s 91(21)). Both levels of government can and do seek to influence economic behaviour through taxation (ss 91(3), 92(2)).

B. INTERNATIONAL AND INTERPROVINCIAL TRADE

The Queen v Klassen

1959 CanLII 438, 20 DLR (2d) 406 (Man CA)

[This case arose as a prosecution under the Canadian Wheat Board Act, RSC 1952, c 44. Section 16(1) prohibited delivery of grain to a grain elevator contrary to the provisions of the Act. Grain could be delivered to an elevator only by its producer, and the quantity of each delivery was to be entered by the elevator operator in the producer's "delivery permit book." The total quantity of grain delivered by a producer in a given year could not exceed the quota established by the Canada Wheat Board for delivery by that producer to that elevator. These detailed recordings were the mechanism by which a quota system was enforced to maintain an orderly international trade in grain. Section 45 of the Canadian Wheat Board Act declared that any elevator and many other of the buildings used in the grain trade, including feed mills, were "works for the general advantage of Canada" pursuant to ss 92(10)(c) and 91(29) of the British North America Act (BNA Act).]

Klassen, a resident of the village of Grunthal, Manitoba and manager and operator of a feed mill (an elevator under the Act) in the town was charged with failing to record a delivery of 296 bushels of wheat delivered to him by Leppky of the Village of Niverville, Manitoba. Klassen had purchased the wheat from Leppky and used it as an ingredient in prepared feeds, which he sold to farmers and feeders in his immediate neighbourhood. Klassen's operation was located ten miles from the nearest railroad; he bought and processed the grain, and then delivered it to its purchaser by truck. It was found as a fact at trial that "the accused has not at any time been engaged in interprovincial or export trade personally, nor so far as the accused is aware have the products of the said mill been used in the interprovincial or export trade" (at para 2).

Klassen was convicted at trial and appealed to the Manitoba Court of Appeal. On appeal, he argued that s 45 of the Canadian Wheat Board Act, which declared all elevators and other buildings used in the grain trade to be works to the general advantage of Canada, was ultra vires in respect to his feed mill.

The appeal was dismissed, and leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada was denied.]

ADAMSON CJM:

[Adamson CJM thought that Klassen had conceded the validity of s 16 in his factum, and that it was, therefore, unnecessary to consider s 45. Nonetheless, he made the following comments (at 410-11) about s 16.]

The appellant is in the grain, feed and mill business. He "has not been at any time in interprovincial or export trade personally" but cannot say that some of his products have not been exported. It is clear that if the appellant is to be allowed to purchase wheat without complying with the provisions of s. 16(2) of the Act the quota system and the orderly marketing of grain is to that extent rendered ineffective. Moreover, so far as the facts show, the appellant could (though he has not done so) ship his products out of the province and this would be a contravention of the Act. It is evident that s. 16 of the Act is necessary and incidental in the control of the export of grain. Section 16(2) and s. 45 of the Act are simply the machinery by which the policy and general purposes and provisions of the Act are administered and enforced.

TRITSCHLER JA (Schultz JA concurring):

[Although s 45 was not considered, s 16 was, in the following terms.]

There is no doubt that Part II "affects" property and civil rights in the provinces. It is a serious interference with the intraprovincial business of (among others) the owners of grain and the operators of flour, feed and seed-cleaning mills.

But this interference of Part II may be justified if it is necessarily incidental to the other provisions of the Act dealing with the interprovincial and export trade in grain.

I think that since Murphy v. C.P.R. [[1958] SCR 626, 1958 CanLII 1], it has been settled that the principal purposes of the Act, i.e., the interprovincial and export marketing of certain grains by the Board and the regulation of interprovincial and export trade in such grains is legislation in relation to the regulation of trade and commerce. ...

Our inquiry must, therefore, be whether the questioned interference of Part II is necessarily incidental or ancillary to (in aid of) effective legislation in respect of the general marketing scheme set up for certain grains by the Act.

... [S]crutinizing the Act in its entirety to determine the true nature and character of the controls of Part II and what it is that the Legislature is really doing, I am of the opinion that Part II is not an attempt by Parliament to interfere with or control the business of flour, feed and seed mills within the provinces as an end in itself but that the interference with property and civil rights which results under Part II is incidental and ancillary to the achievement of the purpose of the Act, the pith and substance of which is the provision of an export market for surplus grains, a matter which has undoubtedly assumed a national importance.

The "quota" controls which are established by Part II, and which are the real subject-matter under appeal, have several objects. They regulate the intake of grain into all channels of the marketing system so that currently marketable grains can be received when needed and grain for which there is no present market kept out of the system. The saleable grain must be at the right place at the right time. If the channels become clogged with unmarketable grains the scheme set up by the Act would become unworkable. This necessary interference with the right of individuals to deliver and receive grain into the marketing system must be made to fall as evenly as possible on all and justice demands that delivery opportunity be rationed as equitably as is possible among producers. The scheme ensures this.

But the opponents of the scheme object that these considerations cease to be valid when applied to mills which are turning grains into flour, feed and seed in purely intraprovincial transactions and particularly so where the mill has little or even no storage space. How, it is argued, can such transactions clog the channels of the marketing system? This submission ignores the other but equally essential feature of the controls, the equitable rationing of delivery opportunity and the ensuring that as nearly as may be all producers whose freedom to trade is interfered with by the scheme will get the same price at the same time for the like kind and quantity of grain. If a producer might sell a portion of his crop to a mill for flour, feed or seed and not have it noted on his permit book he would be able to deliver to the other channels of the marketing system grain up to his quota and thus achieve an advantage over less fortunate producers who were not able to get their grains into the local flour, feed and seed outlets. Equality of delivery opportunity is a basic feature of the scheme. As was said by Rand J. in the Murphy case, supra, "The Act operates on the individual by keeping him in effect in a queue." If this be disturbed then, whether or not the channels of the system are clogged, injustice must result and the public acceptance of the scheme endangered. The quotas allowed are not, as was submitted by counsel for the appellant, "for interprovincial and export purposes" but they fix the quantity of grain a producer may deliver into the market system anywhere. It must be kept in mind that the board which is bound to market for producers certain grains in interprovincial and export trade is itself a prospective seller to all in the milling trades. As agent for the producer the board may find itself in competition with its own principal (the producer) and on that ground also controls are justified as ancillary to the scheme. In respect of grains which the board does not sell as agent for the producers—rye and flaxseed—then if storage and transport considerations were not affected the board would doubtless give permission for such grain to enter ordinary trade channels.

It is admitted that the appellant personally has not been engaged in interprovincial or export trade and that so far as he is aware the products of his mill have not been used in such trade. No one can say that the products of his mill will not be so used. If intraprovincial transactions are beyond the control of the Act so far as he is concerned so should they be in respect of every other miller, but there are obvious difficulties about letting into the marketing system even grains which can be proved to have an intraprovincial destination. This also would make the system unworkable. In short, it seems impractical if not impossible to draw distinctions between the appellant and all other handlers (or at least millers) of grain in respect of intraprovincial transactions.

Appellant's counsel has placed his greatest emphasis on the fact that appellant operates his feed mill in a purely local and provincial manner and does not engage in interprovincial or export trade. This is not relevant if it appears, as I think it does, that the Act is not legislation "in relation to" property and civil rights but is legislation which in pith and substance is in relation to trade and commerce and merely "affects" property and civil rights incidentally.

Appeal dismissed.

NOTE: MURPHY V CPR

Murphy v CPR, [1958] SCR 626, 1958 CanLII 1, referred to in Klassen, involved a BC farmer who went to Manitoba and purchased some grain. When he tried to ship it to British Columbia, the railway refused the shipment on the ground that it was prohibited by s 32 of the Canadian Wheat Board Act, which gave the Canada Wheat Board the exclusive power, subject to exceptions created by regulation, to export grain or to transport it or cause it to be transported interprovincially. Murphy argued that the Act was ultra vires because it interfered with property and civil rights in the province. The Court found that s 32 and the Act as a whole were valid legislation in relation to the regulation of trade and commerce. On the issue of interference with s 92(13), Locke J, writing for five members of the Court, stated (at 632-33):

[T]he fact that of necessity [the Act] interferes with property and civil rights in the province of the nature referred to in head 13 of s. 92 is immaterial. For reasons which have been stated in a great number of cases decided in the Judicial Committee as well as in this Court, it has been decided that if a given subject-matter falls within any class of subjects enumerated in s. 91 it cannot be treated as covered by any of those in s. 92. ... It is, of course, obvious that it would be impossible for Parliament to fully exercise the exclusive jurisdiction assigned to it by head 2 and many others of the heads of s. 91 without interfering with property and civil rights in some or all of the provinces. ...

It is contended for the appellant that the power to regulate trade and commerce under head 2 does not enable Parliament to regulate a particular trade, but this is too broad a statement. The result of the cases in the Judicial Committee dealing with this question appear to me to be most clearly summarized in the judgment of Lord Atkin in Shannon v. Lower Mainland Dairy Products Board [1938] CanLII 250, [1938] AC 708 at 719], where it was said:

It is now well settled that [s 91(2)] does not give the powers to regulate for legitimate provincial purposes particular trades or businesses so far as the trade or business is confined to the province.

The Canadian Wheat Board Act controls and regulates not one trade or business but several, including the activities of the producer, the railroads, the elevators and flour and feed mills and, except to a very minor extent, these activities are directed to the export of grain or grain products from the province, activities which the province itself is powerless to control.

Bora Laskin, "Note on The Queen v Klassen"

(1959) 37 Can Bar Rev 630 (footnotes omitted)

The story of the trade and commerce power, traced with some bitterness by O'Connor in his Report to the Senate on the British North America Act (1945), 27 Journal of Comparative Legislation (3rd) 24, is in my view, the saddest legacy of Privy Council adjudication. ...

What, it may properly be asked, were the defects of Privy Council interpretation of section 91(2)? The major one was its consistent refusal to look at an economic or social problem as a whole, and its correlative a priori assumption that every problem of trade regulation necessarily had its national and its local aspects which constitutionally had to be separated regardless of resulting violence to a legislative scheme. Strangely enough, this attitude was not reflected or manifested in the transportation cases or in communication issues in general. But when it came to trade or to marketing, federal regulation (according to the Privy Council) could begin only at the point of interprovincial or export movement, and certainly not at the point of production or harvesting. Arguments of functional connection or integration, if made, were rejected.

... This, however, was the very approach which was used in the Klassen case and which undergirds its importance.

... In [King v Eastern Terminal Elevator Co, [1925] SCR 434, 1925 CanLII 82, excerpted in Chapter 5, The Early Twentieth Century: The Beginnings of Economic Regulation] Duff J spurned, as a "lurking fallacy" the argument in favour of federal power that (to quote his words) "because in large part the grain trade is an export trade you can regulate it locally in order to give effect to your policy in relation to the regulation of that part of it which is export." The learned judge went on to say, somewhat illogically in my submission, that "obviously that is not a principle the application of which can be ruled by percentages. If it is operative when the export trade is seventy percent, of the whole, it must be equally operative when that percentage is only thirty." This is surely a non-sequitur, unless one rests on an arbitrary constitutional determination that the local and national market in any product can never be dealt with by a central scheme of regulation. The Klassen case has now given a direct rebuff to the proposition advanced by Duff J, and, in so doing, it has taken the line long ago adopted in the United States in dealing with similar marketing problems and exemplified by the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States in United States v. Wrightwood Dairy Co. (1942), 62 SCt. 523 and in Wickard v. Filburn (1942), 63 SCt. 82, 317 US 111. In the Wrightwood case, the court said that the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce "extends to those activities intrastate which so affect interstate commerce, or the exertion of the power of Congress over it, as to make regulation of them appropriate means to the attainment of a legitimate end, the effective execution of the granted power to regulate interstate commerce." In the Wickard case, in upholding federal regulation of the production of wheat even though intended for home consumption by the producer, the court remarked, in words which are apt to the situation in the Klassen case, that "it can hardly be denied that a factor of such volume and variability as home-consumed wheat would have a substantial influence on price and market conditions. This may arise because being in marketable condition such wheat overhangs the market and, if induced by rising prices, tends to flow into the market and check price increases. But if we assume that it is never marketed, it supplies a need of the man who grew it which would otherwise be reflected by purchases in the open market. Homegrown wheat in this sense competes with wheat in commerce. The stimulation of commerce is a use of the regulatory function quite as definitely as prohibitions or restrictions thereon."

It is a fitting characterization of the Klassen case to declare, in paraphrase of another sentence in the Wickard case, that it has recognized that "questions of the power of Parliament are not to be decided by reference to any formula which would give controlling force to nomenclature such as 'production' and 'indirect' and foreclose consideration of the actual effects of the activity in question upon the regulation of trade and commerce." Not only are "mechanical applications of legal formulas no longer feasible" if the Klassen case survives, but we will have to withdraw Idington J's portrait of the federal trade and commerce power as "the old forlorn hope, so many times tried unsuccessfully."

Caloil Inc v Attorney General Canada

[1971] SCR 543, 1970 CanLII 194

[In 1970, in order to enforce its energy policy, the federal government passed regulations that prevented oil importers from transporting any gasoline across a line running north-south through Ontario and Quebec. The government's aim was to provide a market for western Canadian oil west of the line, and to restrict the sale of imported oil to the eastern half of Canada. When Caloil lost its licence for having violated this provision, it obtained a ruling from the courts that the regulations were unconstitutional, as they invaded provincial jurisdiction over "property and civil rights." Rather than appeal this decision, the federal government passed new legislation and again denied the company a licence. The amended National Energy Board Part VI Regulations read:

20(1) In this section and section 21 "consumption" means the placing of oil in tanks connected to an internal combustion engine for purposes of operating such engine.

(2) Where the Board is of the opinion that importation of oil that is the subject of an application for a licence to import into Canada will be consistent with the development and utilization of Canadian indigenous oil resources, it may issue a licence to import oil for consumption in the area of Canada specified therein, in such quantities, at such times and at such points of entry into Canada as it may consider appropriate.

(3) Any licence issued by the Board pursuant to subsection (2) may be issued on the condition that the oil to be imported will be consumed in the area of Canada specified in the licence.

(4) Where the Board is not reasonably satisfied that the consumption of oil to be imported will be in the area of Canada specified in the application for a licence and that the terms of the licence to be issued will be complied with, it shall not issue a licence.

This action was challenged, but the Supreme Court held the law to be intra vires. Justice Pigeon delivered the main judgment in a unanimous decision. The earlier case was distinguished on the ground that the new regulations were implicitly limited in scope to imported oil, while the previous ones applied to "any gasoline." Therefore, the new law was a valid regulation of international trade. The following was said about the propriety of schemes regulating such trade affecting local property rights.]

PIGEON J (Fauteux CJ, Abbott, Martland, Judson, Ritchie, Hall, Spence, and Laskin JJ concurring):

In the present case, subs. 2 of s. 20(2) of the Regulations clearly shows that the policy intended to be implemented by the impugned enactment is a control of the imports of a given commodity to foster the development and utilization of Canadian oil resources. The restriction on the distribution of the imported product to a defined area is intended to reserve the market in other areas for the benefit of products from other Provinces of Canada. Therefore, the true character of the enactment appears to be an incident in the administration of an extra-provincial marketing scheme as in Murphy v. C.P.R. Under the circumstances, the interference with local trade restricted as it is to an imported commodity, is an integral part of the control of imports in the furtherance of an extra-provincial trade policy and cannot be termed "an unwarranted invasion of provincial jurisdiction."

Appeal dismissed.

NOTE: THE IMPOSITION OF NATIONAL STANDARDS THROUGH THE REGULATION OF INTERNATIONAL AND INTERPROVINCIAL TRADE

In Murphy and Caloil, the relevant federal legislation prohibited the international or interprovincial shipment of a product, subject to exceptions defined in federal regulations and/or to a requirement of federal licensing. Subsequently, Parliament has used its authority to regulate international or interprovincial trade as a basis for imposing national product or marketing standards. For example, the Energy Efficiency Act, SC 1992, c 36, s 4(1) provides:

No dealer shall, for the purpose of sale or lease, ship an energy-using product from one province to another province, or import an energy-using product into Canada, unless

- (a) the product complies with the energy efficiency standard [prescribed by the regulations]; and
- (b) the product or its package is labelled in accordance with the regulations, if any.

See also Manganese-Based Fuel Additives Act, SC 1997, c 11, s 4; Motor Vehicle Fuel Consumption Standards Act, RSC 1985, c M-9, s 6(1).

Moreover, in Caloil and Klassen, the regulation by Parliament of an activity taking place solely within a province was upheld because it was incidental to a scheme for the regulation of international or interprovincial trade. There are limits, however, to this authority of Parliament to impose product or marketing standards on intraprovincial transactions, as illustrated by Dominion Stores Ltd v R, [1980] 1 SCR 844, 1979 CanLII 57, in which the Supreme Court held that federal grading standards for the sale of agricultural products within a province were not incidental to the regulation of interprovincial trade in those products.

NOTE: DOMINION STORES LTD V R

Dominion Stores Ltd was charged under the Canada Agricultural Products Standards Act [CAPSA] with selling bruised Spartan apples under the trade name "Canada Extra Fancy." The bruised apples, produced in Ontario and sold within the city of Toronto, did not meet the quality standards for use of that grade name as required by federal law. The statutory backdrop to the case was complicated by the fact that Dominion Stores was charged under a part of the CAPSA that was voluntary. The mandatory provisions of CAPSA applied only to agricultural products that moved in interprovincial and international trade. Wholly intraprovincial sales could be caught by the law only if the seller voluntarily chose to use the trade name. As Dominion Stores chose to sell apples within Ontario graded "Canada Extra Fancy," they were caught by the voluntary provisions and so had to satisfy federal standards. The further complication for the Court was that the federal law mirrored the requirements of an existing Ontario law, the Farm Products and Grades and Sales Act, which set mandatory grading standards for intraprovincial sales. The Court was closely divided, ruling 5–4 that the federal law was ultra vires.

Justice Estey (Martland, Pigeon, Beetz, Estey, and Pratte JJ concurring) wrote for the majority:

Under the interpretation placed upon s. 91(2) of the B.N.A. Act ... , the power of Parliament with reference to the regulation of trade and commerce is limited to trade in the international and interprovincial sense and Parliament is not empowered thereby to regulate local trade simply as a part of a scheme for the regulation of international and interprovincial trade (at 845). ...

Consequently, ... I approach the issue raised in this appeal on the basis that the Parliament of Canada may not, in the guise of regulating trade and commerce, reach into the fields allocated to the provinces by s. 92(13) and (16) and regulate trading transactions occurring entirely within the provinces. In actual fact the provinces and Parliament taking the lead from the Privy Council marketing decision of 1937, supra, have adopted cooperative and complementary schemes for the marketing of natural products (at 855).

A key factor in the reasoning was Estey J's view that it was preferable that only provincial law regulate intraprovincial sales. Otherwise, "the wasteful overlapping or doubledecking of administration or enforcement" (at 864) would surely defeat the constitutional plan designed and constructed in the British North America Act and as evolved through the decisions of the Privy Council

The federal statute seeks to add another consequence to the same action already proscribed under the Ontario Act. It is said that the result is simply that if the retailer affixes to the apples the "extra fancy" grade identification, he is to be prosecuted under the federal statute (assuming quality does not match the prescribed standards), but if he does not affix the label, he is to be prosecuted under the provincial Act. To that result, my strong preference is for the simple solution that Part I of the federal statute is inapplicable to the local trade here in question, and hence the charge, if any, must be laid under the provincial statute (at 864–65).

The majority judgment distinguished an earlier decision of the Privy Council in Ontario (AG) v Canada (AG), 1937 CanLII 366, [1937] AC 405 (UKJCPC) [Canada Standard], discussed briefly in Chapter 6, The 1930s: The Depression and the New Deal. The board there upheld a federally created national trademark called "Canada Standard." Use of the trademark was voluntary, but any user was required to conform to federal product standards. Justice Estey held that there was no comparable statutory scheme in place in that case (at 861):

Marketing schemes affecting as they do the process of marketing as such, are in no way comparable in fact or in law with a program for the creation of a property right in the form of a trade mark coupled with a truly voluntary scheme for licensing the users of that trade mark.

Somewhat surprisingly, Estey J ended his judgment with a comment to the effect that the interpretation of s 91(2) on which he had relied, based on Privy Council decisions, might not be the correct description of the federal power, and suggested that the Court on a future occasion might have the opportunity to deal with the interlocking of federal and provincial powers with respect to the local marketing of articles of commerce that have entered the interprovincial and international stream.

Chief Justice Laskin (Ritchie, Dickson, and McIntyre JJ concurring) dissented and would have upheld the federal standard. It was quite logical, to the dissenting justices (at 852), that the Parliament of Canada, having enacted compulsory grading requirements for agricultural products moving in export and interprovincial trade, should complement those provisions by giving an opportunity to dealers in such products to avail themselves, if they so wished, of the same grade prescriptions for local transactions. It could be a convenience for them and for consumers as well.

NOTE: THE COMMERCE CLAUSE OF THE US CONSTITUTION

Unlike s 91(2) of the Constitution Act, 1867, which refers broadly to "the regulation of trade and commerce," the analogous federal power under the US Constitution is textually limited to "[the regulation of] Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes" (Art I §8). Despite its narrower textual scope, the so-called Commerce Clause has been given a generous interpretation by the US Supreme Court, and Laurence Tribe has referred to the Clause as "the chief source of congressional regulatory power" (American Constitutional Law, 3rd ed, vol I (Foundation Press, 2000) at 808).

The US Supreme Court has held that the federal commerce power extends to the regulation of the use of "channels" and "instrumentalities" of interstate commerce (for example, roads and railways), as well as activities, though taking place within a state, that "substantially affect interstate commerce" (US v Morrison, 529 US 598 at 609, 120 S Ct 1740 (2000)). An illustration of the breadth of the latter concept is Katzenbach v McClung, 379 US 294, 85 S Ct 377 (1964), in which the Court upheld Title II of the federal Civil Rights Act of 1964, which (like the human rights codes enacted by the Canadian provinces and territories) prohibits discrimination in various settings, including the provision of services to the public. In rejecting a challenge brought against the legislation by the owner of a small restaurant, the Court stated that the legislator could rationally conclude that "racial discrimination in restaurants had a direct and adverse effect on the free flow of interstate commerce" (at para 30).

In fact, because there is no equivalent in the US Constitution to Canada's s 91(27), much US federal criminal law depends on the Commerce Clause. For instance, in Gonzales v Raich, 545 US 1, 125 S Ct 2195 (2005), the Court upheld a federal prohibition against the local cultivation and use of cannabis, on the basis that the local activity has a "substantial effect on supply and demand in the national market" for the commodity (at 17).

In 2012, the Supreme Court considered a challenge to the Affordable Care Act (often called "Obamacare"): National Federation of Independent Business v Sebelius, 567 US 519, 132 S Ct 2566 (2012). The Act requires citizens to purchase health insurance from the private market. Congress justified the law, in part, based on the Commerce Clause. A majority of the Court rejected that argument, reasoning that whereas the "power to regulate commerce presupposes the existence of commercial activity to be regulated" (Slip opinion at 18), the Act seeks instead to "compel individuals not engaged in commerce to purchase an unwanted product" (Slip opinion at 18). Chief Justice John Roberts worried that recognizing such a use of the Commerce Clause "would open a new and potentially vast domain to congressional authority" (at 20). (The Chief Justice was part of a separate majority that went on to uphold most of the law as a valid exercise of Congress' taxing power.)

C. GENERAL REGULATION OF TRADE

(Toronto: Carswell, 1990) at 141-44 (footnotes omitted)

[Professor Swinton begins by noting that doctrinal developments with respect to the trade and commerce power, such as the expansion of the necessarily incidental doctrine in Caloil, still required that goods move across provincial borders. These developments thus provided no support for federal regulation of economic problems where such flow did not exist, or where a court believed that the regulation of intra-provincial activity was not necessary to the effective regulation of interprovincial or international trade.]

As a result, the case law on the trade and commerce power, fixing on the inter-provincial or international flow of goods, would not support federal government efforts to regulate problems because of their detrimental impact on national economic health. To permit such action by the federal government, it was necessary to develop another approach to the interpretation of the federal and provincial heads of power, and this seemed to emerge with a new doctrinal development in 1976, when the Supreme Court made reference to the federal government's authority over the "general regulation of trade." That doctrine had its origins in Citizens' Insurance v. Parsons, where the Privy Council stated that Parliament might have jurisdiction over "general regulation of trade."

For many years, this strand of doctrine was of minimal assistance to federal regulators—invoked only in 1914, in John Deere Plow Co. [1914 CanLII 603, [1915] AC 330], to support federal regulation of the activities of federally incorporated companies, and twenty years later in the Privy Council's judgment upholding the Dominion Trade and Industry Act, 1935. That Act provided for voluntary use of a national trademark, the Canada Standard, when the user of the mark complied with standards for a product established under the federal legislation. After these cases, the general regulation of trade doctrine fell into disuse until Laskin CJ attempted to revive it in Macdonald v. Vapor Canada [[1977] 2 SCR 134, 1976 CanLII 181], a case involving the validity of a section of the Trade Marks Act permitting a civil cause of action by an individual harmed by a "business practice contrary to honest industrial or commercial usage in Canada." While Laskin CJ made extensive reference to the general regulation of trade doctrine, he held it inapplicable in this case because of the private enforcement of the legislation, the lack of any regulatory scheme under public supervision, and the close similarity between the statutory remedy and common law and civil law remedies coming under provincial jurisdiction. All these factors militated against a finding that the section dealt with "general" regulation of trade.

Macdonald did, however, open the door to permit a new justification for federal regulation of economic matters, and the doctrine of general regulation of trade surfaced in several cases following Macdonald, and finally was used by the Court to uphold federal competition legislation in 1989. There is an explanation for the Court's initial reluctance to apply the test, which lies in the tension between the general regulation of trade doctrine and the dominant mode of analysis in trade and commerce cases, which emphasizes the need for an interprovincial or international flow of products in order to justify federal regulation of local transactions intertwined with the cross-border flow. The general regulation of trade doctrine does not preclude federal regulation of intraprovincial transactions—provided that there is a sufficiently important national interest to warrant such regulation. However, a judge who looks at a federal scheme from the traditional perspective under the trade and commerce power will be concerned if he or she sees extensive federal regulation of intraprovincial transactions such as contract terms or production standards. Yet if the general regulation of trade doctrine is to be applied, the traditional approach must be discarded, for the court must look beyond the stage at which the regulation is imposed. Instead, the inquiry must be directed to whether the federal measure regulates a national economic problem of interest to the whole country, even if it does so at the stage of production or retailing in a province.

The general regulation of trade test requires the judge to make controversial and difficult decisions about the importance of the national interest at stake and the impact of federal regulation on provincial autonomy in the economic sphere. Indeed, the general regulation of trade doctrine confronts the courts with difficulties similar to those under the national dimensions test of the peace, order and good government clause, since the judges must find some criteria of national interest which leave room for provincial regulation of economic problems, even when those problems are duplicated in more than one province. While the old intra/interprovincial distinction was not altogether satisfactory because it hampered federal initiatives, it had the advantage of clearly recognizing a zone for provincial autonomy in economic regulation. As well, it avoided the problem of judicial balancing of national and provincial interests on a case by case basis in the search for the "national concerns" underlying particular federal measures. Instead, the Court could focus on whether the particular measure under attack dealt with interprovincial or intraprovincial trade—an inquiry that appeared more objective and fact-based than the value-laden inquiry under the general regulation of trade test.

NOTE: LABATT BREWERIES OF CANADA LTD V ATTORNEY GENERAL OF CANADA

The federal Food and Drugs Act, RSC 1970, c F-27 regulated the content of a variety of food and drug products. Section 6 of the Act provided:

6. Where a standard has been prescribed for a food, no person shall label, package, sell, or advertise any article in such a manner that it is likely to be mistaken for such food, unless the article complies with the prescribed standard.

The standards were prescribed by regulations passed pursuant to the legislation. At issue in Labatt Breweries of Canada Ltd v Attorney General of Canada, [1980] 1 SCR 914, 1979 CanLII 190 were regulations prescribing minimum and maximum alcohol content for beer marketed as "light beer." Labatt Breweries marketed "Special Lite Beer," which exceeded the maximum allowable alcohol content. Labatt challenged the validity of the Act and regulations. The federal government sought to justify the law under the trade and commerce power, and in addition relied on its criminal law and POGG powers.

The Court split 6–3, finding the Act and regulations, in so far as they applied to malt liquors and light beer, ultra vires. With respect to the trade and commerce power, Estey J (Martland, Dickson, Pratte, and Beetz JJ concurring) held that the first branch of Parsons, giving the federal government power over interprovincial and foreign trade, was not applicable because the impugned regulation was concerned with production and local sale (at 939):

The impugned regulations in and under the Food and Drugs Act are not concerned with the control and guidance of the flow of articles of commerce through the distribution channels, but rather with the production and local sale of the specified products of the brewing industry. There is no demonstration by the proponent of these isolated provisions in the Food and Drugs Act and its regulations of any interprovincial aspect of this industry. The labels in the record reveal that the appellant produces these beverages in all provinces but Quebec and Prince Edward Island. From the nature of the beverage, it is apparent, without demonstration, that transportation to distant markets would be expensive, and hence the local nature of the production operation.

Nor could federal authority be justified as an exercise of the second branch of Parsons, the general trade power. In setting out the scope of this power, Estey J stated (at 940–41):

What clearly is not of general national concern is the regulation of a single trade or industry. ... [I]t is clear that neither national ownership of a trade or undertaking or even national advertising of its products will alone suffice to authorize the imposition of federal trade and commerce legislation.

The impugned provisions, wrote Estey J, were concerned “with the production process of a single industry” (emphasis added) that was “substantially local in character” (at 943). The Food and Drugs Act, although it covered a substantial portion of Canadian economic activity, was seen as a scheme regulating “one industry or trade at a time, by a varying array of regulations or trade codes applicable to each individual sector” and thus was not, in the result, “a regulation of trade and commerce in the sweeping general sense contemplated in the Citizens Insurance case” (at 944).

Justice Estey could not agree that this was trademark legislation of the sort upheld as a valid exercise of the trade and commerce power in the Canada Standard case, discussed above in the note on Dominion Stores, because of the arrogation by Parliament of common names from the language. While suggesting the possibility of a federal “labelling power,” he went on to find it of no relevance to this case because labelling legislation typically prescribes no standards for the production or marketing of a product, but only requires the revelation of, for example, the contents or conditions of use.

Finally, Estey J found no basis for the legislation in either the criminal law power or the POGG power. With respect to the former power, Estey J found that the impugned provisions, which he characterized as involving detailed regulation of the brewing industry, were not directed at the protection of health or the prevention of deception. With respect to the latter, there was no matter of national concern.

Justice Ritchie wrote a separate judgment but concurred with Estey J as to the result. Pigeon J dissented (McIntyre J concurring). After stating that the federal Parliament had authority under s 91(2) to enact laws relating to trademarks, he concluded that the legislation here, as in the Canada Standard case, created a “national mark” within the exclusive use of the federal government (at 959):

In my view, the federal enactments under attack provide for no more than what might be called “labelling regulations.” These state what specifications must be met if some specific designations are used on food labels. In my view this does not go beyond a proper concept of trade mark legislation.

Chief Justice Laskin also dissented. Though the federal law could be characterized merely as a labelling provision, he preferred to rest his judgment on a broader ground under the authority of the general trade power. In Laskin CJ's view (at 921-22):

[Parliament] should be able to fix standards that are common to all manufacturers of foods, including beer, drugs, cosmetics and therapeutic devices, at least to equalize competitive advantages in the carrying on of businesses concerned with such products. I find some reinforcement in this view of the scope of the federal trade and commerce power in s. 121 of the British North America Act, 1867 which precludes interprovincial tariffs, marking Canada as a whole as an economic union.

The operations of Labatt Breweries and of other brewers of beer extend throughout Canada, and I would not attenuate the federal trade and commerce power any further than has already been manifested in judicial decisions by denying Parliament authority to address itself to uniform prescriptions for the manufacture of food, drugs, cosmetics, therapeutic devices in the way, in the case of beer, of standards for its production and distribution according to various alcoholic strengths under labels appropriate to the governing Regulations.

For discussion of the case, see James C MacPherson, "Economic Regulation and the British North America Act: Labatt Breweries and Other Constitutional Imbroglios" (1980-81) 5 Can Bus LJ 172.

NOTES

1. There are many product standards found in the Food and Drug Regulations, CRC, c 870: see, for example:

Meat, Meat By-Products

B.14.015.[S]. Regular Ground Beef shall be beef meat processed by grinding and shall contain not more than 30 per cent beef fat as determined by [the] official method ...

B.15.015A.[S]. Medium Ground Beef shall be beef meat processed by grinding and shall contain not more than 23 per cent beef fat as determined by [the] official method.

B.14.015B.[S]. Lean Ground Beef shall be beef meat processed by grinding and shall contain not more than 17 per cent beef fat as determined by [the] official method.

B.14.015C. No person shall sell ground beef that contains more than 30 per cent beef fat as determined by [the] official method.

2. Although the Supreme Court of Canada found s 6 of the Food and Drugs Act ultra vires, this did not leave the federal government without recourse to enforce product standards. Section 5(1) of the Act provides that "[n]o person shall label, package, treat, process, sell or advertise any food in a manner that is false, misleading or deceptive or is likely to create an erroneous impression regarding its character, value, quantity, composition, merit or safety." A constitutional challenge to this provision was rejected in R v Wetmore, [\[1983\] 2 SCR 284, 1983 CanLII 29](#).

3. The issue of the general trade power arose in AG (Can) v Can Nat Transportation, Ltd, [\[1983\] 2 SCR 206, 1983 CanLII 36](#). The case involved a challenge to the federal government's ability to initiate prosecutions for offences under the federal Combines Investigation Act, RSC 1970, c C-23. The argument raised was that the prosecution of criminal offences was a power that belonged to the provinces under s 92(14) respecting the administration of justice within the province. That argument was rejected by the Court.

In analyzing this issue, the Court was required to characterize the legislation. A majority of the Court supported the Act under the criminal law power, which had been its traditional basis for support. Justice Dickson, writing for three members of the Court, would have supported the Act under the trade and commerce power, specifically under branch 2 of Parsons, the general trade power, because he believed the provinces had exclusive authority to prosecute criminal offences. In the course of his judgment, Dickson J discussed (at 266-67) the constitutional dilemma posed by interpretation of the general trade power and suggested some criteria central to the federal power:

Every general enactment will necessarily have some local impact and if it is true that an overly literal conception of "general interest" will endanger the very idea of the local, there are equal dangers of swinging the telescope the other way around. The forest is no less a forest for being made up of individual trees. Whatever the constitutional flaws in the Board of Commerce Act and Combines and Fair Prices Act, they cannot be attributed, as Duff J seems to contend, to the fact that any individual order made by the board would have its effect on a business or trade in the province. Were that the test then no economic legislation could ever qualify under the general trade and commerce power. Such a conception is merely the obverse of the equally unacceptable proposition that economic legislation qualifies under the general trade and commerce rubric merely because it applies equally and uniformly throughout the country.

The reason why the regulation of a single trade or business in the province cannot be a question of general interest throughout the Dominion, is that it lies at the very heart of the local autonomy envisaged in the Constitution Act, 1867. That a federal enactment purports to carry out such regulation in the same way in all the provinces or in association with other regulatory codes dealing with other trades or businesses does not change the fact that what is being created is an exact overlapping and hence a nullification of a jurisdiction conceded to the provinces by the Constitution. A different situation obtains, however, when what is at issue is general legislation aimed at the economy as a single integrated national unit rather than as a collection of separate local enterprises. Such legislation is qualitatively different from anything that could practically or constitutionally be enacted by the individual provinces either separately or in combination. The focus of such legislation is on the general, though its results will obviously be manifested in particular local effects any one of which may touch upon "Property and Civil Rights in the Province." Nevertheless, in pith and substance such legislation will be addressed to questions of general interest throughout the Dominion. The line of demarcation is clear between measures validly directed at a general regulation of the national economy and those merely aimed at centralized control over a large number of economic entities. The regulations in the Labatt case were probably close to the line. It may also well be that, given the state of the economy in 1920 and the actual mechanics of the legislation, the Board of Commerce Act and the Combines and Fair Prices Act amounted simply to an attempt to authorize the issuance of an uncoordinated series of local orders and prohibitions.

The issue of the constitutionality of the Combines Investigation Act came before the Supreme Court again in the General Motors case, immediately below. Chief Justice Dickson, writing for the entire Court, drew heavily on his earlier judgment in Canadian National Transportation in upholding the legislation as a general regulation of trade.

General Motors of Canada Ltd v City National Leasing

DICKSON CJ (Beetz, McIntyre, Lamer, La Forest, and L'Heureux-Dubé JJ concurring):

The principal issue in this appeal is the constitutional validity of s. 31.1 of the Combines Investigation Act, RSC 1970, c. C-23. Section 31.1 creates a civil cause of action for certain infractions of the Combines Investigation Act. ... [A] civil cause of action is within the domain of the provinces to create. The essential question raised by this appeal is whether s. 31.1 can, nevertheless, be upheld ... by virtue of its relationship with the Combines Investigation Act. Answering this question requires addressing two issues: first, is the Act valid under the federal trade and commerce power, expressed in s. 91(2) of the Constitution Act, 1867; and second, is s. 31.1 integrated with the Act in such a way that it too is intra vires under s. 91(2).

... In answering the two aforementioned issues, I have decided, first, that the Combines Investigation Act is valid under the federal trade and commerce power, in particular, it is valid under the "second branch" of that power, the power over "general" trade and commerce. Second, I have found that s. 31.1 is constitutionally valid by virtue of being functionally related to the Act.

Legislation

Section 31.1 of the Act reads as follows:

31.1(1) Any person who has suffered loss or damage as a result of
(a) conduct that is contrary to any provision of Part V, or
(b) the failure of any person to comply with an order of the Commission or a court under this Act, may, in any court of competent jurisdiction, sue for and recover from the person who engaged in the conduct or failed to comply with the order an amount equal to the loss or damage proved to have been suffered by him, together with any additional amount that the court may allow not exceeding the full cost to him of any investigation in connection with the matter and of proceedings under this section.

Among the offences covered by Part V of the Act, referred to in s. 31.1(1)(a) above, are those set out in s. 34(1)

[Section 34(1) prohibited price discrimination—that is, a policy of selling products at an unreasonably low price with the intention of substantially lessening competition or eliminating a competitor. City National Leasing (CNL) alleged that General Motors (GM) had engaged in price discrimination and brought an action under s 31.1 seeking damages against GM equivalent to its lost profits.]

The General Trade and Commerce Power

[In t]he leading case of Citizens' Insurance Company of Canada v. Parsons (1881), 7 App. Cas. 96, ... Sir Montague Smith noted at p. 112 that if the words trade and commerce were given their ordinary meaning, s. 91(2) conceivably granted very wide-ranging powers to the federal government To limit the breadth of a literal interpretation of s. 91(2), Sir Montague Smith settled upon the following construction, at p. 113:

Construing therefore the words "regulation of trade and commerce" by the various aids to their interpretation above suggested, they would include political arrangements in regard to trade requiring the sanction of parliament, regulation in matters of inter-provincial concern, and it may be that they would include general regulation of trade affecting the whole dominion.

Sir Montague Smith continued, on the same page:

Having taken this view of the present case, it becomes unnecessary to consider the question how far the general power to make regulations of trade and commerce, ... might legally modify or affect property and civil rights in the provinces, or the legislative power of the provincial legislatures in relation to those subjects

In [AG (Can) v Can Nat Transportation, Ltd, [1983] 2 SCR 206, 1983 CanLII 36], at p. 258, I suggested that Parsons had established three important propositions with regard to the federal trade and commerce power:

- (i) it does not correspond to the literal meaning of the words "regulation of trade and commerce";
- (ii) it includes not only arrangements with regard to international and interprovincial trade but "it may be that ... [it] would include general regulation of trade affecting the whole dominion";
- (iii) it does not extend to regulating the contracts of a particular business or trade.

Since Parsons, the jurisprudence on s. 91(2) has largely been an elaboration on the boundaries of the two aspects or "branches" of federal power: (1) the power over international and interprovincial trade and commerce; and (2) the power over general trade and commerce affecting Canada as a whole. The first branch has been the subject of considerable constitutional challenge and judicial scrutiny. The second branch, in contrast, has remained largely unexplored, terra incognita. In this appeal, however, it is under this second branch of s. 91(2) that CNL and the Attorney General of Canada seek to uphold s. 31.1.

So far as I can gather, legislation has been upheld under the second branch by a final appellate court on only two occasions. In 1937 the Privy Council upheld a federal scheme creating a national trade mark ... : Attorney-General for Ontario v. Attorney-General of Canada (Canada Standards Trade Mark), [1937] AC 405. ... The second occasion was in John Deere Plow Co. v. Wharton, [1915] AC 330, where the Privy Council located the regulation of federally incorporated companies within the general branch of s. 91(2), although they also upheld the legislation under the "peace, order and good government" power.

Aside from these two cases, at least until of late, the general trade and commerce power met with consistent rejection by the courts.

In examining cases which have considered s. 91(2), it is evident that courts have been sensitive to the need to reconcile the general trade and commerce power of the federal government with the provincial power over property and civil rights. Balancing has not been easy.

... The true balance between property and civil rights and the regulation of trade and commerce must lie somewhere between an all pervasive interpretation of s. 91(2) and an interpretation that renders the general trade and commerce power to all intents vapid and meaningless.

This Court took the first step towards delineating more specific principles ... in [MacDonald v Vapor Canada, [1977] 2 SCR 134, 1976 CanLII 181]. In that case, s. 7(e) of the Trade Marks Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. T-10, was challenged as ultra vires Parliament. Section 7 prohibited certain commercial practices, including the making of false and misleading statements to discredit a competitor, passing off goods or services, and making use of false descriptions likely to mislead the public, under the general heading of unfair competition. The impugned subsection was a general catch-all provision, unrelated to the rest of the statute, which prohibited a person from doing "any other act" or adopting "any other business practice contrary to honest industrial or commercial usage in Canada." The respondent, Vapor Canada Ltd., supported by the Attorney General of Canada, argued that s. 7(e) could be sustained as legislation regulating general trade and commerce under s. 91(2).

The Court struck down the provision as ultra vires. Chief Justice Laskin, speaking for five members of the Court, proposed three hallmarks of validity for legislation under the second branch of the trade and commerce power. First, the impugned legislation must be part of a general regulatory scheme. Second, the scheme must be monitored by the continuing oversight of a regulatory agency. Third, the legislation must be concerned with trade as a whole rather than with a particular industry. Each of these requirements is evidence of a concern that federal authority under the second branch of the trade and commerce power does not encroach on provincial jurisdiction. By limiting the means which federal legislators may employ to that of a regulatory scheme overseen by a regulatory agency, and by limiting the object of federal legislation to trade as a whole, these requirements attempt to maintain a delicate balance between federal and provincial power. On the basis of these criteria, Laskin C.J. then rejected the general trade and commerce power as the constitutional foundation for s. 7(e).

Three members of the Court affirmed the Vapor Canada criteria in [Attorney General of Canada v Canadian National Transportation, Ltd., [1983] 2 SCR 206, 1983 CanLII 36]. At issue in Canadian National Transportation was the authority of the Attorney-General of Canada to conduct prosecutions under the Combines Investigation Act. Four members of the Court held that provincial authority over the administration of justice in s. 92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867, did not preclude the federal government from conducting prosecutions of criminal offences. I was of the view that s. 92(14) did preclude the federal government from prosecuting criminal offences—unless the offences could be upheld under a head of power other than s. 91(27). I then took the further position, in which Beetz and Lamer JJ. agreed in substance, that the section could be sustained as legislation relating to the general trade and commerce power

In reaching the conclusion ... , I adopted Laskin C.J.'s three criteria in Vapor Canada, supra, but added two factors ... : (i) the legislation should be of a nature that the provinces jointly or severally would be constitutionally incapable of enacting; and (ii) the failure to include one or more provinces or localities in a legislative scheme would jeopardize the successful operation of the scheme in other parts of the country. These two requirements, like Laskin C.J.'s three criteria, serve to ensure that federal legislation does not upset the balance of power between federal and provincial governments. ... These [five] indicia do not, however, represent an exhaustive list. ... Nor is the presence or absence of any of these five criteria necessarily determinative. ...

On any occasion where the general trade and commerce power is advanced as a ground of constitutional validity, a careful case by case analysis remains appropriate. The five factors articulated in Canadian National Transportation merely represent a principled way to begin the difficult task of distinguishing between matters relating to trade and commerce and those of a more local nature.

VApproach to Determining Constitutionality

[What then followed was a long discussion of the appropriate methodology in cases such as this, where the impugned provision is part of a larger act. This portion of the judgment has been reproduced in Chapter 8, Interpreting the Division of Powers, in the context of that chapter's examination of the ancillary powers doctrine. Only the final paragraph, which summarizes the methodology, is left here.]

• • •

The steps in the analysis may be summarized as follows: First, the court must determine whether the impugned provision can be viewed as intruding on provincial powers, and if so, to what extent Second, the court must establish whether the act (or a severable part of it) is valid If the scheme is not valid, that is the end of the inquiry. If the scheme of regulation is declared valid, the court must then determine whether the impugned provision is sufficiently integrated with the scheme that it can be upheld by virtue of that relationship. This requires considering the seriousness of the encroachment on provincial powers in order to decide on the proper standard for such a relationship.

[In a passage reproduced in Chapter 8, Dickson CJ concluded that s 31.1, in creating a civil right of action, encroached on provincial powers, but that the encroachment was a limited one.]

VIIThe Presence of a Regulatory Scheme in the Combines Investigation Act

The second step in determining the validity of s. 31.1 is to establish whether the Act contains a regulatory scheme.

... I have no difficulty in concluding that the Act as a whole embodies a complex scheme of economic regulation. The purpose of the Act is to eliminate activities that reduce competition in the marketplace. The entire Act is geared to achieving this objective. The Act identifies and defines anti-competitive conduct. It establishes an investigatory mechanism for revealing prohibited activities and provides an extensive range of criminal and administrative redress against companies engaging in behaviour that tends to reduce competition. In my view, these three components, elucidation of prohibited conduct, creation of an investigatory procedure, and the establishment of a remedial mechanism, constitute a well-integrated scheme of regulation designed to discourage forms of commercial behaviour viewed as detrimental to Canada and the Canadian economy.

VIIIThe Validity of the Regulatory Scheme

Having discerned the presence of a regulatory scheme ... , it is necessary to consider the validity of the scheme under the general trade and commerce power in light of the [remaining] criteria established in Canadian National Transportation, supra ... : (1) whether the regulatory scheme operates under the oversight of an agency, (2) whether the Act is concerned with trade in general, (3) whether the provinces would be constitutionally capable of enacting combines legislation, and finally, (4) whether the failure to include one or more provinces or localities would jeopardize the successful operation of the Combines Investigation Act.

The foregoing review of the Combines Investigation Act leaves no doubt that the scheme regulating anti-competitive activities operates under the watchful gaze of a regulatory agency. The regulatory mechanism is carefully controlled by the Director of Investigation and Research and to a lesser degree by the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. ... It is clear that the Director exercises a significant degree of control over the operation of the Combines Investigation Act. In my view, the control over the entire process exercised by the Director and the Commission satisfies the requirement that there be vigilant oversight of the administration of a regulatory scheme.

I am also of the view that the Combines Investigation Act meets the remaining three indicia of Canadian National Transportation. These criteria share a common theme: all three are indications that the scheme of regulation is national in scope and that local regulation would be inadequate. The Act is quite clearly concerned with the regulation of trade in general, rather than with the regulation of a particular industry or commodity. ... I agree with [Justice Ryan, who found in Miracle Mart, 1982 CanLII 3743, 68 CCC (2d) 242 at 259]:

... [Section] 37.1 is part of, as I previously indicated, a complete regulatory scheme aimed at eliminating commercial practices which are contrary to healthy competition across the country, and not in a specific place, in a specific business or industry. [Emphasis in original.]

This generality of application distinguishes the Act from the legislation which was found ultra vires in Labatt Breweries of Canada Ltd. v. Attorney General of Canada, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 914. In that case the legislation regulated a single trade or industry. As I noted earlier, the purpose of the Act [here] is to ensure the existence of a healthy level of competition in the Canadian economy. The deleterious effects of anti-competitive practices transcend provincial boundaries. Competition is not an issue of purely local concern but one of crucial importance for the national economy.

Various factors underlie the need for national regulation of competition in the economy. [In the words of] Professors Hogg and Grover, in "The Constitutionality of the Competition Bill" (1976), 1 Can. Bus. L.J. 197 at pp. 199-200 (an abridged version of a paper written for the federal government's Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) ... :

It is surely obvious that major regulation of the Canadian economy has to be national. Goods and services, and the cash or credit which purchases them, flow freely from one part of the country to another without regard for provincial boundaries. Indeed, a basic concept of the federation is that it must be an economic union. An over-all national policy is the key to efficiency in the production of goods and services. Each province of the country is differently endowed with national resources, capital, labour and access to consumers. The result is that each province will be able to produce some products or services more efficiently than others. The introduction of an effective competition policy can be seen as one method to ensure that these differing regional advantages will accrue to the nation as a whole ... in terms of lower prices, better quality and variety and increased opportunities for Canadians. Any attempt to achieve an optimal distribution of economic activity must transcend provincial boundaries, for, in many respects, Canada is one huge marketplace. ...

The relative unimportance of provincial boundaries has become progressively more obvious as industry has tended to become more concentrated. Improved communications and transportation have increased the mobility of labour, capital and technology, as well as raw materials and the finished product. ...

With respect to businesses which are confined to Canada, with few exceptions, any individual or corporation, including a provincially incorporated corporation, has the capacity to "walk across" provincial boundaries in order to buy or sell, lend or borrow, hire or fire. In the absence of artificial impediments, therefore, the market for goods and services is competitive on a national basis, and provincial legislation cannot be an effective regulator.

Among the materials filed in this appeal by the Attorney-General of Canada was a study prepared by A.E. Safarian for the Government of Canada, entitled Canadian Federalism and Economic Integration (1974), which states a similar point at p. 58:

Competition policy can be used most effectively to support the common market if it is within federal power. With mobility of goods, it is quite unrealistic to attempt to maintain diverse provincial competition policies. The more competitive structure of industry in one or more provinces would tend to impose competitive conditions on the other provinces. In such circumstances, any provincial authority which was more tolerant of monopoly or combinations than other provincial authorities would be forced to resort to protection against interprovincial imports and might be tempted to subsidize interprovincial exports. By contrast, the point of a federal common market is precisely to allow consumers and producers anywhere in Canada free access to supplies and markets across Canada.

It is evident from this discussion that competition cannot be effectively regulated unless it is regulated nationally. As I have said, in my view combines legislation fulfills the three indicia of national scope as described in Canadian National Transportation: it is legislation "aimed at the economy as a single integrated national unit rather than as a collection of separate local enterprises," it is legislation "that the provinces jointly or severally would be constitutionally incapable of passing" and "failure to include one or more provinces or localities would jeopardize successful operation" of the legislation "in other parts of the country."

The above arguments also answer the claim of the Attorney General of Quebec that the regulation of competition does not fall within federal jurisdiction in its intraprovincial dimension and thus the Act should be read down so that s. 31.1 only applies to interprovincial trade. ...

... [N]ot only is the Act meant to cover interprovincial trade, but ... it must do so if it is to be effective. Because regulation of competition is so clearly of national interest and because competition cannot be successfully regulated by federal legislation which is restricted to interprovincial trade, the Quebec argument must fail. ...

On the other hand, competition is not a single matter, any more than inflation or pollution. The provinces too, may deal with competition in the exercise of their legislative powers in such fields as consumer protection, labour relations, marketing and the like. The point is, however, that Parliament also has the constitutional power to regulate intraprovincial aspects of competition.

In sum, the Combines Investigation Act is a complex scheme of competition regulation aimed at improving the economic welfare of the nation as a whole. It operates under a regulatory agency. It is designed to control an aspect of the economy that must be regulated nationally if it is to be successfully regulated at all. As Linden J. of the Ontario High Court of Justice said, when discussing the Act in R. v. Hoffman-La Roche [1981 CanLII 1690, 33 OR (2d) 694, 62 CCC (2d) 118] at p. 191:

It is part of a legislative scheme aimed at deterring a wide range of unfair competitive practices that affect trade and commerce generally across Canada, and is not limited to a single industry, commodity or area. The conduct being prohibited is generally of national and of international scope. The presence or absence of healthy competition may affect the welfare of the economy of the entire nation. It is, therefore, within the sphere of the federal Parliament to seek to regulate such competition in the interest of all Canadians.

I am therefore of the view that the Combines Investigation Act as a whole is intra vires Parliament as legislation in relation to general trade and commerce and I would reiterate the conclusion I reached in Canadian National Transportation, supra, at p. 278:

A scheme aimed at the regulation of competition is in my view an example of the genre of legislation that could not practically or constitutionally be enacted by a provincial government. Given the free flow of trade across provincial borders guaranteed by s. 121 of the Constitution Act, 1867 Canada is, for economic purposes, a single huge market-place. If competition is to be regulated at all it must be regulated federally. This fact leads to the syllogism cited by Hogg and Grover, The Constitutionality of the Competition Bill (1977), 1 Can. Bus. L.J. 197, at p. 200:

... regulation of the competitive sector of the economy can be effectively accomplished only by federal action. If there is no federal power to enact a competition policy, then Canada cannot have a competition policy. The consequence of a denial of federal constitutional power is therefore, in practical effect, a gap in the distribution of legislative powers.

[Chief Justice Dickson went on to conclude that the necessary link between s 31.1 and the Act existed. He found that s 31.1 was "an integral, well-conceived component of the economic regulation strategy found in the Combines Investigation Act." He held that this degree of connection clearly satisfied the "functionally related" test (which was deemed to be the proper test, given the limited intrusion on provincial powers) and would even have passed the stricter test of "necessarily incidental."]

Appeal dismissed.

NOTE: KIRKBI AG V RITVIK HOLDINGS INC

At issue in Kirkbi AG v Ritvik Holdings Inc, 2005 SCC 65, was the constitutionality of s 7(b) of the Trademarks Act, RSC 1985, c T-13, which codifies the common law tort of passing-off. If a person used a particular mark to identify the person's wares to the public, the person had the right, at common law, to enjoin others from using the same or a similar mark if the use would be liable to confuse the public about the origin of the products. In codifying this tort, s 7(b) protects common law trademarks, which the statute refers to as "unregistered trademarks."

The Trademarks Act also enables an individual to register a trademark by filing an application with a federal government agency. If the application is accepted, the government issues a "certificate of registration" to the applicant. Registering a trademark provides the trademark holder with additional enforcement rights specified in the Act, such as the right to apply for an interim court order seizing products pending a determination of whether or not they infringe the trademark holder's rights.

At issue in Kirkbi AG, was the constitutionality of s 7(b). The case arose in the context of a dispute between Kirkbi, which held the patents for LEGO construction sets, and Ritvik, a Canadian toy manufacturer which, after the expiry of Kirkbi's patents, began manufacturing and selling bricks that were interchangeable with LEGO. Kirkbi asserted that the "LEGO indicia—the upper surface of the block with eight studs distributed in a regular geometric pattern—were an unregistered trademark and sought a declaration pursuant to s 7(b) that that mark had been infringed by Ritvik. Ritvik challenged the constitutionality of s 7(b), arguing that the provision was ultra vires the legislative competence of Parliament.

The Court unanimously held that s 7(b) was valid because, although it created a civil remedy and thereby encroached upon provincial jurisdiction over property and civil rights, the provision was incidental to and sufficiently integrated within the scheme of the Trademarks Act, which was itself valid under s 91(2). Regarding the validity of the Trademarks Act, the Court's reasons, provided by Lebel J (at para 28), were extremely brief:

In the second stage of the analysis, the Court must determine whether the Trade-marks Act is a valid exercise of Parliament's general trade and commerce power. The analysis is guided by the five indicia of validity set out above. In [Asbjorn Horgard A/S v Gibbs/Nortac Industries, [1987] 3 FC 544, 1987 CanLII 5269], MacGuigan J.A. of the Federal Court of Appeal noted that:

All of the criteria of Chief Justice Dickson are verified in the Act: a national regulatory scheme, the oversight of the Registrar of Trade Marks, a concern with trade in general rather than with an aspect of a particular business, the incapability of the provinces to establish such a scheme and the necessity for national coverage. [p. 559]

The brevity of the Court's reasons applying the GM indicia reflected the fact that Ritvik did not dispute the validity of the Act as a whole. Rather, the dispute between the parties concerned whether the Trademarks Act should be considered to be a scheme for the registration of trademarks (LEGO was not a registered trademark) or a scheme for the protection of both registered and unregistered trademarks. Ritvik advocated for the former characterization and argued that s 7(b) was functionally unrelated to the scheme of the Act, so characterized. The Court, however, adopted the latter characterization. Having determined that the Act is a scheme for the protection of trademarks (whether registered or unregistered), the Court then reasoned that s 7(b) "plays a clear role in the federal scheme [because without] this provision there would be a gap in the legislative protection of trade-marks" (at para 36).

NOTE: PROVINCIAL INABILITY

In GM, the Supreme Court added two criteria to those posited by Laskin CJ in Vapor Canada for a valid exercise of the general trade power. These criteria involved the concept of "provincial inability" that was also central to the Supreme Court of Canada's articulation of the national concern branch of the POGG power in R v Crown Zellerbach Canada Ltd, [1988] 1 SCR 401, 1988 CanLII 63, decided one year earlier.

But what did the criteria mean? Although the Court's application of the criteria in GM was unstructured and ambiguous, there was a strong implicit suggestion in GM that the underlying concern was with the efficacy (or otherwise) of province-by-province regulation. What Dickson CJ appears to have meant, in concluding that the provincial incapacity criteria were satisfied in the case of competition legislation, is that the economic problem addressed by the legislation "must be regulated nationally if it is to be successfully regulated at all" (at 682, above). To some commentators, this emphasis on functional considerations was welcome; however, others feared that the GM criteria would result in a significant erosion of provincial autonomy. For example, in anticipation that the criteria might be invoked in support of federal jurisdiction to enact securities regulatory legislation under s 91(2), Jean Leclair wrote:

The "provincial incapacity" criterion is extremely problematic. First, it was mobilized and applied by the Supreme Court itself [in GM] in a very erratic manner that shows how devoid of any logical barriers a functional test can be. Second, what does "provincial incapacity" mean? Does it refer to jurisdictional or political inability? Could not 100 years of successful securities regulation count as evidence of "provincial capacity"? Could it mean unwillingness to cooperate then? It does seem that evidence of unwillingness to cooperate might be judicially equated with provincial incapacity. In Multiple Access Ltd., Dickson J. (as he then was) quoted with approval the following excerpt taken from an article written by Philip Anisman:

[T]he factors that indicated a need for federal regulatory involvement in the securities market in 1979 are still present and, if anything, have been reinforced by events during the past two years. ... The fact that the market is national in scope has long been acknowledged and is demonstrated by the cooperative efforts of the provincial commissions with respect to the adoption of national policies and by the statutory authorization for and increasing frequency of joint hearings held by a number of provincial commissions to decide issues that transcend provincial boundaries.

It is somewhat baffling to realize that the provinces' willingness to cooperate with one another to harmonize regulation over a matter that falls under their jurisdiction could count as a reason for vesting legislative power over that very same subject matter with the federal government. Furthermore, since when is provincial willingness or unwillingness to cooperate on matters allocated under section 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 a reason to upset the balance of power in the Canadian federation? Is not a federation based on a principle of autonomy and diversity? This leads us to the third difficulty raised by the provincial incapacity test. ... Dickson C.J.C.'s approach is founded on the two following premises: effectiveness can only be achieved by the federal polity and efficiency is reducible to uniformity However, ... these are normative statements that do not appear to be validated by empirical reality.

See Jean Leclair, "'Please, Draw Me a Field of Jurisdiction': Regulating Securities, Securing Federalism" (2010), 51 Osgoode Hall LJ 555 at 590-91.

As it turned out, when the Supreme Court pronounced on the constitutionality of federal securities regulatory legislation the following year, it concluded that the legislation exceeded federal legislative authority under s 91(2). The Court's decision in the Securities Reference is excerpted immediately below.

Reference re Securities Act

2011 SCC 66

THE COURT (McLachlin CJ and Binnie, LeBel, Deschamps, Fish, Abella, Charron, Rothstein, and Cromwell JJ):

[1] This reference ... requires the Court to determine whether the proposed Securities Act set out in Order in Council P.C. 2010-667 falls within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada.

[29] The preamble of the proposed Act states that its immediate purpose is to create a single Canadian securities regulator. More broadly, s. 9 states that the underlying purposes of the Act are to provide investor protection, to foster fair, efficient and competitive capital markets and to contribute to the integrity and stability of Canada's financial system.

[30] The Act includes registration requirements for securities dealers, prospectus filing requirements, disclosure requirements, specific duties for market participants, a framework for the regulation of derivatives, civil remedies and regulatory and criminal offences pertaining to securities. It provides for the comprehensive regulation of securities in Canada, under the oversight of a single national regulator. ...

[31] The Act, as proposed, does not seek to unilaterally impose a unified system of securities regulation for the whole of Canada. Rather, it permits provinces to opt in, if and when they choose to do so. The hope is that, eventually, all or most provinces will opt in, creating an effective unified national securities regulation system for Canada. If this were to occur, it would represent a dramatic realignment in the manner in which securities have been regulated in this country.

[32] Canada, joined by Ontario ... , argues that the proposed Act, viewed in its entirety, is a constitutional exercise of Parliament's general power to regulate trade and commerce It does not invoke other federal heads of power (... —except with respect to some offence provisions the constitutionality of which is not contested). Nor does Canada [invoke the ancillary powers doctrine.]

IV. The Regulation of Securities

A. Overview

[40] The term "securities" designates a class of assets that conventionally includes shares in corporations, interests in partnerships, debt instruments such as bonds and financial derivatives The securities market channels savings in two basic ways: it allows demanders of investment capital ("issuers") to receive investment capital from suppliers of capital ("investors") in exchange for a security; and it allows investors to trade securities with one another. The first type of transaction occurs through the "primary" market, where issuers trade directly or indirectly with investors, while the second type of transaction is referred to as "secondary" market trading

[41] Every province and territory has its own securities laws and regulatory agency. These agencies exercise a variety of responsibilities, including prospectus review and clearance; oversight of disclosure requirements; takeover bids and insider trading; registration and regulation of market intermediaries; enforcement of compliance with the regime; recognition and supervision of exchanges and other self-regulated organizations; and public education.

[42] Since the beginning of the 21st century, efforts to increase interprovincial cooperation and to harmonize provincial and territorial securities laws have intensified. For example, the supervision and regulation of securities firms are presently carried out by the Investment Industry Regulatory Organization of Canada ("IROC") working under the authority of the Canadian Securities Administrators, a creature of the various provincial and territorial securities commissions. The provincially organized Canadian Investor Protection Fund insures investors' funds in the event of the bankruptcy of an investment firm (in an analogous fashion to the federal Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation for bank depositors). IROC standards are national and directed at ensuring that investment firms are both liquid and solvent. Since 2008, all provincial and territorial jurisdictions except Ontario participate in a "passport regime" based on harmonized rules that allow issuers and market intermediaries to engage in activities in multiple jurisdictions while dealing with a single principal regulator. Nevertheless, distinctions remain between provincial securities regimes.

B. Legislative Competence Over Securities: A Shared Field

[43] Provinces have jurisdiction to regulate securities within their boundaries (intraprovincial jurisdiction) as a matter of property and civil rights, pursuant to s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867. As Lord Atkin stated in Lymburn v. Mayland, [1932] A.C. 318 (P.C.), "If [a company] is formed to trade in securities there appears no reason why it should not be subject to the competent laws of the Province as to the business of all persons who trade in securities" (p. 324).

[44] More recently, this Court, in Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 161, per Dickson J. (as he then was), confirmed [the provincial power to regulate the trade in corporate securities in the province, "provided the statute does not single out federal companies for special treatment or discriminate against them in any way ..."].

[45] The provincial power over securities extends to impacts on market intermediaries or investors outside a particular province

[46] The Constitution gives Parliament powers that enable it to pass laws that affect aspects of securities regulation and, more broadly, to promote the integrity and stability of the Canadian financial system. These include [the criminal law, banks, bankruptcy, telecommunications and peace, order and good government] Finally, s. 91(2) of the Constitution Act, 1867 gives Parliament power over the regulation of trade and commerce. This power has two branches: the power over interprovincial and international commerce ... and the general trade and commerce

[47] Canada bases its argument that the proposed Act is constitutional entirely on the s. 91(2) general trade and commerce power. ...

C. Securities Regulation in Other Federal States

[The Court discussed the division of jurisdiction over securities regulation in other federations. In Germany, there is a three-tiered regulatory system, of which the first tier is federally enacted. In Australia, the states have referred powers to the Commonwealth, as is permitted under that country's constitution, to enact corporate and securities law. In the United States, the federal government regulates "virtually all aspects of interstate securities trading" under its interstate commerce power, although there is also some state regulation. The Court stated that "experience in other federal states suggests that power sharing between the central and local levels of government in this area can succeed" (at para 48).]

V. Constitutional Principles

[The Court observed that, since the end of the Privy Council era, the Supreme Court has "moved toward a more flexible view of federalism that accommodates overlapping jurisdiction and encourages intergovernmental cooperation" (at para 57).]

[61] While flexibility and cooperation are important to federalism, they cannot override or modify the separation of powers. ...

[62] ... The "dominant tide" of flexible federalism, however strong its pull may be, cannot sweep designated powers out to sea, nor erode the constitutional balance inherent in the Canadian federal state.

• • •

VI. Section 91(2): The Federal Trade and Commerce Power

[70] On its face, the general trade and commerce power ... is broad—so broad that it has the potential to permit federal duplication (and, in cases of conflict, evisceration) of the provincial powers over large aspects of property and civil rights and local matters. This would upset the constitutional balance envisaged by ss. 91 and 92 and undermine the federalism principle. To avoid this result, the trade and commerce power has been confined to matters that are genuinely national in scope and qualitatively distinct from those falling under provincial heads of power relating to local matters and property and civil rights. The essence of the general trade and commerce power is its national focus.

[71] ... The Canadian federation rests on the organizing principle that the orders of government are coordinate and not subordinate one to the other. As a consequence, a federal head of power cannot be given a scope that would eviscerate a provincial legislative competence. This is one of the principles that underlies the Constitution (Secession Reference ...).

[72] The jurisprudence on the general trade and commerce power reflects this fundamental principle. An overly expansive interpretation of the federal trade and commerce power under s. 91(2) not only would subsume many more specific federal heads of power (e.g., federal power over banking (s. 91(15)), weights and measures (s. 91(17)), bills of exchange and promissory notes (s. 91(18))), but, more importantly, would have the potential to duplicate and perhaps displace, through the paramountcy doctrine, the clear provincial powers over local matters and property and civil rights which embrace trade and commerce in the province. ...

[73] The circumscribed scope of the general trade and commerce power can also be linked to another facet of federalism—the recognition of the diversity and autonomy of provincial governments in developing their societies within their respective spheres of jurisdiction. As stated in the Secession Reference, “[t]he federal structure of our country also facilitates democratic participation by distributing power to the government thought to be most suited to achieving the particular societal objective having regard to this diversity” (para. 58).

[75] ... The first and still a leading statement of the scope of the trade and commerce power is found in Parsons. In that case, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council established that a literal interpretation of the words “[t]he Regulation of Trade and Commerce” in s. 91(2) was inappropriate given the balance of powers established in the Constitution Act, 1867. Parsons also established the twin branches of the s. 91(2) power: (1) interprovincial and international trade and commerce; and (2) general trade and commerce (“general regulation of trade affecting the whole dominion” (p. 113)). The Judicial Committee further held that s. 91(2) does not include the power to regulate the contracts of a particular business or trade (p. 113).

[76] In the late 1970s and early 1980s, this Court revisited the general trade and commerce power. The “modern” trade and commerce cases have affirmed Parsons and taken up the task of developing indicia for matters that would properly fall within the general branch of s. 91(2)—an effort that culminated with the five indicia proposed in General Motors of Canada Ltd. v. City National Leasing, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 641. ...

[82] This Court confirmed this approach in Kirkbi AG v. Ritvik Holdings Inc., 2005 SCC 65, [2005] 3 S.C.R. 302

[83] When Canadian National Transportation, General Motors and Kirkbi AG are read together, a common theme emerges. Provided the law is part of a general regulatory scheme aimed at trade and commerce under oversight of a regulatory agency, it will fall under the general federal trade and commerce power if the matter regulated is genuinely national in importance and scope. To be genuinely national in importance and scope, it is not enough that the matter be replicated in all jurisdictions throughout the country. It must, to use the phrase in General Motors, be something that the provinces, acting either individually or in concert, could not effectively achieve. To put it another way, the situation must be such that if the federal government were not able to legislate, there would be a constitutional gap. Such a gap is constitutional anathema in a federation.

[86] Before turning to whether the Act falls within s. 91(2), it may be useful to illustrate what it means to be a matter of genuine national importance and scope within the General Motors test, by looking at a matter that has been held to fall within the federal trade and commerce power—competition law.

[87] Competition, as Dickson C.J. observed in General Motors, “is not an issue of purely local concern but one of crucial importance for the national economy” (p. 678). It is a “genre of legislation that could not practically or constitutionally be enacted by a provincial government” (p. 683, citing Canadian National Transportation, at p. 278 (italics in original)). Competition law is not confined to a set group of participants in an organized trade, nor is it limited to a specific location in Canada. Rather, it is a diffuse matter that permeates the economy as a whole, as “[t]he deleterious effects of anti-competitive practices transcend provincial boundaries” (p. 678). Anti-competitive behaviour subjected to weak standards in one province could distort the fairness of the entire Canadian market. This national dimension, as the Court observed, must be regulated federally, or not at all (p. 683, citing Canadian National Transportation, at p. 278). Failure by one province to legislate or the absence of a uniform set of rules applicable throughout the country would render the market vulnerable.

[88] The federal power to regulate competition in Canada does not deprive the provinces of the ability to deal with competition in the exercise of their legislative powers in fields such as consumer protection, labour relations and marketing (General Motors, at p. 682). ...

[89] In sum, competition law illustrates how the indicia set out in General Motors function to identify a matter that properly falls under s. 91(2). The general trade and commerce power cannot be used in a way that denies the provincial legislatures the power to regulate local matters and industries within their boundaries. Nor, by the same token, can the power of the provinces to regulate property and civil rights within the province deprive the federal Parliament of its powers under s. 91(2) to legislate on matters of genuine national importance and scope—matters that transcend the local and concern Canada as a whole.

[90] We would add that, in applying the General Motors test, one should not confuse what is optimum as a matter of policy and what is constitutionally permissible. The fifth General Motors criterion, it is true, asks whether failure of one or more provinces to participate in the regulatory scheme would “jeopardize the successful operation of the scheme in other parts of the country” (p. 662). However, the reference to “successful operation” should not be read as introducing an inquiry into what would be the best resolution in terms of policy. Efficaciousness is not a relevant consideration in a division of powers analysis (see Reference re Firearms Act (Can.) [2000 SCC 31], at para. 18). ...

[92] ... [W]e must [first] identify the main thrust of the proposed legislation having regard to its purpose and effects, and then ask whether the scheme, thus characterized, meets the indicia set out in General Motors.

A. The Purpose and Effects of the Act

[93] The first step in the pith and substance analysis is to ascertain the purpose and effects of the Act, viewed as a single, comprehensive scheme.

• • •

[95] Turning first to purpose, the Act's preamble states that Canada intends to create a single Canadian securities regulator. ... Section 9 of the proposed Act reveals the legislation's broader, underlying purposes: to provide investor protection, to foster fair, efficient and competitive capital markets and to contribute to the integrity and stability of Canada's financial system.

[98] This brings us to the effects of the proposed federal scheme. We must look not only at the direct effects of the legislation, but also at the follow-through effects the legislation may be expected to produce

[99] The direct effect of the proposed Act is to establish a federal securities regulation scheme. If implemented as contemplated, all provinces and territories will eventually join the scheme. This will produce follow-through effects. Once a sufficient number of jurisdictions opt in, the current provincial and territorial securities regulation schemes will be effectively displaced. ...

[100] A detailed look at the provisions of the Act confirms that once in place, it will regulate many matters which Canada concedes also fall within the provincial power over property and civil rights under s. 92(13). Parts 1 and 2 establish regulatory oversight mechanisms. These are followed by a number of provisions broadly pertaining to the registration of persons. To this end, Part 3 of the Act gives the Chief Regulator the power to recognize a person as a self-regulatory organization, an exchange, a clearing agency and an auditor oversight organization (s. 64). These bodies must in turn regulate standards of practice and business conduct of participants in the securities industry (s. 66). Part 4, in similar vein, provides the Chief Regulator with the authority to designate a person as a credit rating organization, an investor compensation fund, a dispute resolution service, an information processor, a trade repository or another entity that provides a market participant with prescribed services (s. 73). Designation engages information sharing duties (s. 74). Part 5 requires registration of dealers, advisers and investment fund managers (s. 76). Parts 6, 7, 8 and 9 deal with the registration of securities, public information on securities and the monitoring of securities and issuers. Other provisions of the Act set standards for trading. For instance, Part 10 prohibits misrepresentations (s. 114), market manipulation (s. 116), insider trading (s. 117(1)), tipping (s. 117(2)) and other unfair practices. It also contains certain standards of conduct and obligations to avoid conflicts of interest that pertain to registered persons (see, e.g., ss. 109 to 113). Finally, Part 11 locks these routine regulatory provisions in place by establishing a scheme for the administration and enforcement of the Act.

[101] The effect of these provisions is in essence to duplicate legislative schemes enacted by provincial legislators exercising their jurisdiction over property and civil rights under s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867.

[102] Against this, Canada argues that what appears, on superficial inspection, to be duplication of provincial legislation is in fact directed at distinct federal concerns—preserving fair, efficient and competitive capital markets throughout Canada and ensuring the integrity and stability of Canada's financial system. Duplication of provincial provisions, Canada correctly points out, does not mean that there is no federal aspect that can support the Act. Moreover, Canada argues that the Act is not merely duplicative. It includes provisions that go beyond provincial powers. For example, it contains provisions for the control of systemic risk and for data collection on a nationwide basis, something Canada argues cannot be accomplished at the provincial level.

[103] Systemic risks have been defined as "risks that occasion a 'domino effect' whereby the risk of default by one market participant will impact the ability of others to fulfil their legal obligations, setting off a chain of negative economic consequences that pervade an entire financial system" (M. J. Trebilcock, National Securities Regulator Report (2010), Reference Record, vol. I, 222, at para. 26). By definition, such risks can be evasive of provincial boundaries and usual methods of control. . . .

[106] Against this background, we return to the question at hand: What is the main thrust of the proposed Securities Act? The purpose of the proposed Act, we have seen, is to implement a comprehensive Canadian regime for the regulation of securities with a view to investor protection, the promotion of fair, efficient and competitive capital markets and ensuring the integrity and stability of the financial system. The effects of the proposed Act would be to duplicate and displace the existing provincial and territorial securities regimes, replacing them with a new federal regulatory scheme. Thus, the main thrust of the Act is to regulate, on an exclusive basis, all aspects of securities trading in Canada, including the trades and occupations related to securities in each of the provinces.

B. Classification: Does the Act Fall Within the General Trade and Commerce Power?

[108] ... [T]he General Motors test frames the inquiry into whether a legislative scheme falls within the general trade and commerce power in terms of the following non-exclusive indicia: (1) Is the law part of a general regulatory scheme? (2) Is the scheme under the oversight of a regulatory agency? (3) Is the law concerned with trade as a whole rather than with a particular industry? (4) Is the scheme of such a nature that the provinces, acting alone or in concert, would be constitutionally incapable of enacting it? (5) Would failure to include one or more provinces or localities in the scheme jeopardize its successful operation in other parts of the country?

[110] The first two General Motors indicia need not detain us. Clearly they are met. . . .

[112] The third question is whether the proposed Act is directed at trade as a whole rather than at a particular industry. This requires us to look at both the purpose and the effects of the Act. Opponents of the Act argue that it is aimed at a particular industry—the securities industry. From their perspective, economic activity consisting of the trading in securities represents a specific industry. They are correct to state that, on their face, the provisions of the proposed Act aimed at government registration and the day-to-day conduct of brokers or investment advisers are not obviously related to trade as a whole.

[113] Canada argues, however, that the proposed Act goes beyond these matters. It sees the Act as fostering a fair, efficient and competitive national capital market and contributing to the integrity and stability of Canada's financial system. Moreover, Canada points out that the securities market is a mechanism for channelling capital from suppliers to consumers and that the capital transferred is applied throughout the Canadian economy in innumerable areas of activity. The securities market thus has a pervasive and significant impact throughout the national economy. ... Regulating this market, Canada argues, relates to trade as a whole and is not an industry-specific matter.

[114] We accept that preservation of capital markets to fuel Canada's economy and maintain Canada's financial stability is a matter that goes beyond a particular "industry" and engages "trade as a whole" within the general trade and commerce power as contemplated by the General Motors test. Legislation aimed at imposing minimum standards applicable throughout the country and preserving the stability and integrity of Canada's financial markets might well relate to trade as a whole. However, the proposed Act reaches beyond such matters and descends into the detailed regulation of all aspects of trading in securities, a matter that has long been viewed as provincial. In justifying the reach of the Act, Canada argues that while securities trading may once have been mainly a local matter, it has evolved to become a matter of transcendent national concern that brings it within the s. 91(2) general trade and commerce power.

[115] No doubt, much of Canada's capital market is interprovincial and indeed international. ... Equally, however, capital markets also exist within provinces that meet the needs of local businesses and investors. While it is obvious that the securities market is of great importance to modern economic activity, we cannot ignore that the provinces have been deeply engaged in the regulation of this market over the course of many years. To make its case, Canada must present the Court with a factual matrix that supports its assertion of a constitutionally significant transformation such that regulating every aspect of securities trading is no longer an industry-specific matter, but now relates, in its entirety, to trade as a whole.

[116] A long-standing exercise of power does not confer constitutional authority to legislate, nor does the historic presence of the provinces in securities regulation preclude a federal claim to regulatory jurisdiction . . . Nevertheless, ... Canada's argument is that this area of economic activity has been so transformed that it now falls to be regulated under a different head of power. This argument requires not mere conjecture, but evidentiary support. The legislative facts adduced by Canada in this reference do not establish the asserted transformation. On the contrary, the fact that the structure and terms of the proposed Act largely replicate the existing provincial schemes belies the suggestion that the securities market has been wholly transformed over the years. ...

[117] Aspects of the Act, for example those aimed at management of systemic risk and at national data collection, appear to be directly related to the larger national goals which the Act proclaims are its raison d'être. However, important as these elements are, they do not, on the record before us, justify a complete takeover of provincial regulation. ...

[118] The fourth General Motors consideration addresses the constitutional capacity of the provinces and territories to enact a similar scheme acting in concert. The provinces opposing the Act argue that if there is a national interest in both fair, efficient and competitive capital markets and the need to provide an effective national response to systemic risk, they can meet it by legislating in concert. No doubt the provinces possess constitutional capacity to enact uniform legislation on most of the administrative matters covered by the federal Act, like registration requirements and the regulation of participants' conduct. By way of administrative delegation, they could delegate provincial regulatory powers to a single pan-Canadian regulator.

[119] The difficulty with the provinces' argument, however, is that, as a matter of constitutional principle, neither Parliament nor the legislatures can, by ordinary legislation, fetter themselves against some future legislative action (P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. Supp.), vol. 1, at pp. 12-8 ff.). Inherently sovereign, the provinces will always retain the ability to resile from an interprovincial scheme and withdraw an initial delegation to a single regulator. ...

[120] The provinces' inherent prerogative to resile from an interprovincial scheme aimed for example at managing systemic risk limits their constitutional capacity to achieve the truly national goals of the proposed federal Act. ...

[122] However, this only takes Canada so far. Canada's problem is that the proposed Act reflects an attempt that goes well beyond these matters of undoubted national interest and concern and reaches down into the detailed regulation of all aspects of securities. In this respect, the proposed Act is unlike federal competition legislation . . . It would regulate all aspects of contracts for securities within the provinces, including all aspects of public protection and professional competence within the provinces. Competition law, by contrast, regulates only anti-competitive contracts and conduct—a particular aspect of economic activity that falls squarely within the federal domain. . . .

[123] The fifth and final General Motors inquiry is whether the absence of a province from the scheme would prevent its effective operation. On lesser regulatory matters the answer might well be no. However, when it comes to genuine national goals, related to fair, efficient and competitive markets and the integrity and stability of Canada's financial system, including national data collection and prevention of and response to systemic risks, the answer must be yes—much for the reasons discussed under the fourth question. On these matters a federal regime would be qualitatively different from a voluntary interprovincial scheme. Viewed as a whole, however, because the main thrust of the proposed Act is concerned with the day-to-day regulation of securities, the proposed Act would not founder if a particular province declined to participate in the federal scheme. Incidentally, we note that the opt-in feature of the scheme, on its face, contemplates the possibility that not all provinces will participate. This weighs against Canada's argument that the success of its proposed legislation requires the participation of all the provinces.

[124] Against the backdrop of these considerations, we come to the ultimate question—whether the Act, viewed in its entirety, addresses a matter of genuine national importance and scope going to trade as a whole in a way that is distinct and different from provincial concerns.

[125] The provisions of the proposed Act, viewed as a whole, compel a negative response. The Act chiefly regulates contracts and property matters within each of the provinces and territories, overlain by some measures directed at the control of the Canadian securities market as a whole that may transcend intraprovincial regulation of property and civil rights. A federal scheme adopted from the latter, distinctly federal, perspective would fall within the circumscribed scope of the general trade and commerce power. But the provisions of the Act that relate to these concerns, although perhaps valid on their own, cannot lend constitutional validity to the full extent of the proposed Act. Based on the record before us, the day-to-day regulation of all aspects of trading in securities and the conduct of those engaged in this field of activity that the Act would sweep into the federal sphere simply cannot be described as a matter that is truly national in importance and scope making it qualitatively different from provincial concerns.

VIII. Conclusion

[134] The Securities Act as presently drafted is not valid under the general branch of the federal power to regulate trade and commerce under s. 91(2) of the Constitution Act, 1867.

NOTE: REFERENCE RE PAN-CANADIAN SECURITIES REGULATION

Following the decision in the Securities Reference, the federal government decided to explore with the provincial governments the possibility of a cooperative securities regulatory system.

The outcome of these discussions was a memorandum of understanding (agreement in principle) entered into in 2013, between the federal government and the governments of five provinces and one territory. The memorandum of understanding contemplated a cooperative regulatory scheme whereby (1) federal legislation would be enacted to deal with systemic risk and the criminal law aspects of securities regulation, (2) the participating provinces and territories would adopt uniform legislation regarding the day-to-day aspects of securities regulation, and (3) a national securities regulator overseen by the relevant federal and provincial ministers would exercise authority delegated to it under the federal and provincial/territorial legislation.

In Reference re Pan-Canadian Securities Regulation, 2018 SCC 48, the Supreme Court unanimously upheld both the constitutionality of the general scheme of regulation contemplated by the memorandum of understanding and the authority of Parliament under s 91(2) to enact the proposed federal legislation in particular.

The Court accepted that the pith and substance of the proposed federal legislation was, as stated within the legislation itself, “to promote and protect the stability of Canada’s financial system through the management of systemic risk related to capital markets” (s 4(a)), and “to protect capital markets, investors and others from financial crimes” (s 4(b)) (at para 97).

The Court further concluded that the legislation satisfied the GM indicia and, in particular, “with its carefully tailored scope,” constituted a response to the provincial incapacity, identified in the Securities Reference, to effectively manage systemic risk (at para 113).

III. THE CANADIAN COMMON MARKET

A. INTRODUCTION

You will recall from Chapter 3, From Contact to Confederation, that a perceived need for economic integration was among the factors that led the pre-1867 colonies to pursue political union. Economic integration can take various forms, ranging from a free trade area, such as that established by the Canada–US–Mexico Agreement (CUSMA), to a deeply integrated economic union, such as that among the member states of the European Union (EU).

A common market is a form of economic integration characterized by the elimination of internal tariffs and other internal trade restrictions, the adoption of a common external trade policy, and the free internal movement of factors of production, including labour. Canada’s constitutional architecture possesses some characteristics of a common market. In particular, the Constitution Act, 1867, confers exclusive jurisdiction over trade and commerce on the federal Parliament, contemplates that the pre-1867 customs and excise legislation in each colony would be replaced by uniform federal legislation (s 122), and provides that goods produced in any province shall “be admitted free into each of the other Provinces” (s 121). Although the Constitution Act, 1867 does not contain provisions dealing specifically with the free movement of people, s 6(2) of the Charter establishes the right of any citizen or permanent resident of Canada to “take up residence” and “pursue the gaining of a livelihood” in any province.

B. SECTION 121

Section 121 of the Constitution Act, 1867 provides:

All Articles of the Growth, Produce, or Manufacture of any one of the Provinces shall, from and after the Union, be admitted free into each of the other Provinces.

For nearly a century, the leading case on s 121 was Gold Seal v Alberta (AG), 62 SCR 424, 1921 CanLII 25, in which the Supreme Court declined to invalidate a provision of the Canada Temperance Act prohibiting the importation of liquor into provinces where local prohibition was in effect. Section 121 was not violated because, in the words of Justice Anglin, "the purpose of that section is to ensure that articles of the growth, produce or manufacture of any province shall not be subjected to any customs duty when carried into any other province" (at 466; see similarly at 456, Duff J). On the Court's interpretation, s 121 did not entail that goods produced in one province must be admitted into the others, but only that those goods, if admitted, must not be subject to customs duties. "The essential word here is 'free,'" stated Mignault J (at 470).

In 2018, without overruling Gold Seal, the Supreme Court offered in obiter dicta a somewhat different interpretation of s 121.

R v Comeau

2018 SCC 15

[The Liquor Control Act (NB) provides, at s 134(b), that no person in the province shall "have or keep liquor" that was not purchased from New Brunswick Liquor Corporation. A practical effect of the prohibition is that New Brunswick residents cannot possess more than a certain quantity of alcohol sourced in another province. When the respondent was stopped by the RCMP in New Brunswick upon returning from Quebec and found to be in possession of a large quantity of alcohol which he had purchased in Quebec, he was charged under s 134(b). The respondent's defence was that s 134(b) was of no force or effect on the basis that it violated s 121 of the Constitution Act, 1867. The trial judge accepted this argument, declining to apply Gold Seal, on the basis that the latter case was "wrongly decided": 2016 NBPC 3. After the New Brunswick Court of Appeal dismissed the Crown's application for leave to appeal, the Crown further appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada.

The Supreme Court first held that the trial judge was wrong to decline to follow Gold Seal, which was a binding precedent. This part of the judgment is omitted.]

B. What Is the Proper Interpretation of Section 121?

[44] The trial judge refused to apply binding precedent and instead adopted a different conclusion on the basis of an expert witness' evidence about the intention of the founding fathers at the time of Confederation and the impact of that intention on how we are to understand s. 121. As just discussed, he erred in doing this. The appeal could be allowed on this ground alone.

[45] However, this Court has been invited to offer guidance on the scope of s. 121. We take up this invitation in this section.

(1) "Admitted Free": the Competing Interpretations

[48] The appellant Crown submits that "admitted free" in s. 121 should be read as prohibiting laws that, like tariffs, place burdens on the price of goods crossing inter-provincial boundaries. There are two versions of this position, one slightly broader than the other, which we will discuss in due course. At this point it suffices to note that on either version, Mr. Comeau would not succeed. Even on the second broader version of this position—that s. 121 prohibits laws that in essence and purpose impede the passage of goods across provincial borders (see Murphy, per Rand J.)—s. 134(b) would stand, because it is part of a comprehensive scheme to control liquor in the province of New Brunswick and is not directed to impeding interprovincial trade in both essence and purpose.

[49] Mr. Comeau ... advances a new and much more radical proposition—that “admitted free” in s. 121 means that provincial laws cannot do anything that impedes, or makes more difficult, the flow of goods across provincial borders, directly or indirectly. In his view, s. 134(b) of the Liquor Control Act impedes the flow of goods across the New Brunswick border by prohibiting New Brunswickers from stocking liquor from other provinces at home. Therefore, it violates s. 121 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

[50] Mr. Comeau essentially contends that s. 121 is a “free trade” provision that bars any impediment to interprovincial commerce. The purpose of s. 121, he says, was to foster the full unimpeded economic integration of the new federation.

[51] The implications of these competing interpretations of s. 121 of the Constitution Act, 1867 are significant. If Mr. Comeau’s broad interpretation of s. 121 is correct, federal and provincial legislative schemes of many types—environmental, health, commercial, social—may be invalid. If a narrower interpretation is correct, the legal force of s. 121 is circumscribed to tariffs, or their functional equivalents.

[53] [For the reasons that follow, we conclude] that the interpretation of “admitted free” proposed by Mr. Comeau should be rejected. Section 121 does not impose absolute free trade across Canada. We further conclude that s. 121 prohibits governments from levying tariffs or tariff-like measures (measures that in essence and purpose burden the passage of goods across a provincial border); but, s. 121 does not prohibit governments from adopting laws and regulatory schemes directed to other goals that have incidental effects on the passage of goods across provincial borders.

(2) Text

[54] The introductory words of s. 121 of the Constitution Act, 1867 are broad; the phrase “All Articles of Growth, Produce, or Manufacture of any one of the Provinces” comprehensively covers all articles of trade of Canadian origin. (We need not decide in this case whether s. 121 applies to articles coming into Canada and then moved around the country.) This text on its own does not answer the question of how “admitted free” should be interpreted. That phrase remains ambiguous, and falls to be interpreted on the basis of the historical, legislative and constitutional contexts.

(3) Historical Context

[55] Historical circumstances surrounding the adoption of s. 121 form part of the contextual interpretation of the provision. ...

[Reviewing pre-Confederation economic history, the Court concluded that the elimination of tariffs between the colonies was important for the achievement of the economic goals of the union.]

[62] ... To achieve economic union, the framers agreed that individual provinces needed to relinquish their tariff powers. As this Court stated in Black, at pp. 608-9, per La Forest J.:

The attainment of economic integration occupied a place of central importance in the scheme. “It was an enterprise which was consciously adopted and deliberately put into execution.”: [D. Creighton, British North America Act at Confederation: A Study Prepared for the Royal Commission on Dominion-Provincial Relations (1939)]; see also Lawson v. Interior Tree Fruit and Vegetable Committee of Direction, [1931] S.C.R. 357, at p. 373. The creation of a central government, the trade and commerce power, s. 121 and the building of a transcontinental railway were expected to help forge this economic union. The concept of Canada as a single country comprising what one would now call a common market was basic to the Confederation arrangements and the drafters of the British North America Act attempted to pull down the existing internal barriers that restricted movement within the country.

Section 121 of the Constitution Act, 1867, was one of the pillars of the Confederation scheme for achieving the economic union sought by the Fathers of Confederation.

[65] What light does this history shed on the question that divides Mr. Comeau and the Crown? ...

• • •

[67] We conclude that the historical context supports the view that, at a minimum, s. 121 prohibits the imposition of charges on goods crossing provincial boundaries—tariffs and tariff-like measures. At the same time, the historical evidence nowhere suggests that provinces, for example, would lose their power to legislate under s. 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 for the benefit of their constituents even if that might have impacts on interprovincial trade. The historical evidence, at best, provides only limited support for the view that “admitted free” in s. 121 was meant as an absolute guarantee of trade free of all barriers.

(4) Legislative Context

[68] Section 121 is found in Part VIII of the Constitution Act, 1867, which is entitled “REVENUES; DEBTS; ASSETS; TAXATION.” Its provisions describe the establishment of Canada’s Consolidated Revenue Fund; the timing for the cessation of certain provincial revenue-generating activities, like tariffs, inconsistent with consolidation; the terms by which the federal government would assume provinces’ debts; and stipulations about provincial fiscal matters that would continue after Confederation. ...

[71] ... Part VIII is concerned with revenue-generating instruments and their consolidation: excise taxes, customs duties, levies. All of these are measures that attach to commodities and function by increasing the price of goods. Nothing in Part VIII suggests that s. 121 should be read to capture merely incidental impacts on demand for goods from other provinces; the focus of Part VIII is direct burdens on the price of commodities.

[72] [In addition,] s. 121’s position in Part VIII, as well as its text, make it clear that it does not confer power, but limits the exercise of the powers conferred on legislatures by ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867. ... Limits on these powers by provisions like s. 121 must be interpreted in a way that does not deprive Parliament and provincial legislatures of the powers granted to them to deal effectively with problems that arise. Otherwise, there would be constitutional hiatuses—circumstances in which no legislature could act. ... It follows that s. 121 should be interpreted in a way that allows governments to enact proactive policies for the good of their citizens and in a way that maintains an appropriate balance between federal and provincial powers—even if the exercise of those powers may have an incidental effect on other matters, like bringing goods across provincial boundaries.

(5) Foundational Principles

[77] In Reference re Secession of Quebec, at para. 32, this Court held that foundational principles underlying the Constitution may aid in its interpretation. [Among these is the federalism principle.]

[78] Federalism refers to how states come together to achieve shared outcomes, while simultaneously pursuing their unique interests. The principle of federalism recognizes the “autonomy of provincial governments to develop their societies within their respective spheres of jurisdiction”: Reference re Secession of Quebec, at para. 58 The tension between the centre and the regions is regulated by the concept of jurisdictional balance: Reference re Secession of Quebec, at paras. 56-59. The federalism principle requires a court interpreting constitutional texts to consider how different interpretations impact the balance between federal and provincial interests. The same concern has led to, for example, the development of doctrines like the necessarily incidental doctrine and the ancillary powers doctrine.

[85] We begin with Mr. Comeau’s submission that the principle of federalism supports full economic integration. We cannot accept this submission. The federalism principle emphasizes balance and the ability of each level of government to achieve its goals in the exercise of its powers under ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Full economic integration would “curtail the freedom of action—indeed, the sovereignty—of governments, especially at the provincial level”: K. Swinton, “Courting Our Way to Economic Integration: Judicial Review and the Canadian Economic Union” (1995), 25 Can. Bus. L.J. 280, at p. 291; see also D. Schneiderman, “Economic Citizenship and Deliberative Democracy: An Inquiry into Constitutional Limitations on Economic Regulation” (1995), 21 Queen’s L.J. 125, at p. 152. Reading s. 121 to require full economic integration would significantly undermine the shape of Canadian federalism, which is built upon regional diversity within a single nation: Reference re Secession of Quebec, at paras. 57-58; Canadian Western Bank, at para. 22. A key facet of this regional diversity is that the Canadian federation provides space to each province to regulate the economy in a manner that reflects local concerns.

[86] The federalism principle supports the view that provinces within a federal state should be allowed leeway to manage the passage of goods while legislating to address particular conditions and priorities within their borders. For example, the Northwest Territories and Nunavut have adopted laws governing the consumption of liquor, which include controls on liquor coming across the border into their territories. The primary objective of the laws is public health, but they have the incidental effect of curtailing cross-border trade in liquor. The Northwest Territories and Nunavut argue that these sorts of laws do not fall under the spectre of s. 121. We agree that to interpret s. 121 in a way that renders such laws invalid despite their non-trade-related objectives is to misunderstand the import of the federalism principle.

[88] . . . The need to maintain balance embodied in the federalism principle supports an interpretation of s. 121 that prohibits laws directed at curtailing the passage of goods over interprovincial borders, but allows legislatures to pass laws to achieve other goals within their powers, even though the laws may have the incidental effect of impeding the passage of goods over interprovincial borders.

(6) Defining the Ambit of Section 121: The Jurisprudence

[89] We have established in the preceding sections that the text, historical context, legislative context, and underlying constitutional principles do not support Mr. Comeau’s contention that s. 121 should be interpreted as prohibiting any and all burdens on the passage of goods over provincial boundaries, essentially imposing an absolute free trade regime within Canada. Rather, these considerations support a flexible, purposive view of s. 121—one that respects an appropriate balance between federal and provincial powers and allows legislatures room to achieve policy objectives that may have the incidental effect of burdening the passage of goods across provincial boundaries.

[90] This established, the next question to be answered is: What does s. 121 of the Constitution Act, 1867 actually prohibit? Before us, the debate was framed as a conflict between two lines of authority—the Gold Seal line of authority, which is said to confine s. 121 to the prohibition of tariffs, and the line of authority based on the [concurring] judgment of Rand J. in Murphy, which sets out the view that s. 121 prohibits not only tariffs, but extends to laws that in essence and purpose are directed to impeding the passage of goods across provincial boundaries.

[91] [W]e do not see these lines of authority to be in conflict. Properly understood, they represent a single, progressive understanding of the purpose and function of s. 121 in the broader constitutional scheme. This understanding is entirely consistent with our earlier conclusion that s. 121—understood through the lens of its text, its historical and legislative contexts and the principle of federalism—is best conceived as preventing provinces from passing laws aimed at impeding trade by setting up barriers at boundaries, while allowing them to legislate to achieve goals within their jurisdiction even where such laws may incidentally limit the passage of goods over provincial borders.

[98] [W]hile the Court in [Gold Seal] spoke of s. 121 forbidding tariffs, and while Rand J. in Murphy spoke of s. 121 forbidding laws that purposely act like tariffs (i.e. laws that in essence burden the passage of goods over provincial borders), this is a distinction without a difference. Constitutional limits must operate on the level of principle and function, not on what label is applied to a particular kind of law. Constitutional compliance is not a matter of semantics. Clearly, traditional tariffs would offend the purpose of s. 121, as Rand J. describes it. But so might other measures that function in the same way. It follows that s. 121 applies not only to tariffs, but also to the functional equivalents of tariffs.

[99] ... Gold Seal and Murphy [also] support the proposition that s. 121 was not intended to catch burdens on goods crossing provincial borders that were merely incidental effects of a law or scheme aimed at some other purpose As Rand J. pointed out in Murphy, to prohibit incidental impacts on cross-border trade would allow s. 121 to trump valid exercises of legislative power, and create legislative hiatuses where neither level of government could act: pp. 638 and 642-43. The federalism principle militates against such an interpretation—the aim is balance and capacity, not imbalance and constitutional gaps. The federal government and provincial governments should be able to legislate in ways that impose incidental burdens on the passage of goods between provinces, in light of the scheme of the Constitution Act, 1867 as a whole, This is illustrated by Gold Seal. If the federal government had not been able to enact its law prohibiting liquor from crossing the borders of the dry provinces, there would have been a legislative hiatus, and the cooperative scheme aimed at allowing these provinces to keep liquor out would not have been possible.

[100] Put another way, s. 121 allows schemes that incidentally burden the passage of goods across provincial boundaries, but does not allow them to impose such impediments only because they cross a provincial boundary. In Rand J.'s view, the gravamen of s. 121 was to prohibit laws directed to erecting barriers to trade at provincial boundaries—whether customs duties or other measures that are intended to fill the role of such tariffs: Murphy, at p. 642.

[107] It follows that a party alleging that a law violates s. 121 must establish that the law in essence and purpose restricts trade across a provincial border. “[E]ssence” refers to the nature of the measure—“what a thing is”; ... [its] character”: The Oxford English Dictionary (2nd ed. 1989), at p. 400. “Purpose” focuses on the object, or primary purpose, of the measure.

[108] The first question is whether the essence or character of the law is to restrict or prohibit trade across a provincial border, like a tariff. Tariffs, broadly defined, are “customs duties and charges of any kind imposed on or in connection with importation or exportation”: General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (World Trade Organization), Can. T.S. 1948 No. 31, Part I, Article I. The claimant must therefore establish that the law imposes an additional cost on goods by virtue of them coming in from outside the province. Put another way, a claimant must establish that the law distinguishes goods in a manner “related to a provincial boundary” that subjects goods from outside the province to additional costs: Murphy, at p. 642, per Rand J. A prohibition on goods crossing the border is an extreme example of such a distinction.

[109] The additional cost need not be a charge physically levied at the border, nor must it take the form of an actual surcharge; all that is required is that the law impose a cost burden on goods crossing a provincial border. A law that provides that “rum produced in the Maritime provinces will be subject to a 50% surcharge upon entering Newfoundland” has the same effect, in principle, as a law that states that “any person who brings rum produced in the Maritime provinces into Newfoundland is guilty of an offence and liable to a fine.” Both laws impose a burden on the cost of goods that cross a provincial boundary.

[111] If the law does not in essence restrict the trade of goods across a provincial border, the inquiry is over and s. 121 is not engaged. If it does, the claimant must also establish that the primary purpose of the law is to restrict trade. A law may have more than one purpose. But impeding trade must be its primary purpose to engage s. 121. The inquiry is objective, based on the wording of the law, the legislative context in which it was enacted (i.e. if it is one element of a broader regulatory scheme), and all of the law’s discernable effects (which can include much more than its trade-impeding effect). If the purpose of the law aligns with purposes traditionally served by tariffs, such as exploiting the passage of goods across a border solely as a way to collect funds, protecting local industry or punishing another province, this may, depending on other factors, support the contention that the primary purpose of the law is to restrict trade

[112] Stand-alone laws that have the effect of restricting trade across provincial boundaries will not violate s. 121 if their primary purpose is not to impede trade, Thus a law that prohibits liquor crossing a provincial boundary for the primary purpose of protecting the health and welfare of the people in the province would not violate s. 121. More commonly, however, the primary purpose requirement of s. 121 fails because the law’s restriction on trade is merely an incidental effect of its role in a scheme with a different purpose. The primary purpose of such a law is not to restrict trade across a provincial boundary, but to achieve the goals of the regulatory scheme.

[113] However, a law that in essence and purpose impedes cross-border trade cannot be rendered constitutional under s. 121 solely by inserting it into a broader regulatory scheme. If the primary purpose of the broader scheme is to impede trade, or if the impugned law is not connected in a rational way to the scheme’s objective, the law will violate s. 121. A rational connection between the impugned measure and the broader objective of the regulatory scheme exists where, as a matter of reason or logic, the former can be said to serve the latter: see, e.g., RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 199, at para. 153, per McLachlin J. (as she then was), and at para. 184, per Iacobucci J. ...

[114] In summary, two things are required for s. 121 to be violated. The law must impact the interprovincial movement of goods like a tariff, which, in the extreme, could be an outright prohibition. And, restriction of cross-border trade must be the primary purpose of the law, thereby excluding laws enacted for other purposes, such as laws that form rational parts of broader legislative schemes with purposes unrelated to impeding interprovincial trade.

[116] There is debate about whether s. 121 applies equally to provincial and federal laws. While this Court has in previous decisions proceeded on the basis that federal laws may engage s. 121 (see, e.g., Gold Seal and Murphy), no federal law is properly at issue in the present appeal and so the question need not be resolved here. We agree with Laskin C.J.'s statement in Reference re Agricultural Products Marketing Act, at p. 1267, that "the application of s. 121 may be different according to whether it is provincial or federal legislation that is involved because what may amount to a tariff or customs duty under a provincial regulatory statute may not have that character at all under a federal regulatory statute."

[Applying this framework, the Court concluded that s 134(b) of the Liquor Control Act does not violate s 121. Although the impact of s 134(b) on interprovincial movement of goods resembles that of a tariff, the primary purpose of s 134(b) is not to restrict trade, but rather "to enable public supervision of the production, movement, sale, and use of alcohol within New Brunswick" (at para 124).]

NOTE: THE FREE MOVEMENT OF GOODS WITHIN THE EUROPEAN UNION

Section 121 of the Constitution Act, 1867 textually resembles art 30 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, 26 October 2012, EU, OJ L 326/47-326/390 (TFEU), which prohibits "customs duties ... and charges having equivalent effect ... between Member States." The TFEU goes well beyond s 121, however, in establishing an integrated European market. For example, art 34 of the TFEU provides:

Quantitative restrictions on imports and all measures having equivalent effect shall be prohibited between Member States.

Article 34 has received a broad interpretation at the hands of the European Court of Justice (ECJ) (whose decisions on questions of EU law are binding on the courts of the Member States). In particular, the concept of "measures having equivalent effect" to a "quantitative restriction" has been construed as applying to Member State product standards, whether or not applied equally to domestic products and imports, and whether or not adopted with protectionist intent, that hinder cross-border trade. In a famous case, Rewe-Zentral AG v Bundesmonopolverwaltung für Branntwein (Cassis de Dijon), [1979] ECR 649, the ECJ held that a German law prescribing the minimum alcoholic content of certain liqueurs sold in Germany (whether or not imported) was contrary to art 34, because "there is no valid reason why, provided that they have been lawfully produced and marketed in one of the Member States, alcoholic beverages should not be introduced into any other Member State" (at para 14).

It is clear that the legal position is quite different in Canada. Divergent provincial product standards are an unquestioned consequence of provincial jurisdiction over in-province transactions under s 92(13). Economic integration is not, in our system, elevated above provincial autonomy: see Comeau, at para 85. While a direct “quantitative restriction on imports” enacted by a province would no doubt run afoul of s 91(2) (about which see Section III.C below), many of the measures which the ECJ has characterized as “having equivalent effect” to a quantitative restriction would clearly not, if enacted by a Canadian province, be precluded by s 121 (or, as you will see in Section III.C, by s 91(2)). As a general rule, Canadian provinces can impose their own rules on transactions taking place within the province, including to goods that have been produced elsewhere, even if the result is to reduce the volume of imported goods that are sold.

NOTE: STEAM WHISTLE BREWING INC V ALBERTA GAMING AND LIQUOR COMMISSION

The Alberta Gaming, Liquor and Cannabis Commission (the Commission) possesses a statutory monopoly over the distribution and sale of liquor to private retailers in Alberta. In 2015 and 2016, the Commission implemented policies whereby it applied a higher mark-up—the difference between the Commission’s cost and the price it charges to retailers—to beer brewed in Alberta, British Columbia, and Saskatchewan than to beer brewed elsewhere. In Steam Whistle Brewing Inc v Alberta Gaming and Liquor Commission, 2019 ABCA 468, the Alberta Court of Appeal held that these policies contravened s 121 and were of no force or effect.

The Court first rejected a claim by the Commission that, insofar as the Commission was merely exercising the powers of a legal person (entering into contracts), its actions were not subject to s 121. The Court accepted the principle that the Crown (whether provincial or federal) inherently possesses the legal capacity to enter into contracts, and to hold and dispose of property, and that, in the exercise of these powers, the Crown is not subject to s 121 or to the constitutional rules concerning the division of powers. However, the principle did not apply here because the Commission “was not solely exercising natural-person powers,” but was exercising “statutory duties and powers” under provincial law and “benefiting from a statutory monopoly” (at paras 71-72, 167).

The Court then applied the two-stage Comeau test and determined, first, that the essence of the policies was “to restrict trade by imposing differential costs on the sale of beer produced inside and outside the province” (at para 100) and, second, that the primary purpose of the policies was “to promote the competitive position” of brewers in the favoured provinces (at para 104)—to “protect local industry, a purpose traditionally served by tariffs” (at para 110). The Court concluded (at paras 112-13):

Promoting local industry may be a constitutionally permissible purpose in some circumstances but not when it is implemented by tariff-like measures on goods produced outside the province. Most grant programs designed to promote local industry are too unlike a tariff to run afoul of s 121. However, the Mark-up schemes in this case, which impose additional costs on beer produced outside the province for the primary purpose of promoting the local beer industry, do violate s 121.

Finally, the [impugned policies] do not constitute, or form part of, a regulatory scheme whose primary purpose is to regulate some aspect of access to alcohol (unlike Comeau). The purpose is to create revenue in a way that promotes the competitive position of local producers in the local craft beer market

C. LIMITS IMPOSED BY SECTION 91(2) ON PROVINCIAL AUTHORITY TO ESTABLISH TRADE BARRIERS

Until the reinterpretation of s 121 undertaken in Comeau, the major constraint on the ability of provinces to enact trade barriers was the exclusive federal power to regulate trade and commerce under s 91(2). In a series of cases, of which two are excerpted below, the Supreme Court of Canada reviewed provincially enacted schemes regulating the marketing of products that, at some point, moved into interprovincial or international trade. In each case, it was asserted by those challenging the legislation that the province was impermissibly attempting to regulate international or interprovincial trade.

Carnation Company Limited v Quebec Agricultural Marketing Board

[1968] SCR 238, 1968 CanLII 82 (footnotes omitted)

MARTLAND J (Fauteux, Abbott, Judson, Ritchie, Hall, and Spence JJ concurring):

This is an appeal from the Court of Queen's Bench for the Province of Quebec (Appeal Side), which confirmed the judgment given in the Superior Court, upholding the validity of three decisions of the Quebec Agricultural Marketing Board, herein-after referred to as "the Marketing Board." The question in issue before this Court is as to whether, in making these orders, the Marketing Board had infringed on the exclusive legislative powers of Parliament under s. 91(2) of the British North America Act to regulate trade and commerce. ...

The Marketing Board was created as a corporation by the provisions of the Quebec Agricultural Marketing Act, 4-5 Eliz. II, 1955-56 (Que.), c. 37. It was empowered, inter alia, to approve joint marketing plans, and to arbitrate any dispute arising in the course of carrying out a joint marketing plan. The Act provided that ten or more producers of agricultural products in any territory in Quebec could apply to the Marketing Board for approval of a joint plan for the marketing of one or more classes of farm products in such territory, if such plan was supported by a vote of at least 75 per cent in number and value of all producers concerned.

On July 25, 1957, the Marketing Board approved the Quebec Carnation Company Milk Producers' Plan. The administration of the Plan was entrusted to the Quebec Carnation Company Milk Producers' Board. The Plan bound all bona fide milk producers shipping milk and dairy products to any of the plants of the appellant in Quebec. The Producers' Board had power to negotiate with the buyer (the appellant) for the marketing and sale to it of milk and dairy products from the farms of producers bound by the Plan. The Plan provided for a board of arbitration, which might be the Marketing Board, to decide conflicts in the event of a failure to agree with the appellant in the negotiation or execution of a convention.

Agreement was not reached as to the purchase price of milk to be purchased by the appellant from the producers, pursuant to the Plan. The matter was arbitrated by the Marketing Board which ... determined a price of $3.07 per hundred pounds. ... [A]fter a further arbitration, the Marketing Board decided on a price of $2.78 per hundred pounds.

It is these three orders of the Marketing Board, which approved the Plan, and which determined the price to be paid by the appellant for milk purchased from producers subject to the Plan, which are the subject of the appellant's attack.

The appellant was incorporated under the Canadian Companies Act [later renamed Canada Corporations Act, 1964-65, c 52, s 2], and has its head office in Toronto. It operates, in Quebec, an evaporated milk plant at Sherbrooke and a receiving station at Waterloo.

During the period concerned, it purchased raw milk from approximately 2,000 farmers, situated mostly in the Eastern Townships. At the Sherbrooke plant it processes raw milk into evaporated milk. The major part of such production is shipped and sold outside Quebec. Milk received at the Waterloo receiving station ... was either sent to the Sherbrooke plant, for processing, or ... sent to appellant's plant at Alexandria, Ontario

The position taken by the appellant is that the three orders of the Marketing Board are invalid because they enable it to set a price to be paid by the appellant for a product the major portion of which, after processing, will be used by it for export out of Quebec. This, it is contended, constitutes the regulation of trade and commerce within the meaning of s. 91(2) of the British North America Act, a field reserved to the Parliament of Canada.

The appellant, in support of this submission, relies upon the reasons of four of the Judges of this Court in the Reference Respecting The Farm Products Marketing Act, R.S.O. 1950, Chapter 131, As Amended [1957] SCR 198, 1957 CanLII 1], which case is hereinafter referred to as "the Ontario Reference."

• • •

Four of the members of the Court, Kerwin C.J., Rand, J., Locke J. and Nolan J., were of the view that a transaction might take place within a province and yet not constitute an "intra-provincial" transaction which would be subject to provincial control.

• • •

Counsel for the respondent points out that, as a result of the reference, there was no majority opinion as to what transactions, completed within a province, constituted interprovincial trade, and contends that the views expressed by the four Judges were not in harmony with earlier decisions of this Court and of the Privy Council.

• • •

The validity of provincial legislation governing the marketing of agricultural products was before this Court in Lawson v. Interior Tree Fruit & Vegetable Committee of Direction, [1931] SCR 357, 1930 CanLII 91], which concerned the Produce Marketing Act of British Columbia, 1926-27 (B.C.), c. 54. In holding that Act to be ultra vires of the Legislature of British Columbia, Duff J. (as he then was), said, at p. 364:

Coming now to the first ground of attack, namely, that the statute constitutes an attempt to regulate trade within the meaning of s. 91(2). To repeat the general language of s. 10(1), the functions of the Committee are for the purpose of controlling and regulating the marketing of any product within its authority, and for that purpose the Committee is empowered to determine whether or not and at what time and in what quantity, and from and to what places, and at what price and on what terms the product may be marketed and delivered.

As I have said, the respondent committee has attempted ... to regulate the marketing of products into parts of Canada outside British Columbia. It claims the right under the statute to control (as in fact it does) the sale of such products for shipment into the prairie provinces as well as the shipment of them into those provinces for sale or storage. The moment his product reaches a state in which it becomes a possible article of commerce, the shipper is (under the committee's interpretation of its powers), subject to the committee's dictation as to the quantity of it which he may dispose of, as to the places from which, and the places to which he may ship, as to the route of transport, as to the price, as to all the terms of sale ... I ought to refer also to the provision of the statute which prohibits anybody becoming a licensed shipper who has not, for six months immediately preceding his application for a licence, been a resident of the province, unless he is the registered owner of the land on which he carries on business as shipper. In a statute which deals with trade that is largely inter-provincial, this is a significant feature. It is an attempt to control the manner in which traders in other provinces, who send their agents into British Columbia ... , shall carry out their inter-provincial transactions. I am unable to convince myself that these matters are all, or chiefly, matters of merely British Columbia concern, in the sense that they are not also directly and substantially the concern of the other provinces, which constitute in fact the most extensive market for these products. In dictating the routes of shipment, the places to which shipment is to be made, the quantities allotted to each terminus ad quem, the committee does, altogether apart from dictating the terms of contracts, exercise a large measure of direct and immediate control over the movement of trade in these commodities between British Columbia and the other provinces.

In 1938, the Privy Council dealt with the validity of a British Columbia statute, The Natural Products Marketing (British Columbia) Act, 1936, in Shannon v. Lower Mainland Dairy Products Board [1938] CanLII 250, [1938] AC 708]. This Act enabled the Lieutenant-Governor in Council to set up a central British Columbia Marketing Board, to establish or approve schemes for the control and regulation within the Province of the transportation, packing, storage and marketing of any natural products, to constitute Marketing Boards to administer such schemes, and to vest in those Boards any powers considered necessary or advisable to exercise those functions.

It was held that this statute was, in pith and substance, an Act to regulate particular businesses, entirely within the Province, and was intra vires of the Provincial Legislature under s. 92(13) of the British North America Act. In dealing with the contention that this Act encroached upon s. 91(2) of the British North America Act, Lord Atkin said, at p. 718:

It is sufficient to say upon this point that it is apparent that the legislation in question is confined to regulating transactions that take place wholly within the Province, and are therefore within the sovereign powers granted to the Legislature in that respect by s. 92. Their Lordships do not accept the view that natural products as defined in the Act are confined to natural products produced in British Columbia. There is no such restriction in the Act, and the limited construction would probably cause difficulty if it were sought at some future time to co-operate with a valid Dominion scheme. But the Act is clearly confined to dealings with such products as are situate within the Province. ...

It is now necessary to consider, in the light of these decisions, the validity of the three orders which are under attack in the present case. The first order, which created the Quebec Carnation Company Milk Producers' Board and empowered it to negotiate, on behalf of the milk producers, for the sale of their products to the appellant, is somewhat analogous to the creation of a collective bargaining agency in the field of labour relations. The purpose of the order was to regulate, on behalf of a particular group of Quebec producers, their trade with the appellant for the sale to it, in Quebec, of their milk. Its object was to improve their bargaining position.

The Producers' Board then undertook, with the appellant, negotiations for the sale to it of that milk. The order provided a machinery whereby the price of milk could be determined by arbitration if agreement could not be reached. In this respect it differs from most provincial legislation governing labour disputes, but there would seem to be no doubt that provincial labour legislation incorporating compulsory arbitration of disputes would be constitutional, unless objectionable on some other ground.

The two subsequent orders of the Marketing Board, under attack, contained the decisions which it reached in determining the proper price to be paid to the producers for milk purchased by the appellant.

Are these orders invalid because the milk purchased by the appellant was processed by it and, as to a major portion of its product, exported from the province? Because of that fact, do they constitute an attempt to regulate trade in matters of interprovincial concern?

That the price determined by the orders may have a bearing upon the appellant's export trade is unquestionable. It affects the cost of doing business. But so, also, do labour costs affect the cost of doing business of any company which may be engaged in export trade and yet there would seem to be little doubt as to the power of a province to regulate wage rates payable within a province, save as to an undertaking falling within the exceptions listed in s. 92(10) of the British North America Act. It is not the possibility that these orders might "affect" the appellant's interprovincial trade which should determine their validity, but, rather, whether they were made "in relation to" the regulation of trade and commerce ...

Thus, as Kerwin C.J., said in the Ontario Reference, in the passage previously quoted: "Once a statute aims at 'regulation of trade in matters of inter-provincial concern' ... it is beyond the competence of a Provincial Legislature."

I am not prepared to agree that, in determining that aim, the fact that these orders may have some impact upon the appellant's interprovincial trade necessarily means that they constitute a regulation of trade and commerce within s. 91(2) and thus renders them invalid. The fact of such impact is a matter which may be relevant in determining their true aim and purpose, but it is not conclusive.

In the Lawson case, where the provincial legislation was found to be unconstitutional, the Committee created by the statute was enabled and purported to exercise a large measure of direct and immediate control over the movement of trade in commodities between a province and other provinces. That is not this case.

On the other hand, in the Shannon case the regulatory statute was upheld, as it was confined to the regulation of transactions taking place wholly within the province. It was held that s. 91(2) was not applicable to the regulation for legitimate provincial purposes of particular trades or businesses confined to the province.

The view of the four Judges in the Ontario Reference was that the fact that a transaction took place wholly within a province did not necessarily mean that it was thereby subject solely to provincial control. The regulation of some such transactions relating to products destined for interprovincial trade could constitute a regulation of interprovincial trade and be beyond provincial control.

While I agree with the view of the four Judges in the Ontario Reference that a trade transaction, completed in a province, is not necessarily, by that fact alone, subject only to provincial control, I also hold the view that the fact that such a transaction incidentally has some effect upon a company engaged in interprovincial trade does not necessarily prevent its being subject to such control.

I agree with the view of Abbott J., in the Ontario Reference, that each transaction and each regulation must be examined in relation to its own facts. In the present case, the orders under question were not, in my opinion, directed at the regulation of interprovincial trade. They did not purport directly to control or to restrict such trade. There was no evidence that, in fact, they did control or restrict it. The most that can be said of them is that they had some effect upon the cost of doing business in Quebec of a company engaged in interprovincial trade, and that, by itself, is not sufficient to make them invalid.

Appeal dismissed.

NOTE: ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR MANITOBA V MANITOBA EGG AND POULTRY ASSOCIATION

Attorney-General for Manitoba v Manitoba Egg and Poultry Association, [1971] SCR 689, 1971 CanLII 135, commonly referred to as the Manitoba Egg Reference, was one of the battles fought in what became known as the interprovincial “chicken and egg war.” The following summary is taken from Paul Weiler:

[The “chicken and egg war” was] primarily an engagement fought by the bordering provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Ontario farmers produced an abundance of cheap eggs and Quebec farmers an abundance of cheap chickens. The surplus producers were naturally interested in the market of the consumers in the neighbouring jurisdiction. Equally naturally, the somewhat less efficient producers of each product were not so enamoured of competition within their own bailiwick. When they went to their own government for protection, the response was legislation facilitating the creation of marketing schemes. These provided for the controlled marketing, at fixed prices, of all the chickens sold in Ontario and all the eggs in Quebec, whatever the source. Unfortunately, it appears that the marketing boards became a little greedy and went even further, giving undue preference in marketing to those products coming from within the province. This had particularly adverse effects on farmers in other provinces such as Manitoba, which, as a consistent producer of agricultural surpluses, was the classic innocent and injured bystander in the “chicken and egg war.” ...

At this very time, the federal government was attempting to shepherd through Parliament a new Farm Products Marketing Act which would endeavour to solve these problems through a complicated process of inter-administrative delegation. Though there appeared to be substantial consensus in favour of the general scheme of the Bill by both federal and provincial ministers of agriculture, it was being delayed by opposition members who largely represented western farming interests. In the interim, the federal government had carefully resisted many calls to refer the “political” dispute to the Supreme Court of Canada for immediate “legal” resolution.

Unfortunately, Manitoba, which was understandably loath to wait for a political decision on the larger questions, devised a scheme for circumventing the reluctance of the federal Justice Minister. This provincial government manufactured a controversy by initiating a carbon copy of the Quebec scheme, a proposed Order-in-Council which provided for Manitoba control of the marketing of extraprovincial eggs in Manitoba. It then referred these regulations to the Manitoba Court of Appeal for a decision about their constitutionality, under its own provincial reference legislation. When the Manitoba Court of Appeal decided against the constitutional validity of the scheme, the Manitoba government was entitled as of right to appeal this “loss” to the Supreme Court of Canada. In this way, it could achieve a binding decision as to all such schemes which would be authoritative in all the provinces.

See Paul C Weiler, In the Last Resort (Toronto: Carswell, 1974) at 156–57.

The scheme at issue in the reference applied to all eggs marketed within the province of Manitoba, whether or not produced within the province. Complete control over the marketing of eggs in Manitoba was vested in the Manitoba Egg Producers’ Marketing Board, the members of which were to be elected by Manitoba producers. In the main judgment in the case, written by Martland J (Fauteux CJ, Abbott, Judson, Ritchie, and Spence JJ concurring), the marketing board’s authority was described as follows (at 700; footnotes omitted):

It is only through the Board, as selling agent, that any eggs may be sold or offered for sale. It has the authority, as already noted, to impose marketing quotas and to prohibit the offering for sale of a particular regulated product to ensure the orderly marketing of the regulated product. No eggs can be sold or offered for sale unless graded, packed and marked by a grading or packing station under contract with the Board. All eggs must be offered for sale to distributors, under contract with the Board, at prices set, from time to time, by the Board.

Justice Martland then turned to the main issue on appeal (at 701-3):

The issue which has to be considered in this appeal is as to whether the Plan is ultra vires the Manitoba Legislature because it trespasses upon the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada to legislate on the matter of the regulation of trade and commerce conferred by s. 91(2) of the British North America Act.

When the Privy Council first addressed itself to the meaning of that provision it was stated that it included "regulation of trade in matters of inter-provincial concern" (Citizens Insurance Company of Canada v. Parsons [(1881), 4 SCR 215, 7 App Cas 96 at 113 (UKJCPC)]. That proposition has not since been challenged. However, the case went on to hold that the provision did not include the regulation of the contracts of a particular business or trade in a single province.

This limitation on the federal power was reiterated in subsequent decisions of the Privy Council

In [Shannon v Lower Mainland Dairy Products Board, 1938 CanLII 250, [1938] AC 708] the Natural Products Marketing (British Columbia) Act, 1936 was held to be intra vires the provincial Legislature because it was confined to dealings with such products as were situate within the province, even though not necessarily produced there. The basis of this decision was that "The pith and substance of this Act is that it is an Act to regulate particular businesses entirely within the Province. ..." (at p. 720).

Similarly, this Court upheld, in Home Oil Distributors Limited v. Attorney-General of British Columbia [(1940) SCR 444, 1940 CanLII 46], provincial legislation authorizing the fixing of wholesale or retail prices for coal or petroleum products sold in British Columbia for use in that province. This judgment was based upon the decision in the Shannon case.

The earlier authorities on the matter of provincial marketing regulation were ... reviewed in the judgment of this Court in Carnation Company Limited v. The Quebec Agricultural Marketing Board [(1968) SCR 238, 1968 CanLII 82]. ...

Our conclusion was that each transaction and regulation had to be examined in relation to its own facts, and that, in determining the validity of the regulatory legislation in issue in that appeal, the issue was not as to whether it might affect the inter-provincial trade of the appellant company, but whether it was made in relation to the regulation of inter-provincial trade and commerce. ...

It is my opinion that the Plan now in issue not only affects interprovincial trade in eggs, but that it aims at the regulation of such trade. It is an essential part of this scheme, the purpose of which is to obtain for Manitoba producers the most advantageous marketing conditions for eggs, specifically to control and regulate the sale in Manitoba of imported eggs. It is designed to restrict or limit the free flow of trade between provinces as such. Because of that, it constitutes an invasion of the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada over the matter of the regulation of trade and commerce.

Justice Laskin (Hall J concurring) expressed concern about answering the reference question in the abstract. There was "no factual underpinning for the issues" (at 704) that were raised by the reference, he complained. Nevertheless, Laskin J proceeded to answer the reference question, holding the proposed scheme to be beyond provincial authority. He first distinguished the earlier holdings of the Court in Carnation, Shannon, and Home Oil on the basis that, unlike the legislation in these earlier cases, the scheme at issue in Manitoba Egg was directed at goods coming from outside the province (at 715-18):

Although the emphasis is on control of the Manitoba producers and distributors in order (as stated in the proposed measures) "to obtain for producers the most advantageous marketing conditions" and "to avoid overproduction," the scheme brings into its grasp "persons" as well as producers, that is, those outside the province who are either producers or distributors seeking to enter the Manitoba market, or those inside the province who are not themselves producers but who bring in out-of-province eggs for disposition in Manitoba. This view is reinforced by the provision for indicating the origin of eggs, including eggs other than those produced in Manitoba.

There may be a variety of reasons which impel a province to enact regulatory legislation for the marketing of various products. For example, it may wish to secure the health of the inhabitants by establishing quality standards; it may wish to protect consumers against exorbitant prices; it may wish to equalize the bargaining or competitive position of producers or distributors or retailers, or all three classes; it may wish to ensure an adequate supply of certain products. These objects may not all nor always be realizable through legislation which fastens on the regulated product as being within the province. That is no longer, if it ever was, the test of validity. Just as the province may not, as a general rule, prohibit an owner of goods from sending them outside the province, so it may not be able to subject goods to a regulatory scheme upon their entry into the province. This is not to say that goods that have come into a province may not, thereafter, be subject to the same controls in, for example, retail distribution to consumers as apply to similar goods produced in the province.

Assuming such controls to be open to a province, the scheme before this Court is not so limited. It embraces products which are in the current of interprovincial trade and, as noted at the beginning of these reasons, it embraces them in whatever degree they seek to enter the provincial market. It begs the question to say that out-of-province producers who come in voluntarily (certainly they cannot be compelled by Manitoba) must not expect to be treated differently from local producers. I do not reach the question of discriminatory standards applied to out-of-province producers or distributors (that is, the question of a possibly illegal administration of the scheme as bearing on its validity) because I am of opinion that the scheme is on its face an invasion of federal power in relation to s. 91(2).

There are several grounds upon which I base this conclusion. The proposed scheme has as a direct object the regulation of the importation of eggs, and it is not saved by the fact that the local market is under the same regime. Anglin J. said in Gold Seal Ltd. v. Dominion Express Co [(1921), 62 SCR 424 at 465, 1921 CanLII 25] that "It is common ground that the prohibition of importation is beyond the legislative jurisdiction of the province." Conversely, the general limitation upon provincial authority to exercise of its powers within or in the province precludes it from intercepting either goods moving into the province or goods moving out, subject to possible exceptions, as in the case of danger to life or health. Again, the Manitoba scheme cannot be considered in isolation from similar schemes in other provinces; and to permit each province to seek its own advantage, so to speak, through a figurative sealing of its borders to entry of goods from others would be to deny one of the objects of Confederation, evidenced by the catalogue of federal powers and by s. 121, namely, to form an economic unit of the whole of Canada . . . The existence of egg marketing schemes in more than one province, with objectives similar to the proposed Manitoba scheme, makes it clear that interprovincial trade in eggs is being struck at by the provincial barriers to their movement into various provincial markets. If it be thought necessary or desirable to arrest such movement at any provincial border then the aid of the Parliament of Canada must be sought, as was done through Part V of the Canada Temperance Act, RSC 1952, c. 30, in respect of provincial regulation of the sale of intoxicating liquor.

I do not find it necessary in this case to invoke s. 121, and hence say nothing about its applicability to the marketing scheme under review.

As a reference proceeding, the Manitoba Egg Reference allowed for certain strategic choices by the Manitoba cabinet that heavily influenced the outcome. Carissima Mathen has observed:

Manitoba, plainly, did not wish the putative scheme to be upheld. After all, it had drawn up the Order-in-Council for the sole purpose of showing its constitutional defect[. It] carefully avoided putting before the Court any broader context in which provinces enacting such schemes might be responding to negative circumstances elsewhere. The reference thus impeded those provinces with an interest in preserving such boards—namely Quebec and Ontario—from highlighting additional economic facts that might have explained their protectionism.

See Carissima Mathen, Courts Without Cases: The Law and Politics of Advisory Opinions (Oxford: Hart, 2019) at 96–98. The reference function is discussed in more detail in Chapter 13, The Role of the Judiciary, Section VII.

Paul Weiler questioned whether it was appropriate for the Court to respond to the Manitoba Egg Reference at all:

There was no concrete focus around which the reasoning of the Court could be organized, nor was the factual economic background to the statute depicted. The Manitoba government conspicuously omitted to set out in the Reference the relevant economic background which might well have supported the reasonability of provincial action in the area. Ontario and Quebec, which were vitally interested in sustaining this kind of legislation, did not have an opportunity to present this factual support. Indeed, the questions which the Manitoba government posed to the Court did not focus on what appears to have been the real character of the dispute—the discriminatory application of provincial marketing quotas against out-of-province producers—and instead required the Court to make a blanket decision about the legality of any such marketing scheme, no matter how favourably it might be applied to extra-provincial products. In my opinion, the most sensible response would have been a forthright refusal to answer the questions on the grounds that the dispute was not appropriate for judicial resolution. One senses that Mr. Justice Laskin, who was especially critical of the abstract character of the Reference, was drawn in this direction, but eventually the legal mystique surrounding issues of federalism overcame his reluctance. The majority opinion proceeded blithely ahead, without any apparent concern for the complex and inter-related political or economic interests involved in the dispute, and the Court gave Manitoba the broad legal weapon it was hoping for.

See Paul Weiler, “The Supreme Court of Canada and Canadian Federalism” in Jacob S Ziegel, ed, Law and Social Change (Toronto: Carswell, 1973) at 41–42.

According to Weiler, this resulted in several inadequacies in the Court’s reasoning including the lack of any real distinction between the provincial schemes at issue in Carnation and Manitoba Egg (at 46):

In the final analysis, the only difference is that in Carnation the wholesale marketing and prices of Quebec milk are controlled by Quebec law—whether it is destined for inside or outside Quebec—while in the Manitoba Egg case, all eggs sold in Manitoba are to be marketed and priced under Manitoba controls, whether they come from within or without Manitoba. Yet Martland J decided that, “on its own facts,” the Manitoba legislation is in relation to trade and commerce, as well as affecting it, and thus unconstitutional. As to the Carnation scheme, again “on its own facts” he said it merely had some effect on inter-provincial trade, and was valid. If there is a difference, which is relevant to the federal division of legislative power, it is not apparent to me, and certainly not adverted to on the face of the opinion.

Weiler went on to say (at 47):

The functional problem which the Court is required to face in the case is the degree of latitude which a province should be allowed in subjecting the business sector of our society to regulation within its borders. As a matter of plain, economic facts, the inter-dependent nature of business activity in this country is such that almost all provincial regulations will have ramifications on citizens and enterprises outside the country, whether or not the legal rule technically applies only to purely intra-provincial trade or transactions. Moreover, the citizens of these provinces, who are so affected by these regulatory decisions, have no real say in the election of the representative governments which make them. Hence the arguments which can be made for judicial laissez-faire with respect to democratically-elected parliaments do not have the same weight as in many of the other constitutional areas decided by the Court.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Do you agree with Weiler's argument that the economic consequences of the Manitoba and Quebec schemes were similar? Are the two cases distinguishable? What do you think Weiler means when he refers to "the legal mystique surrounding issues of federalism"?

2. Manitoba Egg was followed in Burns Foods Ltd v Attorney General for Manitoba, [1975] 1 SCR 494, 1973 CanLII 194, which involved a challenge to a Manitoba hog marketing scheme that required that all hogs slaughtered in the province by processors be purchased from the Hog Producers' Marketing Board. The scheme applied to hogs brought from other provinces as well as hogs produced in the province. There was no power to limit the entry of out-of-province hogs or impose quotas, only a requirement that out-of-province hogs be treated the same way as in-province hogs. The Supreme Court concluded (Ritchie J dissenting) that because the legislation had the effect of prohibiting processors from purchasing hogs from producers in another province except through the agency of the board, it was ultra vires in substance as an attempt to regulate the interprovincial trade in hogs.

Pigeon J (Fauteux CJ, Abbott, Martland, Judson, and Spence JJ concurring) stated at 505-6:

It was also said that the pith and substance is not to erect any barrier against the free flow of trade but to stabilize the price of hogs in Manitoba. The difficulty is that such regulation by subjecting the price of "imports" to the same regulations as local sales is, of itself, a regulation of the interprovincial trade. The fact that this is presently being done without the features of discrimination present in the Egg case ... cannot make a real difference, not only because discrimination could at any time be established at the discretion of the Board, but also because what is sought to be regulated in all its essential aspects is the trade in hogs between the Packers in Manitoba and hog producers in any other province.

The case discussed in the following note involved the constitutionality of a federal–provincial egg marketing scheme. The case, Reference re Agricultural Products Marketing, is noteworthy for several reasons: first, it seems to indicate a greater degree of judicial deference when reviewing joint federal–provincial action; second, Pigeon J emphasizes that the "production" stage is prima facie provincial jurisdiction; and, third, there is discussion in Laskin CJ's reasons of the "common market" clause in s 121 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

NOTE: REFERENCE RE AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS MARKETING

Reference re Agricultural Products Marketing, [1978] 2 SCR 1198, 1978 CanLII 10 originated in a reference by the lieutenant governor of Ontario to that province's Court of Appeal of a series of questions concerning the validity of certain provisions of the Agricultural Products Marketing Act, RSC 1970, c A-7; the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act, SC 1970-71-72, c 65; and the Farm Products Marketing Act, RSO 1970, c 162, and of the orders in council and regulations passed pursuant to these statutes. This legislative package constituted a solution worked out, through federal–provincial cooperation, to the problems of regulating the marketing of agricultural products that gave rise to Manitoba Egg.

This legislation and a companion agreement (entered into by the federal and ten provincial ministers of agriculture, together with the federal and provincial marketing boards) established a comprehensive program for regulating the marketing of eggs in Canada. The program provided for sharing of the interprovincial and export market by allocating quotas to each province and to each egg producer. The Canadian Egg Marketing Agency (CEMA) administered the plan, with authority to buy and dispose of any surplus production, to impose levies on producers so as to finance its operations, and to authorize local boards to collect the levies on its behalf. Under provincial regulations, the Ontario board set quotas on eggs to be marketed intraprovincially that were identical to the interprovincial and export quotas established under the national program. Ontario egg producers challenged quotas set by the Ontario Farm Products Marketing Board, arguing that provincial quotas could apply only to goods sold within the province, and thus these quotas were beyond provincial competence.

A number of other constitutional issues were raised, including the validity of CEMA's surplus disposal program; the authority of Parliament to provide for levies in respect of intraprovincial marketing; and the validity, in the light of s 121 of the British North America Act, 1867 (now the Constitution Act, 1867), of a marketing scheme based on provincial boundaries.

The majority judgment was delivered by Pigeon J (Martland, Ritchie, Beetz, and de Grandpré JJ concurring). He began his analysis by establishing that control of production is prima facie a matter falling within provincial jurisdiction (at 1293-94):

In my view, the control of production, whether agricultural or industrial, is prima facie a local matter, a matter of provincial jurisdiction. Egg farms are local undertakings subject to provincial jurisdiction under s. 92(10) of the B.N.A. Act, unless they are considered as within the scope of "agriculture" in which case, by virtue of s. 95, the jurisdiction is provincial subject to the overriding authority of Parliament. In my view [Carnation Company Ltd v Quebec Agricultural Marketing Board, [1968] SCR 238, 1968 CanLII 82] is conclusive in favour of provincial jurisdiction over undertakings where primary agricultural products are transformed into other food products. In that case, the major portion of the production was shipped outside the province) . . . In view of the reasons given, the conclusion could not be different even if the whole production had been going into extraprovincial trade.

Justice Pigeon recognized the difficulty of distinguishing between eggs consumed within the province and those destined for out-of-province trade—"any workable control scheme has to be effective with respect to all eggs irrespective of intended disposition" (at 1295). He also acknowledged that, as was held in Manitoba Egg, provincial authority cannot extend to the control of extraprovincial trade. However, according to Pigeon J (at 1296-97), "marketing" does not extend to production and so provincial control of production is prima facie valid. In the instant case, the provincial regulation is not aimed at controlling the extraprovincial trade. In so far as it affects this trade, it is only complementary to the regulations established under federal authority. In my view this is perfectly legitimate, otherwise it would mean that our Constitution makes it impossible by federal–provincial cooperative action to arrive at any practical scheme for the orderly and efficient production and marketing of a commodity which all governments concerned agree requires regulation in both intraprovincial and extraprovincial trade. As early as 1912, it was asserted by the Privy Council that "whatever belongs to self-government in Canada belongs either to the Dominion or to the provinces" [References Case, 1912

CanLII 407, [1912] AC 571 at 584 (UKJCPC)]. I do not overlook the admonition in [AG BC v A-G Can; Reference re Natural Products Marketing Act, 1937 CanLII 364, [1937] AC 377 at 389 (UKJCPC)], that the legislation has to be carefully framed but, when after 40 years a sincere cooperative effort has been accomplished, it would really be unfortunate if this was all brought to nought. While I adhere to the view that provinces may not make use of their control over local undertakings to affect extraprovincial marketing, this does not, in my view prevent the use of provincial control to complement federal regulation of extraprovincial trade.

Justice Laskin (Judson, Spence, and Dickson JJ concurring) delivered a separate judgment addressing the claim that the scheme offended s 121 of the British North America Act, 1867. The argument was that the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency, by establishing a fixed quota system for the production of eggs within each province, "effectively prevents the establishment of a single economic unit in Canada with absolute freedom of trade between its constituent parts, which was one of the main purposes of confederation and which is guaranteed by s 121 of the Constitution." Justice Laskin admitted (at 1268) that s 121 applied to federal law as it did to provincial law, but that its application may be different according to whether it is provincial or federal legislation that is involved because what may amount to a tariff or customs duty under a provincial regulatory statute may not have that character at all under a federal regulatory statute. ... A federal regulatory statute which does not directly impose a customs charge but through a price fixing scheme, designed to stabilize the marketing of products in intraprovincial trade, seeks through quotas, paying due regard to provincial production experience, to establish orderly marketing in such trade cannot, in my opinion, be in violation of s. 121. ...

... I find nothing in the marketing scheme here that, as a trade regulation, is in its essence and purpose related to a provincial boundary. To hold otherwise would mean that a federal marketing statute, referable to intraprovincial trade, could not validly take into account patterns of production in the various Provinces in attempting to establish an equitable basis for the flow of trade. I find here no design of punitive regulation directed against or in favour of any Province.

Patrick Monahan argues that the Court, in this case, did not engage in any sensitive balancing of the issues at stake:

It would not have been difficult to construct some functional counterargument in favour of the provincial quotas. For instance, it could have been suggested that it was impossible to identify, at the point of production, whether the goods were eventually to be sold locally or interprovincially. Any requirement that separate regimes be established for local as opposed to interprovincial producers would have been unworkable. But Pigeon J did not rely on any such limited, functional argument. Instead, he advanced the sweeping generalization that a province had control over all "production" of eggs. The destination of the eggs was irrelevant. One did not have to inquire whether most or even all of a producer's eggs would eventually leave the province. The only relevant issue was that the province had enacted "production" quotas rather than "marketing" quotas; "marketing does not include production and, therefore, provincial control of production is prima facie valid."

See Patrick Monahan, Politics and the Constitution: The Charter, Federalism and the Supreme Court of Canada (Toronto: Carswell, 1987) at 207-8.

NOTE: US DORMANT COMMERCE CLAUSE DOCTRINE

Like all federal legislative powers in the US, the power of the Congress to regulate interstate commerce is concurrent, not exclusive. Nevertheless, under what is known as the "Dormant Commerce Clause" doctrine, a state law has been held to be inconsistent with the Commerce Clause (US Const art I, § 8, cl 3), and therefore unconstitutional, if it "clearly discriminates against interstate commerce, ... unless the discrimination is demonstrably justified by a valid factor unrelated to economic protectionism" (Wyoming v Oklahoma, 502 US 437 at 454-55, 112 S Ct 789 (1991)); or if it imposes "an undue burden on interstate commerce," in the sense that the burden is disproportionate to a legitimate interest of the state (Northwest Central Pipeline Corp v State Corp Comm'n of Kansas, 489 US 493 at 625, 109 S Ct 1262 (1989)). (Such discrimination or burdens by a state law would be valid, however, if authorized by legislation enacted by Congress under the Commerce Clause.)

Notice the role that proportionality analysis plays under the US doctrine, in contrast to Canadian doctrine under s 91(2) and s 121. The upshot of Manitoba Egg and Comeau appears to be that the provincial regulation of transactions within the province will not run afoul of s 91(2) or s 121 so long as its purpose is not to interfere with interprovincial trade, even if there is an impact on interprovincial trade. By contrast, under the Dormant Commerce Clause doctrine, where a state law has the effect of burdening interstate commerce, it is not enough that the state's interest be legitimate; the impact on interstate commerce must, in addition, not be disproportionate to that interest.

D. FREE MOVEMENT OF PEOPLE

So far, we have examined only one aspect of the Canadian common market—the internal free movement of goods. Another characteristic of a common market is the internal free movement of people. What constraints does the Canadian constitution impose on the ability of provinces (or the federal government) to restrict the interprovincial mobility of people?

Within the Constitution Act, 1867, there is no equivalent to s 121 prohibiting restrictions on the "admission" of people into other provinces. In Chapter 15, Antecedents of the Charter, we will examine a handful of JCPC decisions from the turn of the 20th century in which the exclusive federal legislative authority with respect to "naturalization" (s 91(25)) served as a barrier against provincially enacted race-based restrictions on the mobility of citizens. However, for provisions dealing directly with the free movement of people within Canada, one must look to the Constitution Act, 1982: specifically, s 6(2) of the Charter enacts a guarantee of interprovincial mobility for citizens and permanent residents with respect to employment and residency. The leading cases interpreting s 6 are Black v Law Society of Alberta, [1989] 1 SCR 591, 1989 CanLII 132 and Canadian Egg Marketing Agency v Richardson, [1998] 3 SCR 157, 1997 CanLII 17020.

Black v Law Society of Alberta

[1989] 1 SCR 591, 1989 CanLII 132

[This case involved a challenge to a rule of the Law Society of Alberta prohibiting partnerships between resident and non-resident lawyers, a rule enacted to prevent the Toronto-based law firm McCarthy and McCarthy from opening a branch office in Calgary. The Supreme Court concluded that the rule violated s 6(2)(b) of the Charter and could not be upheld as a reasonable limit under s 1 of the Charter. Section 6(2)(b) guarantees a citizen or permanent resident the right to pursue the gaining of a livelihood in any province. Section 6(3) subjects these rights to laws or practices of general application in force in a province other than those that discriminate among persons primarily on the basis of province of present or previous residence. Although much of the discussion in the majority reasons, written by LaForest J, is about individual rights, note the discussion of economic integration as a goal of federalism at the time of Confederation and the links made between s 6 of the Charter and the constitutional norm of economic union.]

La FOREST J (Dickson CJ and Wilson J concurring):

A discussion of the scope and effect of s. 6(2)(b) in the context of this case is enhanced by a brief review of the history of the protection of interprovincial mobility in Canada.

A dominant intention of the drafters of the British North America Act (now the Constitution Act, 1867) was to establish "a new political nationality" and, as the counterpart to national unity, the creation of a national economy: D. Creighton, British North America Act at Confederation: A Study Prepared for the Royal Commission on Dominion-Provincial Relations (1939), [Appendix 2,] at p. 40 [(Ottawa: King's Printer, 1940)]. The attainment of economic integration occupied a place of central importance in the scheme. "It was an enterprise which was consciously adopted and deliberately put into execution": Creighton, supra; see also Lawson v. Interior Tree Fruit & Vegetable Committee, [1931] S.C.R. 357, at p. 373. The creation of a central government, the trade and commerce power, s. 121 and the building of a transcontinental railway were expected to help forge this economic union. The concept of Canada as a single country comprising what one would now call a common market was basic to the Confederation arrangements

Section 121 of the Constitution Act, 1867 was one of the pillars of the Confederation scheme for achieving the economic union sought by the Fathers of Confederation. ... Rand J. in Murphy v. Canadian Pacific Railway Co., [1958] S.C.R. 626, at p. 638, commented on the scope of s. 121:

Apart from matters of purely local and private concern, this country is one economic unit; in freedom of movement its business interests are in an extra-provincial dimension, and, among other things, are deeply involved in trade and commerce between and beyond provinces.

The word "free" in the context of s. 121 was held to mean "without impediment related to the traversing of a provincial boundary."

Before the enactment of the Charter, however, there was no specific constitutional provision guaranteeing personal mobility, but it is fundamental to nationhood, and even in the early years of Confederation there is some, if limited, evidence that the courts would, in a proper case, be prepared to characterize certain rights as being fundamental to, and flowing naturally from a person's status as a Canadian citizen. In Union Colliery Company of British Columbia v. Bryden, [1899] A.C. 580, the Privy Council dealt with the validity of a British Columbia enactment that prohibited people of Chinese origin or descent from being employed in mines. The Privy Council found the provision to be ultra vires the provincial legislature and thus illegal. Lord Watson based his reasons on s. 91(25) of the British North America Act, which gives exclusive legislative authority over "naturalization and aliens" to the Parliament of Canada. "Naturalization," it was held at p. 586, includes "the power of enacting ... what shall be the rights and privileges pertaining to residents in Canada after they have been naturalized." Provincial interference with a resident's right to live and work in the province was thus not permitted; see also Cunningham v. Homma, [1903] A.C. 151 at p. 157.

It was left to Rand J. in Winner v. S.M.T. (Eastern) Ltd., [1951] S.C.R. 887, to spell out the full implications of the Bryden case for Canadian citizenship. Rand J. makes it clear that Canadian citizenship carries with it certain inherent rights, including some form of mobility right. The essential attributes of citizenship including the right to enter and the right to work in a province, he asserted, cannot be denied by the provincial legislatures. And he extended this right for practical purposes to other residents of Canada. He thus put it at pp. 919-20:

What this implies is that a Province cannot, by depriving a Canadian of the means of working, force him to leave it: it cannot divest him of his right or capacity to remain and to engage in work there: that capacity inhering as a constituent element of his citizenship status is beyond nullification by provincial action. The contrary view would involve the anomaly that although British Columbia could not by mere prohibition deprive a naturalized foreigner of his means of livelihood, it could do so to a native-born Canadian. He may, of course, disable himself from exercising his capacity or he may be regulated in it by valid provincial law in other aspects. But that attribute of citizenship lies outside of those civil rights committed to the province, and is analogous to the capacity of a Dominion corporation which the province cannot sterilize.

It follows, a fortiori, that a province cannot prevent a Canadian from entering it except, conceivably, in temporary circumstances, for some local reason as, for example, health. With such a prohibitory power, the country could be converted into a number of enclaves and the "union" which the original provinces sought and obtained disrupted. In a like position is a subject of a friendly foreign country; for practical purposes he enjoys all the rights of the citizen.

Such, then, is the national status embodying certain inherent or constitutive characteristics, of members of the Canadian public, and it can be modified, defeated or destroyed, as for instance by outlawry, only by Parliament.

During the constitutional exercise culminating in the enactment of the Charter, there was a wave of political and academic concern regarding the construction of numerous barriers to interprovincial economic activity. There was also a strong feeling that the integration of the Canadian economy, which had been only partially successful under the British North America Act, should be completed. The federal government in particular was concerned about the growing fragmentation of the Canadian economic union

These economic concerns undoubtedly played a part in the constitutional entrenchment of interprovincial mobility rights, under s. 6(2) of the Charter. But citizenship, and the rights and duties that inhere in it are relevant not only to state concerns for the proper structuring of the economy. It defines the relationship of citizens to their country and the rights that accrue to the citizen in that regard, a factor not lost on Rand J., as is evident from the passage already quoted. This approach is reflected in the language of s. 6 of the Charter, which is not expressed in terms of the structural elements of federalism, but in terms of the rights of the citizen and permanent residents of Canada. Citizenship and nationhood are correlative. Inhering in citizenship is the right to reside wherever one wishes in the country and to pursue the gaining of a livelihood without regard for provincial boundaries. Under Charter disposition, that right is expressly made applicable to citizens and permanent residents alike. Like other individual rights guaranteed by the Charter, it must be interpreted generously to achieve its purpose to secure to all Canadians and permanent residents the rights that flow from membership or permanent residency in a united country.

The purposes of the Charter's mobility rights section were revisited in the Richardson case, excerpted immediately below. Note a shift in emphasis in the Court's reasons concerning the objectives served by s 6.

Canadian Egg Marketing Agency v Richardson[1998] 3 SCR 157, 1997 CanLII 17020

[This case concerned the exclusion of egg producers in the Northwest Territories from Canada's national egg marketing scheme. The scheme was the product of interlocking federal and provincial legislation and regulations governing the production and marketing of eggs in Canada. The federal portion of the scheme was administered by the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency. Under the scheme, production and marketing quotas were allocated based on egg production levels in 1972, at which time there was no egg production in the Northwest Territories. Thus, egg producers in the Northwest Territories, like Richardson, were prohibited by law from marketing or exporting eggs interprovincially or internationally. In the course of addressing the claim that the scheme offended s 6 of the Charter, the Court addressed the larger purposes served by the mobility guarantees.]

IACOBUCCI and BASTARACHE JJ (Lamer CJ and L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, Cory, and Binnie JJ concurring):

[60] Situated in the Charter, and closely mirroring the language of international human rights treaties, it seems clear then that s. 6 responds to a concern to ensure one of the conditions for the preservation of the basic dignity of the person. The specific guarantee described in s. 6(2)(b) and s. 6(3)(a) is mobility in the gaining of a livelihood subject to those laws which do not discriminate on the basis of residence. The mobility guarantee is defined and supported by the notion of equality of treatment, and absence of discrimination on the ground normally related to mobility in the pursuit of a livelihood (i.e. residence). ... The freedom guaranteed in s. 6 embodies a concern for the dignity of the individual. Sections 6(2)(b) and 6(3)(a) advance this purpose by guaranteeing a measure of autonomy in terms of personal mobility, and by forbidding the state from undermining this mobility and autonomy through discriminatory treatment based on place of residence, past or present. The freedom to pursue a livelihood is essential to self-fulfilment as well as survival. Section 6 is meant to give effect to the basic human right, closely related to equality, that individuals should be able to participate in the economy without being subject to legislation which discriminates primarily on the basis of attributes related to mobility in pursuit of their livelihood.

[61] The terms of s. 6 suggest that this right is not violated by legislation regulating any particular type of economic activity, but rather by the effect of such legislation on the fundamental right to pursue a livelihood on an equal basis with others. Indeed, the provinces and federal government are authorized by virtue of ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 to regulate all manner of economic activity, as defined by type of activity. ... [Cooperative federal–provincial] economic legislation, and the growth of divergent regulatory regimes in the provinces, is undoubtedly authorized by the Constitution.

[62] There is, thus, a tension in the purposes and text of ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867, and s. 6 of the Charter. The former sections authorize the development of distinct legal regimes in the provinces, and define the matters, including many integral to the functioning of the economy, under their exclusive jurisdiction; the latter section, however, says that the individual has a right to pursue a livelihood throughout Canada, without discrimination "primarily on the basis of province of present or previous residence."

[63] This tension is heightened when one takes into account the judicial interpretation and legislative history of s. 121 of the Constitution Act, 1867. That section reads:

121. All Articles of the Growth, Produce, or Manufacture of any one of the Provinces shall, from and after the Union, be admitted free into each of the other Provinces.

[65] Dissatisfaction in the federal government with the scope of s. 121 and a perceived tendency in the provinces to erect interprovincial trade barriers led to a proposal for a more robust version of the section in the constitutional negotiations leading up to the 1982 amendments . . . In addition to the free movement of persons, this new version of s. 121 would also have expressly protected the mobility of specified factors of economic production which are often integrally related to the gaining of a livelihood by a person: goods, services, and capital. This proposed s. 121 did not purport to confer rights on individuals or groups; rather, it sought to ensure mobility in the pursuit of a livelihood by dramatically limiting any government's right to legislate with respect to the interprovincial mobility of certain factors of economic production. As it turned out, nine of ten provinces rejected this amendment, leaving s. 121 as it is worded today.

[The majority went on to characterize the inclusion of s 6 in the Charter as reflecting "a human rights objective," holding that "it guarantees the mobility of persons, not as a feature of the economic unity of the country, but in order to further a human rights purpose" (at para 66). The majority could not find that the primary purpose of the scheme was to "discriminate among persons primarily on the basis of province of present . . . residence" (the language of s 6). Evaluating the primary purpose of the law in this context was akin to identifying its "pith and substance." It could not be said that the dominant feature of the legislation was to discriminate against out-of-province producers. Hence, the challenge to the legislation was dismissed.]

[Justice McLachlin (Major J concurring) offered dissenting reasons. The purpose of the mobility rights guarantee, according to McLachlin J, was to enshrine]

[122] . . . the right of Canadian citizens and permanent residents to pursue a living wherever in the country they choose without undue government interference. It has two purposes, one collective, one individual: (1) to promote economic union among the provinces; and (2) to ensure to all Canadians one of the fundamental incidents of citizenship: the right to travel throughout the country, to choose a place of residence anywhere within its borders, and to pursue a livelihood, all without regard to provincial boundaries. These purposes are related. The individual right of citizens and permanent residents of Canada to reside and pursue the gaining of a living in any province is the private correlative of the collective interest in a unified economy.

[For McLachlin J, the exclusion of NWT producers from the national egg marketing scheme "is a senseless and counter-productive impediment to the right of the respondents to pursue their chosen livelihood, egg production, in the province or territory of their choice, the Northwest Territories" (at para 173). Nor could this scheme constitute a reasonable measure demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society and so be saved under s 1. Being the product of historical accident, the infringing aspects of the scheme could not be characterized as a pressing and substantial objective.]

NOTE: MOBILITY RESTRICTIONS AND THE COVID-19 PANDEMIC

In Black, excerpted above, La Forest J quoted an assertion by Rand J, in Winner v SMT (Eastern) Ltd, [1951] SCR 887, 1951 CanLII 2, that "a province cannot prevent a Canadian from entering it except, conceivably, in temporary circumstances, for some local reason as, for example, health" (at 611). During the COVID-19 pandemic, several provinces and territories in fact enacted rules restricting the entry of persons into the province. In Taylor v Newfoundland and Labrador, 2020 NLSC 125, the Supreme Court of Newfoundland and Labrador dismissed a challenge, brought on both federalism and Charter grounds, to s 28(1)(h) of the provincial Public Health Protection and Promotion Act, SNL 2018, c P-37.3 [PHPPA], which provides:

28.(1) While a declaration of a public health emergency is in effect, the Chief Medical Officer of Health may do one or more of the following for the purpose of protecting the health of the population and preventing, remedying or mitigating the effects of the public health emergency: ...

(h) make orders restricting travel to or from the province or an area within the province.

First addressing the federalism aspect of the challenge, Burrage J of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland and Labrador began by characterizing the provincial legislation. Although the legal effect of s 28(1)(h) was certainly to restrict interprovincial travel, the Court considered the pith and substance of the legislation to be governed by the legislation's purpose:

[239] On its surface, s. 28(1)(h) of the PHPPA empowers the CMOH to restrict interprovincial travel, just as in Ward [discussed in Chapter 11] the impugned regulation might be seen as a prohibition on sale. The question, however, is not whether s. 28(1)(h) restricts travel, but why does it do so?

[240] As was the case in Ward, to say that because s. 28(1)(h) restricts travel it must be pith and substance concerned with the regulation of travel, is to confuse the purpose of s. 28(1)(h) with the means to carry out that purpose. At its core, s. 28(1)(h) is directed toward the health of those in the province. The "mischief" the legislature sought to address by empowering the CMOH to restrict travel included the spread of a communicable disease. In this sense the effect of s. 28(1)(h) is felt well beyond those directly impacted by the travel restriction, such as Ms. Taylor.

[241] For the foregoing reasons, I thus conclude that the purpose of s. 28(1)(h) of the PHPPA, its pith and substance, is the protection and promotion of the health of those in Newfoundland and Labrador. At its core it is a public health measure.

The Court concluded that the measure came within the province's authority to legislate on matters of a local or private nature (s 92(16)).

On the Charter challenge, the Court concluded that the applicant's rights under s 6(2) had been infringed, but that the measure, undertaken with the goal of reducing the importation of COVID-19 into the province, was a reasonable limit on her mobility.

IV. NATURAL RESOURCES

Jurisdiction over natural resources is one of the most contentious areas of Canadian intergovernmental relations. Given the geographic distribution of resources across regions of Canada, the opposition of interests that arises, at a global level, between producing and consuming nations has played out in Canada between producing and consuming regions. These tensions have given rise to disputes over, for example, the distribution of the gains and losses resulting from external shocks, such as the oil crisis of the 1970s. More recently, the growing public consciousness of environmental issues has created additional opportunities for intergovernmental conflict over resource development, for example, where the economic benefits and environmental risks of a development activity are not distributed equally across different parts of the country.

Although the focus of this chapter is on the division of powers between the federal and provincial levels of government, an additional layer of jurisdictional complexity arises by virtue of the Aboriginal and treaty rights recognized and affirmed under s 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. As will be apparent when you read the materials in Chapter 14, Indigenous Peoples and the Constitution, s 35 has significant implications for natural resource management and development at both the provincial and the federal levels.

As originally enacted, the Constitution Act, 1867 did not contain “natural resources” as an enumerated head of legislative power. There was, to be sure, a federal power to regulate the fisheries (s 91(12)) and a provincial power to legislate in relation to the management and sale of timber and wood on public lands (s 92(5)), as well as a concurrent power of both levels of government to legislate in relation to agriculture (s 95). More generally, however, a federal or provincial law having some connection with natural resources fell to be classified as one of the enumerated heads of power, or under the residual POGG power, depending on the form and subject-matter of the legislation. Thus, for example, the provisions of the National Energy Board Act challenged in Caloil were determined to be measures incidental to a scheme for the regulation of the importation of oil, while the impugned provincial marketing board orders in Carnation were determined to be measures regulating intraprovincial contracts in agricultural products.

In 1982, a provincial “natural resources” power was added to the Constitution Act, 1867 in the form of s 92A(1), which provides that provinces have the exclusive authority to make laws in relation to the exploration, development, conservation, and management of non-renewable natural resources in the province. Even without this provision, however, it was clear that the provinces could pass such laws on the basis of their jurisdiction over property and civil rights and matters of a local or private nature (ss 92(13) or (16)).

However, s 92A also made two other, more important changes to the extent of provincial legislative authority. The first change was to provide that the provinces have the authority to “make laws in relation to the export [of natural resources] from the province to another part of Canada” (s 92A(2)). This authority is concurrent, not exclusive, and is subject to a caveat that there must be no “discrimination in prices and in supplies” exported to the rest of Canada. Nevertheless, in the absence of s 92A(2), the laws now authorized by that provision would doubtless have been found to be incursions on federal jurisdiction under s 91(2).

The second change was to authorize the provinces to levy indirect taxes on natural resources in the province and on their production (s 92A(4)). An indirect tax is a tax that is nominally levied on a person or firm within a supply chain and passed along to consumers as part of the price of the good. In the absence of this provision, the provinces were limited to direct taxation only, under the terms of s 92(3).

The CIGOL and Central Canada Potash cases excerpted below were decided before s 92A was added to the Constitution Act, 1867. As you read the cases, consider what difference, if any, s 92A would have made to their respective outcomes.

Canadian Industrial Gas and Oil Ltd v Government of Saskatchewan

MARTLAND J (Laskin CJ and Judson, Ritchie, Spence, Pigeon, and Beetz JJ concurring):

The question in issue in this appeal is as to the constitutional validity of certain statutes enacted by the Legislature of the Province of Saskatchewan and regulations enacted pursuant thereto, to which reference will be made hereafter. Their validity was challenged by the appellant, a corporation engaged in the exploration for, drilling for and production of oil and natural gas in Saskatchewan and owning freehold leases, Crown leases and royalty interests in that Province. The respondents are the Government of the Province of Saskatchewan and the Attorney General of the Province. The appellant was unsuccessful in seeking to obtain a declaration of their invalidity, both at trial and on appeal to the Court of Appeal for Saskatchewan. It appeals, with leave, to this Court from the judgment of the Court of Appeal.

The legislation was enacted following the sharp rise in the price of oil on the world market which occurred in 1973. The effect of the legislation has been summarized in the reasons of my brother Dickson, which I have had the advantage of reading. For purposes of convenience I substantially repeat that summary here:

First, production revenues from freehold lands were subjected to what was called a "mineral income tax." The tax was 100% of the difference between the price received at the well-head and the "basic well-head price," a statutory figure approximately equal to the price per barrel received by producers prior to the energy crisis. The owner's interest in oil and gas rights in producing tracts of less than 1,280 acres were exempted from tax. Deductions approved by the Minister of Mineral Resources were allowed in respect of increases in production costs and extraordinary transportation costs. Provision was made for the Minister to determine the well-head value of the oil where he was of the opinion that oil had been disposed of at less than its fair value.

Secondly, all petroleum and natural gas in all producing tracts within the Province were expropriated and subjected to what was called a "royalty surcharge." Oil and gas rights owned by one person in producing tracts not exceeding 1,280 acres were exempted. Although introduced by Regulation rather than statute, the royalty surcharge is calculated in the same manner as the mineral income tax. For all practical purposes they are the same, save one exception. The well-head value for the purposes of royalty surcharge is the higher of the price received at the well-head and the price per barrel listed in the Minister's order.

The practical consequence of the application of this legislation is that the Government of Saskatchewan will acquire the benefit of all increases in the value of oil produced in that Province above the set basic well-head price fixed by the statute and regulations, which is approximately the same as that which existed in 1973 before the increase in world prices for oil. In this connection, there is the important fact that 98 per cent of all crude oil produced in Saskatchewan is destined for export from the Province either to Eastern Canada or the United States of America.

The appellant's attack upon the legislation is made upon two grounds:

1. It is contended that both the mineral income tax and the royalty surcharge constitute indirect taxation, and are therefore beyond the power of the Province to impose, the provincial legislative powers being limited to direct taxation within the province under s.s. 92(2) of the British North America Act, 1867.
2. It is contended that the legislation relates to the regulation of interprovincial and international trade and commerce, a matter over which the federal Parliament has exclusive legislative power under s. 91(2) of the British North America Act.

[The discussion of the taxation issue has been omitted. Martland J concluded that the mineral income tax and royalty surcharge were an indirect tax and hence not within provincial jurisdiction.]

Regulation of Trade and Commerce

In considering this issue the important fact is, of course, that practically all of the oil to which the mineral income tax or the royalty surcharge becomes applicable is destined for interprovincial or international trade. Some of this oil is sold by producers at the well-head and thereafter transported from the Province by pipeline. Some of the oil is not sold at the well-head, but is produced by companies for their own purposes, and is likewise transported out of the Province by pipeline. In either case the levy becomes applicable. The producer in the first case must, if he is to avoid pecuniary loss, sell at the well-head at the well-head value established. The company which has its own oil production transported from the Province must, if it is to avoid pecuniary loss, ultimately dispose of the refined product at a price which will recoup the amount of the levy. Thus, the effect of the legislation is to set a floor price for Saskatchewan oil purchased for export by the appropriation of its potential incremental value in interprovincial and international markets, or to ensure that the incremental value is not appropriated by persons outside the Province.

The purpose of the legislation under review was accurately defined by Chief Justice Culliton in the Court of Appeal [1975 CanLII 807, 65 DLR (3d) 79 at 98 (Sask CA)]:

There is no doubt in my mind that both the mineral income tax and the royalty surcharge were imposed for one purpose, and one purpose only—to drain off substantial benefits that would have accrued to the producers due to the sudden and unprecedented price of crude oil.

The means used to achieve this end are to compel a Saskatchewan oil producer to effect the sale of the oil at a price determined by the Minister. The mineral income tax is defined as the difference between the basic well-head price and the price at which the oil is sold, but with the important proviso that if the Minister is of the opinion that the oil has been sold at less than its fair value, he can determine the price at which it should have been sold, and that price governs in determining the amount of the tax. The royalty surcharge, as provided under the Regulations requires the payment of the surcharge on oil produced on the basis of the difference between its well-head value, as established by the Minister, less the basic well-head price. In either case the Minister is empowered to determine well-head value of the oil which is produced which will govern the price at which the producer is compelled to sell the oil which he produces. In an effort to obtain for the provincial treasury the increases in the value of oil exported from Saskatchewan which began in 1973, in the form of a tax upon the production of oil in Saskatchewan, the legislation gave power to the Minister to fix the price receivable by Saskatchewan oil producers on their export sales of a commodity that has almost no local market in Saskatchewan. Provincial legislative authority does not extend to fixing the price to be charged or received in respect of the sale of goods in the export market. It involves the regulation of interprovincial trade and trenches upon s. 91(2) of the British North America Act.

This is not a case similar to Carnation Co. Ltd. v. Quebec Agricultural Marketing Board [[1968] SCR 238, 1968 CanLII 82], where the effect of the Regulations was to increase the cost of the milk purchased by Carnation in Quebec and processed there, mostly for sale outside Quebec. The legislation there indirectly affected Carnation's export trade in the sense that its costs of production were increased, but was designed to establish a method for determining the price of milk sold by Quebec milk producers, to a purchaser in Quebec, who processed it there. Here the legislation is directly aimed at the production of oil destined for export and has the effect of regulating the export price, since the producer is effectively compelled to obtain that price on the sale of his product.

For these reasons, in my opinion, the statutory provisions, and the Regulations and orders enacted and made relating to the imposition of the mineral income tax and royalty surcharge, are ultra vires of the Legislature of the Province of Saskatchewan. ...

• • •

DICKSON J (de Grandpré J concurring) dissenting:

• • •

Before considering in detail the legislation, one or two observations of a general nature are warranted. This Court is sensitive to the freedom of action which must be allowed to the Legislatures to safeguard their legitimate interests as in their wisdom they see fit. It presumes that they have acted constitutionally. The onus of rebutting that presumption is upon the appellant. Before the Court concludes that the Province has transcended its constitutional powers the evidence must be clear and unmistakable; more than conjecture or speculation is needed to underpin a finding of constitutional incompetence.

• • •

Subject to the limits imposed by the Canadian Constitution, the power of the Province to tax, control and manage its natural resources is plenary and absolute.

[Dickson J's analysis of the taxation issue has been omitted. He would have upheld the mineral income tax as a form of direct taxation within the province.]

• • •

Counsel for appellant urged the Court to strike down the legislation as an infringement of Parliament's exclusive authority respecting the regulation of trade and commerce. Appellant says: "the tax and surcharge are established in a way which enables the Province of Saskatchewan to control the minimum price at which Saskatchewan crude oil is sold. This control is imposed on a commodity almost exclusively consumed outside of Saskatchewan, either in the Canadian or international marketplace. This imposition of a minimum price by the Province to be passed on to consumers outside of the Province is an interference with the free flow of trade between provinces ... so as to prevent producers in Saskatchewan from dealing unhampered with purchasers outside of Saskatchewan."

The conceptual tool of "flow" or "current," or "stream" of commerce has been referred to by the Court in a number of subsequent cases, the most recent being MacDonald v. Vapor Canada Ltd. [[1977] 2 SCR 134 at 167, 1976 CanLII 181]. The real question, unsettled in the jurisprudence, is the determination of when the product enters the export stream marking the start of the process of exportation. American jurisprudence has held that the distinguishing mark of an export product is shipment or entry with a common carrier for transportation to another jurisdiction: Coe v. Errol, [116 US 517] at 527; Richfield Oil Corp. v. State Board of Equalization [329 US 69]; Empresa Siderurgica v. Merced Co. [337 US 154]. Implicit in the argument of the appellant is the assumption that federal regulatory power pursuant to s. 91(2) follows the flow of oil backward across provincial boundaries, back through provincial gathering systems and finally to the well-head. A secondary assumption is that sale at the well-head marks the start of the process of exportation. In the view I take of the case it is unnecessary to reach any conclusion as to the validity of either of these assumptions. It is, however, worth noting that neither American nor Canadian jurisprudence has ever gone that far.

I can find nothing in the present case to lead me to conclude that the taxation measures imposed by the Province of Saskatchewan were merely a colourable device for assuming control of extra-provincial trade. The language of the impugned statutes does not disclose an intention on the part of the Province to regulate, or control, or impede marketing or export of oil from Saskatchewan. "Oil produced and sold" means produced and sold within the Provinces. "Well-head price" by definition means the price at the well-head of a barrel of oil produced in Saskatchewan. The mineral income tax and the royalty surcharge relate only to oil produced within Saskatchewan. The transactions are well-head transactions. There are no impediments to the free movement of goods as were found objectionable in Attorney-General for Manitoba v. Manitoba Egg & Poultry Ass'n [[1971] SCR 689, 1971 CanLII 135], and in Burns Foods Ltd. v. Attorney-General for Manitoba [[1975] 1 SCR 494, 1973 CanLII 194].

Nor is there anything in the extraneous evidence to form the basis of an argument that the impugned legislation in its effect regulated interprovincial or international trade. The evidence is all to the contrary and that evidence comes entirely from witnesses called on behalf of the appellant. Production and export of oil increased after the legislative scheme was implemented. Sales of oil by the appellant were continued in 1974 as in 1973 and previously.

It was contended in argument that the effect was to place a floor price under Saskatchewan oil and thereby interfere with interprovincial trade. So far as mineral income tax is concerned the incidence of taxation is pegged to the price received for the oil at the well-head. Section 4A is an "after-the-event" provision which comes into play only if there was a sale at less than fair value. The emphasis on fair value ensures that the tax will not change the export oil price. The price of oil subject to the tax and the price of oil free of the tax, i.e., from the exempted 1,280-acre tracts, will be the same as the product crosses the provincial border. The ultimate position of consumers is unaffected. The only way in which extra-provincial consumers could have benefited would have been in the event of the Province freezing the price of oil, assuming constitutional competence to do so.

One is free to speculate that, to the extent producers would be prepared to undercut the fair market value of their oil, the legislation discourages them from doing so by virtue of the constant tax liability. The possibility of price-cutting is highly theoretical, unsupported by evidence and in view of the inelasticity of demand for petroleum products, highly unlikely.

• • •

The Province of Saskatchewan had a bona fide legitimate and reasonable interest of its own to advance in enacting the legislation in question, as related to taxation and natural resources, out of all proportion to the burden, if there can be said to be a burden, imposed on the Canadian free trade economic unit through the legislation. The effect, if any, on the extra-provincial trade in oil is merely indirectly and remotely incidental to the manifest revenue-producing object of the legislation under attack.

Appeal allowed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Are the facts in Canadian Industrial Gas and Oil Ltd (CIGOL) distinguishable from those in Carnation? Is CIGOL more faithful, instead, to the decision in the Manitoba Egg Reference?

For discussion, see Patrick Monahan, Constitutional Law, 4th ed (Toronto: Irwin Law, 2012) at 332-34.

2. Saskatchewan ultimately paid CIGOL $3.7 million. To safeguard the over $500 million collected under the mineral income tax and royalty scheme, it enacted new legislation, the Oil Well Income Tax Act, RSS 1978, c O-3.1 (Supp), which implemented an income tax on oil well income earned after January 1, 1974: see William Moull, "Natural Resources: The Other Crisis in Canadian Federalism" (1980) 18:1 Osgoode Hall LJ 1 at 25.

3. If s 92A had been in force, how would it have affected the outcome of the case?

Central Canada Potash Co Ltd v Government of Saskatchewan

[1979] 1 SCR 42, 1978 CanLII 21

[Facing possible trade sanctions by the United States arising out of a complaint of dumping and a depressed market for potash, Saskatchewan instituted a potash prorationing scheme in 1969. At that time, almost all of its potash was sold outside the province, with about 64 percent marketed in the United States. The scheme was discussed with officials from New Mexico, the only US producer of potash. The scheme and its successors controlled production through licences, which prevented Central Canada Potash from fulfilling one of its contracts. The trial judge found the regulations ultra vires, while the Court of Appeal upheld their validity. The other issue in the case involving a claim for damages for intimidation, is omitted.]

LASKIN CJ (Martland, Ritchie, Spence, Pigeon, Dickson, and Pratte JJ concurring):

This appeal, which is here by leave of this Court, concerns (1) the validity of what I may compendiously refer to as a potash prorationing scheme, established pursuant to the Mineral Resources Act, R.S.S. 1965, c. 50, as amended

What is evident from the circumstances under which the Potash Conservation Regulations were promulgated, and from the terms of the directives and licences through which the ABC and FP schemes were instituted and administered, is that the Government of Saskatchewan had in view the regulation of the marketing of potash through the fixing of a minimum selling price applicable to the permitted production quotas. The only market for which the schemes had any significance was the export market. There could be no suggestion that the schemes had any relation to the marketing of potash within the Province of Saskatchewan when there was hardly any Saskatchewan market for the mineral. There was no question here of any concluded transactions of sale and purchase in the Province, as was the situation in [Carnation Co Ltd v Quebec Agricultural Marketing Board, [1968] SCR 238, 1968 CanLII 82]. Out of Province and offshore sales were the principal objects of the licences and directives.

The documentary evidence leaves no doubt about this. The first directive fixing the minimum floor price for potash to the producer, f.o.b. the potash plant, dated November 25, 1969, was stated to be for the purpose of determining the demand for it "for reasonable current requirements and current consumption or use within or without Saskatchewan." The first producing licence to Noranda, dated December 12, 1969, required the licensee to comply with "all applicable Acts, regulations, orders and directions governing production, conservation, processing, disposal, marketing, transporting ..." The second producing licence conditioned its validity on observance of the minimum selling price, f.o.b. the producer's plant in Saskatchewan.

Subsequent producing licences did not indicate any change of focus, although they forfeited ministerial control.

A directive of August 24, 1971, to all producers fixed the minimum price f.o.b. vessel, Vancouver. On August 27, 1971, a letter to producers from the Deputy Minister advised of approval given, on certain conditions, to an agreement for delivery of potash to a business organization in France. One of the conditions required that "all potash delivered to Europe from Saskatchewan pursuant to the agreement shall be for consumption in Europe." The new allocation formula prescribed by the directive of June 30, 1972, from which I have already quoted, was concerned with the sharing of production "to meet the market demand." The purpose of Canpotex, to which I have also referred above, was to make it the instrument for offshore sales of Saskatchewan potash.

In all of the foregoing, the Government of Saskatchewan, and its responsible Ministers and their Deputies, were acting not under proprietary right but in pursuance of legislative and statutory authority directed to the proprietary rights of others, including the appellant. It was strenuously contended by the respondent Government (and in this they were supported by the intervening Provinces) that the natural resources, the mineral wealth of the Province was subject to provincial regulatory control alone, and that production controls or quotas were peculiarly matters within exclusive provincial legislative authority. Chief Justice Culliton gave force to this point in two concluding paragraphs of his reasons, which he prefaced by saying that "Courts must approach constitutional problems with a sense of realism and practicality." The two paragraphs read as follows [1977 CanLII 1459, 79 DLR (3d) 203 at 234-35 (Sask CA)]:

It was admitted by all parties that the potash industry of Saskatchewan was facing difficult problems—problems which, if not solved, would have a most detrimental effect on the industry and on the Province. In these circumstances, the potash industry had a right to seek assistance from whatever Government had the power to grant that assistance. Natural resources, being exclusively within the provincial jurisdiction, the industry turned to the Province. The Province, to protect and conserve the potash industry, implemented controlled production and established minimum prices in the Province. These programmes did assist the industry but at the same time had some effect on areas within Federal jurisdiction. However, in pith and substance, they were programmes directed to a matter within Provincial jurisdiction and thus were valid notwithstanding such ultimate effects.

If I am not right in this conclusion, then it must be said the right to control production of potash within the Province and to establish a minimum price at the mine, rests with the Parliament of Canada, for the right to do so must rest somewhere. Clearly, in my opinion, the Parliament of Canada does not have the power to control the production of potash within the Province, or to set a minimum price at the mine. Thus, in my opinion, to hold that the prorationing and price stabilization programmes are ultra vires the Province, is to determine their validity by the ultimate effects of such programmes and not by their true nature and character.

It is, of course, true, that production controls and conservation measures with respect to natural resources in a Province are, ordinarily, matters within provincial legislative authority. This Court's reasons in its recent judgment in the Ontario Egg Reference (Reference re Agricultural Products Marketing Act ... [since reported [1978] 2 SCR 1198, 1978 CanLII 10], supports that view. The situation may be different, however, where a province establishes a marketing scheme with price fixing as its central feature. Indeed, it has been held that provincial legislative authority does not extend to the control or regulation of the marketing of provincial products, whether minerals or natural resources, in interprovincial or export trade. ...

The present case reduces itself therefore to a consideration of "the true nature and character" of the prorationing and price stabilization schemes which are before us. This Court cannot ignore the circumstances under which the Potash Conservation Regulations came into being, nor the market to which they were applied and in which they had their substantial operation. In Canadian Industrial Gas & Oil Ltd. v. Government of Saskatchewan [[1978] 2 SCR 545, 1977 CanLII 210], this Court, speaking in its majority judgment through Martland J., said (at p. 568) that "provincial legislative authority does not extend to fixing the price to be charged or received in respect of the sale of goods in the export market." It may properly be said here of potash as it was said there of oil that "the legislation is directly aimed at the production of potash destined for export, and it has the effect of regulating the export price since the producer is effectively compelled to obtain that price on the sale of his product" (at p. 569).

I do not agree with Chief Justice Culliton that the consequence of invalidating the provincial scheme in this case is to move to the Parliament of Canada the power to control production of minerals in the Province and the price to be charged at the mine. There is no accretion at all to federal power in this case, which does not involve federal legislation, but simply a determination by this Court, in obedience to its duty, of a limitation on provincial legislative power. It is true, as he says that (with some exceptions, not relevant here) the British North America Act distributes all legislative power either to Parliament or to the provincial Legislatures, but it does not follow that legislation of a Province held to be invalid may ipso facto be validly enacted by Parliament in its very terms. It is nothing new for this Court, or indeed, for any Court in this country seized of a constitutional issue, to go behind the words used by a Legislature and to see what it is that it is doing. It is especially important for Courts, called upon to interpret and apply a constitution which limits legislative power, to do so in a case where not only the authorizing legislation but regulations enacted pursuant thereto are themselves couched in generalities, and the bite of a scheme envisaged by the parent legislation and the delegated regulations is found in administrative directions.

Where governments in good faith, as in this case, invoke authority to realize desirable economic policies, they must know that they have no open-ended means of achieving their goals when there are constitutional limitations on the legislative power under which they purport to act. They are entitled to expect that the Courts, and especially this Court, will approach the task of appraisal of the constitutionality of social and economic programmes with sympathy and regard for the serious consequences of holding them ultra vires. Yet, if the appraisal results in a clash with the Constitution, it is the latter which must govern. That is the situation here.

In my opinion, the judgment of the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal on the constitutional question posed for this Court should be set aside and the declaration of invalidity by the trial Judge should be restored.

• • •

Appeal with respect to constitutional validity allowed; declaration of invalidity by trial Judge restored.

NOTE: PROPRIETARY RIGHTS

Apart from any regulatory jurisdiction the provinces possess under ss 92, 92A, and 95, another important source of provincial authority in relation to natural resources is each province's proprietary rights over the resources situated within the province. Section 109 of the Constitution Act, 1867, which applies to the four original provinces, provides:

All Lands, Mines, Minerals, and Royalties belonging to the several Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick at the Union ... shall belong to the several Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick in which the same are situate or arise, subject to any ... Interest other than that of the Province in the same.

The constitutional instruments by which British Columbia, Prince Edward Island, and Newfoundland were admitted to the federation similarly provide for provincial ownership of the lands and resources located within each of those provinces. Manitoba, Alberta, and Saskatchewan initially received different, less favourable treatment: when they were carved out of the Northwest Territories, ownership of the land and resources situated within those newly established provinces was retained by the federal Crown. A long political struggle followed, culminating in the 1930 Natural Resource Transfer Agreements (Constitution Act 1930, 20-21 Geo V, c 26 (UK), pursuant to which the three prairie provinces finally acquired resource ownership on the same terms as the others).

From forests and mines to hydroelectric energy and oil, all of the provinces have used their ownership of their resources—and the consequent power to decide whether, and on what terms, the resources may be used—as a means of achieving provincial goals.

NOTE: OFFSHORE RESOURCES

An important difference exists between resources situated within a province and those situated, for example, offshore. In Reference Re: Offshore Mineral Rights, [1967] SCR 792, 1967 CanLII 71, the Supreme Court held that the coastal waters off British Columbia (from the low water mark) fall outside the boundaries of the province and, therefore, are not the property of the province. Rather, they are the property of the federal Crown. On similar grounds, in Reference re Newfoundland Continental Shelf, [1984] 1 SCR 86, 1984 CanLII 132, the Court rejected a claim by Newfoundland to ownership of offshore continental shelf rights and to legislative jurisdiction over the related resources. Specifically, regarding the jurisdictional issue, the Court held that given that the offshore area is outside the boundaries of Newfoundland (or any other province), legislative authority belongs to the federal Parliament, under POGG.

The political aftermath of the Newfoundland Continental Shelf decision illustrates the point that, although the law defines baseline entitlements, it is usually open to governments to reach a different arrangement through negotiation. On February 11, 1995, the Governments of Canada and of Newfoundland entered into a Memorandum of Agreement providing for the "joint management of the offshore oil and gas resources off Newfoundland and Labrador and the sharing of revenues from the exploitation of these resources" (art 1). In particular, the agreement, known as the Atlantic Accord, contemplated that Newfoundland would receive revenues in the form of taxes and royalties from offshore petroleum activities as if those activities occurred on provincial land.

NOTE: INTERPROVINCIAL PIPELINES AND PROVINCIAL ENVIRONMENTAL LAW

In addition to disputes about which level of government owns or has jurisdiction over resources, disagreements can also arise where a resource development activity has negative impacts outside the jurisdiction that primarily benefits from the activity. The controversy over the proposal to expand the Trans Mountain pipeline linking Alberta and the British Columbia coast, and the ensuing constitutional litigation, provide an example of such a conflict.

Pursuant to the Canadian Energy Regulator Act, SC 2019, c 28, s 10, the Canada Energy Regulator (CER) regulates pipelines in Canada that cross provincial or national borders. Parliament's jurisdiction over interprovincial and international pipelines comes from s 92(10)(a), which excludes from provincial jurisdiction the enactment of laws in relation to "Works and Undertakings connecting the Province with any other or others of the Provinces, or extending beyond the Limits of the Province." Federal statutes and regulations impose many obligations on federally regulated pipeline companies for the purpose of environmental protection, including the requirement for an environmental assessment prior to approval by the CER of a pipeline project, ongoing operational oversight by the CER, obligations related to spill prevention and management, and financial liability for damage caused by spills.

To what extent are interprovincial and international pipelines also subject to provincial laws of general application, such as environmental protection laws? It would seem that this question engages the interjurisdictional immunity doctrine, discussed in Chapter 8: an otherwise valid provincial law cannot be applied so as to impair the "vital part" of a federal undertaking. In the Reference re Environmental Management Act (BC), however, the BC Court of Appeal determined that the provincial legislation was not merely inapplicable; it was ultra vires.

Reference re Environmental Management Act (BC)

2019 BCCA 181

[The Trans Mountain pipeline carries oil from Alberta to the coast of British Columbia. A proposed expansion project involves "twinning" the existing pipeline, and expanding certain related infrastructure, with the objective of increasing the capacity of the pipeline from approximately 300,000 barrels of oil per day to approximately 890,000. An application to the National Energy Board (the predecessor to the CER) for permission to undertake the project was filed in 2013 and remained pending at the time of the Reference.

The Environmental Management Act (BC) [EMA] is provincial legislation regulating, among other things, waste discharges, hazardous waste storage, transportation, contaminated sites, and greenhouse gas emissions. In 2018, the government of BC proposed to amend the EMA to add part 2.1, which establishes a scheme for the issuance of a "hazardous substance permit" and prohibits any person from possessing, without such a permit, more than a specified amount of any substance listed in a schedule to the legislation. The only substance listed in the schedule is "heavy oil." The Lieutenant Governor in Council referred to the BC Court of Appeal's three questions: (1) whether the proposed legislation is intra vires; (2) if so, whether the proposed legislation is applicable to interprovincial undertakings; and (3) if so, whether existing federal legislation would render the proposed legislation inoperative.]

NEWBURY JA (Baumann CJ and Groberman, Harris, and Fenlon JJ concurring):

[1] The protection of the environment is one of the driving challenges of our time. No part of the world is now untouched by the need for such protection; no government may ignore it; no industry may claim immunity from its constraints. This reference is not about whether the planned Trans Mountain pipeline expansion ("TMX") should be regulated to minimize the risks it poses to the environment—that is a given. Rather, this reference asks which level or levels of government may do so under our constitution, specifically ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867. British Columbia asserts that it may regulate the pipeline in the interests of the environment—not exclusively, but to the extent that it may impose conditions on, and even prohibit, the presence of "heavy oil" in the Province unless a director under the Environmental Management Act issues a "hazardous substance permit" under the proposed addition that is the subject of the reference.

[2] The Province readily acknowledges that the pipeline is an interprovincial (and therefore "federal") undertaking. However, it asserts that the expansion and operation of the pipeline as a carrier of heavy oil will have a disproportionate effect on the interests of British Columbians, as compared with other Canadians. It emphasizes that provincial environmental legislation has long affected aspects of federal undertakings without serious challenge; that the heads of power set out in ss. 91 and 92 are not "watertight compartments"; and that the Supreme Court of Canada has recognized on occasion that certain functions are best carried out by the level of government closest to the citizens affected (the principle of "subsidiarity"). The Province sees the proposed addition to the Environmental Management Act as relating to "Property and Civil Rights in the Province" or "Matters of a merely local or private Nature" under s. 92 of the Constitution Act.

[3] Canada on the other hand characterizes the addition as relating to the "matter" of "Works and Undertakings connecting the Province with any other or others of the Provinces, or extending beyond the Limits of the Province." It submits that its jurisdiction under ss. 91(29) and 92(10)(a) of the Constitution Act includes the regulation of the construction and operation of the pipeline, its route and contents, and the management of risks of environmental harm. Although Canada acknowledges that provincial environmental laws of general application may affect interprovincial undertakings "incidentally," it says the proposed addition is targeted legislation and would effectively lead to a situation of concurrent jurisdiction, contrary to the exclusive authority contemplated by the Constitution Act.

[92] [Although] interjurisdictional immunity has on occasion overshadowed the determination of "pith and substance," the Supreme Court has clarified in recent years that the first task in determining the constitutional validity of legislation is to determine its "true character" or "dominant characteristic." That determination is not to be conflated with deciding whether the law "impairs" a "vital part" of the federal jurisdiction over interprovincial undertakings. If the law relates in substance to a federal head of power, that is "the end of the matter." In this case, the pith and substance of the subject legislation is indeed "the end of the matter" and it is unnecessary for us to continue on to paramountcy or interjurisdictional immunity.

[93] It is clear that federal undertakings are not "enclaves" immune from provincial environmental laws. Indeed, both levels of government have jurisdiction over aspects of the environment, and both levels have adopted complex and far-ranging legislation dealing with the prevention and mitigation of environmental harm and the remediation of and compensation for such harm, usually incorporating the principle of "polluter pays." Mr. Arvay submitted, however, that provincial jurisdiction in respect of the environment is "plenary and direct" while Parliament's jurisdiction is "derivative." He seemed to base this submission on the proposition that environmental legislation is intended to protect "property" and therefore fits directly into "Property and Civil Rights in the Province" in s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act. But while the provincial head of power is broad, the authorities do not support a superior or presumptive claim to jurisdiction for the provinces by reason of the role of "property"; nor do they support the notion of absolute and unqualified jurisdiction. Environmental protection is indeed "too important"—and too diffuse—to belong to one level exclusively or absolutely.

[94] I have already suggested that although Part 2.1 is framed as a law of general application, it is intended, and (more importantly) its sole effect is, to set conditions for, and if necessary prohibit, the possession and control of increased volumes of heavy oil in the Province. Heavy oil will enter the Province only via Trans Mountain's interprovincial pipeline and railcars destined for export. The Province contended that that fact is irrelevant to the purpose of Part 2.1, and that if there were no interprovincial pipeline, there would be no doubt about the validity of the proposed law. Counsel also cautioned against confusing the "motives" of government, or any of its members, with legislative purpose. ... I agree with the latter proposition, and have been careful not to rely on extrinsic evidence contained in the ASF [Agreed Statement of Facts] that consisted of statements made by governmental officials outside the Legislative Assembly concerning the TMX project or the introduction of Part 2.1. Such statements lack the "institutional" quality that gives some assurance of relevance to the question of legislative purpose. ... I do consider that we may take judicial notice of the fact that there is currently much public discussion about the TMX project and that Part 2.1 has been brought forward at the same time as that discussion.

[95] As for the proposition that there would be no doubt about the validity of Part 2.1 in the absence of the Trans Mountain pipeline, it resolves nothing. The fact is that there is an interprovincial undertaking the purpose of which is to carry the heavy oil from outside of British Columbia to tidewater, and that while heavy oil produced and refined in this province (if there were such a thing) would have the same properties as heavy oil from Alberta or elsewhere, the Constitution Act distinguishes between the two in terms of regulatory authority.

[97] I would not characterize the proposed amendment to the EMA as "colourable" in the sense that anything is being concealed; but the practicalities cannot be ignored. The 'default' position of the law is to prohibit the possession of all heavy oil in the Province above the Substance Threshold—an immediate and existential threat to a federal undertaking that is being expanded specifically to increase the amount of oil being transported through British Columbia. This can hardly be described as an "incidental" or "ancillary" effect. Even stopping short of prohibition, the permitting requirement may be used to impose conditions relating to the environment. This seems likely to occur in a qualitatively different manner from the manner in which the existing EMA [and other provincial environmental assessment] provisions operate—otherwise no new legislation would be necessary.

[98] At what point is the line crossed between valid provincial environmental legislation and the impermissible regulation of a federal undertaking? ...

[100] [T]he Court in Bell Canada (1988) ... suggested that a matter that is "intrinsic to a field of federal jurisdiction" is not within provincial jurisdiction, even if it has elements of property and civil rights. (At 842.) Canadian Western Bank (2007) similarly referred to what makes federal undertakings "specifically of federal jurisdiction." (At paras. 51 and 57.) See also Consolidated Fastfrate (2009) at para. 36; National Battlefields (1990) at 853; and Montcalm (1979), where it was said that provincial legislation must not reach a federal work qua federal organization, or regulate it "under some primary federal aspect." (See para. 67 above; my emphasis.)

[101] In my view, Part 2.1 does cross the line between environmental laws of general application and the regulation of federal undertakings. Even if it were not intended to 'single out' the TMX pipeline, it has the potential to affect (and indeed 'stop in its tracks') the entire operation of Trans Mountain as an interprovincial carrier and exporter of oil. It is legislation that in pith and substance relates to, and relates only to, what makes the pipeline "specifically of federal jurisdiction." By definition, an interprovincial pipeline is a continuous carrier of liquid across provincial borders. Indeed, in Canada the pipeline owner is subject to conditions of common carriage across those borders: see s. 71(1) of the National Energy Board Act. Unless the pipeline is contained entirely within a province, federal jurisdiction is the only way in which it may be regulated. Notwithstanding Mr. Arvay's contention that there is "nothing wrong with a patchwork", it is simply not practical—or appropriate in terms of constitutional law—for different laws and regulations to apply to an inter-provincial pipeline (or railway or communications infrastructure) every time it crosses a border. ... [The] operation of an interprovincial pipeline would be "stymied" by the necessity to comply with different conditions governing its route, construction, cargo, safety measures, spill prevention, and the aftermath of any accidental release of oil. Jurisdiction over interprovincial undertakings was allocated exclusively to Parliament by the Constitution Act to deal with just this type of situation, allowing a single regulator to consider interests and concerns beyond those of the individual province(s).

[103] ... I view environmental protection as a ... diffuse field in which both levels of government play important roles. Part 2.1, however, is unlike the EMA and [existing provincial environmental assessment legislation]. It is not legislation of general application, but is targeted at one substance in one (interprovincial) pipeline. Immediately upon coming into force, it would prohibit the operation of the expanded Trans Mountain pipeline in the Province until such time as a provincially-appointed official decided otherwise. This alone threatens to usurp the role of the NEB, which has made many rulings and imposed many conditions to be complied with by Trans Mountain for the protection of the environment. The approval process is still continuing. The minimization of environmental harm associated with inter-provincial undertakings is a key component of the federal "matter," and there is no authority for the 'hiving off' of damage cleanup and remediation from the prevention of mishaps in the operation and management of an interprovincial work. To the contrary, all of these aspects are part of an integrated whole.

[104] At the end of the day, the NEB is the body entrusted with regulating the flow of energy resources across Canada to export markets. Although the principle of subsidiarity has understandable appeal, the TMX project is not only a "British Columbia project." The project affects the country as a whole, and falls to be regulated taking into account the interests of the country as a whole.

[105] Both the law relating to the division of powers and the practicalities surrounding the TMX project lead to the conclusion, then, that the pith and substance of the proposed Part 2.1 is to place conditions on, and if necessary, prohibit, the carriage of heavy oil thorough an interprovincial undertaking. Such legislation does not in its pith and substance relate to "Property ... in the Province" or to "Matters of a merely local or private Nature," but to Parliament's jurisdiction in respect of federal undertakings under s. 92(10) of the Constitution Act. Contrary to Mr. Arvay's submission, this conclusion does not reflect a 'sea change' in the law, a return to 'watertight' compartments of jurisdiction or a diminution of co-operative federalism. Rather it reflects the more basic principle that ss. 91 and 92 provide for "exclusive" heads of power that have substantive content.

[106] I would therefore answer 'no' to the first question on the reference. In light of this answer to the first question, it is unnecessary to answer the latter two questions.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The Court took pains to suggest that its conclusion did not depend on colourability, or even on a finding that the purpose of part 2.1 was to interfere with interprovincial pipelines. Instead, the effects of the legislation seem to have been dispositive. As you know from Morgentaler (1993) and other cases, there is a distinction between “legal effects” and “practical effects.” Did the Court’s characterization of part 2.1 rest on legal effects, practical effects, or both?
2. The hurdle should be greater for a finding that legislation is invalid than for a finding that the legislation, although valid in most of its applications, cannot validly be applied to a particular undertaking. In this case, was there any difference between what the Court identified as the basis for its finding that the law is ultra vires and what would have needed to be shown in order to sustain a finding of constitutional inapplicability under the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity?
3. An appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada was dismissed. In an unusual move, the Court issued its judgment directly from the bench at the conclusion of the hearing. It unanimously adopted the reasons of the Court of Appeal: Reference re Environmental Management Act, 2020 SCC 1.

CHAPTER ELEVEN

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE

I. Federal Powers over Criminal Law and Procedure	405
II. Provincial Power to Regulate Morality and Public Order	457

I. FEDERAL POWERS OVER CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE

Section 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867 assigns responsibility over criminal law and criminal procedure to the federal Parliament, a choice embraced by many other modern federations, such as South Africa and Brazil. Other federations—notably, the United States and Australia—have made criminal law a state responsibility, opting for local rather than national standards for defining and prosecuting criminal activities. Canada, however, is unusual in assigning the criminal law power to a different level of government from the power over property and civil rights. This division began with the Quebec Act, 1774, 14 Geo III, c 83 (UK), which provided that although Quebec would follow the “Criminal Law of England,” French civil law would govern disputes about “Property and Civil Rights.” The division gives rise to complicated questions about the interplay between the two heads of power.

This chapter explores two issues about the choice to make criminal law an area of national rather than local standards: (1) the scope of the federal power over criminal law and procedure; and (2) the extent to which the interpretation of this federal power has constrained provincial attempts, using the ss 92(13) and (16) heads of power, to control local conditions of public order and safety; impose local standards of morality; and design various methods for enforcing local standards.

On the first issue, the scope of the federal criminal power, Allan Hutchinson and David Schneiderman have commented:

The federal government’s “exclusive” jurisdiction under section 91(27) has always been a difficult and dynamic category of power to circumscribe: its scope is potentially limitless and can subvert the division of powers between the federal and provincial legislatures. With succinct understatement, Justice Estey was close to the mark when he noted [in Scowby v Glendinning, [1986] 2 SCR 226 at 236, 1986 CanLII 30] that “criminal law is easier to recognize than to define.” In seeking to set some guidelines and limits, the courts have tended to swing between unrealistically narrow and broad interpretations. Striking a considered and consistent balance has proved an elusive task for the courts.

See Allan Hutchinson and David Schneiderman, “Smoking Guns: The Federal Government Confronts the Tobacco and Gun Lobbies” (1995) 7 Const Forum Const 16 at 16.

As Hutchinson & Schneiderman note, s 91(27) has experienced fairly dramatic shifts in interpretation. Recall that in Canada (AG) v Alberta (AG), [\[1921\] CanLII 399, \[1922\] 1 AC 191 \(UKJCPC\)](#) [Reference re the Board of Commerce Act], excerpted in Chapter 5, The Early Twentieth Century: Beginnings of Economic Regulation, Lord Haldane interpreted the criminal law power as “enabling the Dominion Parliament to exercise exclusive legislative power where the subject matter is one which by its very nature belongs to the domain of criminal jurisprudence" (at 518). He gave incest as an example and, applying this restrictive definition, concluded that the federal Combines and Fair Prices Act was not an exercise of the criminal law power. Subsequently, in Proprietary Articles Trade Association v Canada (AG), [1931 CanLII 385, \[1931\] AC 310 \(UKJCPC\)](#), excerpted in Chapter 6, The 1930s: The Depression and the New Deal, Lord Atkin rejected a narrow definition of criminal law that would be restricted to matters that, because of their inherent nature, have traditionally fallen within the domain of criminal jurisprudence. He offered instead a wide definition of criminal law that included all acts that, at any particular period of time, are prohibited with penal sanctions. Applying this definition, he concluded that the federal Combines Investigation Act, 1927 was a valid exercise of the criminal law power.

The modern starting point for any discussion of the federal criminal law power is the judgment of Rand J in the Margarine Reference, immediately below. Concerned with the impact of a purely formal definition of criminal law in a federal system, Rand J emphasized the need for a criminal purpose, in addition to the formal requirements of prohibition and penalty, in order for a federal law to be upheld as an exercise of the criminal law power.

Reference re Validity of Section 5(a) of the Dairy Industry Act

[\[1949\] SCR 1, 1984 CanLII 2 \[Margarine Reference\]](#)

RAND J:

His Excellency in Council has referred to this Court the following question:

Is section 5(a) of the Dairy Industry Act, R.S.C. 1927, chapter 45, ultra vires of the Parliament of Canada either in whole or in part and if so in what particular or particulars and to what extent?

The section is as follows:

5. No person shall
 - (a) manufacture, import into Canada, or offer, sell or have in his possession for sale, any oleomargarine, margarine, butterine, or other substitute for butter, manufactured wholly or in part from any fat other than that of milk or cream.

[Justice Rand then traced the history of this provision, finding its origins in legislation enacted in 1886 that banned the manufacture and sale of butter substitutes and that included a preamble stating that butter substitutes were harmful to health.]

But whatever might have been the case of the 1886 legislation, the situation now is that not only has the preamble disappeared, but its recital of fact is admittedly no longer true [of] either margarine or oleomargarine. It is conceded that both of them ... are substantially as nutritious, possess as much energy value and are as free from deleterious effects as butter itself

The appearance of the provision in a statute dealing comprehensively with the dairy industry and the inclusion of prohibition of importation, the ordinary mode of protection of industry in its ultimate form, are, for this initial purpose, of considerable significance. On the other hand, the scope and importance of agriculture in the economy of this country, the part played by the dairy industry as an essential branch of it, and the desirability of maintaining a market demand for butter to meet the seasonal exigencies of that industry, are beyond controversy. What, then, in that whole background is the true nature of the enactment?

Mr. Varcoe argues that it is simply a provision of criminal law, a field exclusively Dominion, and the issue, I think, depends upon the validity of that contention. In The Proprietary Articles Trade Association v. Attorney-General of Canada [1931 CanLII 385, [1931] AC 310 (UKJCPC)], Lord Atkin rejected the notion that the acts against which criminal law is directed must carry some moral taint. A crime is an act which the law, with appropriate penal sanctions, forbids; but as prohibitions are not enacted in a vacuum, we can properly look for some evil or injurious or undesirable effect upon the public against which the law is directed. That effect may be in relation to social, economic or political interests; and the legislature has had in mind to suppress the evil or to safeguard the interest threatened.

Criminal law is a body of prohibitions; but that prohibition can be used legislatively as a device to effect a positive result is obvious; we have only to refer to Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations ... to discover how extensively it has been used not only to keep foreign goods from the domestic market but to prevent manufactures in the colonies for the benefit of home industries The Court in its enquiry is not bound by the ex facie form of the statute; and in the ordinary sense of the word, the purpose of a legislative enactment is generally evidential of its true nature or subject matter Under a unitary legislature, all prohibitions may be viewed indifferently as of criminal law, but as the cases cited demonstrate, such a classification is inappropriate to the distribution of legislative power in Canada.

Is the prohibition then enacted with a view to a public purpose which can support it as being in relation to criminal law? Public peace, order, security, health, morality: these are the ordinary though not exclusive ends served by that law, but they do not appear to be the object of the parliamentary action here. That object, as I must find it, is economic and the legislative purpose, to give trade protection to the dairy industry in the production and sale of butter; to benefit one group of persons as against competitors in business in which, in the absence of the legislation, the latter would be free to engage in the provinces. To forbid manufacture and sale for such an end is prima facie to deal directly with the civil rights of individuals in relation to particular trade within the provinces

The public interest in this regulation lies obviously in the trade effects: it is annexed to the legislative subject-matter and follows the latter in its allocation to the one or other Legislature. But to use it as a support for the legislation in the aspect of criminal law would mean that the Dominion under its authority in that field, by forbidding the manufacture or sale of particular products, could, in what it considered a sound trade policy, not only interdict a substantial part of the economic life of one section of Canada but do so for the benefit of that of another. Whatever the scope of the regulation of interprovincial trade, it is hard to conceive a more insidious form of encroachment on a complementary jurisdiction. [Here] there is nothing of a general or injurious nature to be abolished or removed; it is a matter of preferring certain local trade to others.

[Justice Rand then went on to conclude that the prohibition of the manufacture, possession, and sale of margarine was ultra vires Parliament, because it could not be upheld under either the criminal law power or the trade and commerce power. However, he concluded that the prohibition of importation could be upheld under the federal government's power to regulate foreign trade, and that it could stand on its own apart from the remainder of the legislation. Justices Taschereau, Kellock, and Estey wrote concurring judgments; Locke J concurred in part; Rinfret CJ and Kerwin J dissented.]

Question answered in the affirmative.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Margarine Reference was affirmed by the Privy Council: Reference re Validity of Section 5(a) of the Dairy Industry Act, Canadian Federation of Agriculture v AG of Quebec, 1950 CanLII 342, [1951] AC 179.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Why did it seem so apparent to Rand J that there was no “public” interest informing protection of the dairy industry? Could it not be argued that a healthy dairy industry was an important component of the overall Canadian economy, and hence a benefit to all Canadians? Or is giving a competitive advantage to one industry over another—in this case, the dairy industry over the margarine industry—a choice that should be authorized and justified, if possible, under Parliament’s economic powers, not its criminal law power? Should it matter if authorization under economic powers is not possible, as Rand J held in this case?

2. Margarine may be the only consumer product with its own constitutional provision. When Newfoundland joined Confederation in 1949, s 46 of the Terms of Union (being the Schedule to the Newfoundland Act, 12 & 13 Geo IV, c 22 (UK)) specifically permitted the new province to continue manufacturing and selling margarine without federal interference, a protection of local margarine production that benefited the vital fishing industry (as marine oil was used in margarine produced in Newfoundland) as well as impoverished Newfoundland consumers. The provision was deemed necessary in light of the economic and political context of margarine production. From the time of margarine’s development in the mid-1870s as a safe and inexpensive alternative to butter, its production had generated controversial legislative controls, typically at the behest of dairy producers. In addition to the federal ban in Canada on margarine production and sale that began in the 1880s (although lifted during and immediately after the First World War, when butter was in short supply), which was invalidated in the Margarine Reference, most governments across North America regulated margarine in such a way as to make its consumption less desirable, such as imposing heavy taxes and licensing fees and forbidding margarine to be dyed pale yellow (and, in several American states, requiring it to be coloured pink). As Ruth Dupré pointed out, the restrictions had a disproportionately negative effect on people who could not afford to purchase butter: see Ruth Dupré, “If It’s Yellow, It Must Be Butter: Margarine Regulation in North America Since 1886” (1999) J Economic Hist 353. Although the Margarine Reference declared the federal prohibition to be ultra vires, provincial regulation of margarine, especially its colour, continued into modern times in several provinces with large dairy industries. In UL Canada Inc v Quebec (AG), 2005 SCC 10, the Supreme Court unanimously upheld provincial regulation of margarine colour as a valid exercise of provincial power over property and civil rights. (It also rejected a challenge to the regulation based on freedom of expression). Recently, however, the remaining regulations about margarine colour have been repealed. The margarine and butter wars appear to be over.

3. Despite the constraint of “a public purpose which can support it as being in relation to criminal law” (at 50) imposed in the Margarine Reference, the criminal law power has remained broad and has been relied on by the federal government in enacting a vast array of regulatory legislation beyond the Criminal Code, including environmental and health and safety legislation, as well as combines legislation. Between the Margarine Reference and Reference re Assisted Human Reproduction Act, 2010 SCC 61, excerpted below, there have been relatively few occasions where federal laws that meet the formal requirements of criminal law—that is, prohibition and penalty—have been found invalid because of the absence of a criminal law purpose. One such occasion was a notable trilogy of decisions released between 1979 and 1981. The first two cases concerned economic regulation enforced by criminal sanctions. In Dominion Stores Ltd v R, [\[1980\] 1 SCR 844](#), 1979 CanLII 57, Estey J, writing for a narrow majority of the Court, held that federal legislation creating national grade names and standards for agricultural products, which left the use of the grade names voluntary in intra-provincial trade, but made it an offence not to comply with the standards if the grade names were used, was marketing legislation involving no criminal purpose. Shortly after, in Labatt Breweries of Canada Ltd v Attorney General of Canada, [1980] 1 SCR 914, 1979 CanLII 190, discussed further in Chapter 10, Federalism and the Economy, Estey J, writing the plurality opinion of a badly fractured Court—it issued five separate opinions—refused to find federal commodity standards for food valid under the criminal law power, concluding that there was no consumer protection purpose because the legislation was not directed at either the adulteration of food or false or misleading advertising or labelling. In that case, the form of the law, dealing as it did with the “detailed regulation of the brewing industry in the production and sale of its product” (at 915), may also have contributed to the Court’s reluctance to characterize the legislation as criminal law. Finally, in Boggs v R, [1981] 1 SCR 49, 1981 CanLII 39, Estey J, writing for a unanimous Court, struck down a section of the Criminal Code that made it an offence to drive while one’s provincial driver’s licence was suspended. Licence suspensions could be imposed not only for violations of the Criminal Code but also for breach of various provincial regulations and failure to pay taxes, judgments, and other fees. Justice Estey concluded that there was no discernible community interest in the criminalization of the administration of such provincial regulatory schemes.

4. Many years later, in Ward v Canada (AG), 2002 SCC 17, a regulation enacted under the federal Fisheries Act, RSC 1985, c F-14 that prohibited the sale of young harp seals and hooded seals was found not to be sustainable under the criminal law power because the legislative history suggested that the legislation was enacted to manage the fisheries, not to criminalize the killing or sale of seals. The regulation sought to eliminate the large-scale killing and commercial hunting of the young seals because the international reaction to the harvest was threatening the markets for Canadian fish products abroad, and hence the economic viability of the Canadian fishery. The regulation was upheld, however, under the fisheries power. The most recent example of a federal law failing to satisfy the test of criminal purpose is Reference re Assisted Human Reproduction Act, 2010 SCC 61, excerpted below, in which a divided Court found most parts of the Assisted Human Reproduction Act, SC 2004, c 2, to be ultra vires. As in Labatt Breweries of Canada Ltd v AG Canada, above, there were also problems with the form of the law.

5. In R v Malmo-Levine; R v Caine, 2003 SCC 74, the Court upheld the prohibition of possession of marijuana in the Narcotic Control Act, SC 1960-61, c 35 as a valid exercise of the criminal law power on the basis that the protection of vulnerable groups from self-inflicted harms was a valid public purpose within the meaning of the Margarine Reference. It defended this characterization in the following terms:

[76] The purpose of the NCA [Narcotic Control Act, SC 1960-61, c 35] fits within the criminal law power, which includes the protection of vulnerable groups: Rodriguez v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 519, at p. 595.

[77] The protection of vulnerable groups from self-inflicted harms does not, as [the appellant] argues, amount to no more than “legal moralism.” Morality has traditionally been identified as a legitimate concern of the criminal law ([Labatt Breweries of Canada Ltd v AG Canada, [1980] 1 SCR 914, 1979 CanLII 190], at p. 933) although today this does not include mere “conventional standards of propriety” but must be understood as referring to societal values beyond the simply prurient or prudish . . . The protection of . . . chronic users . . . and adolescents who may not yet have become chronic users, but who have the potential to do so, is a valid criminal law objective. In R v. Hydro-Québec [[1997] 3 SCR 213, 1997 CanLII 318], the Court held at para. 131 that “Parliament has for long exercised extensive control over such matters as food and drugs by prohibitions grounded in the criminal law power.” . . . In our view, the control of a “psychoactive drug” that “causes alteration of mental function” clearly raises issues of public health and safety, both for the user as well as for those in the broader society affected by his or her conduct.

Do you agree?

In the first three decisions excerpted below—RJR MacDonald Inc v Canada (AG), R v Hydro-Québec, and Reference re Firearms Act (Can)—the Supreme Court of Canada provides strong confirmation of the broad scope of the federal criminal law power. As you read the cases, note the ways in which the Supreme Court applies the tests of both purpose and form. In the fourth decision below, Reference Re Assisted Human Reproduction Act, a narrow majority of the Court drew back from further expansion of the criminal law power. A fifth decision, Re Genetic Non-Discrimination Act, demonstrates the crucial role that characterization plays in the analysis of validity under s 91(27), as well as continuing concerns on the part of some members of the Supreme Court that further refinement of the purpose requirement is needed in order to prevent federal legislative jurisdiction under s 91(27) from being effectively without limits.

RJR-MacDonald Inc v Canada (AG)

[1995] 3 SCR 199, 1995 CanLII 64

[The Tobacco Products Control Act, SC 1988, c 20 was enacted by Parliament in 1988. The purpose of the Act was set out in s 3, which states:

3. The purpose of this Act is to provide a legislative response to a national public health problem of substantial and pressing concern and, in particular,
 - (a) to protect the health of Canadians in the light of conclusive evidence implicating tobacco use in the incidence of numerous debilitating and fatal diseases;
 - (b) to protect young persons and others, to the extent that is reasonable in a free and democratic society, from inducements to use tobacco products and consequent dependence on them; and
 - (c) to enhance public awareness of the hazards of tobacco use by ensuring the effective communication of pertinent information to consumers of tobacco products.

The Act prohibited all advertising and promotion of tobacco products offered for sale in Canada, with an exemption for advertising of foreign tobacco products in imported publications. As well, the legislation required the display of unattributed health warnings on all tobacco products and precluded manufacturers from putting other information on tobacco products. Violation of the provisions of the Act constituted an offence punishable by way of summary conviction or indictment, with penalties ranging in seriousness from a fine not exceeding $2,000 or six months' imprisonment to a fine not exceeding $300,000 or two years' imprisonment.

Two tobacco companies sought declarations that the law was ultra vires Parliament as an intrusion into provincial jurisdiction over advertising grounded in ss 92(13) or (16) of the Constitution Act, 1867 and that it infringed freedom of expression guaranteed by s 2(b) of the Charter. A majority of the Supreme Court of Canada found the legislation intra vires as a legitimate exercise of the criminal law power, but then went on to declare its central provisions of no force and effect as an unjustifiable infringement of freedom of expression. Only those portions of the judgment dealing with the federalism issue are reproduced here. On that issue, the trial judge had found the legislation to be ultra vires because it was in relation to the control of advertising, a provincial matter under ss 92(13) and (16). The Quebec Court of Appeal concluded that the legislation was intra vires, finding that, although it could not be sustained under the criminal law power, it was a valid exercise of Parliament's power to legislate for the peace, order, and good government (POGG) of Canada in a matter of national concern.]

La FOREST J (Lamer CJ and L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin, and Iacobucci JJ concurring) (dissenting):

[28] ... The criminal law power is plenary in nature and this Court has always defined its scope broadly. ... In developing a definition of the criminal law, this Court has been careful not to freeze the definition in time or confine it to a fixed domain of activity In Proprietary Articles Trade Association v. Attorney-General for Canada, [1931] A.C. 310 (PATA), at p. 324, the Privy Council defined the federal criminal law power in the widest possible terms to include any prohibited act with penal consequences. Subsequent to that decision, this Court recognized that the Privy Council's definition was too broad in that it would allow Parliament to invade areas of provincial legislative competence colourably simply by legislating in the proper form [The] necessary adjustment was introduced in Reference re Validity of Section 5(a) of the Dairy Industry Act, [1949] S.C.R. 1 (the Margarine Reference). Rand J. drew attention ... to the need to identify the evil or injurious effect at which a penal prohibition was directed. ...

[29] Taking into account the broad definition of the criminal law developed by this Court, I am satisfied that the Act is, in pith and substance, criminal law From a plain reading of the Act, it seems clear that Parliament's purpose in enacting this legislation was to prohibit three categories of acts: advertisement of tobacco products (ss. 4 and 5), promotion of tobacco products (ss. 6 to 8) and sale of tobacco products without printed health warnings (s. 9). These prohibitions are accompanied by penal sanctions under s. 18 of the Act, which, as Lord Atkin noted in PATA ... creates at least a prima facie indication that the Act is criminal law. However, the crucial further question is whether the Act also has an underlying criminal public purpose in the sense described by Rand J. in the Margarine Reference. ...

[30] In these cases, the evil targeted by Parliament is the detrimental health effects caused by tobacco consumption. This is apparent from s. 3, the Act's "purpose" clause Quite clearly, the common thread running throughout the three enumerated purposes ... is a concern for public health and, more specifically, a concern with protecting Canadians from the hazards of tobacco consumption. This is a valid concern. A copious body of evidence was introduced at trial demonstrating convincingly, and this was not disputed by the appellants, that tobacco consumption is widespread in Canadian society and that it poses serious risks to the health of a great number of Canadians.

[32] It appears, then, that the detrimental health effects of tobacco consumption are both dramatic and substantial. Put bluntly, tobacco kills. Given this fact, can Parliament validly employ the criminal law to prohibit tobacco manufacturers from inducing Canadians to consume these products, and to increase public awareness concerning the hazards of their use? In my view, there is no question that it can. "Health," of course, is not an enumerated head under the Constitution Act, 1867. As Estey J. observed in Schneider v. The Queen, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 112, at p. 142:

... "health" is not a matter which is subject to specific constitutional assignment but instead is an amorphous topic which can be addressed by valid federal or provincial legislation, depending in the circumstances of each case on the nature or scope of the health problem in question.

Given the “amorphous” nature of health as a constitutional matter, and the resulting fact that Parliament and the provincial legislatures may both validly legislate in this area, it is important to emphasize once again the plenary nature of the criminal law power. In the Margarine Reference ... Rand J. made it clear that the protection of “health” is one of the “ordinary ends” served by the criminal law, and that the criminal law power may validly be used to safeguard the public from any “injurious or undesirable effect.” The scope of the federal power to create criminal legislation with respect to health matters is broad, and is circumscribed only by the requirements that the legislation must contain a prohibition accompanied by a penal sanction and must be directed at a legitimate public health evil. If a given piece of federal legislation contains these features, and if that legislation is not otherwise a “colourable” intrusion upon provincial jurisdiction, then it is valid as criminal law. ...

[33] As I have indicated, it is clear that this legislation is directed at a public health evil and that it contains prohibitions accompanied by penal sanctions. Is it colourable? In my view, it is not. Indeed, it is difficult to conceive what Parliament’s purpose could have been in enacting this legislation apart from the reduction of tobacco consumption and the protection of public health. ... [I]f Parliament’s intent had been to regulate the tobacco industry as an industry, and not merely to combat the ancillary health effects resulting from tobacco consumption, then it would surely have enacted provisions that relate to such matters as product quality, pricing and labour relations [T]here is no evidence in the present cases that Parliament had an ulterior motive in enacting this legislation, or that it was attempting to intrude unjustifiably upon provincial powers under ss. 92(13) and (16). It thus differs from the Margarine Reference ... where the prohibition was not really directed at curtailing a public evil, but was in reality, in pith and substance, aimed at regulating the dairy industry.

[34] Why, then, has Parliament chosen to prohibit tobacco advertising, and not tobacco consumption itself? In my view, there is a compelling explanation for this choice. It is not that Parliament was attempting to intrude colourably upon provincial jurisdiction but that a prohibition upon the sale or consumption of tobacco is not a practical policy option at this time. It must be kept in mind that the very nature of tobacco consumption makes government action problematic. ... Given the addictive nature of tobacco products, and the fact that over one-third of Canadians smoke, it is clear that a legislative prohibition on the sale and use of tobacco products would be highly impractical. ... As legislators in this country discovered earlier in the century, the prohibition of a social drug such as tobacco or alcohol leads almost inevitably to an increase in smuggling and crime.

[35] However, the mere fact that it is not practical or realistic to implement a prohibition on the use or manufacture of tobacco products does not mean that Parliament cannot, or should not, resort to other intermediate policy options. ...

[39] ... This Court has long recognized that Parliament may validly employ the criminal law power to prohibit or control the manufacture, sale and distribution of products that present a danger to public health, and that Parliament may also validly impose labelling and packaging requirements on dangerous products with a view to protecting public health. ...

[Reference is then made to a number of cases, including R v Wetmore, [1983] 2 SCR 284, 1983 CanLII 29, in which offences under the federal Food and Drug Act of manufacturing drugs under unsanitary conditions and deceptive labelling of drugs were upheld as criminal law.]

[41] Moreover, in my view ... the federal criminal law power to legislate with respect to dangerous goods also encompasses the power to legislate with respect to health warnings on dangerous goods. Since health warnings serve to alert Canadians to the potentially harmful consequences of the use of dangerous products, the power to prohibit sales without these warnings is simply a logical extension of the federal power to protect public health by prohibiting the sale of the products themselves. ...

• • •

[43] From the foregoing, it is clear that Parliament could, if it chose, validly prohibit the manufacture and sale of tobacco products under the criminal law power on the ground that these products constitute a danger to public health. Such a prohibition would be directly analogous to the prohibitions on dangerous drugs and unsanitary foods or poisons. ... In my view, once it is accepted that Parliament may validly legislate under the criminal law power with respect to the manufacture and sale of tobacco products, it logically follows that Parliament may also validly legislate under that power to prohibit the advertisement of tobacco products and sales of products without health warnings. In either case, Parliament is legislating to effect the same underlying criminal public purpose: protecting Canadians from harmful and dangerous products.

• • •

[45] The foregoing considerations, it seems to me, are sufficient to establish that the pith and substance of the Act is criminal law for the purpose of protecting public health and that Parliament accordingly has the legislative authority under s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867 to enact this legislation. However, I think it right to address directly the three principal arguments raised by the appellants in support of their submission that the Act is not valid as criminal law

i. Affinity of the Act with a Traditional Criminal Law Concern

[46] The appellants' first argument is that the Act is not a valid exercise of the criminal law power because it does not involve conduct having an affinity with a traditional criminal law concern. The appellants observe that both tobacco consumption and tobacco advertising have always been legal in this country and, on this basis, argue that this legislation does not serve a "public purpose commonly recognized as being criminal in nature"

[47] In my view, this argument fails because it neglects the well-established principle that the definition of the criminal law is not "frozen as of some particular time." ... It has long been recognized that Parliament's power to legislate with respect to the criminal law must, of necessity, include the power to create new crimes.

[Justice La Forest then quickly dealt with the second argument that Parliament cannot criminalize an activity ancillary to an "evil" if it does not criminalize the "evil" itself, emphasizing once again that Parliament is allowed to choose a "circuitous path" (at para 51) to accomplish its goals as long as the goals are constitutionally valid. In this case, Parliament's underlying purpose was clearly to eradicate the practice of tobacco consumption.]

iii. The Creation of Exemptions Under the Criminal Law Power

[52] The appellants' third argument is that the Act is fundamentally regulatory, not criminal, in nature. In support of this argument, they observe that the Act contains exemptions for publications and broadcasts originating outside Canada. ... The practical effect of these exemptions, the appellants argue, is that the very same act can be legal when committed by one party in Canada but illegal when committed by another.

[53] In my view, this argument fails because it disregards the long-established principle that the criminal law may validly contain exemptions for certain conduct without losing its status as criminal law. As early as 1959, in Lord's Day Alliance of Canada v. Attorney General of British Columbia, [1959] S.C.R. 497, this Court held that the Lord's Day Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 171, which prohibited gambling on Sunday, was a valid exercise of the criminal law power despite the fact that s. 6 of that Act created an exemption for provinces which had passed legislation to the contrary. ...

[54] This principle was reiterated in Morgentaler v. The Queen, [1976] 1 S.C.R. 616, where this Court addressed the constitutionality of s. 251 of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-34. Under s. 251(1) of the Code, the intentional procurement of a miscarriage was declared to be unlawful. However, under s. 251(4) and (5), Parliament had also created an exemption for miscarriages carried out by qualified medical practitioners where the life of the woman was in danger. Laskin CJ, dissenting in the result but not on this issue, made it clear that the creation of such an exemption did not detract from the validity of the provision as criminal law, at p. 627:

I need cite no authority for the proposition that Parliament may determine what is not criminal as well as what is, and may hence introduce dispensations or exemptions in its criminal legislation. ...

[56] The clear implication of this Court's decisions ... is that the creation of a broad status-based exemption to criminal legislation does not detract from the criminal nature of the legislation. On the contrary, the exemption helps to define the crime by clarifying its contours. In my view, this is precisely what Parliament has done in creating exemptions under the Act. The crime created by Parliament is the advertisement and promotion of tobacco products offered for sale in Canada. Rather than diluting the criminality of these acts, the exemptions to which the appellants refer serve merely to delineate the logical and practical limits to Parliament's exercise of the criminal law power in this context. For example, it is clear that the exemption for foreign media under s. 4(3) was created to avoid both the extraterritorial application of Canadian legislation and the page-by-page censorship of foreign publications at the border. ... Given the fact that foreign tobacco products comprise less than 1 percent of the Canadian market, it is apparent that the exemption has an extremely limited scope. ...

[57] For all the foregoing reasons, I am of the view that the Act is a valid exercise of the federal criminal law power. ...

MAJOR J (Sopinka J concurring) (dissenting):

[195] It is undisputed that Parliament may legislate with respect to hazardous, unsanitary, adulterated and otherwise dangerous foods and drugs pursuant to its power to legislate in the field of criminal law.

[196] It follows that Parliament can require manufacturers to place warnings on tobacco products which are known to have harmful effects on health. Manufacturers of tobacco products are under a duty to disclose and warn of the dangers inherent in the consumption of tobacco products. Failure to place warnings on tobacco products can validly constitute a crime, a "public wrong" which merits proscription and punishment and ought to be suppressed as "socially undesirable conduct" . . . Section 9 of the Tobacco Products Control Act [requiring the display of unattributed health warnings] . . . falls within Parliament's power under s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867.

[197] However, I do not agree that Parliament under its criminal law power is entitled to prohibit all advertising and promotion of tobacco products and restrict the use of tobacco trademarks . . .

[Justice Major then discussed the requirement of a "typically criminal public purpose" (at para 198) and referred to cases where that test was not satisfied—the Margarine Reference, Labatt Breweries, and Boggs. (The latter two cases are discussed in the notes following the Margarine Reference.) These cases are read as standing for the principle that "although Parliament's power to legislate in the field of criminal law is broad, it is subject to constitutional limits" (at para 199).]

[200] A definitive and all-encompassing test to determine what constitutes a "criminal offence" remains elusive but the activity which Parliament wishes to suppress through criminal sanction must pose a significant, grave and serious risk of harm to public health, morality, safety or security before it can fall within the purview of the criminal law power. While there is a range of conduct between the most and less serious, not every harm or risk to society is sufficiently grave or serious to warrant the application of the criminal law.

[201] The heart of criminal law is the prohibition of conduct which interferes with the proper functioning of society or which undermines the safety and security of society as a whole. . . [A] crime is a public wrong involving a violation of the public rights and duties to the whole community, considered as a community, in its social aggregate capacity. Matters which pose a significant and serious risk of harm or which cause significant and serious harm to public health, safety or security can be proscribed by Parliament as criminal.

[202] Consequently, lesser threats to society and its functioning do not fall within the criminal law, but are addressed through non-criminal regulation, either by Parliament or provincial legislatures, depending on the subject matter of the regulation.

[204] . . . I agree that criminal law is not frozen in time. . . I disagree that affinity with a traditional criminal law concern has no part to play in the analysis, whether the conduct proscribed by Parliament has an affinity with a traditional criminal law concern is a starting point in determining whether a particular matter comes within federal criminal competence. . .

[208] The objective of the advertising ban and trade mark usage restrictions . . . is to prevent Canadians from being persuaded by advertising and promotion to use tobacco products. I respectfully disagree with La Forest J. that this type of persuasion constitutes criminal conduct.

[209] Tobacco advertising and promotion may encourage some people to start or to continue to smoke. For that reason, it is viewed by many as an undesirable form of commercial expression. I do not disagree that it may be an undesirable form of expression, but is this undesirability sufficient to make such expression criminal? Does tobacco advertising pose a significant, grave and serious danger to public health? Or does it simply encourage people to consume a legal but harmful product? I cannot agree that the commercial speech at issue poses such a significant, grave and serious danger to public health to fall within the purview of the federal criminal law power. In my opinion, the Act is too far removed from the injurious or undesirable effects of tobacco use to constitute a valid exercise of Parliament's criminal law power. Legislation prohibiting all advertising of a product which is both legal and licensed for sale throughout Canada lacks a typically criminal public purpose and is ultra vires Parliament under s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867. ...

[212] Since Parliament has chosen not to criminalize tobacco use, it is difficult to understand how tobacco advertising can somehow take on the character of criminal activity. The Act does not deal in any way with the regulation or prohibition of dangerous products or drugs. The underlying "evil" of tobacco use which the Act is designed to combat remains perfectly legal. Tobacco advertising is in itself not sufficiently dangerous or harmful to justify criminal sanctions. In my view, it is beyond Parliament's competence to criminalize this type of speech where Parliament has declined to criminalize the underlying activity of tobacco use.

[213] On a final note, La Forest J. addressed the exemptions contained within the Act, most notably the exemption for foreign periodicals. He concluded that notwithstanding the exemptions, tobacco advertising still constitutes criminal law. I disagree. ... While exemptions do not necessarily take a statute out of criminal law, broadly based exemptions are a factor which may lead a court to conclude that the proscribed conduct is not truly criminal. Both Morgentaler (dealing with abortion) and Furtney (dealing with gambling) involved conduct which has traditionally been viewed as criminal. The exemptions could not be described as "broadly based." ...

[215] In these appeals, McLachlin J. notes that despite the advertising ban, 65 percent of the Canadian magazine market will contain tobacco advertisements, given that the ban applies only to Canadian media and not to imported publications. The exemptions for advertising cannot be seen as being limited in nature because most Canadians will be exposed to advertising for tobacco products in newspapers, magazines and so forth. It is hard to understand how the respondent on the one hand claims that nothing short of a total ban will accomplish the goal of reducing tobacco consumption while at the same time the Act allows a very significant amount of advertising to enter the country. It is difficult to imagine how tobacco advertising produced by the United States or other countries and distributed in Canada through publications somehow becomes criminal when produced and distributed by Canadians. The broadly based exemptions contained in the Act, combined with the fact that the Act does not engage a typically criminal public purpose, leads to the conclusion that the prohibitions on advertising cannot be upheld as a valid exercise of Parliament's criminal law power.

[216] The Act, except for s. 9 and its associated provisions relating to mandatory health warnings on tobacco packaging, cannot be upheld as valid criminal legislation. The Act is a regulatory measure aimed at decreasing tobacco consumption. While Parliament's desire to limit tobacco advertising may be desirable, its power to do so cannot be found in s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The excerpt from the majority opinion begins with La Forest J's statement that the criminal law power "is plenary in nature." What does it mean to describe a power as "plenary"? Ian

Lee suggests that a plenary power is one that is not carved out from a broader concept. He notes, for example, that the federal power over bills of exchange and promissory notes in s 91(18) is a carve-out from the provincial power over property and civil rights, and that the provincial power in s 92(15) to impose penalties for violations of provincial laws is a "subtracted subset" of the broader concept of criminal law: see Ian Lee, "Case Comment" (2011) 90 Can Bar Rev 469 at 482. In the Firearms Reference, excerpted below, the Supreme Court of Canada explicitly rejected the argument that the federal criminal law power was a subtraction from the provincial power over property and civil rights.

2. The definition and scope of "criminal procedure" in s 91(27) has received relatively scant attention. In The Queen v Zelensky, [1978] 2 SCR 940, 1978 CanLII 8, the constitutionality of the Criminal Code's compensation and restitution provisions were before the Court for the first time. In upholding the provisions, the Court recognized the wide scope of the federal powers over both criminal law and criminal procedure. In the Firearms Reference, the Court stated that criminal law "includes criminal procedure, which regulates many aspects of criminal law enforcement, such as arrest, search and seizure of evidence, the regulation of electronic surveillance and the forfeiture of stolen property" (at para 28). In Chatterjee v Ontario (AG), 2009 SCC 19, excerpted below, the Court noted that criminal procedure "in general refers to the means by which an allegation of a particular criminal offence is proven against a particular offender" (at para 4). By its express terms, however, s 91(27) does not include the "Constitution of Courts of Criminal Jurisdiction," a matter specifically given to the provinces in s 92(14) as part of the "Administration of Justice in the Province." Would it matter if "Constitution of Courts of Criminal Jurisdiction" in s 92(14) is treated as a carve-out from the federal power over criminal procedure? Or should criminal procedure be treated as a carve-out from the provincial power in s 92(14) over the "Administration of Justice in the Province"? In light of the extensive rights in criminal proceedings that are now contained in the Charter, has the answer acquired greater or lesser importance?

NOTE: THE REQUIREMENT OF A CRIMINAL FORM

One main constraint on the federal criminal law power has been that of form—the standard form of criminal law is a prohibition and penalty enforced by courts. The presence of regulatory features in a federal law—for example, powers of licensing and prior inspection, involvement of an administrative agency exercising discretionary authority in the administration of the law, detailed regulation, and civil remedies—may engage property and civil rights in a way that makes the law incapable of being upheld as an exercise of the criminal power. However, in cases where the courts have found a clear criminal law purpose, they have allowed some deviation from the strict form of prohibition and penalty. In RJR MacDonald, a majority of the Court found that the presence of exemptions did not preclude a finding that the legislation was criminal law. The majority also referred to cases establishing the federal government's undisputed power to regulate unsafe food and products under the criminal law power. In R v Cosman's Furniture (1972) Ltd, 1976 CanLII 1279, 73 DLR (3d) 312 (Man CA), for example, detailed regulations setting out standards for the manufacture of babies' cribs and cradles, made pursuant to the federal Hazardous Products Act, which made it an offence to manufacture or sell products that did not conform to the safety standards set in the regulations, were found to be a valid exercise of the criminal law power because they were directed at safeguarding the health and security of infants. In R v Hydro-Québec, which follows, the Supreme Court of Canada went even further in finding that a regulatory scheme with a large measure of ministerial discretion satisfied the formal requirements of criminal law.

Remedies that are ancillary to criminal prohibitions have also been upheld under the criminal law power. For example, in R v Zelensky, noted above, the Supreme Court of Canada upheld a provision of the Criminal Code authorizing a court to order an accused found guilty of an indictable offence to pay compensation to the victim on the basis that such an order was a functional part of sentencing, which is an integral component of the criminal law power. In Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co of Canada v R, [1956] SCR 303, 1956 CanLII 4, the Court upheld a provision allowing courts to make an order prohibiting the repetition of competition offences. In Industrial Acceptance Corp Ltd v The Queen, [1953] 2 SCR 273, 1953 CanLII 50, it upheld federal forfeiture provisions relating to property used in the commission of crimes as an "integral part of criminal law" (as per Rand J at 278), and thus validly enacted by Parliament. The Criminal Code also contains provisions authorizing a sentencing court to order forfeiture of property that is the proceeds of crime, even without a showing that the offence was committed in relation to that property. Is this provision vulnerable to challenge on the ground of division of powers? Consider this question again after you read Chatterjee v Ontario (AG), 2009 SCC 19, later in this chapter.

In some cases, a departure from the criminal form of prohibition and penalty has been allowed where the purpose of the law is the prevention of a crime. For example, in R v Swain, [1991] 1 SCR 933, 1991 CanLII 104, the Supreme Court of Canada found that the provisions of the Criminal Code that provided for the detention in a provincial mental health institution of persons acquitted of an offence by reason of insanity were intra vires the federal Parliament. While acknowledging that the criminal committal provisions were not designed to impose punishment, the Court nonetheless found that they were a valid exercise of the preventive branch of the criminal law power. The provisions, which related only to insane persons whose actions were proscribed by the Criminal Code, were intended to protect society by preventing further dangerous conduct. The protection of society was found to be one of the important aims of the criminal law. (The provisions were, however, found to violate s 7 of the Charter.)

Finally, it has long been recognized that form requirements are not imposed when legislation repeals criminal offences, a point recently affirmed in Quebec (AG) v Canada (AG), 2015 SCC 14, excerpted at the end of this chapter. The Court unanimously held that Parliament's power to enact criminal offences includes the power to repeal offences, but divided, inter alia, on the question of whether Parliament's power to repeal the offence provisions in this case included the power to destroy the data collected for the purpose of the offence provision.

R v Hydro-Québec

[1997] 3 SCR 213, 1997 CanLII 318

[Hydro-Québec was charged with violation of an interim order made by the federal minister of the environment, restricting its emissions of PCBs. This order was made under part II of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, RSC 1985, c 16 (4th Supp), which, in short, established a process for regulating the use of toxic substances. In its defence, Hydro-Québec claimed that the two sections of the Act that were crucial to the making of the interim order, and hence to the charge, ss 34 and 35, were ultra vires. This claim succeeded throughout the Quebec courts, and the federal government appealed to the Supreme Court. The federal government attempted to support the legislation under both the POGG and criminal law powers. A narrow majority of the Supreme Court of Canada, in a judgment written by La Forest J, found that the impugned legislation was a valid exercise of the criminal law power and that it was, therefore, unnecessary to address the POGG arguments. In a dissenting judgment, Lamer CJ and Iacobucci J found no basis for the legislation in either the criminal law or POGG powers. Only the portion of their judgment dealing with the criminal law power has been reproduced below; a discussion of their reasoning on the

POGG power can be found in Chapter 9, Peace, Order, and Good Government, under the heading "Note: The National Concern Doctrine from the Anti-Inflation Reference to the Greenhouse Pollution Pricing Act References."

The analysis in both the majority and dissenting reasons involves detailed references to the Act, which is both long and complex. The preamble, which provides some evidence of the government's intentions in enacting the legislation, reads as follows:

WHEREAS the presence of toxic substances in the environment is a matter of national concern;

WHEREAS toxic substances, once introduced into the environment, cannot always be contained within geographic boundaries;

WHEREAS the Government of Canada in demonstrating national leadership should establish national environmental quality objectives, guidelines and codes of practice;

AND WHEREAS Canada must be able to fulfil its international obligations in respect of the environment

The scheme of the legislation was summarized as follows in the dissenting reasons of Lamre CJ and Iacobucci J.:]

[15] ... Part II of the Act, which contains ss. 34 and 35, is called "Toxic Substances" and deals with the identification and regulation of substances which could potentially pose a risk to the environment and/or to human health. According to s. 11 of the Act, a substance is toxic where "it is entering or may enter the environment" under conditions "having or that may have an immediate or long-term harmful effect on the environment," "constituting or that may constitute a danger to the environment on which human life depends," or "constituting or that may constitute a danger in Canada to human life or health." Section 3 broadly defines a "substance" as "any distinguishable kind of organic or inorganic matter, whether animate or inanimate" and the "environment" as "the components of the Earth." "Harmful effect" and "danger" are not defined.

[16] The Act instructs the Ministers of the Environment and Health to compile and maintain four lists: the Domestic Substances List (DSL), the Non-Domestic Substances List (NDSL), the Priority Substances List (PSL) and the List of Toxic Substances (LTS). The DSL includes all substances in use in Canada since 1986 (some 21,700 substances as of January 1991). The NDSL contains all other substances. ... There is a blanket restriction on importing NDSL substances into Canada until they are approved (s. 26).

[17] Sections 12 and 13 of the Act require the Ministers to compile a "Priority Substances List" specifying those substances to which priority should be given in determining whether or not they should be placed on the List of Toxic Substances.

[18] Once a priority listed substance is found to be toxic within the meaning of s. 11, the Ministers may recommend adding it to the List of Toxic Substances. After a federal-provincial advisory committee (established under s. 6) has been given an opportunity to provide its advice, the Governor in Council may add the substance to the list and bring it under the regulatory control of s. 34.

[19] Section 34 provides for the regulation of substances on the List of Toxic Substances. The Governor in Council is given extensive powers to prescribe regulations dealing with every conceivable aspect of the listed substance, including: the quantity or concentration in which [a substance] can be released; the commercial or manufacturing activity in the course of which it can be released; the quantity ... that can be manufactured, imported, owned, sold, or used—including total prohibitions on its manufacture, importation, ownership, use or sale—and likewise the manner in and purposes for which it can be manufactured, imported, processed, used, offered for sale or sold; the manner and conditions in which the substance may be advertised, stored, displayed, handled, transported or offered for transport; the manner ... of disposal of the substance; the maintenance ... records in respect of the substance; and the extent to which reports must be made to the Minister regarding the monitoring of the substance. Section 34(1)(x) allows the Governor in Council to regulate "any other matter necessary to carry out the purposes of this Part."

[20] Where a substance is not on the List of Toxic Substances (or where it is listed, but the Ministers believe that it is not adequately regulated), and where the Ministers believe that immediate action is necessary in respect of that substance, s. 35 allows for the making of "interim orders" without going through the usual procedure. ...

• • •

[22] Finally, the Act prescribes a number of civil and criminal penalties. ... [In particular, s 113(f) makes it an offence (punishable by fines or imprisonment) to contravene regulations made under s 34, while s 113(i) similarly makes it an offence to violate an order made under s 35.]

• • •

La FOREST J (L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, Cory, and McLachlin JJ concurring):

• • •

[110] ... [I]n my view, the impugned provisions are valid legislation under the criminal law power—s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867. It thus becomes unnecessary to deal with the national concern doctrine, which inevitably raises profound issues respecting the federal structure of our Constitution which do not arise with anything like the same intensity in relation to the criminal law power.

[Justice La Forest first reviewed the manner in which the Supreme Court has approached environmental issues under the division of powers.]

[116] ... The general thrust of [Friends of the Oldman River Society v Canada (Minister of Transport), [1992] 1 SCR 3, 1992 CanLII 110] is that the Constitution should be so interpreted as to afford both levels of government ample means to protect the environment while maintaining the general structure of the Constitution. ...

[117] I have gone on at this length to demonstrate the simple proposition that the validity of a legislative provision (including one relating to environmental protection) must be tested against the specific characteristics of the head of power under which it is proposed to justify it. For each constitutional head of power has its own particular characteristics and raises concerns peculiar to itself in assessing it in the balance of Canadian federalism. ... [I]t is all too easy ... to overlook the characteristics of a particular power and overshoot the mark or, again, in assessing the applicability of one head of power to give effect to concerns appropriate to another head of power when this is neither appropriate nor consistent with [the jurisprudence] ... respecting the ambit and contours of that other power. In the present case, ... [t]here was a marked attempt to raise concerns appropriate to the national concern doctrine under the peace, order and good government clause to the criminal law power in a manner that ... is wholly inconsistent with the nature and ambit of that power as set down by this Court from a very early period and continually reiterated since

The Criminal Law Power

[118] Section 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867 confers the exclusive power to legislate in relation to criminal law on Parliament. The nature and ambit of this power has recently been the subject of a detailed analytical and historical examination in [RJR-MacDonald Inc v Canada (AG), [1995] 3 SCR 199, 1995 CanLII 64] ... where it was again described, as it has [been] for many years, as being "plenary in nature" (emphasis added). ... I add that Professor Leclair in an excellent article, "Aperçu des virtualités de la compétence fédérale en droit criminel dans le contexte de la protection de l'environnement" (1996), 27 R.G.D. 137, has very recently analysed all the relevant cases and has come to the same conclusion about the general scope of the criminal law power and its application to the environment, and in particular the Act here in question.

[121] The Charter apart, only one qualification has been attached to Parliament's plenary power over criminal law. The power cannot be employed colourably. Like other legislative powers, it cannot, as Estey J. put it in Scowby v. Glendinning, [1986] 2 S.C.R. 226, at p. 237, "permit Parliament, simply by legislating in the proper form, to colourably invade areas of exclusively provincial legislative competence." To determine whether such an attempt is being made, it is, of course, appropriate to enquire into Parliament's purpose in enacting the legislation. As Estey J. noted in Scowby, at p. 237, since the Margarine Reference [Reference re Validity of Section 5(a) of the Dairy Industry Act, [1949] SCR 1, 1945 CanLII 2], it has been "accepted that some legitimate public purpose must underlie the prohibition." ...

[122] ... [T]he listed purposes [in the Margarine Reference] by no means exhaust the purposes that may legitimately support valid criminal legislation. ... [T]his is, of course, consistent with the view, most recently reiterated in RJR-MacDonald, at pp. 259-61, that criminal law is not frozen in time.

[123] During the argument in the present case, however, one sensed, at times, a tendency ... to seek justification solely for the purpose of the protection of health specifically identified by Rand J. Now I have no doubt that that purpose obviously will support a considerable measure of environmental legislation, as perhaps also the ground of security. But I entertain no doubt that the protection of a clean environment is a public purpose within Rand J.'s formulation in the Margarine Reference, ... sufficient to support a criminal prohibition. It is surely an "interest threatened" which Parliament can legitimately "safeguard," or to put it another way, pollution is an "evil" that Parliament can legitimately seek to suppress. Indeed, ... it is a public purpose of superordinate importance; it constitutes one of the major challenges of our time. It would be surprising indeed if Parliament could not exercise its plenary power over criminal law to protect this interest and to suppress the evils associated with it by appropriate penal prohibitions.

[Excerpts from statements by public bodies, both Canadian and international, about the urgent need to protect the environment have been omitted.]

[127] What the foregoing underlines is ... that the protection of the environment is a major challenge of our time. It is an international problem, one that requires action by governments at all levels. And, as is stated in the preamble to the Act under review, "Canada must be able to fulfil its international obligations in respect of the environment." I am confident that Canada can fulfil its international obligations, in so far as the toxic substances sought to be prohibited from entering into the environment under the Act are concerned, by use of the criminal law power. The purpose of the criminal law is to underline and protect our fundamental values. ... [T]he stewardship of the environment is a fundamental value of our society and ... Parliament may use its criminal law power to underline that value. The criminal law must be able to keep pace with and protect our emerging values.

[128] In saying that Parliament may use its criminal law power in the interest of protecting the environment or preventing pollution, there again appears to have been confusion during the argument between the approach to the national concern doctrine and the criminal law power. The national concern doctrine operates by assigning full power to regulate an area to Parliament. Criminal law does not work that way. Rather it seeks by discrete prohibitions to prevent evils falling within a broad purpose, such as, for example, the protection of health. In the criminal law area, reference to such broad policy objectives is simply a means of ensuring that the prohibition is legitimately aimed at some public evil Parliament wishes to suppress and so is not a colourable attempt to deal with a matter falling exclusively within an area of provincial legislative jurisdiction.

[129] The legitimate use of the criminal law I have just described in no way constitutes an encroachment on provincial legislative power, though it may affect matters falling within the latter's ambit. . . .

[131] . . . [T]he use of the federal criminal law power in no way precludes the provinces from exercising their extensive powers under s. 92 to regulate and control the pollution of the environment either independently or to supplement federal action. The situation is really no different from the situation regarding the protection of health where Parliament has for long exercised extensive control over such matters as food and drugs by prohibitions grounded in the criminal law power. This has not prevented the provinces from extensively regulating and prohibiting many activities relating to health. The two levels of government frequently work together to meet common concerns. . . .

The Provisions Respecting Toxic Substances

[133] The respondent, the mis en cause and their supporting interveners primarily attack ss. 34 and 35 of the Act as constituting an infringement on provincial regulatory powers conferred by the Constitution. This they do by submitting that the power to regulate a substance is so broad as to encroach upon provincial legislative jurisdiction. That is because of what they call the broad "definition" given to toxic substances under s. 11

[134] I cannot agree with this submission. As I see it, the argument focusses too narrowly on a specific provision of the Act and for that matter only on certain aspects of it, and then applies that provision in a manner that I do not think is warranted by a consideration of the provisions of the Act as a whole and in light of its background and purpose. I shall deal with the latter first. . . .

[Justice La Forest then commented that broad wording is unavoidable in environmental protection legislation because of the breadth and complexity of the subject, and must be kept in mind in interpreting the relevant legislation.]

[135] I turn then to the background and purpose of the provisions under review. Part II does not deal with the protection of the environment generally. It deals simply with the control of toxic substances that may be released into the environment under certain restricted circumstances, and does so through a series of prohibitions to which penal sanctions are attached. . . .

[138] There was no intention that the Act should bar the use, importation or manufacture of all chemical products, but rather that it should affect only those substances that are dangerous to the environment, and then only if they are not regulated by law. ...

[141] The impugned Act appears to me to respond closely to these objectives. ... The subject of toxic substances is dealt with principally in Part II of the Act. It begins, we saw, with s. 11, which has been described as a "definition" in argument. While the provision has some properties of a definition, to speak of it in this way is misleading [The provision is not one that] describes with finality what the defined concept means. Rather, it sets forth that a substance can only be toxic, for the purposes of Part II, if it is entering or may enter the environment in a quantity or concentration or under conditions that result in the detrimental effects on the environment, human life and human health As well, the provision underlines that toxic as used in the Act includes substances that are not per se, toxic, but that may, when released into the environment in a certain quantity, concentration or condition, become toxic.

[142] I add that the determination of whether the various components of s. 11 are satisfied in respect of particular substances is by no means an easy task. Whether substances enter or may enter the environment in a quantity, concentration or conditions sufficient to have the effects set forth in that provision are not matters that are generally known. Rather these are matters that must be ascertained by assessments or tests set forth in s. 15, and in accordance with a procedure that requires consultation with the provinces, the informed community and the general public with a view to determining whether certain substances "are toxic or capable of becoming toxic," In light of this, it is difficult to believe "toxic" is not given its ordinary meaning in the Act, and that s. 11 is, therefore, simply a drafting tool for the demarcation of those aspects of toxicity that are to be considered in the tests required in the sections that follow.

[143] What the assessments described in Part II are aimed at is the selection of new items to add to the List of Toxic Substances set forth in Schedule I. Thus s. 11 is the first of a series of provisions respecting testing or assessment for toxicity.

[A long account of the process of decision-making has been omitted.]

[146] In summary, as I see it, the broad purpose and effect of Part II is to provide a procedure for assessing whether out of the many substances that may conceivably fall within the ambit of s. 11, some should be added to the List of Toxic Substances in Schedule I and, when an order to this effect is made, whether to prohibit the use of the substance so added in the manner provided in the regulations made under s. 34(1) subject to a penalty. These listed substances, toxic in the ordinary sense, are those whose use in a manner contrary to the regulations the Act ultimately prohibits. This is a limited prohibition applicable to a restricted number of substances. The prohibition is enforced by a penal sanction and is undergirded by a valid criminal objective, and so is valid criminal legislation.

[147] This, in my mind, is consistent with the terms of the statute, its purpose, and indeed common sense. It is precisely what one would expect of an environmental statute—a procedure to weed out from the vast number of substances potentially harmful to the environment or human life those only that pose significant risks of that type of harm. Specific targeting of toxic substances based on individual assessment avoids resort to unnecessarily broad prohibitions and their impact on the exercise of provincial powers. Having regard to the particular nature and requirements of effective environmental protection legislation, I do not share my colleagues' concern that the prohibition originates in a regulation, the breach of which gives rise to criminal sanction. The careful targeting of toxic substances is borne out by practice.

[149] I turn now to a more detailed examination of the provisions of the Act impugned in the present case, i.e. ss. 34 and 35. I mentioned earlier that the testing phase provided for under Part II ends with s. 32. Up to that point, Part II deals with the testing of substances that may be toxic when released into the environment as described in s. 11. The remainder of Part II, beginning with s. 33, however, is no longer addressed at substances that may be toxic in that broad sense. Rather it is more narrowly addressed at substances specifically listed in the List of Toxic Substances in Schedule I of the Act. In particular, s. 34 authorizes the Governor in Council to make regulations setting forth the restrictions imposed on those using or dealing with such substances. ...

[150] ... [Section] 34 precisely defines situations where the use of a substance in the List of Toxic Substances in Schedule I is prohibited, and these prohibitions are made subject to penal consequences. This is similar to the techniques Parliament has employed in providing for and imposing highly detailed requirements and standards in relation to food and drugs, which control their import, sale, manufacturing, labelling, packaging, processing and storing. ...

• • •

[152] ... [T]his kind of legislation does not constitute an invasion of provincial regulatory power As noted earlier, we are dealing with prohibitions accompanied by penal sanctions, so that we are really not concerned with whether these may incidentally affect property and civil rights but whether the prohibitions are directed at a public evil. ...

[154] In Crown Zellerbach, I expressed concern with the possibility of allocating legislative power respecting environmental pollution exclusively to Parliament. I would be equally concerned with an interpretation of the Constitution that effectively allocated to the provinces, under general powers such as property and civil rights, control over the environment in a manner that prevented Parliament from ... protecting the basic values of Canadians regarding the environment through the instrumentality of the criminal law power. ...

[155] Turning then to s. 35, I mentioned that it is ancillary to s. 34. It deals with emergency situations. The provision, it seems to me, indicates even more clearly a criminal purpose, and throws further light on the intention of s. 34 and of the Act generally. It can only be brought into play when the Ministers believe a substance is not specified in the List in Schedule I or is listed but is not subjected to control under s. 34. In such a case, they may make an interim order in respect of the substance if they believe "immediate action is required to deal with a significant danger to the environment or to human life or health."

LAMER CJ and IACOBUCCI J (Sopinka and Major JJ concurring) (dissenting):

The Pith and Substance of the Legislation

[30] ... [W]e cannot, with respect, agree with our colleague, La Forest J., that the criteria found in s. 11 are simply a "drafting tool" or that to speak of s. 11 as a definition is "misleading." The purpose of this section is to delineate from the category of "substances" (as defined by s. 3) those particular substances which qualify for regulation under ss. 34 and 35. It does so by specifying that "toxic" substances are, for the purposes of Part II, those which are capable of posing one of the threats listed above. This seems to us a clear statement of Parliament's intentions in this area. ...

[31] Nothing in the Act suggests that "toxic" is to be defined by any criteria other than those given in s. 11. ... If a substance (which can be essentially anything) poses or may pose a risk to human life or health, or to the environment upon which human life depends, or to any aspect of the environment itself, it qualifies as toxic according to the Act and may be made the subject of comprehensive federal regulation.

[33] In light of these factors, we believe the pith and substance of Part II of the Act lies in the wholesale regulation by federal agents of any and all substances which may harm any aspect of the environment or which may present a danger to human life or health. That is, the impugned provisions are in pith and substance aimed at protecting the environment and human life and health from any and all harmful substances by regulating these substances. ...

The Criminal Law Power

[34] Parliament has been given broad and exclusive power to legislate in relation to criminal law by virtue of s. 91(27). ... This power has traditionally been construed generously. ...

[35] Nevertheless, the criminal law power has always been made subject to two requirements: laws purporting to be upheld under s. 91(27) must contain prohibitions backed by penalties; and they must be directed at a "legitimate public purpose." ...

[38] The next step is therefore to examine the impugned provisions and determine whether they meet these criteria. In our view, they fall short. While the protection of the environment is a legitimate public purpose which could support the enactment of criminal legislation, we believe the impugned provisions of the Act are more an attempt to regulate environmental pollution than to prohibit or proscribe it. As such, they extend beyond the purview of criminal law and cannot be justified under s. 91(27).

[With respect to the requirement of a "legitimate public purpose," Lamer CJ and Iacobucci J found that, given the broad definition of "toxic" in s 11(a), which does not require a finding of danger to human life or health and could, for example, include a substance that affected groundhogs but had no effect on people, the legislation could not be supported as relating to health. However, they agreed with La Forest J that the protection of the environment was itself a legitimate criminal public purpose, analogous to those cited in the Margarine Reference.]

[44] However, we still do not feel that the impugned provisions qualify as criminal law under s. 91(27). While they have a legitimate criminal purpose, they fail to meet the other half of the Margarine Reference test. The structure of Part II of the Act indicates that they are not intended to prohibit environmental pollution, but simply to regulate it. As we will now explain in further detail, they are not, therefore, criminal law. ...

[45] Ascertaining whether a particular statute is prohibitive or regulatory in nature is often more of an art than a science. ...

[47] ... [A] criminal law does not have to consist solely of blanket prohibitions. It may, as La Forest J. noted in RJR-MacDonald, supra, at pp. 263-64, "validly contain exemptions for certain conduct without losing its status as criminal law." ... These exemptions may have the effect of establishing "regulatory" schemes which confer a measure of discretionary authority without changing the character of the law, as was the case in RJR-MacDonald.

[48] Determining when a piece of legislation has crossed the line from criminal to regulatory involves, in our view, considering the nature and extent of the regulation it creates, as well as the context within which it purports to apply. A scheme which is fundamentally regulatory, for example, will not be saved by calling it an "exemption." As Professor Hogg suggests [PW Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada, 3rd ed, vol 1 (Toronto: Carswell, 1992) (loose-leaf)], at p. 18-26, "the more elaborate [a] regulatory scheme, the more likely it is that the Court will classify the dispensation or exemption as being regulatory rather than criminal." At the same time, the subject matter of the impugned law may indicate the appropriate approach to take in characterizing the law as criminal or regulatory.

[49] Having examined the legislation at issue in this case, we have no doubt that it is essentially regulatory in nature, and therefore outside the scope of s. 91(27). In order to have an "exemption," there must first be a prohibition in the legislation from which that exemption is derived. Thus, the Tobacco Products Control Act, S.C. 1988, c. 20, at issue in RJR-MacDonald, supra, contained broad prohibitions against the advertising and promotion of tobacco products in Canada. ...

[51] In the legislation at issue in this appeal, on the other hand, no such prohibitions appear. ...

[52] [Section 34] is not ancillary to existing prohibitions found elsewhere in the Act or to exemptions to such prohibitions. It is not itself prohibitory in nature. ...

[54] Moreover, as Professor Hogg notes, supra, at p. 18-24:

A criminal law ordinarily consists of a prohibition which is to be self-applied by the persons to whom it is addressed. There is not normally any intervention by an administrative agency or official prior to the application of the law. The law is "administered" by law enforcement officials and courts of criminal jurisdiction only in the sense that they can bring to bear the machinery of punishment after the prohibited conduct has occurred.

[55] In this case, there is no offence until an administrative agency "intervenes." Sections 34 and 35 do not define an offence at all: which, if any, substances will be placed on the List of Toxic Substances, as well as the norms of conduct regarding these substances, are to be defined on an on-going basis by the Ministers of Health and the Environment. It would be an odd crime whose definition was made entirely dependent on the discretion of the Executive. ...

[57] Moreover, this process is further complicated by the equivalency provisions in s. 34(6) of the Act. Under this provision, the Governor in Council may exempt a province from the application of regulations made under ss. 34 or 35 if that province already has equivalent regulations in force there. This would be a very unusual provision for a criminal law. Provinces do not have the jurisdiction to enact criminal legislation, nor can the federal government delegate such jurisdiction to them. ... Any environmental legislation enacted by the provinces must, therefore, be of a regulatory nature. Deferring to provincial regulatory schemes on the basis that they are "equivalent" to federal regulations made under s. 34(1) creates a strong presumption that the federal regulations are themselves also of a regulatory, not criminal, nature.

[58] ... [In contrast to RJR-MacDonald, t]he impugned provisions in this case ... involve no ... general prohibition. In our view, they can only be characterized as a broad delegation of regulatory authority to the Governor in Council. The aim of these provisions is not to prohibit toxic substances or any aspect of their use, but simply to control the manner in which these substances will be allowed to interact with the environment.

[59] RJR-MacDonald, supra, may be further distinguished, in our view. The Tobacco Products Control Act addressed a narrow field of activity: the advertising and promotion of tobacco products. The impugned provisions here deal with a much broader area of concern: the release of substances into the environment. This Court has unanimously held that the environment is a subject matter of shared jurisdiction, that is, that the Constitution does not assign it exclusively to either the provinces or Parliament . . . A decision by the framers of the Constitution not to give one level of government exclusive control over a subject matter should, in our opinion, act as a signal that the two levels of government are meant to operate in tandem with regard to that subject matter. One level should not be allowed to take over the field so as to completely dwarf the presence of the other. This does not mean that no regulation will be permissible, but wholesale regulatory authority of the type envisaged by the Act is, in our view, inconsistent with the shared nature of jurisdiction over the environment. . .

[60] . . . Granting Parliament the authority to regulate so completely the release of substances into the environment by determining whether or not they are "toxic" would not only inescapably preclude the possibility of shared environmental jurisdiction; it would also infringe severely on other heads of power assigned to the provinces. . .

Peace, Order and Good Government

[Only the national concern branch of the POGG power was in issue, and the legislation was found to fail the test of "singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility" from R v Crown Zellerbach Canada Ltd, [1988] 1 SCR 401, 1988 CanLII 63 because it was not confined to a narrow range of toxic chemical substances such as PCBs, which have a severely harmful effect on human health and the environment and whose pollutant effects persist in the environment and are diffuse, but potentially covered a broader range of harmful substances whose effects may be temporary and more local in nature.]

NOTES

1. David Beatty is extremely critical of the Court's ruling in Hydro-Québec, arguing that it unjustifiably expands the federal government's criminal law power by removing the constraint of prohibition and penalty and undermines the federal–provincial equilibrium that previous decisions of the Supreme Court had established in the environmental area:

Because the outcome in the case is so congenial with most people's political instincts, it is easy to overlook or forgive the fact that jurisprudentially, Hydro-Québec poses a serious threat to the integrity of the country's federal structure and to the rule of law. The decision of the majority puts at risk the federal principle and the idea that both levels of government have a role to play in protecting the environment. If Parliament can justify everything it does under its power to make criminal law, provincial authority over even the local aspects of the environment will depend upon the sufferance of federal officials. Such a sweeping authorization of law making power, combined with a paramountcy rule which gives precedence to federal enactments whenever they conflict with parallel provincial laws, effectively would allow the federal government to dictate to the provinces what their environmental policies would be. As a practical matter it would reverse the Court's earlier rulings on the environment and give the federal government exclusive jurisdiction in the field.

See David M Beatty, "Polluting the Law to Protect the Environment" (1998) 9:2 Const Forum Const 55 at 58. Beatty argues that a more principled (and preferable) approach would have been to uphold the legislation under the POGG power by demonstrating provincial inability to effectively control the spread of toxic substances.

For a contrasting opinion on Hydro-Québec, see Jean Leclair, "The Supreme Court, the Environment, and the Construction of National Identity: R v Hydro-Québec" (1998) 4 Rev Const Stud 372. Leclair notes that even Quebec environmentalists strongly encourage federal involvement in environmental matters, given the general lack of interest shown by the provinces in protection of the environment. Leclair finds no difficulty with the Court's treatment of the criminal law power, arguing that, based on prior jurisprudence, s 91(27) need not be confined to traditional modes of sanctions so long as the law is aimed at the regulation of "public evils"—that is, conduct that endangers either the safety of the public or the integrity of the environment. On the issue of impact on provincial jurisdiction, he reasons (at 374):

Such an approach does not preclude the possibility of shared environmental jurisdiction. The provinces can still intervene to protect the environment. Under the criminal law power, Parliament can only prevent evils which offend against certain fundamental values, such as the protection of health and the protection of the environment. A province can regulate the very same activity or conduct, so long as it pursues an objective falling within its constitutional jurisdiction. In so doing, it will not be enacting criminal legislation.

Leclair goes on to express pessimism about the practical effect of the judgment in improving the quality of environmental protection in Canada, recognizing that the federal government may be unwilling to seriously assume its responsibilities to protect the environment. Nevertheless, he argues that even if it fails to accomplish anything for the environment, the Hydro-Québec decision is an important one from the perspective of nation-building and national identity (at 377-78):

In recognizing very extensive powers to Parliament in matters such as the protection of health (Imperial Tobacco) and the protection of the environment (Hydro-Québec), two highly sensitive issues for all Canadians, the Court participates in a process of legitimization of the Canadian state and in the construction of national identity. Not only do protection of health and the environment represent two values perceived by many as traditionally and typically "Canadian" values, but they also have the singular ability of enabling us to transcend the issues which constantly divide us (language, ethnic origin, etc.). In other words, they are values about which we can all agree. Thus they operate as symbols of what being Canadian really means. ... In identifying and defining [the "fundamental values of our society"] the Court actively participates in the construction of "Canadian identity."

2. As noted previously, in R v Malmo-Levine; R v Caine, 2003 SCC 74, the Court upheld the prohibition of possession of marijuana in the Narcotic Control Act as a valid exercise of the criminal law power. In obiter, it added:

[72] We do not exclude the possibility that the NCA might be justifiable under the "national concern" branch on the rationale adopted in R. v. Crown Zellerbach Canada Ltd., [1988] 1 S.C.R. 401, at p. 432, where we held that concerted action amongst provincial and federal entities, each acting within their respective spheres of legislative jurisdiction, was essential to deal with Canada's international obligations regarding the environment. In our view, however, the Court should decline in this case to revisit Parliament's residual authority to deal with drugs in general (or marihuana in particular) under the POGG power. If ... Parliament removes marihuana entirely from the criminal law framework, Parliament's continuing legislative authority to deal with marihuana use on a purely regulatory basis might well be questioned. ... Our conclusion that the present prohibition against the use of marihuana can be supported under the criminal law power makes it unnecessary to deal with the Attorney General's alternative position under the POGG power, and we leave this question open for another day.

NOTE: REFERENCE RE FIREARMS ACT (CAN)

In 1995, the federal government passed new gun control legislation. In addition to banning or restricting the use of certain types of firearms, the Firearms Act, SC 1995, c 39, which amended the existing Criminal Code provisions related to firearms, established a comprehensive licensing system for the possession and use of firearms and a national registration system for all firearms. Failure to comply with the licensing and registration requirements was made an offence under the Criminal Code. While licensing requirements for the use of certain firearms had for many years been found in part III of the Criminal Code, the new scheme extended the reach of the regulation to all firearms (thus including what are often referred to as "long guns" or "ordinary firearms," such as rifles and shotguns). It also provided for much more detailed regulation of licence conditions, including, for example, the specific locations at which firearms may be stored and used. Under the licensing provisions, applicants with criminal records involving drug offences or violence, or a history of mental illness, could be denied a licence. The national firearms registration system, requiring registration of all firearms, was a completely new addition. Registration of a firearm would not be permitted unless the applicant was licensed to possess that type of firearm.

In 1996, the province of Alberta challenged the federal government's power to enact the new gun control law by a reference to the Alberta Court of Appeal. The essence of the challenge was that the scheme was regulatory rather than criminal legislation because of the complexity of the legislation and the discretion given to the chief firearms officer. The province argued that the gun control scheme was indistinguishable from existing provincial property regulation schemes such as automobile and land title registries. The Court of Appeal upheld the legislation by a 3–2 majority, a result confirmed on appeal by the Supreme Court of Canada in Reference re Firearms Act (Can), 2000 SCC 31. In a unanimous judgment, the Court found that the gun control law fell within Parliament's jurisdiction over criminal law, thus continuing the trend in the Court's recent judgments toward an expansive interpretation of the criminal law power. The following paragraph provides a summary of the Court's reasons:

[4] We conclude that the gun control law comes within Parliament's jurisdiction over criminal law. The law in "pith and substance" is directed to enhancing public safety by controlling access to firearms through prohibitions and penalties. This brings it under the federal criminal law power. While the law has regulatory aspects, they are secondary to its primary criminal law purpose. The intrusion of the law into the provincial jurisdiction over property and civil rights is not so excessive as to upset the balance of federalism.

The Court had little difficulty finding a criminal law purpose:

[33] Gun control has traditionally been considered valid criminal law because guns are dangerous and pose a risk to public safety. ... The law is limited to restrictions which are directed at safety purposes. As such, the regulation of guns as dangerous products is a valid purpose within the criminal law power.

With respect to the more difficult issue of the requirement of criminal form, the Court focused on the Criminal Code prohibition of the possession of firearms without a licence and registration certificate. As a result of this method of analysis, the Court was not required to resort to the necessarily incidental doctrine to uphold the licensing and registration provisions as sufficiently integral to a larger scheme of criminal prohibition:

[34] The finding of a valid criminal law purpose does not end the inquiry, however. In order to be classified as a valid criminal law, that purpose must be connected to a prohibition backed by a penalty. The 1995 gun control law satisfies these requirements. Section 112 of the Firearms Act prohibits the possession of a firearm without a registration certificate. Section 91 of the Criminal Code (as amended by s. 139 of the Firearms Act) prohibits the possession of a firearm without a licence and a registration certificate. These prohibitions are backed by penalties: see s. 115 of the Firearms Act and s. 91 of the Code.

The complex, regulatory nature of the legislation was found not to preclude a finding of criminal prohibition:

[36] The first objection [of Alberta] is that the Firearms Act is essentially regulatory rather than criminal legislation because of the complexity of the law and the discretion it grants to the chief firearms officer. These aspects of the law, the provinces argue, are the hallmarks of regulatory legislation, not the criminal law

[37] Despite its initial appeal, this argument fails to advance Alberta's case. The fact that the Act is complex does not necessarily detract from its criminal nature. Other legislation, such as the Food and Drugs Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. F-27, and the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. 16 (4th Supp.), are legitimate exercises of the criminal law power, yet highly complex. Nor does the Act give the chief firearms officer or Registrar undue discretion. The offences are not defined by an administrative body, avoiding the difficulty identified in the dissenting judgment in Hydro-Québec They are clearly stated in the Act and the Criminal Code: no one shall possess a firearm without a proper licence and registration. While the Act provides for discretion to refuse to issue ... a registration certificate under s. 69, that discretion is restricted by the Act. ...

Gun control was distinguished from provincial regulatory schemes for the registration of motor vehicles and land titles because of the inherently dangerous nature of firearms:

[42] [The provincial] argument overlooks the different purposes behind the federal restrictions on firearms and the provincial regulation of other forms of property. Guns are restricted because they are dangerous. While cars are also dangerous, provincial legislatures regulate the possession and use of automobiles not as dangerous products but rather as items of property and as an exercise of civil rights, pursuant to the provinces' s. 92(13) jurisdiction

[43] The argument that the federal gun control scheme is no different from the provincial regulation of motor vehicles ignores the fact that there are significant distinctions between the roles of guns and cars in Canadian society. Both firearms and automobiles can be used for socially approved purposes. Likewise, both may cause death and injury. Yet their primary uses are fundamentally different. Cars are used mainly as means of transportation. Danger to the public is ordinarily unintended and incidental to that use. Guns, by contrast, pose a pressing safety risk in many if not all of their functions. ... Thus Parliament views guns as particularly dangerous and has sought to combat that danger by extending its licensing and registration scheme to all classes of firearms. Parliament did not enact the Firearms Act to regulate guns as items of property. The Act does not address insurance or permissible locations of use. Rather, the Act addresses those aspects of gun control which relate to the dangerous nature of firearms and the need to reduce misuse.

Finally, in an interesting doctrinal development, the Court explicitly considered the question of whether its holding would upset the federal–provincial balance of power:

[48] ... Alberta and the provincial intervenors submit that this law inappropriately trenches on provincial powers and that upholding it as criminal law will upset the balance of federalism. ... [It] is beyond debate that an appropriate balance of power must be maintained between the central and provincial levels of government, as this court affirmed in Reference re Secession of Quebec, [1998] 2 S.C.R. 217 The question is not whether such a balance is necessary, but whether the 1995 gun control law upsets that balance.

The Court went on to find that the gun control law did not upset the balance of power because its effects on property rights were incidental—the Act did not hinder the ability of the provinces to regulate the property and civil rights aspects of guns, nor did the law precipitate the federal government's entry into a new field, given that gun control had been the subject of federal legislation since Confederation.

In 2012, Parliament introduced legislation to abolish the long-gun registry. Among the opponents to abolition was the government of Quebec, which announced plans to create its own registry and asked the federal government to turn over data pertaining to guns connected to Quebec. After the federal government refused and amended its bill to provide for the destruction of all data pertaining to long guns, Quebec referred the question of the constitutionality of the federal plan to destroy the data to the courts. In Quebec (AG) v Canada (AG), 2015 SCC 14, excerpted near the end of this chapter, a narrow majority of the Supreme Court of Canada upheld the constitutionality of the federal action. The Court unanimously reiterated that form requirements are not applicable when legislation repeals a criminal offence. By a narrow majority, however, it also held that principles of cooperative federalism do not impose constraints on how one level of government exercises its powers on matters that fall within its exclusive jurisdiction.

Reference re Assisted Human Reproduction Act

2010 SCC 61

[In 2004, Parliament enacted the Assisted Human Reproduction Act, SC 2004, c 2 [AHRA]. The principles underlying the Act were set out in s 2:

2. The Parliament of Canada recognizes and declares that
 - (a) the health and well-being of children born through the application of assisted human reproductive technologies must be given priority in all decisions respecting their use;
 - (b) the benefits of assisted human reproductive technologies ... can be most effectively secured by taking appropriate measures for the protection and promotion of human health, safety, dignity and rights in [their] use ... ;
 - (c) while all persons are affected by these technologies, women more than men are directly and significantly affected ... ;
 - (d) the principle of free and informed consent must be promoted and applied as a fundamental condition of the use of human reproductive technologies;
 - (e) persons who seek to undergo assisted reproduction procedures must not be discriminated against ... ;
 - (f) trade in [reproductive capabilities] and ... exploitation of [persons] for commercial ends raise health and ethical concerns that justify their prohibition; and
 - (g) human individuality and diversity, and the integrity of the human genome, must be preserved and protected.

The Act divided activities relating to human reproduction into "prohibited" and "controlled" activities. The first category, "prohibited activities," was contained in ss 5 to 9 of the Act:

- s 5 prohibited, inter alia, human cloning, creating an in vitro embryo for any purpose other than creating a human being, and creating hybrids or chimeras for the purpose of transplanting them into a human being or a non-human life form;
- ss 6 and 7, reiterating the principle of non-commercialization of the human body, prohibited any form of payment to surrogate mothers as well as the purchase or sale of ova, sperm, in vitro embryos, and human cells or genes;
- s 8 prohibited the use or removal of human reproductive material for the purpose of creating an embryo, as well as the use of an in vitro embryo without the donor's consent; and
- finally, s 9 prohibited the removal or use of ova or sperm of a person under 18 years of age.

The prohibition of each of the activities in ss 5 to 9 was absolute.

The second category, "controlled activities," comprised ss 10 to 13 of the Act. Unlike those in the first category, these activities were prohibited only if they were not performed in accordance with the regulations and under a licence issued by the Assisted Human Reproduction Agency of Canada (the Agency). The controlled activities included manipulation of reproductive material to create embryos, combining human and other species' genomes, and paying donors and surrogate mothers.

These "controlled activities" targeted both clinical practice and research in assisted reproduction. Section 13 provided that these controlled activities could only be exercised at a facility that had been licensed by the Agency.

The remainder of the Act, ss 14 to 68, contained provisions regarding the collection of information about persons who used assisted reproductive technology and the administration and enforcement of the Act. The latter provisions included a licensing scheme for the controlled activities under the authority of the Agency and provisions concerning penalties, regulations, and equivalency agreements with provinces.

The Quebec government accepted that ss 5 to 7 of the AHRA were valid criminal law but referred the question of the validity of much of the rest of the Act to the Quebec Court of Appeal, which struck down those other provisions. The Attorney General of Canada appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada.

The Attorney General of Quebec argued that the pith and substance of the impugned provisions was regulation of all aspects of medical practices related to assisted human reproduction, invaded provincial powers, and were accordingly invalid. By contrast, the Attorney General of Canada submitted that the Act was valid pursuant to both the federal criminal law power and the double aspect doctrine, according to which two levels of government may make laws on different aspects of a single field.

By a narrow majority, the Supreme Court struck down most of the AHRA. Four members of the Court would have upheld the Act in its entirety. Four characterized the law's matter as an attempt to regulate a health service and invalidated ss 8 and 9 of the prohibited activities and almost all the provisions relating to the controlled activities. The decisive opinion, written by Cromwell J, characterized the matter of the legislation as regulation of virtually every aspect of assisted human reproduction, and thus an infringement of provincial powers, but he upheld all the provisions dealing with prohibited activities, and also some of those relating to controlled activities, as within the federal criminal law power.

The two major sets of reasons—those of McLachlin CJ and those of LeBel and Deschamps JJ—engaged in a wide-ranging review of federalism principles and doctrine, including the double aspect doctrine, the ancillary powers doctrine, the scope of the criminal law power, especially in relation to health, the principle of subsidiarity, and provincial powers over local matters and property and civil rights.]

McLACHLIN CJ (Binnie, Fish, and Charron JJ concurring):

[1] ... Among the most important moral issues faced by this generation are questions arising from technologically assisted reproduction The question on appeal is whether this law represents a proper exercise of Parliament's criminal law power. I conclude that it does.

[2] Since time immemorial, human beings have been conceived naturally. Human beings have sought to enhance this process, to be sure; fertility rites, prayers and various medical and quasi-medical prescriptives to enhance fertility are part of human history. Human beings have also sought to constrain the process, through rules governing sexual conduct and marriage. ... Through morality, often abetted by the criminal law, society has traditionally found collective answers to reproductive issues. Yet, until recently, the fundamental processes by which new human beings were conceived remained largely beyond technological manipulation.

[3] This changed in the latter part of the 20th century [S]cientists found ways to disassemble and recombine genetic material within the ovum. Implantation techniques allowed couples and surrogate mothers to carry pregnancies created in a petri dish to term. At the far end of the spectrum lay the possibility of combining animal and human forms or reproducing an individual through cloning.

[4] These new techniques raise important moral, religious and juridical questions. The new questions do not fit neatly within the traditional legal frameworks that have developed in a world of natural conception. ... Traditional criminal law imposed no obvious restraints and offered no clear answers to these questions.

[Chief Justice McLachlin described the consultations that preceded enactment of the AHRA and the challenge brought by the Attorney General of Quebec, noting that the constitutionality of ss 5 to 7 of the Act as valid criminal law had been conceded.]

[10] My colleagues LeBel and Deschamps JJ. conclude that the impugned sections of the Act ... are ultra vires the federal Parliament. I respectfully disagree. The prohibitions in ss. 5 to 7 are conceded to be valid criminal legislation. In my view, the remaining prohibitions in ss. 8 to 13 are also valid criminal law.

[After outlining the Act, McLachlin CJ listed three issues: (1) the validity of the legislative scheme as a whole, (2) the validity of the "controlled activities" prohibitions, and (3) the validity of the administrative provisions under the ancillary powers doctrine.]

A. The Validity of the Legislative Scheme as a Whole

[16] Since the Attorney General of Quebec is challenging individual provisions of the federal scheme, this Court must examine the whole scheme and the impugned provisions separately (General Motors of Canada Ltd. v. City National Leasing, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 641, at p. 666). Ordinarily, this Court would begin by examining the impugned provisions in order to determine if and to what extent they intrude on the provincial sphere of competence

[17] However, in the case at bar it is necessary to examine the whole scheme first before we can make sense of the challenged provisions. ... In this case, the Attorney General of Quebec is challenging the bulk of the Assisted Human Reproduction Act ... [I]t is impossible to meaningfully consider the provisions at issue without first considering the nature of the whole scheme.

[18] Therefore, the first question is whether the matter of the statutory scheme, viewed as a whole, is a valid exercise of federal power. The second question is whether its individual provisions are also valid. If the scheme as a whole is valid, but some of its provisions invalid, the invalid provisions are severed, leaving the remaining provisions intact. ...

(1) Characterizing the Legislative Scheme

[21] The issue is as follows: Is the Assisted Human Reproduction Act properly characterized as legislation to curtail practices that may contravene morality, create public health evils or put the security of individuals at risk, as the Attorney General of Canada contends? Or should it be characterized as legislation to promote positive medical practices associated with assisted reproduction, as the Attorney General of Quebec contends? ...

[22] To determine which characterization is correct, ... [o]ne must ask, "[w]hat in fact does the law do and why?"

[24] The text of the Act suggests that its dominant purpose is to prohibit inappropriate practices, rather than to promote beneficial ones. It is true that the Act establishes a scheme to control assisted reproduction on a national level, and this initiative necessarily touches on provincial jurisdiction over medical research and practice. However, the dominant thrust of the Act is prohibitory, and the aspects that concern the provision of health services do not rise to the level of pith and substance. As s. 2 of the Act explains, the purpose of the Act is to safeguard against practices that may offend fundamental values and rights and harm human health, safety and dignity. The emphasis is on preventing practices that offend these values and produce this harm.

[25] ... The Act is essentially a series of prohibitions, followed by a set of subsidiary provisions for their administration.

[26] The Attorney General of Quebec concedes that the prohibitions in ss. 5 to 7 of the Act are valid criminal law. In my view, the prohibitions in ss. 8 to 13 advance the same criminal law purpose. Sections 8 to 13, viewed in context, are not aimed at promoting the beneficial aspects of assisted reproduction. While they distinguish the beneficial from the reprehensible, it is only for the purpose of carving out the latter. In this sense, the prohibitions in ss. 5 to 13 all advance a common purpose, but do so in a manner tailored to the conduct that they address. Conduct that is always reprehensible is prohibited absolutely (ss. 5 to 9). Conduct that is reprehensible in particular situations is prohibited selectively [ss. 10 to 13] The scheme of the Act is to carve out from the broader field of assisted reproduction conduct that Parliament considers criminal. These prohibitions give the Act its content and define its purpose.

[28] My colleagues rely on the Baird Report [Proceed with Care: Final Report of the Royal Commission on New Reproductive Technologies (Ottawa: Minister of Government Services Canada, 1993)] as proof of Parliament's intention to impose national medical standards under the guise of criminal law, e.g., at para. 206:

It is clear that the Baird Commission wanted certain activities to be denounced and prohibited because, in its view, there was a consensus that they were reprehensible. But the Commission also wanted assisted human reproduction and related research activities to be regulated for the purpose of establishing uniform standards that would apply across Canada. Thus, it can be seen that the distinction drawn in the [Act] between prohibited activities and controlled activities corresponds to the two distinct categories of activities for which the Baird Commission recommended two distinct approaches with different purposes. [Emphasis added.]

... [According to my colleagues, t]he Act impermissibly gathers both purposes under the broad umbrella of the criminal law. ... [I]t follows[, they say,] that large parts of the Act are invalid.

[29] [My colleagues treat] the Baird Report as proof of the purpose behind the Assisted Human Reproduction Act. But ... [t]he Baird Commission was writing a policy analysis (not a constitutional law paper) on a subject thought to raise serious issues of morality. ... [T]he fact that the Baird Commission may have referred to positive aspects of assisted reproduction technology—benefits all acknowledge—does not establish that these benefits were the focus of Parliament's efforts.

[30] [Second, this argument] ... rests on an artificial dichotomy between reprehensible conduct and beneficial practices. ... Prohibiting or regulating bad conduct may in fact produce benefits. This is a common consequence of many criminal laws. What matters for purposes of constitutionality is not whether a criminal law has beneficial consequences, but whether its dominant purpose is criminal [31] Turning to the effects of the Act, this legislation clearly has an impact on the regulation of medical research and practice, and hospital administration. Researchers, practitioners and hospitals will be subject to both the Act and the regulations it contemplates.

[32] However, the doctrine of pith and substance permits either level of government to enact laws that have "substantial impact on matters outside its jurisdiction" The issue in such cases is to determine the dominant effect of the law. Viewed as a whole, the dominant effect of the Act is to prohibit a number of practices which Parliament considers immoral and/or which it considers a risk to health and security, not to promote the positive aspects of assisted reproduction.

[34] I conclude that the pith and substance of the Act is properly characterized as the prohibition of negative practices associated with assisted reproduction.

(2) Does the Matter of the Act Come Within Section 91(27)?

[35] Having characterized the matter to which the Act relates, the next question is whether it comes within the scope of the federal criminal law In order to answer this question, we must consider whether the matter satisfies the three requirements of valid criminal law: (1) a prohibition; (2) backed by a penalty; (3) with a criminal law purpose

[36] As already discussed, the Act, properly characterized, imposes prohibitions backed by penalties, thereby fulfilling the first two requirements of a valid criminal law. Admittedly, some of the provisions permit exceptions. However, the criminal law does not require absolute prohibitions To be sure, a large portion of the scheme is regulatory. However, it is open to Parliament to create regulatory schemes under the criminal law power, provided they further the law's criminal law purpose.

[37] My colleagues LeBel and Deschamps JJ. [view] the provisions of the Act that prohibit activities unless conducted in accordance with federal regulations [as] designed to promote beneficial practices, while I view them as carve-outs from prohibition. They further argue that since the doctrine of paramountcy allows federal legislation to prevail over provincial legislation in the case of conflicts, finding the regulatory provisions intra vires would effectively oust provincial power over health.

[38] In my view, the requirement that a criminal law contain a prohibition prevents Parliament from undermining the provincial competence in health. The federal criminal law power may only be used to prohibit conduct, and may not be employed to promote beneficial medical practices. Federal laws (such as the one in this case) may involve large carve-outs for practices that Parliament does not wish to prohibit. However, the use of a carve-out only means that a particular practice is not prohibited, not that the practice is positively allowed by the federal law. This has important implications for the doctrine of federal paramountcy. If a province enacted stricter regulations than the federal government, there would be no conflict in operation between the two sets of provisions since it would be possible to comply with both. ... There may be a conflict between a criminal law and a less strict provincial scheme. However, in such a case, Parliament's stricter scheme would be acting as a prohibition. In this way, the prohibition requirement for criminal laws acts as a major limitation on the effect of s. 91(27).

(3) Does the Act Serve a Valid Criminal Law Purpose?

[43] ... The criminal law must be able to respond to new and emerging matters of public concern that go to the health and security of Canadians and the fundamental values that underpin Canadian society. ... To constitute a valid criminal law purpose, a law's purpose must address a public concern relating to peace, order, security, morality, health, or some similar purpose. At the same time, extensions that have the potential to undermine the constitutional division of powers should be rejected.

[44] Whether a federal law falls within Parliament's criminal law power ... is a question of which level of government has jurisdiction to enact this law. ... The degree to which the Act may impact on individual liberties is not relevant to this inquiry. ...

[45] It follows that this case does not require us to balance the impact of the Act on liberty against the importance of Parliament's legislative objective. ... I differ from my colleagues LeBel and Deschamps JJ., who argue that there is insufficient societal consensus to justify the restrictions that the Act imposes on individual liberties. With respect, the language of justification has no place in the pith and substance analysis.

[46] Criminal law objectives, such as peace, order, security, morality, and health do not occupy separate watertight compartments. ... Criminal laws will often engage more than one objective, and the objectives may overlap with each other.

[48] ... I conclude that upholding morality is the principal criminal law object of the Act. What is at stake is ... Parliament's power to enact general norms for the whole of Canada to meet the pressing moral concerns raised by the techniques of assisted reproduction. The objects of prohibiting public health evils and promoting security play supporting roles with respect to some provisions. Taken together, these objects confirm that the Act serves valid criminal law purposes. ...

(a) Morality

[50] ... Moral disapprobation is itself sufficient to ground criminal law when it addresses issues that are integral to society. ... Parliament need only have a reasonable basis to expect that its legislation will address a moral concern of fundamental importance, even if hard evidence is unavailable on some points because "the jury is still out": Malmo-Levine, at para. 78. Whether the law violates the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees of individual liberty is another issue.

• • •

(b) Health

[52] ... In order to preserve the balance of powers, Parliament's ability to pass criminal laws on the basis of health must be circumscribed. To this end, criminal laws for the protection of health must address a "legitimate public health evil"

[53] It has proven difficult to articulate a precise definition of a legitimate public health evil

[54] Behind the diversity in the cases that have upheld criminal laws on the basis of public health evils lie three constant features. In each of these cases, the criminal law was grounded in (1) human conduct (2) that has an injurious or undesirable effect (3) on the health of members of the public.

[55] Human conduct causing harm is the fundamental stuff of the criminal law.

[56] No constitutional threshold level of harm, as such, constrains Parliament's ability to target conduct causing these evils. ... This said, the need to establish a reasonable apprehension of harm means that conduct with little or no threat of harm is unlikely to qualify as a "public health evil": Malmo-Levine, at para. 212, per Arbour J., dissenting, but not on this point.

[57] My colleagues LeBel and Deschamps JJ. argue that there is little to distinguish assisted reproduction from any other emerging field of medical practice. All medical practices come with risks. This, they argue, does not bring those practices within the federal criminal law power. The answer to this argument, confirmed by the cases, is that, provided it is not a colourable intrusion upon provincial jurisdiction (i.e. one not supported by a valid criminal law purpose), Parliament is entitled to use the criminal law power to safeguard the public from [injurious or undesirable] conduct

[The discussion of the protection of personal security, relied on only peripherally in this case, has been omitted. Chief Justice McLachlin went on to conclude that the AHRA, viewed as whole, was grounded in valid criminal law purposes.]

[64] I conclude that the legislative scheme ... addresses legitimate criminal law objects. As discussed above, the other two elements of criminal law, prohibition and penalty, are established on the face of the Act. I therefore conclude that the Assisted Human Reproduction Act, viewed as a whole, is valid criminal legislation.

[65] It may be appropriate at this point to address the arguments relied on by LeBel and Deschamps JJ. in support of their view that the criminal law must be circumscribed to prevent trenching on provincial powers to regulate health.

[67] My colleagues' conclusion takes them into untravelled constitutional territory. "Double occupancy" of a field of endeavour, such as health, is a permanent feature of the Canadian constitutional order. ... In holding that the double aspect doctrine does not apply to this field of double occupancy, my colleagues assert a new approach of provincial exclusivity that is supported by neither precedent nor practice.

[68] The Constitution Act, 1867, allocates to Parliament jurisdiction over the criminal law precisely to permit Parliament to create uniform norms. Circumscription of the ambit of the criminal law to avoid trenching on provincial regulation runs counter to this purpose.

[69] ... [M]y colleagues repeatedly refer to the principle of subsidiarity (e.g., para. 273). ... Since the provincial governments are closest to health care, the argument goes, they should exercise power in this area, free from interference of the criminal law. Subsidiarity therefore favours provincial jurisdiction.

[70] ... [T]his argument misconstrues the principle of subsidiarity. As L'Heureux-Dubé J. explained in 114957 Canada Ltée (Spraytech, Société d'arrosage) v. Hudson (Town), 2001 SCC 40, [2001] 2 S.C.R. 241, at para. 3, in an area of jurisdictional overlap, the level of government that is closest to the matter will often introduce complementary legislation to accommodate local circumstances [but that law will complement rather than frustrate federal legislation.] ...

• • •

[72] More fundamentally, subsidiarity does not override the division of powers Subsidiarity might permit the provinces to introduce legislation that complements the Assisted Human Reproduction Act, but it does not preclude Parliament from legislating on the shared subject of health.

[76] As I explained earlier, I do not share the view that the Act can be characterized as legislation in relation to the positive aspects of assisted reproduction. However, my colleagues' argument on this point raises a more fundamental issue. Their reasoning, with respect, substitutes a judicial view of what is good and what is bad for the wisdom of Parliament. ... My colleagues break new ground in enlarging the judiciary's role in assessing valid criminal law objectives. It is ground on which I respectfully decline to tread.

[77] For the foregoing reasons, I cannot subscribe to the picture of Canadian federalism painted by my colleagues, where the federal criminal law power would be circumscribed by provincial competencies. I share their view that the criminal law cannot be used to eviscerate the provincial power to regulate health. Our Constitution prevents this from occurring, however, by requiring that criminal laws further a valid criminal law objective, and that they adopt the form of a prohibition. These requirements allow for the nationwide criminal norms that the Constitution intended, while ensuring adequate space for provincial regulation.

B. Do the Prohibitions in Sections 8 to 13 of the Act Constitute Valid Criminal Law?

[78] ... Even if a law is in pith and substance criminal legislation, it may nevertheless contain provisions which are neither valid criminal prohibitions, nor ancillary to valid criminal prohibitions. An invalid legislative provision is not rendered valid merely because it is included in a legislative scheme that, viewed globally, is valid: General Motors. In each case, the question is whether the provision, considered in the context of the larger scheme of the Act, is valid criminal legislation, in terms of prohibition, penalty and criminal law purpose.

[80] The challenged prohibitions in ss. 8 to 13 generally engage the same morality, health, and security issues as the prohibitions in ss. 5 to 7, as discussed more fully below. Sections 10 and 11 amplify the scope of the prohibitions in s. 5, and s. 12 addresses the pecuniary issues that arise in ss. 6 and 7.

[81] ... [T]he cases establish that criminal prohibitions may permit exceptions, and that the exceptions may take the form of a regulatory scheme. Thus, the form of ss. 8 to 13 is itself insufficient to remove these sections from the scope of the federal criminal law power.

[82] The Attorney General of Quebec's argument appears to be that the extent of the regulation and the unpublished nature of the regulations distinguishes this case from cases like RJR-MacDonald and the Firearms Reference, where regulatory schemes were upheld as valid criminal law.

[83] I turn first to the fact that the regulations have not yet been published.

[84] ... Any regulations passed under the enabling statute will be valid only insofar as they further valid criminal law goals

[85] ... [T]he extent or comprehensiveness of a criminal law regulatory scheme does not affect its constitutionality. Provided a regulatory scheme reflects and furthers proper criminal law goals, it remains securely anchored in the federal criminal law power. Extensive and comprehensive regulatory schemes were found to be valid criminal law in RJR-MacDonald and the Firearms Reference.

[86] The Attorney General of Quebec's real point appears to be that the regulatory scheme imposed by ss. 8 to 13 is of such magnitude that medical and research regulation becomes the dominant character, or pith and substance, of these provisions,

[87] This argument, ... requires that the prohibitions in ss. 8 to 13 be viewed in isolation from the rest of the Act

[88] Viewed in the context of the legislative scheme as a whole, the dominant character of the prohibitions in ss. 5 to 7 is to criminalize conduct that Parliament has found to be fundamentally immoral, a public health evil, a threat to personal security, or some combination of these factors.

[Chief Justice McLachlin proceeded to analyze ss 8 to 13 in detail. The excerpts below focus on ss 10 and 13, both of which are in the part of the Act dealing with controlled activities.]

[95] ... Section 10 of the Act is the most problematic of the impugned provisions. By prohibiting all the listed medical procedures unless they are performed by a licence holder in compliance with regulations, this section allows for federal oversight of research and medical practice. The ultimate impact of the provision will be determined by the future regulations. If the federal government were to implement regulations enacting a complete code of conduct for doctors, and regulating every component of the delivery of fertility services, the regulations would be ultra vires. However, as noted above, a finding that s. 10 is intra vires would not mean that the future regulations promulgated under this section will necessarily be valid as well. Should future regulations go too far, they will be ultra vires. The only question before us now is whether s. 10 itself falls under the criminal law power.

[96] ... The Attorney General of Canada contends that licensing is the only means of identifying where suspect practices are performed, and by whom. In turn, the regulations introduced under s. 10 provide a flexible means with which to carve out those aspects of genetic manipulation that are unacceptable from the perspective of morality, health, or security.

[97] The Attorney General of Canada identifies a number of health risks that it seeks to target with s. 10. [A detailed account of these is omitted.] Conduct that creates a serious risk of these problems arguably rises to the level of a public health evil, and Parliament is entitled to criminalize it.

[98] The health aspects of s. 10 are buttressed by morality concerns. ... Social mores have changed over time on these issues, but that is not the point. The point is simply that s. 10 touches on important moral concerns that have long been held to fall within the s. 91(27) criminal law power

[100] These [new] developments raise the prospect of novel harms to society, as the Baird Report amply documents. The "commodification of women and children" (p. 718); sex-selective abortions (p. 896); cross-species hybrids; ectogenesis with the potential to "dehumanize motherhood"; "baby farms" (p. 637); saviour siblings (a child whose primary purpose is to cure another child suffering from a genetic disorder); devaluation of persons with disabilities; discrimination based on ethnicity or genetic status (p. 28); and exploitation of the vulnerable—these are but some of the moral concerns raised in the Report. ... [I]t cannot be seriously questioned that Parliament is able to prohibit or regulate them.

[101] Had Parliament wished to prohibit absolutely the practices targeted in s. 10—the altering, manipulation and treatment of human reproductive material—it could have done so

[102] Section 10 must also be read in light of s. 68 of the Act, which lifts the application of the federal law in any province [pursuant to federal–provincial agreement.] ... This provision suggests that Parliament's object when enacting s. 10 was to establish "minimum federal safety and ethical standards" for fertility services, while leaving the provinces in charge of regulating and monitoring the medical profession

• • •

[105] I conclude that s. 10 is valid criminal legislation.

[Chief Justice McLachlin had the following to say about s 13, which absolutely prohibited licensed activities in unlicensed premises:]

• • •

[117] The location where assisted reproduction takes place is important. ... The suitability of assisted reproduction facilities is vital to avoiding harms related to morality and health. In turn, these facilities must be identified so that they can be subject to inspection and control. As with ss. 10 to 12, licensing provides the only practical means of enacting a prohibition on substandard facilities.

[118] The production of human life in clandestine facilities may well constitute a public health evil.

[120] The prohibition on unlicensed facilities does not oust the ability of the provinces to designate the facilities in which assisted reproduction procedures are performed. ... Section 13 does not displace this provincial oversight, but merely requires a supplementary federal licence

[121] I conclude that s. 13 addresses serious harms both to society and the individuals involved in assisted reproduction procedures. It is valid criminal law.

[Having concluded that the prohibitions in ss 8 to 13 were valid criminal law, McLachlin CJ then addressed the constitutionality of ss 14 to 61 and 65 to 68, which provided for the administration and enforcement of the Act. These sections established a system of information management, created the Agency, authorized the agency to issue licences and generally enforce the Act, provided for penalties and promulgation of regulations, and permitted equivalency agreements with provinces. Chief Justice McLachlin concluded that even though many of these provisions did not fall within the criminal law power, they were valid under the ancillary powers doctrine.

Applying the test from General Motors, she held first that the impugned provisions were a minor intrusion on the provincial powers because: (1) the provincial powers of ss 92(13) and 92(16) were broad, thus making any federal intrusion more tolerable; (2) the impugned provisions related only to the Act's administration and enforcement, and thus they affected only "a small corner of the vast topography of provincial powers over health" (at para 135); and (3) history supported Parliament's use of its criminal law power to address issues of morality, health, and security. Second, McLachlin CJ found that, because the intrusion was minor, the "rational and functional connection" branch of the ancillary powers doctrine was the appropriate standard. Third, she applied that standard and concluded that it was satisfied—the ancillary provisions were rationally and functionally connected to the valid criminal law provisions in ss 5 to 13 of the Act. In sum, the Act was upheld as constitutional in its entirety.]

• • •

LeBEL and DESCHAMPS JJ (Abella and Rothstein JJ concurring):

[Justices LeBel and Deschamps reviewed the history of the Act and described its structure and contents, noting the two categories of prohibited and controlled activities.]

[176] We will return to the different parts of the AHR Act below. For now, we will simply note that substantive and formal distinctions are drawn between prohibited activities and controlled activities. The dichotomy ... appears clearly from Parliament's statement of principles in s. 2 and from the titles used in the Act itself. ...

[177] In sum, the ... distinctions between controlled activities and activities ... stem from the legislative history, from the nature of the activities and from how they are presented in the AHR Act. The Chief Justice interprets the AHR Act very differently. She disregards its legislative history, even criticizing us for attaching importance to the Baird Report. ... We can only emphasize that there is no factual basis whatsoever for the Chief Justice's interpretation. ...

[182] ... Of particular interest to us in the case at bar is [the unwritten constitutional principle of] federalism. According to this principle, the powers of the different levels of government in a federation are co-ordinate, not subordinate, powers. ...

[183] ... [T]he proper operation of Canadian federalism sometimes requires the application of a principle of subsidiarity in the arrangement of relationships between the legislative powers of the two levels of government. According to this principle, legislative action is to be taken by the government that is closest to the citizen and is thus considered to be in the best position to respond to the citizen's concerns (on the application of this principle in public law, see 114957 Canada Ltée (Spraytech, Société d'arrosage) v. Hudson (Town), 2001 SCC 40, [2001] 2 S.C.R. 241, at para. 3). In Reference re Secession of Quebec, ... the Court recognized the possibility inherent in a federal system of applying the principle of subsidiarity, thereby enhancing its democratic dimension and democratic value added. ... This principle is therefore an important component of Canadian federalism.

[184] In performing their function as interpreters of the law in the context of Canada's federal system, the Canadian courts have developed a number of doctrines based on constitutional principles, two of which could apply in the instant case: the double aspect doctrine and the ancillary powers doctrine. Because it can be difficult to legislate effectively within a rigid, formal framework, these two doctrines introduce a measure of flexibility that enables governments at different levels to cooperate in pursuing their legislative mandates. The constitutional analysis required by these two doctrines involves identifying the pith and substance of the impugned statute or provisions. ... We will use the expression "dominant purpose," which incorporates all the necessary nuances.

[185] Activities, acts or conduct can sometimes be viewed from different normative perspectives, one relating to a federal power and the other to a provincial power. Where this is the case, the double aspect doctrine is engaged. ...

[188] As a result of some clarifications made in Canadian Western Bank, at para. 32, ... we now prefer—rather than speaking of an "encroachment" ... to use the word "overflow" when discussing the ancillary powers doctrine. ...

[Justices LeBel and Deschamps described the ancillary powers doctrine, stressing that the first step is to identify the pith and substance of each impugned provision as precisely as possible, avoiding vague or general characterizations. In the course of this discussion, they drew an analogy to Charter analysis.]

• • •

[190] ... The identification of the pith and substance of a provision or a statute is ... subject to the same requirement of precision as the identification of the purpose ... under s. 1 of the [Charter]. ... If vague characterizations of the pith and substance of provisions were accepted, this could lead not only to the dilution of and confusion with respect to [constitutional doctrine] ... but also to an erosion of the scope of provincial powers

• • •

[192] Despite its importance, the identification of the pith and substance remains only one part of the first step in applying the ancillary powers doctrine. It is also necessary to assess the extent of the overflow. ... [I]f the provisions—considered in isolation—would be ultra vires the legislature that enacted them, the court must review the extent to which they are integrated into the otherwise valid statute of which they form a part. ... There are two applicable concepts: rationality—or simple functionality, to use the language from General Motors—and necessity.

[193] The need to maintain the balance resulting from the division of legislative powers ... justifies the adoption of a variable test. ... [T]he more necessary the provisions are to the effectiveness of the rules set out in the part of the statute that is not open to challenge, the greater the acceptable overflow will be.

[194] ... Since the purposes and effects of a statute's many provisions can be different, it is important to consider the impugned provisions separately before considering their connection with the other provisions of the statute.

• • •

[196] ... [Clare must be taken to maintain the constitutional balance of powers at all stages of the constitutional analysis. ...

• • •

VII. Analysis of the Impugned Provisions

• • •

A. Pith and Substance of the Impugned Provisions

• • •

(1) Purpose of the Provisions

[202] The words of the statute itself can of course be of assistance in the identification of the purpose of impugned provisions. However, the context of the enactment of the statute often reveals as much as, if not more than, the words used. ... We must therefore go back to the Baird Commission's studies and the extensive work that followed, as well as to the bills that preceded the enactment of the AHR Act. ...

• • •

[206] It is clear that the Baird Commission wanted certain activities to be denounced and prohibited because, in its view, there was a consensus that they were reprehensible. But the Commission also wanted assisted human reproduction and related research activities to be regulated for the purpose of establishing uniform standards that would apply across Canada. Thus, it can be seen that the distinction drawn in the AHR Act between prohibited activities and controlled activities corresponds to the two distinct categories of activities for which the Baird Commission recommended two distinct approaches with different purposes.

[Justices LeBel and Deschamps reviewed the 1995 moratorium on certain reproductive practices; the 1995 report of a federal discussion group on embryo research; the first three bills introduced in Parliament, which dealt only with the prohibited activities; and the scheme of the 2004 Act, with its distinction between prohibited and controlled activities, to conclude that Parliament had adopted the Baird Commission's recommendation of two distinct approaches.]

• • •

[213] In short, while it is true that certain groups in Canadian society are opposed to assisted human reproductive technologies ... , the evidence shows that assisted human reproduction is usually regarded as a form of scientific progress that is of great value to individuals dealing with infertility problems. ... [I]t is clear from the evidence that research into such technologies is considered to be not only desirable, but necessary.

• • •

[217] We therefore cannot agree with the Attorney General of Canada that the impugned provisions concerning the controlled activities have the same purpose as the unchallenged provisions concerning the prohibited activities. Parliament responded to what was presented to it as a consensus that some of the prohibited activities are reprehensible. ... It showed no such intention with respect to the activities that are not prohibited completely

(2) Effect of the Provisions

[Justices LeBel and Deschamps then considered at length the "actual impact of the application of the provisions." They concluded that the Act's provisions seriously affected the practice of medicine, and overlapped or conflicted with many provisions of Quebec law. In their view, the Act would have a considerable impact on the practice of medicine and everyone who participates in assisted human reproduction.]

• • •

[227] [Therefore,] the purpose and effects of the provisions in question related to the regulation of a specific type of health services provided ... to individuals who ... need help to reproduce. Their pith and substance must be characterized as the regulation of assisted human reproduction as a health service.

B. Connecting the Pith and Substance of the Provisions with Heads of Power

(1) Scope of the Federal Criminal Law Power

[232] [In the Margarine Reference,] Rand J. stressed that a substantive component was needed to justify the exercise of the federal criminal law power. However, the most frequently quoted passage from his opinion does little to clarify the content of this substantive component:

Is the prohibition ... enacted with a view to a public purpose which can support it as being in relation to criminal law? Public peace, order, security, health, morality: these are the ordinary though not exclusive ends served by that law [p. 50]

Health, which Rand J. mentioned, cannot always justify action by Parliament in relation to the criminal law. This passage must therefore also be considered in the context of Rand J.'s definition of the criminal law. :

A crime is an act which the law, with appropriate penal sanctions, forbids; but as prohibitions are not enacted in a vacuum, we can properly look for some evil or injurious or undesirable effect upon the public against which the law is directed. That effect may be in relation to social, economic or political interests; and the legislature has had in mind to suppress the evil or to safeguard the interest threatened. [Emphasis added; p. 49.]

In our view, therefore, it is not enough to identify a public purpose that would have justified Parliament's action. ... Where its action is grounded in the criminal law, the public purpose must involve suppressing an evil or safeguarding a threatened interest.

[234] The formal component—establishing a prohibition and accompanying it with a penalty—supports a finding that a regulatory scheme, even one that takes the form of exemptions from a prohibitory scheme, falls within the field of criminal law. However, the substantive component, the justifiable criminal law purpose—the prohibition of a real or apprehended evil, and the concomitant protection of legitimate societal interests—must also be present. ...

[235] These components permit the federal government to deal with and make laws with regard to new realities, such as pollution, and genetic manipulations that are considered undesirable. Thus, Parliament retains flexibility in making decisions to prohibit conduct it considers reprehensible and to prevent the undesirable effects of such conduct.

[236] ... [T]he evil or threat must be real. In the context of the Charter, the recognized threshold is that of the reasoned apprehension of harm Although the instant case does not involve the application of the Charter, referring to a threshold illustrates what form a substantive component might take and helps give concrete form to the substantive component of the criminal law. ...

[237] It must be possible to describe the risk of harm precisely enough that a connection can be established between the apprehended harm and the evil in question. ...

[A review of case law, including RJR-MacDonald, Hydro Québec, and the Firearms Reference, has been omitted.]

[238] The requirement of a concrete basis and a reasoned apprehension of harm applies with equal force where the legislative action is based on morality. ... [T]he Chief Justice relies heavily on the purpose of upholding public morality. In her view, ... Parliament need only have a reasonable basis to expect that its legislation will address a concern of fundamental importance (para. 50). If her interpretation were adopted, the decision to bring certain conduct within the criminal law sphere would never be open to effective review by the courts. ... This approach in effect totally excludes the substantive component that serves to delimit the criminal law. ...

[239] In our opinion, this goes further than any previous judicial interpretation. ... It is true that the criminal law often expresses aspects of social morality Yet care must be taken not to view every social, economic or scientific issue as a moral problem. ... [W]hen Parliament criminalizes an act, its decision remains subject to review by the courts, which will take society's attitude into account. And it must be borne in mind in this area that a broad range of philosophical and religious ideas coexist in a society as diverse as contemporary Canadian society. ... The coming into force of the Charter, for example, resulted in fundamental changes that affected offences related to sex, pornography and prostitution and demonstrated the importance of the explosion of the former conceptual framework The judgments on the application of the Charter ... clearly illustrate what is considered to be an evil, which is a question the Chief Justice does not deal with in her analysis relating to morality. ...

• • •

(2) Lack of a Connection Between the Pith and Substance of the Impugned Provisions and the Federal Criminal Law Power

• • •

[250] To find that the pith and substance of the impugned provisions relates to the prohibition of reprehensible conduct is ... problematic in two ways. First, from the standpoint of morality, no evil has been identified. Second, all activities related to assisted human reproduction are regulated, not just specific ones that Parliament could theoretically have considered—but in fact did not consider—reprehensible. ...

• • •

[254] ... Although assisted human reproduction raises moral and ethical questions, this does not necessarily mean that exercising the criminal law power is justified on the basis that there is an evil to be suppressed. Rather, both those who testified before the Baird Commission and those who participated in the parliamentary debates acknowledged that the development of assisted human reproduction amounts to a step forward for the constantly growing number of people dealing with infertility. Moreover, it represents the only option for homosexuals who wish to reproduce. The risks for the health and safety of people who resort to these technologies do not distinguish the field of assisted human reproduction from other fields of medical practice

[Reference is made to many other medical procedures, such as heart bypass surgery, that raise issues related to health, safety, and ethics.]

• • •

[256] In the end, if we were to adopt the Attorney General of Canada's interpretation ... , nearly every new medical technology could be brought within federal jurisdiction. This view of the criminal law is incompatible with the federal nature of Canada

• • •

[258] As we explained above, in determining whether a provision is valid, the court must examine, inter alia, the overflow from the exclusive jurisdiction of the government that enacted it. ... We will now therefore turn to the connection between the impugned provisions and the exclusive provincial power.

(3) Connection with Provincial Powers

[259] ... It is clear from the record that the impugned statutory provisions fall under various provincial heads of power.

[260] ... [I]t is inconceivable that assisted reproductive technologies could be employed without the support of institutions under provincial jurisdiction

• • •

[265] In reviewing the effects of the impugned provisions, we observed that the provisions affect essential aspects of the relationship between a physician and persons who require assistance for reproduction. ... [T]he provisions lie at the very core of the provinces' jurisdiction over civil rights and local matters.

[267] ... [T]he fact that the impugned provisions have a significant effect on activities that generally fall within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces confirms that those provisions represent an overflow of the exercise of the federal criminal law power. At this point, ... it is necessary to complete the analysis and consider whether the ancillary powers doctrine applies. [Here, the judges discuss double aspect. This portion of the judgment is excerpted in Chapter 8, Interpreting the Division of Powers.]

[272] Insofar as the provisions ... are purely ancillary ... we need not go into greater detail in order to conclude that they are invalid. However, we wish to point out that the constitutional defects are not remedied by s. 68 of the AHR Act, which authorizes the Governor in Council to declare certain provisions inapplicable if the federal minister and the government of a province so agree. The jurisdictional overflow remains just as great as long as regulation of the activities in question remains dependent on the will of the federal government. ... The federal government alone is to determine whether the two schemes are consistent. Subordinating the statutes and regulations in question in this way would be possible only if the federal legislation were itself valid because it was anchored in a specific federal power

[273] In sum, ... the impugned provisions, far from falling under the federal criminal law power, relate instead to the provinces' jurisdiction over hospitals, property and civil rights and matters of a merely local or private nature... . If any doubt remained, this is where the principle of subsidiarity could apply ... as an interpretive principle ... that serves as a basis for connecting provisions with an exclusive legislative power. ... [Subsidiarity] would favour connecting the rules in question with the provinces' jurisdiction over local matters, not with the criminal law power

[Justices LeBel and Deschamps then considered the application of the ancillary powers doctrine to the impugned provisions. In light of their finding that the overflow was serious, they applied the "necessity" test and determined that it was not met. The absolute prohibitions could stand on their own, and there was no legislative history that connected those prohibitions with the criminal law. They concluded that the impugned provisions were not valid, thus upholding the decision of the Quebec Court of Appeal.]

CROMWELL J:

[In a very brief opinion, Cromwell J disagreed with the results proposed by the other justices. He characterized the "matter" of Act as regulation of virtually every aspect of research and clinical practice relating to assisted human reproduction. He then classified this matter as being in relation to provincial powers in ss 92(7), (13), (16), stating that he mostly agreed with the reasons proffered by LeBel and Deschamps JJ. However, unlike Justices LeBel and Deschamps, he upheld ss 8, 9, and 12 as validly enacted under the federal criminal law power because they prohibited negative practices, which fell within the "traditional ambit of the federal criminal law power." He upheld the constitutionality of the remaining provisions only to the extent that they dealt with enforcement of the constitutionally valid provisions.]

Appeal allowed in part.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In 2012, the Act was amended to conform with the pivotal and brief decision of Cromwell J: see the Jobs, Growth and Long-Term Prosperity Act, SC 2012, c 19, ss 713-25.
2. The two main opinions differ both as to the characterization of the impugned legislation and as to the criteria for classifying legislation as coming within s 91(27).

With respect to characterization, McLachlin CJ describes the pith and substance of the Act, including each of ss 5 through 13, as "the prohibition of negative practices associated with assisted reproduction" (at para 34). By contrast, Lebel and Deschamps JJ characterize some of the provisions (ss 8–13) differently: "their pith and substance ... [is] the regulation of assisted human reproduction as a health service" (at para 227). Do the justices' respective characterizations predetermine the outcome of the validity analysis, insofar as the prohibition of harmful practices obviously aligns with the criteria for validity under s 91(27), while the regulation of health services obviously comes within s 92(13) or s 92(16)? By what objective standard can one decide whether the dominant character of a legal provision is to "prohibit negative practices" as opposed to "regulating" an otherwise licit activity? See Ian Lee, "Case Comment" (2011) 90 Can Bar Rev 469 at 475, 485.

With respect to scope of the federal criminal law power, the LeBel and Deschamps JJ opinion would require that legislation enacted under s 91(27) be directed at a "real evil" and that there be "a reasonable apprehension of harm" (at para 240). By contrast, the McLachlin CJ opinion views the criminal law power as "plenary," subject only to the three requirements of prohibition, penalty, and criminal law purpose. What are the implications of each view for the judicial function in federalism cases?

3. As noted in the discussion of the ancillary powers doctrine in Chapter 8, Interpreting the Division of Powers, the McLachlin CJ and Lebel and Deschamps JJ opinions take different positions on the order in which to apply the steps in the ancillary powers doctrine, with McLachlin CJ beginning her analysis by considering the legislation as a whole, and LeBel and Deschamps JJ beginning their analysis by looking only at the impugned provision. What difference, if any, does it make in what order these steps are undertaken?

4. The two main opinions also disagree about the appropriate role of the principle of subsidiarity—that is, the principle that decisions should be made at the level of government closest to the citizens affected. The LeBel and Deschamps JJ opinion regards the principle as an interpretive aid that, in the context of doubt about classification, "would favour connecting the rules in question with the provinces' jurisdiction over local matters, not with the criminal law" (at para 273). By contrast, McLachlin CJ stresses that while the principle of subsidiarity may allow complementary legislation by the provincial government, it does not prevent the national government from using its heads of power, nor is the exercise of a power constrained by concerns of subsidiarity (at para 72). Further discussion of the principle of subsidiarity, including its origins in European Union law and suggestions for further reading, can be found in Chapter 9 (see Note 6 following the References Re Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act excerpt in Chapter 9).

5. As you have read, the AHRA contained an equivalency provision, s 68, which permitted the governor in council to declare provisions of the Act inapplicable in a province with a similar provincial law, pursuant to an agreement with that province. Chief Justice McLachlin characterized this provision as follows:

[152] ... This provision recognizes the fact that assisted human reproduction is an area of overlapping jurisdiction, and it provides for harmonization and the avoidance of duplication where provincial laws cover the same matters as the Act. Section 68 provides a flexible approach to federal–provincial cooperation, which is appropriate to modern federalism, where matters will frequently attract concurrent legislative authority.

In response to Quebec's argument that the inclusion of s 68 indicated the "predominantly regulatory nature" of the Act, McLachlin CJ replied:

[153] ... This is an old argument, and it has been soundly rejected in the jurisprudence. The mere fact that a matter comes within provincial jurisdiction does not preclude it from coming under federal jurisdiction as well. As noted above, this Court has upheld as constitutional provisions that allow the provinces to limit the scope of federal legislation under cooperative schemes.

How does this characterization of the equivalency provision compare to the treatment of similar provisions in the legislation at issue in Hydro-Québec, excerpted above, and the Reference re Securities Act, 2011 SCC 66, excerpted in Chapter 10.

Reference Re Genetic Non-Discrimination Act 2020 SCC 17

[The Genetic Non-Discrimination Act, enacted by Parliament in 2017, does three things. First, in ss 1-7, the Act prohibits any person, under penalty of a fine or imprisonment, from requiring an individual to undergo or disclose the results of a genetic test as a condition of contracting with or providing goods and services to that individual, or to collect and use such results without the individual's consent. Second, s 8 of the Act amends the Canada Labour Code, RSC 1985, c L-2 to protect the right of the employees in industries within federal jurisdiction not to be required to undergo genetic testing or disclose the results of a genetic test. Third, ss 9-10 of the Act add "genetic characteristics" as a listed ground of discrimination under the Canadian Human Rights Act, RSC 1985, c H-6 (which applies within the federal public sector and to businesses in federally regulated industries).]

Unusually, the Act originated as a private member's bill. The federal government had expressed opposition to the bill on the ground that ss 1-7 fell within provincial jurisdiction. Nevertheless, the bill was approved unanimously by the Senate and by a large majority in a free vote in the House of Commons. Soon after its enactment, the validity of ss 1-7 was challenged in a reference proceeding brought by the Quebec government.]

KARAKATSANIS J (Abella and Martin JJ, concurring):

A. Characterization

• • •

[30] Identifying a law's pith and substance requires considering both the law's purpose and its effects: Firearms Reference, at para. 16....

[34] To determine a law's purpose, a court looks to both intrinsic and extrinsic evidence. Intrinsic evidence includes the text of the law, and provisions that expressly set out the law's purpose, as well as the law's title and structure. Extrinsic evidence includes statements made during parliamentary proceedings and drawn from government publications: Firearms Reference, at para. 17.

[35] A law's title, especially its long title, is an important form of intrinsic evidence, as both titles are an integral part of the law: R. Sullivan, Sullivan on the Construction of Statutes (6th ed. 2014), at pp. 440-41. Here, both the short title—the Genetic Non-Discrimination Act—and the long title—An Act to prohibit and prevent genetic discrimination—suggest that the Act's purpose is twofold. They suggest that the Act seeks to prohibit discrimination on genetic grounds and prevent such discrimination from occurring in the first place.

[36] Turning to the Act's text and structure, the prohibitions created by ss. 3 to 5 apply to a wide range of circumstances (obtaining goods and services and entering into contracts) in which individuals might be treated adversely based on their decision whether to undergo genetic testing and based on test results. The prohibitions are of general application, as they do not target a particular activity or industry. Instead, they target specific behaviour related to genetic testing, namely forcing individuals to undergo testing and disclose test results, and using test results without consent. The prohibitions target conduct that enables genetic discrimination.

[37] The definition of "genetic test" in s. 2 of the Act is broad and captures analyses of DNA, RNA or chromosomes performed with a wide range of ends in mind. Section 2 defines a genetic test as "a test that analyzes DNA, RNA or chromosomes for purposes such as the prediction of disease or vertical transmission risks, or monitoring, diagnosis or prognosis."

[39] ... Health-related genetic tests reveal highly personal information—details that individuals might not wish to know or share and that could be used against them. The prohibitions target a broad range of conduct that creates the opportunity for genetic discrimination based on intimate personal information revealed by health-related tests. Parliament saw genetic test results relating to health as particularly vulnerable to abuse and discrimination. The intrinsic evidence suggests that the purpose of the provisions is to combat discrimination based on information disclosed by genetic tests by criminalizing compulsory genetic testing, compulsory disclosure of test results, and non-consensual use of test results in a broadly-defined context (the areas of contracting and the provision of goods and services). The extrinsic evidence points largely in the same direction.

• • •

[47] Parliament's decision to [amend] the Canada Labour Code and the Canadian Human Rights Act in conjunction with its enactment of the Act's substantive provisions suggests that Parliament was looking to take a coordinated approach to tackling genetic discrimination based on test results, using different tools. It was not only targeting genetic discrimination directly through human rights and labour legislation, but was also targeting precursors to such discrimination, namely forced genetic testing and disclosure of the results of such testing. The fact that Parliament did not criminalize genetic discrimination does not belie Parliament's purpose of combatting genetic discrimination in this context. The relative breadth, directness or efficacy of the means Parliament chooses to address a problem is not the court's concern in its pith and substance inquiry.

[51] Both legal and practical effects are relevant to identifying a law's pith and substance. Legal effects "flow [directly] from the provisions of the statute ... itself," whereas practical effects "flow from the application of the statute [but] are not direct effects of the provisions of the statute itself": Kitkatla, at para. 54, citing Morgentaler (1993), at pp. 482-83.

[52] Starting with legal effects, ss. 3 to 5 of the Genetic Non-Discrimination Act prohibit genetic testing requirements and non-consensual uses of genetic test results in a broad range of circumstances. Section 7 imposes significant penalties for contravening these prohibitions.

[54] The most significant practical effect of the Act is that it gives individuals control over the decision of whether to undergo genetic testing and over access to the results of any genetic testing they choose to undergo. The Act does so by preventing genetic testing requirements from being imposed on individuals as a condition of access to goods, services and contracts, and by preventing individuals' genetic test results from being used non-consensually when they seek to obtain goods and services and enter into contracts. Even if an individual voluntarily discloses the results of a genetic test in such circumstances, the Act prevents the recipient of the information from using the information in any manner that has not been consented to in writing or from further disclosing the information. The activities to which the Act applies are broad and fundamentally structure Canadians' interactions with the world around them. The control that ss. 1 to 7 of the Act gives to individuals over genetic testing and genetic test results is equally significant and broad in scope.

[56] By protecting choices about who has access to such information, the legislation reduces the risk of genetic discrimination. And by removing the fear of some of the negative consequences that could flow from genetic testing, the Act may encourage individuals to undergo genetic testing. Additional testing may in turn produce health benefits, including by enabling earlier detection of health problems or predispositions, providing for more accurate and sometimes life-saving diagnoses and improving the health care system's ability to provide maximally beneficial care.

[63] In enacting the Genetic Non-Discrimination Act, Parliament acted to combat genetic discrimination and the fear of genetic discrimination based on genetic test results. ...

[64] Crucially, Parliament's purpose in enacting the provisions in question is borne out in the provisions' effects. The most direct and significant practical effect of the prohibitions is to give individuals control over the decision of whether to undergo genetic testing and over access to the results of genetic testing. This practical effect is a direct result of the prohibitions' legal effects.

[65] I accordingly conclude that, in pith and substance, ss. 1 to 7 of the Act protect individuals' control over their detailed personal information disclosed by genetic tests in the areas of contracting and the provision of goods and services in order to address fears that individuals' genetic test results will be used against them and to prevent discrimination based on that information.

G. Classification

[67] ... Sections 1 to 7 of the Genetic Non-Discrimination Act will be valid criminal law if, in pith and substance: (1) it consists of a prohibition (2) accompanied by a penalty and (3) backed by a criminal law purpose: Firearms Reference, at para. 27; Reference re Validity of Section 5(a) of the Dairy Industry Act, [1949] S.C.R. 1, at pp. 49-50 (Margarine Reference), aff'd [1951] A.C. 179 (P.C.).

[68] There is no dispute that the challenged provisions meet the first two requirements. They prohibit specific conduct and impose penalties for violating those prohibitions. The only issue is whether the matter of ss. 1 to 7 of the Act is supported by a criminal law purpose. ...

[74] ... A law will have a criminal law purpose if it addresses an evil, injurious or undesirable effect on a public interest traditionally protected by the criminal law, or another similar public interest.

• • •

[79] Taken together, the requirements established in the Margarine Reference and subsequently applied in this Court's jurisprudence mean that a law will have a criminal law purpose if its matter represents Parliament's response to a threat of harm to public order, safety, health or morality or fundamental social values, or to a similar public interest. As long as Parliament is addressing a reasoned apprehension of harm to one or more of these public interests, no degree of seriousness of harm need be proved before it can make criminal law. The court does not determine whether Parliament's criminal law response is appropriate or wise. The focus is solely on whether recourse to criminal law is available under the circumstances.

[80] ... In my view, the essential character of the prohibitions represents Parliament's response to the risk of harm that the prohibited conduct, genetic discrimination and the fear of genetic discrimination based on genetic test results pose to several public interests traditionally protected by the criminal law: autonomy, privacy and the fundamental social value of equality, as well as public health.

[85] In particular, forced genetic testing (prohibited in s. 3 of the Act) poses a clear threat to autonomy and to an individual's privacy interest in not finding out what their genetic makeup reveals about them and their health prospects. People may not want to learn about their "genetic destiny," or risk the psychological harm that can result from obtaining unfavourable genetic test results. ... Forced disclosure of genetic test results (prohibited in s. 4) and the collection, use or disclosure of genetic test results without written consent (prohibited in s. 5) threaten autonomy and privacy by compromising an individual's control over access to their detailed genetic information. Such threats to autonomy and personal privacy are threats to human dignity.

• • •

[90] Protecting fundamental moral precepts or social values is an established criminal law purpose: Margarine Reference, at p. 50; Labatt Breweries of Canada Ltd. v. Attorney General of Canada, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 914, at pp. 932-33; Reference re AHRA, at paras. 49-51 and 250. Parliamentarians considered discrimination on the basis of health-related genetic test results to be morally wrong. They viewed such genetic discrimination to be antithetical to the values of equality and human dignity. ... In acting to suppress a threat of that nature, Parliament acted with a criminal law purpose.

[96] Parliament is entitled to use its criminal law power to respond to a reasoned apprehension of harm, including a threat to public health.

[97] ... Testimony before Parliament demonstrated that fear of genetic discrimination leads patients to forego beneficial testing, results in wasted health care dollars and may deter patients from participating in research that could advance medical understanding of their conditions. Genetic discrimination is a barrier to accessing suitable, maximally effective health care, to preventing the onset of certain health conditions and to participating in research and other initiatives serving public health. Parliament accordingly apprehended individuals' vulnerability to and fear of genetic discrimination based on test results as a threat to public health.

[103] Parliament took action in response to its concern that individuals' vulnerability to genetic discrimination posed a threat of harm to several public interests traditionally protected by the criminal law. Parliament enacted legislation that, in pith and substance, protects individuals' control over their detailed personal information disclosed by genetic tests in the areas of contracting and the provision of goods and services in order to address Canadian's fears that their genetic test results will be used against them and to prevent discrimination based on that information. It did so to safeguard autonomy, privacy and equality, along with public health. The challenged provisions fall within Parliament's criminal law power because they consist of prohibitions accompanied by penalties, backed by a criminal law purpose.

MOLDAVER J (Côté J concurring):

A. Characterization

[114] ... [T]he pith and substance of ss. 1 to 7 of the Act is to protect health by prohibiting conduct that undermines individuals' control over the intimate information revealed by genetic testing. This is borne out by the purpose and effects of these provisions.

[115] ... I do not agree with Justice Karakatsanis that preventing discrimination forms part of the pith and substance of the challenged provisions. While I accept that ss. 1 to 7 of the Act reduce the opportunities for discrimination based on one's genetic test results, thereby mitigating individuals' fear of genetic discrimination, they do so by giving people control over the information revealed by genetic tests in furtherance of the purpose of protecting health. With respect, preventing or combating genetic discrimination is not the "dominant purpose or true character" of these provisions (see Quebec (Attorney General) v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 14, [2015] 1 S.C.R. 693, at para. 29, quoting RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 199, at para. 29).

[125] Unlike the changes to the Canada Labour Code and the Canadian Human Rights Act, the provisions in issue do not prohibit genetic discrimination—that is, differential treatment "on the basis of the results of a genetic test" or based on one's "genetic characteristics." Sections 1 to 7 could have included such a prohibition, but they do not. In my view, the different approach taken by Parliament in the amendments to the Canada Labour Code and the Canadian Human Rights Act as compared to the impugned provisions indicates that where Parliament's dominant objective was to prevent and prohibit genetic discrimination, it did so directly. This supports my conclusion that the dominant purpose of ss. 1 to 7 is not preventing and prohibiting genetic discrimination, but rather prohibiting conduct that deprives individuals of control over their genetic test results in order to protect health. It follows that I am unable to agree with Justice Karakatsanis's conclusion that the three parts of the Act are all part of "a multi-pronged approach to combatting genetic discrimination" (para. 48). With respect, that conclusion is too broad and fails to place adequate weight on the important differences between ss. 1 to 7 and ss. 8 to 10.

[126] The parliamentary record bolsters my conclusion regarding the purpose of the provisions in question. On my reading of the debates and the testimony heard by the Senate and House of Commons committees tasked with reviewing Bill S-201, An Act to prohibit and prevent genetic discrimination, 1st Sess., 42nd Parl., 2017, the focus was clearly directed at the devastating health consequences that were resulting from people foregoing genetic testing out of fear that the personal health information revealed by such testing could be used against them, including in discriminatory ways. ...

[136] For these reasons, I conclude that the pith and substance of ss. 1 to 7 of the Act is to protect health by prohibiting conduct that undermines individuals' control over the intimate information revealed by genetic testing. These provisions prohibit compulsory genetic testing, compulsory disclosure of genetic test results, and the non-consensual collection, disclosure and use of those results in a wide array of contexts that govern how people interact with society. By giving people control over this information, ss. 1 to 7 of the Act mitigate their fears that it will be used against them. Such fears lead many to forego genetic testing, to the detriment of their own health, the health of their families, and the public healthcare system as a whole.

B. Classification

[Discussion of criminal law form has been omitted.]

[139] Sections 1 to 7 of the Act are backed by a criminal law purpose because they are directed at suppressing a threat to health. ...

[140] The threat to health that Parliament targeted by enacting ss. 1 to 7 of the Act was real—in every sense of the word. Parliament had ample evidence before it that people were refraining from undergoing genetic testing out of fear as to how their genetic test results could be used, thereby suffering significant harm or putting themselves at risk of significant and avoidable harm. The debates and committee testimony are saturated with examples of the life-saving, life-extending, and life-enhancing potential of genetic testing—all of which individuals felt they had to forego because they could not control the ways in which the results of such testing would be used in various contexts.

[143] ... [Sections] 1 to 7 are not directed at the mere "promotion of beneficial health services or practices" (Kasirer J.'s reasons, at para. 240), but rather at protecting people from severe harms to their health caused by foregoing genetic testing out of fear that their information will be used against them (e.g., by way of non-consensual collection, disclosure, or use of genetic test results). While it is no doubt true that not dying of a preventable disease is a "better health outcom[e]" than dying from that disease (Kasirer J.'s reasons, at para. 239), I believe it makes more sense to describe measures directed at preventing such outcomes as being protective of health.

• • •

[150] In sum, as I see it, by enacting ss. 1 to 7 of the Act, Parliament targeted conduct that was having an injurious effect on health. ... Parliament was constitutionally entitled to address [this threat to health], pursuant to s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867 ...

KASIRER J (Wagner CJ and Brown and Rowe JJ concurring) (dissenting):

[154] On my understanding, the pith and substance of ss. 1 to 7 is to regulate contracts and the provision of goods and services, in particular contracts of insurance and employment, by prohibiting some perceived misuses of one category of genetic tests, the whole with a view to promoting the health of Canadians. ...

• • •

A. Characterization: What Is the Pith and Substance of Sections 1 to 7 of the Act?

• • •

[174] In my view, neither the long title of this statute—An Act to prohibit and prevent genetic discrimination—nor its short title—Genetic Non-Discrimination Act—can be said to reflect clearly the impugned provisions' true purpose. With respect, I disagree that these titles reveal that the provisions' purpose is to prohibit discrimination on genetic grounds and prevent such discrimination from occurring in the first place. To my mind, genetic non-discrimination cannot be said to be the primary objective of the impugned provisions.

[175] ... While the long title explicitly refers to the prohibition of genetic discrimination, it must be borne in mind that this long title speaks to the entirety of the Act, which includes amendments to the CLC and the CHRA. [T]he amendments to the CLC and the CHRA purport to prohibit genetic discrimination directly whereas the prohibitions in ss. 1 to 7 do not. As a result, the long title does not support the conclusion that the impugned provisions—the focus of the pith and substance inquiry—seek to prohibit genetic discrimination, as the “prohibition” in the long title could easily be referring to the CLC and CHRA amendments, but not to ss. 1 to 7. ...

[176] This then brings us to the prevention of discrimination on genetic grounds, which is also explicitly referred to in the long title. While I accept that ss. 1 to 7 do seek to curtail circumstances in which genetic discrimination can occur, and thus prevent such circumstances from arising in connection with contracts and the provision of goods and services, the provisions leave open the possibility that genetic information may be legitimately used—thereby not precluding use for drawing distinctions based on genetic characteristics—when it has been disclosed voluntarily or obtained through other means than a genetic test. In that sense, even “preventing genetic discrimination” cannot be properly understood to be the main objective of the contested provisions. At most, preventing some circumstances from arising that could facilitate genetic discrimination is one of the many consequences of ss. 1 to 7, but an unconvincing way to describe its dominant purpose.

[184] As the Court of Appeal explained in its reasons, taken together, ss. 1 to 7 aim to prohibit making the provision of goods and services or the making, continuing, or offering of specific terms or conditions of a contract conditional upon an individual undergoing or disclosing the results of genetic testing (paras. 8 and 10). The provisions do not prohibit the use of genetic information that may be disclosed voluntarily or that may be required or obtained through other means, such as family history or other medical tests, and they do not prohibit genetic discrimination. It is clear that the purpose of ss. 1 to 7 is different from the veritable prohibitions against discrimination based on genetic characteristics set forth in the amendments made to the CHRA and to the CLC in ss. 8 to 10 of the Act, which are extrinsic to the impugned provisions, to which I turn in the next section.

[Justice Kasirer next discusses the amendments to the CHRA and CLC that prohibit genetic discrimination.]

[193] The contrast between the amendments to the CHRA and the CLC, which create prohibitions against discrimination, and the impugned provisions, which do not, shows that the purpose of ss. 1 to 7 is different from that of these amendments. If Parliament had attempted to take a coordinated approach to genetic discrimination in the Act, discrimination on the basis of genetic characteristics would have been directly prohibited in the impugned provisions, and not only in the CHRA and CLC. ...

• • •

[196] ... [Moreover, the legislative] debates generally reveal that genetic tests were considered to be beneficial and viewed as a means of opening avenues to improved health treatment, as they allow Canadians to be aware of risks and change their behaviour. ...

• • •

[202] ... [T]hese debates emphasize that while the amendments to the CLC and CHRA prohibit genetic discrimination, ss. 1 to 7 of the Act were included as a way to encourage Canadians to undergo genetic tests, by mitigating their fears that they would be misused, in particular in respect of insurance and employment.

[203] When considering the whole of the record, ... it is plain that the main goal of ss. 1 to 7 is not to combat discrimination based on genetic characteristics. Genetic discrimination may have been on the mind of parliamentarians, but it is not prohibited in the impugned provisions. Nor is their objective to control the use of private information revealed by genetic testing, which is secondary to the true purpose of the provisions. Rather, the true aim of the provisions is to regulate contracts, particularly contracts of insurance and employment, in order to encourage Canadians to undergo genetic tests without fear that those tests will be misused so that their health can ultimately be improved.

• • •

B. Classification: Does the Pith and Substance of the Impugned Provisions Fall Under the Section 91(27) Criminal Law Power?

• • •

[230] As the parties all agree, the impugned provisions satisfy the formal requirements of a criminal law. The only issue concerns whether they are supported by the third requirement, a valid criminal law purpose. My colleague Justice Karakatsanis and I have different views of this requirement, and we accordingly reach different conclusions on whether it is satisfied. Our respective views of the matter—which find echo in the disagreement at the heart of the AHRA Reference—cannot be said to have no impact on the result of this case.

[231] In the Margarine Reference, Rand J., whose reasoning was adopted by the Privy Council in Canadian Federation of Agriculture v. Attorney-General for Quebec, [1951] A.C. 179, explained the substantive “criminal law purpose” requirement:

A crime is an act which the law, with appropriate penal sanctions, forbids; but as prohibitions are not enacted in a vacuum, we can properly look for some evil or injurious or undesirable effect upon the public against which the law is directed. That effect may be in relation to social, economic or political interests; and the legislature has had in mind to suppress the evil or to safeguard the interest threatened. ...

Accordingly, it is not sufficient that Parliament merely wishes to legislate with respect to some public purpose. Rather, the impugned legislation must also be directed at an “evil or injurious or undesirable effect upon the public.”

[232] I disagree with the appellant that the word “evil”—the traditional measure of the criminal law in this context—is unhelpful in the classification analysis. Rather, the concept of “evil” is necessary to remind Parliament that mere undesirable effects are not sufficient for legislation to have a criminal purpose, contrary to my colleague’s suggestion (see Karakatsanis J.’s reasons, at para. 76). ...

[233] The words “some evil or injurious or undesirable effect upon the public against which the law is directed” point to a more precise idea than the protection of central moral precepts, in a broad sense: Parliament cannot act unless it seeks to suppress some threat. This threat itself must be well-defined and have ascertainable contours to constitute the valid subject-matter of criminal law pursuant to s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867. It must also be real, in the sense that Parliament has a concrete basis and a reasoned apprehension of harm. To suggest otherwise would be to render the substantive requirement so vague as to be impractical as a measure of what amounts to criminal law for constitutional purposes.

[234] I draw from the Margarine Reference and LeBel and Deschamps JJ.’s reasons in the AHRA Reference that three questions must be confronted when determining whether a law rests upon a valid criminal law purpose. First, does the impugned legislation relate to a “public purpose,” such as public peace, order, security, health, or morality? Second, did Parliament articulate a well-defined threat to be suppressed or prevented by the impugned legislation (i.e. the “evil or injurious or undesirable effect upon the public”)? Third, is the threat “real,” in the sense that Parliament had a concrete basis and a reasoned apprehension of harm when enacting the impugned legislation? I will discuss each question in turn.

[Justice Kasirer agrees that the legislation relates to a “public purpose”—namely, health—and that the first question is therefore answered in the affirmative. However, he would answer the second and third questions in the negative.]

• • •

[237] ... [The second question requires Parliament to] clearly articulate and define the scope of the threat it seeks to suppress. That is, it must articulate a precise threat with ascertainable contours. This requirement ensures that the scope of Parliament’s actions is limited to a specific problem, and it is particularly important in relation to matters that have provincial aspects, such as health, in order to preserve the balance of federal and provincial powers.

[242] [T]he “promotion of health” in and of itself will simply not suffice at this stage. ... The record must reveal a well-defined threat (i.e. the “evil or injurious or undesirable effect upon the public”) to be suppressed or prevented by the impugned legislation. As my colleague Justice Karakatsanis notes, such threats may be as diverse as tobacco (RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 199); dangerous food products (R. v. Wetmore, [1983] 2 S.C.R. 284); illicit drugs (Malmo-Levine); firearms (Firearms Reference); and toxic substances (R. v. Hydro-Québec, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 213).

[243] My colleague Justice Moldaver writes that the impugned provisions are directed not at the promotion of health, but at the protection of individuals from health-related harms. In his view, the impugned provisions protect against deleterious effects on health that have resulted from Canadians foregoing genetic testing (paras. 116 and 140-43). In the circumstances of this case, however, any protection from health-related harms is present solely because it is a consequence of another objective: the promotion of better health outcomes for all Canadians. Contrary to McLachlin C.J.’s conclusion in the AHRA Reference, beneficial practices in our case are not “incidentally” permitted; rather, they are at the very core of the impugned legislation (para. 30). In other words, Parliament viewed genetic tests as beneficial, and therefore sought to remove barriers so Canadians could access them.

[247] As explained above, ss. 1 to 7 do not prohibit genetic discrimination. While they may be said to have an indirect effect of preventing genetic discrimination from occurring in the first place, the primary objective of the provisions is not to prohibit or even to prevent genetic discrimination. Rather, the impugned provisions prohibit requiring a genetic test or the disclosure or use of the results in the conclusion of a contract or in the provision of goods and services, except where consent is given. Nothing in the record suggests that these prohibited activities should be regarded as conduct that is a threat to health.

• • •

[249] Of course, Parliament can use indirect means in the exercise of its criminal law power, as was the case in RJR-MacDonald. [But in] that case, the threat targeted by Parliament was the detrimental effects caused by tobacco, which was supported by a copious body of evidence demonstrating that tobacco poses a serious threat to Canadians’ health. ... In this case, the impugned provisions are designed to encourage the use of genetic tests, which is a beneficial health practice as opposed to an inherently harmful substance, in an attempt to improve Canadians’ health. Since Parliament did not target a threat to health, there is simply no public health evil present here.

• • •

[267] [The third substantive requirement is that] the threat Parliament seeks to suppress must be real, in the sense that Parliament has a concrete basis and a reasoned apprehension of harm.

[270] In this case, had I concluded there is a well-defined threat, I would also conclude that there is no evidentiary foundation of harm. Rather, Parliament seeks to improve the health of Canadians by making them aware of underlying conditions they may have and does so by attempting to encourage the use of genetic tests. Just as in the AHRA Reference, this advance in technology and health services is beneficial to Canadians, and has always been perceived as such.

[271] From the foregoing, I conclude that the contested provisions do not satisfy the substantive component of criminal law. While they do relate to a public purpose, Parliament has neither articulated a well-defined threat that it intended to target, nor did it provide any evidentiary foundation of such a threat. It matters little to the present task whether the impugned provisions constitute good policy: they are ultra vires Parliament's criminal law power.

[272] In my view, ss. 1 to 7 of the Act rather fall within provincial jurisdiction over property and civil rights conferred by s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867. As explained above, the impugned provisions substantially affect the substantive law of insurance as well as human rights and labour legislation in all provinces. There is no question that the provinces could enact the impugned provisions in their own jurisdiction, if they so desired (see Citizens Insurance Co. v. Parsons (1881), 7 App. Cas. 96 (P.C.)).

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The divergent characterizations of Moldaver and Kasirer JJ illustrate the difficulty, also encountered in the AHRA Reference, of ascertaining whether a given provision is concerned with "prohibiting negative practices" or with "regulating" an activity, and the related difficulty of determining whether the purpose of a provision is to prevent deleterious outcomes or to promote beneficial ones.

2. Additionally, as in the AHRA Reference, the validity analysis would seem to be predetermined by the characterization adopted. To be sure, there is a disagreement between Kasirer J and Karakatsanis and Moldaver JJ as to the legal requirements for valid criminal law. Yet, once Moldaver J has found that the dominant character of a law is to prohibit conduct because of its negative health consequences, it seems difficult to avoid the conclusion that the law is "criminal law" within the meaning of s 91(27); similarly, Kasirer J's determination that the pith and substance of which is to "regulate contracts and the provision of goods and services" seems to make it inevitable that the legislation is in relation to property and civil rights.

II. PROVINCIAL POWER TO REGULATE MORALITY AND PUBLIC ORDER

In our federal system, Parliament's power over criminal law exists not only in tension with provincial powers over property and civil rights but also with provincial imperatives to respond to local conditions of public order, safety, and morality. In many federations, national standards for defining and prosecuting criminal conduct are seen as serving important goals of instilling shared values and guaranteeing common standards and procedures for individuals. At the same time, local conditions may vary considerably and require local responses and solutions to protect the public interest in order and morality. As noted above, in some federal systems, the local interest in criminal matters has been perceived as sufficiently strong to justify assigning jurisdiction over criminal law matters to regional units. While Canada did not make that choice, various mechanisms permit recognition of local interests in criminal law matters. First, as a result of s 92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867, which gives the provincial legislatures jurisdiction over the administration of justice in the province (including provincial policing), combined with federal delegation to the provinces of the power to prosecute Criminal Code offences, much of the federal Criminal Code is provincially enforced. A degree of responsiveness to local conditions may thus inform decisions about the investigation and prosecution of criminal offences.

Second, in some cases, the federal government itself has, through the mechanism of conditional legislation (discussed further in Chapter 12, Instruments of Flexibility in the Federal System), drafted its criminal laws in ways that allow them to be shaped by the provinces to respond to local conditions. For example, Sunday observance laws were found to be a federal matter under the criminal law power in AG Ont v Hamilton Street Railway, [\[1903\] CanLII 121](#), [\[1903\] AC 524 \(UKJCPC\)](#), which declared provincial legislation on the subject ultra vires. However, the federal Lord's Day Act recognized the need for responsiveness to local values by following its general prohibition of work on Sunday with an exculpatory clause, "except as provided in any Provincial Act or law." Similarly, the Criminal Code prohibition on lotteries is followed by an exemption for provincial lotteries conducted in accordance with terms and licences issued by the lieutenant governor: see R v Furtney, [\[1991\] 3 SCR 89](#), 1991 CanLII 30.

The third way in which local interests in matters of public order and morality may be given expression is through judicial recognition of concurrent provincial jurisdiction in matters that may also be the subject of criminal law. This option is facilitated by the broad scope of provincial power over property and civil rights and the tendency in modern times to permit concurrency. But "double aspect" has its limits, as noted by the preceding discussion in Reference re Assisted Human Reproduction Act. The extent to which concurrency has been allowed and, conversely, the extent to which the federal criminal law power has operated as a brake on provincial attempts to regulate matters of public order and morality is explored in the materials that follow. Section 92(15) of the Constitution Act, 1867 allows the provinces to enact penal sanctions, but the power is understood as an "ancillary" one, authorizing the use of penal sanctions to enforce provincial regulatory schemes that are validly anchored elsewhere in the s 92 list of provincial powers. The cases that follow typically turn on the issue of what constitutes a valid provincial anchor and the extent to which the courts are willing to recognize a double aspect with respect to matters covered by the Criminal Code. Just as the criminal law power has proven difficult to define with precision, so too has the scope of the limitation it imposes on provincial powers. The issue has been the source of ongoing litigation since Confederation, as the provinces have attempted to regulate local conditions of public order and morality and devise various ways of addressing public problems, such as driving while under the influence of alcohol.

In general, a fair amount of concurrency has been allowed by the courts, following the early precedent set in the battle over liquor regulation detailed in Chapter 4, The Late Nineteenth Century: The Courts Set an Initial Course, where the end result was a recognition that both the federal and provincial governments could legislate prohibition. However, from time to time, as in Westendorp and Morgentaler, both excerpted below, the courts have found that provinces have exceeded their jurisdiction and intruded into the federal criminal law power. As you read these cases, try to think about the factors that make a provincial law vulnerable to attack. Does it make a difference if the province is supplementing an existing criminal law or legislating in the absence of criminal prohibitions?

Nova Scotia Board of Censors v McNeil[1978] 2 SCR 662, 1978 CanLII 6

[The Nova Scotia Theatres and Amusements Act, RSNS 1989, c 466 and the regulations enacted under it established a system for licensing and regulating the showing of films. The regulations required that all films be submitted to the provincial censor board prior to their exhibition, the censor board having an unfettered power to permit or prohibit the showing of the film, or to permit its showing with directed changes. Sanction for breach of the regulations was a monetary penalty and revocation of a theatre owner's licence. After the censor board banned the film Last Tango in Paris from public viewing in theatres or other places in the province, McNeil, a private citizen, sought a declaration that the provisions of the Act and the regulations that authorized the ban were ultra vires the provincial legislature. The Appeal Division of the Nova Scotia Supreme Court granted the declaration. The Attorney General of Nova Scotia then appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada.]

LASKIN CJ (Judson, Dickson, and Spence JJ concurring) (dissenting):

What is involved [here] is an unqualified power in the Nova Scotia Board to determine the fitness of films for public viewing on considerations that may extend beyond the moral and may include the political, the social and the religious. Giving its assertion of power the narrowest compass, related to the film in the present case, the Board is asserting authority to protect public morals, to safeguard the public from exposure to films, to ideas and images in films, that it regards as morally offensive, as indecent, probably as obscene.

The determination of what is decent or indecent or obscene ... , what is morally fit for public viewing, whether in films, in art or in a live performance is, as such, within the exclusive power of the Parliament of Canada under ... the criminal law. This has been recognized in a line of cases in which ... the criminal law power has been held to be as much a brake on provincial legislation as a source of federal legislation. For example, in Switzman v. Elbling, [[1957] SCR 285, 1957 CanLII 2] the Supreme Court invalidated a provincial statute which not only made it illegal for the possessor or occupier of a house to use or permit it to be used to propagate communism or bolshevism (which were not defined), but also made it unlawful to print, publish or distribute any newspaper or writing propagating or tending to propagate communism or bolshevism. ...

It is beside the point to urge that morality is not co-extensive with the criminal law. Such a contention cannot of itself bring legislation respecting public morals within provincial competence. Moreover, the federal power in relation to the criminal law extends beyond control of morality, and is wide enough to embrace anti-social conduct or behaviour and has, indeed, been exercised in those respects.

• • •

This is not a case where civil consequences are attached to conduct defined and punished as criminal under federal legislation ... but rather a case where a provincially authorized tribunal itself defines and determines legality, what is permissible and what is not. This, in my view, is a direct intrusion into the field of criminal law. At best, what the challenged Nova Scotia legislation is doing is seeking to supplement the criminal law enacted by Parliament, and this is forbidden

It was contended, however, by the appellant and by supporting intervenants that the Nova Scotia Board was merely exercising a preventive power, no penalty or punishment being involved, no offence having been created. ... [I]t is ingenuous to say that no offence is created when a licensee who disobeyed the order would be at risk of a cancellation of his licence and at risk of a penalty and anyone else who proposed to exhibit the film publicly would likewise be liable to a penalty. Indeed, the contention invites this Court to allow form to mask substance ... [permitting the province to do] by prior restraint what it could not do by defining an offence and prescribing post facto punishment. ...

It does not follow from all of the foregoing that provincial legislative authority may not extend to objects where moral considerations are involved, but those objects must in themselves be anchored in the provincial catalogue of powers and must, moreover, not be in conflict with valid federal legislation. It is impossible in the present case to find any such anchorage in the provisions of the Nova Scotia statute that are challenged

RITCHIE J (Martland, Pigeon, Beetz, and de Grandpré JJ concurring):

• • •

When the Act and the Regulations are read as a whole, I find them to be primarily directed to the regulation, supervision and control of the film business within the Province of Nova Scotia, including the use and exhibition of films in that Province. To this end the impugned provisions are, in my view, enacted for the purpose of reinforcing the authority vested in a provincially appointed Board to perform the task of regulation which includes the authority to prevent the exhibition of films which the Board, applying its own local standards, has rejected as unsuitable for viewing by provincial audiences. This legislation is concerned with dealings in and the use of property (i.e., films) which take place wholly within the Province and in my opinion it is subject to the same considerations as those which were held to be applicable in such cases as Shannon v. Lower Mainland Dairy Products Board, [1938] CanLII 250, [1938] AC 708; Home Oil Distributors Limited v. A-G of British Columbia, [1940] SCR 444, 1940 CanLII 46] and Caloil Inc. v. Attorney General of Canada [1971] SCR 543, 1970 CanLII 194].

• • •

It will be seen that, in my opinion, the impugned legislation constitutes nothing more than the exercise of provincial authority over transactions taking place wholly within the Province and it applies to the "regulating, exhibition, sale and exchange of films" whether those films have been imported from another country or not.

• • •

Simply put, the issue raised by the majority opinion in the Appeal Division is whether the Province is clothed with authority under s. 92 of the British North America Act to regulate the exhibition and distribution of films within its own boundaries which are considered unsuitable for local viewing by a local board on grounds of morality or whether this is a matter of criminal law reserved to Parliament under s. 91(27).

• • •

Under the authority assigned to it by s. 91(27), the Parliament of Canada has enacted the Criminal Code, a penal statute the end purpose of which is the definition and punishment of crime when it has been proved to have been committed.

On the other hand, the Theatres and Amusements Act is not concerned with creating a criminal offence or providing for its punishment, but rather in so regulating a business within the Province as to prevent the exhibition in its theatres of performances which do not comply with the standards of propriety established by the Board.

I share the opinion [expressed by Lord Atkin in Proprietary Articles Trade Association v Canada (AG), 1931 CanLII 385, [1931] AC 310 (UKJCPC)] that morality and criminality are far from coextensive and it follows in my view that legislation which authorizes the establishment and enforcement of a local standard of morality in the exhibition of films is not necessarily "an invasion of the federal criminal field" as Chief Justice MacKeigan thought it to be in this case.

Even if I accepted the view that the impugned legislation is concerned with criminal morality, it would still have to be noted that it is preventive rather than penal and the authority of the Province to pass legislation directed towards prevention of crime is illustrated by the case of Bedard v. Dawson [[1923] SCR 681, 1923 CanLII 43],

As I have already said, however, I take the view that the impugned legislation is not concerned with criminality. The rejection of films by the Board is based on a failure to conform to the standards of propriety which it has itself adopted and this failure cannot be said to be "an act prohibited with penal consequences" by the Parliament of Canada. ... This is not to say that Parliament is in any way restricted in its authority to pass laws penalizing immoral acts or conduct, but simply that the provincial Government in regulating a local trade may set its own standards which in no sense exclude the operation of the federal law.

There is, in my view, no constitutional barrier preventing the Board from rejecting a film for exhibition in Nova Scotia on the sole ground that it fails to conform to standards of morality which the Board itself has fixed notwithstanding the fact that the film is not offensive to any provision of the Criminal Code; and, equally, there is no constitutional reason why a prosecution cannot be brought under s. 163 of the Criminal Code in respect of the exhibition of a film which the Board of Censors has approved as conforming to its standards of propriety.

• • •

As I have said, I take the view that the legislation here in question is, in pith and substance, directed to property and civil rights and therefore valid under s. 92(13) of the British North America Act, but there is a further and different ground on which its validity might be sustained. In a country as vast and diverse as Canada, where tastes and standards may vary from one area to another, the determination of what is and what is not acceptable for public exhibition on moral grounds may be viewed as a matter of a "local and private nature in the Province" within the meaning of s. 92(16) of the B.N.A. Act, and as it is not a matter coming within any of the classes of subject enumerated in s. 91, this is a field in which the Legislature is free to act.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. While upholding most of the Act and regulations as they applied to film censorship, Ritchie J did invalidate one particular regulation (reg 32), applicable to both films and live performances, which provided that: "No theatre owner ... shall permit any indecent or improper performance in his theatre." Given the similarity of wording, reg 32 was found to be indistinguishable from the Criminal Code provision making it an offence to publicly exhibit an indecent show, with the result that the regulation impermissibly authorized the censor board to define what constituted a Criminal Code offence. Is this a satisfactory justification for invalidation? Are the differences between reg 32 and the rest of the censorship scheme significant, or was Ritchie J perhaps confusing the issues of validity and paramountcy?

2. In McNeil, reference is made to an earlier decision delineating the limits imposed on provincial powers by the federal criminal power: Bédard v Dawson, [1923] SCR 681, 1923 CanLII 43. Bédard involved a challenge to Quebec legislation providing for the closure of premises being used as a "disorderly house." The legislation was primarily concerned with premises in respect of which there had been Criminal Code convictions for prostitution and gambling. The five members of the Supreme Court of Canada who heard the case upheld the legislation. Some of the judgments emphasized that the law was in relation to property use and drew an analogy to the control of nuisance. Others relied on the broader ground of a provincial power to suppress conditions favouring the development of crime—hence giving rise to the arguments made in McNeil that the scheme of censorship was "preventive" rather than penal. It is also clearly established that provinces can legislate with respect to the civil consequences of crime—for example, provincial highway traffic legislation providing for suspension of a provincial driver's licence after conviction for certain Criminal Code offences has been held valid: see Ross v Registrar of Motor Vehicles, [1975] 1 SCR 5, 1973 CanLII 176, excerpted in Chapter 8.

3. The pattern of sympathy to provincial interests in regulating local conditions of morality and public order demonstrated by the majority judgment in McNeil was continued in Dupond v City of Montreal, [1978] 2 SCR 770, 1978 CanLII 201, decided shortly thereafter. In 1969, after a period of numerous public demonstrations, many of which were accompanied by violence, vandalism, and looting, the city of Montreal passed a by-law prohibiting parades or other gatherings that "endanger tranquillity, safety, peace or public order" in public places and thoroughfares. One section of the by-law gave the city's executive committee the power to make an ordinance prohibiting public gatherings if there were reasonable grounds to believe that the gatherings would endanger "safety, peace or public order." The penalties provided for violation of the by-law and ordinance were fines and imprisonment. Acting under the authority of the by-law, the executive council imposed a prohibition on all public demonstrations for 30 days. Dupond, as a ratepayer of the city, challenged both the by-law and ordinance. Justice Beetz, writing for a majority of the Court that also included Martland, Judson, Ritchie, Pigeon, and de Grandpré JJ, found that the by-law and ordinance were intra vires as a regulation of the municipal public domain, a pre-eminently local matter. In contrasting the challenged enactments with the Criminal Code provisions dealing with breach of the peace, Beetz J emphasized the preventive character of the municipal regulations. Chief Justice Laskin, who dissented, Spence and Dickson JJ concurring, viewed the by-law and ordinance as an ultra vires attempt to reinforce the criminal law. He characterized the law as a "mini-criminal code, dealing with apprehended breach of the peace, apprehended violence and the maintenance of public order" (at 774-75). In the course of his reasons, Laskin CJ emphasized the Draconian nature of the law in barring all gatherings, even those for innocent purposes, and the striking departure from the basic criminal law principle that the police are expected to enforce the law against violators and not against innocents. He concluded with the following comment: "This is the invocation of a doctrine which should alarm free citizens" (at 780).

4. Chief Justice Laskin's dissenting judgments in both McNeil and Dupond are informed by a concern to protect civil liberties by means of the federal criminal power. Although he failed to gain majority support in these cases, such concerns had in the past, through combined reliance on the federal criminal power and a doctrine called the "Implied Bill of Rights," led to the invalidation of provincial laws viewed as seriously threatening civil liberties: see the cases and materials found in Chapter 15, Antecedents of the Charter, including Switzman v Elbling, [1957] SCR 285, 1957 CanLII 2, which Laskin CJ relied on in McNeil. Did the enactment of the Charter of Rights in 1982 eliminate the need for the indirect use of federalism doctrines to protect civil liberties? For an argument that Laskin CJ's view of the criminal power led him to undervalue provincial claims to an anchor in s 92, see Katherine E Swinton, "Bora Laskin and Federalism" (1985) 35 UTLJ 353 at 367-72.

In Westendorp v The Queen, immediately below, the Supreme Court of Canada reversed the trend established in McNeil and Dupond and struck down a municipal by-law regulating public order and morality as an intrusion into the federal criminal law power. How can Westendorp be distinguished from McNeil and Dupond?

Westendorp v The Queen

[Westendorp had been charged with being on a street for the purpose of prostitution in contravention of s 6.1(2) of by-law 9022 of the City of Calgary. The by-law dealt generally with the regulation of the use of city streets and included provisions controlling soliciting or carrying on businesses, trades, or occupations on any street. The penalties provided for breach of the provisions of the by-law (other than s 6.1) were fines ranging from $20 to $300 and imprisonment for up to 10, 30, 45, or 60 days, according to the gravity of the infractions. In June 1981, city council had amended the by-law, by means of by-law 25M81, to add s 6.1, an explicit provision dealing with prostitution, which provided in s 6.1(2) that “[n]o person shall be or remain on a street for the purpose of prostitution,” and in s 6.1(3) that “[n]o person shall approach another person on a street for the purposes of prostitution.” The penalties provided for contravention of the provisions of s 6.1 were fines ranging from $100 to $500 and imprisonment of up to six months.

The recitals that introduced the amendment and explained its necessity referred to the fact that prostitutes “often collect in groups on city streets and attract crowds on city streets, vehicular and pedestrian ... [which] activities are a source of annoyance and embarrassment to members of the public and interfere with their right and ability to move freely and peacefully upon the city streets.”

In her defence, Westendorp challenged the constitutionality of s 6.1 of the by-law on the ground that it invaded federal authority in relation to criminal law. She was successful at trial, but her acquittal was set aside by the Alberta Court of Appeal, which found no invasion of the criminal law power.]

LASKIN CJ (Ritchie, Dickson, Beetz, Estey, McIntyre, Chouinard, Lamer, and Wilson JJ concurring):

[15] I have referred, however briefly, to the types of regulations and prohibitions and accompanying penalties which the by-law encompasses beyond s. 6.1. ... [T]here is nothing in the by-law which has any relation to s. 6.1 or to the scale of penalties prescribed for breach of s. 6.1 compared with those in the general penalty provisions of the by-law to which I have referred. Section 6.1 stands as an intruded provision of By-law 9022 which might just as well have been left in its original form in By-law 25M81. In short, there is nothing in By-law 9022 which invigorates s. 6.1 which must stand on its own merit as a valid municipal by-law.

[16] It is patent, from a comparison of s. 6.1 with ss. 3, 4 and 5 of the by-law, that s. 6.1 is of a completely different order from its preceding sections and, certainly, from all those succeeding it. It is specious to regard s. 6.1 as relating to control of the streets. If that were its purpose, it would have dealt with congregation of persons on the streets or with obstruction, unrelated to what the congregating or obstructing persons say or otherwise do. As the by-law stands and reads, it is activated only by what is said by a person, referable to the offer of sexual services. For persons to converse together on a street, as did the two women and the police officer here, and to discuss a recent or upcoming sporting event or a concert or some similar event would not attract liability. It is triggered only by an offer of sexual services or a solicitation to that end. There is no violation of s. 6.1 by congregation or obstruction per se; the offence arises only by proposing or soliciting another for prostitution. To remain on a street for the purpose of prostitution or to approach another for that purpose is so patently an attempt to control or punish prostitution as to be beyond question. ... There is no property question here, no question even of interference with the enjoyment of public property let alone private property.

[17] Nor can any comparison be made between this case and the judgment of this court in Attorney General for Canada and Dupond v. Montreal, [1978] 2 S.C.R. 770, which related to a municipal anti-demonstration by-law which was also emphasized as being of a temporary nature. That by-law related plainly to parades and assemblies on the streets, different from s. 6.1 of the present case.

[18] The question remains, however, whether ... there is none the less constitutional scope for the valid enactment of the challenged by-law. This brings me to consider the reasons given by Kerans JA for upholding the by-law. He construed it as an attempt to deal with a public nuisance. This is not how the offence under the by-law is either defined or charged. ...

[Reference was then made to Kerans JA's assessment of the by-law as "an attempt, by preventive measure, to regulate the activities of the prostitutes and their customers on the streets. It is, as it were, a pre-emptive strike" (at para 20).]

[21] What appears to me to emerge from Kerans JA's consideration of the by-law is to establish a concurrency of legislative power, going beyond any double aspect principle and leaving it open to a Province or to a municipality authorized by a Province to usurp exclusive federal legislative power. If a Province or municipality may translate a direct attack on prostitution into street control through reliance on public nuisance, it may do the same with respect to trafficking in drugs. And, may it not, on the same view, seek to punish assaults that take place on city streets as an aspect of street control!

[22] However desirable it may be for the municipality to control or prohibit prostitution, there has been an over-reaching in the present case which offends the division of legislative powers. I would, accordingly, allow the appeal, set aside the judgment of the Alberta Court of Appeal and restore the acquittal directed by the Provincial Court Judge.

Appeal allowed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. A similar by-law enacted by the City of Montreal was also found ultra vires—Goldwax v Montréal, [1984] 2 SCR 525, 1984 CanLII 125. Municipalities such as Calgary and Montreal were led to enact anti-prostitution by-laws because of dissatisfaction with the operation of the existing Criminal Code provision prohibiting solicitation in a public place for the purposes of prostitution. As a result of the Supreme Court of Canada's interpretation of the Code provision as requiring that soliciting had to be "pressing or persistent" in order to be a crime: see Hutt v The Queen, [1978] 2 SCR 476, 1978 CanLII 190, the control of street prostitution became much more difficult. Some municipalities reacted by imposing more stringent controls on the nuisance aspects of prostitution. When these municipal controls were found to be unconstitutional, as in Westendorp, the federal government decided to repeal the existing Criminal Code provision, replacing it with one making it an offence to communicate or attempt to communicate with any person in a public place for the purpose of engaging in prostitution. The new Code provision was challenged under the Charter as a violation of ss 2(b) (freedom of expression) and 7 (life, liberty, and security of the person), but was upheld by the Supreme Court of Canada in Reference re ss 193 and 195.1(1)(c) of the Criminal Code (Man), [1990] 1 SCR 1123, 1990 CanLII 105 [Prostitution Reference]. However, that decision was effectively set aside in Canada (AG) v Bedford, 2013 SCC 72, in which the Court invalidated the provision, along with several others relating to prostitution, as a violation of the right to security in s 7 of the Charter. Excerpts from Bedford are reproduced in Chapter 22, The Right to Life, Liberty, and Security of the Person.

2. Subsequent cases at the Supreme Court of Canada level have continued the general pattern of upholding provincial laws dealing with public order and morality through generous use of the doctrine of double aspect rather than finding them to be an intrusion on the federal criminal law power. Occasionally, however, no valid provincial purpose is found, and instead the provincial law is found to constitute an invalid attempt to duplicate, stiffen, or undermine the operation of the criminal law. To what extent might the number of litigated cases have been affected by the availability, since 1982, of the Charter as a means to challenge provincial laws that appear to restrict traditional civil liberties, such as freedom of association?

3. Rio Hotel Ltd v New Brunswick (Liquor Licensing Board), [1987] 2 SCR 59, 1987 CanLII 72, conforms to the dominant pattern of concurrency. In this case, the Supreme Court of Canada upheld provisions of the New Brunswick Liquor Control Act, RSNB 1973, c L-10, which gave the Liquor Licensing Board the power to attach conditions to liquor licences regulating and restricting the nature and conduct of live entertainment in licensed premises. On the facts of the case, a licence had been issued to a hotel owner with a condition precluding nude performances. The hotel owner argued that the condition related to public morality and therefore fell within the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal Parliament under s 91(27), noting that Parliament had enacted numerous provisions in the Criminal Code relating directly or indirectly to public nudity. The Supreme Court of Canada confirmed the province's ability to prohibit nude entertainment as part of a liquor licensing scheme notwithstanding the related provisions in the Criminal Code. The main judgment, written by Dickson CJ, emphasized the integration of the provincial prohibition in a comprehensive scheme of regulation and licensing in distinguishing the case from Westendorp, where the challenged by-law was described as an "intruded provision" (at para 7).

4. In contrast, in R v Morgentaler, [1993] 3 SCR 463, 1993 CanLII 74, excerpted in Chapter 8, the Supreme Court of Canada struck down a provincial law prohibiting the performance of certain designated medical services, in particular abortion, anywhere other than in a hospital. Penal sanctions were imposed for breach of the prohibition. The legislation was enacted in the wake of the Supreme Court of Canada decision in R v Morgentaler, [1988] 1 SCR 30, 1988 CanLII 90, excerpted in Chapter 22, which ruled that the Criminal Code provisions relating to abortion were unconstitutional because they violated s 7 of the Charter. Although the province attempted to uphold its legislation as a valid exercise of its jurisdiction to regulate health and hospitals, the Supreme Court of Canada, like the courts below, concluded that the legislation was in pith and substance in relation to criminal law. Heavy reliance was placed on excerpts from Hansard that demonstrated that the proposed law was understood to be about preventing the establishment of free-standing abortion clinics that were viewed as a "public evil." How is Morgentaler distinguishable from Rio Hotel? Are there similarities between Morgentaler and Westendorp? Is it possible to view Morgentaler as a case in which issues of rights indirectly influenced the federalism analysis?

Complicated issues about the interaction between the federal criminal law power and provincial powers over property and civil rights may arise when provinces seek to stiffen criminal penalties or replace them with administrative or civil sanctions. Because criminal prohibitions are enforced using criminal procedures, also within federal jurisdiction, a province's deployment of civil sanctions can circumvent the protections afforded by criminal procedures. These alternative schemes may also have an effect on the jurisdiction of s 96 judges, discussed in Chapter 13, The Role of the Judiciary.

Chatterjee v Ontario (AG)

2009 SCC 19

[At issue was the constitutionality of Ontario's Civil Remedies Act, SO 2001, c 28 [CRA], which authorizes the forfeiture of proceeds of unlawful activity. The CRA does not require an allegation or proof that any particular person committed any particular crime. Property may be forfeited under the CRA if, on a balance of probabilities, it is demonstrated that the property constituted the proceeds of crime in general, without further specificity. The police arrested the appellant, Chatterjee, for breach of probation and, in a search of his car incidental to the arrest, discovered $29,020 in small bills and items associated with the illicit drug trade (items that smelled of cannabis), but they did not find any drugs. The appellant was never charged with any offence in relation to the money and items or with any drug-related activity. The Attorney General of Ontario applied under ss 3 and 8 of the CRA for forfeiture of the seized cash as proceeds of unlawful activity. Chatterjee challenged the CRA's constitutionality, arguing that its forfeiture provisions were ultra vires the province because they encroach on the federal criminal law power.]

BINNIE J (McLachlin CJ and LeBel, Deschamps, Fish, Abella, and Rothstein JJ concurring):

[1] ... In my view, the CRA is valid provincial legislation.

[2] The argument that the CRA is ultra vires is based in this case on an exaggerated view of the immunity of federal jurisdiction in relation to matters that may, in another aspect, be the subject of provincial legislation. Resort to a federalist concept of proliferating jurisdictional enclaves (or "interjurisdictional immunities") was discouraged by this Court's decisions in Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 3, and British Columbia (Attorney General) v. Lafarge Canada Inc., [2007] 2 S.C.R. 86, and should not now be given a new lease on life. As stated in Canadian Western Bank, "a court should favour, where possible, the ordinary operation of statutes enacted by both levels of government" (para. 37 (emphasis in original)).

[3] The present appeal provides an opportunity to apply the principles of federalism affirmed in those recent cases. The CRA was enacted to deter crime and to compensate its victims. The former purpose is broad enough that both the federal government (in relation to criminal law) and the provincial governments (in relation to property and civil rights) can validly pursue it. The latter purpose falls squarely within provincial competence. Crime imposes substantial costs on provincial treasuries. Those costs impact many provincial interests, including health, policing resources, community stability and family welfare. It would be out of step with modern realities to conclude that a province must shoulder the costs to the community of criminal behaviour but cannot use deterrence to suppress it.

[4] Moreover, the CRA method of attack on crime is to authorize in rem forfeiture of its proceeds and differs from both the traditional criminal law which ordinarily couples a prohibition with a penalty (see Reference re Firearms Act (Can.), [2000] 1 S.C.R. 783) and criminal procedure which in general refers to the means by which an allegation of a particular criminal offence is proven against a particular offender. The appellant's answer, however, is that the effect of the CRA in rem remedy just adds to the penalties available in the criminal process, and as such the CRA invalidly interferes with the sentencing regime established by Parliament. It is true that forfeiture may have de facto punitive effects in some cases, but its dominant purpose is to make crime in general unprofitable, to capture resources tainted by crime so as to make them unavailable to fund future crime and to help compensate private individuals and public institutions for the costs of past crime. These are valid provincial objects. There is no operational conflict between the forfeiture provisions of the Criminal Code ... and the CRA. It cannot reasonably be said that the CRA amounts to colourable criminal legislation. Accordingly, I would dismiss the appeal.

[Justice Binnie described the facts, the relevant legislation, and the judgments of the Courts below.]

[15] Crime imposes significant costs at every level of government: federal, provincial and municipal. Impaired driving is a Criminal Code offence but carnage on the roads touches numerous matters within provincial jurisdiction including health, highways, automobile insurance and property damage. The cost associated with drug abuse is another example. Each level of government bears a portion of the costs of criminality and each level of government therefore has an interest in its suppression. ...

[Justice Binnie first examined the purpose and effects of the Act to determine its pith and substance.]

• • •

[23] In essence, therefore, the CRA creates a property-based authority to seize money and other things shown on a balance of probabilities to be tainted by crime and thereafter to allocate the proceeds to compensating victims of and remedying the societal effects of criminality. The practical (and intended) effect is also to take the profit out of crime and to deter its present and would-be perpetrators.

B. Assignment to Heads of Legislative Power

[24] Once the "pith and substance" is ascertained, it is necessary to classify that essential character of the law by reference to the provincial and federal "classes of subjects" listed in ss. 91 and 92 ... to determine if the law comes within the jurisdiction of the enacting legislature. Clearly, the CRA relates to property but, of course, much of the Criminal Code is dedicated to offences involving property. To characterize a provincial law as being in pith and substance related to property is therefore just a starting point. A good deal of overlap in measures taken to suppress crime is inevitable

C. The Provincial Aspect

[25] As stated, the CRA fits neatly into the provincial competence in relation to Property and Civil Rights in the Province (Constitution Act, 1867, s. 92(13)) or Matters of a merely local or private Nature in the Province (s. 92(16)). The Attorneys General rely on Martineau v. M.N.R., [2004] 3 S.C.R. 737, for the proposition that "civil mechanisms include the seizure as forfeit of goods and conveyances" (para. 27).

[26] Our jurisprudence offers many examples of the interplay between provincial legislative jurisdiction over property and civil rights and federal legislative jurisdiction over criminal law and procedure. In Bédard v. Dawson, [1923] S.C.R. 681, for example, the Court upheld the validity of a provincial law that authorized a judge to close a "disorderly hous[e]" for up to one year. The Court held that the law was directed to the enjoyment of property rights not criminal law. ... Idington J., in words relevant to the disposition of the present appeal, said that:

As to the argument addressed to us that the local legislatures cannot legislate to prevent crime, I cannot assent thereto for in a very wide sense it is the duty of the legislature to do the utmost it can within its power to anticipate and remove, so far as practicable, whatever is likely to tend to produce crime; [Emphasis added; p. 684.]

[27] ... [T]he CRA does not define a new offence or clearly take aim at any particular category of criminal conduct. ...

[28] In Attorney General for Canada and Dupond v. City of Montreal, [1978] 2 S.C.R. 770, the Court upheld a municipal ordinance regulating public demonstrations with a view to the prevention of "conditions conducive to breaches of the peace and detrimental to the administration of justice" (p. 791). The Court held the municipal law to be in relation to "Matters of a merely local or private Nature" under s. 92(16) and stated at p. 792 that "[i]t is now well established that the suppression of conditions likely to favour the commission of crimes falls within provincial competence" The Attorney General of Ontario also argues that the CRA in a sense operates as a substitute for civil litigation by victims against criminal offenders, a notoriously difficult and costly exercise.

[29] The question, however, is at what point does a provincial measure designed to "suppress" crime become itself "criminal law"? There will often be a degree of overlap between measures enacted pursuant to the provincial power (property and civil rights) and measures taken pursuant to the federal power (criminal law and procedure). In such cases it is necessary for the Court to identify the "dominant feature" of an impugned measure. If, as is argued by the Attorneys General here, the dominant feature of the CRA is property and civil rights, it will not be invalidated because of an "incidental" intrusion into the field of criminal law.

[30] For the reasons that follow I agree that the CRA was enacted "in relation to" property and civil rights and may incidentally "affect" criminal law and procedure without doing violence to the division of powers.

D. The Federal Aspect

[In response to the appellant's argument that the pith and substance of the CRA was criminal law because it imposed an additional penal regime in relation to federal offences and could, on occasion, conflict with the Criminal Code's forfeiture provisions, Binnie J considered Johnson v AG Alberta, [1954] SCR 127, 1954 CanLII 68, in which an Alberta law providing for forfeiture of slot machines was invalidated as an invasion of the federal criminal law power. He distinguished Johnson on several grounds, including its application of the now obsolete "covering the field" test for federal paramountcy, and its factual circumstances, specifically that the person suffering forfeiture under the Alberta law had also committed federal offences, whereas forfeiture pursuant to the CRA is independent of the sentencing process.]

• • •

E. Overlapping Effects

[40] The Constitution permits a province to enact measures to deter criminality and to deal with its financial consequences so long as those measures are taken in relation to a head of provincial competence and do not compromise the proper functioning of the Criminal Code including the sentencing provisions. In Provincial Secretary of Prince Edward Island v. Egan, [1941] S.C.R. 396, it was held that a province could validly impose automatic suspension of a provincial driver's licence after conviction for impaired driving under the Criminal Code. ... [Reference is also made to Ross v Registrar of Motor Vehicles, [1975] 1 SCR 5, 1973 CanLII 176.] There is no general bar to a province's enacting civil consequences to criminal acts provided the province does so for its own purposes in relation to provincial heads of legislative power.

[41] In Egan and Ross, the provincial laws were clearly aimed at deterring impaired driving, notwithstanding its status as a federal offence, and with good reason. Drunk drivers create public safety hazards on provincial highways and their accidents impose costs by way of examples on the provincial health system and provincial police and highway services. Similarly, the fact the CRA aims to deter federal offences as well as provincial offences and indeed offences committed outside Canada, is not fatal to its validity. On the contrary, its very generality shows that the province is concerned about the effects of crime as a generic source of social ill and provincial expense, and not with supplementing federal criminal law as part of the sentencing process.

F. Interference with the Criminal Code Forfeiture Provisions

[42] The argument arises in this case, as it did in Johnson, that the provisions of the provincial Act should be set aside as they "introduce an interference with the administration of [the Criminal Code forfeiture] provisions" (p. 138). If such operational interference were demonstrated, of course, or if it were shown that the CRA frustrated the federal purpose underlying the forfeiture provisions of the Criminal Code, the doctrine of federal paramountcy would render inoperative the CRA to the extent of the conflict or interference

[43] Consideration must therefore be given to Part XII.2 of the Criminal Code which in s. 462.37(1) provides as follows:

... where an offender is convicted, ... of a designated offence and the court imposing sentence on the offender, on application of the Attorney General, is satisfied, on a balance of probabilities, that any property is proceeds of crime and that the designated offence was committed in relation to that property, the court shall order that the property be forfeited to Her Majesty to be disposed of as the Attorney General directs or otherwise dealt with in accordance with the law.

[44] The Criminal Code also provide[s] that if the court is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the property in question represents the proceeds of crime, the court may order forfeiture even without a showing that the offence was committed in relation to that property (s. 462.37(2)).

[45] Parliament's legislative authority to bring about property consequences that are not directly connected with the offence for which an accused is being sentenced is not before the Court. I do not suggest any infirmity with any aspect of Criminal Code forfeiture. I say only that we have heard no argument on these provisions.

[46] On the other hand ... it is clear that [the provisions of the CRA] are not part of any "sentencing process." The CRA does not require an allegation or proof that a particular person committed a particular crime. For example, a drug dealer might, in a fit of conscience, gift the proceeds of a drug sale to a charity. Under the CRA, the money would constitute the proceeds of unlawful activity, and the charity would not be a "legitimate owner" within the scope of s. 2 because the charity would have acquired the property after the unlawful activity occurred and would not have given "fair value" for it. The money would, thus, be subject to forfeiture. In the present case, the CRA judge could have accepted wholeheartedly the appellant's claim that he was entirely innocent of any involvement with marijuana cultivation, yet still ordered forfeiture.

[47] Even when the owner has gained the property by means of crime, the CRA forfeiture proceeding does not require, and may not involve, identifying the owner with a particular offence. This would be the case, for example, if cash were seized from a gang safe house. In such a case, the Attorney General may be able to show on a balance of probabilities that money constituted the proceeds of crime in general without identifying any particular crime or criminal.

G. Interference in the Sentencing Process

• • •

[49] The concern has been that the federal forfeiture provisions will be displaced by the CRA with its lower threshold of proof This may be true, but where no forfeiture is sought in the sentencing process, I see no reason why the Attorney General cannot make an application under the CRA. Where forfeiture is sought and refused in the criminal process, a different issue arises.

• • •

[51] I believe the various doctrines of res judicata, issue estoppel and abuse of process are adequate to prevent the prosecution from re-litigating the sentencing issue. Detailed consideration must await a case where the clash of remedies is truly in issue. . . .

[52] Accordingly, procedural options are available where a CRA judge considers that the conduct of the Attorney General is abusive of the processes of the Court. Furthermore, if in particular circumstances a conflict arises with the CRA to the extent that dual compliance is impossible, then the doctrine of paramountcy would render the CRA inoperable to the extent of the conflict.

[53] In summary, the CRA is valid provincial legislation. It does not "introduce an interference with the administration of [the Criminal Code] provisions" within the scope of the mischief identified by Rand J. in Johnson. . . . [T]here is no necessary operational conflict between the Criminal Code and the CRA such as to invalidate the latter.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Do the valid provincial interests in suppressing crime justify requiring individuals to prove that they have not acquired property by illegal means? Why did the Court not give more attention to the presumption of innocence? Does Chatterjee allow a province to presume that a person is guilty of a criminal offence so long as the province uses civil sanctions rather than criminal ones?

2. At para 45, Binnie J noted that the constitutionality of the federal provisions that permit forfeiture of the proceeds of crime, even if those proceeds are not connected to an offence before a sentencing court, was not before the Court. Earlier in this chapter, in our discussion of the requirement of a criminal law form, you were asked if these provisions were constitutionally suspect. After reading Chatterjee, have you changed your view?

3. In Goodwin v British Columbia (Superintendent of Motor Vehicles), 2015 SCC 46, the Supreme Court of Canada upheld a provincial scheme of roadside testing for impaired driving from a challenge on a division of powers grounds. British Columbia, as part of its long-standing effort to combat impaired driving using administrative prohibitions such as licence suspensions, created the automatic roadside prohibition (ARP) program, under which drivers who failed a roadside breathalyzer test that was administered by police officers would have their licences suspended immediately for 90 days, their vehicles immediately impounded for the suspension's duration, and be liable for penalties and costs of $4,000 and over. Drivers who refused to take the roadside test incurred the same penalties. A "warn reading" would result in a shorter period of immediate suspension and impoundment. Drivers could apply to the superintendent of motor vehicles for a review of suspensions, but only on very limited grounds, which did not include challenging the accuracy of the roadside breathalyzer. Drivers who had their licences suspended under the ARP would not be charged with violations of the Criminal Code provisions relating to impaired driving; one consequence of police officers deciding to enforce the ARP rather than the Criminal Code provisions was a noticeable reduction in the number of trials in provincial courts.

Justice Karakatsanis, writing for a unanimous Court on the issues pertaining to the division of powers, upheld the program as a valid exercise of provincial power over property and civil rights. In rejecting the appellant's argument that the provincial purpose was to provide a punitive, criminal law response to drunk driving without engaging the Charter and its procedural protections, she characterized the ARP scheme as "the licensing of drivers, the enhancement of highway traffic safety, and the deterrence of persons from driving on highways when their ability is impaired by alcohol" (at para 29), valid purposes under the province's power over property and civil rights. However, Karakatsanis J went on to hold (with McLachlin CJ dissenting on this point) that the ARP violated the right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure under s 8 of the Charter because it did not permit review of the accuracy of the roadside breathalyzer. On this point, the BC legislature had already amended the Act to give the driver a right to ask for a second breathalyzer test, to be administered immediately after the first, with the lower result forming the basis of the suspension.

Modern law enforcement often requires considerable cooperation between federal and provincial authorities, including interlocking legislative schemes, to effectively address the complex problems generated by modern technologies and globalization. Consider, for example, the extensive cooperation necessary for the investigation and prosecution of crimes committed using the Internet. The need for federal–provincial cooperation in law enforcement raises issues that are common to instruments of cooperative federalism across all subject matters. This chapter thus appropriately concludes with Quebec v Canada, which involved the criminal law power and introduced some issues pertaining to cooperative federalism that are discussed in Chapter 12. Specifically, it addressed the question of what happens when Parliament decides to dismantle a cooperative scheme while a province wishes to continue with the scheme on its own accord.

Quebec (AG) v Canada (AG)

2015 SCC 14

CROMWELL and KARAKATSANIS JJ (McLachlin CJ and Rothstein and Moldaver JJ concurring):

I. Introduction

[1] Fifteen years ago, this Court determined that Parliament, acting under its power to legislate in relation to criminal law, had the constitutional authority to establish a nationwide gun control scheme. Parliament's decision to do so was a contentious policy choice that was contested on constitutional grounds. Three years ago, Parliament reversed in part that earlier policy choice: it repealed the legislation that had established the long-gun registry within the gun control scheme, and provided for the destruction of the data it contained. This too was a contentious policy choice which is now contested on constitutional grounds.

[2] When the government tabled the bill abolishing the long-gun registry and providing for the destruction of the data it contained, Quebec expressed its intention to create its own provincial gun control scheme and asked Canada to give it the data on long guns connected with the province. The federal government refused. As a result, Quebec challenged the constitutionality of the federal law providing for destruction of the data and sought an order requiring the federal government to turn it over. The Superior Court of Quebec declared that Parliament's legislative jurisdiction with respect to criminal law does not allow it to legislate for the destruction of the long-gun registration records without first making this data available to provinces seeking to establish their own registries, and ordered the federal government to transfer the relevant data to Quebec. A five-member panel of the Quebec Court of Appeal disagreed. ... Quebec now appeals to this Court

[3] We agree with the conclusions of the Quebec Court of Appeal and would dismiss the appeal. The principle of cooperative federalism does not constrain federal legislative competence in this case, Quebec has no legal right to the data, and s. 29 of the Act to amend the Criminal Code and the Firearms Act (short title Ending the Long-gun Registry Act ("ELRA")) is a lawful exercise of Parliament's criminal law legislative power under the Constitution. We add this; to some, Parliament's choice to destroy this data will undermine public safety and waste enormous amounts of public money. To others, it will seem to be the dismantling of an ill-advised regime and the overdue restoration of the privacy rights of law-abiding gun owners. But these competing views about the merits of Parliament's policy choice are not at issue here. As has been said many times, the courts are not to question the wisdom of legislation but only to rule on its legality. In our view, the decision to dismantle the long-gun registry and destroy the data that it contains is a policy choice that Parliament was constitutionally entitled to make.

[4] We note that our conclusion in this case partly rests on the fact that the Canadian Firearms Registry ("CFR") flows directly from federal legislation and is not dependent on any provincial statutes. Different considerations might arise in a case involving a truly interlocking federal–provincial legislative framework. However, the CFR is not, in our respectful view, such a scheme. Therefore we need not consider what might follow if it were.

[The facts and the decisions of the courts below were then reviewed.]

III. Analysis

A. Does the Principle of Cooperative Federalism Prevent Parliament from Legislating to Dispose of the Data?

[15] Quebec invokes the principle of cooperative federalism in support of both its argument that s. 29 of the ELRA is ultra vires and its claim that Quebec has the right to receive the data contained in the CFR related to long guns connected to Quebec. In essence, Quebec is asking us to recognize that the principle of cooperative federalism prevents Canada and the provinces from acting or legislating in a way that would hinder cooperation between both orders of government, especially in spheres of concurrent jurisdiction.

[16] In our respectful view, Quebec's position has no foundation in our constitutional law and is contrary to the governing authorities from this Court.

[17] Cooperative federalism is a concept used to describe the "network of relationships between the executives of the central and regional governments [through which] mechanisms are developed, especially fiscal mechanisms, which allow a continuous redistribution of powers and resources without recourse to the courts or the amending process": P.W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. Supp.), at p. 5-46; see also W.R. Lederman, "Some Forms and Limitations of Co-Operative Federalism," in Continuing Canadian Constitutional Dilemmas (1981), 314. From this descriptive concept of cooperative federalism, courts have developed a legal principle that has been invoked to provide flexibility in separation of powers doctrines, such as federal paramountcy and interjurisdictional immunity. It is used to facilitate interlocking federal and provincial legislative schemes and to avoid unnecessary constraints on provincial legislative action . . . With respect to interjurisdictional immunity, for example, the principle of cooperative federalism has been relied on to explain and justify relaxing a rigid, watertight compartments approach to the division of legislative power that unnecessarily constrains legislative action by the other order of government . . . [reference is made to Canadian Western Bank v Alberta, 2007 SCC 22].

[18] However, we must also recognize the limits of the principle of cooperative federalism. The primacy of our written Constitution remains one of the fundamental tenets of our constitutional framework: Reference re Secession of Quebec, [1998] 2 S.C.R. 217, at para. 53. This is especially the case with regard to the division of powers:

... [T]he text of the federal constitution as authoritatively interpreted in the courts remains very important. It tells us who can act in any event. In other words, constitutionally it must always be possible in a federal country to ask and answer the question: What happens if the federal and provincial governments do not agree about a particular measure of co-operative action? Then which government and legislative body has power to do what? [Emphasis added; footnote omitted.]

(Lederman, at p. 315)

[19] The principle of cooperative federalism, therefore, cannot be seen as imposing limits on the otherwise valid exercise of legislative competence . . . This was recently reiterated by this Court in its unanimous opinion in Reference re Securities Act, [2011] 3 S.C.R. 837, at paras. 61-62:

While flexibility and cooperation are important to federalism, they cannot override or modify the separation of powers. The Secession Reference affirmed federalism as an underlying constitutional principle that demands respect for the constitutional division of powers and the maintenance of a constitutional balance between federal and provincial powers.

In summary, notwithstanding the Court's promotion of cooperative and flexible federalism, the constitutional boundaries that underlie the division of powers must be respected. The "dominant tide" of flexible federalism, however strong its pull may be, cannot sweep designated powers out to sea, nor erode the constitutional balance inherent in the Canadian federal state. [Emphasis added.]

[20] In our respectful view, the principle of cooperative federalism does not assist Quebec in this case. Neither this Court's jurisprudence nor the text of the Constitution Act, 1867 supports using that principle to limit the scope of legislative authority or to impose a positive obligation to facilitate cooperation where the constitutional division of powers authorizes unilateral action. To hold otherwise would undermine parliamentary sovereignty and create legal uncertainty whenever one order of government adopted legislation having some impact on the policy objectives of another. Paradoxically, such an approach could discourage the practice of cooperative federalism for fear that cooperative measures could risk diminishing a government's legislative authority to act alone.

[21] We conclude that the principle of cooperative federalism does not prevent Parliament from exercising legislative authority that it otherwise possesses to dispose of the data.

[Cromwell and Karakatansis JJ then rejected Quebec's submission that it had a right to obtain the data, on this point agreeing with the dissenting judges that Quebec had not established a legal basis for its claim to the data.]

• • •

C. Is Section 29 Ultra Vires Parliament's Criminal Law Power?

• • •

[28] To answer this question, we first characterize the law—that is, determine its subject matter or "pith and substance"—and then classify it as to whether it is in relation to the subject of criminal law and procedure.

• • •

[30] Where the challenge concerns a particular provision which forms part of a larger scheme, the pith and substance analysis begins with the challenged provision However, the "matter" of the provision must be considered in the context of the larger scheme, as its relationship to that scheme may be an important consideration in determining its pith and substance

[31] Courts must be careful not to endorse a "colourable" statute, that is, one that in form appears to relate to a matter within the legislative competence of the enacting order of government, but in substance addresses a matter falling outside its competence The colourability doctrine simply means that "form is not controlling in the determination of essential character" Courts are, for good reasons, reluctant to find legislation to be colourable There is a danger that any broader application of the colourability doctrine may lead the courts to exceed their role of determining the constitutionality of legislation and, instead, express disapproval of either the policy of the statute or the means by which the legislation seeks to carry it out

[32] Once the subject matter has been identified, the next step ... consists of classifying the legislation or provision in relation to the division of legislative power in the Constitution. ... If the "matter" of the legislation comes within the "subject" of the head of power of the enacting order of government, the legislation is intra vires even if it has incidental effects on the other jurisdiction's legislative competence (subject to federal paramountcy in the case of provincial legislation)

[33] This point takes on special importance when considering the classification of a law, like this one, that undoes a previously enacted scheme. In classifying legislation that undoes an existing legislative scheme, due regard must be paid to the proper classification of that scheme. Consider the example of the repeal of a criminal offence. The scope of the criminal law power extends to laws that create a prohibition backed by a penalty for a criminal law purpose A law creating a true criminal offence clearly has these features, but a law repealing that same offence does not; the latter does not create a prohibition backed by a penalty for a criminal law purpose. The repealing enactment, however, is clearly criminal law because the "matter" of that law comes within the same criminal law subject as did the provision it seeks to repeal. This is why Quebec is clearly right in this case not to question Parliament's authority to repeal the long-gun registry scheme, and to restrict its challenge to s. 29 of the ELRA, which provides for the destruction of the data. The fatal flaw in Quebec's analysis, however, is that in characterizing the pith and substance of s. 29, it ignores the place of the data gathering and retention provisions in the overall scheme.

(a) The "Matter" of Section 29

[34] In essence, Quebec submits that the pith and substance of s. 29 of the ELRA is to prevent the long-gun registry from being continued through provincial legislation. Although Quebec does not suggest that this "matter" comes within any of the enumerated heads of provincial legislative power, it submits nonetheless that the federal legislation is not a valid exercise of the criminal law power because it [TRANSLATION] "encroaches massively on the ability of a provincial legislature to exercise as it sees fit its powers with respect to the administration of justice, public safety, [and] the prevention of crime and the social costs associated with crime" Quebec relies on several statements made by the Prime Minister and other federal cabinet ministers to the effect that Canada's objective is to put a definite end to the long-gun registry by destroying the data contained in the CFR connected to long guns, and that they will do nothing to support any province or territory who would like to create a local long-gun registry. Quebec also submits that the effect of the destruction of the data will be to make it prohibitively expensive and complicated for the province to create its own long-gun registry. Section 29 of the ELRA therefore constitutes an encroachment on the province's powers.

[35] Canada submits that the subject matter of s. 29 is the same as the rest of the ELRA: to abolish the long-gun registry and put an end to what it considers an unwarranted intrusion into the private lives of Canadian gun owners. Canada also asserts that the practical effects of the destruction of the data on provinces who want to create their own gun control scheme do not change the pith and substance of the impugned provision.

[36] In our respectful view, the proper characterization of the "matter" of s. 29 of the ELRA derives from that of the scheme that it is undoing. In the Reference re Firearms Act, this Court held that both the criminal prohibition on possessing an unregistered firearm and the registration scheme provided for in the Firearms Act were valid public safety measures. ... The Court rejected arguments from Ontario and Saskatchewan to the effect that the "matter" of the registration and data retention provisions, which s. 29 seeks to dismantle, was the regulation of property within the province. The Court concluded that the "matter" of these provisions was the same as the rest of the scheme—public safety—and that they should accordingly be classified as being in relation to the subject of criminal law

[37] Viewed in this light, the "matter" of s. 29 is simply to determine what will happen with the data collected under a now repealed legislative scheme. Given that the "matter" of the registration scheme, including data collection, was found to be public safety in the Reference re Firearms Act, dealing with the collected data following the repeal of the scheme must share that same characterization.

[38] Quebec's submissions, in our respectful view, confuse the subject matter of s. 29 of the ELRA with Canada's motives and the means employed by Parliament. In determining the true character of s. 29, we are not concerned with whether destroying the data is good policy, whether Canada's motives were sound, or whether the destruction of that data conflicts with the policy objectives of Quebec. We recognize that the federal government's ultimate goal may well have been to prevent Quebec from creating its own long-gun registry. We also accept that the destruction of the data is the means chosen by Canada because of its irremediable nature. That being said, these considerations are not indicative of a "colourable" purpose from a division of powers' perspective. An intention on the part of one level of government to prevent another from realizing a policy objective it disagrees with does not, on its own, lead to the conclusion that there is an encroachment on the other level of government's sphere of exclusive jurisdiction. The fact that s. 29 of the ELRA has the practical effect of making it more difficult financially for Quebec to create its own gun control regime does not ... affect the pith and substance of the provision. ...

[Quebec's argument that s 29 is a colourable attempt to legislate in relation to property and civil rights in the province was rejected.]

• • •

[41] In summary, this Court has already been called upon in the Reference re Firearms Act to determine the pith and substance of the scheme enacted by the Firearms Act. In our view, legislation repealing the part of that scheme relating to long guns, including a provision addressing what will happen to the data collected thereunder, must be characterized in the same way. We conclude that s. 29, in essence, relates to public safety—as did the long-gun registration scheme being repealed by the balance of the ELRA.

(b) Classification: Does Section 29 Come Within the Criminal Law Power?

[42] Quebec submits that s. 29 cannot be a valid exercise of Parliament's criminal law power because it is not aimed at preventing crime or at decriminalizing any conduct. We disagree and would hold that s. 29 of the ELRA falls under the criminal law head of power.

[43] It is not contested that the repeal of criminal provisions constitutes a valid exercise of the criminal law power The power to repeal a criminal law provision must logically be wide enough to give Parliament jurisdiction to destroy the data collected for the purpose of a criminal law provision. If a law establishing a scheme requiring collection of data is legislation "in relation to" criminal law, then legislation providing for the destruction of that data on the repeal of the scheme must also be legislation "in relation to" criminal law. This is the case here.

[45] Therefore, we agree with the Quebec Court of Appeal that s. 29 of the ELRA should be characterized as being in relation to criminal law. It therefore falls within the legislative competence of Parliament.

LeBEL, WAGNER, and GASCON JJ (Abella J concurring) (dissenting):

[50] We are of the opinion that the appeal should be allowed, but only in part. This conclusion is dictated by the exceptional circumstances in which long-gun regulation was implemented in Canada. In our opinion, ... both the collection of the data with respect to long guns and the broader initiatives aimed at regulating the use of such guns were the result of a partnership with the provinces, including Quebec. Where an integrated scheme such as this requires the exercise of both federal and provincial legislative powers, the analytical framework for questions related to the division of powers must be adapted and applied accordingly. Whether the means the federal government adopted to terminate this partnership were constitutional can be measured, in particular, in terms of the effect they will have on its partners' powers.

[51] The ELRA is the measure chosen by Parliament to end its participation in long-gun regulation. But s. 29 goes beyond the scope of that purpose, as it requires that the data in question be destroyed without providing for a possibility of their first being transferred to the provincial partners, which prevents the latter from using them in the exercise of their powers. This section has significant effects on Quebec's legislative powers and is not necessary to the achievement of the ELRA 's purpose. Section 29 is therefore unconstitutional and should be declared to be invalid.

[52] Although we find that s. 29 is unconstitutional, the AGQ [Attorney General of Quebec] has nonetheless failed to establish a legal basis for his request for a compulsory transfer of the data. The conditions applicable to such a transfer are a matter for the governments concerned, not the courts.

[Justices LeBel, Wagner, and Gascon conducted a lengthy and detailed analysis of the various registry schemes created under the Firearms Act and the methods by which the information in each was gathered, stored, and accessed. They concluded that the trial judge was correct in his findings that Quebec had contributed to the data, and the evidence established a partnership between the federal government and Quebec with respect to implementing the Firearms Act and firearms control more generally.]

C. Analytical Framework Applicable to the Division of Powers

[The general principles governing a pith and substance analysis were reviewed, followed by a discussion of the ancillary powers doctrine.]

• • •

[143] [This Court has] recognized that a government at one level can validly pass legislation on a matter within its jurisdiction even though the legislation intrudes upon the other level's jurisdiction. Yet the constitutional doctrines that make such an intrusion permissible—namely the pith and substance and ancillary powers doctrines—cannot be fully understood without considering the constitutional principles upon which they are based We will now turn to these principles, in particular that of federalism.

(3) Unwritten Principles: Federalism

[144] The Court has, while stressing that our written Constitution is paramount, recognized the importance of the unwritten principles that underlie it

[145] ... The principle of federalism requires that the constitutional division of powers be respected and that a balance be maintained between federal and provincial powers. One "power may not be used in a manner that effectively eviscerates another": Reference re Securities Act, at para. 7; Reference re Secession of Quebec, at paras. 57–58.

[146] According to the "classical" approach favoured by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council until 1949, the heads of power constituted "watertight compartments," and overlaps between them were to be avoided to the full extent possible

[147] The modern view of federalism rejects this approach and ... "recognizes that in practice there is significant overlap between the federal and provincial areas of jurisdiction, and provides that both governments should be permitted to legislate for their own valid purposes in these areas of overlap" Such a conception thus facilitates intergovernmental co-operation Both in law and in the political arena, the concept of "co-operative federalism" has been developed to adapt the principle of federalism to this modern reality.

(4) Recognition of Co-operative Federalism

[148] Co-operative federalism reflects the realities of an increasingly complex society that requires the enactment of co-ordinated federal and provincial legislative schemes to better deal with the local needs of unity and diversity From a legal perspective, it is by allowing for overlapping powers through the application of the pith and substance and ancillary powers doctrines that co-operative federalism is able to meet those needs and, in this sense, to enable the goals of federalism to be realized.

[149] In our opinion, the federal – provincial partnership with respect to firearms control is consistent with the spirit of co-operative federalism. ...

[150] In the case at bar, this Court is not being asked to hold that a co-operative scheme based on the powers of both levels of government is valid. Rather, the AGQ is challenging the validity of a provision that contributes to the dismantling of a partnership that was created in the spirit of co-operative federalism. This situation is unique and novel.

(5) The End of a Partnership Based on “Co-operative Federalism”

[151] In the novel circumstances of this case, our analysis must be guided by the Constitution’s unwritten principles. In particular, we must be careful not to place the principle of federalism and its modern form – co-operative federalism – in jeopardy. ...

[152] The dominant tide with respect to the division of powers admits of overlapping powers and favours co-operation between the different levels of governments. It also supports the validity of schemes established jointly through partnerships developed between members of our federation. In our opinion, our courts must protect such schemes both when they are implemented and when they are dismantled. It would hardly make sense to encourage co-operation and find that schemes established in the context of a partnership are valid while at the same time refusing to take this particular context into account when those schemes are terminated.

[153] In our opinion, the dismantling of a partnership like the one established with respect to gun control must be carried out in a manner that is compatible with the principle of federalism that underlies our Constitution. Thus, Parliament or a provincial legislature cannot adopt legislation to terminate such a partnership without taking into account the reasonably foreseeable consequences of the decision to do so for the other partner. ...

[154] In other words, a co-operative scheme from which both the federal and provincial governments benefit cannot be dismantled unilaterally by one of the parties without taking the impact of such a decision on its partner’s heads of power into account. To conclude otherwise would be to accept a one-way form of co-operative federalism. ... The concern here is not to alter the separation of powers in our Constitution through the application of co-operative federalism, but to ensure that it is respected. ...

[155] We could not state these principles more clearly than the Court has already done in Reference re Assisted Human Reproduction Act [2010 SCC 61]:

In short, care must be taken to maintain the constitutional balance of powers at all stages of the constitutional analysis. Be it in identifying the pith and substance of a statute or a provision or in reviewing the limits of an assigned power or of the exercise of an ancillary power, the courts must bear the importance of the unwritten constitutional principles in mind and must adhere to them. [para. 196]

[156] Thus, subject to adherence to the above-mentioned principles, the courts nonetheless must not stray from the analytical framework applicable to the division of powers. To determine whether s. 29 of the ELRA is valid, it is therefore necessary to consider that framework and these principles.

D. Constitutionality of Section 29 of the ELRA

[157] ... It is true that Parliament can repeal or amend legislation it has validly enacted under one of its heads of power Nevertheless, the courts must consider the impugned provision or legislation to determine whether, in pith and substance, all that it does in fact is repeal or amend legislation that was validly enacted.

• • •

[159] ... [A] statutory provision might be enacted to abolish a scheme that was incidental to the jurisdiction of the legislature that initially created it. In such a case, the legislature in question might in theory wish to eliminate an encroachment on a head of power that does not belong to it. But it is quite possible that what the legislature intends to do to eliminate that initial encroachment in fact encroaches to an even greater extent on that head of power. This is all the more likely to occur in the context of a partnership.

[160] As a result, whether s. 29 of the ELRA is constitutional must be determined in the same way as for any legislation enacted by Parliament. To do this, we must identify the pith and substance of that section and link it to a head of legislative power.

(1) Analysis Regarding the Pith and Substance of Section 29

[Justices LeBel, Wagner, and Gascon conducted an analysis of the purpose and effects of s 29, concluding that the trial judge was correct in his finding that the parliamentary intention in destroying the data was to hinder the provinces. In light of the extrinsic evidence, they also rejected the assertion by the Attorney General of Canada that the purpose of s 29 was to eliminate an invasion of privacy.]

• • •

[176] In our opinion, in light of its purpose and its effect, s. 29 goes much farther than simply requiring that the data be destroyed [T]he section's true purpose is to ensure that the information on long guns can no longer be used for any provincial purposes. As we mentioned above, however, the regulation of long guns and the use of information about them fall primarily within the provinces' power to make laws in relation to property and civil rights. This is all the more true now that the failure to comply with the requirement to register has been decriminalized, because the use of the information has lost its federal aspect. As a result, the pith and substance of s. 29 relates to the provinces' power over property and civil rights.

[177] To be valid, therefore, s. 29 must be integrated into the ELRA as a whole. This conclusion makes sense to us, given that whether the CFR is constitutional in fact depends on its being ancillary to a criminal law purpose, as the Court found in the FA Reference.

(2) Ancillary Powers Analysis

[178] To determine whether s. 29 of the ELRA is constitutional on the basis of the ancillary powers doctrine, we must consider the seriousness, or extent, of its encroachment on provincial powers, bearing in mind that the provincial power to make laws in relation to property and civil rights is a head that should not be intruded upon lightly We should mention that s. 29 may also encroach on the provinces' powers in relation to the administration of justice, as can be seen from our analysis below.

[179] The seriousness of the encroachment of s. 29 must be analyzed on the basis of the specific factual and legal context of the instant case

[180] By enacting the FA, the federal government effectively took over the field of firearms regulation. The decision to do so had two major consequences. On the one hand, the provinces had to deal with a national registry. As a result, the creation of a provincial long-gun registry became unnecessary As well, Quebec passed legislation based upon this partnership with the federal government. The creation and management of a federal firearms registry thus led to the development of a provincial aspect. To destroy the registry unilaterally without taking this reality into account is to negate Quebec's financial, administrative and legislative participation.

[181] On the other hand, although the FA did not have a significant effect on the provinces' powers with respect to firearms at the time of its enactment, that is no longer true today in a context in which the data are to be destroyed without first being transferred to Quebec. The consequences of the loss of the information collected since 1998 will not be only financial in nature. The quality and usefulness of a restored registry created by Quebec would be diminished, since, to give one example, the chain of ownership of each weapon will have been lost. ... Quebec maintains that, if it does not obtain and cannot retain the data concerning the registrations of interest to it, it will lose track of more than one and one half million long guns Thus, the destruction of the data would compromise the creation and the usefulness of a future Quebec firearms registry.

[182] Furthermore, ... the partnership discussed above led to the enactment by Quebec of legislation that falls within its powers in relation to the administration of justice. Destruction of the data would therefore interfere with the use Quebec makes of them in the administration of certain provincial legislative schemes ... and with their use by the police in investigations in particular.

[183] Finally, the federal government could have implemented its vision of firearms control without involving the provinces in any significant way, but it did not choose to take that approach. Doubtless for the sake of efficiency, it instead developed a legislative scheme that required active provincial participation and took the form of a partnership. This cannot be disregarded in analyzing the seriousness of the encroachment on the powers of the other level of government and, consequently, in determining the scope and validity of s. 29.

[184] This leads us to conclude that in terms of both its nature and its effects, s. 29 causes a substantial encroachment on provincial jurisdiction. In such a case, the Court's past decisions tell us that for the encroachment of s. 29 to be found to be ancillary to the ELRA, the degree to which the section is integrated into the Act must be high, that is, it must satisfy the necessity or "integral part" criterion

[185] The purpose of the ELRA as a whole, with the exception of s. 29, is to abolish the requirement to register long guns. The fact that the "summary" of the ELRA refers to two purposes cannot serve on its own as proof of the true purpose of the ELRA. It goes without saying that the courts, in determining whether legislation is constitutionally valid, must look beyond the legislation's declared or apparent purpose. Were they not to do so, it would be possible for a legislature to shield statutory provisions from constitutional challenge simply by drafting a preamble. Furthermore, it is only s. 29 of the ELRA that is related to the supposed second purpose of the Act.

[186] In our opinion, the destruction of the data in question in s. 29 cannot be considered necessary to the abolition of the requirement to register long guns. These two purposes are distinct. Moreover, as we mentioned above, the earlier bills did not provide for the destruction of these data.

[187] We also doubt that s. 29 can be linked to the ELRA based upon a test of rationality. Although the destruction of data in which the federal government is no longer interested might seem rational at first glance, we find it hard to reconcile the manner in which their destruction was provided for with the desire certain provinces might show to maintain a registry within the limits of their powers. The AGC in fact acknowledged at the hearing that what was problematic was not really the fact of transferring the data to the government of Quebec, but that of transmitting personal information about long-gun owners: transcript, at p. 55. ...

[188] Finally, we agree with Blanchard J. that Parliament's declared intention to cause harm to the other level of government cannot be disregarded. ...

[189] Although it is not necessary to take this into account for the purposes of our analysis, the intention to cause harm is all the more relevant in that it arises in a context in which Quebec and the federal government had agreed to act jointly, in the spirit of co-operative federalism . . . In this context, it is hard to imagine how a provision whose purpose is to put an end to this co-operation and that is enacted with an intention to cause harm to a partner can be rational.

[190] The foregoing analysis leads to an inescapable conclusion: because of its pith and substance, s. 29 of the ELRA does not fall within the federal criminal law power and is not ancillary to the ELRA, which is otherwise valid. The section has not therefore been shown to be constitutionally valid. In our opinion, a legislative measure cannot be found to be valid that (1) does not fall within the federal criminal law power and that (2) thwarts, by the substantial encroachment it causes, the corollary exercise of provincial powers that flowed from the partnership. To conclude otherwise would be inconsistent with the principles of federalism.

[191] Our conclusion does not necessarily mean that Parliament cannot enact legislation to destroy the data. What we are saying is merely that to destroy the data, as provided for in s. 29, without first offering to transfer them is unconstitutional. ...

[Justice LeBel, Wagner, and Gascon would have declared s 29 of the Ending the Long-Gun Registry Act to be invalid as it pertained to data with respect to long guns that have a connection with Quebec. However, because in their opinion Quebec had not established a legal basis for its claim to the data, they would not have issued a declaration that Quebec was entitled to receive the data.]

Appeal dismissed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Why was the majority reluctant to apply the doctrine of colourability? What more would be needed to show that this was an appropriate set of facts for applying the doctrine?
2. Will this decision have consequences for the content of agreements negotiated between the federal and provincial governments?
3. Various formulations of a "duty of reciprocal loyalty" can be found in the constitutional law of many federations, sometimes explicitly in the constitutional text—e.g. s 41(1) of the South African constitution and art 143(1) of the Belgium constitution—and sometimes, as in Germany, as a doctrine developed by the judiciary to regulate intergovernmental relationships on the basis that loyalty is an inherent normative aspect of the very idea of federalism. Jean-François Gaudreault-DesBiens has argued that recognizing a duty of loyalty would "bridge the Court's increased reliance on the normative principle of federalism with the fact that intergovernmental cooperation has become a central feature of the federalism's daily life." Using the considerable German experience as a guide, Gaudreault-DesBiens describes the duty of loyalty, with its corollary of good faith, as encompassing negative duties on government actors to avoid exercising their powers in certain ways—for example, as actions that disproportionately impose negative externalities on others—and positive duties to remove obstacles to the lawful exercise of other actors' jurisdictions:

Federal loyalty provides a normative justification for occasional judicial interventions targeted either at preventing that trust be unduly undermined within the federation, or by facilitating the restoration of trust between federal actors. ... [T]he judicial identification of its normative contours could assuage fears raised by potential unprincipled and opportunistic uses of unwritten constitutional principles.

See Jean-François Gaudreault-DesBiens, "Cooperative Federalism in Search of a Normative Justification: Considering the Principle of Federal Loyalty" (2014) 23:4 Const Forum Const 1 at 14-15. In light of the majority opinion in Quebec v Canada, what is now the future of the duty of loyalty?

INSTRUMENTS OF FLEXIBILITY IN THE FEDERAL SYSTEM

I. Introduction	12-1
II. The Spending Power	12-2
III. Intergovernmental Agreements	12-14
IV. Delegation	12-17

I. INTRODUCTION

At this point in the materials, you might feel that the provisions relating to the distribution of powers have been interpreted by the courts in a manner that either denies the federal government the authority necessary to deal with important issues of public policy or imposes unjustified constraints on the provinces in dealing with issues of significance to them. However, it is important to be aware that the emphasis in the casebook is on the jurisdiction of federal and provincial governments to enact regulatory laws—or what some might call “command and control” legislation.

Before coming to any firm conclusions about the balance of power in the Canadian federal system, one should look beyond the “regulatory” jurisdiction of the federal and provincial governments to a number of policy instruments that have been used to alter the formal distribution of functions and the policy responsibilities of each level of government in many areas. These instruments include taxation, the spending power, public ownership, interdelegation, and intergovernmental agreements. In the materials that follow, you will see that the courts have placed few legal constraints on the use of these instruments, with the result that the actual distribution of functions is quite different from what we have studied so far.

At times, these instruments have permitted significant centralization of some functions. But more recently, with federal attempts to respond to both fiscal pressures and Quebecers’ demands for constitutional change, the federal role has been reduced in many policy areas. For example, as we will see, the spending power has been used both as means of centralization and decentralization.

Although the instruments we discuss below have been important in reshaping the Canadian Constitution, they do not reallocate regulatory jurisdiction over policy areas and, as a consequence, are always subject to legislative repeal. Only a constitutional amendment can securely shift the boundaries of federal and provincial regulatory jurisdiction. Amendment is dealt with in a separate chapter at the end of this book: see Chapter 26, Amending the Constitution.

II. THE SPENDING POWER

Keith G Banting, "The Past Speaks to the Future: Lessons from the Postwar Social Union" in Harvey Lazar, ed, Non-Constitutional Renewal (Kingston, Ont: Institute of Intergovernmental Relations, 1998) at 39

Introduction

During the postwar years, Canadians built their own version of the welfare state, establishing a new social contract between citizens and the state. This process was underway throughout the western world, as all countries experienced similar pressures to protect citizens from the social insecurities inherent in industrial society. Canada, however, faced the additional challenge of fashioning its social programs in the context of a federal state and society divided along linguistic and regional lines. Constructing the welfare state therefore also involved building what would now be called a social union, a set of understandings about the balance between federal and provincial social programs, and a set of intergovernmental arrangements to give those understandings life.

The postwar generation had to decide whether there would be a pan-Canadian welfare state or a series of distinctive provincial welfare states. The social union that emerged in those years was a compromise between these two poles. The system was significantly more decentralized than that in many other federal systems, including countries such as Australia and the United States, but it did incorporate critical pan-Canadian dimensions. Major social programs operated across the country as a whole and established a set of social benefits that Canadians held in common, irrespective of the region in which they lived. ...

In the postwar social union, the pan-Canadian elements of the welfare state were associated strongly with the role of the federal government. As the political and economic strength of the federal government has declined in recent years, and as our constitutional tensions have grown, the original social union has come under strain. Increasingly, Canadians are being forced back to first principles in social debate. What is the appropriate balance between pan-Canadianism and regional diversity in the construction of the welfare state? If pan-Canadianism is an important value, are there mechanisms other than federal power through which it can be sustained? ...

Federal Instruments

The federal government utilized three critical policy instruments in developing pan-Canadian social programs: the provision of benefits directly to citizens, federal shared-cost programs in areas of provincial jurisdiction, and equalization grants to poorer provinces.

Direct Federal Programs

Although it is sometimes argued casually that social policy generally is a provincial responsibility, the federal government's own jurisdiction in social policy is substantial, especially in the area of income security. During the middle decades of this century, three formal amendments to the constitutional division of powers gave the federal government complete authority over Unemployment Insurance, and substantial authority in the area of pensions. In addition, under the doctrine of the spending power, the federal government claimed an untrammeled right to make payments to individuals, institutions or other governments for any purpose, and argued that such transfers do not represent an invasion of provincial jurisdiction as long as they do not constitute regulation of the sector. Finally, the federal role in taxation constitutes a powerful instrument in redistributive policies, especially with the development of a fuller array of refundable tax credits and benefits.

On these constitutional footings, the federal government developed a significant direct presence in social policy. In 1940, it introduced Unemployment Insurance, which was later complemented by training and other labour market programs. The federal government also established two universal programs: Family Allowances (1944) which were paid to all families with dependent children; and Old Age Security (1951), which provided a basic pension to all elderly Canadians. In the mid-1960s, the federal government enriched pensions with two additional programs: the Canada Pension Plan, a contributory plan providing earnings-related pensions, and the Guaranteed Income Supplement, an income-tested benefit for the elderly poor. Finally, a Spouse's Allowance for younger spouses of pensioners was added in 1975.

These initiatives established a direct federal presence in the lives of Canadians, and made Ottawa the dominant government in income security. Provincial governments delivered Workers' Compensation and social assistance programs; and Quebec chose to operate its own Quebec Pension Plan, which is closely aligned with the Canada Pension Plan operating throughout the rest of the country. Nevertheless, the federal role was dominant. ... [T]he federal government paid out between 70 to 80 percent of all income security dollars directly to Canadians for the entire period from the late 1950s to the early 1990s. ...

Shared-Cost Programs

In other parts of the welfare state, the constitution and political realities pointed to provincial responsibility and delivery. In such areas as health care, social assistance and postsecondary education, the federal government therefore relied on the spending power to make shared-cost grants to provincial governments. Under these programs, Ottawa provided substantial financial support to any province mounting a program that met conditions or standards specified in federal legislation. In this way, the federal government stimulated the expansion of key social services, and established a common framework for program design from coast to coast.

The pan-Canadian nature of these programs turned to a significant degree on the terms and conditions attached to federal funding, especially in their developmental stages. The level of specificity in shared-cost programs varied considerably, both over time and from program to program. For example, some of the early shared-cost programs, such as the categorical social assistance programs that were the precursors to the Canada Assistance Plan, did establish relatively detailed conditions, including maximum shareable benefit levels. However, provincial resistance, especially from Quebec, changed that practice, and federal conditions became less detailed. Nevertheless, the federal conditions that were attached to shared-cost programs were important in giving broad shape to provincial programs. ...

Equalization Grants

Federal equalization grants to poorer provinces constituted the third instrument that sustained pan-Canadianism. These grants were designed to enable the seven poorer provinces to provide average levels of public services without having to resort to above-average levels of taxation. Equalization grants have always been unconditional, and in theory could be used to reduce provincial taxes rather than enhance provincial programs. In practice, however, the equalizing of fiscal capacity among provincial governments led to a more common level of public services generally across the country than would have been possible if provinces had to rely on their own revenues alone.

NOTE: SHARED-COST PROGRAMS

In the extract above, Banting refers to the ability of the federal government to spend in areas outside its jurisdiction. This power is known as the federal spending power (which we refer to simply as the “spending power,” not to be confused with the power of provincial governments to spend in areas of federal jurisdiction, recognized by the Supreme Court in Lovelace v Ontario, 2000 SCC 37). As Banting notes, the spending power has been used in connection with three kinds of programs—direct federal programs, equalization grants, and shared-cost programs. Our focus in this note is on the last of these three.

The dominant legal instrument for the exercise of the spending power has been the shared-cost statute. However, the design of the programs created by these statutes may vary along a number of different dimensions. Indeed, much of the politics of social policy revolves around these issues of design. Historically, the level of the grant was set on a shared-cost basis, with the federal and provincial government providing a fixed percentage of funds (typically, 50–50). However, in recent years, the federal government has instead relied on a system of block grants, which are set at a level that is not tied to program expenditures. Closely related to the level of federal grants is the form of the federal transfer. Again, there has been a shift over time, from direct cash transfers to a mix of cash transfers and tax points—that is, a percentage of federal tax revenue. Finally, most shared-cost program grants come with conditions—for example, the prohibition on residency requirements for the receipt of social assistance in the Canada Health Transfer, Canada Social Transfer and Wait Times Reduction Transfer Regulations [SOR/2004-62] and the various conditions on the delivery of medical care set out in the Canada Health Act, RSC 1985, c C-6 [CHA], both discussed below. However, this need not be the case—for example, equalization grants are unconditional.

In the area of health insurance, the central pieces of legislation were the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, SC 1957, c 28, covering in-patient and out-patient hospital services; the 1966 Medical Care Act, SC 1966-67, c 64, covering non-hospital-based physician services; and, finally, the 1984 Canada Health Act, RSC 1985, c C-6, which consolidated and replaced the earlier two statutes and is still in force. The Canada Health Act requires provincial health plans to meet five national standards in order to qualify for federal funding:

1. accessibility (“reasonable access to health care without financial or other barriers”),
2. comprehensiveness (coverage of all medically necessary hospital and medical services),
3. universality (coverage of all residents of a province after three months’ residency),
4. portability (coverage when temporarily absent from the province), and
5. non-profit public administration.

As well, the Act contains specific bans on extra-billing by physicians and user charges by other providers—for example, hospitals—for insured services. The Act contains enforcement machinery for provincial non-compliance, imposing mandatory deductions for violations of the bans on extra-billing and user charges, and vesting a discretion in the federal Cabinet to withhold funds from provinces in breach of the five national standards, after consultation with the province in question. For a detailed discussion of these standards, see Sujit Choudhry, “The Enforcement of the Canada Health Act” (1996) 41 McGill LJ 461.

On the income assistance side, the central piece of legislation was the Canada Assistance Plan, SC 1966-67, c 45 [CAP], enacted in 1966, but since repealed, as explained below. The CAP contained a series of national standards for provincial social assistance programs. Central among these was the requirement that provinces provide financial aid or other assistance to "any person in need," in an amount that met the "basic requirements" of that person. Other conditions required that there be no minimum residency requirement for the receipt of social assistance, and that provincial law provide for a right of appeal from decisions regarding social assistance. There was and is no shared-cost statute specifically directed at post-secondary education.

During the first wave of federal policy activism that created the social union, federal transfers for health insurance and social assistance were funded on a 50–50 basis. However, these arrangements have been altered in stages, in response to growing fiscal pressures on the federal government. In the health care context, this shift is described as follows:

The story of declining federal funding began in 1977, with the shift away from 50/50 cost-sharing to a block grant (the Established Programs Financing or EPF Grant) consisting of a mixture of cash and tax points, with the cash component tied to an escalator based on growth in per capita Gross National Product (GNP). In 1982, the escalator was applied to the entire EPF entitlement, not just the cash component, making the EPF cash transfer strictly residual. The escalator was then eliminated in stages, first in 1986 (when it was reduced to GNP less 2 per cent), then in 1990 (when the EPF per capita transfer was frozen).

See Sujit Choudhry, "Bill 11, the Canada Health Act, and the Social Union: The Need for Institutions" (2000) 38 Osgoode Hall LJ 39 at 62.

A similar story can be told about federal transfers for social assistance. First came the so-called cap on CAP. Until 1990, the federal government paid half the costs of social assistance in the provinces. In the 1990 budget, it unilaterally announced a 5 percent ceiling on the growth of payments to the three "have" provinces: Alberta, British Columbia, and Ontario. Coupled with a recession that increased the numbers on the welfare rolls, the province of Ontario was particularly hard hit, with the federal share of social assistance costs dropping from 50 percent to 28 percent in 1992-93, a reduction of $1.7 billion.

These trends culminated in the creation of the Canada Health and Social Transfer (CHST) in 1995 (by the Budget Implementation Act, SC 1995, c 17, part V, especially ss 13-23.2). The CHST was a new global block grant, consisting of a mix of cash transfers and tax points to cover post-secondary education, medicare, and social assistance, that replaced both the EPF and CAP. Because it was a block grant that was not tied to actual program expenditures, it marked the final break with the shared-cost approach to federal shared-cost programs. The cash component of the CHST for 1996-97 was set at $14.7 billion, a $4.2 billion reduction from the 1995-96 total for transfers under the EPF and CAP ($18.5 billion). Moreover, as a quid pro quo for reduced federal funding, the CHST eliminated all national standards in the CAP for social assistance programs, except for the prohibition on residency requirements. However, the national standards of the CHA remained.

In 2004, the CHST was split into the Canada Health Transfer (CHT) and Canada Social Transfer (CST) to provide greater accountability and transparency for federal health funding.

THE SPENDING POWER AND THE CONSTITUTION

The spending power has been central to the growth, development, and politics of post-war Canada. However, its constitutional foundations are unclear. The existence of the spending power was announced by Lord Atkin in Canada (AG) v Ontario (AG), [1937 CanLII 363, \[1937\] AC 355 \(UKJCPC\)](#) [The Employment and Social Insurance Act Reference], excerpted in Chapter 6, The 1930s: The Depression and the New Deal, in the following famous passage (at 687):

That the Dominion may impose taxation for the purpose of creating a fund for special purposes and may apply that fund for making contributions in the public interest to individuals, corporations or public authorities could not as a general proposition be denied. Whether in such an Act as the present, compulsion applied to an employed person to make a contribution to an insurance fund out of which he will receive benefit for a period proportionate to the number of his contributions is in fact taxation, it is not necessary finally to decide. It might seem difficult to discern how it differs from a form of compulsory insurance, or what the difference is between a statutory obligation to pay insurance premiums to the State, or to an insurance company. But assuming that the Dominion has collected by means of taxation a fund, it by no means follows that any legislation which disposes of it is necessarily within Dominion competence.

It may still be legislation affecting the classes of subjects enumerated in s. 92, and, if so, would be ultra vires. In other words, Dominion legislation, even though it deals with Dominion property, may yet be so framed as to invade civil rights within the Province, or encroach upon the classes of subjects which are reserved to Provincial competence. It is not necessary that it should be a colourable device, or a pretence. If on the true view of the legislation it is found that in reality in pith and substance the legislation invades civil rights within the Province or in respect of other classes of subjects otherwise encroaches upon the provincial field, the legislation will be invalid. To hold otherwise would afford the Dominion an easy passage into the Provincial domain.

This brief passage has given rise to a host of interpretive questions. First and foremost is the constitutional source of the spending power. The spending power is not mentioned in s 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Commentators have suggested a variety of sources for the spending power: s 91A (federal jurisdiction over the public debt and property), s 91(3) (taxation), and s 106, the authority to make payments out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Others have turned to the royal prerogative, or even the legal rule that the Crown possesses the powers of a private person, including the power to spend its moneys as it chooses.

But there are other questions as well. In the Supreme Court of Canada's judgment in Reference re legislative jurisdiction of Parliament of Canada to enact the Employment and Social Insurance Act (1935, c 48), [1936] SCR 427, 1936 CanLII 30 [Unemployment Insurance Reference], Kerwin J supported the ability of the federal government to spend in areas out of its jurisdiction by making a distinction between spending and "coercive" forms of regulation on the ground that the recipient of a grant, including one with conditions, is free to "decline the gift or to accept it subject to such conditions." Scholars have questioned the cogency of this distinction, however, given that the Constitution allocates jurisdiction on the basis of subject matter, not on the basis of policy instrument (a point made by the Privy Council in the Labour Conventions case in the context of treaties: see Canada (AG) v Ontario (AG), 1937 CanLII 362, [1937] AC 326 (UKJCPC) [Labour Conventions], excerpted in Chapter 6).

Another issue is whether the spending power is subject to any justiciable limits. For example, is federal legislation enacted with the purpose of regulating an area of provincial regulatory jurisdiction ultra vires? Alternatively, can the degree of impact of a federal spending statute on areas of provincial jurisdiction rise to such a level as to take that statute out of federal jurisdiction? Lord Atkin's judgment clearly contemplated both kinds of limits on the exercise of the federal spending power.

In most areas of constitutional law, subsequent jurisprudence would be available to answer these questions. However, the spending power is an exception. Consider the following observation:

In the years after the New Deal, the question of the division of powers in relation to social policy almost never came before the Supreme Court. Thus, although handed down over six decades ago, the UI Reference decisions are still the leading judgments in the area. The contrast with other areas of public policy is striking. In the post-war period, the Court pronounced on the division of powers in a broad variety of policy contexts—including agricultural marketing, natural resources, inflation controls, the environment and broadcasting, making social policy conspicuous by its absence from the Court's docket. The silence of the Court on social policy is all the more unusual because jurisdictional questions often ended up before the Supreme Court because of intense federal–provincial conflict. In the social policy arena, disputes over the source and scope of federal involvement have been the norm and have often been framed in jurisdictional terms, and yet the courts have rarely been given an opportunity to elaborate upon and clarify the Privy Council's holdings. By contrast, federal–provincial conflicts that raised fundamental questions about the Canadian constitutional order, such as the patriation of the Constitution and the potential secession of Quebec have landed before the Court.

Why did social policy not give rise to litigation under the division of powers? Although federal–provincial relations in this area were often acrimonious, in the end, both the federal and provincial governments likely concluded that the potential costs of a litigation strategy outweighed the potential benefits. The federal government, for example, has consistently asserted the federal spending power is a plenary power that allows it to spend in areas of provincial jurisdiction without constitutional limitation. The risk of bringing the spending power before the courts, however, was that a ruling might have imposed some limits on that power, for example, by holding that extremely intrusive conditions might amount to an unconstitutional attempt regulate matters in provincial jurisdiction. The provinces other than Quebec faced a similar dilemma. Given the existence of vertical fiscal imbalance, they did not oppose the federal spending power in principle, but wanted federal transfers to be unconditional. A court pronouncement, though, might have had the effect of legitimizing intrusive federal conditions. Even Quebec, which opposed even unconditional federal transfers, opted not to litigate, likely because it seemed exceedingly unlikely that its consistent demand—a right to opt-out with compensation—would not be granted by the Court. Not surprisingly, the cases in which the division of powers and social policy was litigated were brought by private parties. The first social policy case brought by a government did not come before the Supreme Court until 1990.

See Sujit Choudhry, "Recasting Social Canada: A Reconsideration of Federal Jurisdiction over Social Policy" (2002) 52 UTLJ 163 at 198–99 (footnotes omitted).

As sparse as it is, subsequent case law appears to have departed from some of the limits imposed on the spending power by Lord Atkin. The focus of these cases has been on whether conditions attached to grants amount to a federal attempt to legislate in areas of provincial jurisdiction. In Winterhaven Stables Limited v Canada (AG), 1988 ABCA 334, leave to appeal to SCC refused (1989), 95 AR 236, [1988] SCCA No 543 (QL), the Alberta Court of Appeal considered a constitutional challenge brought by a taxpayer to a number of statutes, including the CAP (since repealed) and the Federal–Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act, 1977, SC 1976–77, c 10 (which established funding arrangements for the Canada Health Act, and has also since been repealed). The Court rejected the challenge. The Court conceded that "the consequence [of legislation authorizing conditional grants to the provinces] is to impose considerable pressure on the provinces to pass complementary legislation or otherwise comply with the conditions of the allocation" (at para 19), and stated that conditions could be attached to grants "so long as the conditions do not amount in fact to a regulation or control of a matter outside of federal authority" (at para 23), thereby suggesting that the effects of some conditions on provincial areas of responsibility could be so significant as to render the federal law ultra vires. But the Court also stated that "questions of constitutional validity under ss 91 and 92 are not resolved by looking at the ultimate probable effect" (at para 19).

The issue was also commented on by the Supreme Court in Reference Re Canada Assistance Plan (BC), [\[1991\] 2 SCR 525](#), 1991 CanLII 74, discussed further below. In that case, the Supreme Court addressed an argument raised by Manitoba that the cap on CAP was unconstitutional because it intruded on provincial jurisdiction. The Court rightly noted that this argument was a challenge to the constitutionality of the CAP itself. It rejected Manitoba's submission, stating that the simple fact that a federal spending statute "impacts upon [a] constitutional interest" (at 566) outside of federal jurisdiction was "not enough to find that a statute encroaches upon the jurisdiction of the other level of government" (at 567). This statement suggests that the effects of federal spending statutes are constitutionally irrelevant. Moreover, both judgments appeared to assume that the spending power may be deliberately directed at matters lying within provincial jurisdiction. If this is true, then the Canada Assistance Plan Reference may have overruled the Unemployment Insurance Reference. However, the Court referred to the Unemployment Insurance Reference decision in the Canada Assistance Plan Reference, leaving the matter uncertain.

NORMATIVE CRITIQUES AND DEFENCES OF THE SPENDING POWER

Consider the following criticism of the federal spending power by Andrew Petter, "Federalism and the Myth of the Federal Spending Power" (1989) 68 Can Bar Rev 448 at 463-67:

There are many values which find voice in the Canadian Constitution but, in terms of the structure of government, the two most fundamental are federalism and responsible government. Although federalism has many forms, at root it implies a division of legislative and executive responsibilities between two orders of government, neither of which is subordinate to the other. Responsible government is a system of representative democracy in which the head of state acts upon the advice of an executive that, in turn, is directly answerable to a democratically elected legislature. Viewed in light of these constitutional values, the debate over the federal spending power takes on new importance. It becomes a debate not just about constitutional doctrine, but about the integrity of the federal system and the preservation of political accountability in Canadian government.

The underlying rationale for federalism is a belief that while some matters are better decided by the national political community, others should be left to regional political communities. Implicit in this belief is a view that, with respect to certain matters, regional governments can better reflect the political attitudes and aspirations of citizens. It is not hard to see why this might be the case. In a country as large and diverse as Canada, the opinions and priorities of the inhabitants of one region may well differ from those of other regions. A system of regional governments is more likely to be responsive to these regional variations than is a single central government. ...

The raison d'être of the federal spending power (and of conditional grants in particular) is to permit the federal government to use fiscal means to influence decision-making at the provincial level. In other words, it allows national majorities to set priorities and to determine policy within spheres of influence allocated under the Constitution to regional majorities. Thus, both by design and effect, the spending power runs counter to the political purposes of a federal system. ...

An even more powerful objection to the federal spending power concerns its impact upon responsible government. The organizing principle of responsible government is political accountability: accountability of the executive to the legislature and of the legislature to the electorate. It is this thread of accountability that transforms what would otherwise be a despotic system of government into a democratic one. Yet if a legislature is to be held accountable to the electorate, citizens must have a definite understanding of the scope of that legislature's powers. An electorate that cannot attribute political responsibility to one order of government or the other lacks both the ability to express its political will and the assurance that its will can be translated into action.

By allowing the federal government to use fiscal means to influence provincial policies, the spending power compromises political accountability and thereby weakens the ability of electors to exercise democratic control over government.

Petter then discusses a hypothetical example where a province wishes to impose user fees for health care services on high-income individuals, but does not because of the fiscal penalties that it would face under the Canada Health Act, and continues:

Some may argue that the solution is for citizens to favour such a policy to organize at the national rather than the provincial level. ... Even if citizens, by organizing nationally, were able to convince the federal government to endorse their proposal, that government would be forced to rely solely upon fiscal measures to implement the reform. While such measures probably could be structured so as to compel provincial acquiescence with federal requirements, they could not give the federal government direct regulatory control over the policy. Thus the policy, although well conceived at the federal level, could suffer from incompetence or lack of political support on the part of the provincial authorities charged with its administration.

What the above example shows is that the spending power does not simply shift political responsibility from one order of government to the other; it intersperses responsibility between both orders. The result is to require those advocating a particular reform to fight a battle on two fronts. At the same time, it becomes virtually impossible for citizens to determine which order of government to hold accountable for policies that fail or, for that matter, for ones that succeed.

Consider the following defence by Sujit Choudhry of a strong federal role in redistribution, which is one of the policy goals achieved by exercises of the spending power:

To fully grasp the difficulties that the pursuit of redistributive goals poses for a federal state, we must define what those redistributive goals actually are. The goal I focus on here is vertical equity. Vertical equity refers to the appropriate stance of governments toward interpersonal economic inequality (however measured) prior to and independent of redistributive policies. ...

How does vertical equity operate in a federal state? In federations like Canada ... the concern raised by economists is that this goal is quite difficult to achieve.

The seminal work here is Wallace Oates' Fiscal Federalism Oates starts by considering how redistribution would work in a highly decentralized federation, in which the federal government did not exercise any of the traditional functions of the public sector, including redistribution. For the purposes of his analysis, he makes a key assumption—"an absence of restrictions on the movements of goods and services" within the federation, i.e. extensive inter-provincial economic mobility. Oates' central claim is that in a decentralized federation, vertical equity, understood as interpersonal redistribution in order to reduce economic inequality, is very difficult to achieve. To understand why, Oates outlines the normative justification for federalism that emerges from the public choice literature, particularly the work of Charles Tiebout.

Tiebout relies on an economic conception of citizenship, which gives principal importance to the satisfaction of citizens' preferences. Tiebout's focus is on citizens' preferences for goods and services provided by governments, and he argues that systems of government can be compared with one another and assessed by their ability to maximize preference satisfaction. His central point is that federalism can be expected to produce a higher degree of preference satisfaction than would a unitary state, in the following way. Suppose each province provides a package of goods and services that varies along a number of different dimensions. As a simplifying device, assume that the two dimensions that matter most are the level or quantity of those goods and services, and the cost of those services. Each province can be uniquely characterized by where it lies on these two dimensions. One province may offer larger quantities per capita of goods and services (e.g. comprehensive health insurance, publicly funded education through to the post-secondary level) and will charge accordingly. Another province may offer a slightly lower quantity of goods and services (e.g. health insurance covering minimal health needs, and no publicly operated higher education system), but will charge less. Tiebout assumes that citizens are mobile, and that they will migrate to the province which offers them the basket of policies which suits them best. Federalism, then, creates a market for mobile citizens, where federal sub-units compete with one another through packages of goods and services they offer their citizens in exchange for fees to finance those services. ...

A complication arises, though, when one considers how provincial governments charge their residents for publicly provided goods and services. Oates sketches two different pricing options: benefit pricing and pricing on the basis of ability to pay. Under benefit pricing, each provincial resident, regardless of income level, would be charged an identical fee to cover the additional costs of offering goods and services to an additional resident of a province. From the vantage point of vertical equity, the principal problem with a flat benefit tax is that it disproportionately burdens the poor. The obvious solution, then, is to price publicly provided goods and services on the basis of ability to pay, so that those with relatively higher incomes pay more for the same goods and services than those with relatively lower incomes. A provincial income tax system would be the simplest mechanism for this sort of pricing.

Oates argues, though, that provincial governments are limited in their ability to redistribute interpersonally. The difficulty is the prospect of inter-provincial migration, both of higher and lower income persons. Higher income individuals would have an economic incentive to relocate to provinces where they would pay less for publicly provided goods and services, either because those provinces priced on a benefit basis, or adopted forms of income taxation which were less redistributive. Conversely, lower income individuals would have an incentive to move into provinces that finance services in a manner that least disadvantages low income individuals. The result is a cycle of out-migration and in-migration, whereby the departure of the rich and the arrival of the poor increases the proportion of lower income persons in the province, reduces the per capita provincial tax base, and accordingly requires an increase in the provincial income tax rate in order to provide public goods and services at the original level. Each increase in income taxes would in turn cause more higher income persons to leave and more poor persons to immigrate. After a point, the decline in the per capita tax base would force provinces to offer a lower level of goods and services. As a consequence, provinces that redistribute will be constrained in their ability to offer goods and services to their residents. Indeed, Oates goes further, and identifies the same dynamic at work in any provincial effort to achieve vertical equity. Thus, if a province wished to achieve a more egalitarian distribution of income than currently existed, it too would create incentives for higher income individuals, who would bear the burden of this policy, to migrate to jurisdictions with less egalitarian income tax policies. The end result would be a more egalitarian distribution of income, but a decline in per capita income.

One solution would be for provinces interested in redistribution to co-ordinate their public policies so as to make unavailable an attractive exit option within the federation for high-income individuals. Provinces might co-ordinate the structure of provincial income tax regimes, and/or might ensure that they provide comparable levels of goods and services to their residents, acting as a cartel to set a price for their goods and services other than the one which would prevail in the absence of co-ordinated action. High-income individuals would lack the incentive to migrate inter-provincially, because they would be unable to escape redistribution. Inter-provincial co-ordination, though, may be ineffectual, because in some circumstances provinces have strong incentives to defect from a co-ordinated regime of redistribution. Provinces will have an incentive to defect when the benefits foregone exceed the benefits of participating in such a regime. The foregone benefit is the additional tax revenue brought in by each additional high-income individual who migrates to a province from another province in response to an inter-provincial redistribution differential. Provinces benefit from the in-migration of each additional high-income individual as long as the tax yield exceeds the marginal cost of providing goods and services to that person. But provinces will only be able to derive that benefit if other provinces do not defect, and adhere to the co-ordinated redistribution regime, thereby creating the incentive for high-income persons to migrate.

The difficulty though, is that each province has the same incentive to defect, and to adopt policies that are less redistributive in nature. Moreover, in response to a defection that has already occurred, a province will have an incentive to defect and adopt less redistribution in order to stem the out-migration of high-income individuals, because failing to do so would leave them in a worse off situation than if they did not respond. Thus, given sufficient incentives, rather than co-operate, provinces will compete on the terrain of redistribution. The net result will be lower rates of redistribution than would have occurred were inter-provincial co-ordination to have been successful. In other words, if left to the provinces alone, Canada risks a redistribution race to the bottom.

See Sujit Choudhry, "Recasting Social Canada," above at 219-24.

Choudhry goes on to argue that the prospect of races to the bottom can serve as the basis of federal regulatory jurisdiction over social policy under the national dimensions/national concern branch of POGG. Would the existence of federal regulatory jurisdiction over social policy be an effective response to Petter's concerns?

NOTE: PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS

The spending power has been the subject of constitutional discussions on a number of occasions. Quebec governments, in particular, have demanded controls on the federal spending power to prevent encroachments on provincial areas of jurisdiction. But others see the federal spending power as an important mechanism for maintaining a social union with common national standards. The following is a proposal on the reform of the spending power found in the 1987 Meech Lake Accord and duplicated in the Charlottetown Accord in 1992. It would have added a new s 106A to the Constitution Act, 1867, which would have read as follows:

106A(1) The Government of Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to the government of a province that chooses not to participate in a national shared-cost program that is established by the Government of Canada after the coming into force of this section in an area of exclusive provincial jurisdiction, if the province carries on a program or initiative that is compatible with the national objectives.

(2) Nothing in this section extends the legislative powers of the Parliament of Canada or of the legislatures of the provinces.

This provision raised a series of difficult interpretive questions. One was whether it amounted to an explicit recognition of the ability of the federal government to expend money in areas of provincial jurisdiction. The reference to "national shared cost program ... in an area of exclusive provincial jurisdiction" seems to presuppose this. But how can this position be reconciled with s 106A(2)? A host of questions surrounded the opt-out with compensation. What was a "national" program—one that operated in every province, or simply one operated by the federal government in some provinces? Section 106A would have applied, prospectively, only to new shared-cost programs. But would it apply to amendments to, or extensions of, existing programs? What amount of compensation would be "reasonable": on this point, see similar language in s 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982? What is a "program," and is it different from an "initiative"? What are "national objectives," and in particular, how are they related to the national standards laid down in the CJA? What would it mean for a provincial program to be "compatible" with national objectives? Need that program employ identical means to pursue the same ends, or would it be sufficient if the program pursued the same objectives, by whatever means?

Although s 106A was never entrenched, the federal government made a promise in the February 1996 Speech from the Throne not to use its spending power to create new shared-cost programs in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction without the consent of a majority of the provinces. Provinces choosing not to participate were promised compensation if they established "equivalent or comparable initiatives."

NOTE: THE ENFORCEMENT OF NATIONAL STANDARDS

The enforcement of the national standards set out in the CHA has been a flash point of federal-provincial controversy. However, Sujit Choudhry suggests that national standards are largely unenforced:

Let me begin with two facts. The first is that, despite the explicit bans on user charges and extra-billing—which are remarkably specific in a statute otherwise marked by its use of open-ended language—provinces continue to violate these conditions of federal funding. ... Since these conditions are subject to the mandatory enforcement mechanism, the federal government is legally obliged to make deductions in federal transfer payments, and it appears that the federal government complies with the CHA. [The data show, however, that the total dollar amounts involved are small.] ...

In stark contrast, the discretionary enforcement mechanism, which attaches itself to the important conditions of universality, comprehensiveness and accessibility, has never been used. Juxtaposed against the active use of the mandatory deductions scheme, a casual observer could reasonably conclude that the federal government is actively monitoring provincial compliance with the terms of the CHA, and has come to the conclusion that provincial plans meet those national standards. Alternatively, one could conclude that instances of non-compliance have been resolved without the need for financial penalties. ...

However, the reports of the auditor general tell a radically different story. The auditor general has examined the enforcement of the CHA on three occasions, in 1987, 1990, and 1999. I focus on the last report, because it is by far the most detailed, and because it repeats many of the concerns advanced in the first two. The auditor general indicated in 1999 that there had been numerous instances of non-compliance in the last five years. Six cases were resolved without the use of financial penalties; the report did not provide any details. However, the auditor general noted that there were other cases of non-compliance that had not been resolved. A number of provinces (which the auditor general did not name) contravened the portability condition, which requires that medical services received outside of a province (including outside of the country) by insured persons temporarily absent from that province be reimbursed at the same rate as inside the province. The portability condition was apparently violated by five provinces with respect to treatment received outside of Canada; in addition, one province violated the condition with respect to treatment received in other provinces. The auditor general also stated, without providing any detail, that "[o]ther examples of suspected non-compliance with the comprehensiveness and accessibility criteria have been the subject of considerable discussion between the federal government and the provinces and territories." These disputes remained unresolved.

The most charitable interpretation of the auditor general's findings to this point of the report is that the federal government has been aware of the extent of provincial non-compliance, has been able to resolve some but not all disputes through negotiation, and has been reluctant to use the powerful financial levers available to it to secure better compliance. However, the report then went on to state that the federal government was largely unaware of the true extent of provincial non-compliance, because it lacked the required information. ...

[T]he federal government's non-enforcement of the CHA, along with the failure of political actors and the academic community to highlight the federal government's abdication of its responsibilities, is a national embarrassment. ...

Why the lacklustre federal performance? There would appear to be two reasons why the federal government has failed to aggressively enforce the national conditions spelled out in the CHA. The first is a lack of institutional capacity. Information gathering of the kind that is required to gauge provincial compliance with the conditions of accessibility and comprehensiveness, in particular, requires a serious commitment of human and capital resources.

See Sujit Choudry, "Bill 11, the Canada Health Act, and the Social Union: The Need for Institutions," above at 51-58. In an earlier article, Choudry concludes:

However, it would be a mistake to reduce the federal government's neglect of the CHA to a lack of resources. The more fundamental problem is a lack of political will. The auditor general's report made an oblique yet revealing reference to this problem, when it stated that the enforcement of the CHA had been tempered by national unity concerns. What the report was referring to was a long history of tense federal–provincial relations surrounding the federal spending power. Particular exercises of the federal spending power have long been regarded as federal impositions by provincial governments (although only one province, Quebec, has ever challenged the constitutionality of federal government expenditures in areas of provincial jurisdiction). The dynamic of fiscal federalism has also been profoundly affected by the dramatic decline in federal transfer payments. ... [T]he legitimacy of the federal enforcement of national standards has been diminished along with its financial involvement. The failure to exercise its discretionary enforcement power accordingly reflects a loss of legitimacy and political capital on the part of the federal government.

See Sujit Choudry, "The Enforcement of the Canada Health Act," above at 504-5.

In 1999, the federal government, the nine provinces other than Quebec, and the three territories signed the Social Union Framework Agreement (SUFA). The goal of SUFA was to provide for a normative framework for federal–provincial relations in the social policy arena. The document contains seven articles of varying specificity, ranging from the extremely general (for example, art 1's statement that "Canada's social union should reflect and give expression to the fundamental values of Canadians—equality, respect for diversity, fairness, individual dignity and responsibility, and mutual aid and our responsibilities to one another") to the fairly specific (for example, art 5's requirement that the federal government "consult with provincial and territorial governments at one year prior to renewal or significant funding changes in existing social transfers to provinces/territories"). Noteworthy is art 6, "Dispute Avoidance and Resolution," which provides for the establishment of dispute settlement machinery for disagreements regarding the interpretation of national standards.

NOTE: FEDERAL TAXATION POWERS

The federal power to tax in s 91(3) of the Constitution Act, 1867 is virtually unrestricted, despite the Privy Council's judgment in the Unemployment Insurance Reference, excerpted in Chapter 6. Provinces' powers are more circumscribed because s 92(2) limits them to direct taxation within the province (except with respect to natural resources, where indirect taxation is permitted by s 92A(4)). The meaning of "direct" and "indirect" taxation is explored in Canadian Industrial Gas & Oil Ltd v Government of Saskatchewan, [1978] 2 SCR 545, 1977 CanLII 210, excerpted in Chapter 10, Federalism and the Economy. Both federal and provincial governments are immune from the taxes of the other level of government in relation to their lands and property because of s 125.

III. INTERGOVERNMENTAL AGREEMENTS

Federal and provincial governments enter into a wide variety of agreements on matters within their authority. Some of these agreements look like detailed contracts, and may cover matters such as the delivery of services or conditions to be satisfied for the receipt of funds. Others are broad statements of political objectives and obligations, such as an agreement by ministers to develop a common approach to educational standards. Because of this range, there is some uncertainty about the role of the courts in enforcing intergovernmental agreements. The most ambitious intergovernmental agreement in recent times is the Agreement on Internal Trade, discussed in Chapter 10, Federalism and the Economy.

The following case deals with the enforceability of intergovernmental agreements in a context where the federal government had unilaterally altered its obligations to certain provinces under the CAP.

Reference Re Canada Assistance Plan (BC)

[\[1991\] 2 SCR 525, 1991 CanLII 74](#)

[Section 4 of the Canada Assistance Plan, RSC 1985, c C-1 [the Plan] authorized the government of Canada to enter into agreements with provincial governments to pay contributions toward their expenditures on social assistance and welfare. Section 5 of the Plan authorized payments to the provinces pursuant to such agreements, and generally authorized contributions amounting to half of the provinces' eligible expenditures. The Plan specified certain conditions for eligibility of provincial expenditures (s 6(2)), but left it to the provinces to decide which programs would be operated and how much money would be spent. Section 8(1) of the Plan provided that agreements would continue in force so long as the relevant provincial law remained in operation, but they could be terminated by consent or on one year's notice from either party (s 8(2)). Agreements could also be amended by consent (s 8(2)). The Plan provided for regulations to govern such things as the calculation of eligible costs (s 9(1)), but regulations affecting the substance of agreements were ineffective unless passed with the consent of any province affected (s 9(2)). The Plan was silent as to the authority of Parliament to amend the Plan.]

The Government of Canada entered into agreements with each of the provincial governments in 1967. In 1990, the federal government decided to limit its expenditures in order to reduce its budget deficit. Therefore, it decided that payments due to the "have" provinces of Alberta, British Columbia, and Ontario (those that do not receive equalization payments) would grow by no more than five percent for the 1991 and 1992 fiscal years.

The Government of British Columbia initiated a reference to the BC Court of Appeal to determine whether the federal government could reduce its contributions in this manner. A majority of that Court relied on the doctrine of legitimate expectations to find that the federal government was required to obtain British Columbia's consent to the changes to the agreement.]

SOPINKA J (Lamer CJ and La Forest, Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin, and Stevenson JJ concurring):

In general, the language of the [Canada Assistance] Plan is duplicated in the [federal-provincial] Agreement. But the contribution formula, which actually authorizes payments to the provinces, does not appear in the Agreement. It is only in s. 5 of the Plan. Clause 3(1)(a) of the Agreement provides that "Canada agrees ... to pay to the province of British Columbia the contributions or advances ... that Canada is authorized to pay to that province under the Act and the Regulations." That means, of course, the contributions or advances authorized by s. 5 of the Plan, an instrument that is to be construed as subject to amendment. This is the effect of s. 42(1) of the Interpretation Act which states:

42(1) Every Act shall be so construed as to reserve to Parliament the power of repealing or amending it, and of revoking, restricting or modifying any power, privilege or advantage thereby vested in or granted to any person.

In my view this provision reflects the principle of parliamentary sovereignty. The same results would flow from that principle even in the absence or non-applicability of this enactment. But since the Interpretation Act governs the interpretation of the Plan and all federal statutes where no contrary intention appears, the matter will be resolved by reference to it.

It is conceded that the government could not bind Parliament from exercising its powers to legislate amendments to the Plan. To assert the contrary would be to negate the sovereignty of Parliament. This basic fact of our constitutional life was, therefore, present to the minds of the parties when the Plan and Agreement were enacted and concluded. The parties were also aware that an amendment to the Plan would have to be initiated by the government by reason of the provisions of s. 54 of the Constitution Act, 1867. If it had been the intention of the parties to arrest this process, one would have expected clear language in the Agreement that the payment formula was frozen. Instead, the payment formula was left out of the Agreement and placed in the statute where it was, by virtue of s. 42, subject to amendment. In these circumstances the natural meaning to be given to the words "authorized to pay ... under the Act" in clause 3(1)(a) is that the obligation is to pay what is authorized from time to time. The government was, therefore, not precluded from exercising its powers to introduce legislation in Parliament amending the Plan.

... The contention is that the Agreement could only be amended in accordance with s. 8. This submission fails to take into account that the Agreement which is subject to the amending formula in s. 8 obliges Canada to pay the amounts which Parliament has authorized Canada to pay pursuant to s. 5 of the Plan. Hence, the payment obligations under the Agreement are subject to change when s. 5 is changed. That provision contains within it its own process of amendment by virtue of the principle of parliamentary sovereignty reflected in s. 42 of the Interpretation Act.

If this appears to deprive the Agreement of binding effect or mutuality, which are both features of ordinary contracts, it must be remembered that this is not an ordinary contract but an agreement between governments. Moreover, s. 8 itself contains an amending formula that enables either party to terminate at will. In lieu of relying on mutually binding reciprocal undertakings which promote the observance of ordinary contractual obligations, these parties were content to rely on the perceived political price to be paid for non-performance.

The result of this is that the Government of Canada, in presenting Bill C-69 to Parliament, acted in accordance with the Agreement and otherwise with the law which empowers the Government of Canada to introduce a money bill in Parliament.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The exact holding in the Canada Assistance Plan Reference is the subject of some dispute. It has been argued, for example, that the judgment stands for one of three propositions:

First, a narrow reading would hold that the agreement did not specify the levels of payment, leaving this matter to federal legislation. Thus, the agreement was not breached, and the question of legal enforceability was not decided. A second, and slightly broader, reading of the decision would be that the agreement was binding but could be discharged by conflicting legislation. ... Until Parliament or a provincial legislature did enact conflicting legislation, governments would be bound to comply with the terms of the agreement and could be held accountable by a court. The third, and broadest view, however, seems to be that the agreement only created political, not legal, obligations.

See Sujit Choudhry, "The Enforcement of the Canada Health Act," above at 503-4. For a case applying the second reading of the judgment, see Saskatchewan Egg Producers Marketing Board v Ontario (Minister of Agriculture and Food), [1993] OJ No 434 (QL), 38 ACWS (3d) 917 (Gen Div).

2. The issue of the binding nature of intergovernmental agreements has arisen most recently in relation to the 1994 Agreement on Internal Trade. Although the Agreement sets out detailed obligations on federal, provincial, and territorial governments, the Canada Assistance Plan Reference seems to suggest that a province could refuse to comply with the Agreement or a decision of the dispute settlement process: see further Katherine Swinton, "Law, Politics, and the Enforcement of the Agreement on Internal Trade" in Michael J Trebilcock & Daniel Schwanen, eds, Getting There: An Assessment of the Agreement on Internal Trade (Toronto: CD Howe, 1995) at 196. For discussion on intergovernmental agreements more generally, see Lara Friedlander, "Constitutionalizing Intergovernmental Agreements" (1994) 4 NJCL 153.

3. In response to the judgment in the Canada Assistance Plan Reference, the Charlottetown Accord of 1992 proposed a constitutional amendment to make intergovernmental agreements binding. It read:

126A(1) Where the Government of Canada and the government of one or more provinces or territories enter into an agreement that is approved under this section, no law made by or under the authority of the Parliament of Canada or of any legislature of a province or legislative authority of a territory that is a party to the agreement and has caused it to be approved under this section may amend, revoke or otherwise supersede the agreement while the approval of the agreement remains in force.

(2) An agreement is approved when the Parliament of Canada and the legislature of a province, or the legislative authority of a territory, that is a party thereto have each passed a law that approves the agreement and that includes an express declaration that this section applies in respect of the agreement.

(3) An agreement approved under this section may be amended, revoked or otherwise superseded only in accordance with its terms or by a further agreement approved under this section.

(4) An approval under this section expires no later than five years after it is given, but may be renewed under this section for additional periods not exceeding five years each.

Why does s 126A(4) set a time limit of five years on an approval of an agreement? Would this provision be a useful addition to the Constitution?

4. See Quebec (AG) v Canada (AG), 2015 SCC 14, excerpted in Chapter 11, Criminal Law and Procedure, which dealt with the dismantling of a cooperative scheme (related to firearms control) between the federal government and the provinces in circumstances where one province (Quebec) wanted to continue with the scheme on its own and to prevent the destruction of data gathered under the scheme. A majority of the Court found that the federal government had no obligation to preserve the data.

IV. DELEGATION

Another way in which governments get around the constraints of the distribution of powers is through delegation of functions to the other level of government. Although governments cannot delegate legislative powers directly to one another, various devices allow them to achieve this result by indirect means.

In the Nova Scotia Interdelegation case: Attorney General of Nova Scotia v Attorney General of Canada, [1951] SCR 31, 1950 CanLII 26, the Supreme Court of Canada rejected the argument that the federal Parliament and the provincial legislatures could delegate legislative power to one another. The plan of the federal and provincial governments in that case had been to alter their respective legislative authority to regulate employment and indirect taxation in order to establish a public pension scheme. The seven members of the Court each wrote reasons rejecting the possibility of legislative delegation. The following quote from Rinfret CJ captures some of the reasons for the conclusion (at 33-34):

The Parliament of Canada and the Legislatures of the several Provinces are sovereign within their sphere defined by The British North America Act, but none of them has the unlimited capacity of an individual. They can exercise only the legislative powers respectively given to them by ss. 91 and 92 of the Act, and these powers must be found in either of these sections.

The constitution of Canada does not belong either to Parliament, or to the Legislatures; it belongs to the country and it is there that the citizens of the country will find the protection of the rights to which they are entitled. It is part of that protection that Parliament can legislate only on the subject-matters referred to it by s. 91 and that each Province can legislate exclusively on the subject-matters referred to it by s. 92. The country is entitled to insist that legislation adopted under s. 91 should be passed exclusively by the Parliament of Canada in the same way as the people of each Province are entitled to insist that legislation concerning the matters enumerated in s. 92 should come exclusively from their respective Legislatures.

The Court has since relaxed this position by permitting extensive delegation between governments through various devices:

1. administrative delegation, whereby functions are delegated to an official, minister, or administrative tribunal of the other level of government or to a tribunal created by both levels, as in the Reference re Agricultural Products Marketing, [1978] 2 SCR 1198, 1978 CanLII 10, discussed in a note in Chapter 10, Federalism and the Economy, Section III.C;
2. incorporation by reference of the laws of the other level of government as they now exist or as they may be amended from time to time (the latter being known as anticipatory incorporation by reference); and
3. conditional legislation, whereby a law or legislative provision of one government does not come into effect at the other level of government without a certain condition being fulfilled, such as approval by that level's government.

All these devices are used in the case that follows, which was the most dramatic example of the effectiveness of these devices to circumvent the holding in the Nova Scotia Interdelegation case.

Coughlin v The Ontario Highway Transport Board[1968] SCR 569, 1968 CanLII 2

[The federal Parliament enacted the Motor Vehicle Transport Act, SC 1953-54, c 59, which delegated power to provincial highway transport boards to regulate inter-provincial trucking, a matter within federal jurisdiction under s 92(10)(a) of the Constitution Act, 1867. The Act read:

2. In this Act,

(a) "extra-provincial transport" means the transport of passengers or goods by means of an extra-provincial undertaking;

(b) "extra-provincial undertaking" means a work or undertaking for the transport of passengers or goods by motor vehicle, connecting a province with any other or others of the provinces, or extending beyond the limits of a province;

• • •

(g) "local undertaking" means a work or undertaking for the transport of passengers or goods by motor vehicle, not being an extra-provincial undertaking; and

(h) "provincial transport board" means a board, commission or other body or person having under the law of a province authority to control or regulate the operation of a local undertaking.

3(1) Where in any province a licence is by the law of the province required for the operation of a local undertaking, no person shall operate an extra-provincial undertaking in that province unless he holds a licence issued under the authority of this Act.

(2) The provincial transport board in each province may in its discretion issue a licence to a person to operate an extra-provincial undertaking into or through the province upon the like terms and conditions and in the like manner as if the extra-provincial undertaking operated in the province were a local undertaking.

5. The Governor in Council may exempt any person or the whole or any part of an extra-provincial undertaking or any extra-provincial transport from all or any of the provisions of this Act.

Coughlin was engaged only in extraprovincial trucking and challenged the constitutionality of the delegation of power to the Ontario Highway Transport Board (the Board) to issue extraprovincial operating licences. That Board was established by the Public Commercial Vehicles Act, RSO 1950, c 304, which authorized the Board to regulate intraprovincial trucking.]

CARTWRIGHT CJ (Fauteux, Abbott, Judson, and Spence JJ concurring):

[A]s matters stand at present the question whether a person may operate the undertaking of an interprovincial carrier of goods by motor vehicle within the limits of the Province of Ontario is to be decided by a Board constituted by the provincial legislature and which must be guided in the making of its decision by the terms of the statutes of that Legislature and the Regulations passed thereunder as they may exist from time to time.

Mr. Laidlaw argues that in bringing about this result by the enactment of s. 3 of the Motor Vehicle Transport Act Parliament has in substance and reality abdicated its power to make laws in relation to the subject of interprovincial motor vehicle carriage and unlawfully delegated that power to the provincial Legislature.

• • •

It is well settled that Parliament may confer upon a provincially constituted board power to regulate a matter within the exclusive jurisdiction of Parliament. On this point it is sufficient to refer to the reasons delivered in the case of P.E.I. Potato Marketing Board v. H.B. Willis Inc. [[1952] 2 SCR 392, 1952 CanLII 26].

In the case before us the respondent Board derives no power from the Legislature of Ontario to regulate or deal with the interprovincial carriage of goods. Its wide powers in that regard are conferred upon it by Parliament. Parliament has seen fit to enact that in the exercise of those powers the Board shall proceed in the same manner as that prescribed from time to time by the Legislature for its dealings with intraprovincial carriage. Parliament can at any time terminate the powers of the Board in regard to interprovincial carriage or alter the manner in which those powers are to be exercised. Should occasion for immediate action arise the Governor-General in Council may act under s. 5 of the Motor Vehicle Transport Act.

In my opinion there is here no delegation of law-making power, but rather the adoption by Parliament, in the exercise of its exclusive power, of the legislation of another body as it may from time to time exist, a course which has been held constitutionally valid by this Court in Attorney-General for Ontario v. Scott [[1956] SCR 137, 1955 CanLII 16] and by the Court of Appeal for Ontario in R v. Glibbery [1962 CanLII 229, [1963] 1 OR 232 (CA)].

• • •

RITCHIE J (Martland J concurring) (dissenting):

• • •

In the case of A. G. (Ontario) v. Winner ... [1954 CanLII 289, [1954] AC 541 (PC)], the Privy Council had decided that it was beyond the legislative powers of a Province (New Brunswick) to prohibit the operator of an interprovincial bus line from carrying passengers from points outside the Province to points within the Province and vice versa on the ground that no Province had jurisdiction to legislate in relation to extra-provincial transport. The matter was succinctly stated by Lord Porter at page 580 where he said:

... it is for the Dominion alone to exercise either by Act or by Regulation control over connecting undertakings.

It appears to me to be of more than passing interest to note that the Motor Vehicle Transport Act (Canada) was assented to by Parliament almost exactly four months after the decision in the Winner case had been rendered by the Privy Council and that three months later, at the request of the Province of Ontario, a proclamation was issued "declaring the said act to be in force in the said province."

It seems to me that if it is to be held that s. 3(2) of the Motor Vehicle Transport Act is valid federal legislation, then the effect of the decision in the Winner case has been effectively nullified in so far as the Province of Ontario is concerned.

• • •

In the case of the Motor Vehicle Transport Act, direct authority has been given to the local board in each Province "in its discretion to issue a licence to a person to operate an extra-provincial undertaking into or through the province," and the manner in which that discretion is to be exercised is not limited to such provincial Regulations as the Governor in Council may designate but is to be exactly the same as if the extra-provincial undertaking were a "local undertaking." In my view the effect of this legislation is that the control of the regulation of licensing of a "connecting undertaking," is turned over to the provincial authority, and in the Province of Ontario this means that the controlling legislation is the Ontario Highway Transport Board Act, R.S.O. 1960, c. 273, and the Public Commercial Vehicles Act, R.S.O. 1960, c. 319.

• • •

There can, in my view, be no objection to Parliament enacting a statute in which existing provincial legislation is incorporated by reference so as to obviate the necessity of reenacting it verbatim, but in providing for the granting of licences to extra-provincial undertakings in the like manner as if they were local undertakings, Parliament must, I think, be taken to have adopted the provisions of the provincial statutes in question as they may be amended from time to time. The result is that the granting of such licences is governed by the Public Commercial Vehicles Act, supra, pursuant to s. 16 of which the Lieutenant-Governor-in-Council may make Regulations

... (q) respecting any matter necessary or advisable to carry out effectively the intent and purpose of this Act, ...

I can only read this as meaning that the licensing Regulations for extra-provincial transport may be governed by decisions made from time to time by the Lieutenant-Governor-in-Council without any control by, or reference to, the federal authority. This is very different from adopting by reference the language used in a provincial statute and, in my opinion, it means that the control over the regulation of licensing in this field has been left in provincial hands.

It is, of course, true that Parliament can at any time terminate the powers of the provincial Boards to license extra-provincial undertakings, but it seems to me that this would entail repealing s. 3(2) of the Motor Vehicle Transport Act and it is the constitutionality of that subsection which is here impugned.

It is also suggested that the Governor-in-Council might exercise control by acting under s. 5 of the Motor Vehicle Transport Act ... [quoted above].

... I do not read this latter section as reserving any power to the Governor-in-Council to nullify the effect of s. 3(2) of the Act by exempting all extra-provincial transport from its provisions, and I am therefore of opinion that no control was retained by the federal authority over the unlimited legislative powers which it purported to transfer to the Province by the language employed in s. 3(2) of the Act. Presumably, any person or undertaking exempted by the Governor in Council from the provisions of the Act would be without authority to operate in the Province of Ontario, unless and until provision was made for the granting of a federal licence, but this would in no way affect the powers which s. 3(2) purported to confer on the Board to issue licences to persons or undertakings which had not been so exempted.

In my view, therefore, in enacting the Motor Vehicle Transport Act, and particularly s. 3(2) and s. 5 thereof, the Parliament of Canada purported to relinquish all control over a field in which Parliament has exclusive jurisdiction under the British North America Act, and left the power to exercise control of the licensing of extra-provincial undertakings to be regulated in such manner as the province might from time to time determine.

I. INTRODUCTION AND OVERVIEW OF THIS CHAPTER

As noted throughout this book, the judiciary is an essential player in the Canadian constitution. Canada's legal system is characterized, above all, by a commitment to the rule of law. One of the constitutive elements of that is a positive system of laws applied and upheld by an impartial, independent judiciary.

Aside from the rule of law, other key principles relevant to the judiciary are judicial independence and the separation of powers. These principles stand in a symbiotic relationship with other constitutional principles, such as parliamentary supremacy, federalism, and democratic governance. (A review of these foundational principles can be found both in the Introduction and in Reference re Secession of Quebec, [1998] 2 SCR 217, 1998 CanLII 793, excerpted in Chapter 2, Judicial Review and Constitutional Interpretation.)

Confederation affirmed some of the principles above through a number of written provisions. The preamble of the Constitution Act, 1867 expressed a desire for a constitution "similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom.” Section 129 maintained the pre-Confederation court system based on the primacy of the superior courts of inherent jurisdiction. And, finally, specific provisions (ss 96-101, s 92(14)) set out how the courts would function in a federal system.

Section 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982 confirms that the Constitution is the supreme law of Canada, and any law inconsistent with it is of no force or effect. The preamble to the Charter reaffirms the principle of the rule of law, and s 11(d) guarantees the right to be presumed innocent of an offence until determined otherwise in a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal. In addition, s 24 permits anyone whose Charter rights or freedoms have been infringed or denied to apply to a “court of competent jurisdiction” to seek an “appropriate and just” remedy.

The Canadian judiciary encompasses distinct court systems, each with intermediate appeal courts. Sections 92(4) and (16) of the Constitution Act, 1867 empower provinces to create “inferior,” statutory courts vested with civil and criminal jurisdiction. At the federal level, s 101 of the Act empowers Parliament to create its own statutory courts “for the better Administration of the Laws of Canada.”

Notwithstanding the country’s federal structure, Canadian trial and appellate courts have mixed jurisdiction. This is why, for example, provincial inferior courts can hear matters arising under the federal Criminal Code.

Additionally, as noted above, s 129 of the Constitution Act, 1867 maintained the superior common law courts that had been operating prior to Confederation. Note that, by virtue of s 96, the federal government appoints judges to those superior courts.

In 1975, the Supreme Court of Canada gained the ability to decide most of the appeals it would hear, based on the national importance of an issue of law or of mixed law and fact (a small number of appeals are still heard “as of right”). As a result, the Court’s docket came to include more public law cases. In addition, the Court issues reference or advisory opinions, mostly on constitutional questions, that reach the Court either directly from the federal Cabinet or on appeal from references issued by provincial appellate courts. (References are discussed in Section VII of this chapter.)

Section II of this chapter reviews the basic structure of the Canadian judicial system and the role of the judiciary, which has changed considerably since Confederation. It sets out the elements of the judicial system. Section III turns to the Supreme Court’s interpretation and application of the constitutional provisions—especially s 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867—designed to preserve the historical role of the superior courts within the British legal tradition. The Supreme Court has extended the s 96 safeguards in three ways: against the federal government, as a guarantee of certain superior court supervisory review over administrative tribunals, and as an assurance of access to justice.

Section IV examines the unwritten constitutional principle of judicial independence. Section V considers judicial appointments, looking first at provincial, superior, and federal courts, and, second, the Supreme Court of Canada. Section VI looks at judges’ security of tenure and the related issue of judicial discipline. Finally, Section VII considers a number of issues pertinent to how constitutional issues get before courts.

II. THE COURT STRUCTURE

The Canadian court structure is founded on the special independence accorded to the superior courts (trial and appellate) of each province and territory. As the descendants of British common law courts, superior court judges enjoy security of tenure and remuneration to ensure their impartiality and freedom from political pressure or manipulation.

Only superior courts possess what is called “inherent jurisdiction.” Originally, this meant that, unless expressly removed by statute, their jurisdiction was “plenary”—extending to any type of legal case. However, as discussed in more detail in Section III, the courts have strengthened their jurisdiction against legislative attempts to narrow it.

Under the Constitution, statutory and superior courts are structured differently. For statutory courts, the level of government that establishes the court is also responsible for appointing and paying its judges. In contrast, while provinces are responsible for the administration of superior courts (under s 92(14)), the federal order of government appoints, remunerates, and safeguards the security of tenure of its judges (under s 96).

The Supreme Court of Canada, which Parliament was permitted to create under s 101, is now composed of nine judges. Its enabling statute, the Supreme Court Act, RSC 1985, c S-26, states that the federal executive (through the governor general) appoints judges to the Court. By convention, appointments of associate or "puisne" justices are based on the recommendation of the minister of justice. For the position of chief justice, the prime minister makes the recommendation personally. There is no legislated process for these appointments. In recent years, different governments have tried out different methods to permit more parliamentary input. More detail on the appointment process to the court is set out below in Section V.

The Federal Court, which is also anticipated by s 101 of the Constitution Act, 1867, operates under the Federal Courts Act, RSC 1985, c F-7, with jurisdiction over matters arising under federal law, such as copyright, patents, and trademarks; tax; and citizenship. The Federal Court also has the power of judicial review over federal officials and agencies exercising administrative authority under federal laws.

The Federal Court, which has both a trial and appellate division, enjoys concurrent jurisdiction with the provincial superior courts to adjudicate constitutional cases so long as they arise within the Court's area of statutory authority.

Under s 92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867, the provinces have jurisdiction over the "Constitution, Maintenance, and Organization of Provincial Courts, both of Civil and Criminal Jurisdiction" as well as "Procedure in Civil Matters in those Courts." Pursuant to s 129 of the Constitution Act, 1867, the provinces and territories have continued to maintain the superior trial courts (under a number of names—for example, Court of Queen's Bench, Supreme Court, Superior Court, or Superior Court of Justice) as well as an appellate level court (named the Court of Appeal or Appeal Division). These courts oversee trials and appellate review in criminal law and divorce cases, which are under federal jurisdiction, civil cases under provincial law, and constitutional cases.

The Constitution Act, 1867, in ss 96 to 100, secures the special status of the provincial superior courts. Section 96 provides that the governor general has the authority to appoint these judges. (While the original text refers to the "Superior, District and County Courts," only the superior courts remain in operation today.) Section 98 stipulates that eligibility for appointment requires membership in the relevant bar. Section 99 ensures the security of tenure of these judges—they hold office during good behaviour, must retire at age 75, and can only be removed from office by the governor general upon address of the Senate and House of Commons. Section 100 provides financial security, stipulating that the salaries, allowances, and pensions of these judges must be "fixed and provided by the Parliament of Canada."

There is one remaining component of the judicial structure to consider—the provincial and territorial court systems, which operate solely under those jurisdictions which appoint and pay their judges. These courts are strictly statutory, with jurisdiction over both civil and criminal matters. In criminal law, their jurisdiction includes all but the most serious criminal offences. They lack inherent jurisdiction, and their judgments are subject to statutory appeal or judicial review in the superior courts.

As is evident from the description above, the Canadian judicial system is complex. That complexity has presented a number of challenges and intriguing questions, a number of which are developed in the rest of this chapter.

III. THE SEPARATION OF POWERS AND THE SECTION 96 COURTS

The separation of powers (also discussed in Chapter 1, Introduction) is a foundational constitutional doctrine. It provides that different functions will be performed by different branches of government: legislative, executive, and judicial. That said, the doctrine is attenuated in a country with a parliamentary system of government because the executive derives its authority from the confidence of the legislature and, indeed, draws most if not all of its members from that body.

A lot of Canadian case law on the separation of powers relates to the judiciary. At least in part, that is because the judicial role has greatly expanded since the Constitution Act, 1982. While separation of powers concerns are not limited to cases dealing with the Charter, Canadian courts acknowledged quite early on that that element had added a new dimension to their role: Operation Dismantle v The Queen, [1985] 1 SCR 441, 1985 CanLII 74; Wells v Newfoundland, [1999] 3 SCR 199, 1999 CanLII 657; Newfoundland (Treasury Board) v NAPE, 2004 SCC 66; Cooper v Canada (Human Rights Commission), [1996] 3 SCR 854, 1996 CanLII 152.

Citing the doctrine of separation of powers, the Canadian Supreme Court has declined to deal with a number of issues touching on core powers of other branches, including prosecutorial discretion, parliamentary privileges, and Crown prerogatives. A converse development has been the Court's use of separation of powers principles so as to enhance its power. Some of these are canvassed below.

A. SECTION 96 AND THE ADJUDICATIVE FUNCTION

NOTE: JOHN EAST IRON WORKS

In Labour Relations Board of Saskatchewan v John East Iron Works Ltd, 1948 CanLII 266, [1949] AC 134 (UKJCPC), the Privy Council addressed a challenge to certain powers vested in a provincially appointed tribunal. Under the Trade Union Act, 1944, the province of Saskatchewan established a Labour Relations Board with the power to require reinstatement of and compensation to employees who had been unlawfully dismissed. When John East Iron Works Ltd terminated the employment of six employees, the United Steelworkers of America complained that the company had engaged in an unfair labour practice. The Labour Relations Board ordered reinstatement and compensation, but the Court of Appeal for Saskatchewan quashed those orders on the grounds that only superior courts could have awarded them. The Board successfully appealed this decision to the Privy Council.

At the Privy Council, Lord Simonds identified factors that would become the basic elements of analysis in s 96 litigation: the continuity of the historical role of the superior courts, the contrast between the modes of adjudication afforded for claims based on the common law and claims to entitlements embedded in legislated policy regimes, the different kind of expertise required of the adjudicator in these different contexts, and the importance of supervision by the superior courts.

Over time, other considerations were added. Federal tribunals were subject to similar restrictions as provincial ones. Judges considered the "core" powers of the superior courts, asking, for example, whether the exclusive assignment to inferior courts and tribunals of functions traditionally exercised by the superior courts undermined the independence of the judiciary and the separation of powers. ("Core powers" are discussed later in this section under MacMillan Bloedel.)

The Supreme Court of Canada's advisory opinion in Re Residential Tenancies Act, excerpted below, adapted Lord Simonds's tests to a proposed Residential Tenancy Commission. Established by a 1979 Ontario law, the Commission was designed to protect tenants at a time of apartment scarcity. Prior to the law coming into effect, the Ontario Cabinet initiated a reference on its validity to the Ontario Court of Appeal, which advised that the Act was non-compliant with s 96. Ontario appealed that conclusion to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Justice Dickson (as he then was), considered and refined the various s 96 tests into a more systematic formulation known as "the Residential Tenancies test."

Re Residential Tenancies Act

[1981] 1 SCR 714, 1981 CanLII 24

DICKSON J (Laskin CJ and Martland, Ritchie, Estey, McIntyre, and Lamer JJ concurring):

The Residential Tenancies Act, 1979 ... set up a new tribunal, the Residential Tenancy Commission, to oversee and enforce the obligations of landlords and tenants in Ontario. The tribunal is given wide-ranging powers and functions. Some of these are purely administrative in nature, for example, the Commission is charged with the obligation of informing members of the public as to their rights under the legislation. But by far the most significant role to be played is in the resolution of disputes between landlords and tenants. ...

• • •

... [T]he Courts have applied an increasingly broad test of constitutional validity in upholding the establishment of administrative tribunals within provincial jurisdiction. ... [I]t is now open to the provinces to invest administrative bodies with "judicial functions" as part of a broader policy scheme. ...

The teaching of John East Labour Relations Board of Saskatchewan v John East Iron Works Ltd, 1978 CanLII 266, [1949] AC 134 (UKJCPC), Tomko v Labour Relations Board (Nova Scotia), [1977] 1 SCR 112, 1975 CanLII 183], and Mississauga [City of Mississauga v Regional Municipality of Peel, [1979] 2 SCR 244, 1979 CanLII

37] is that one must look to the "institutional setting" in order to determine whether a particular power or jurisdiction can validly be conferred on a provincial body. ...

The jurisprudence since John East leads one to conclude that the test must now be formulated in three steps. The first involves consideration, in the light of the historical conditions existing in 1867, of the particular power or jurisdiction conferred upon the tribunal. The question here is whether [it] conforms to the power or jurisdiction exercised by Superior, District or County Courts at the time of Confederation. ...

If the historical inquiry leads to the conclusion that the power or jurisdiction is not broadly conformable to jurisdiction formerly exercised by s. 96 courts, that is the end of the matter. ... If, however, the historical evidence indicates that the impugned power is identical or analogous to a power exercised by s. 96 courts at Confederation, then one must proceed to the second step of the inquiry.

Step two involves consideration of the function within its institutional setting to determine whether the function itself is different when viewed in that setting. ... The primary issue is the nature of the question which the tribunal is called upon to decide. Where the tribunal is faced with a private dispute between parties, and [must apply] a recognized body of rules in a manner consistent with fairness and impartiality, then, normally, it is acting in a "judicial capacity." To borrow the terminology of Professor Ronald Dworkin, the judicial task involves questions of "principle," that is, consideration of the competing rights of individuals or groups. This can be contrasted with questions of "policy" involving competing views of the collective good of the community as a whole. (See Dworkin, Taking Rights Seriously (Duckworth, 1977) pp. 82-90.)

If, after examining the institutional context, it becomes apparent that the power is not being exercised as a "judicial power" then the inquiry need go no further ... and the provincial scheme is valid. [If it is ...], then it becomes necessary to proceed to the third and final step in the analysis and review the tribunal's function as a whole in order to appraise the impugned function in its entire institutional context. ... It may be that the impugned "judicial powers" are merely subsidiary or ancillary to general administrative functions assigned to the tribunal (John East; Tomko) or ... necessarily incidental to the achievement of a broader policy goal ... (Mississauga). In such a situation, the grant of judicial power to provincial appointees is valid. The scheme is only invalid when the adjudicative function is a sole or central function of the tribunal (Farrah) so that the tribunal can be said to be operating "like a s. 96 court."

[Applying the historical test, Dickson J noted (at 738) that "the settlement of disputes between landlords and tenants ... [had] always been within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Superior, District and County Court judges."

In considering the second stage of the test, Dickson J concluded that the commission—which was required to analyze the law, apply the law to the facts, make a decision, and issue an order—was "exercising judicial powers roughly in the same way" as the courts (at 745).

With respect to the third stage, Dickson J stated that "the central function of the Commission is that of resolving disputes, in the final resort by a judicial form of hearing between landlords and tenants" (at 746). The power to mediate was of secondary importance, available only on application by one of the parties, and other powers were either "ancillary" or "bear no relation" to the core power of adjudication.

Accordingly, the impugned provisions were invalid.]

Appeal dismissed.

NOTE

While it became an important tool for s 96, the Residential Tenancies test also spurred criticism and concern. The test requires historical analysis that is highly dependent upon the quality of evidence adduced before the Court, which in turn depends on the competence (and resources) of parties. The test has been criticized, as well, for lacking precision.

Peter Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada, 5th ed (Scarborough, Ont: Carswell, 2007) (loose-leaf) at 7-49, took the view that while the test is no doubt a sound synthesis of the prior case law ... it is not satisfactory as constitutional-law doctrine. Each of the three steps is vague and disputable in many situations, and small differences between the provinces in their history or institutional arrangements can spell the difference between the validity and invalidity of apparently similar administrative tribunals.

For another critical assessment, see Robin Elliot, "Rethinking Section 96: From a Question of Power to a Question of Rights" in Denis N Magnusson & DA Soberman, eds, Canadian Constitutional Dilemmas Revisited (Kingston, Ont: Institute of Intergovernmental Relations, 1997).

In Sobeys Stores Ltd v Yeomans and Labour Standards Tribunal, Wilson J addressed a number of issues relating to the first, historical factor. In particular, she discussed whether it was acceptable to have divergent results in different provinces given that s 96 was intended to standardize the superior court system across the country.

Sobeys Stores Ltd v Yeomans and Labour Standards Tribunal (NS)

[\[1989\] 1 SCR 238, 1989 CanLII 116](#)

WILSON J (Dickson CJ and McIntyre and Lamer JJ concurring):

The respondent Sobeys Stores Limited ("Sobeys") operates a chain of grocery supermarkets in the Atlantic provinces. The appellant Clifford Yeomans was continuously employed by Sobeys ... [for ten years] when he was dismissed for alleged unsatisfactory performance ...

Yeomans complained to the Director of Labour Standards for Nova Scotia that he had been dismissed "without just cause" within the meaning of s. 67A of the Code [Labour Standards Code, SNS 1972, c 10]. The Director ordered that Yeomans be reinstated and that Sobeys pay him $21,242 in lost wages stemming from the unjust dismissal. This decision was upheld by the Labour Standards Tribunal. ... [Sobeys successfully appealed.] The [Nova Scotia Supreme Court] held that ss. (2) and (3) of s. 67A of the Code were unconstitutional because they conferred a s. 96 power on a provincially appointed tribunal.

[Justice Wilson first asked whether the tribunal's jurisdiction over unjust dismissal conformed to the powers of s 96 courts at the time of Confederation. In the course of this analysis, she considered three problems. The first was how specific the characterization of the function should be.]

• • •

In argument before this Court both the Attorney General of Nova Scotia (appellant) and the respondent Sobeys initially characterized the jurisdiction under s. 67A as jurisdiction in relation to the equitable remedy of specific performance of employment contracts. Each argued that such a characterization would [fall] in his favour When the argument progressed to the second and third stages of the Residential

Tenancies test [Re Residential Tenancies Act, [1981] 1 SCR 714, 1981 CanLII 24], [however,] the same parties suggested broader characterizations such as "unjust dismissal," "employer–employee relations" and "labour standards." Counsel for the other appellant, Yeomans, argued consistently throughout that the jurisdiction was over "master–servant relations." [Justice Hart, in the Appeal Division, characterized s 67A as a provision relating to "unjust dismissal."]

... The purposes of s. 96 require a strict, that is to say a narrow, approach to characterization at the first stage. ... [A]ny other approach would potentially open the door to large accretions of jurisdiction and thereby defeat the purposes of the constitutional provision. I would therefore reject as too broad characterizations of the s. 67A jurisdiction as being in relation to employer/employee relations or labour standards.

Having rejected broad characterizations, the court is given a choice between two possible narrow ones, jurisdiction over reinstatement or jurisdiction over unjust dismissal. ...

I would ... resolve the issue by reference to the language and purpose of the Residential Tenancies test. At the first stage the search is for "broad conformity" with the powers of s. 96 courts at Confederation. It is a search for analogous, not precisely the same, jurisdiction. Even if I were to accept the appellant's contention that the remedy of reinstatement was outside the purview of s. 96 courts . . . I do not think that should be determinative in s. 96 cases. To do so would be to freeze the jurisdiction of those courts at 1867 by a technical analysis of remedies . . . The question of new remedies for traditional causes of action is better suited to the second and third steps of the Residential Tenancies test which are specifically designed to allow the courts to consider ... approaches which are more responsive to changing social conditions. Thus, the jurisdiction in this case should, in my view, be characterized as jurisdiction in relation to unjust dismissal.

[Justice Wilson next considered whether the superior court jurisdiction at the time of Confederation must be exclusive.]

... [A] certain gloss must be added to the Residential Tenancies test. At the first step, the threshold question is whether at Confederation superior courts exercised an exclusive jurisdiction. This test accords with the general principle that inferior court jurisdiction need not be frozen at its pre-Confederation level: see Re Cour de Magistrat de Quebec [[1965] SCR 772, 1965 CanLII 46]. If the jurisdiction was exclusive to superior courts, then the inquiry must pass on to the second and third stages of the test. If the jurisdiction was shared, the legislation under challenge may, in some circumstances, be held valid by the historical test.

... In all cases, ... the inquiry should be directed to the question whether or not the work of the inferior courts at the time of Confederation was broadly co-extensive with that of the superior courts. Only if this standard is met will the history of shared jurisdiction validate the contemporary scheme under the historical test.

[Justice Wilson then considered the geographic scope of the historical inquiry.]

It seems to me that this issue should be resolved by answering a somewhat broader question—does pre-confederation jurisdiction refer to pre-1867 jurisdiction or to jurisdiction ... immediately prior to [a] province joining confederation? ... [P]ast decisions of this Court have been somewhat inconsistent. ...

In resolving this issue I take as my starting point this Court's decision in Residential Tenancies. In describing the historical test Dickson J. had this to say at pp. 729 and 734: ...

... the test must now be formulated in three steps. The first involves consideration, in the light of the historical conditions existing in 1867, of the particular power or jurisdiction conferred upon the tribunal. The question here is whether the power or jurisdiction conforms to the power or jurisdiction exercised by superior, district or county courts at the time of Confederation. [Emphasis added.]

Although it might be argued that the references to 1867 [in the Residential Tenancies case] were the result of the fact that [that case] emanated from Ontario, I think the better view is that they were intended to refer generally to the original bargain made in 1867. ...

... When new provinces joined confederation they accepted the existing constitutional arrangements in ss. 91 and 92 and must, in my view, be taken to have done the same with s. 96.

... [T]he Residential Tenancies test of 1867 jurisdiction should be expanded somewhat to include examination of the general historical conditions in all four original confederating provinces. ...

... [Section] 96 should apply in the same way across the country. The "strong constitutional basis for national unity, through a unitary judicial system" (Residential Tenancies, p. 728) would indeed be undermined by inconsistent results derived from a jurisprudence developed province by province. ...

I do not wish to suggest that there must be uniformity of result for all s. 96 challenges

... It is entirely possible that different results may emerge from analyzing contemporary schemes in light of the second and third stages of the Residential Tenancies test. I am suggesting only that consistency at the level of the historical analysis would seem to be desirable The test at this stage should be national, not provincial.

[In case of a tie, as there was in this case, Wilson J stated that the Court should "examine jurisdiction in the United Kingdom at the time of Confederation" (at 266-67).
